Article 32, as recently amended by NDAA FY 2014 and NDAA FY 2015, requires completion of a preliminary hearing as a precondition to referral of charges to a general court-martial. The statute provides that the purpose of a preliminary hearing is limited to: (1) determining whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense; (2) determining whether there is jurisdiction over the accused and the offense(s); (3) considering the form of the charge(s); and (4) recommending "the disposition that should be made of the case." An impartial hearing officer, normally a judge advocate senior in rank to the accused, presides at the preliminary hearing and prepares a post-hearing report for the convening authority addressing probable cause, jurisdiction, the form of the charges, and the hearing officer's recommendation as to disposition. At the hearing, the accused, who must be advised of the charges, has the right to be represented by counsel, to cross-examine witnesses who testify, and to present evidence in defense and mitigation that is relevant to the purposes of the hearing. The hearing officer may consider uncharged misconduct, subject to providing notice to the accused and affording the accused the same opportunities for representation, cross-examination, and presentation of evidence as are available regarding the charges.

Article 32(d)(3) provides that a victim (including any military member) who declines to testify at the preliminary hearing cannot be required to do so. Under Article 32(e), the preliminary hearing must be recorded, and a copy of the recording must be provided to a victim upon request. The requirements of Article 32 are binding on all convening authorities; however, failure to follow them does not constitute jurisdictional error.

3. Historical Background

Article 32 traces its history to the 1920 amendments to the Articles of War, which grew out of the post-World War I debates concerning the administration of military justice in the Army during the war.[1] A significant concern raised during the hearings and debates concerned the practice under which "a soldier may be put on trial by a commanding officer's arbitrary discretion, without any preliminary inquiry into the probability of the charge."[2] The 1920 amendments to the Articles of War established a requirement that:

> No charge will be referred for trial until after a thorough and impartial investigation thereof shall have been made. This investigation will include inquiries as to the truth of the matter set forth in said charges, form of charges, and what disposition of the case should be made in the interest of justice and discipline. At such investigation full opportunity shall be given to the accused to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available and to present anything he may desire in his own behalf either in defense or mitigation, and the investigating officer shall examine available witnesses requested by the accused. If the charges are forwarded after such investigation, they shall be accompanied by a statement of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides . . . .[3]

The goal of this statutory pretrial investigation was to ensure adequate preparation of cases; to guard against hasty, ill-considered charges; to save innocent persons from the stigma of unfounded charges; and to prevent trivial cases from going before general courts-martial.[4]

The post-World War II military justice debates resulted in a series of amendments to the Articles of War known as the Elston Act.[5] Among the changes, Congress moved "pretrial investigations" to Article 46 and amended the statute to permit the accused to be Discipline in the Navy was controlled by the Articles for the Government of the Navy, which contained no statutory provision for a pretrial investigation. The Articles for the Government of the Navy were adopted in 1862 and had not been substantially amended since that time. Coast Guard Disciplinary Regulations called for a "careful investigation into the circumstances on which the complaint is founded" and a written report which included available witnesses and evidence.

It was also during this time that the Army first developed the criminal investigative division within the Military Police Corps to conduct criminal investigations. However, at this early stage, investigators were selected from military police units within each individual command, and they generally lacked investigative training and experience. The Navy's criminal investigative organization did not develop until 1945, when the Office of Naval Intelligence charter was expanded to include criminal investigations.

represented by counsel at the investigation.[6] Two years later, Congress consolidated the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the Disciplinary Rules for the Coast Guard into the UCMJ and incorporated the requirement for a pretrial investigation.[7] The language of Article 32 outlining its purpose, however, remained essentially the same as under the original statute under the 1920 Articles of War: an inquiry as to the truth of the matter set forth in the charges, consideration of the form of charges, and a recommendation as to the disposition which should be made of the case "in the interest of justice and discipline."[8]

Subsequent to enactment of the UCMJ, the statutory provisions governing the Article 32 investigation remained largely unchanged over the next six decades, with only minor technical and clarifying amendments. The Military Justice Amendments of 1981 clarified the accused's right to individual military counsel at the investigation and aligned the right to counsel in Article 32(b) with the right to counsel under Article 27 and the duties of counsel contained in Article 38.[9] NDAA FY 1996 amended the statute to provide for the investigation of uncharged misconduct,[10] and NDAA FY 2012 expanded the subpoena authority under Article 47 to include a subpoena to compel the production of documents and evidence issued in connection with an Article 32 investigation.[11]

In NDAA FY 2014, Congress revised Article 32 in its entirety, with the new provisions applying to offenses committed on or after December 27, 2014.[12] The Joint Explanatory Statement accompanying the final bill noted that the legislation "changes Article 32, UCMJ, proceedings from an investigation to a preliminary hearing."[13] The statement drew the

As Congress was enacting the Elston Act, the Navy was conducting a review of the Articles for Government of the Navy. Although these Articles did not require a pretrial investigation, internal Service regulations called for an inquiry by the officer recommending court-martial, who could order a board of investigation or court of inquiry if additional development of the facts was needed. See SYNOPSIS OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF NAVAL JUSTICE, OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, NAVY DEPARTMENT (1947), available at http://www.loc.gov/mwg-internal/de5fs23hu73ds/progress?id=yHs22rx0-_bQk8Zm_NTgo2FGtJbHsUEszdpj8uXPbRo.

following contrast between an Article 32 "investigation" under then-current law and an Article 32 "preliminary hearing" under the new version of Article 32:

> Under current law and Rule 405 of the Rules for Courts-Martial, an Article 32, UCMJ investigation includes an inquiry into the truth of the matters set forth in the charges, provides a means to ascertain and impartially weigh all available facts in arriving at conclusions and recommendations, and serves as a tool of discovery. The agreement establishes that an Article 32, UCMJ, preliminary hearing has a narrower objective: (1) Determine whether there is probable cause to believe an offense has been committed and that the accused committed the offense; (2) Determine whether the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the offense and the accused; (3) Consider the form of the charges; and (4) Recommend the disposition that should be made of the case.[14]

Subsequently, Congress approved a technical amendment to the new Article 32 to clarify that the accused, as under prior law, could waive the Article 32 proceeding.[15]

4. Contemporary Practice

The new Article 32 provisions apply to all preliminary hearings held on or after December 27, 2014. A recent executive order contains the implementing rules and procedures for the new Article 32, including a new R.C.M. 404A addressing disclosure of matters to the defense before the preliminary hearing.[16] The substance of the new statute and the new implementing provisions have not been addressed in reported appellate decisions.[17] Part II of this Report will further consider contemporary practice in light of any developments in the implementing rules or the applicable case law concerning Article 32.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is not a direct corollary to the Article 32 hearing in federal civilian practice. Both the prior Article 32 investigation and the current Article 32 preliminary hearing have been compared to two distinct types of civilian proceedings—a civilian grand jury and a judicial probable cause hearing.[18] The current Article 32 preliminary hearing has some of the traits of both, and possesses other traits common to neither.

In federal civilian criminal trials, the right to a grand jury is established through the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution and is implemented in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which recognize the right to grand jury indictment in all felony cases.[19] The Supreme Court has described the purpose and powers of the grand jury in expansive terms:

> [The grand jury] serves the dual function of determining if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions. It has . . . extraordinary powers of investigation and great responsibility for directing its own efforts. . . . Without thorough and effective investigation, the grand jury would be unable either to ferret out crimes deserving of prosecution, or to screen out charges not warranting prosecution.[20]

The U.S. Attorney's Manual, however, describes a narrower role for grand jurors:

> While grand juries are sometimes described as performing accusatory and investigatory functions, the grand jury's principal function is to determine whether or not there is probable cause to believe that one or more persons committed a certain Federal offense within the venue of the district court. . . . The grand jury's power, although expansive, is limited by its function toward possible return of an indictment . . . [and] cannot be used solely to obtain additional evidence against a defendant who has already been indicted [or] used solely for pre-trial discovery or trial preparation.[21]

Although the grand jury is often described as an independent body—and grand juries do act with independence in many areas—the Supreme Court has stated that it is "an appendage of the court, powerless to perform its investigative function without the court's aid, because powerless itself to compel the testimony of witnesses."[22] This specifically includes the ability of the grand jury to issue subpoenas. However, the court's ability to exercise its supervisory power over grand juries is limited.[23]

Regular federal grand juries are standing bodies, impaneled for up to eighteen months, although they may actually sit for as little as once a month. Grand juries have a maximum of 23 members, with 16 needed for a quorum. An indictment may be returned by a vote of 12 or more members.[24] The grand jury does not conduct its business in open court, and a federal judge does not preside over its proceedings. It meets behind closed doors, in secret, with only the grand jurors, the attorney for the government, witnesses, a recorder, and possibly an interpreter present. The target of a grand jury investigation or a potential defendant may request to appear and testify before the grand jury, but may actually appear only if invited or subpoenaed and may not be accompanied by counsel while testifying. In addition, a potential defendant has no right to cross-examine witnesses and no right to introduce evidence in rebuttal. Hearsay evidence is generally permissible at the grand jury proceeding, and there is no legal requirement for the prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence.[25]

There are four possible outcomes from a federal grand jury investigation: (1) an indictment, in which the grand jury accuses an individual investigated of a specific crime and the government is authorized to proceed to trial; (2) a vote not to indict, which is binding on the government unless the U.S. Attorney specifically authorizes the case to be re-presented to the same or a different grand jury; (3) the discharge or expiration of the grand jury without any action; or (4) the submission of a presentment or report to the court.[26] In the majority of cases that go before a grand jury, the government will have already conducted a criminal investigation, and is primarily seeking an indictment. In these cases, the attorney for the government will present evidence to the grand jury, including testimony from criminal investigators or law enforcement agents, in order to establish probable cause for the indictment. In other cases, however, the investigation will be incomplete before the grand jury stage, and the grand jury—either on its own initiative or at the suggestion of the attorney for the government—will investigate the matter presented by the government. In its investigative capacity, the grand jury has the power to issue subpoenas to compel the testimony of witnesses and the production of documents and physical evidence.[27] A grand jury uses the court's subpoena power, as provided in Fed. R. Crim. P. 17.

In addition to the grand jury, federal civilian practice also provides for an adversarial preliminary hearing, to be conducted between 14-21 days following a not-yet-indicted accused's initial appearance following arrest.[28] The hearing is presided over by a federal magistrate judge, whose role is to determine whether there is probable cause for the charges. If there is probable cause, the magistrate judge "binds over" the charges for felony trial (pending indictment) in U.S. district court; if there is not probable cause, the magistrate judge dismisses the complaint.[29] The purpose of this proceeding is to provide the accused a procedural protection against baseless charges early in the life of a case in situations where the government has not yet sought or obtained a grand jury indictment.[30]

With respect to state practice, the Constitutional guarantee of prosecution by grand jury indictment is not applicable to the states,[31] and the Supreme Court has held that independent judicial screening of felony-level charges through a preliminary hearing is not a due process requirement.[32] Nevertheless, all American jurisdictions provide at least one procedural avenue for obtaining such a screening, and nearly two-thirds of the states allow for filing of felony-level charges without a prior grand jury indictment.[33] Instead, most of these states allow felony cases to be brought following an adversarial preliminary hearing similar to the one provided for by Fed. R. Crim. P. 5.1. Six of these states permit bypassing the preliminary hearing through direct filing of an information (a charging instrument filed with the court similar in both content and function to charges that are referred to a court-martial).[34] In these direct filing jurisdictions, the trial judge makes an ex parte probable cause determination after the filing of the information by the prosecutor, by reviewing the charges and the prosecutor's sworn affidavit summarizing the available evidence.[35]

Like Article 32 hearings, state-level preliminary hearings are generally adversarial in nature. The accused has a right to counsel and to cross-examine witnesses; though in the majority of jurisdictions the rules of evidence do not apply, except with respect to privileges.[36] Most jurisdictions recognize a general defense right to present defense witnesses at the preliminary hearing.[37] However, "[w]here the magistrate has reason to believe that the defense is calling a witness to obtain further discovery of the prosecution's case, the magistrate may require the defense to make an offer of proof as to what will be obtained from the witness' testimony."[38] Furthermore, in most jurisdictions, magistrate judges will not allow subpoenas of crime victims to testify at the preliminary hearing, or at any pretrial proceeding, unless it can be shown that they are likely to be unavailable to testify at trial.[39]

The primary purposes of preliminary hearings in both federal and state practice—similar to the primary purposes of Article 32 and its statutory predecessors in the Articles of War—are to prevent hasty, malicious, improvident, or oppressive prosecutions; to ensure that there are substantial grounds upon which a prosecution may be based; and to avoid the unnecessary public expense of an unwarranted trial.[40] To ensure these purposes are fulfilled, the magistrate judge's probable cause determination is generally binding on the government.[41] Preliminary hearings also serve several prosecution and public policy goals, including: helping to inform the decision by the government whether to proceed with criminal prosecution at the felony trial court; informing the ultimate decision by the accused with respect to his plea;[42] gaining the defense perspective as to what actually happened; promoting the victim's interest in pursuing the matter by presenting it in a public forum; and promoting public confidence in a sensitive prosecutorial decision by having the evidence presented in a public forum and the decision ratified by a neutral and detached magistrate (or, if the case is likely to be dismissed, by showing that the dismissal stemmed from deficiencies in the evidence rather than any favoritism on the part of the prosecutor).[43] For these reasons, in most states where there is an option to bypass the preliminary hearing with a grand jury indictment, prosecutors generally choose not to exercise this option.[44]

The recently enacted Article 32 preliminary hearing differs from its federal and state civilian counterpart in that the preliminary hearing officer does not exercise judicial powers with respect to the disposition of charges. Instead, the preliminary hearing and the report of the preliminary hearing officer serve primarily as vehicles for developing and analyzing information for consideration by the staff judge advocate and the convening authority. The responsibility for determining probable cause and jurisdiction, as well as the responsibility for making a decision on disposition, only arise after the preliminary hearing officer prepares and forwards the report required by Article 32. At that point, before the charges and specifications may be referred to a general court-martial for trial, the staff judge advocate makes a determination on the legal issues of probable cause, jurisdiction, and whether each specification states an offense under military law which is binding on the convening authority if any of the three are lacking. As a separate matter, the staff judge advocate makes an advisory recommendation on disposition to the convening authority, the officer charged with the responsibility for making the ultimate disposition decision.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 32: Amend Article 32(a)-(c) by revising the current requirement for a disposition "recommendation" to focus the preliminary hearing officer more directly on providing an analysis of the information that will be useful in fulfilling the statutory responsibilities of: (1) the staff judge advocate, in providing legal determinations and a disposition recommendation to the convening authority under Article 34; and (2) the convening authority, in disposing of the charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline" under Article 30.

- This proposal would retain the core purposes of the Article 32 preliminary hearing as amended—to determine whether or not each specification alleges an offense, whether or not there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offense charged, and whether or not the convening authority has jurisdiction over the accused and the offense—while restructuring the current requirement for a disposition recommendation. As amended, the parties and any victim of an offense could submit additional matters relevant to disposition to the hearing officer, which the hearing officer would then organize and analyze in the preliminary hearing report. As such, the proposed amendments would retain the current limitations on the nature of the Article 32 preliminary hearing, while expanding the opportunity for victims and the accused to provide timely and useful input for consideration in the disposition decision-making process.

- The proposed amendments recognize that the preliminary hearing officer is in a unique position to organize and analyze the information developed during the preliminary hearing and—as will be developed more fully in the proposed implementing rules in Part II of this Report—a broader range of additional documentary information that the government, the accused, and the victim would be able to submit following the hearing. Under the proposed amendments, the hearing officer would use all of this information to assist and inform the staff judge advocate's recommendation and the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision.

- Under the proposal, the hearing officer's report would be required to include an analysis of whether each specification alleges an offense; whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense; whether any modifications to the specifications are needed; the evidence supporting the elements of each offense; a summary of witness testimony and documentary evidence; observations concerning the testimony of witnesses; additional information relevant to the convening authority's disposition decision under Articles 30 and 34; and a discussion of any uncharged offenses.

- The proposed amendments would emphasize that the primary responsibility for a disposition recommendation resides with the staff judge advocate under Article 34. Also, while not requiring the preliminary hearing officer to make a recommendation, the proposed legislation does not preclude the preliminary hearing officer from doing so, either when required by service regulations or by the convening authority in a particular case.

- As in the current statute, the proposal reflects that none of the preliminary hearing officer's conclusions would be binding on the convening authority, who is ultimately responsible for determining the appropriate disposition of the charges and specifications for each case in the interest of justice and discipline.

- This proposal reaffirms that a victim's desire not to testify at the preliminary hearing will not, alone, be grounds for ordering a deposition.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating, to the extent practicable and appropriate, the principles of law and the rules of procedure used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts into military justice practice.
- This recommendation also supports the GC Terms of Reference by examining and incorporating where appropriate the recommendations, proposals and analysis of the Response Systems Panel—in particular, Recommendation 115 (concerning the ordering of depositions), Recommendation 116 (regarding the treatment of the hearing officer's recommendation), and Recommendation 55 (regarding creation and implementation of mechanisms requiring trial counsel to convey the victim's specific concerns and preferences to the convening authority regarding case disposition) of the Response Systems Panel's final report.
- This recommendation is related to the proposed amendments to Articles 30, 33 and 34 concerning the staff judge advocate's responsibility to provide a recommendation, the convening authority's responsibility to appropriately dispose of the case, and guidance concerning the exercise of disposition authority.

"(b) HEARING OFFICER.—(1) A preliminary hearing under this section shall be conducted by an impartial hearing officer, who—

"(A) whenever practicable, shall be a judge advocate who is certified under section 827(b)(2) of this title (article 27(b)(2)); or

"(B) in exceptional circumstances, shall be an impartial hearing officer, who is not a judge advocate so certified.

"(2) In the case of a hearing officer under paragraph (1)(B), a judge advocate who is certified under section 827(b)(2) of this title (article 27(b)(2)) shall be available to provide legal advice to the hearing officer.

"(3) Whenever practicable, the hearing officer shall be equal in grade or senior in grade to military counsel who are detailed to represent the accused or the Government at the preliminary hearing.

"(c) REPORT TO CONVENING AUTHORITY.—After a preliminary hearing under this section, the hearing officer shall submit to the convening authority a written report (accompanied by a recording of the preliminary hearing under subsection (e)) that includes the following:

"(1) For each specification, a statement of the reasoning and conclusions of the hearing officer with respect to determinations under subsection (a)(2), including a summary of relevant witness testimony and documentary evidence presented at the hearing and any observations of the hearing officer concerning the testimony of witnesses and the availability and admissibility of evidence at trial.

"(2) Recommendations for any necessary modifications to the form of the charges or specifications.

"(3) An analysis of any additional information submitted after the hearing by the parties or by a victim of an offense, that, under such rules as the President may prescribe, is relevant to disposition under sections 830 and 834 of this title (articles 30 and 34).

"(4) A statement of action taken on evidence adduced with respect to uncharged offenses, as described in subsection (f).".

(b) SUNDRY AMENDMENTS.—Subsection (d) of such section (article) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), by striking "subsection (a)" in the first sentence and inserting "this section";

(2) in paragraph (2), by striking "in defense" and all that follows through the end and inserting "that is relevant to the issues for determination under subsection (a)(2).";

(3) in paragraph (3), by adding at the end the following new sentence: "A declination under this paragraph shall not serve as the sole basis for ordering a deposition under section 849 of this title (article 49)."; and

(4) in paragraph (4), by striking "the limited purposes of the hearing, as provided in subsection (a)(2)." and inserting the following: "determinations under subsection (a)(2).".

(c) REFERENCE TO MCM.—Subsection (e) of such section (article) is amended by striking "as prescribed by the Manual for Courts-Martial" in the second sentence and inserting "under such rules as the President may prescribe".

(d) EFFECT OF VIOLATION.—Subsection (g) of such section (article) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "A defect in a report under subsection (c) is not a basis for relief if the report is in substantial compliance with that subsection.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 603 would amend Article 32 to clarify current law concerning the requirement for and the conduct of preliminary hearings before referral of charges and specifications to general courts-martial for trial. The amendments would focus the preliminary hearing on an initial determination of probable cause, jurisdiction, and the form of the charges, and would provide for the production of evidence and the examination of witnesses to assist the preliminary hearing officer in making these determinations. In addition, the amendments would revise the requirement for a disposition recommendation—currently provided as a fourth, distinct purpose of the preliminary hearing—to focus the preliminary hearing officer more directly on providing a thorough analysis of the information developed at the hearing. The purpose of this analysis would be to inform the staff judge advocate's recommendation and the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision with respect to the charges and specifications in the case, rather than providing a disposition recommendation in summary form without supporting analysis. The report and the analysis contained within it would be advisory in nature and would be designed to assist the staff judge advocate and the convening authority. The analysis contained within the report would not provide a basis for complaint or relief when in substantial compliance with the requirements of the amended Article 32. As amended, Article 32 would contain the following provisions:

Article 32(a) would state the issues for determination at the preliminary hearing: (1) whether or not the specification alleges an offense under the UCMJ; (2) whether or not there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offense charged; and (3) whether or not the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the accused and over the offense.

Article 32(b) would retain and clarify current law concerning the qualifications of the preliminary hearing officer.

Article 32(c) would require the preliminary hearing officer's report to include an analysis of whether each specification alleges an offense; whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense; any necessary modifications to the form of the charges and specifications; the state of the evidence supporting the elements of each offense; a summary of witness testimony and documentary evidence; a statement regarding the availability and admissibility of evidence; additional information relevant to disposition of charges and specification under Articles 30 and 34; and a discussion of any uncharged offenses. The proposed amendments recognize that the primary responsibility for a disposition recommendation resides with the staff judge advocate under Article 34. Also, while not requiring the preliminary hearing officer to make a recommendation, the proposed legislation does not preclude the preliminary hearing officer from doing so, either when required by service regulations or by the convening authority in a particular case.

Article 32(c)(2) would provide the parties and any victim with the opportunity to submit additional information to the preliminary hearing officer for transmission for consideration by the convening authority with respect to disposition. The procedure for submission of additional information would be separate from the hearing, reflecting the broader range of information that may be pertinent to the exercise of disposition discretion. The implementing regulations would provide procedures for sealing or otherwise protecting sensitive or personal material in the additional information submitted by the parties or the victim.

Article 32(d)(3) would clarify that a victim's declination to participate in the Article 32 hearing "shall not serve as the sole basis for ordering a deposition" under Article 49. This change would ensure that a victim's declination under Article 32(d)(3) is not used to circumvent the limited purpose of depositions under Article 49: to preserve prospective witness testimony for use at trial, generally in cases where the prospective witness will be unavailable to testify in person. See Section 711, infra.

The proposed changes are based in part on a recognition that the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision depends on a broad range of factors relating to good order and discipline—of which the preliminary hearing officer may not be aware and which may not directly relate to the legal or factual strengths or weaknesses of the limited case as presented at the preliminary hearing—including those factors contained in the disposition guidance under the proposed new Article 33. In addition, consistent with the proposed amendments to Articles 46 and 47 (and as will be more fully developed in the Rules for Courts-Martial), the authority to issue pre-referral investigative subpoenas would be governed by a uniform policy that will apply throughout the process prior to referral, and would not be limited narrowly to Article 32 proceedings.

Article 33 (Current law) – Forwarding of Charges
10 U.S.C. § 833

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would move the requirement for prompt forwarding of charges in cases involving pretrial confinement or arrest from Article 33 to Article 10.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 33 requires that the commanding officer forward the charges against "a person who is held for trial by general court-martial," along with the Article 32 preliminary hearing report, to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction within eight days after the accused is ordered into arrest or confinement "if practicable." When such forwarding is not practicable, the article requires the commanding officer to submit a written report to the general court-martial convening authority stating the reasons for delay.

3. Historical Background

Article 33 is based on a similar provision from Article 46c of the 1948 Articles of War:

> When a person is held for trial by general court-martial the commanding officer will, within eight days after the accused is arrested or confined, if practicable, forward the charges to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction and furnish the accused a copy of such charges.[1]

This provision was derived, in turn, from Articles 70 and 71 of the 1920 Articles of War. Article 70 provided that "no officer or soldier" could be held in pretrial confinement for "more than eight days, or until such time as a court-martial can be assembled."[2] Article 71 required that "an officer" held in pretrial confinement be served with a copy of the charges within eight days of his confinement.[3] Article 71 also required that the officer be brought to trial with 10 days of the service of such charges.[4] Neither of the Article 71 requirements, apparently, applied to enlisted members who were ordered into confinement. Whereas Article 10 requires prompt disposition of offenses in all cases in which the accused is being held for trial, the drafters of the UCMJ specifically intended Article 33 to insure "an expeditious processing of charges and specifications in general courts-martial," where there was an additional pretrial requirement of the Article 32 investigation.[5] Unlike its predecessors, Article 33 requires the report of the investigating officer (now the preliminary hearing officer) to be forwarded along with the charges. The drafters acknowledged, however, that the 8-day requirement for forwarding was "just an arbitrary figure."[6] Otherwise, there was very little discussion of Article 33 during the Congressional hearings leading to the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has not implemented Article 33's 8-day requirement for the forwarding of charges to the general court-martial convening authority when a member is held in pretrial confinement anywhere in the Rules for Courts-Martial. Because it is rare in modern practice for an Article 32 hearing and report to be completed within eight days, it has not served as a realistic time frame for moving cases forward. However, the reporting requirement in Article 33 is typically performed as matter of routine in accordance with service-specific reporting regulations whenever an accused is placed in placed in pretrial confinement. Notwithstanding the statute's unrealistic time frame for forwarding charges, the courts have viewed Article 33 as serving two primary purposes independent of its specific requirements. First, the courts have held that Article 33 is a source of "speedy trial law" in the military justice system.[7] Second, the article has, historically, served to ensure early assignment of defense counsel to military members in pretrial confinement.[8] Within the Manual for Courts-Martial, there are seven provisions which require that an action be taken "as soon as practicable."[9] Among these provisions, only Article 33 also includes a time certain.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no direct federal civilian analogue for Article 33. Instead, the interests underlying Fed. R. Crim. P. 5 (Initial Appearance) and the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3161, are spread among the requirements contained in Articles 10, 30, 33, and 35, along with the rules implementing these statutes.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 33: Move the requirement for prompt forwarding of charges in cases involving pretrial arrest or confinement from Article 33 to Article 10.

- Article 33 is based upon antiquated ideas concerning how cases are processed and the speed at which they are processed. The rule is derived from a 1948 Article of War that was based on a 1920 Article of War that required service of charges in eight days after the imposition of restraint and the actual trial just ten days after service. While the 10-day requirement from the 1920 Articles of War was later dropped, the 1948 version of the statute still required service of charges within eight days of the imposition of restraint. In addition, Congress added a requirement to Article 33 that was not present in the Articles of War: that the Article 32 report of investigation be forwarded along with the charges. Under current practice, there are few cases where an Article 32 hearing will be held, let alone completed, within 8 days.

- Article 33 only applies to cases where a person is ordered into arrest or confinement pending trial by general court-martial. Moving the language in Article 33 to Article 10 will promote efficient processing of all cases involving pretrial arrest or confinement.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal will support MJRG Operational Guidance by enhancing prompt pretrial processing and disposition of offenses.

- Article 33 in its present form would be deleted, and a new provision would be inserted—"Disposition Guidance."

Article 33 (New Provision) – Disposition Guidance
10 U.S.C. § 833

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would enact a new Article 33 requiring the establishment of non-binding guidance regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline under Articles 30 and 34. This Disposition Guidance would draw upon the Principles of Federal Prosecution ("DOJ Guidelines") in the United States Attorneys' Manual, with appropriate modifications to reflect the unique purposes of military law. Part II of this Report will contain a complete draft of the proposed disposition guidance, for inclusion in the Manual for Courts-Martial as an appendix.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Under current law, convening authorities may not refer a charge to court-martial for trial in the absence of a determination that the charge is supported by probable cause. In general courts-martial, this probable cause determination is made by the staff judge advocate pursuant to Article 34, and is informed by the Article 32 hearing officer's report. In special and summary courts-martial, the probable cause screening can be performed by any judge advocate, or by the convening authority.[1] Article 30 directs commanders and convening authorities to dispose of charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline."

3. Historical Background

Before 1920, convening authorities exercised virtually unfettered discretion to dispose of charges and specifications against an accused, including by referring the charges to court-martial for trial.[2] Article 70 of the 1920 Articles of War contained the first requirement for pre-referral staff judge advocate advice. This was a procedural requirement only and the convening authority was not required to follow the advice, even if the staff judge advocate determined there was insufficient evidence to prosecute the accused.[3] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress provided, in Article 34, that convening authorities themselves must determine that a charge is supported by probable cause before referring the charge to general court-martial; and, in Article 30, Congress specified that commanders and convening authorities must dispose of charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline."[4] In 1983, Congress amended Article 34 to transfer the probable cause screening function in general courts-martial from the convening authority to the staff judge advocate.[5] In 1984, the President set forth the first Manual provision, R.C.M. 306, to expressly provide a "policy" for the disposition of offenses by military commanders and convening authorities.[6]

4. Contemporary Practice

R.C.M. 601(d)(1) provides that a convening authority generally may refer charges to any court-martial as long as "the convening authority finds or is advised by a judge advocate" that there is probable cause for the specification and that the specification alleges an offense. In general court-martial cases, this function is always performed by the staff judge advocate pursuant to Article 34. The rule further provides that the convening authority may rely on information from any source when making the referral decision, including hearsay and other evidence that may not be admissible at trial.[7]

Many factors must be taken into consideration and balanced . . . . The goal should be a disposition that is warranted, appropriate, and fair." The Discussion provides a non-exclusive list of "disposition factors" for commanders and convening authorities to consider, including: the nature of and circumstances surrounding the offense and the extent of the harm caused by the offense, including the offense's effect on morale, health, safety, welfare, and discipline; when applicable, the views of the victim as to disposition; existence of jurisdiction over the accused and the offense; availability and admissibility of evidence; the willingness of the victim or others to testify; cooperation of the accused in the apprehension or prosecution of another accused; possible improper motives or biases of the person(s) making the allegation(s); availability and likelihood of prosecution of the same or similar and related charges against the accused by another jurisdiction; and appropriateness of the authorized punishment to the particular accused or offense. In fact, the decision to prosecute may be premised on evidence which is incompetent, inadmissible, or even tainted by illegality."). The requirement for probable cause is consistent with the first sentence—but not the second—of the ABA Standards concerning the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in the charging decision: "A prosecutor should not institute, or cause to be instituted, or permit the continued pendency of criminal charges when the prosecutor knows that the charges are not supported by probable cause. A prosecutor should not institute, cause to be instituted, or permit the continued pendency of criminal charges in the absence of sufficient admissible evidence to support a conviction." ABA STANDARDS FOR THE PROSECUTION FUNCTION § 3-3.9(a).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Military charging practice and federal civilian charging practice differ significantly with respect to the decisional principles used to determine when charges should be referred to court-martial or federal criminal court for trial. In federal civilian practice, probable cause is the ethical floor for charging; above that floor, attorneys are guided by robust decision rules and charging standards that help to structure and guide the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The Principles of Federal Prosecution ("DOJ Guidelines") contained in the United States Attorneys' Manual provide the following decision rule with respect to the charging decision:

> The attorney for the government should commence or recommend Federal prosecution if he/she believes that the person's conduct constitutes a Federal offense and that the admissible evidence will probably be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction, unless, in his/her judgment, prosecution should be declined because:
> (1) No substantial Federal interest would be served by prosecution;
> (2) The person is subject to effective prosecution in another jurisdiction; or
> (3) There exists an adequate non-criminal alternative to prosecution."[8]

In addition to this rule for the charging decision, the DOJ Guidelines provide structured guidance regarding plea agreements, non-criminal alternative dispositions, and wide range of other matters impacting or implicating prosecutorial discretion.[9] In military practice, the broad admonition in Article 30 to dispose of charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline" and the R.C.M. 306 factors are not similarly structured.[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 33.2: Create a new statutory provision requiring the establishment of non-binding guidance—taking into account the Principles of Federal Prosecution in the U.S. Attorney's Manual with appropriate consideration of military requirements—regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline.

- This proposal would help to "fill the gap" that currently exists in military practice between the probable cause standard for referral of charges to court-martial and the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard for conviction. In civilian practice, this gap has been filled with structured decisional principles and charging standards to help guide prosecutors in the prudent and effective exercise of prosecutorial discretion. In military practice, the disposition decision-making guidance under Article 30 and R.C.M. 306(b) is relatively unstructured.
- The proposed disposition guidance would provide structured decisional principles to help guide commanders and convening authorities—as well as the staff judge advocates, judge advocates, and legal officers who advise them in all military justice matters—in the effective exercise of disposition discretion "in the interest of justice and discipline" in individual cases.
- Part II of this Report will contain a complete draft of the proposed disposition guidance, for inclusion in the Manual for Courts-Martial as an appendix.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by incorporating, to the extent practicable, the standards and procedures of the civilian sector with respect to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 604. DISPOSITION GUIDANCE.

Section 833 of title 10, United States Code (article 33 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§833. Art. 33. Disposition guidance

VanLandingham, Acoustic Separation in Military Justice: Filling the Decision Rule Vacuum with Ethical Standards, 11 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 389 (2014).

"The President shall direct the Secretary of Defense to issue, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, non-binding guidance regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline under sections 830 and 834 of this title (articles 30 and 34). Such guidance shall take into account, with appropriate consideration of military requirements, the principles contained in official guidance of the Attorney General to attorneys for the Government with respect to disposition of Federal criminal cases in accordance with the principle of fair and evenhanded administration of Federal criminal law.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 604 contains a complete revision of Article 33. The current statute concerning forwarding of charges in general courts-martial when the accused is in confinement would be incorporated into the closely related provisions in Article 10. Article 33, as amended, would require the establishment and maintenance of non-binding guidance regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline under Articles 30 and 34. This disposition guidance would draw upon the Principles of Federal Prosecution in the United States Attorneys' Manual, with appropriate modifications to reflect the unique purposes and requirements of military law. In doing so, the proposed guidance would enhance the disposition decision-making process and better align military charging practice with the standards and principles applicable in most civilian jurisdictions. The proposed disposition guidance would be issued by the Department of Defense, and would be included in the Manual for Courts-Martial as an appendix.

Article 34 – Advice of Staff Judge Advocate and Reference for Trial

10 U.S.C. § 834

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 34 to clarify ambiguities in the language of the current statute and to expressly tie the staff judge advocate's pre-referral disposition recommendation to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" standard for disposition of charges and specifications under Article 30(b). This proposal would further amend Article 34 to require that convening authorities consult a judge advocate on relevant legal issues before referral of charges and specifications to special courts-martial for trial, consistent with current practice.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 34 concerns the relationship between the staff judge advocate and the convening authority in the disposition decision-making process in general court-martial cases. The article contains three subsections. Article 34(a) requires convening authorities to obtain advice from their staff judge advocates before referring charges and specifications to general court-martial for trial; it also prohibits convening authorities from referring any specification to general court-martial unless the staff judge advocate finds that: (1) the specification alleges an offense; (2) the specification is "warranted by the evidence" contained in the Article 32 preliminary hearing report, if there is such a report; and (3) a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the accused and the offense. Article 34(b) requires the staff judge advocate's advice to include a written and signed statement providing conclusions on the three threshold legal issues as well as a recommendation to the convening authority regarding the disposition of each specification. The staff judge advocate's recommendation must accompany any specification referred for trial. Article 34(c) authorizes formal corrections to the charges and specifications, as well as changes to conform them to the evidence contained in the Article 32 report.

3. Historical Background

Article 34 did not come into its current form until the Military Justice Act of 1983. Before 1920, the convening authority exercised near total discretion to refer charges against a military accused to general court-martial for trial.[1] The first statutory requirement for pre-referral staff judge advocate advice appeared in Article 70 of the 1920 Articles of War, which combined various pretrial requirements that are now spread across Articles 10, 30, [1] See, e.g., MCM 1905, at 19 (requiring only that the commanding officer investigate charges before referring them to a court-martial, and that he "state in his indorsement whether or not, in his opinion, the charges can be sustained").

32, 33, 34, and 35 of the UCMJ. Paragraph 3 of Article 70 required simply that, "Before directing the trial of any charge by general court-martial the appointing authority will refer it to his staff judge advocate for consideration and advice."[2] This was a procedural requirement only; the convening authority was not obliged to follow the staff judge advocate's advice, even if the staff judge advocate determined there was insufficient evidence to prosecute the accused.

In the Elston Act of 1948, Congress moved the requirement for pre-referral staff judge advocate advice from Article 70 to Article 47(b) and placed a statutory prohibition on the convening authority's ability to refer charges to a general court-martial when certain legal thresholds were not met following review of the report of investigation under Article 46(b) (the precursor to Article 32 of the UCMJ):

> Before directing the trial of any charge by general court-martial the convening authority will refer it to his staff judge advocate for consideration and advice; and no charge will be referred to a general court-martial for trial unless it has been found that a thorough and impartial investigation thereof has been made as prescribed in the preceding article, that such is legally sufficient to allege an offense under these articles, and is sustained by evidence indicated in the report of investigation.[3]

The passive construction of "unless it has been found that . . ." was ambiguous, but seemed to indicate that the staff judge advocate was responsible for determining whether the charge was legally sufficient and sustained by the evidence. When Congress enacted the UCMJ two years later, the drafters clarified this ambiguity by explicitly vesting the convening authority—not the staff judge advocate—with the power to determine the threshold legal issues.[4] Under the new Article 34, the convening authority was prohibited from referring charges to general court-martial unless the convening authority personally determined that the charge alleged an offense under the Code and was warranted by the evidence in the Article 32 report.[5] Congress also added a new subsection (now subsection

In 1983, Congress revised Article 34 extensively, bringing the statute into its present form.[7] Language that had previously been in Article 34(a) which allowed the convening authority to obtain the required pre-referral advice from a legal officer instead of the staff judge advocate was removed.[8] Congress then updated the staff judge advocate advice consistent with what appeared to be the original intent of this provision under the Elston Act, by vesting referral "veto" authority with the staff judge advocate rather than the convening authority himself.[9] This change conformed the statute to the practice as it had developed in the decades since the UCMJ was enacted; it also acknowledged that the legality of the charges, the legal sufficiency of the evidence, and court-martial jurisdiction "involve complex legal determinations" best addressed by legally trained staff judge advocates.[10] The 1983 amendments moved subsection (b) to subsection (c) and created a new subsection (b), specifying the required content of the staff judge advocate's advice: (1) a signed, written statement of the staff judge advocate's conclusions with respect to charge sufficiency, probable cause, and jurisdiction; and (2) a recommendation of the action that the convening authority should take regarding each specification.[11] This secondary requirement implicitly tied the staff judge advocate's recommendation under Article 34 to the disposition standard articulated in Article 30(b)—"in the interest of justice and discipline"—mirroring the requirement in Article 32(a) that the Article 32 investigating officer provide "a recommendation as to the disposition which should be made of the case in the interest of justice and discipline."[12] However, this connection was never made explicitly in the statute.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 34 across several different rules in the Manual for Courts-Martial. R.C.M. 406, 407, and 601 implement Article 34(a)-(b), repeating the statutory provisions concerning the content of the staff judge advocate advice and providing additional rules and procedures applicable to referral of charges and specifications to all courts-martial. R.C.M. 603 expands on Article 34(c), providing additional rules and procedures for making "minor" and "major" changes to the charges and specifications before and after referral in all three types of court-martial. R.C.M. 601(d)(1) provides that a convening authority generally may refer charges to any court-martial as long as "the convening authority finds or is advised by a judge advocate" that there is probable cause for the specification and that the specification alleges an offense. In general court-martial cases, this function is always performed by the staff judge advocate.

With respect to the additional required content of the staff judge advocate advice prior to referral of charges and specifications to general courts-martial, the rules themselves repeat the statutory provisions while providing little additional guidance. The Discussion to R.C.M. 406(b) explains that the "warranted by the evidence" standard under Article 34(a)(2) means probable cause.[13] It also explains:

> The advice need not set forth the underlying analysis or rationale for its conclusions. Ordinarily, the charge sheet, forwarding letter, endorsements, and report of investigation are forwarded with the pretrial advice. In addition, the pretrial advice should include when appropriate: a brief summary of the evidence; discussion of significant aggravating, extenuating, or mitigating factors; any recommendations for disposition of the case by commanders or others who have forwarded the charges; and the recommendation of the Article 32 investigating officer. However, there is no legal requirement to include such information, and failure to do so is not error.[14]

Because the staff judge advocate's recommendation concerns referral of charges and specifications by the convening authority, this statutory requirement implicitly implicates R.C.M. 601 (Referral), which directs convening authorities to "consider the options and considerations under R.C.M. 306 in exercising the discretion to refer."[15] As noted earlier in this Report, R.C.M. 306 provides that all allegations of offenses (including preferred charges and specifications) should be disposed of in a timely manner at the lowest appropriate level of disposition.[16] The Discussion to R.C.M. 306(b) then provides a non-exclusive list of factors military commanders should consider when deciding how to dispose of offenses. These "disposition factors" form the President's core policy guidance with respect to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" disposition standard articulated in Article 30(b), and help to inform the staff judge advocate's pre-referral advice under Article 34(b). However, under the current rules, the connection between staff judge advocate's advice under R.C.M. 406 and this disposition policy guidance under R.C.M. 306 is not explicitly drawn.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Referral of charges and specifications to court-martial for trial under Article 34 and R.C.M. 601 is similar in many respects to the indictment or information under Fed. R. Crim. P. 7. In both cases, the purpose of the action is to officially direct that an accused be criminally prosecuted on the charges in a court of law; and in both cases, the action generally signals that the government has considered alternative dispositions and has determined that the interest of justice—or, in the case of the military, the interest of justice and discipline—warrants prosecution. In this sense, the exercise of disposition discretion by court-martial convening authorities under Article 30 and 34 is akin to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion by attorneys for the government in federal civilian practice. In military practice, this responsibility is split between two officials: the staff judge advocate, who is responsible for making legal determinations and providing legal advice; and the convening authority, who is responsible for balancing the interests of justice and discipline appropriately in each individual case. The decision rules used to guide the exercise of disposition discretion by the convening authority and the staff judge advocate are addressed in greater detail in this Report in the section concerning proposed Article 33 (Disposition Guidance).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 34.1: Amend Article 34 to clarify ambiguities in the language of the current statute and to explicitly tie the staff judge advocate's recommendation to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" standard under Article 30(b).

- Currently, Article 34 contains several ambiguities that hinder its application, including the use of the term "refer" in different contexts in subsection (a), and the requirement for a recommendation from the staff judge advocate under subsection (b) that is not clearly tied to the disposition standard articulated in Article 30(b).

- This proposal would clarify the language of the statute and the relationship between the staff judge advocate's advice under Article 34 and the general standard for disposition of charges and specifications under Article 30. It also would include a new subsection defining the term "referral" as "the order of a convening authority that charges and specifications against an accused be tried by a specified court-martial." This definition would help to provide consistency throughout the Code with respect to usage of the terms "refer" or "referral" in the context of charging.

- Part II of the Report will consider additional changes in the rules implementing Article 34, with particular focus on the content of advice with respect to the staff judge advocate's conclusion regarding probable cause and jurisdiction. Part II of the Report will also address the content of the staff judge advocate's advice on those matters in which the staff judge advocate disagrees with the conclusions of the preliminary hearing officer. This will take into account the recommendation of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel) "to evaluate if there are circumstances when a general court-martial convening authority should not have authority to override an Article 32 investigating officer's recommendation against referral of an investigated charge for trial by court-martial."[17]

Recommendation 34.2: Amend Article 34 to require the convening authority to consult with a judge advocate on relevant legal issues before referral of charges to special courts-martial.

- This change would codify current practice, and would amount to a minor change to the rule concerning referral of charges generally under R.C.M. 601(d). It also would enhance the decision-making relationship between convening authorities and judge advocates and ensure greater consistency in the exercise of disposition discretion by convening authorities generally.

- Part II of the Report will propose changes in the rules implementing Article 34 to reflect the requirement for judge advocate consultation on relevant legal issues in special courts-martial. The proposed rules will include baseline requirements and guidance, and will provide flexibility for service-specific regulations and procedures concerning the method and manner of the required judge advocate consultation. This flexibility will ensure that different services will be able to tailor the new requirement to their specific needs and personnel structures.

Recommendation 34.3: Amend Article 34 to clarify that formal corrections to the charges and specifications may be made before referral for trial in special court-martial cases as well as in general courts-martial.

- Under current law, Article 34 applies only in the context of general court-martial cases. This change would clarify that the ability to make formal corrections to the charges and specifications before referral for trial is not exclusive to charges that are being referred to general courts-martial. This change is necessitated by the proposal to require, in the statute, judge advocate advice prior to referral of charges and specifications to special courts-martial.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by considering the recommendations, proposals, and analysis issued by the Response Systems Panel.

- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by incorporating, to the extent practicable, the standards and procedures of the civilian sector with respect to the charging decision. Specifically, this proposal requires pre-referral legal advice from legally trained judge advocates in all general and special court-martial cases, which would result in greater consistency among convening authorities in the decision to prosecute offenders, and enhancement of the standards used to determine when to exercise referral authority.

- This proposal is closely related to the proposed creation of a new Article 33, which would provide a statutory requirement for the issuance of robust disposition guidance based on the Principles of Federal Prosecution contained in the United States Attorneys' Manual.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 605. ADVICE TO CONVENING AUTHORITY BEFORE REFERRAL FOR TRIAL.

Section 834 of title 10, United States Code (article 34 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§834. Art. 34. Advice to convening authority before referral for trial

"(a) GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL.—

"(1) STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE ADVICE REQUIRED BEFORE REFERRAL.—Before referral of charges and specifications to a general court-martial for trial, the convening authority shall submit the matter to the staff judge advocate for advice, which the staff judge advocate shall provide to the convening authority in writing. The convening authority may not refer a specification under a charge to a general court-martial unless the staff judge advocate advises the convening authority in writing that—

"(A) the specification alleges an offense under this chapter;

"(B) there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offense charged; and

"(C) a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the accused and the offense.

"(2) STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE RECOMMENDATION AS TO DISPOSITION.—Together with the written advice provided under paragraph (1), the staff judge advocate shall provide a written recommendation to the convening authority as to the disposition that should be made of the specification in the interest of justice and discipline.

"(3) STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE ADVICE AND RECOMMENDATION TO ACCOMPANY REFERRAL.—When a convening authority makes a referral for trial by general court-martial, the written advice of the staff judge advocate under paragraph (1) and the written recommendation of the staff judge advocate under paragraph (2) with respect to each specification shall accompany the referral.

"(b) SPECIAL COURT-MARTIAL; CONVENING AUTHORITY CONSULTATION WITH JUDGE ADVOCATE.—Before referral of charges and specifications to a special court-martial for trial, the convening authority shall consult a judge advocate on relevant legal issues.

"(c) GENERAL AND SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL; CORRECTION OF CHARGES AND SPECIFICATIONS BEFORE REFERRAL.—Before referral for trial by general court-martial or special court-martial, changes may be made to charges and specifications—

"(1) to correct errors in form; and

"(2) when applicable, to conform to the substance of the evidence contained in a report under section 832(c) of this title (article 32(c)).

"(d) DEFINITION.—In this section, the term 'referral' means the order of a convening authority that charges and specifications against an accused be tried by a specified court-martial.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 605 would amend Article 34, which concerns the relationship between the staff judge advocate and the convening authority in the disposition decision-making process in general court-martial cases. The section would amend Article 34 to clarify ambiguities in the language of the current statute, to require judge advocate consultation before referral of charges to special courts-martial, and to expressly tie the staff judge advocate's pre-referral disposition recommendation in general courts-martial to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" standard for disposition of charges and specifications under Article 30. As amended, Article 34 would contain the following provisions:

Article 34(a) would replace and clarify the provisions concerning staff judge advocate advice before referral to general courts-martial currently contained in Article 34(a)-(b). Article 34(a)(2) would expressly tie the staff judge advocate's disposition recommendation to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" disposition standard under Article 30.

Article 34(b) would require that convening authorities consult a judge advocate on relevant legal issues before referral of charges and specifications to special courts-martial for trial, consistent with current practice.

Article 34(c) would allow formal corrections to the charges and specifications to be made before referral in both general and special courts-martial.

Article 34(d) would define "referral," in the context of Article 34, to mean "the order of the convening authority that charges and specifications against an accused be tried by a specified court-martial," consistent with current implementing regulations.

The changes to Article 34 are intended to solidify and enhance the decision-making partnership between judge advocates and court-martial convening authorities, ensuring that the interests of justice and discipline are well-considered and appropriately balanced in each individual case. Implementing regulations will address additional changes in the rules implementing Article 34, with particular focus on the content of advice with respect to the staff judge advocate's conclusion regarding probable cause and jurisdiction, and with respect to those matters in which the staff judge advocate disagrees with the conclusions of the preliminary hearing officer. Implementing regulations also would address the baseline requirements for pre-referral judge advocate consultation on relevant legal issues in special courts-martial.

Article 35 – Service of Charges
10 U.S.C. § 835

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would clarify the current statute with no substantive changes. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 35.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 35 contains two related procedural requirements. First, it requires the trial counsel to serve a copy of referred court-martial charges upon the accused. Second, in time of peace, it provides for a "waiting period" which must be observed after service of charges before the accused may be brought to trial against his objection: five days for general court-martial; three days for special court-martial.

3. Historical Background

Article 35 is based in part on the second half of Article 46(c) of the 1920 Articles of War and was also "in accordance with present Navy practice" at the time of the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[1] In contrast with Article 33, which forms a part of the military accused's speedy trial rights, Article 35 was designed to protect the accused against a "too speedy trial."[2] This protection "is closely intertwined with the basic right of an accused and his counsel to have adequate time, before trial, to prepare their case and, once trial has begun, to conduct the defense."[3] The statute has remained unchanged in the decades since.[4]

During the House Subcommittee's hearings on the UCMJ in 1949, the only aspect of Article 35 that sparked any debate was that the statutory three-day and five-day waiting period requirements were only to apply "in time of peace." Chairman Elston pointed out that it seemed odd to limit these accused-friendly protections to peacetime court-martial cases since "most of the complaints [giving rise to the UCMJ] arose during wartime and by reason of wartime prosecutions." Hearings on H.R. 2498, supra note 1, at 1013. After some discussion of this topic, the Subcommittee determined that the waiting periods were not required by policy or law and merely constituted an "added protection in time of peace." Id. at 1014.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 35's service and waiting period requirements are implemented through R.C.M. 602, which restates these requirements and clarifies that the dates of service and of trial (but not Sundays or holidays) are excluded for purposes of calculating the three-day and five-day waiting periods. If the government violates the required waiting period and the accused objects, the trial may not proceed until the end of the waiting period; however, if the accused does not object the right to delay is deemed waived and the trial may proceed.[5] The Discussion to R.C.M. 901(a) (Call to order) notes Article 35's waiting period requirement and instructs military judges to "secure an affirmative waiver on the record" if it appears from the referred charge sheet that the required waiting period has not elapsed. Neither Article 35 nor its implementing rules have resulted in a significant amount of litigation in the decades since the UCMJ's adoption.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 35's "service of charges" requirement functionally corresponds to Fed. R. Crim. P. 9 (Arrest Warrant or Summons on an Indictment or Information). The primary purpose of both rules is to notify the accused that the accused will soon be prosecuted for certain charges, and that the court has these charges for action.[7] Article 35 requires the trial counsel to serve a copy of the charges on the accused. Under the federal rule, the court itself is responsible for issuing the warrant or summons.[8] The federal analogue to Article 35's waiting period requirement resides in Section 3161(c)(2) of the Speedy Trial Act.[9] The statute imposes a mandatory 30-day delay before trial following the defendant's first appearance through counsel (or express waiver of counsel), unless the defendant consents to a shorter time period.[10]

Although the three-day and five-day waiting periods under Article 35 are shorter than the 30-day delay under the federal rule, this difference is less significant in practice in light of other aspects of military practice. First, a military accused is notified of the charges "as soon as practicable" after preferral under Article 30, and is generally provided with a defense counsel and a copy of the charge sheet at this time.[11] Second, it is rare for the accused to be brought to trial within thirty days after preferral, particularly in general courts-martial cases, and Article 40 provides for continuances "as often as may appear to be just." Thus, the three-day and five-day waiting periods following referral of charges do not appreciably impact an accused's ability to fully prepare for trial over the course of at least several weeks (and generally much more time) prior to arraignment.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 35: Amend Article 35 by dividing it into two subsections and revising the language of its two substantive provisions—the service of charges and waiting period requirements—to better align the article with current practice and related UCMJ articles.

As currently drafted, the purpose and function of Article 35's two procedural requirements contain several ambiguities. The proposed language for Article 35's service of charges requirement would clarify and simplify this provision while avoiding ambiguous use of the term "refer." The proposed language for Article 35's waiting period requirement (updated with the subheading "Commencement of Trial") would conform this part of the article to current practice by ensuring that the military judge inquires on the record whether the accused objects in a case where the government schedules the first session of trial within the statutory waiting period. It also would address ambiguities in the statute with respect to the starting and ending points of the three-day and five-day waiting periods.

This proposal would revise Article 35's "[i]n time of peace . . ." limitation to read: "This subsection shall not apply in time of war." This change would provide greater consistency between Article 35 and other UCMJ articles that include "time of war" exceptions, including Articles 43, 71, 85, 90, 101, 105, 106, 112a, and 113.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by clarifying ambiguities in the language of Article 35 while retaining and improving its two key provisions, which provide significant procedural safeguards for the accused in military criminal proceedings.

The proposal also would better align Article 35 with its corresponding MCM provisions and current practice, as well as with other statutory exceptions for "in time of war," minimizing the opportunity for misapplication of the statute or renewed appellate activity concerning its language and intent.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 606. SERVICE OF CHARGES AND COMMENCEMENT OF TRIAL.

Section 835 of title 10, United States Code (article 35 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§835. Art. 35. Service of charges; commencement of trial

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Trial counsel detailed for a court-martial under section 827 of this title (article 27) shall cause to be served upon the accused a copy of the charges and specifications referred for trial.

"(b) COMMENCEMENT OF TRIAL.—(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), no trial or other proceeding of a general court-martial or a special court-martial (including any session under section 839(a) of this title (article 39(a)) may be held over the objection of the accused—

"(A) with respect to a general court-martial, from the time of service through the fifth day after the date of service; or

"(B) with respect to a special court-martial, from the time of service through the third day after the date of service.

"(2) An objection under paragraph (1) may be raised only at the first session of the trial or other proceeding and only if the first session occurs before the end of the applicable period under paragraph (1)(A) or (1)(B). If the first session occurs before the end of the applicable period, the military judge shall, at that session, inquire as to whether the defense objects under this subsection.

"(3) This subsection shall not apply in time of war.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 606 would amend Article 35, which requires the trial counsel to ensure that a copy of the charges and specifications is served upon the accused following referral of charges. Article 35 also provides the accused with the opportunity, in time of peace, to object to the commencement of trial until the completion of a statutory period following service of charges—three days for special courts-martial, and five days for general courts-martial. These requirements, consistent with similar procedural requirements in federal district court, would ensure that military accused receive sufficient notice of the charges upon which they are to be tried by court-martial, and sufficient time to prepare for trial with their defense counsel. The present statute contains ambiguities with respect to each of these statutory requirements. The proposed revision would address these ambiguities and make other clarifying and conforming changes, none of which alter the purposes of Article 35.

Subchapter VII. Trial Procedure

Article 36 – President May Prescribe Rules
10 U.S.C. § 836

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 36.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 36 provides broad authority to the President to prescribe rules for pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedures, including modes of proof for courts-martial, military commissions, and other military tribunals, and procedures for courts of inquiry. The statute allows the President to prescribe rules which, so far as the President considers practicable, apply the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally applicable in United States district court, so long as those rules are not contrary to or inconsistent with other statutory provisions of the UCMJ. Article 36 also requires all rules and regulations prescribed by the President to be uniform so far as practicable.

3. Historical Background

As early as 1813, Congress provided statutory authority for the President to prescribe rules and procedures for courts-martial and military justice practice.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress derived Article 36 from similar statutory provisions in Article 38 of the Articles of War. The proposed Article 48 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy, by contrast, would have given rule-making authority to the Secretary of the Navy.[2] Article 36 was included in the UCMJ in order to standardize this rule-making authority in the President, and in order to ensure that the rules prescribed by the President would conform to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure insofar as practicable.[3] In 1979, Congress clarified the breadth of the President's authority to issue rules governing pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedures.[4] In 2006, Congress amended Article 36 to provide exceptions in the case of military commissions established under chapter 47A of title 10.[5]

[5] Military Commissions Act of 2006, Pub. L. No. 109-366, § 4(a)(3), 120 Stat. 2600 (2006).

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 36 is the basis for the Rules for Courts-Martial, the Military Rules of Evidence, and any other executive order pertaining to military justice practice. Typically, rules that are prescribed by the President under the authority of Article 36 are proposed by and reviewed within the Department of Defense and in the Executive Branch under established procedures governing the preparation of executive orders by the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice.[6] The President's rule-making authority is broad, and is generally only limited by the Constitution and the UCMJ itself.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Supreme Court promulgates most procedural and evidentiary rules in the federal courts under the Rules Enabling Act.[8] These rules have the weight of law, provided that there is "no contrary congressional command."[9] Generally, these rules are based on the recommendations of a standing advisory committee. After the committee adopts a new rule, the rule is forwarded to Congress, which has the authority to reject the rule. Congress may also create its own rules pursuant to statute.[10] Generally, the Rules for Courts-Martial tend to be much more detailed than the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, reflecting the relative brevity of the UCMJ and consequent extent of Presidential authority under Art. 36.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 36: No change to Article 36.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing the President's authority to prescribe rules under Article 36, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining the statutory requirement that the rules implementing the UCMJ apply the standards and practices of the civilian sector insofar as practicable.

Article 37 – Unlawfully Influencing Action of Court
10 U.S.C. § 837

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 37. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 37.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 37 contains a series of proscriptions concerning improper influence in court-martial proceedings. Article 37(a) prohibits: (1) censures, reprimands, or admonishments of the military judge, counsel, or any member of a court-martial by the convening authority or any other commanding officer; (2) attempts to coerce or improperly influence the action of a court or any member thereof with respect to the findings or sentence in any case by any person subject to the Code; and (3) attempts to coerce or improperly influence the convening authority or other approving/reviewing authority by any person subject to the Code. Statements and instructions provided to the court in the normal course of a trial are exempted from these prohibitions. Subsection (b) of the statute prohibits use of an individual's performance of duty as a member of a court-martial or an attorney's zealous representation of an accused as the basis for an unfavorable performance evaluation or fitness report of the member.

3. Historical Background

Congress derived Article 37 from Article 88 of the Articles of War.[1] As enacted in 1950 and as set forth today, the statute prohibits the convening authority from improperly influencing the law officer (a predecessor to the military judge, who advised the court-martial members) or the counsel assigned to the case.[2] The statute does not prohibit a reviewing authority from making comment on errors of the court in the course of a proper review or from taking appropriate action when a member of the court acted in such manner that he abandoned his or her judicial responsibilities and duties.[3] In addition, the statute does not prohibit military commanders from providing general instructions as to the state of discipline within their commands.[4] In 1968, Congress replaced the term "law officer" with "military judge" to reflect the introduction of military judges into the military justice system, and it added the remainder of subsection (a) and all of subsection (b) to the statute.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 37 through R.C.M. 104, which provides additional clarification concerning the statutory prohibitions. Article 37(b) also has been implemented through M.R.E. 606(b), which recognizes unlawful command influence as a legitimate subject of inquiry when inquiring into the validity of the findings or sentence of a court-martial. The case law addressing the statute is well-developed.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although there are federal statutes which prohibit influencing or obstructing federal civilian courts and court officers—for example, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1501-21 (Obstruction of Justice)—these are punitive statutes more closely related to UCMJ Article 134 (Obstructing justice) in Part IV of the Manual.[7] Federal civilian courts are standing courts, which makes comparison to courts-martial imprecise. Each court-martial is a temporary tribunal convened to consider a specific case, and is convened by a military commander who has the power to refer charges for trial; to select the members of the court; to approve or disapprove a variety of legal issues related to pretrial confinement and witnesses; and to exercise extensive administrative powers with respect to the duties, assignments, and careers of the accused, the members, witnesses, and others. In these respects, Article 37 addresses issues unique to the military environment.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 37: No change to Article 37.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 37 and the rules implementing it, a statutory change is not necessary.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to ensure the rules reflect the current state of the law and adequately reflect the authority to engage in appropriate command activities, including lawful command emphasis with respect to disciplinary matters.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique statutory provision that protects against undue command influence and which the Supreme Court has recognized as playing a significant role in protecting the due process interests of accused military members in court-martial proceedings.

Article 38 – Duties of Trial Counsel and Defense Counsel
10 U.S.C. § 838

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would conform the provisions of Article 38 addressing assistant defense counsel to the related provisions in Article 27. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes are need needed to the rules with respect to defense counsel's post-trial responsibilities in light of changes to Article 60 and this Report's proposals to modify post-trial procedures.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 38 details the duties and responsibilities of trial and defense counsel and provides the accused with various rights regarding his legal representation. Article 38(a) states that counsel for the government shall be appointed in every general or special courts-martial and that the trial counsel is responsible for preparing a record of the proceedings. The accused's rights to be represented by military counsel, civilian counsel, or specific military counsel upon request are outlined in Article 38(b). Subsection (c) addresses the defense counsel's role in clemency matters under Article 60. Subsections (d) and (e) address the duties and qualification requirements of assistant trial and defense counsel. These provisions expressly authorize assistant trial counsel (in a general court-martial) and assistant defense counsel (in a general or special court-martial) who are not qualified under Article 27(b) to perform the duties of trial and defense counsel under the direction of counsel so qualified.

3. Historical Background

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress derived Article 38, in part, from Articles 17, 11 and 116 of the Articles of War, as well as a proposed Article for the Government of the Navy.[1] In 1981, Article 38(b) was amended to: (1) add provisions relating to the right to counsel at an Article 32 hearing; (2) authorize promulgation of regulations relating to the reasonable availability of military counsel; and (3) authorize the detailing of additional military defense counsel under specified circumstances.[2] In 1983, subsection (b)(7) was modified to provide that regulations defining "reasonable availability" could not prescribe any limitations based on the fact the individual military counsel requested is from a different branch of service than the accused.[3]

Prior to World War II, an accused was provided military defense counsel at courts-martial; however, the counsel provided often lacked formal legal training, even when charges were referred to general courts-martial. When the UCMJ was enacted, Congress addressed this situation by adding a requirement into Article 27 that lawyers be appointed as defense counsel in all general courts-martial.[4] However, in special courts-martial, the detailed military defense counsel was required to be a lawyer only if the trial counsel was a lawyer.[5] In the Military Justice Act of 1968, Congress amended Article 27 to require that a lawyer be appointed as defense counsel unless such appointment would be impracticable based on physical conditions or military exigencies; and it limited the punishment that could be imposed at court-martial if the detailed defense counsel was not qualified under Article 27(b).[6] Currently, Article 19 (Jurisdiction of special courts-martial) does not permit a bad-conduct discharge to be adjudged unless Article 27(b)-qualified defense counsel is detailed to represent the accused.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 38 through R.C.M. 502, 506, 808, and 1103(b). The accused's rights to military counsel, civilian counsel, and specific military counsel upon request are outlined in R.C.M. 506(a)-(b). R.C.M. 502(d) requires defense counsel and associate defense counsel in general and special courts-martial, and trial counsel in general courts-martial, to be certified under Article 27(b). The services currently detail judge advocates to serve as assistant defense counsel who are qualified under Article 27(b). Article 38(c), concerning the defense counsel's role in clemency matters, is addressed in R.C.M. 502(d)(6) and 1105(a)-(b), which detail the rules and procedures for submitting post-trial clemency matters to the convening authority. R.C.M. 808 and 1103(b) implement Article 38(a)'s requirement that the trial counsel prepare the record of proceedings following each court-martial.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The duties of trial and defense counsel under Article 38 are largely similar to those of federal prosecutors, who represent the United States in U.S. district court, and civilian defense attorneys, who represent federal defendants. The military trial counsel's duty under Article 38(a) to prosecute "in the name of the United States" is similar to the responsibility of U.S. Attorneys in the federal civilian system to act as the attorney for the government in all criminal prosecutions.[7] However, in federal civilian practice, the court reporter, not the U.S. Attorney, is responsible for preparing the record of trial.[8] By contrast, under Article 38(a), record preparation is the responsibility of the trial counsel.[9] (In addition, military trial counsel are typically responsible for a whole host of administrative responsibilities—courthouse security, witness travel, reviewing defense witness requests, and other duties—that are primarily performed by other personnel in the federal civilian system.) In the federal civilian system, defendants in criminal cases have the right to representation by an attorney at all stages of prosecution. The defendant may hire an attorney or, if indigent, have counsel appointed at the government's expense.[10] Under Article 38(b), an accused has the right to at least one free military defense counsel in all general and special courts-martial, irrespective of indigence, and has an additional right to hire a civilian defense counsel at no cost to the government.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 38: Amend Article 38(e) to delete reference to an assistant defense counsel who is not qualified to be defense counsel as required by Article 27(b).

The proposed change would require all defense counsel, regardless of whether they are acting as lead or assistant defense counsel, to be qualified under Article 27(b). This change is consistent with the actual practice of all of the services, and would align military rules in this area with federal civilian practice.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by employing civilian standards for the qualification of government and defense counsel insofar as practicable.

This proposal also supports MJRG Operational Guidance by removing an inconsistency between Article 38 and current practice with respect to the qualification requirements of detailed defense counsel and assistant defense counsel.

Subsection (e) of section 838 of title 10, United States Code (article 38 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking ", under the direction" and all that follows through "(article 27),".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 701 would amend Article 38 to conform it to the proposed amendments in Article 27 concerning the requirement for all defense counsel in general and special courts-martial to be qualified under Article 27(b).

Article 39 – Sessions
10 U.S.C. § 839

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would codify current practice under which military judges preside at arraignments. This proposal also would conform Article 39 to the proposed amendments to Articles 16 and 19, which provide for a military judge to preside at all general and special courts-martial.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 39 provides the authority and basic rules for post-referral sessions of court conducted outside the presence of the court-martial members. Article 39(a) authorizes a military judge, after service of referred charges under Article 35, to hold proceedings without the presence of members for the purpose of: (1) hearing and determining pretrial motions; (2) hearing and ruling upon any matter that does not require member involvement; (3) holding the arraignment and receiving the pleas of the accused; and (4) performing any other procedural function that does not require the presence of the members. Article 39(b)-(c) require all proceedings, including those conducted pursuant to Article 39(a), to be made part the record of trial and to be conducted in the presence of the accused, the defense counsel, and the trial counsel. Article 39(d) prohibits the use of findings and holdings of military commissions in any Article 39(a) session.

3. Historical Background

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, there were no military judges and Article 39 contained only the provisions that are now set forth in subsection (c), requiring all proceedings of the court to be on the record except for member deliberations.[1] In 1968, when the position of military judge was created, Article 39 was amended to provide for trial sessions conducted by the military judge without the presence of the members.[2] In 2006, Congress separated what is now subsection (b) from subsection (a) and added a video teleconferencing provision.[3] In 2009, Congress added subsection (d) concerning military commissions under chapter 47A.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

Currently, military judges are not detailed to cases or proceedings under the UCMJ until charges have been referred for trial by court-martial. Once referred, it is common practice for military judges, pursuant to Article 39(a), to arraign the accused and hold pretrial hearings to consider and determine pretrial motions and other matters related to the court-martial.[5] Article 39(a) sessions are also used to resolve issues raised during the course of trial which should not be discussed within the presence of members, such as arguments concerning the admissibility of evidence. The President has implemented Article 39 through R.C.M. 803, which generally tracks the language of the statute. The Discussion to R.C.M. 803 notes that Article 39(a) sessions should be held:

> to ascertain the accused's understanding of the right to counsel, the right to request trial by military judge-alone, or when applicable, enlisted members, and the accused's choices with respect to these matters; dispose of interlocutory matters; hear objections and motions; rule upon other matters that may legally be ruled upon by the military judge, such as admitting evidence; and perform other procedural functions which do not require the presence of members.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian courts are standing courts with no direct analogy to courts-martial, which are temporary tribunals convened to consider a specific case.[6] There is no need in the federal civilian system for an express statutory authority for sessions of court held outside the presence of the jurors.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 39.1: Amend Article 39 to establish uniform requirements for arraignment by a military judge and to eliminate references to courts-martial without a military judge.

This is primarily a conforming change to reflect the proposed amendments to Articles 16 and 19, which require a military judge to preside at all general and special courts-martial. The proposal also would codify the longstanding practice of using military judges for arraignments.

This recommendation only relates to post-referral sessions of court in the context of convened general and special courts-martial. This Report's proposal to enact a new Article 30a concerning pre-referral proceedings is discussed in detail in that section of the Report.

Recommendation 39.2: Amend Article 39 to conform to the proposal under Article 53 for judicial sentencing in all non-capital general courts-martial and all special courts-martial.

This is a conforming change to reflect the proposed amendments to Articles 53. The change would clarify that the military judge may call the court into session without the presence of the members for the purpose of conducting a sentencing proceeding and sentencing the accused.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique feature of the UCMJ that is necessary for the proper administration of justice given the temporary, ad hoc nature of courts-martial.

The recommended amendments reflect proposed changes in Articles 16 and 19 to eliminate courts-martial without a military judge.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 702. SESSIONS.

Section 839 of title 10, United States Code (article 39 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) by redesignating paragraph (4) as paragraph (5); and

(B) by striking paragraph (3) and inserting the following new paragraphs:

"(3) holding the arraignment and receiving the pleas of the accused;

"(4) conducting a sentencing proceeding and sentencing the accused; and"; and

(2) in the second sentence of subsection (c), by striking ", in cases in which a military judge has been detailed to the court,".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 702 would amend Article 39 to codify current practice, in which military judges preside at arraignments. The amendments also would conform the statute to the proposed amendments to Articles 16, 19, and 53 requiring military judges to be detailed to preside over and to sentence the accused in all non-capital general courts-martial and all special courts-martial.

Article 40 – Continuances
10 U.S.C. § 840

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would modify Article 40's reference to "a court-martial without a military judge" to conform to this Report's proposal to require a military judge in all special courts-martial.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 40 provides statutory authority for the military judge of a general or special-court-martial, a special court-martial without a military judge, or a summary court-martial to order continuances at the request of either party "for reasonable cause." The statute also provides that continuances may be granted "for such time, and as often, as may appear to be just."

3. Historical Background

The authority to grant continuances was first codified in the Articles of War of 1898.[1] This first version of the statute included a provision that if the prisoner was in close confinement, the trial could not be delayed for longer than sixty days. This provision was removed in 1916.[2] Article 40, as originally drafted, was derived verbatim from the 1920 version of the statute.[3] Because the position of military judge was not created until 1968, the original version of Article 40 gave the authority to grant continuances exclusively to "[the] court-martial."[4] The article has been amended twice in the decades since inclusion of this provision in the UCMJ as enacted in 1950. In 1956, Congress added "the law officer" as an authority that may grant continuances under the article in addition to a court-martial without a law officer;[5] and in 1968, Congress inserted "military judge" in place of "law officer," bringing Article 40 into its current form.[6]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 40 through R.C.M. 906(b)(1), which states that "[a] continuance may be granted only by the military judge." Previously, convening authorities possessed an overlapping authority to order "postponements."[7] This authority was determined to conflict with the military judge's authority to schedule proceedings and control the docket, and it was therefore removed from the 1984 Manual.[8] Under current law, the decision whether to grant a continuance is a matter within the discretion of the military judge, who evaluates the particular facts and circumstances of each case.[9] "Reasons for a continuance may include: insufficient opportunity to prepare for trial; unavailability of an essential witness; the interest of Government in the order of trial of related cases; and illness of an accused, counsel, military judge, or member."[10] In order to obtain a continuance, the moving party must show by a preponderance of the evidence that prejudice to the party's substantial rights will occur absent a continuance.[11] In United States v. Miller, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces provided a list of factors "used to determine whether a military judge abused his or her discretion by denying a continuance."[12] The list includes "'surprise, nature of any evidence involved, timeliness of the request, substitute testimony or evidence, availability of witness or evidence requested, length of continuance, prejudice to opponent, moving party received prior continuances, good faith of moving party, use of reasonable diligence by moving party, possible impact on verdict, and prior notice.'"[13] The military Courts of Criminal Appeals continue to apply the Miller factors when reviewing military judge denials of continuance requests for abuse of discretion.[14]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although there is no analogous federal rule specifically covering continuances, Article 40 and the case law interpreting it are generally consistent with longstanding federal common law rules concerning the trial judge's discretionary authority to grant pretrial and trial continuances.[15] As the Supreme Court noted in Avery v. State of Alabama in 1940:

> In the course of trial, after due appointment of competent counsel, many procedural questions necessarily arise which must be decided by the trial judge in the light of facts then presented and conditions then existing. Disposition of a request for continuance is of this nature and is made in the discretion of the trial judge, the exercise of which will ordinarily not be reviewed.[16]

Similarly, in Morris v. Slappy, the Court characterized the discretion that must be granted to trial courts on matters of continuances as "broad," and stated that "only an unreasoning and arbitrary 'insistence upon expeditiousness in the face of a justifiable request for delay' violates the right to the assistance of counsel."[17]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 40: Amend Article 40 by deleting the words "a court-martial without a military judge" and replacing them with the words "a summary court-martial."

This proposal is based on this Report's proposal to amend Article 16 to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge. This change would better align the UCMJ with contemporary military justice practice, in which special courts-martial without a military judge are rarely, if ever, convened. It also would better align military practice with the practice in federal district courts, where there is no procedure for a trial without a judge.

Although Article 40, in its current form, does not expressly reference "a special court-martial without a military judge," the proposed amendment would clarify the article's meaning and would help to distinguish the authority to grant continuances, which extends to summary courts-martial, from other UCMJ provisions that would be eliminated as a result of the proposed amendment to Article 16.

The reference to summary courts-martial in the amendment reflects the fact that a military judge does not preside in that forum.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and Article 36 of the UCMJ by incorporating, to the extent practicable, the principles of law and the rules of procedure used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts into military justice practice.

This recommendation is related to the proposed amendment to Article 16 to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 703. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO CONTINUANCES.

Section 840 of title 10, United States Code (article 40 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "court-martial without a military judge" and inserting "summary court-martial".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 703 would make a technical amendment to Article 40 to clarify that "a summary court-martial" is the narrow exception to the general rule that the authority to grant continuances is vested solely in the military judge, with no substantive change to the law. This change would conform the statute to the proposed amendments to Articles 16 and 19 requiring military judges to be detailed to preside over all general and special courts-martial, and would better align military practice regarding continuances with federal civilian practice.

Article 41 – Challenges
10 U.S.C. § 841

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align Article 41 with the changes proposed in Article 16 concerning fixed panel sizes and elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge. Part II of the Report will consider changes that would be needed in the rules implementing Article 41 based on these proposed statutory amendments. Part II of the Report will also address application of the liberal grant mandate with respect to "for cause" challenges by the parties in general and special courts-martial.

2. Narrative Summary of the Current Statute

Article 41 provides that the military judge and members of a general or special court-martial may be challenged by the accused or the trial counsel for cause; it also provides each party with one peremptory challenge with respect to the members only. The statute vests authority for determining the relevance and validity of all challenges for cause with the military judge—or, in the case of a special court-martial without a military judge, with the court-martial itself. Subsections (a)(2) and (b)(2) of the statute provide the procedures applicable when the exercise of challenges reduces the court-martial below the minimum number of members required under Article 16.

3. Historical Background

Congress derived Article 41 from Article 18 of the Articles of War.[1] The statute adopted the then-existing Army and Navy practice with respect to challenges for cause, and the Army practice with respect to peremptory challenges.[2] In 1991, Congress amended Article 41 to provide procedures applicable in situations where the exercise of challenges reduces the court-martial below the minimum number of members required under Article 16.[3] In 1968, Congress established the position of military judge for all general and most special courts-martial and authorized the military judge to rule on challenges.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 41 through R.C.M. 902 (concerning disqualification of military judges) and R.C.M. 912 (concerning member challenges). R.C.M. 912(f)(1) expands upon Article 41(a)(1) and identifies fourteen specific grounds for challenging and removing members for cause. Until 1984, the Manual provided that challenges for cause should be "liberally granted" to both parties.[5] Under current case law, the liberal grant standard applies only to defense challenges for cause.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Military courts often follow federal case law concerning the grounds for challenge.[7] Military courts and federal district courts differ, however, in the number of peremptory challenges allowed for each party. In military practice, each party is entitled to only one peremptory challenge in all types of cases.[8] In the federal civilian system, the number of peremptory challenges allowed is based on the type of case: in a capital case, each party is entitled to twenty peremptory challenges; in a non-capital felony case, the defense is entitled to ten peremptory challenges while the government is entitled to only six; and in misdemeanor cases, each party is allowed three peremptory challenges.[9] The vast majority of states provide the government and defense with the same number of peremptory challenges regardless of the type of case.[10] In every state, the number of peremptory challenges is greater than one and generally ranges between three and ten.[11]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 41: Amend Article 41 to align the statute with changes proposed in Article 16 concerning fixed panel sizes and elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge. Specifically: (1) amend Article 41(a)(1) to delete reference to courts-martial without a military judge; and (2) amend Article 41(a)(2) and (b)(2) to delete the word "minimum."

These are conforming amendments. The underlying legislative proposals and justifications are provided in the section in this Report addressing proposed amendments to Article 16.

Part II of the Report will consider changes that would be needed in the rules implementing Article 41 based on these proposed statutory amendments. It will also address application of the liberal grant mandate with respect to "for cause" challenges by each party in general and special courts-martial.[12]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

The proposal to eliminate the reference to special courts-martial without a military judge in Article 41(a)(1) is related to proposed changes to Article 16 to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge.

The proposal to delete the word "minimum" in Article 41(a)(2) and (b)(2) is related to the proposal to amend Article 16 to set fixed panel sizes.

Section 841 of title 10, United States Code (article 41 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(1), by striking ", or, if none, the court," in the second sentence;

(3) in subsection (b)(2), by striking "minimum".

Section 704 would amend Article 41 to conform the statute to the changes proposed in Article 16 concerning standard panel sizes in general and special courts-martial and the elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge. The statute's implementing rules would address application of the "liberal grant mandate" with respect to "for cause" challenges by each party in a general or special court-martial. *See United States v. Article 42 – Oaths

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 42. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 42.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 42 requires all participants in a court-martial (including judges, attorneys, members, reporters, and interpreters) to take an oath that they will perform their duties faithfully. The statute allows each Service Secretary to control the manner and form of the oath, and specifically requires that all witness testimony must be given under oath.

3. Historical Background

Taking oaths to perform court duties faithfully or to swear to tell the truth has long been a practice in the military justice system. The first oath requirements appeared in the original Articles of War of 1775.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Article 42 was derived from Article 19 of the 1948 Articles of War.[2] With the exception of minor updates, the statute has changed little since 1950.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 42 through R.C.M. 807. Under the rule, military judges, attorneys, and court reporters swear to faithfully perform their duties when they assume their position. They are not required to repeat the oath with each new court-martial. Panel members are re-sworn with each new court-martial, regardless of any previous oaths. Witnesses are generally sworn in the first time they testify, but do not need to be re-sworn if they testify again in the same court-martial. R.C.M. 807 provides examples of oaths for various participants. Article 136 lists the persons who are authorized to administer oaths for military justice purposes.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian practice and military practice concerning the taking of oaths by participants in criminal proceedings are generally similar.[4] In federal civilian practice, jurors take two oaths: a preliminary oath as prospective jurors before voir dire; and an impanelment oath if selected to serve on the jury. In military practice, the substance of the two oaths is combined into a single oath given to members before the court-martial is assembled.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 42: No change to Article 42.

The law governing oaths in the military is long-established, noncontroversial, and aligned with similar federal civilian rules. No statutory changes are necessary.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 42.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline assessment. Based on the stability in the case law dealing with Article 42's substantive provisions, no change is warranted.

Article 43 – Statute of Limitations
10 U.S.C. § 843

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 43 to align military practice with federal civilian practice by extending the statute of limitations applicable to child abuse offenses and offenses in which DNA evidence implicates an identified individual. The proposal also would extend the statute of limitations for offenses under Article 83 (Fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation).

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 43 sets forth the statute of limitations under the UCMJ. Article 43(a) specifies certain offenses that may be tried and punished at any time without limitation, including: murder; rape and sexual assault; rape and sexual assault of a child; and any other offense punishable by death. Article 43(b)(1) sets a default statute of limitations for all other offenses at five years. Article 43(b)(2) creates an exception for child abuse offenses, which may be tried at a court-martial within five years or during the life of the child, whichever provides a longer period. Subsections (d)-(g) of the statute provide additional rules and exceptions applicable in other special situations, including time of war exceptions and periods in which an accused is absent from territory in which the United States has the authority to apprehend him, or is in the custody of civil authorities or enemy forces.

3. Historical Background

Article 88 of the 1806 Articles of War specified a two-year limitations provision, including a tolling provision in cases of unauthorized absence, and courts-martial have been bound by a time limitations provision since that time.[1] Article 39 of the 1920 Articles of War provided a statute of limitations of two years for most offenses; three years for desertion in time of peace, damage to federal property, and certain other federal offenses; and no statute of limitations for desertion during time of war, murder, and mutiny.[2] Articles 61 and 62 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy established a two-year limitation period that began to run on the date the offense was committed, with an exception for desertion in time of peace, in which case the limitation period began to run at the end of the accused's enlistment.[3] These articles further provided for the suspension of the running of the statute under certain circumstances, and for its tolling upon the issuance of an order for trial or punishment.[4]

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] Congress included a statute of limitations in Article 43 of three years for most offenses, which was raised to five years in 1986.[6] Under the original version of Article 43, the only offenses subject to punishment without limitation were desertion or absence without leave in time of war, aiding the enemy, mutiny, or murder.[7] In 2003, Congress added a provision based on 18 U.S.C. § 3283 (Offenses against children), providing a statute of limitations in child abuse cases of five years or the life of the child, whichever period is longer.[8] In 2006, Congress added "rape, or rape of a child" to the list of offenses subject to punishment without limitation under Article 43(a),[9] and in 2014 this provision was expanded again to include "sexual assault" and "sexual assault of a child" in addition to "rape" and "rape of a child."[10]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 43 through R.C.M. 907(b)(2)(B), which provides the accused with waivable grounds for dismissal of charges when the applicable statute of limitations under Article 43 has run.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The statute of limitations provisions under Article 43 are largely consistent with the statutes of limitations applicable to similar offenses in federal civilian practice under Title 18. Article 43, however, provides a shorter statute of limitations for child abuse offenses when the victim is no longer alive. Under Article 43(b)(2)(A), the limitation period is five years or the life of the child, whichever is longer; under 18 U.S.C. § 3283 the statute of limitations is ten years or the life of the child, whichever is longer. In 2006, Congress raised the limitations period in the Title 18 provision from five years to ten years.

In cases where DNA testing implicates an identified person in the commission of a felony, 18 U.S.C. § 3297 provides that "no statute of limitations that would otherwise preclude prosecution of the offense shall preclude such prosecution until a period of time following the implication of the person by DNA testing has elapsed that is equal to the otherwise applicable limitation period."

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 43.1: Amend Article 43 to increase the statute of limitations applicable to child abuse offenses from the current 5 years or the life of the child, whichever is longer, to 10 years or life of the child, whichever is longer.

This change would align Article 43(b)(2)(A) with 18 U.S.C. § 3283, which was amended in 2006 to increase the statute of limitations applicable for child abuse offenses from five to ten years.

Recommendation 43.2: Amend Article 43 by adding a new subsection (h) to extend the statute of limitations for Article 83 fraudulent enlistment cases from five years, as it currently stands, to: (1) the length of the enlistment, in the case of enlisted members; (2) the length of the appointment, in the case of officers; or (3) five years, whichever is longer.

Under current law, a servicemember who commits the offense of fraudulent enlistment would be subject to prosecution for violation of Article 83 until five years from the day he or she began receiving pay. Some enlistments and appointments last six years or more, and servicemembers may be in inactive-duty status for several years while receiving education. Such servicemembers may enter the service fraudulently (for example, by lying about violent crimes committed under another name before enlisting) and only disclose that fact, voluntarily or involuntarily, after the statute of limitations for the offense under Article 83 has already run.[11] When these scenarios arise, courts have strictly applied the 5-year limitations period under Article 43.[12]

This proposal would enhance the ability of the armed services to prosecute fraudulent enlistment offenses and avoid the scenario where an enlistment or appointment has been premised on false information and deception, but the servicemember is permitted to evade prosecution, and even to reenlist, because five years has elapsed since the servicemember first received pay or allowances.

Recommendation 43.3: Amend Article 43 by adding a new subsection (i) to extend the statute of limitations when DNA testing implicates an identified person in the commission

Jackson, 18 M.J. 753, 756 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (defense counsel's failure to raise the statute of limitations that barred the accused's conviction for fraudulent enlistment fell below minimum standards of competence); United States v. of an offense by excluding periods prior to the DNA implication in computing the period of limitations.

This change would align Article 43 with 18 U.S.C. § 3297 which extends the limitation period in specified circumstances where DNA testing implicates an identified person.

The amendments made by the proposal would apply to the prosecution of any offense committed before, on, or after the date of the enactment of the statute if the applicable limitation period has not yet expired.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal would support the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by incorporating practices and procedures used in U.S. district courts with respect to the applicable statute of limitations for child abuse offenses and for DNA testing identification.

This proposal also would support MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing an ambiguity in Article 43 with respect to fraudulent enlistment offenses.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 705. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

(a) INCREASE IN PERIOD FOR CHILD ABUSE OFFENSES.—Subsection (b)(2)(A) of section 843 of title 10, United States Code (article 43 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "five years" and inserting "ten years".

(b) INCREASE IN PERIOD FOR FRAUDULENT ENLISTMENT OR APPOINTMENT OFFENSES.—Such section (article) is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(h) FRAUDULENT ENLISTMENT OR APPOINTMENT.—A person charged with fraudulent enlistment or fraudulent appointment under section 904a(1) of this title (article 104a(1)) may be tried by court-martial if the sworn charges and specifications are received by an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction with respect to that person, as follows:

"(1) In the case of an enlisted member, during the period of the enlistment or five years, whichever provides a longer period.

"(2) In the case of an officer, during the period of the appointment or five years, whichever provides a longer period.".

(c) DNA EVIDENCE.—Such section (article), as amended by subsection (b), is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(i) DNA EVIDENCE.—If DNA testing implicates an identified person in the commission of an offense punishable by confinement for more than one year, no statute of limitations that would otherwise preclude prosecution of the offense shall preclude such prosecution until a period of time following the implication of the person by DNA testing has elapsed that is equal to the otherwise applicable limitation period.".

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Such section (article) is further amended in subsection (b)(2)(B) by striking clauses (i) through (v) and inserting the following:

"(i) Any offense in violation of section 920, 920a, 920b, 920c, or 930 of this title (article 120, 120a, 120b, 120c, or 130), unless the offense is covered by subsection (a).

"(ii) Maiming in violation of section 928a of this title (article 128a).

"(iii) Aggravated assault, assault consummated by a battery, or assault with intent to commit specified offenses in violation of section 928 of this title (article 128).

"(iv) Kidnapping in violation of section 925 of this title (article 125).".

(e) APPLICATION.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) shall apply to the prosecution of any offense committed before, on, or after the date of the enactment of this subsection if the applicable limitation period has not yet expired.

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 705 contains amendments to Article 43 pertaining to the statute of limitations for certain UCMJ offenses. The statute would be amended as follows:

Section 705(a) would extend the statute of limitations applicable to child abuse offenses under Article 43 from the current five years or the life of the child, whichever is longer, to ten years or the life of the child, whichever is longer, thereby aligning Article 43(b)(2)(A) with 18 U.S.C. § 3283 (Offenses against children).

Section 705(b) would create a new subsection (h), extending the statute of limitations for Article 83 (fraudulent enlistment) cases from five years, as it currently stands, to (1) the length of the enlistment, in the case of enlisted members; (2) the length of the appointment, in the case of officers; or (3) five years, whichever is longer.

Section 705(c) would create a new subsection (i), extending the statute of limitations until a period of time following the implication of an identified person by DNA testing that is equal to the otherwise applicable limitations period.

Section 705(d) contains conforming amendments based on the proposed realignment of the punitive articles.

Section 705(e) establishes the applicability of the amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) to the prosecution of any offense committed before, on, or after the date of the enactment of the statute if the applicable limitations period has not yet expired.

Article 44 – Former Jeopardy
10 U.S.C. § 844

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 44 to more closely align the attachment of jeopardy standard with the standard applicable in federal civilian criminal proceedings. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 44.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 44 contains three related subsections: (a) stating the general principle that "[n]o person may, without his consent, be tried a second time for the same offense"; (b) defining finality with respect to former guilty findings as being "after review of the case has been fully completed"; and (c) stating that, for the purpose of dismissals by the convening authority or "on motion of the prosecution for failure of available evidence or witnesses without any fault of the accused," jeopardy attaches "after the introduction of evidence."

3. Historical Background

When Article 44 was originally proposed, it included the provisions that are currently under subsections (a) (no retrial for the same offense) and (b) (defining finality), but not the provision under subsection (c) (attaching jeopardy after introduction of evidence).[1] During the House Subcommittee hearings on the UCMJ in 1949, concern was raised about a recent double jeopardy case in which charges had been dismissed after evidence had already been entered.[2] Article 44(c) was added in order to protect military members against such actions.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current rules, a panel is sworn in prior to voir dire.[3] After challenges are made and resolved and all the dismissed members have departed, the military judge will announce that the court is assembled.[4] This is often immediately followed by opening statements, and then the presentation of the evidence by the government.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, prospective jurors swear two oaths: first, they swear to tell the truth during voir dire; then, after they are impaneled, they swear a second oath to faithfully perform their duties as a juror.[5] Jeopardy attaches following the second oath.[6] After jeopardy attaches, a case may not be retried after dismissal unless the dismissal was required due to a manifest necessity.[7] In civilian practice, manifest necessity includes mistrials, unavailable witnesses due to the fault of the accused, and other reasons out of the control of the government. In military practice, manifest necessity also includes military necessities, such as interrupting a court-martial due to military operations.[8] In short, both systems allow for a retrial after jeopardy attaches, provided there is a legitimate need for the dismissal.

The difference between military and federal civilian practice with respect to jeopardy attachment is attributable to the different bases for the rules in each system. In civilian practice, jeopardy attachment is based on case law concerning the Fifth Amendment;[9] in the military, attachment is based on statute. Attachment of jeopardy in civilian practice changed when the Supreme Court held that attachment must occur when the jury is sworn.[10] Military law has not incorporated this change. The military's deviation from the civilian standard is not necessary in order to meet the goals of military justice. Rather, it is the result of an amendment to Article 44, originally intended to bring military practice into compliance with then contemporary civilian practice,[11] which has not been updated to match current civilian law.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 44: Amend Article 44 to more closely align double jeopardy protections in the military with those applicable in federal civilian practice.

Given that the doctrine of manifest necessity will allow retrials for cases which were dismissed due to military necessity, there does not appear to be any need for the deviation between civilian and military double jeopardy rules.

Other proposals in this Report, such as eliminating courts-martial without a military judge and using fixed panel sizes, would reduce many differences between civilian juries and military panels. Since military and civilian practice are becoming more similar, the military should follow the same rules regarding double/former jeopardy as the federal civilian courts.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal support the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating double jeopardy standards used in U.S. district courts.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 706. FORMER JEOPARDY.

Subsection (c) of section 844 of title 10, United States Code (article 44 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) A court-martial with a military judge alone is a trial in the sense of this section (article) if, without fault of the accused—

"(A) after introduction of evidence; and

"(B) before announcement of findings under section 853 of this title (article 53);

the case is dismissed or terminated by the convening authority or on motion of the prosecution for failure of available evidence or witnesses.

"(2) A court-martial with a military judge and members is a trial in the sense of this section (article) if, without fault of the accused—

"(A) after the members, having taken an oath as members under section 842 of this title (article 42) and after completion of challenges under section 841 of this title (article 41), are impaneled; and the case is dismissed or terminated by the convening authority or on motion of the prosecution for failure of available evidence or witnesses.".

"(B) before announcement of findings under section 853 of this title (article 53);

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 706 would amend Article 44 (Former jeopardy) to align the military more closely with federal civilian standards concerning double jeopardy.

Article 45 – Pleas of the Accused
10 U.S.C. § 845

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 45 to: (1) to permit an accused to enter a guilty plea to a capital offense, subject to the requisite inquiry to ensure that the plea is voluntary and that the accused articulates the facts establishing the elements of the plea; (2) establish a statutory standard for assessing claims of error in the plea inquiry process; and (3) make technical conforming changes in the statute.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 45(a) requires a military judge to enter a plea of not guilty in the record on behalf of an accused when an accused: (1) makes an irregular pleading; (2) fails to enter a plea; (3) enters a plea of guilty but sets forth matters inconsistent with the plea that cannot be resolved; (4) has made an improvident plea; or (5) does not understand the meaning and effect of a guilty plea. Article 45(b) prohibits an accused from pleading guilty to an offense for which the death penalty may be adjudged. Subsection (b) also permits, if authorized by regulations of the Secretary concerned and if the offense is not one for which the death penalty may be adjudged, the entry of findings of guilt upon acceptance of a plea of guilty without the necessity of voting on the findings. Under the statute, such a finding of guilt constitutes the finding of the court unless the plea is withdrawn prior to the announcement of the sentence, in which case the proceedings continue as though the accused had pleaded not guilty.

3. Historical Background

Article 45(a) generally reflected Army and Navy practice at the time of the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[1] Article 45(b) also reflected Army and Navy practice before the enactment of the UCMJ, although there was previously no statute prohibiting guilty pleas in capital cases.[2] Article 45(b) was amended in the Military Justice Act of 1968 to permit the entry of findings of guilt upon acceptance of a plea of guilty without the necessity of voting on the findings, if authorized by regulations of the Secretary concerned, and if the offense was not one for which the death penalty could be adjudged.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 45 through R.C.M. 910, which provides the rules and procedures applicable to guilty plea proceedings, including plea agreement inquiries by the military judge. Under current military practice, a plea of guilty may not be accepted unless it is made knowingly and voluntarily after the military judge has explained the elements of the offense. Furthermore, before a plea of guilty may be accepted, the accused must admit every act or omission, and element of the offense to which the accused has pled guilty, and must be pleading guilty because the accused agrees that he or she is, in fact, guilty.[4] The military judge is required to engage in a detailed colloquy with the accused in accordance with United States v. Care.[5] Unless it is clear from the entire record that an accused knows the elements, admits them freely, and is pleading guilty because he or she is actually guilty, the plea of guilty will not be accepted.

The current approach to appellate review of guilty pleas focuses attention on the military judge's conduct of the plea inquiry. "Rejection of a guilty plea on appellate review requires that the record of trial show a substantial basis in law and fact for questioning the guilty plea."[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Fed. R. Crim. P. 11 governs guilty pleas in federal civilian practice. Like Article 45(a), Rule 11 requires a federal court, before accepting a guilty plea, to determine that the defendant's decision to plead is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent.[7] Similar to R.C.M. 910, the federal rules require that a defendant understand the nature of the offense to which he or she is pleading guilty.[8] The federal rules also require a factual basis for a plea.[9] However, Fed. R. Crim. P. 11 does not require any specific on-the-record colloquy.[10]

District court judges may also accept a guilty plea when an accused claims he is innocent, pursuant to North Carolina v. Alford.[11] The Alford plea is not permitted under longstanding military law, which requires the accused to agree that he or she is, in fact, guilty of the offense.[12]

In federal civilian practice and in all but three of the states that have the death penalty, defendants may plead guilty in a capital cases. Furthermore, federal defendants have a right to appeal their guilty pleas unless waived, but the appeal is not automatic.[13] In these cases, federal appellate courts will apply either a harmless-error or a plain-error standard of review, depending on whether the defendant made a timely objection at trial.[14] Under Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(h), like Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a), the courts will grant no relief for errors a defendant raises by timely objection at trial that "do not affect substantial rights."[15]

With respect to appellate review of errors in the plea process not raised at trial, the Supreme Court has held that plain-error will apply when a defendant stays silent and fails to object to an error in the Rule 11 guilty plea proceedings.[16] Federal plain error doctrine

In Alford, the plea was accepted despite protestations of innocence because the court found overwhelming evidence of guilt.

[12] The military's mandate to insure that pleas are voluntary, knowing, and intelligent under Article 45 and R.C.M. 910 reflects the unique challenges of ensuring voluntariness of a plea under the special circumstances of military life, including the "subtle pressures inherent to the military environment that may influence the manner in which service members exercise (and waive) their rights." United States v. Phillippe, 63 M.J. 307, 310 (C.A.A.F. 2006). See United States v. Care, 40 C.M.R. 247, 253 (C.M.A. 1969). Members of the armed forces are subject to involuntary orders and assignments, often in locations far from family, friends and other sources of support. They are subject to prosecution under statutes that would be considered unconstitutionally vague in civilian courts. See Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974). In contrast to civilian proceedings, where unrelated charges typically are not subject to a single trial, military policy provides for trial of all known offenses -- no matter how distinct -- at a single trial under a very narrow standard for severance of charges. See R.C.M. 906(b)(10) (severance may be granted only to prevent a manifest injustice). In light of those circumstances, the military justice system has counterbalanced the pressures of military life by ensuring that the record of trial demonstrates a clear acknowledgement of guilt based upon an understanding element and an articulation by the accused of the facts establishing each element. These standards diminish the potential for wrongful convictions, while also providing a well-developed record that can prove highly useful in sustaining convictions based upon a properly conducted proceeding.

[13] See United States v. Seay, 620 F.3d 919, 921 (8th Cir. 2010) ("It is a well-established legal principle that a valid plea of guilty is an admission of guilt that waives all non-jurisdictional defects and defenses."); United States v. Moussaoui, 591 F.3d 263, 279 (4th Cir. 2010) ("When a defendant pleads guilty, he waives all non-jurisdictional defects in the proceedings conducted prior to entry of the plea [and] has no non-jurisdictional ground upon which to attack that judgment except the inadequacy of the plea."); see also Eric Hawkins, *A Murky Doctrine Gets A Little Pushback: The Fourth Circuit's Rebuff of Guilty Pleas in United States v. [15] Rule 11(h) states, "A variance from the requirements of this rule is harmless error if it does not affect substantial rights." Rule 52(a) states "Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded."

allows an appellate court to correct an error not raised at trial only when the appellant demonstrates that: (1) there is error; (2) the error is clear or obvious; (3) the error affected the appellant's substantial rights; and (4) the error seriously affects the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings.[17] In United States v. Dominguez Benitez, the Supreme Court further refined the plain error test in a guilty plea case.[18] The Court said that relief for Rule 11 error must be tied to prejudicial effect. In order to demonstrate that an error affected substantial rights, the error must have had a prejudicial effect on the outcome of a judicial proceeding. The Court held that "a defendant who seeks reversal of his conviction after a guilty plea, on the ground that the . . . court committed plain error under Rule 11 . . . must show a reasonable probability that, but for the error, he would not have entered the guilty plea."[19]

Finally, unlike in the military, a federal defendant may waive the right to appeal as part of a plea agreement, if that waiver is knowing and intelligent,[20] although the waiver may not include ineffective assistance of counsel claims. A district court, before accepting a guilty plea, must "inform the defendant of, and determine that the defendant understands . . . any . . . provision waiving the right to appeal."[21] However, the court accepting the plea is not required to conduct a specific dialogue with the defendant concerning the waiver of his right to appeal, so long as the record contains sufficient evidence to determine that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived that right.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 45.1: Amend Article 45(b) to permit an accused to plead guilty in capital cases where death is not mandatory.

Permitting an accused to enter a plea of guilty in a capital case where the death sentence is not mandatory is consistent with civilian criminal practice. The reasons for the prohibition on guilty pleas in capital cases are no longer applicable in light of statutory and constitutional requirements for a knowing and voluntary plea, the assistance of counsel, and the detailed inquiry into voluntariness and the circumstances of the offense under Article 45 and R.C.M. 910.

A guilty plea is recognized as a matter in mitigation. A plea in a capital case may allow an accused to avoid imposition of the death penalty by demonstrating that he has taken responsibility for his conduct, is remorseful, and is seeking to spare the victim's family and the court system unnecessary time and expense. The Supreme Court has recognized that an individual accused of a capital charge has an interest in pleading guilty and avoiding trial "in order to spare themselves and their families the spectacle and expense of protracted courtroom proceedings."

Recommendation 45.2: Amend Article 45(b) to delete reference to a court-martial without a military judge.

Based on a separate proposal to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge, reference to such a court-martial in subsection (b) should be deleted.

Recommendation 45.3: Amend Article 45(b) to eliminate the need for separate service regulations authorizing entry of findings upon acceptance of a guilty plea.

Prior to the enactment of the UCMJ, a finding of guilty could not be entered without a vote even if the plea had been accepted. The drafters of the Code permitted the services to authorize entry of a finding of guilty without a vote after acceptance of such a plea. Each of the services authorizes this practice through service regulations. Entry of a finding of guilty after acceptance of a plea is the norm in military justice practice. Requiring the services to separately authorize such a practice is unnecessary.

Recommendation 45.4: Amend Article 45 to include a new subsection (c) that would codify harmless error review in guilty plea cases.

This proposal is modeled after Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(h) with language that conforms to Article 59(a). Subsection (c) would make clear that deviations from Article 45(a) are subject to harmless error review. The proposal is an acknowledgement that not every violation of Article 45 requires invalidation of the guilty plea. The military providence inquiry has developed over the years into a careful, deliberate procedure with comprehensive protections to ensure that every guilty plea is knowing and voluntary. A guilty plea of that character should not be overturned for minor or technical violations of Article 45(a) that amount to harmless error.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

The recommendation to eliminate the reference to a court-martial without a military judge is related to proposed changes to Articles 16, 19, 26, 40, 41, 49, 50a and 51 to delete similar references.

The recommendation to codify a harmless error review in guilty plea cases is related to proposed changes in appellate review under Article 66(c) which are designed to focus appellate review more precisely on claims of prejudicial error at trial. In that regard, Part II of the Report will recommend related changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial to apply plain error review for matters not properly preserved at trial. Specifically, Part II of the Report will consider the potential of applying a rule for plain error, similar to Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b), as well as a modification to R.C.M. 910(j) to apply plain error review to Article 45(a) matters raised for the first time on appeal. The goal would be to require an accused to identify errors in the guilty plea process and bring them to the attention of the trial judge to correct, or face plain-error review on appeal.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 707. PLEAS OF THE ACCUSED.

(a) PLEAS OF GUILTY.—Subsection (b) of section 845 of title 10, United States Code (article 45 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking "may be adjudged" and inserting "is mandatory"; and

(2) in the second sentence—

(A) by striking "or by a court-martial without a military judge"; and

(B) by striking ", if permitted by regulations of the Secretary concerned,".

(b) HARMLESS ERROR.—Such section (article) is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) HARMLESS ERROR.—A variance from the requirements of this article is harmless error if the variance does not materially prejudice the substantial rights of the accused.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 707 contains amendments to Article 45 concerning the pleas of the accused.

Section 707(a) would amend Article 45(b) to permit an accused to plead guilty in a capital case when the death penalty is not a mandatorily prescribed punishment. It would further amend the statute to conform to the proposed changes in Articles 16 and 19 to require a military judge to be detailed to all general and special courts-martial, and to eliminate the unnecessary requirement under current law for members to enter a finding of guilty where the military judge has already accepted the accused's guilty plea.

Section 707(b) would codify a harmless error rule in a new subsection (c) of Article 45. The proposed language is adapted from Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(h), using the language of Article 59(a) by substituting the phrase "materially prejudice the substantial rights of the accused" for the phrase "affects" substantial rights. See Article 59(a) ("A finding or sentence of court-martial may not be held incorrect on the ground of an error of law unless the error materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused."); United States v. Davis, 64 M.J. 445, 449 (C.A.A.F. 2007) (describing Article 59(a) as the military counterpart to Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a)). These changes would reflect federal practice and procedure with respect to harmless error and plain error review, while recognizing the unique aspects of military practice.

The proposed amendments to Article 45 aim to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of appellate review of unconditional guilty pleas, while also preserving the unique procedural protections in the military system to ensure a guilty plea is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The amendments fit within the larger goal of encouraging error correction at the trial stage and would make no change to the responsibilities of the military judge under Article 45(a). The changes seek to eliminate the sanction of reversal for harmless errors, and would conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 66 (replacing automatic review in non-capital cases with review based upon the accused's right to file an appeal). Subsection (c) addresses only harmless error. Implementing rules will prescribe plain error review for matters not properly preserved at trial. The addition of subsection (c) reflects the specific structure of Article 45, and is not intended to disturb the longstanding application of standards of review, including a harmless error test, to other aspects of the Code that are not accompanied by a statutory standard of review.

Articles 46-47 – Opportunity to Obtain Witnesses and Other Evidence & Refusal to Appear or Testify

10 U.S.C. §§ 846-47

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Articles 46 and 47 to clarify the authority to issue and enforce subpoenas for witnesses and other evidence, and to enhance the government's ability to use investigative subpoenas prior to trial, consistent with federal and state practice. In addition, the proposed amendments to Article 46 would provide explicit authority for military judges to modify, quash, or order compliance with subpoenas before and after referral of charges, and to issue warrants and orders for the production of stored electronic communications, consistent with federal and state practice under the Stored Communications Act. This proposal would further amend Article 46 by moving the provisions under subsection (b) concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses to Article 6b and extending those provisions to victims of all offenses, consistent with related victims' rights provisions.

2. Summary of the Current Statutes

Article 46 addresses the production of witnesses and evidence, including the issuance of subpoenas. Under Article 46(a), the trial counsel, defense counsel, and the court-martial are guaranteed "equal opportunity" to obtain witnesses and other evidence. Article 46(b) places two conditions on the defense counsel's ability to interview "alleged victims of alleged sex-related offenses": (1) when the government notifies the defense of its intent to call such victims as witnesses at a preliminary hearing or a court-martial, the defense must make any requests for interviews of the alleged victims through the Special Victims' Counsel or other victim's counsel, if applicable; and (2) such interviews shall, if requested by the alleged victim, take place only in the presence of counsel for the Government, counsel for the victim, or a Sexual Assault Victim Advocate. Article 46(c) provides statutory authority for the use of subpoenas to obtain witnesses and evidence for courts-martial, stating that "[p]rocess issued in court-martial cases . . . shall be similar to that which courts of the United States having criminal jurisdiction may lawfully issue and shall run to any part of the United States or the Commonwealths and possessions."

Article 47 assists in the enforcement of military subpoenas with respect to civilian witnesses and evidence custodians, by making it a punishable offense—triable in U.S. district court upon certification of facts to the U.S. Attorney—for any person to willfully neglect or refuse to comply with process issued under Article 46, including duly issued subpoenas duces tecum (subpoenas for evidence) to obtain documentary evidence for use at Article 32 preliminary hearings.

3. Historical Background

As early as 1891, the ability to issue enforceable, nationwide process to obtain witnesses and other evidence for court-martial proceedings was recognized as essential to the legitimacy and effective administration of the nation's military justice system.[1] In 1901, Congress passed "an act to prevent the failure of military justice and for other purposes," the central feature of which was to make it a misdemeanor offense for any "person not belonging to the army of the United States" to willfully neglect or refuse to appear as a witness at, or produce documentary evidence for, a general court-martial.[2] When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950,[3] it sought to replicate the rules for federal compulsory process in Articles 46 and 47,[4] which it derived in part from Articles 22 and 23 of the Articles of War.[5] With respect to Article 46's subpoena power provision (now codified as subsection (c)), the drafters of the UCMJ "felt [it] appropriate to leave the mechanical details as to the issuance of process to regulation."[6] The drafters added the first sentence of Article 46 concerning "equal opportunity" (now codified as subsection (a)) in order "to insure equality between the parties in securing witnesses."[7] Both articles remained substantially unchanged from their original versions until recently.

In 2011, the Department of Defense proposed several amendments to Article 47 in order to address the lack of investigative subpoena power in military practice.[8] Previously, the power to compel witness testimony and the production of documentary evidence by subpoena under the Code was limited to depositions, courts of inquiry, and courts-martial after referral of charges for trial.[9] This lack of pre-referral subpoena power created a paradox for commanders and convening authorities, in whom the UCMJ vests responsibility for investigating and disposing of alleged offenses and preferred charges and specifications: they could not refer charges for trial until there was probable cause to believe an accused committed the offense; but in order to subpoena the evidence that could help inform this probable cause determination, they first had to refer charges to a court-martial. By contrast, the vast majority of federal subpoenas are issued pre-indictment, pursuant to grand jury investigations and in support of the prosecution's efforts to develop the evidence upon which to charge the accused.[10] For decades, the military's "subpoena paradox" was widely understood to be a weakness of the military justice system and an area in need of reform.[11]

Unlike the current Article 46(c), which simply requires process issued in court-martial cases to "be similar" to process issued in U.S. district court, the Articles of War expressly provided such authority: "Every trial judge advocate of a general or special court-martial and every summary court-martial shall have power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which courts of the United States, having criminal jurisdiction, may lawfully issue . . . ." AW 22 of 1920 (emphasis added). Similarly, the Articles for the Government of the Navy provided that "[a] naval court-martial or court of inquiry shall have power to issue like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which United States courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or District where such naval court shall be ordered to sit may lawfully issue." AGN 42 of 1930 (emphasis added).

In its 2012 amendments to the UCMJ, Congress responded to the Department of Defense's legislative proposals by extending Article 47's punishment authority to cover persons not subject to the UCMJ who receive subpoenas duces tecum for Article 32 investigations, and by authorizing the convening authority in these cases to certify cases of non-compliance to the U.S. attorney for prosecution in U.S. district court.[12] With these changes, government counsel in courts-martial and Article 32 investigations now had an enforceable, pre-referral subpoena authority somewhat analogous to the authority of federal prosecutors to issue pre-indictment subpoenas pursuant to grand jury investigations.[13] Two years later, [13] Cf. FED. R. CRIM. P. 17. See generally Topinka, supra note 4. Under the Department of Defense's original 2011 legislative proposal, the trial counsel's subpoena duces tecum authority would have been tied to "investigations" more generally, not solely investigations under Article 32; however, concern over "how recipients could challenge a pre-referral subpoena led Congress to limit the authority to Article 32 investigations, where the convening authority would have cognizance over the case and the power to quash or modify the subpoena." Pehrson, supra note 8, at 10; see OLC Leg. Proposal, supra note 8 (proposing that Article 47(a)(1) be amended to state, "Any person not subject to this chapter who . . . has been duly issued a subpoena duces tecum for an investigation, including an investigation pursuant to section 832(b) of this title (article 32(b)) . . .") (emphasis added); see also R.C.M. 703(e)(2)(F) (2012) ("If a person subpoenaed requests relief on the grounds that compliance is unreasonable or oppressive, the convening authority or, after referral, the military judge may direct that the subpoena be modified or withdrawn if appropriate.").

Congress amended Article 47 again, this time in order to align the statute with the NDAA FY 2014 amendments that transformed the Article 32 investigation into a more narrowly focused "preliminary hearing." As amended, the purpose of the Article 32 hearing is no longer to conduct "a thorough and impartial investigation of all the matters set forth" in the charges and specifications, as it was previously. As a consequence of this transformation, the investigative value of subpoenas duces tecum issued under Articles 46 and 47 was indirectly diminished.

As part of the NDAA FY 2014 amendments, Congress also amended Article 46, splitting the statute into subsections and adding a new subsection (b). The new provision placed conditions on a defense counsel's ability to interview alleged victims of sex-related offenses. The contours of this provision have not been interpreted in the Manual or in appellate decisions. Although the legislative history does not expressly address this provision, it appears to reflect two well-settled principles of law and professional ethics: (1) that a lawyer may not communicate directly with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel without the consent of that counsel or a court order;[14] and (2) that "neither the accused, his counsel, nor the court may be able to compel a witness to submit to a private interview, or not to attach such conditions to the matter as he, the witness, deems appropriate."[15] In 2015, Congress made technical amendments to Article 46(a) and (b), changing the terms "trial counsel" and "defense counsel" wherever they appeared to "counsel for the Government" and "counsel for the accused," respectively.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has addressed Articles 46 and 47 through R.C.M. 701 (Discovery) and R.C.M. 703 (Production of witnesses and evidence), which primarily address post-referral rules of procedure. R.C.M. 405, a related provision concerning production of witnesses and evidence for a proceeding under Article 32, was recently amended to conform to the recent transformation of the Article 32 proceeding from an investigation to a preliminary hearing.[16] During the pretrial and trial stages of court-martial proceedings, these rules guide the parties with respect to disclosure of evidence and names of witnesses; access to witnesses and evidence and regulation of discovery; the parties' rights to production of witnesses and evidence; the rules and procedures applicable to Article 32 hearings; and the procedures for issuing, challenging, and enforcing subpoenas for witnesses and evidence.

Under R.C.M. 703, each party is entitled to the production of any witness whose testimony on a matter in issue would be relevant and necessary; similarly, each party is entitled to the production of evidence that is relevant and necessary.[17] Because the convening authority generally funds all court-martial costs, including witness expenses, the rules require the defense to submit its witness and evidence requests to the convening authority via the trial counsel and staff judge advocate.[18] Based on the "relevant and necessary" standard, the trial counsel normally determines "whether to grant or deny defense witness requests, other than expert witness requests which require the convening authority's personal decision."[19] Under current law, "[I]f the convening authority denies the request, the defense counsel must wait until the case is referred to submit the request to the military judge" for review of the convening authority's decision.[20]

When civilian witnesses and evidence not under the control of the government are determined to be relevant and necessary to a matter at issue in the case, the trial counsel issues subpoenas using the standard DD Form 453.[21] Subpoenas for live witness testimony (subpoenas ad testificandum) compel the civilian recipient—under penalty of federal prosecution—to attend and give testimony at a court-martial, court of inquiry, or deposition. These witness subpoenas are not authorized for Article 32 hearings, and generally are not issued until after referral of charges and specifications for trial (subpoenas for pre-referral depositions under Article 49 and R.C.M. 702 being the exception to this general rule).[22] Subpoenas for the production of evidence (subpoenas duces tecum) compel the recipient to produce the "books, papers, documents, data, or other objects or electronically stored information designated therein at the proceeding or at an earlier time for inspection by the parties."[23] When civilian recipients wish to

The rules and procedures pertaining to pre-referral subpoenas duces tecum have been in a state of flux due to the multiple amendments to Article 47(a)(1) over the past three years. On June 13, 2014, the President issued Executive Order (EO) 13669, modifying various sections of R.C.M. 703 and R.C.M. 405 to implement the 2012 amendments that created the initial authority for issuance of subpoenas duces tecum for "investigation[s] pursuant to" Article 32. Exec. Order No. 13,669, 79 Fed. Reg. 34,999, 35,000-35,005 (Jun. 18, 2014). Under the revised rules, following the convening authority's order directing an Article 32 investigation, the Article 32 investigating officer makes an initial determination of whether documentary evidence requested by the parties is relevant to the investigation and non-cumulative. Id. at 35,000-35,001, 35,004-35,005 (describing amended R.C.M. 405(g) and R.C.M. 703(f)(4)(B)). If that determination is positive, the trial counsel or the investigating officer is authorized to issue a subpoena duces tecum to attempt to obtain the relevant evidence. Id. On June 17, 2015, the President signed Executive Order 13,696, implementing new changes to R.C.M. 405 and 703. Exec. Order No. 13,696, 80 Fed. Reg. 35,783 (Jun. 22, 2015). Under the recent revisions, only "counsel for the Government" would be authorized to issue subpoenas duces tecum to obtain evidence for challenge military subpoenas on the grounds that the demands for testimony or evidence contained therein are "unreasonable or oppressive" (the applicable federal civilian standard), they are authorized to submit requests that the subpoena be modified or withdrawn ("quashed").[24] Under current law, when subpoenas are issued after referral of charges and specifications for trial, such requests are received and acted upon by the military judge detailed to the court-martial; before referral of charges and specifications—including for any Article 32 subpoena duces tecum—the convening authority is responsible for acting upon these requests.[25] If the appropriate authority determines that the subpoenas are not unreasonable or oppressive, then warrants of attachment (DD Form 454) may be issued to compel the appearance of the witness or the production of documents.[26]

Subpoenas issued pursuant to Articles 46 and 47 and the procedures provided in R.C.M. 703 have been described as "judicial subpoenas"—roughly equivalent to subpoenas issued under Fed. R. Crim. P. 17 in U.S. district court.[27] Under current law, however, military criminal investigative organizations and military trial counsel are unable to utilize the subpoena authority to order production of relevant evidence from electronic communications service providers—including cell phone records, emails, and text messages. This is because such information is protected by the Stored Communications Act,[28] a federal privacy-protection law, and military courts are not defined as "courts of competent jurisdiction" under the law's definitions section.[29] Furthermore, military judges do not currently have the authority to issue "warrants," which are required for most types

Article 32 preliminary hearings. The standard for determining whether a subpoena duces tecum should issue would be: (1) "whether the evidence [sought] is relevant, not cumulative, and necessary based on the limited scope and purpose of the hearing"; and (2) whether issuance of the subpoena duces tecum would "cause undue delay to the preliminary hearing."

However, in United States v. Warshak, 631 F.3d 266, 288 (6th Cir. 2010), the Sixth Circuit held such procedures to be unconstitutional. Several providers, including Google and Yahoo!, have cited the Sixth Circuit's position and refused to provide any class of stored electronic communications without a search warrant issued by a "court of competent jurisdiction" under Section 2711 of the Act. of information protected under the Act. As a result, only the most basic account data and account holder information are generally obtainable for use in military investigations.

One alternative to obtaining relevant electronic communications for investigative purposes is to request an administrative subpoena issued under the authority of the DoD Inspector General.[30] These administrative subpoenas traditionally were limited to Department investigations concerning fraud, waste, and abuse, but in 2009, the program was expanded to include "support of certain DoD non-fraud related [general crimes] investigations."[31] Under the expanded mandate, the Inspector General's Office may exercise its administrative subpoena power in support of general crimes investigations when there is a "sufficient DoD nexus to the crime at issue," and when "the particular crime at issue is of such a nature and/or such concern to DoD as to warrant the DoD IG's involvement in the investigation."[32] Under this "Particular Crimes Test," one of twenty listed offenses—including sexual assault, murder, espionage, drug trafficking, and other serious offenses under the UCMJ—must be alleged in order for the Inspector General's Office to issue an administrative subpoena in support of a general crimes investigation.[33] Although these administrative subpoenas have certain advantages over subpoenas issued under Articles 46 and 47,[34] generally they are viewed as an inadequate alternative, due both to the limited scope of offenses for which they are available and their lengthy administrative requirements.[35] A second alternative, often equally if not more difficult as a practical matter, is for the trial counsel and the military criminal investigative organization to request subpoena assistance from U.S. Attorney offices, state prosecutors, and local law enforcement. Generally, these agencies are fully occupied in the prosecution of federal and state crimes and find it difficult to provide additional support for military investigations and prosecutions.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, discovery rules and procedures are provided under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16, and subpoena procedures are provided under Fed. R. Crim. P. 17. Although federal discovery rules are similar to military discovery rules in many ways, in terms of practice, discovery in military cases has traditionally been much broader than the discovery provided for in federal district court cases.[36] In part, this difference between military and federal civilian discovery practice can be attributed to tradition and custom, and the orientation in the military justice system toward "open-file" disclosure policies that are not as common in federal prosecution offices.

With respect to subpoena practice, despite the similarities between military subpoenas and subpoenas issued under Fed. R. Crim. P. 17,[37] federal prosecutors and law enforcement agencies have much broader authority to utilize subpoenas during the investigative, pre-indictment (pre-referral) stages of a case.[38] Under Fed. R. Crim. P. 6 and 17, federal prosecutors have access to grand jury investigative subpoenas as soon as a grand jury is summoned, which often happens before the accused is even aware of the investigation or afforded the right to counsel. Similarly, in many states, prosecutors are given investigative subpoena authority by statute, to be exercised in advance of filing charges with the court or obtaining an indictment.[39] In the military justice system, by contrast, an accused is provided with a defense counsel as soon as charges are preferred—generally weeks before an Article 32 hearing or before referral of charges and specifications to general or special courts-martial for trial. Furthermore, whereas probable cause is not required for the issuance of grand jury subpoenas,[40] the vast majority of military subpoenas are issued post-referral, after the probable cause threshold has already been met. This difference provides federal prosecutors with a superior investigative tool during the preliminary, investigative stages of a case.[41] In addition, federal prosecutors and law enforcement agencies have several available means for obtaining electronic communications and other stored data protected by the Stored Communications Act, including—depending on the classification level of the information sought—grand jury investigative subpoenas, trial subpoenas, and search warrants and court orders issued by district court judges.[42]

Another difference between military practice and federal civilian practice in this area is the new Article 46(b), the provision placing statutory conditions on the defense counsel's ability to interview victims of sex-related offenses. There is no federal equivalent for this provision; however, some states have created constitutional, statutory, and regulatory protections for crime victims—generally tied to other Crime Victim's Rights Act-like protections—formalizing the right of victims to refuse interviews with defense attorneys or to place reasonable conditions on the conduct of such interviews. For example, under the California Constitution, "In order to preserve and protect a victim's rights to justice and due process, a victim shall be entitled to . . . [the right] to refuse an interview, deposition, or discovery request by the defendant, the defendant's attorney, or any other person acting on behalf of the defendant, and to set reasonable conditions on the conduct of any such interview to which the victim consents."[43]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 46.1: Amend Articles 46 and 47 to clarify the authority to issue and enforce subpoenas for witnesses and other evidence, to allow subpoenas duces tecum to be issued for "investigations of offenses under" the UCMJ when authorized by a general court-martial convening authority, and to authorize military judges to issue warrants and orders for the production of stored electronic communications under the Stored Communications Act.

This proposal would restructure Articles 46 and 47 to clarify and enhance the relationship between the two statutes. It also would enhance the government's ability to issue investigative subpoenas prior to trial, consistent with federal and state practice. These changes would provide military trial counsel with similar subpoena authority to grand jury investigative subpoenas issued by federal prosecutors in federal district court, and the investigative subpoena authority granted to prosecutors and attorneys general by statute in many state jurisdictions.

The proposed amendments are similar to the amendments to Article 47 proposed by the Department of Defense in 2011. There are two key differences between the two proposals:

First, this proposal would amend Article 46, which is the statutory authority under the UCMJ for the issuance of process, rather than Article 47, which is a punishment provision only. Because the authority "to compel the production of other evidence" under Article [43] CAL. CONST. art. 1 Sect. 28(b)(5). The manner in which such provisions are implemented may raise due process issues with respect to the rights of an accused. See State v. Murtagh, 169 P.3d 602, 615, 624 (Alaska 2007) (holding that the accused's rights under the Alaska state constitution to "reasonable access to witnesses without unjustified state interference" were violated by certain provisions in the state's victims' rights, which provided that: (1) defense counsel in sexual offense cases must obtain written consent from a witness or victim before interviewing them; (2) defense representatives must advise all victims and witnesses that they did not have to talk to them and could have a prosecuting attorney or other person present during the interview; (3) defense representatives in sexual offense cases are prohibited from contacting a witness who provided written notice that they did not wish to be contacted; and (4) defense representatives must obtain consent of a victim or witness prior to recording an interview). Part II of this Report will propose implementing rules consistent with the right to due process.

46(c) is limited to "court-martial cases," it is necessary to extend this authority to include "investigations of alleged offenses under this chapter" as well.[44]

Second, this proposal would condition the issuance of pre-referral subpoenas duces tecum on the approval of a general court-martial convening authority. This requirement would provide an administrative check on this pre-referral authority, and is consistent with the convening authority's law enforcement role in the investigative stages of a potential court-martial.

These changes would result in more well-developed military criminal investigations before the ultimate charging decision by the convening authority, as well as enhanced cooperation between military criminal investigative organizations and military prosecutors during the investigative stages of a court-martial.

This proposal would clarify the provisions governing the opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence in cases referred to trial by court-martial. This proposal also would make technical changes to Article 46 to clarify the relationship between Articles 46, 47, and 49 with respect to subpoenas for witnesses and other evidence for courts-martial, military commissions, courts of inquiry, and depositions. Currently, Article 47 references each of these proceedings; Article 46, on the other hand, refers only to "court-martial cases," while Article 49 authorizes the ordering of depositions for use at courts-martial as well as at Article 32 preliminary hearings.

This proposal would create two related judicial authorities. First, it would authorize military judges to review requests from civilian subpoena recipients to modify or quash subpoenas for testimony and production of evidence, both before and after referral of charges. Currently, R.C.M. 703 authorizes military judges to perform this function only after charges are referred to court-martial; before charges are referred, subpoena recipients must petition the convening authority for relief.

This change would ensure that subpoenas issued to civilian witnesses and evidence custodians are reviewed, modified, and enforced by trained judicial officers at all stages of the court-martial process, consistent with the procedures and standards of review applicable in federal district court. Part II of the Report will address these standards in the rules implementing Articles 46 and 47.

In the context of pre-referral requests for depositions of crime victims, the proposed amendment would ensure that any subpoena issued to compel a victim to provide a deposition would be reviewed by a military judge, as opposed to the convening authority who ordered the deposition.

[44] See Topinka, supra note 4, at 21 ("There is no trial counsel or court-martial . . . until a convening authority has referred a case to trial and counsel is detailed to the court-martial. By implication, there is no trial counsel subpoena authority in a military case until after referral of the charges."); LCDR James Warns, Obtaining of Witnesses, JAG JOURNAL 5 (1951) ("In order for this penalty language [in Article 47] to have any application, authority must exist to issue the process compelling the production of documentary evidence.").

Second, this proposal also would authorize military judges to issue warrants and court orders for the production of stored electronic communications, consistent with federal and state practice under the Stored Communications Act. This amendment would better align military practice with federal civilian practice with respect to the ability to obtain protected electronic communications during the investigative and trial stages of a court-martial proceeding. In many criminal investigations, this type of information is critical to successful law enforcement and criminal prosecutions. The UCMJ's current lack of authority to obtain this information without assistance of federal and state prosecutors inhibits law enforcement efforts and impacts the military's ability to investigate and prosecute offenders.

This proposal would include conforming amendments to the Stored Communications Act, Chapter 121 of Title 18, United States Code.

Although this is an area of federal law that is currently in flux, with various appellate court decisions making proper application of the Stored Communications Act uncertain, these amendments would ensure that military criminal investigations and courts-martial have the same access provided to state and federal investigators and courts with respect to this type of highly relevant information.

Recommendation 46.2: Amend Article 46 by moving the provisions under subsection (b) concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses to Article 6b and extending those provisions to victims of all offenses, consistent with related victims' rights provisions.

The proposed amendments would extend recent protections provided to victims of sex-related offenses to all victims, consistent with the purpose and function of Article 6b and other victims' rights provisions that apply equally to all victims of offenses under the UCMJ.

Part II of the Report will address implementing rules, including R.C.M. 701, 702, and 703, and will specifically address the opportunity for expanded defense access to subpoenas during the pretrial and trial stages of courts-martial, consistent with federal civilian practice.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal would support the MJRG Terms of Reference by better aligning military practice with respect to the investigative use of subpoenas and warrants with the practices and procedures applicable in federal district court.

This proposal would support MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures of the civilian sector insofar as practicable, and by addressing ambiguities in the relationship between Articles 46, 47, and 49 thereby reducing the potential for litigation in these areas.

This proposal relates to the proposed enactment of Article 30a concerning pre-referral proceedings presided over by a military judge. The proposed new article would allow military judges to modify, quash, or order compliance with subpoenas during the pre-referral, investigative stage of a court-martial case.

(b) SECTION HEADING.—The heading for such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"§847. Art. 47. Refusal of person not subject to chapter to appear, testify, or produce evidence".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 708 contains several amendments to Article 46 pertaining to the opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence and the use of subpoenas and other process for courts-martial and for investigative purposes. Currently, Article 46 states only that process issued in "court-martial cases" for witnesses and evidence shall be similar to process issued in federal district court, with no explicit subpoena authority provided, and with no distinction made between different types of proceedings under the UCMJ and the different authorities for subpoenaing witnesses and evidence at different stages in the court-martial process. The proposed changes would maintain and enhance the core features of Article 46, while strengthening the relationships among related provisions in Articles 46, 47, and 49.

Article 46(a) would be amended to clarify the provisions governing the opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence in cases referred to trial by court-martial.

The limitations and conditions on defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses currently in Article 46(b) would be moved to Article 6b and expanded to cover all crime victims, consistent with related victims' rights provisions under that statute.

Article 46(b) would restate the current provisions of Article 46(c).

Article 46(c) would clarify current law concerning the issuance of subpoenas or other process to compel witnesses to appear and testify before a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other court or board, or at a deposition under Article 49.

Article 46(d) would provide for subpoenas to compel the production of evidence before a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other court or board, or at a deposition under Article 49. It would also include an additional paragraph providing authority to issue subpoenas duces tecum for investigations of offenses under the UCMJ, if authorized by a general court-martial convening authority. This provision would enhance the government's ability to issue investigative subpoenas prior to trial, consistent with federal and state practice, and would replace the provision currently contained in Article 47(a)(1) concerning the issuance of subpoenas duces tecum for Article 32 preliminary hearings. In addition, Article 46(d) would authorize military judges to issue warrants or court orders for information pertaining to stored electronic communications in the same manner as U.S. district court judges under the Stored Communications Act (Chapter 121, Title 18) subject to limitations prescribed by the President. This new provision would ensure military criminal investigative organizations and military prosecutors have access to electronic evidence during the investigative stages of court-martial cases, similar to their federal counterparts, and under the same limitations and conditions applicable in federal district court.

Article 46(e) would add a new subsection to provide explicit authority for military judges to modify, quash, or order compliance with subpoenas before and after referral of charges.

Section 708(b) would make conforming amendments to 18 U.S.C. §§ 2703 and 2711(3) to include process issued in court-martial proceedings.

Section 709 contains amendments to Article 47, which provides for criminal prosecution in U.S. district court of civilians who fail to comply with military subpoenas issued under Article 46. The amendments would retain current law under Article 47(a), while updating and clarifying the statute's provisions and the relationship between Articles 46 and 47.

Article 48 – Contempts
10 U.S.C. § 848

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would extend the contempt power of military judges under Article 48 to pre-referral proceedings, consistent with the proposal to enact Article 30a (Proceedings Conducted Before Referral). This proposal also would clarify recent amendments to Article 48 in order to remove ambiguities in the language of the current statute with respect to the contempt power of appellate judges. In addition, this proposal would provide for appellate review of contempt punishments in a manner consistent with the review of other orders and judgments under the UCMJ. Part II of the Report will address additional changes needed in the rules implementing Article 48.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 48 provides statutory authority for the punishment of acts of contempt and violations of court orders and rules in courts-martial and other military proceedings. The article's main provision, subsection (a), defines who may punish acts of contempt: judges detailed to courts-martial, courts of inquiry, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the military Courts of Criminal Appeals, provost courts, and military commissions. It then defines which acts constitute contempt under the statute: (1) the use of "any menacing word, sign, or gesture in the presence of the judge during the proceedings of the court-martial, court, or military commission"; (2) disturbances to such proceedings; and (3) willful failures to obey "the lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the court-martial, court, or military commission." Article 48(b) provides that the maximum punishment for contempt is 30 days confinement, a fine of $1,000, or both; and Article 48(c) makes the article inapplicable to military commissions established under Chapter 47A.

3. Historical Background

The power of military courts to punish contemptuous acts has been a part of the military justice system since the original Articles of War provided that "[n]o person whatsoever shall use menacing words, signs, or gestures in the presence of a court-martial then sitting, or shall cause any disorder or riot, so as to disturb their proceeding, on the penalty of being punished at the discretion of the said court-martial."[1] By 1893, the language of the statute evolved nearly to its current form, providing courts-martial with the power to summarily punish "any person who uses any menacing words, signs, or gestures in its presence, or who disturbs its proceedings by any riot or disorder."[2] In 1921, Congress expanded this authority to include "military tribunals" and added a maximum punishment of "one month's confinement or a fine of $100, or both."[3] Under the Articles of War, civilians were not punished for contempt, and only "direct" contempts were proscribed (i.e. those committed in the direct presence of the court or in its immediate proximity).[4] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, the contempt authority under Article 48 was revised to include "[a] court-martial, provost court, or military commission."[5] The conduct covered under the statute continued to include only "direct" contempts;[6] however, for the first time, civilians could be punished for contempt by military courts.[7] As Mr. Larkin noted during the Subcommittee hearings:

> Unless [the court-martial] has the power to discipline those before it you may have the most erratic kind of proceedings, and the most disturbing circus atmosphere, as you very frequently have in some sensational civil cases. If the court cannot operate its own proceedings in a dignified manner its proceedings become intolerable.[8]

From 1950 until 2011, Congress substantively amended Article 48 just once, in 2006, when it excluded military commissions under chapter 47A from the article's applicability.[9]

In 2011, Congress made the first significant amendments to Article 48. First, it amended Article 48(a) to identify the "judge detailed to" the court-martial, provost court, or military commission—rather than the court itself—as the disposition authority for contempts.[10] Second, Congress extended the contempt authority to judges detailed to courts of inquiry, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, and the military Courts of Criminal Appeals. The purpose of these changes was to better align military courts procedurally with federal district courts, by providing military trial and appellate judges with a means to directly enforce their court orders, particularly with respect to civilian attorneys who are not subject to military discipline.[11] These changes also better aligned Article 48 with the procedures applicable to contempt proceedings under R.C.M. 809, which was amended in 1998 in order to eliminate the members' involvement in the contempt disposition process.[12] In addition to vesting the contempt authority in trial and appellate judges, the 2011 amendments: (1) raised the maximum monetary punishment under Article 48(b) from $100 to $1,000; and (2) added subsection (a)(3) to the statute to make "indirect" contempts directly punishable by the military judge, including willful failures to follow the lawful writ, process, orders, or rules of the court.[13] Article 47 (Refusal to appear or testify), by contrast, provides only for indirect enforcement of process issued to civilian witnesses and evidence custodians, via prosecution by the U.S. attorney in U.S. district court.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 48 through R.C.M. 201(c), defining court-martial jurisdiction for the contempt power, and R.C.M. 809, providing the rules and procedures for contempt proceedings. R.C.M. 809(b) provides that acts of contempt directly witnessed by the court may be punished summarily, and that acts committed outside the immediate presence of the court (such as disturbances in the waiting area) shall be disposed of through notice and hearing. R.C.M. 809(c) provides the procedures applicable for contempt proceedings, and R.C.M. 809(d) provides that convening authorities—rather than the Courts of Criminal Appeals—are responsible for reviewing the records of contempt proceedings and approving or disapproving the findings and sentence in whole or in part. Under the rule, the convening authority's action is not subject to further review or appeal.[14] Because of this, there has been very little litigation concerning Article 48 and the rules implementing the statute, and the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has reviewed contempt rulings at the trial level only as mandamus requests.[15]

As currently drafted, R.C.M. 201(c) and R.C.M. 809 contain several ambiguities that may prevent the contempt authority under Article 48 from being exercised effectively by military trial and appellate judges. First, despite the 2011 amendments to Article 48, both rules continue to refer to the "court-martial" itself as the contempt authority; both rules also continue to quote the pre-2011 version of the article, in which only "direct" contempts were punishable and the maximum monetary punishment for a contempt finding was

The fact that judges on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the military Courts of Criminal Appeals are not "detailed" to their respective courts in the same way that military judges are "detailed" to courts-martial appears to have been an oversight in the 2011 amendments.

$100.[16] Second, R.C.M. 809 appears to have been drafted entirely with an eye toward contempt findings at trial by a detailed military judge, as there is no mechanism provided in the rule for a convening authority to "review" or "approve" a contempt finding by a judge serving on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces or a military Court of Criminal Appeals. Finally, because the convening authority's action on the court's contempt findings and sentence is final and not subject to further review or appeal, the military judge's ability to use the contempt power to enforce court rules is limited. This limitation is inconsistent with other judicial functions—deciding on continuance requests, excluding evidence, determining which witnesses and evidence will be produced—which are reviewed by the appellate courts for abuse of discretion. It also creates a potential for disparate treatment of trial and defense counsel with respect to the convening authority's action on any contempt findings by the military judge. The requirement for convening authority review is based on previous practice and appears to be a holdover from Manual provisions that pre-dated the establishment of military judges and the military Courts of Criminal Appeals.[17]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although the 2011 amendments to Article 48 helped to bring military contempt procedures into closer alignment with the contempt procedures applicable in U.S. district court, several major differences remain. First, because federal civilian courts are permanent standing courts—as opposed to the ad hoc courts convened under the UCMJ—the contempt power of federal judges is provided by statute in terms that do not limit its exercise to specified proceedings.[18] For example, under 28 U.S.C. § 636, magistrate judges have the power "within the territorial jurisdiction prescribed by the appointment of such magistrate judge the power to exercise contempt authority" with respect to any contemptuous acts conducted "in the magistrate judge's presence so as to obstruct the administration of justice."[19] By contrast, under Article 48, the judge's contempt authority is confined to the specific court-martial or other proceeding to which the judge has been detailed. A second major difference between the two systems is that in the federal civilian system, a person punished for contempt is provided a right of appeal to the appropriate United States court of appeals upon entry of judgment.[20] Neither R.C.M. 809 nor Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals) provide for appellate review of the detailed military judge's contempt findings. Instead, as noted above, R.C.M. 809(d) provides for convening authority review of all contempt findings, and "[t]he action of the convening authority is not subject to further review or appeal."[21] Also, unlike military contempt proceedings, where the military judge always determines the findings and sentence, persons cited for contempt in federal district court are entitled to jury trials in certain cases, and judges are disqualified from presiding over contempt trials when the alleged contempt involves disrespect toward or criticism of the judge, unless the defendant consents.[22] Finally, unlike the fixed maximum punishment for contempt under Article 48, the maximum punishment in federal district court varies depending on the forum: when tried by a jury, the maximum punishment for contempt is a $1000 fine and confinement for six months; when the judge issues a summary disposition, the maximum punishment is a fine of $300 or 45 days confinement; and when a magistrate judge presides over the contempt proceedings, the punishment cannot exceed the penalties for a Class C misdemeanor.[23]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 48.1: Amend Article 48(a) to extend the contempt power to include military judges and military magistrates detailed to pre-referral proceedings under the proposed Article 30a.

This change would ensure that military judges and magistrates have the authority to directly enforce their orders and court rules in any proceeding to which they have been detailed, including pre-referral proceedings under the proposed Article 30a.

Part II of this Report will address whether the contempt powers of military judges and military magistrates should involve different maximum punishments, consistent with the tiered approach in federal civilian practice.

Recommendation 48.2: Amend Article 48(a) to clarify that judges on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals do not have to be "detailed" to cases or proceedings in order to exercise the contempt power under Article 48, and to clarify that the president (as opposed to the judge) of a court of inquiry is vested with the contempt power.

As amended by NDAA FY 2011, Article 48 vests the contempt power in "judge[s] detailed to" various military courts, including the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals. This is inconsistent with the fact that military and civilian judges who serve on these appellate courts are not "detailed" to cases in the same sense that military judges are detailed to courts-martial. Unlike courts-martial, which are ad hoc courts convened to consider specific cases, these appellate courts are standing courts; the contempt authority of the judges who serve on these courts, therefore, should not be contingent on having been "detailed."

This proposal also would clarify that the "president of a court of inquiry," as opposed to "a judge detailed to . . . a court of inquiry," is vested with the contempt authority. This change reflects that military judges are not detailed to courts of inquiry. It is consistent with R.C.M. 703(e)(2)(C), which provides that "the president of a court of inquiry" may issue subpoenas to secure witnesses or evidence for the proceeding.

Recommendation 48.3: Amend Article 48 to provide for appellate review of contempt punishments consistent with the review of other orders and judgments under the UCMJ.

The proposed new subsection (c) providing for appellate review of contempt punishments would better align military procedures with respect to review of contempt findings and sentences by military courts with the procedures applicable in federal district courts and federal appellate courts.

By transferring the review function for the military judge's contempt findings from the convening authority to the Courts of Criminal Appeals, this proposal would eliminate the potential for unequal treatment of the trial and defense counsel by the convening authority exercising the contempt review authority. In addition, this proposal would eliminate the anomaly under the current rules that the convening authority is responsible for reviewing contempt orders by appellate judges.

This change also would enhance the legitimacy of the military's contempt power under Article 48, by ensuring that individuals—particularly civilian attorneys and witnesses—who are held in contempt of court by military judges can seek review of the contempt citation by a neutral, detached appellate judge, as opposed to the convening authority who referred the charges for trial in the underlying case.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by employing the standards and procedures of the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

This proposal would support the MJRG Operational Guidance by ensuring that the court-martial process employs the standards and procedures of the civilian sector with respect to the contempt power of trial judges insofar as practicable. Though this is an area recently addressed by Congress, the proposed amendments would further the intent of the recent amendments by better aligning the contempt power of military judges with that of federal court judges and strengthening the contempt power as a tool to directly enforce court rules and orders in military proceedings.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 710. CONTEMPT.

(a) AUTHORITY TO PUNISH.—Subsection (a) of section 848 of title 10, United States Code (article 48 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) AUTHORITY TO PUNISH.—(1) With respect to any proceeding under this chapter, a judicial officer specified in paragraph (2) may punish for contempt any person who—

"(A) uses any menacing word, sign, or gesture in the presence of the judicial officer during the proceeding;

"(B) disturbs the proceeding by any riot or disorder; or

"(C) willfully disobeys a lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command issued with respect to the proceeding.

"(2) A judicial officer referred to in paragraph (1) is any of the following:

"(A) Any judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and any judge of a Court of Criminal Appeals under section 866 of this title (article 66).

"(B) Any military judge detailed to a court-martial, a provost court, a military commission, or any other proceeding under this chapter.

"(C) Any military magistrate designated to preside under section 819 or section 830a of this title (article 19 or 30a).

"(D) Any commissioned officer detailed as a summary court-martial.

"(E) The president of a court of inquiry.".

(b) REVIEW.—Such section (article) is further amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(2) by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection (c):

"(c) REVIEW.—A punishment under this section—

"(1) if imposed by a military judge or military magistrate, may be reviewed by the Court of Criminal Appeals in accordance with the uniform rules of procedure for the Courts of Criminal Appeals under section 866(i) of this title (article 66(i));

"(2) if imposed by a judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces or a judge of a Court of Criminal Appeals, shall constitute a judgment of the court, subject to review under the applicable provisions of section 867 or 867a of this title (article 67 or 67a); and

"(3) if imposed by a summary court-martial or court of inquiry, shall be subject to review by the convening authority in accordance with rules prescribed by the President.".

(c) SECTION HEADING.—The heading for such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"§848. Art. 48. Contempt".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 710 would amend Article 48, which provides statutory authority for the punishment of acts of contempt and violations of court orders and rules in courts-martial and other proceedings under the UCMJ. In 2011, Congress made significant amendments to Article 48 that provided a more direct means for military judges to enforce court orders and military subpoenas, and better aligned the contempt authority and procedures in military courts with those in federal district courts. However, the language of the statute as amended is ambiguous with respect to the contempt power of judges serving on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the military Courts of Criminal Appeals.

Section 710(a) would clarify the recent amendments to Article 48 by defining the judicial officers who may exercise the contempt authority to include judges of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals; military judges detailed to courts-martial, provost courts, military commissions, or any other proceeding under the UCMJ (including the proposed Article 30a proceedings); military magistrates designated under Articles 19 or 30a; commissioned officers detailed as summary courts-martial; and presidents of courts of inquiry.

Section 710(b) would transfer the review function for contempt punishments issued by military and appellate judges from the convening authority to the appropriate appellate court. This change would strengthen the contempt power and would ensure that persons held in contempt of court by military judges and appellate judges—particularly civilian attorneys and witnesses—are afforded a fair appellate review process, comparable to the review process applicable in civilian criminal courts and appellate courts across the country. The convening authority's review function would be retained for contempt punishments issued by summary courts-martial and courts of inquiry.

Article 49 – Depositions
10 U.S.C. § 849

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 49 to reflect current deposition practice, case law, related statutory provisions, and related proposals in this Report. The proposed amendments also would better align military deposition practice with federal civilian deposition practice by ensuring that depositions generally are ordered in military criminal cases only when it is likely that a prospective witness's trial testimony otherwise would be lost.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 49 provides statutory authority for the taking of depositions by the parties; it also places statutory restrictions on the conduct of depositions and on their use as a substitute for live witness testimony at trial. Subsection (a) requires the party requesting a deposition to demonstrate that, "due to exceptional circumstances, it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of the prospective witness be taken and preserved for use at a preliminary hearing . . . or a court-martial." Subsection (a)(1) provides that depositions may be ordered between preferral and referral of charges by the convening authority, and after referral of charges by either the convening authority or the military judge. Under subsection (a)(3), the convening authority may designate commissioned officers to represent the prosecution and the defense during deposition hearings and to take the deposition of any witness. The article's remaining five subsections require that the party requesting the deposition give reasonable notice to the other parties of the time and place of the deposition; authorize the deposition officer to be any military or civil officer authorized to take oaths; provide rules and restrictions concerning the admissibility of depositions at trial in non-capital cases; and authorize the use of depositions by the defense in capital cases, and by either party in cases when death is authorized but not mandatory and the convening authority directs that the case be treated as not capital.

3. Historical Background

Congress derived Article 49 from Articles 25 and 26 of the 1920 Articles of War, as amended by the Elston Act of 1948.[1] Under the Articles of War, the parties had greater flexibility in taking depositions and using them at trial than in most civilian jurisdictions, where the ordering of depositions is generally tied to prospective witness unavailability at trial. When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress maintained this variance with civilian practice (and expanded it slightly) by expressly allowing the parties to take oral or written depositions at any time after preferral of charges, unless forbidden by a competent convening authority "for good cause."[2] The main justifications offered for Article 49's openness to taking depositions and using them as a substitute for live witness testimony at trial included the greater mobility of servicemembers, the risk of sudden death for potential court-martial witnesses prior to trial, and the remoteness of many overseas duty stations. As Professor Everett commented in 1960:

> Many exigencies peculiar to the Armed Services undoubtedly led Congress to authorize in Article 49 of the [UCMJ]—and in previous parallel legislation—a use of depositions unparalleled elsewhere in American criminal law administration. 'For instance, when the Armed Services are operating in foreign countries where there is no American subpoena power, it might be impossible to compel a foreign civilian witness to come to the place where the trial is held, and yet he may be quite willing to give a deposition. Furthermore, military life is marked by transfers of personnel—the military community being much more transient than most groups of civilians. To retain military personnel in one spot so that they will be available for a forthcoming trial, or to bring them back from a locale to which they have been transferred, might involve considerable disruption of military operations. Likewise, in combat areas there is often considerable risk that a witness may be dead before trial date, in which event, were civilian rules to be followed, his testimony would be lost.[3]

During the 1949 congressional hearings, Representative Elston suggested that Article 49 provided an important protection for servicemembers accused of offenses, particularly in deployed environments: "I think the reason we provided for depositions . . . was to give the accused a greater opportunity. . . . [T]he complaint we had to deal with was that an accused person was often deprived of witnesses. So we wrote into the law that depositions could be taken."[4] In the decade following the UCMJ's enactment, military courts generally embraced these early justifications for the Article 49's openness to allowing depositions to be taken and used at trial.[5] When the position of military judge was created in 1968, Congress chose to maintain a key aspect of this variance between military and civilian deposition practice, extending Article 49(a)'s limited authority to forbid depositions "for good cause" to military judges following referral of charges to court-martial.[6]

In the 1960s and '70s, military courts endeavored to reconcile Article 49's broad language concerning the availability of depositions in court-martial proceedings with the Sixth Amendment's guarantee that, "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him."[7] In United States v. Jacoby, the Court of Military Appeals reversed a line of cases which held that Article 49 "expressly or by necessary implication" made the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation inapplicable in the military setting.[8] In its decision, the Court acknowledged "[t]hat the exigencies of the military service frequently prohibit the appearance of a military witness or a civilian far removed from the place of trial"; nevertheless, it held that the Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses does indeed apply to servicemembers in court-martial proceedings, and that a military accused's right of confrontation is not satisfied unless he or she is given the opportunity to be present at the taking of depositions and to cross-examine the deposed witnesses in person.[9] A decade later, in United States v. Davis, the Court of Military Appeals struck down the so-called "100-mile rule" of Article 49(d)(1) with respect to military witnesses, announcing that "depositions are an exception to the general rule of live testimony and are to be used only when the Government cannot reasonably have the witness present at trial."[10] Then, in 1980, the President exercised rule-making authority under Article 36 to adopt the military rules of evidence (modeled after the federal rules of evidence), including M.R.E. 804(a), which provided situational definitions for "unavailability as a witness" that effectively replaced Article 49(d)'s "unavailability" criteria. Each of these events brought military deposition practice closer in line with federal civilian deposition practice—affording the accused greater protections while narrowing the range of situations in which depositions could be presented as evidence by either party in courts-martial.

Aside from considerations governing the use of depositions at trial, depositions also have been used in connection with Article 32 investigations as a means of defense discovery.[11] In 2014, Congress transformed the Article 32 investigation into a "preliminary hearing" and provided that crime victims may not be compelled to testify at the hearing.[12] In 2015, Congress amended Article 49(a) to expressly authorize the ordering of depositions to preserve prospective witness testimony "for use at a preliminary hearing."[13] At the same time, Congress removed the broad language in Article 49 authorizing the parties to take depositions at any time unless forbidden "for good cause." In place of this broad language, Congress provided a more restrictive standard for ordering depositions, based on the language of R.C.M. 702 and Fed. R. Crim. P. 15. Under the amended statute, depositions may be ordered by convening authorities—and by military judges after referral of charges—"only if the [requesting] party demonstrates that, due to exceptional circumstances, it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of the prospective witness be taken and preserved for use at a preliminary hearing . . . or a court-martial."[14]

4. Contemporary Practice

The ordering and use of depositions in current military practice is somewhat rare. R.C.M. 702(a) emphasizes that depositions should be ordered in "exceptional circumstances . . . [when] it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of a prospective witness be taken and preserved for use at a preliminary hearing . . . or a court-martial."[15] This language was derived, in part, from the federal rule on depositions, which states that "[a] party may move that a prospective witness be deposed in order to preserve testimony for trial," and that "[t]he court may grant the motion because of exceptional circumstances and in the interest of justice."[16] The 2015 amendments to Article 49(a) updated the statute to reflect the more restrictive language from R.C.M. 702(a). R.C.M. 702's remaining subsections cover who may order depositions; the procedures for requesting, acting upon requests for, and conducting depositions; notice requirements; the duties of deposition officers; objections; and depositions by agreement of the parties.[17] With respect to the admissibility of depositions at court-martial, M.R.E. 804 prohibits the use of depositions unless the moving party can establish that the deponent is unavailable to testify in person. Article 49(d)(1)'s "100-mile rule" is not included among the situational definitions of "unavailability" given in M.R.E. 804(a); rather, the rule states that "'[u]navailability as a witness' includes situations in which the declarant is unavailable within the meaning of Article 49(d)(2)."[18] There are four unavailability criteria contained in Article 49(d)(2) that are not also contained in M.R.E. 804(a): age, imprisonment, military necessity, and "other reasonable cause."[19]

In 2014, the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel observed that Congress's transformation of the Article 32 investigation into a preliminary hearing "may result in additional requests to depose victims and other witnesses."[20] In a recent executive order, the President has amended R.C.M. 702 to clarify the recent amendments to Articles 32 and 49.[21] The amendments to the rule are as follows:

R.C.M. 702(a) clarifies that "exceptional circumstances" for ordering a deposition do not include a victim's refusal to testify at a preliminary hearing or to submit to pretrial interviews. Subsection (a) also requires the convening authority or military judge to determine, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the victim will not be available to testify at court-martial before ordering a deposition of the victim.[22]

The standard for acting on requests for depositions of (non-victim) witnesses under R.C.M. 702(c)(3)(A) has been changed from "may be denied only for good cause" to "whether the requesting party has shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, that due to exceptional circumstances and in the interest of justice, the testimony of the prospective witness must be taken and preserved for use at a preliminary hearing under Article 32 or court-martial."

The requirement under R.C.M. 702(c)(2) that parties requesting depositions must include "[a] statement of the reasons for taking the deposition" in their request has been eliminated.

The Discussion section after R.C.M. 702(c)(3)(A) explaining which situations would constitute good cause for denial of a deposition request has been eliminated.

R.C.M. 702(d)(1) requires that a judge advocate certified under Article 27(b) be detailed as the deposition officer, unless "not practicable."

The rule changes create two different standards in the context of ordering pretrial depositions of prospective witnesses: one standard for victims (unavailability at trial), and a slightly broader standard for non-victim witnesses (exceptional circumstances and in the interest of justice). The changes also closely align the qualification requirements for deposition officers with those of preliminary hearing officers under the 2014 amendments to Article 32.[23]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In the federal criminal justice system and in the vast majority of state jurisdictions, depositions are not authorized for purposes of discovery. Instead, depositions are generally tied to prospective witness unavailability.[24] This is particularly true in jurisdictions that utilize the preliminary hearing as the primary pretrial screening device for charges.[25] In the federal civilian system, the primary purpose of depositions in criminal cases is explicitly to "preserve testimony for trial," and the admissibility of a deposition at trial is determined solely by the rules of evidence.[26] The courts have held that a federal judge's discretion in ordering depositions "is not broad and should be exercised carefully."[27] Also under the federal rule, "only the 'testimony of a prospective witness of a party' can be taken . . . [which] means the party's own witness [and not] an adverse witness."[28] In contrast to the opportunity under Article 49 for the use of depositions as a discovery device, the standards in the federal civilian system do not include such situations, regardless of the witness's availability to testify at trial. A slightly different formulation of the rule is prevalent in many state jurisdictions, where statutes and rules of criminal procedure concerning the ordering of depositions require a showing "that a prospective witness may be unable to attend or prevented from attending a trial or hearing, that the witness' testimony is material, and that it is necessary to take the witness' deposition in order to prevent a failure of justice."[29]

With respect to the admissibility of depositions at trial, Article 49(d)'s rules for using depositions at trial are significantly less restrictive than the rules provided under federal common law, where the Supreme Court has long held the use of depositions in criminal cases to be violative of the accused's Sixth Amendment right to confront adverse witnesses except in a narrow range of situations. In Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237 (1895), the Court explained the antagonism between depositions and the Confrontation Clause as follows:

> The primary object of the constitutional provision in question was to prevent depositions or ex parte affidavits, such as were sometimes admitted in civil cases, being used against the prisoner in lieu of a personal examination and cross-examination of the witness, in which the accused has an opportunity, not only of testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness, but of compelling him to stand face to face with the jury in order that they may look at him, and judge by his demeanor upon the stand and the manner in which he gives his testimony whether he is worthy of belief.[30]

More recently, the Court has held that depositions may not be used against an accused at trial even when the deposed witness is incarcerated at the time of trial and the accused previously has had ample opportunity to cross-examine the witness at a preliminary hearing, unless the prosecution can affirmatively show that the witness's presence at trial cannot practicably be obtained.[31] The enactment of the Federal Rules of Evidence in 1975 and the Military Rules of Evidence five years later narrowed the gap between the two systems with respect to the admissibility of depositions as evidence at trial, as the situational definitions for "unavailability as a witness" contained in M.R.E. 804(a) are largely identical to those contained in Fed. R. Evid. 804(a). However, the additional

"unavailability" criteria in Article 49(d)(2) that are not contained in the Rule—age, imprisonment, military necessity, and "other reasonable cause"—continue to allow for greater use of depositions in military criminal proceedings than in federal civilian practice.

A final difference between military and civilian deposition practice concerns the timing of the right to request depositions. Article 49(a) expressly limits the parties' ability to request depositions until after preferral of charges; Fed. R. Crim. P. 15(a), by contrast, contains no such limitation. In 1971, the Army Court of Military Review considered whether "pre-preferral" depositions could be ordered and concluded that, by its text, Article 49 does not authorize such depositions. In so holding, the Court also noted that, from the accused's perspective, "knowledge of the charge is essential to effective cross examination."[32] Federal case law has echoed this Sixth Amendment concern in the face of government motions for "pre-indictment" depositions of prospective witnesses.[33] However, in one recent decision, a federal district court ordered pre-indictment depositions on government motion where the prospective witnesses were likely to die soon.[34] In resolving the matter in favor of the government, the court looked to the text and history of the federal rule, which suggests that pre-indictment depositions may be ordered "in exceptional circumstances and in the interests of justice." Regarding the accused's Sixth Amendment concerns, the court noted that "the defense can always file a motion to suppress before trial" if the government moves to introduce a deposition that should not be admitted as a Constitutional matter.[35] Conceivably, the government could face a similar situation in a military case, particularly in a deployed environment, where it would be premature to prefer charges but also highly likely that a prospective witness's testimony would be lost without a deposition. In such a situation, the federal rule's greater flexibility allows the court to craft appropriate protections for the accused's Sixth Amendment rights on a case-by-case basis, ensuring that the "interests of justice" are not sacrificed merely because the factual situation confronted by the government is unusual. It is also arguable that the term "party" in Article 49(a) already implies the existence of an "accused," which itself implies the existence of preferred charges and specifications.[36] If this is the case, then Article 49(a)'s "post-preferral" timing requirement is not only unnecessary; it is redundant.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 49.1: Amend Article 49(a) to more closely mirror the language and function of Fed. R. Crim. P. 15(a)(1), while moving the more procedural aspects of this provision to R.C.M. 702. Specifically, amend subsection (a)(1) to provide that "a convening authority or a military judge may order depositions . . . only if the requesting party demonstrates that, due to exceptional circumstances, it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of a prospective witness be preserved for use at a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other military court or board.

This proposal would reduce Article 49(a) to its essential elements, allowing the more procedural aspects of requesting and ordering depositions to be moved to the rules implementing the statute. The result would be a clearer, more functional statute, and one less likely to require further amendments as practice in this area develops over time.

This proposal would clarify that depositions may not be ordered specifically for use at Article 32 preliminary hearings. This change would reflect federal civilian practice and would address the absence of subpoena authority under Article 47 to compel civilian witnesses to provide such depositions for use at preliminary hearings (as opposed to depositions for use at courts-martial, military commissions, and courts of inquiry). Importantly, depositions are not the only means of obtaining information for an Article 32 proceeding when in person testimony is not available. R.C.M. 405, the rule implementing Article 32, also provides for the use of sworn statements and testimony via remote means for witnesses who are not reasonably available to testify in person (as well as unsworn statements when the defense does not object). These alternatives should provide a sufficient means to obtain relevant witness testimony for the limited purposes of the preliminary hearing in most cases.

Under the proposal, a properly ordered deposition that complies with Article 49(a) (e.g., one not ordered specifically for use at an Article 32 preliminary hearing) may be used as a substitute for live testimony at a preliminary hearing.

Under current law, military judges are unable to order depositions or review denials of deposition requests by convening authorities until after the charges are referred to court-martial. By removing this prohibition, the proposed amendments to Article 49(a) would—in conjunction with the proposal to enact Article 30a—give the accused an avenue for judicial relief in cases where the convening authority improperly denies a pretrial deposition request.[37] Under current practice, such denials can result in lost testimony during the critical, investigative stages of a military criminal case. This change would prevent such loss.

This proposal also would remove Article 49(a)'s timing requirement, which limits the parties' ability to request depositions until after preferral of charges under Article 30. This timing requirement varies from the federal civilian rule unnecessarily. The new statutory rule for ordering depositions—"due to exceptional circumstances, [and] in the interest of justice"—provides convening authorities and military judges with a clear standard for determining when, if ever, "pre-preferral" depositions may be warranted. Furthermore, under R.C.M. 103(16) and Article 1(9), the definition of "party" in military law arguably implies the existence of preferred charges and specifications, making this qualification in the current statute redundant at best.

Recommendation 49.2: Redesignate Article 49(b) as Article 49(a)(3), and amend the language of the provision by replacing the phrase "The party at whose instance a deposition is to be taken . . ." with the more direct phrase, "A party who requests a deposition . . . ."

This proposal would update the language of Article 49(b) to clarify the provision in the context of the statute's other provisions.

Recommendation 49.3: Redesignate Article 49(c) as Article 49(a)(4), and amend the language of the provision to reflect recent amendments to Article 32(b) and proposed changes to R.C.M. 702(d)(1), by requiring that deposition officers be judge advocates certified under Article 27(b) "whenever practicable."

Under current law, depositions "may be taken before and authenticated by any military or civil officer authorized by the laws of the United States or by the laws of the place where the deposition is taken to administer oaths." This allows for the detail of deposition officers who are not legally trained, with no requirement that judge advocates act as the deposition officer whenever practicable.

The proposed change to R.C.M. 702(d)(1) would require the convening authority to detail impartial judge advocates certified under Article 27(b) as deposition officers unless "not practicable." Similarly, Article 32(b) now requires judge advocates to be detailed as preliminary hearing officers "whenever practicable." This amendment would align deposition officer qualification requirements under Article 49 with the similar qualification requirements for preliminary hearing officers under Article 32.

Recommendation 49.4: Redesignate Article 49(a)(3) as Article 49(b) (Representation by Counsel), and amend the provision to provide that: (1) representation of the parties with respect to a deposition shall be by counsel detailed in the same manner as trial counsel and defense counsel are detailed under Article 27; and (2) the accused shall have the right to be represented by civilian or military counsel in the same manner as such counsel are provided for in Article 38(b).

Article 49(a)(3) currently provides that the convening authority "may designate commissioned officers as counsel for the Government and counsel for the accused, and may authorize those officers to take the deposition of any witness." R.C.M. 702(d)(2), by contrast, provides that the convening authority "shall ensure that counsel qualified as required under R.C.M. 502(d) are assigned to represent each party." R.C.M. 502(d), in turn, provides that trial and defense counsel in general courts-martial, and defense counsel in special courts-martial, must be certified under Article 27(b) unless the accused elects individual military or civilian defense counsel in accordance with Article 38(b)(2)-(3).

With respect to detailing of trial and defense counsel to depositions generally, both the statute and the rules need to be updated to reflect current practice, in which trial and defense counsel are detailed to courts-martial by their respective legal service departments, not by the convening authority.

This change would align Article 49 with the counsel qualification requirements of R.C.M. 702(d)(2) and R.C.M. 502(d), and with current practice with respect to the detailing of trial and defense counsel by legal chains of command rather than convening authorities. At the same time, it would preserve the option of the accused to be represented by non-Article 27(b) certified civilian defense counsel at depositions.

Recommendation 49.5: Amend Article 49(d) to replace that subsection's recitation of the situations in which depositions may be used in military proceedings with a more direct reference to the military rules of evidence, consistent with the federal rule.

The current version of Article 49(d) is basically unchanged from how it appeared in 1950, despite the President's adoption of the military rules of evidence in 1980, including M.R.E. 804(a), and despite court rulings in the intervening decades that have significantly narrowed this subsection's scope and effect. The proposed amendment would simplify Article 49(d) and better align the provision with current practice.

The proposed amendment, if adopted, would necessitate a change to M.R.E. 804(a)(6), which currently cross-references to Article 49(d)(2), in order to allow the use of depositions at trial when the deponent is unavailable as a witness due to military necessity or other reasonable cause. This rule change will be considered in Part II of this Report.

Recommendation 49.6: Amend Article 49(e) and (f) by redesignating the two subsections as a single Article 49(d) (Capital Cases), providing that "[t]estimony by deposition may be presented in capital cases only by the defense."

When the UCMJ was enacted, if an offense was punishable by death, the case was classified as "capital" unless the convening authority opted against a capital referral. Under R.C.M. 103(2) and R.C.M. 1004(b)(1), however, a case is not capital unless the convening authority specifically refers the case as capital through special instruction. Because of this change, Article 49(e)'s cross-reference to Article 49(d) is unnecessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal would support the GC Terms of Reference and Article 36 of the UCMJ by conforming Article 49 to current military deposition practice and case law, and by aligning military deposition practice more closely with deposition practices and procedures applicable in federal district court and most state jurisdictions.

This proposal would support MJRG Operational Guidance by providing greater internal consistency among related UCMJ articles, MCM provisions, and other MJRG proposals, including the proposal to expand the pre-referral authorities of military judges.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 711. DEPOSITIONS.

Section 849 of title 10, United States Code (article 49 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§849. Art. 49. Depositions

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), a convening authority or a military judge may order depositions at the request of any party.

"(2) A deposition may be ordered under paragraph (1) only if the requesting party demonstrates that, due to exceptional circumstances, it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of a prospective witness be preserved for use at a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other military court or board.

"(3) A party who requests a deposition under this section shall give to every other party reasonable written notice of the time and place for the deposition.

"(4) A deposition under this section shall be taken before, and authenticated by, an impartial officer, as follows:

"(A) Whenever practicable, by an impartial judge advocate certified under section 827(b) of this title (article 27(b)).

"(B) In exceptional circumstances, by an impartial military or civil officer authorized to administer oaths by (i) the laws of the United States or (ii) the laws of the place where the deposition is taken.

"(b) REPRESENTATION BY COUNSEL.—Representation of the parties with respect to a deposition shall be by counsel detailed in the same manner as trial counsel and defense counsel are detailed under section 827 of this title (article 27). In addition, the accused shall have the right to be represented by civilian or military counsel in the same manner as such counsel are provided for in section 838(b) of this title (article 38(b)).

"(c) ADMISSIBILITY AND USE AS EVIDENCE.—A deposition order under subsection (a) does not control the admissibility of the deposition in a court-martial or other proceeding under this chapter. Except as provided by subsection (d), a party may use all or part of a deposition as provided by the rules of evidence.

"(d) CAPITAL CASES.—Testimony by deposition may be presented in capital cases only by the defense.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 711 contains a complete revision of Article 49. Article 49 provides statutory authority for the taking of depositions by the parties of a court-martial; it also places statutory restrictions on the conduct of depositions and on their use as a substitute for live witness testimony at trial. Consistent with Article 36, the proposed amendments would conform Article 49's substantive provisions, to the extent practicable, to the procedures and principles of law pertaining to depositions applicable in federal district court. These amendments also would conform the statute to the Confrontation Clause. As revised, Article 49 would contain the following provisions:

Article 49(a) would better align military deposition practice under Article 49 with federal and state deposition practice, and with the authority to issue and enforce subpoenas for witnesses under Articles 46 and 47, by ensuring that depositions of prospective witnesses will generally be ordered only when it is likely that the witness's trial testimony otherwise would be lost. By eliminating the reference to Article 32 preliminary hearings, the proposed amendments would ensure that depositions are permitted only for the purpose of preserving testimony for trial, not for pretrial discovery purposes. As amended, subsection (a) would conform to the proposed Article 30a concerning pre-referral duties of military judges. As amended, the authority to order depositions could be exercised by military judges detailed under Articles 26 or 30a (consistent with the definition of "military judge" proposed under Article 1(10)), as well as military magistrates designated by the detailed military judge under Articles 19 or 30a.

Article 49(a)(3) would replace and clarify the requirement for notice currently contained in subsection (b).

Article 49(a)(4) would replace and update subsection (c), providing greater consistency between Articles 49 and 32 with respect to the qualifications of deposition officers and preliminary hearing officers.

Article 49(b) would replace and update the counsel provisions currently contained in subsection (a), ensuring that the parties at a deposition will be represented by counsel detailed in the same manner as under Articles 27 and 38.

Article 49(c) would update and replace obsolete provisions in subsection (d) concerning the admissibility of depositions as evidence at trial. These changes would reflect the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence in 1980 and provide greater consistency with federal civilian deposition practice.

Article 49(d) would update and replace subsections (e) and (f) to clarify the prohibition on the use of depositions in capital cases by the government.

Article 50 – Admissibility of Records of Courts of Inquiry
10 U.S.C. § 850

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 50 to permit sworn testimony from a court of inquiry to be either played from an audiovisual recording or read into evidence when it is otherwise admissible.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 50 concerns the admissibility of records of courts of inquiry in courts-martial and military commissions. Under the statute, authenticated records from courts of inquiry may be read into evidence at a court-martial or military commission if the witness is unavailable at trial and the evidence is otherwise admissible. In capital cases or cases extending to the dismissal of commissioned officers, however, testimony can be read only by the defense.

3. Historical Background

Article 50 was derived from Article 27 of the Articles of War and was consistent with the practice in the Navy prior to the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[1] At the time, courts of inquiry were used frequently to investigate allegations of officer misconduct.[2] Boards of investigation, where sworn testimony was not taken, were generally used in cases involving enlisted members.[3] The only amendment to Article 50 came in 2006 when Congress excluded the admissibility of courts of inquiry records in a military commission established under 10 U.S.C. § 948a et seq.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 50 through M.R.E. 804(b)(1), which expressly includes testimony from a court of inquiry within the definition of former testimony that may be admissible when the declarant is found to be unavailable at trial. Although courts of inquiry have a long tradition in the military, they are rarely conducted today, having given way to other investigative and administrative procedures. Because of the infrequent use of courts of inquiry, Article 50 is rarely used as a basis for admitting the former testimony of an unavailable declarant.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 50 has no corresponding rule in federal civilian criminal practice. Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1), however, does provide a hearsay exception for former testimony nearly identical to the exception contained in M.R.E. 804(b)(1).[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 50: Amend Article 50 to permit sworn testimony from a court of inquiry to be played, in addition to read, into evidence in courts-martial and military commissions not established under 10 U.S.C. § 948a et seq. when it is otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence.

As noted, use of courts of inquiry today is extremely rare. When they are used, however, the manner of presenting the evidence to a factfinder at a court-martial should not be limited to the reading of a transcript. Allowing an authenticated audio recording to be played for the members allows for more flexibility in the manner of presentation and is more efficient.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

This proposal supports the MJRG operational guidance by promoting efficiency in the court-martial process.

[5] FED. R. EVID. 804(b)(1) (providing for the admissibility at trial of prior sworn testimony, subject to cross examination by the accused and submitted at trial when the declarant is "unavailable"). In practice this essentially extends only to testimony from prior trials, as grand jury testimony does not qualify as the witnesses at a grand jury are not subject to cross-examination. See FED. R. CRIM. P. 6(d)(1) (providing that only the grand jurors, testifying witness, prosecutor, and court reporter, and court interpreter (if necessary) are authorized to be present during grand jury proceedings).

SEC. 712. ADMISSIBILITY OF SWORN TESTIMONY BY AUDIOTAPE OR VIDEOTAPE FROM RECORDS OF COURTS OF INQUIRY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 850 of title 10, United States Code (article 50 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(d) AUDIOTAPE OR VIDEOTAPE.—Sworn testimony that—

"(1) is recorded by audiotape, videotape, or similar method; and

"(2) is contained in the duly authenticated record of proceedings of a court of inquiry; is admissible before a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or military board, to the same extent as sworn testimony may be read in evidence before any such body under subsection (a), (b), or (c).".

(b) SECTION HEADING.—The heading for such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"§850. Art. 50. Admissibility of sworn testimony from records of courts of inquiry".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 712 would amend Article 50 to update the statute to permit sworn testimony from a court of inquiry to be played from an audiovisual recording if the deposed witness is unavailable at trial and the evidence is otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence.

Article 50a – Defense of Lack of Mental Responsibility
10 U.S.C. § 850a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align Article 50a with the changes proposed in Article 16. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 50a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 50a defines the defense of "lack of mental responsibility." This defense is an affirmative defense. In order to succeed, the accused must prove by "clear and convincing" evidence that the accused: (1) suffered a severe mental disease or defect; and (2) as a result, was unable to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of the acts. After the accused raises this defense, the members may find the accused guilty, not guilty, or not guilty only by reason of lack of mental responsibility. The statute requires a majority of the panel to find the accused is "not guilty only by reason of lack of mental responsibility." In a case tried before a military judge only, the military judge determines that the defense of lack of mental responsibility has been established. In a case tried with members, the military judge instructs the members on the defense. In a court-martial tried with members but no military judge, the President of the panel instructs the other members as to the defense.

3. Historical Background

For most of American history, the insanity defense was governed by the M'Naghten rule from England. This defense required a mental disease or defect which caused the defendant to either not know the nature of a committed act, or to not know that the act was wrong. This defense was judicially adopted and defined in most American jurisdictions, including the military's case law. Over time, many jurisdictions expanded this defense to include any act committed because of the accused's mental defect, or any act which was an "irresistible impulse." In 1984, Congress passed the Insanity Defense Reform Act[1]. The Act required the mental defect to be "severe" and eliminated the "irresistible impulse" defense. The Act also made the defense an affirmative defense, which placed the burden on the accused to prove lack of mental responsibility. Shortly after the Act was passed, Article 50a was added to the

[1] 18 U.S.C. § 17 (1984).

UCMJ.[2] Article 50a essentially mirrors the requirements of the Insanity Defense Reform Act.

4. Contemporary Practice

The defense of lack of mental responsibility is not frequently raised and there are few reported military appellate cases addressing the defense.[3] The military courts recognize that, while lack of mental responsibility is an affirmative defense which the accused has the burden of proving, if evidence is introduced which calls into question the mens rea of the accused on a specific intent element of an offense, the government has the burden of proving specific intent.[4] In United States v. Berri, the Court of Military Appeals held that "[i]f admissible evidence suggests that the accused, for whatever reason, including mental abnormality, lacked mens rea, the factfinder must weigh it along with any evidence to the contrary."[5] Thus, if a specific mens rea is an element of a crime, the government must prove it as they would any other element. The President has implemented Article 50a through R.C.M. 916(k)(2). The article also details procedures for instructing members in cases where a special court-martial has been convened without a military judge. Under longstanding practice among all the services, such courts-martial are extremely rare because a military judge is typically detailed to every general and special court-martial.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although Article 50a is essentially identical to the provisions of the Insanity Defense Reform Act, federal and military courts have taken different approaches to diminished mental capacity as a way to negate mens rea as an element of an offense. The military courts allow evidence of partial mental responsibility to negate the mens rea of specific intent crimes.[6] In United States v. Berri, the U.S. Court of Military Appeals cited to cases in the Eleventh and Third Circuits for this rule.[7] Not all of the federal circuits have followed the Eleventh and Third Circuits.[8]

Recommendation 50a: Amend Article 50a to delete provisions pertaining to courts-martial without a military judge, with no substantive changes.

In view of the well-established case law addressing Article 50a, only conforming changes are necessary. Article 50a mirrors federal law and both are generally similar in practice.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 50a.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

Article 50a is a stable area of military criminal justice practice and mirrors federal law.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 713. CONFORMING AMENDMENT RELATING TO DEFENSE OF LACK OF MENTAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Section 850a(c) of title 10, United States Code (article 50a(c) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking ", or the president of a court-martial without a military judge,".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 713 would amend Article 50a to conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 16 to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge.

Article 51 – Voting and Rulings
10 U.S.C. § 851

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align Article 51 with the changes proposed in Article 16. Part II of the Report will consider changes in the rules implementing Article 51 necessitated by the proposed statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 51 concerns voting by the members of a court-martial and rulings by the military judge. Article 51(a) prescribes the procedures for the members of a general or special court-martial to vote by secret written ballot on the findings and sentence. Article 51(b) provides that the military judge or, in a special court-martial without a military judge, the President of the court-martial panel, shall issue final rulings upon all questions of law and all interlocutory questions arising during the proceedings. Article 51(c) lists required instructions pertaining to presumptions of innocence and the government's burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. And Article 51(d) exempts courts-martial tried by military judge alone from the requirements of subsections (a)-(c).

3. Historical Background

With the exception of the change from "law officer" to "military judge" in 1968, Article 51 has remained relatively unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 51 through R.C.M. 920 (Instructions on findings), 921 (Deliberations and voting on findings), and 922 (Announcement of findings), which provide additional rules and procedures for voting by secret ballot, rulings by the military judge, the limited role of the members, members instructions prior to findings, and trial by a military judge alone. The rules also provide specific instructions for these functions in cases where a special court-martial has been convened without a military judge. Under longstanding practice among all the services, such courts-martial are extremely rare because a military judge typically is detailed to every general and special court-martial.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The rules and procedures pertaining to deliberations and voting under Article 51 and the Rules for Courts-Martial differ in several ways from federal civilian practice. First, due to the differences in rank between court-martial members, Article 51 requires that all voting be by secret written ballot. This helps to preserve anonymity and minimize the potential for unlawful command influence in deliberations. In federal civilian practice, a party may request to poll the jury after the verdict is announced and determine each juror's individual vote in order to ensure unanimity.[2] Another area of difference is with members (or jury) instructions, which tend to be more detailed and uniform in military practice than in federal civilian practice. Article 51 gives specific members instructions that must be given in each case, and the Military Judge's Benchbook provides suggested instructions on elements of offenses, how to view evidence, defenses, and other matters.[3] In federal civilian practice, jury instructions may be given when specifically requested by a party, but they are not required.[4] Each circuit has pattern jury instructions proposed by a Committee on Pattern Jury Instructions.[5] When a judge fails to give a requested instruction, the courts will look at the totality of the circumstances to determine whether an accused received a constitutionally fair trial.[6]

With respect to judicial rulings before findings, military practice and federal civilian practice are closely aligned. Both require the presiding judge to rule on motions, questions of law, excusal requests, and other related matters. While the military technically allows the president of a special court-martial without a military judge to issue rulings, this procedure is not used in practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 51: Amend Article 51 to delete references and rules pertaining to courts-martial without a military judge.

(citation omitted).

This proposal would conform Article 51 to longstanding practice and the proposed changes in Article 16.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

This proposal is related to the proposed changes in Article 16.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 714. VOTING AND RULINGS.

Section 851 of title 10, United States Code (article 51 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking ", and by members of a court-martial without a military judge upon questions of challenge," in the first sentence;

(2) in subsection (b)—

(A) by striking "and, except for questions of challenge, the president of a court-martial without a military judge" in the first sentence; and

(B) by striking ", or by the president" in the second sentence and all that follows through the end of the subsection and inserting "is final and constitutes the ruling of the court, except that the military judge may change a ruling at any time during trial."; and

(3) in subsection (c), by striking "or the president of a court-martial without a military judge" in the matter before paragraph (1).

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 714 would amend Article 51, which concerns voting by members of a court-martial and rulings by military judges. These amendments would remove statutory references to courts-martial without a military judge, reflecting the proposed amendments to Article 16 to require the detailing of a military judge in all general and special courts-martial. The amendments would retain current law and procedures for voting on the findings and sentence, and for rulings by the military judge, other than those aspects of Article 51 and the implementing rules which specifically concern courts-martial without a detailed military judge.

Article 52 – Number of Votes Required
10 U.S.C. § 852

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal, in conjunction with the recommendation for fixed panel sizes under Article 16, would eliminate inconsistencies and uncertainties in court-martial voting requirements by standardizing the requirements for each type of court-martial. The proposal also would make conforming changes to align Article 52 with the proposed changes in Articles 16, 25a, and 53.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 52 requires that for an accused to be convicted of an offense there must be a concurrence of all the members in cases where death is required, and two-thirds of the members for all other offenses. The statute requires unanimity for a death sentence, three-fourths concurrence for a sentence to confinement for more than ten years, and a two-thirds concurrence for all other sentences. A vote for reconsideration of a finding of guilt requires more than one-third of the panel for non-capital offenses and any one member may move for reconsideration of a finding of guilt in a capital case. All other matters require a majority vote.[1] Finally, Article 52 discusses voting on issues pertaining to special courts-martial without a military judge, such as members voting on challenges to another member and motions to suppress evidence.

3. Historical Background

Under the original Articles of War, a majority vote of a thirteen-person court-martial panel was required for conviction.[2] After the American Revolution, and in order to account for the limited size of America's military forces, the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy adopted the practice of seating five to thirteen officers in general courts-martial, with regimental courts-martial (or "summary" courts-martial in the Navy) fixed at three members.[3] In 1920, amendments to the Articles of War increased the majority vote requirements for a conviction to a three-fourths requirement in cases where death was mandatory and a two-thirds requirement in all other cases.[4] When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, it kept in place the two-thirds voting requirement for most cases, but added a requirement of unanimity for death sentences and a requirement for three-fourths of the members to agree in order to adjudge sentences over 10 years. Since military judges were introduced to the system in 1968, the practice has evolved such that military judges are detailed to all special courts-martial, rendering obsolete the provisions of Article 52 directed at a special court-martial without a military judge.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, a special court-martial can consist of as few as three members. However, a special court-martial frequently will include more members because of uncertainty as to the number who will remain after excusals and challenges. A general court-martial may consist of as few as five members, but for the same reasons often will have more than five members. Because there is no maximum number of members in general and special courts-martial, the number of members who are impaneled can fluctuate from case to case. Because a concurrence of at least two-thirds of the panel is required for a conviction, the actual percentage necessary for conviction changes with the size of the panel. The following table shows the varying percentages required for conviction in typical courts-martial.[5]

of members	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
% required for conviction	67%	75%	80%	67%	71%	75%	67%	70%	73%	67%	69%

Panel members also vote on sentencing. The voting requirements range from unanimous (for a death sentence) to a minimum of two-thirds. A sentence of more than ten years confinement requires the concurrence of at least three-fourths of the panel. The following table shows the necessary percentages required for sentences in typical courts-martial.

of members	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
% required for sentence ≤ 10 years	67%	75%	80%	67%	71%	75%	67%	70%	73%	67%	69%
% required for > 10 years	NA	NA	80%	83%	86%	75%	78%	80%	82%	75%	77%

[5] Because there currently is no maximum number of members who may sit on a panel, this table is not exhaustive.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Civilian practice and military practice concerning voting differ with respect to minimum requirements. In federal civilian practice, all findings by a jury must be unanimous. In capital cases, a jury must also unanimously agree to a sentence of death. The federal district court judge is the sentencing authority in all other cases. There are no federal courts without a trial judge or magistrate. Every state except Oregon and Louisiana requires unanimous verdicts. Those two states require at least ten of twelve jurors for a conviction.[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 52.1: Amend Article 52 to require concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present.

With the fixed panel sizes established under the proposal for Article 16, this proposal would set the voting percentage for a conviction to 75% (e.g., 6 of 8 at general courts-martial; 3 of 4 at special courts-martial).

Recommendation 52.2: Amend Article 52 to require concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present on offenses in a case referred for trial as a capital case, where there was not a unanimous finding of guilty.

In order for the accused to be sentenced to death, the panel must be unanimous on both findings and sentence. The panel in a capital case first considers the findings on both capital and non-capital offenses that have been referred to the court-martial. For non-capital offenses in such a case, this proposal would require concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present to convict. With respect to a capital offense, concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present would be sufficient for a conviction, but only unanimous concurrence by all members present on findings for a capital offense would authorize the court-martial to consider the death penalty on sentencing.

Recommendation 52.3: Amend Article 52(c) to eliminate the language concerning "tie vote[s]" on challenges, motions, and other questions, which is applicable only to special courts-martial without a military judge, and which would no longer be necessary given the proposal in Article 16 to eliminate these members-only courts-martial.

This is a conforming change to align Article 52 with the proposed amendments to Article 16.

Recommendation 52.4: Amend Article 52 to conform the statute to the proposal in Article 53 for judicial sentencing in all non-capital cases, and member sentencing in capital cases with respect to sentences of death and life without parole.

This proposal would conform Article 52 to the proposal in Article 53 for judge-sentencing in all non-capital cases and members-sentencing in capital cases with respect to the sentences of death and life without parole.

With respect to sentences of death and life without parole, the proposed amendments retain the current requirement for unanimity as to the death sentence, and reflect the current three-fourths floor for life without parole by requiring a three-fourths vote for other sentences.

This proposal conforms to federal civilian law, in which the judge determines the sentence in capital cases where the jury does not vote for death or life without parole.[7]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

These proposed changes would align the court-martial voting process with the standardized panel size and judicial sentencing provisions in the proposed amendments to Article 16 (setting a fixed number of members on a courts-martial panel and requiring a military judge at all general and special courts-martial), Article 25a (fixing the number of members in a capital case at twelve), and Article 53 (adding a requirement that all sentences except for death will be determined by the military judge).

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating, insofar as practicable, voting requirements applicable in U.S. district court.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 715. VOTES REQUIRED FOR CONVICTION, SENTENCING, AND OTHER MATTERS.

Section 852 of title 10, United States Code (article 52 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§852. Art. 52. Votes required for conviction, sentencing, and other matters

"(a) IN GENERAL.—No person may be convicted of an offense in a general or special court-martial, other than—

"(1) after a plea of guilty under section 845(b) of this title (article 45(b));

"(2) by a military judge in a court-martial with a military judge alone, under section 816 of this title (article 16); or

[7] 18 U.S.C. § 3594.

"(3) in a court-martial with members under section 816 of this title (article 16), by the concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present when the vote is taken.

"(b) LEVEL OF CONCURRENCE REQUIRED.—

"(1) IN GENERAL—Except as provided in subsection (a) and in paragraph (2), all matters to be decided by members of a general or special court-martial shall be determined by a majority vote, but a reconsideration of a finding of guilty or reconsideration of a sentence, with a view toward decreasing the sentence, may be made by any lesser vote which indicates that the reconsideration is not opposed by the number of votes required for that finding or sentence.

"(2) SENTENCING.—A sentence of death requires (A) a unanimous finding of guilty of an offense in this chapter expressly made punishable by death and (B) a unanimous determination by the members that the sentence for that offense shall include death. All other sentences imposed by members shall be determined by the concurrence of at least three-fourths of the members present when the vote is taken.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 715 would amend Article 52 concerning the number of votes required for the findings in members cases, and for the findings and sentence in capital cases. Under current law, because the requirement for a two-thirds vote on the findings (and on most sentences) in Article 52 establishes a floor, not a fixed requirement, none of the parties or the public knows at the outset of a court-martial how many votes will be required for a conviction. The percentage required for a conviction and for a specific sentence can be affected significantly by the number of members detailed to a court-martial and the number of members removed through excusal, challenges for cause, and peremptory challenges. As a result, it is not unusual to see variations in voting requirements ranging from 67 percent to 80 percent of the members of the court-martial panel. The proposed amendments, in conjunction with the proposal for standard panel sizes under Article 16, would standardize the voting requirement in each type of court-martial at three-fourths (75 percent) in non-capital members cases, and unanimous on the findings and the sentence in capital cases. The proposal also would make conforming changes to align Article 52 with the proposed changes in Articles 16, 25a, and 53 with respect to capital cases and judge-alone sentencing. Implementing rules would address the procedures concerning voting on sentences of death, life without the possibility of parole, and other lawful sentences.

Article 53 – Court to Announce Action
10 U.S.C. § 853

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 53 to provide for judicial sentencing for all non-capital offenses. For capital offenses, the panel members would decide whether the accused should be sentenced to death, life without eligibility for parole, or to a lesser sentence adjudicated by the military judge. This proposal has been developed in conjunction with this Report's recommendations to: establish "segmented sentencing"—a sentence adjudged for each offense for which an accused is convicted; develop sentencing parameters and criteria to guide judicial discretion in sentencing while fashioning an individualized sentence for each offender; modernize military appellate practice; enhance the selection criteria for military judges; and establish minimum tour lengths for military judges. Taken together, these proposals present a significant opportunity to enhance transparency in military sentencing. The proposals are designed to facilitate sentencing consistency in a manner that permits each sentence to be tailored to address the specific offense and the specific offender.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 53 requires a court-martial to announce its findings and sentence to the parties as soon as they are determined. The sentence is determined by either a panel or a military judge, depending on the accused's forum selection. Article 16 provides that a general or special court-martial may be composed of a military judge with no members, but only if the accused formally requests such composition before the court is assembled and the military judge approves.

3. Historical Background

Under the Articles of War, courts-martial were composed solely of members, there were no judges, often no counsel, and there was no separate sentencing proceeding following the announcement of findings.[1] Instead, the court deliberated on the findings and sentence at the end of the trial and announced them at the same time.[2] To determine an appropriate sentence, the members were instructed (by guidance contained in the MCM) to consider the accused's background and the goals of general deterrence, discipline, and uniformity in sentencing, as well as the nature and circumstances of the offense.[3] If the court's judgment was for acquittal on all charges and specifications, it announced its findings immediately; in all other cases, the announcement of findings and sentence was left to regulations.[4] In Navy practice, the court's findings and sentence were not announced until after the first reviewing authority had completed its action.[5] The drafters of the UCMJ felt it appropriate that the accused be informed of the outcome of the trial as soon as possible, regardless of the specific findings and sentence, so they made this practice a uniform requirement in Article 53.[6] The change was adopted without objection, and Article 53 has not been significantly amended since its enactment.[7]

The rules providing for a separate sentencing proceeding directly following trial on the merits were first established in the 1951 MCM, and have evolved since then.[8] At first, these rules generally allowed the parties to present "appropriate matter to aid the court in determining the kind and amount of punishment to be imposed."[9] However, the government's ability to offer evidence in aggravation was limited: it could present aggravating circumstances of the offense that were not introduced on the merits, but only in guilty plea cases.[10] Evidence of the accused's prior court-martial convictions was limited to the previous three years or the current service enlistment, and evidence of uncharged misconduct, prior arrests, civil convictions, and other criminal history information was strictly prohibited, even when the accused was responsible for introducing it.[11] Although the relevance of such information to the goals of sentencing was generally acknowledged, the use of such information was deemed inappropriate in the military setting where court-martial members—not a judge, as in most civilian systems—determined the accused's sentence, and where the risk of confusing the members and prejudicing the accused was acute.[12] Under the new rules, the accused could make an unsworn statement, and the law officer could relax the rules of evidence for the accused's presentation of extenuation and mitigation evidence.[13] The government's sentencing case, however, was strictly limited by the rules of evidence, even in rebuttal.[14]

In 1968, Congress created the position of military judge and amended Article 16 to provide for general and special courts-martial composed of a military judge and panel members. As amended, the accused could elect to be tried and sentenced by a military judge alone, subject to the military judge's approval.[15] Subsequently, the President modified presentencing procedures in the MCM to allow for argument by counsel as to the appropriate sentence;[16] and the next year, a rule was added to allow the trial counsel to present "any personnel records" of the accused when sentencing was before a military judge without members.[17] The Court of Military Appeals later restricted the practice of providing complete personnel records to the military judge, noting that "sentencing in the federal civilian courts is based on statutes not yet found applicable to courts-martial," and the decisions reflected ongoing concerns about the inherent risks of allowing this type of information into a sentencing system that generally, if not always, relied on members to determine the accused's sentence.[18]

The rules concerning sentencing evidence began to expand in the 1980s. Beginning in 1981, the military judge was allowed to keep the rules of evidence relaxed for the government in rebuttal, and evidence of civil convictions could be offered.[19] In 1982, the Court of Military Appeals overruled prior case law that limited the government's ability to introduce aggravation evidence to guilty plea cases.[20] Three years later it allowed for the government to introduce uncharged misconduct directly related to the offense in all cases.[21] Beginning in 1984, the government was allowed to introduce evidence concerning the accused's rehabilitative potential in the form of opinion testimony.[22] Subsequent rule changes have clarified the definition of "conviction" and the aggravating nature of hate crimes, and permit the introduction of victim impact evidence.[23] Otherwise, the rules for presentencing procedures today are similar to when R.C.M. 1001 was first adopted in 1984.

As the rules for the presentencing proceeding evolved, so did the rules for determining an appropriate sentence. In 1957, the Court of Military Appeals prohibited the use of the MCM by the members during their deliberations on findings and sentence.[24] In 1959, the Court of Military Appeals held that the standard instruction to members that "sentences should . . . be relatively uniform throughout the armed forces," was "impractical, confusing, and of such doubtful validity [it] should not be given to the court-martial members."[25] Noting that the law prohibited providing the members other cases for comparative purposes, the court stated the "principle is founded on the hypothesis that accused persons are not robots to be sentenced by fixed formulae but rather, they are offenders who should be given individualized consideration on punishment."[26] This focus on individualized sentencing became the bedrock of military sentencing philosophy, and, in 1969, the President removed "sentence uniformity" from the list of sentencing goals in the Manual.[27]

Subsequent editions of the MCM have not included guidance to members on how to arrive at an appropriate sentence. This reflects two factors. First, as rehabilitation replaced retribution as the primary sentencing theory during the first three quarters of the twentieth century, individualized sentencing was prioritized over uniformity as a

The consequences that flow from such a situation are manifold. . . . It is fundamental that the only appropriate source of the law applicable to any case should come from the law officer. . . . sentencing goal.[28] Second, there was increasing concern that influencing, or attempting to influence, the discretion of the sentencing authority in adjudging a sentence was per se improper.[29] To some extent, this lack of sentencing guidance has been assuaged through model instructions suggested in the Military Judges' Benchbook and supplemental member instructions under R.C.M. 1005.

In 1983, a year before the enactment of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines, Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to establish a commission to study and make recommendations to Congress regarding a number of military justice issues. One of the issues assigned to this Advisory Commission was whether the sentencing authority in court-martial cases should be exercised by the military judge in all non-capital cases to which a military judge has been detailed.[30] The Commission ultimately recommended no change to the existing system, noting, among other reasons, that "participation of military members in court-martial punishment decisions . . . fosters understanding of military justice by all servicemembers and belief in the fairness of the system."[31]

In the three decades since the Advisory Commission issued its report, practitioners and scholars have continued to recommend revisiting the issue of judge-alone sentencing.[32] As noted in 1998 by Brigadier General John S. Cooke, the Chief Judge of the Army Court of Criminal Appeals:

> Since [the Advisory Commission's Report], we have seen the movement in civilian courts toward greater uniformity in sentencing, and the nature of our caseload has continued to swing toward crimes against society, not just against the military. . . . [J]udge alone sentencing would bring, I am confident, greater uniformity and consistency. It also would make it easier to present more information at the sentencing phase, without fear that it would be used improperly. Certainly, it would be more efficient, both in terms of the court-martial itself, and by freeing the members for other duties.[33]

In 2014, the Comparative Systems Subcommittee of the Congressionally mandated Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel) recommended that military judges should be the sole sentencing authority in sexual assault and other non-capital cases:

> Forty-four states and the federal criminal justice system all require judges, not juries, to impose sentences for convicted offenders in noncapital cases, including adult sexual assault cases. This change has the potential to improve sentencing consistency and fairness without the imposition of sentencing guidelines because of the advantage in experience and expertise that military judges have over panel members. It will also reduce the administrative burden of panel member sentencing and help to minimize the perception of command influence.[34]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 53 through R.C.M. 922 and 1007, and has provided the rules for sentencing in Chapter X of the Rules for Courts-Martial. Currently, the rules do not include separate procedures for sentencing by members and sentencing by the military judge. R.C.M. 1001 and 1002 provide presentencing procedures and the rules for sentence determination applicable in all cases, and R.C.M. 1004 provides additional rules and procedures applicable only in capital cases.

Under current law, the sentencing authority—either members or, in most guilty plea cases, a military judge—exercises broad discretion to determine an appropriate sentence, constrained by the maximum punishments for offenses prescribed by the President, and any statutory provisions concerning mandatory minimum sentences.[35] Guidance on how to exercise discretion is very limited.[36] In members cases, R.C.M. 1005 requires the military judge to give the members "appropriate instructions on sentence," and required instructions include: guidance on the maximum punishment; guidance on the effect of any sentence on the accused's entitlement to pay and allowances; guidance on the procedures for deliberation and voting; advice that the members are solely responsible for selecting an appropriate sentence and may not rely on the possibility of any mitigating action by the convening or higher authority; and instructions that the members should consider all matters in extenuation, mitigation, and aggravation.[37]

The Military Judges' Benchbook provides judges with additional guidance on how to craft supplemental instructions.[38] The Benchbook recommends a general statement of the purposes of punishment and suggests that military judges complete their sentencing instructions to members with a brief reiteration of the overall purposes of military law: "In arriving at your determination, you should select the sentence which will best serve the ends of good order and discipline, the needs of the accused, and the welfare of society."[39] However, the Benchbook does not instruct members (or provide guidance to a military judge who is adjudging a sentence) how the general purposes of punishment and the overall purposes of military law should inform their consideration of the evidence introduced during the two phases of the trial. Furthermore, the Benchbook does not instruct members how to connect the nature of the particular offense and the background of the particular offender to these purposes in a meaningful way.[40]

The sentencing proceeding prescribed under R.C.M. 1001 is an adversarial proceeding that largely resembles a trial on guilt or innocence. R.C.M. 1001 is divided into seven subparts, covering the sequence of the proceeding, matters to be presented by the prosecution and defense, rebuttal, production of witnesses, and argument. The rule limits the evidence that the government can present in aggravation to "aggravating circumstances directly relating to or resulting from the [adjudged] offenses" including the impact of the offense on any victim and evidence of adverse impact on the mission of the command.[41] The trial counsel may introduce evidence of prior convictions of the accused under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3), but the scope of other evidence of criminal history, such as arrests, is limited.[42] The rule allows the military judge to relax the rules of evidence, upon defense request, during the defense presentation of evidence and the government has a similar allowance in its rebuttal case if the rules were relaxed for the defense.[43] During the defense case, the accused may make a sworn statement, an unsworn statement, or both.[44] The defense may also choose to offer no evidence in sentencing. During argument, the trial counsel may relate the specific sentence argued for to the generally accepted sentencing goals of rehabilitation, specific and general deterrence, social retribution.[45] Both trial and defense counsel may recommend a particular sentence to the members or the judge in their arguments on sentence.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although there is no specific rule concerning the announcement of findings and sentence in U.S. district courts, federal civilian practice and military practice in this area are generally consistent.[46] The overall goals of sentencing in the federal civilian system and the military justice system are nearly identical. The goals of sentencing in the federal civilian system include just punishment (retribution), general and specific deterrence, incapacitation, and (albeit it to a lesser degree than in the past) rehabilitation.[47] The military justice system recognizes these four sentencing goals plus "preservation of good order and discipline."[48] Despite this basic similarity between the two systems in terms of their overall objectives,[49]

Those are all essential matters to be considered by a convening authority but, in addition, he must consider the accused's value to the service if he is retained and the impact on discipline if he permits an incorrigible to remain in close association with other members of the armed services.").

[49] Although both systems continue to embrace all four of sentencing goals (plus good order and discipline in the military), the goal of rehabilitation was de-emphasized, though not rejected, by the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984. The Act retained rehabilitation as a sentencing purpose, but reduced its importance by barring sentencing courts from seeking to achieve that purpose through the sanction of imprisonment. Compare In re Sealed Case, 573 F.3d 844, 850-51 (D.C. As rehabilitation fell somewhat out of favor in the federal system in the 1970's and 80's, deterrence and incapacitation gained favor as alternative sentencing theories, including within the military. See, e.g., Pell v. That place is both proper and necessary; proper because it does not offend against the maxim that a sentence ought to fit the individual military sentencing procedures and rules for sentence determination differ from those applicable in federal district court. This difference may be attributed to the lack of jury participation in sentencing in the federal civilian system in all non-capital cases.[50] (In capital cases, absent an agreement by the parties to sentencing by the trial judge, the jury determines aggravating and mitigating factors and makes a sentencing recommendation to the trial judge.[51])

Before the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, federal judges exercised virtually unfettered sentencing discretion, similar to the discretion exercised by both military judges and members in current military practice. As in the military system, the only limitations on federal judges' sentencing discretion were statutory maximum sentences.[52] Judges were free to sentence based on the sentencing goals (retribution, deterrence, incapacitation, rehabilitation) and sentencing objectives (uniformity, proportionality, individualization) of their choosing.[53] This discretionary system was criticized for resulting in unwarranted sentencing disparity.[54] Federal judges operating within this discretionary system were well-trained concerning the general theories of sentencing, the rules of evidence, data concerning which sentences are commonly imposed for certain crimes, and other information relevant to determining appropriate sentences in individual cases.[55]

With the enactment of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 and the implementation of Sentencing Guidelines three years later,[56] the wide discretion exercised by federal judges during sentencing became more constrained, as their sentence determinations were tethered to statutory sentencing factors, sentencing ranges, and clearly defined sentencing goals.[57] The purpose of this shift toward less discretion was to:

> [P]rovide certainty and fairness in meeting the purposes of sentencing, avoiding unwarranted sentencing disparities among defendants with similar records who have been found guilty of similar criminal conduct while maintaining sufficient flexibility to permit individualized sentences when warranted by mitigating or aggravating factors not taken into account in the establishment of general sentencing practices; and [to] reflect, to the extent practicable, advancement in knowledge of human behavior as it relates to the criminal justice process . . . .[58]

Today, the sentencing ranges established by the federal sentencing guidelines are just one of eight factors the judge is required to consider at sentencing, but they are not mandatory and do not bind the judge in his sentencing determination, and federal sentencing under discretionary guidelines is less uniform than under mandatory guidelines. The other factors include: (1) the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the defendant; (2) the general goals of sentencing; (3) the kinds of sentence available; (4) the sentences and sentencing ranges established by the Sentencing Guidelines; (5) any policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission; (6) the need to avoid unwarranted sentence disparities among defendants with similar records who have been found guilty of similar conduct; and (7) the need to provide restitution to any victims of the offense.[59] In contrast, the military justice system does not currently have statutory sentencing factors, and R.C.M. 1002 provides little guidance regarding determining an appropriate sentence.

A second area of difference between military sentencing practice and federal civilian sentencing practice concerns the sentencing proceeding itself. In the federal civilian system, the merits and sentencing phases of the trial are bifurcated. Following a guilty verdict, probation officers conduct a presentence investigation and prepare an extensive presentence report to inform the discretion of the sentencing judge.[60] The sentencing proceeding takes place no sooner than 35 days following the issuance of the pre-sentencing report to the defendant.[61] In addition, in the federal civilian system, the rules of evidence are not applied during sentencing, and judges exercise wide discretion in the sources and types of evidence they may use to adjudge an appropriate sentence.[62]

[61] FED. R. CRIM. P. 32(e)(2). The presentence report contains a wide variety of information about the offense and the offender relevant to the sentencing factors listed in 18 U.S.C. § 3553, including: identification of applicable sentencing guidelines and policy statements; calculation of the defendant's offense level, criminal history category, and the sentencing range available; identification of factors relevant to the sentences range or departures therefrom; the defendant's history and characteristics, including prior criminal record, financial condition, and unique behavioral circumstances; information concerning the financial, social, psychological, and medical impact on any victim; a description of any non-prison programs or resources available; information on restitution and forfeiture; and any specific information that the court requests. The probation officer tasked with producing the presentence report is given wide investigative authority, including the authority to interview the defendant and incorporate any findings into the report. These presentence reports contribute to the federal sentencing goals by giving the sentencing judge a more thorough basis of information upon which to base his determinations, and by ensuring that the information before the court is reliable, material, and relevant to the sentencing factors listed in 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a). See Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 249 (1949) ("[A] strong motivating force for the changes [in sentencing philosophy and treatment of offenders] has been the belief that by careful study of the lives and personalities of convicted offenders many could be less severely punished and restored sooner to complete freedom and useful citizenship. Pratt, 553 F.3d 1165, 1170 (8th Cir. 2009) (sentencing judges have "wide discretion at sentencing as to the kind of information considered or its

Federal courts have held that consideration of certain factors is never permissible, including the race or gender of the defendant or the victim, the defendant's exercise of fundamental rights, or the defendant's exercise of certain procedural rights.[63] Second, the courts have fashioned a due process test for determining the admissibility of sentencing evidence objected to by either party:

> In resolving any reasonable dispute concerning a factor important to the sentencing determination, the court may consider relevant information without regard to its admissibility under the rules of evidence applicable at trial, provided that the information has sufficient indicia of reliability to support its probable accuracy.[64]

Under federal law, the court's determination of whether "sufficient indicia of reliability" exist in a given instance is a factual determination within the discretion of the sentencing judge—although there is some variance among the Circuits on the amount or quality of corroborating information needed to establish "sufficient indicia of reliability,"[65] and on the standard of review applicable when reviewing a sentencing judge's findings in this area.[66]

Military sentencing procedures vary from these aspects of federal civilian practice. First, there currently are no probation officers or presentence reports in military practice.[67] The Analysis to R.C.M. 1001(b) notes that the intent of the rule is to "allow the presentation of much of the same information to the court-martial as would be contained in a [federal] presentence report, but . . . within the protections of an adversarial proceeding, to which rules of evidence apply."[68] However, the only mandatory information that the Rule requires to be introduced in sentencing is the accused's service data from the charge sheet.[69] Also, in military practice, the sentencing proceeding itself generally is held immediately after the announcement of findings, which promotes efficiency and finality. Finally, despite Williams, military practice applies the rules of evidence at the sentencing hearing (subject to the military judge's ability to relax the rules for the defense). Whether or not required due to members sentencing, the application of the full rules of evidence to the sentencing proceeding has been cited as both unnecessary and contrary to the ultimate ends of military justice.[70]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 53.1: Amend Article 53 to require sentencing by a military judge in all non-capital general and special courts-martial.

This proposal would present an opportunity for military judges to fashion appropriate sentences based on all relevant information available about the accused and the circumstances surrounding the offenses of which he is convicted, which would align military practice more closely to federal civilian practice.

In addition, the proposed changes would conform military sentencing standards to the practice in the vast majority of state courts, as reflected in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice in Sentencing, which state: "Imposition of sentences is a judicial function to be performed by sentencing courts. The function of sentencing courts is to impose a sentence upon each offender that is appropriate to the offense and the offender. The jury's role in a criminal trial should not extend to determination of the appropriate sentence."[71]

Consequently, the government's ability to offer substantial evidence about the accused or the offense often is frustrated and the resultant sentence is based on little or no information about the accused or the offense. Moreover, it is the accused and not the government who controls the amount and type of evidence that the government may introduce regarding the accused's background and character. If the accused has a bad record, he or she can keep this from the members by not 'opening the door' for the government by introducing any good character evidence. Conversely, if he or she has a good background, the defense can present a great variety of evidence in extenuation and mitigation.").

This proposal would allow reforms in the sentencing process in general and special courts-martial that are impractical absent judge-alone sentencing. Specifically:

Judge-alone sentencing would allow for changes in the rules and procedures pertaining to sentencing that would expand the range of evidence and information provided to the sentencing authority to adjudge an appropriate sentence and increase the transparency of the sentencing process.

Judge-alone sentencing would allow for victim-impact statements to be introduced and used in the sentencing proceeding in the same manner as in civilian courts, and would allow for incorporation of victim impact statement procedures directly into R.C.M. 1001, the rule governing sentencing proceedings.

Judge-alone sentencing would allow for expansion of R.C.M. 1002 and the implementation of sentencing guidance similar to the "sentencing factors" used to guide the sentencing discretion of federal judges under 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a). Such a rule would promote greater consistency and uniformity among sentencing authorities with respect to the goals of military sentencing and the factors that must be considered and balanced in each individual case.

Judge-alone sentencing would eliminate the need for member instructions before sentencing. These instructions, which are imperative in a members sentencing system, often give rise to objections and can sometimes result in sentences being vacated on appeal.

Judge-alone sentencing would allow for a shift to segmented sentencing, where the military judge would consider an appropriate sentence for each offense rather than an overall sentence based on the combined offenses. (This proposal is discussed in detail in the section of this Report concerning Article 56.) In a members' sentencing system, panel voting requirements and the need to determine whether periods of confinement run consecutively or concurrently make segmented sentencing impractical.

Judge-alone sentencing would enhance review of sentence determinations by appellate courts. In a members sentencing system, appellate review of such determinations is not possible, as a panel cannot be called upon to explain how it arrived at a particular sentence. This would intrude upon the members' sentencing deliberations, and potentially subject the members to allegations of improper influence. More problematically, each member of a panel may vote for a particular sentence for different reasons.

Recommendation 53.2: Amend Article 53 to provide that, in cases where the accused may be sentenced to death, the members shall participate in the sentence determination consistent with federal civilian practice.

This proposal would better align military sentencing practice in capital cases with the practice in federal district courts under 18 U.S.C. §§ 3593-94. Under the proposal, a panel would determine whether the accused should be sentenced to death, to life without eligibility for parole, or to some lesser sentence for capital offenses. The panel's sentence determination with respect to death or life without eligibility of parole would be binding on the military judge. The military judge would determine all other punishments (e.g. reduction, forfeitures, discharge), and in cases where the panel voted for a sentence less than life without parole, the judge would determine the entire sentence.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating sentencing practices used in U.S. district courts, and almost all state jurisdictions. The proposal draws upon the experience of members and considers a broad range of information to arrive at its final recommendation. This proposal also considers the recommendations of the Response Systems Panel to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures of the civilian sector insofar as practicable, by promoting justice and enhanced efficiency during the sentencing phase of the court-martial. With respect to sentencing in capital cases, this proposal relates to other proposals in this Report that also address capital cases, including the proposals relating to Article 52 (requiring a unanimous finding of guilt); Article 56 (exempting capital cases from sentencing parameters and criteria), and Article 27 (requiring learned counsel, to the greatest extent practicable, for death penalty cases, including during the sentencing phase).

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 716. FINDINGS AND SENTENCING.

Section 853 of title 10, United States Code (article 53 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§853. Art. 53. Findings and sentencing

"(a) ANNOUNCEMENT.—A court-martial shall announce its findings and sentence to the parties as soon as determined.

"(b) SENTENCING GENERALLY.—(1) Except as provided in subsection (c) for capital offenses, if the accused is convicted of an offense in a trial by general or special court-martial, the military judge shall sentence the accused. The sentence determined by the military judge constitutes the sentence of the court-martial.

"(2) If the accused is convicted of an offense in a trial by summary court-martial, the court-martial shall sentence the accused.

"(c) SENTENCING FOR CAPITAL OFFENSES.—(1) In a capital case, if the accused is convicted of an offense for which the court-martial may sentence the accused to death—

"(A) the members shall determine whether the sentence for that offense shall be death, life in prison without eligibility for parole, or a lesser punishment determined by the military judge; and

"(B) the military judge shall sentence the accused for that offense in accordance with the determination of the members under subparagraph (A).

"(2) In accordance with regulations prescribed by the President, the military judge may include in any sentence to death or life in prison without eligibility for parole other lesser punishments authorized under this chapter.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 716 would amend Article 53 to provide for judicial sentencing in all general and special courts-martial. This change would better align military sentencing practice with federal civilian sentencing practice, as well as the practice in the majority of state jurisdictions. Judicial sentencing would create the opportunity for greater uniformity and consistency in court-martial sentences, enhanced efficiency and cost-savings, and would facilitate further reforms in military sentencing practices and procedures.

Article 53(c), as amended, would provide that, for capital offenses, members will determine whether the sentence shall include death, life without eligibility for parole, or such other lesser punishments as may be determined by the military judge. The military judge would sentence the accused in accordance with the determination of the members, including to other lesser punishments in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President.

Implementing rules would address procedures for sentencing proceedings and sentence determination in the context of judge-alone sentencing, including with respect to: releasing the members, subject to recall, after the findings are announced in a non-capital case; the admissibility of sentencing information offered by the parties and the grounds for objection to such information; the rights of victims to participate in sentencing proceedings; the use of victim impact statements during sentencing; the duties of trial and defense counsel before and during the proceeding; the rules and factors to guide military judges in their sentence determinations (similar to 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)); and rules pertaining to appellate review of military judge sentence determinations and findings.

Article 53a (New Provision) – Plea Agreements
10 U.S.C. § 853a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create a new statute, transferring the authority for plea agreements—currently referred to as "pretrial agreements"—from Article 60 (Action of Convening Authority) to a new Article 53a (Plea Agreements). The proposed statute would provide basic rules concerning: (1) the construction and negotiation of plea agreements concerning the charges, the sentence, or both; (2) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement; and (3) the operation of plea agreements containing sentence limitations with respect to the military judge's sentencing authority. This proposal is related to the proposals in this Report to amend Articles 16, 53, 56, and 60 to allow for judge-alone sentencing in all non-capital cases, to establish sentencing parameters and criteria, and to move to an "entry of judgment" post-trial procedure model. Part II of the Report will provide more detailed implementing rules and procedures for the new statute.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Currently, three articles in the UCMJ provide statutory authority for the government to negotiate binding agreements with a military accused concerning the charges to be referred to court-martial, the level of court-martial or other disciplinary proceeding to be convened, and the sentence that may be approved on the charges. Article 60 provides convening authorities with "the authority to approve, disapprove, commute, or suspend the sentence adjudged by the court-martial in whole or in part pursuant to the terms of [a] pre-trial agreement." Because courts-martial are transitory in nature, all plea agreements that contain binding sentence limitations derive their authority from this statute. In addition, Articles 30 and 34 vest discretion in convening authorities to dispose of charges and specifications against an accused "in the interest of justice and discipline," including by referring (or not referring) the charges to court-martial for trial. These articles are the basis of all agreements concerning disposition of the charges and specifications in a particular manner or to a particular forum in exchange for the accused's plea and other concessions.

3. Historical Background

Although there were no specific statutory or regulatory provisions governing the use of plea agreements in courts-martial until 1984, these agreements have been a part of military practice at least as far back as 1953. At that time, the Assistant Judge Advocate General of the Army, Major General Franklin P. Shaw, successfully proposed the use of plea agreements to help relieve a military justice system that was over-worked and over-clogged as the result of two major wars.[1] That year, the Court of Military Appeals gave an initial non-committal acknowledgement of the use of plea agreements,[2] and it began to issue decisions that shaped plea-bargaining practice shortly thereafter.[3] By the end of the decade, a reference to plea-bargaining had been inserted into the MCM,[4] and the practice of using plea agreements to secure convictions—the "adoption of [which] was not an altruistic act, but a pragmatic decision to avoid drowning in a sea of litigation"[5]—had achieved widespread acceptance within the Army, Navy, and Coast Guard. The Air Force, however, continued to prohibit their use until 1975.[6]

In the absence of statutory and regulatory guidance on plea agreements during most of the formative years under the UCMJ, the rules for their use in courts-martial developed primarily through case law. In the mid-1950s, and from the late 1960s through the 1970s, plea agreements were looked upon with substantial skepticism, and terms that are now commonplace were subjected to severe appellate scrutiny.[7] Even terms that were found permissible were accepted with some degree of derision. For example, an agreement calling for trial by military judge alone was allowed but had "the appearance of evil,"[8] and a term prohibiting the accused from engaging in future misconduct was allowable but not "proper."[9] When the Rules for Courts-Martial were adopted in 1984, the rules concerning permissible and prohibited pretrial agreement terms and conditions reflected the prevailing case law at the time.[10]

Because of the unique role of the convening authority in military justice practice, the rules and procedures applicable to plea agreements concerning the sentence to be adjudged and approved developed much differently than in the federal civilian system. Under applicable case law and rules, the military judge's determination of an appropriate sentence must be independent, without prior reference to any sentence agreement between the convening authority and the accused.[11] To accommodate this, plea agreements are divided into two parts: the first part of the agreement contains the agreement's terms and conditions; the second part contains the sentence limitations (the "cap" or "quantum"). The military judge is prohibited from examining Part 2 of the agreement until after announcing the adjudged sentence.[12]

This practice results from a confluence of two UCMJ Articles. First, Article 60 gives convening authorities discretion to decrease adjudged sentences, but it prohibits them from increasing sentences. Thus, even if the parties were to agree in advance to a specific sentence or sentence range, the convening authority would be powerless to increase any adjudged sentence to conform to the agreement. Second, under a practice that was developed before the establishment of military judges in 1968, the sentencing authority cannot be informed in advance of a sentence limitation because that would be tantamount to allowing the court to be influenced by the convening authority's view on an appropriate sentence, in violation of Article 37's prohibition on unlawful command influence.

In short, in military plea-bargaining practice, if the sentence adjudged at trial is below the sentence "cap" agreed to by the parties—a cap that is not disclosed to the sentencing authority at trial—the accused receives the lower sentence, the sentence adjudged at trial.

Thomas, 6 M.J. 573 (A.C.M.R. 1978) (finding term in pretrial agreement requiring the accused to enter into a stipulation of fact was not an illegal collateral condition); United States v. Callahan, 8 M.J. 804, 806 (N.M.C.M.R. 1980) (allowing a term requiring that the accused pay cash restitution to victims acceptable and cautioning against restitution "in-kind," such as labor); United States v. Dawson, 10 M.J. 142, 150 (C.M.A. 1982) (approving 'no misconduct' provision in plea deal, but holding that the CA must give accused due process before setting aside sentence limitation); United States v. Schaffer, 12 M.J. 425 (C.M.A. 1982) (finding that it is permissible to waive the Article 32 Investigation as part of a pretrial agreement); United States v. Schmeltz, 1 M.J. 8 (C.M.A. 1975) (approving a plea deal in which the accused was required to request trial by judge alone); United States v. Mills, 12 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1981) (allowing the accused to waive Government production of sentencing witnesses as part of pretrial agreement).

[11] United States v. Green, 1 M.J. 453, 456 (C.M.A. 1976) ("Inquiry into the actual sentence limitations specified in the plea bargain should be delayed until after announcing sentence where the accused elects to be sentenced by the military judge rather than a court with members"); see R.C.M. 910(f)(3) ("If a plea agreement exists, the military judge shall require disclosure of the entire agreement before the plea is accepted, provided that in trial before military judge-alone the military judge ordinarily shall not examine any sentence limitation contained in the agreement until after the sentence of the court-martial has been announced.").

[12] See R.C.M. 910(f)(3).

But if the sentence adjudged at trial is above the sentence cap agreed to by the parties, the accused gets the benefit of the sentence cap, because the convening authority is prohibited from approving any sentence above the agreed upon cap. This system—which was not planned by the drafters of the UCMJ, but which rather evolved from a confluence of statutory structure, case law, and procedural rules over the course of several decades—has come to be known, and criticized, as "beat the deal" plea-bargaining.[13]

4. Contemporary Practice

Today, the use of plea agreements to secure convictions in exchange for sentence caps and other concessions is standard practice throughout the services—though service practices with respect to standard terms, conditions, and restrictions in agreements vary.[14] In addition to the statutory provisions concerning plea agreements in Article 60, the President has prescribed two rules controlling their use, acceptance, and effect in court-martial cases. R.C.M. 705 (Pretrial agreements) provides specific guidance on the use, structure, and effect of pretrial agreements, including permissible and prohibited terms and conditions and the prohibition on disclosing the existence of a pretrial agreement to the panel.[15] Under the rule, "The decision whether to accept or reject an offer [of the accused to enter into a pretrial agreement] is within the sole discretion of the convening authority."[16] R.C.M. 910 (Pleas) implements Article 45, and governs the plea process itself, including the duties of the military judge to advise the accused properly, to ensure the plea is voluntary and accurate, to ensure the accused understands the terms and effect of any pretrial agreement, and to issue findings appropriately upon acceptance of the plea.[17] Under the rule, the military judge may strike any provisions in a pretrial agreement that are prohibited by R.C.M. 705(c)(1) or that "violate appellate case law, public policy, or notions of fundamental fairness."[18]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In both military practice and federal civilian practice, the parties are allowed to plea-bargain on the charges, the sentence, or both. Both systems rely on plea-bargaining to efficiently administer justice, and both systems provide safeguards to ensure the accused is not coerced by the government into signing a plea agreement that does not represent the accused's actual guilt, or that exaggerates his or her wrongdoing. The Supreme Court recognizes the federal plea-bargaining process provides systemic benefits, including facilitating pleas and speeding the process of rehabilitation; increasing the certainty of both parties in the results; protecting society from individuals who otherwise might be out on bail pending completion of their trials; and helping to conserve limited judicial and prosecutorial resources.[19] These benefits are applicable to plea-bargaining in the military justice system, as well. The two systems differ in the area of sentence agreements.

In federal civilian practice, the parties can bargain on sentence by agreeing that a specific sentence or sentencing range is appropriate for the offense, which may or may not be binding on the judge's sentencing discretion.[20] If the agreement is one that binds the sentencing discretion of the sentencing judge, after reviewing the agreement, the judge has three options: (1) accept the agreement and adjudge the sentence (or within the limits of the sentence range) agreed to by the parties; (2) reject the agreement entirely; or (3) defer the decision until after review of the presentence report.[21] Because the sentence agreement is binding, the parties—and any victim of the offense—are able to know in advance the upper and lower bounds of the sentence that is likely to be adjudged. If the judge rejects an agreement, that rejection is reviewable (at the request of the defendant) for abuse of discretion.[22] The federal rule states that "[t]he court must not participate in these [plea agreement] discussions."[23]

however, an impermissible term may be stricken without impairing the remainder of the agreement. See, e.g., United States v. McLaughlin, 50 M.J. 217, 218-19 (C.A.A.F. 1999).

[20] See FED. R. CRIM. P. 11(c)(1)(C). The Rule 11(c)(1)(C) agreement is one of two types of sentence agreements in federal practice. Under Rule 11(c)(1)(B), the prosecutor makes a recommendation to the judge that a particular sentence or sentencing range is appropriate. The recommendation is not binding on the judge's sentencing discretion. Whether prosecutors use the recommendation-type sentence agreement under Rule 11(c)(1)(B) or the binding "C" sentence agreement is largely a function of local practice, as usage varies by district. In recent years, type "C" agreements have become more favored. See generally Wes R. United States District Court, 356 F.3d 1198, 1209 (9th Cir. 2004) (upholding a district court's rejection of a sentence agreement where the court "viewed the sentence resulting from the plea bargain as not in the best interest of society, given [the accused's] criminal history and the circumstances of the offense charged."); State v. In the federal system, use of "specific sentence/sentencing range" plea agreements predates the adoption of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines in 1984. Since their adoption, the Guidelines have provided a framework—in addition to the other sentencing factors under 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)—for analyzing the discretionary acceptance/rejection of sentence agreements by trial judges.[24] Under the Guidelines, a court may impose the agreed-upon sentence only if it is satisfied that the sentence is either "within the applicable guideline range" or "departs from the applicable guidelines range for justifiable reasons."[25]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 53a.1: Enact a new Article 53a to provide statutory authority and basic rules for: (1) the construction and negotiation of charge and sentence agreements; (2) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement; and (3) the operation of sentence agreements with respect to the military judge's sentencing authority.

Under this Report's proposal to amend Article 60 to establish an "entry of judgment" model for the military judge's sentence determinations, a new statutory authority for the convening authority's ability to enter into binding plea agreements with the accused will be necessary. This proposal would create a new statute to transfer the authority currently in Article 60 into a new article, while providing more robust statutory rules concerning the construction and operation of plea agreements in the adjudication process.

Part II of the Report will provide implementing rules for this proposed statute, with particular emphasis on the opportunity for negotiated sentencing ranges. Under this proposal, if the agreement contained a negotiated sentencing range or sentence limitation, the military judge would enter a sentence in accordance with the agreement unless the judge determined the negotiated sentencing range or sentence limination to be plainly unreasonable or otherwise unlawful.

appropriately exercises its discretion, reject any plea agreement that does not, in its view, serve the public interest"). However, the discretion of district judges to reject sentence agreements "is not unbounded," and courts abuse their discretion when they fail to "consider individually every sentence bargain presented to them and . . . set forth, on the record, [their] reasons in light of the specific circumstances of the case for rejecting the bargain." In re Morgan, 506 F.3d at 712; accord United States v. Robertson, 45 F.3d 1423 (10th Cir. 1995) (noting that the requirement for judges to set forth the reasons for their rejection of a plea agreement "helps insure the court is aware of and gives adequate deference to prosecutorial discretion" and "is the surest, indeed the only way to facilitate appellate review of rejected plea bargains.").

Part II of the Report will also address procedures to allow the victim to be heard by the convening authority before a decision on a plea agreement. Plea agreements are one of the primary tools convening authorities utilize to dispose of charges against an accused; however, currently, R.C.M. 705 does not address the role of the victim in this decision. The implementing rules that will be proposed in Part II of the Report will address this gap in the current rules.

Recommendation 53a.2: In the new Article 53a, provide that the military judge shall accept any lawful sentence agreement submitted by the parties, except that: (1) in the case of an offense with a sentencing parameter under Article 56, the military judge may reject the agreement only if it proposes a sentence that is both outside the sentencing parameter and plainly unreasonable; and (2) in the case of an offense without a sentencing parameter, the military judge may reject the agreement only if it proposes a sentence that is plainly unreasonable.

This proposal would better align military plea-bargaining practice with federal civilian plea-bargaining practice, and would result in increased efficiencies and greater bargaining power for both parties.

The proposed "plainly unreasonable" standard would ensure that military judges are appropriately constrained in their ability to reject sentence agreements entered into by the parties, while at the same time providing military judges the authority to reject agreements they determine are unacceptable, consistent with federal civilian practice. The decision of a military judge to reject an agreement would be reviewable for an abuse of discretion.

This proposal takes into account the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel's recommendation to "study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified."[26]

Part II of the Report will address the rules implementing Article 53a, including a requirement that if the military judge holds that a sentence agreement is plainly unreasonable, the judge must set forth on the record the findings of fact and conclusions of law supporting that determination.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal is related to the proposals concerning Articles 16, 53, 56, and 60.

This proposal would support the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating, insofar as practicable, plea-bargaining practices and procedures applicable in federal district court into military justice practice. This proposal also supports the GC terms of Reference by considering the recommendations of the Response Systems Panel.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 717. PLEA AGREEMENTS.

Subchapter VII of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 853 (article 53 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice) the following:

"§853a. Art. 53a. Plea agreements

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) At any time before the announcement of findings under section 853 of this title (article 53), the convening authority and the accused may enter into a plea agreement with respect to such matters as—

"(A) the manner in which the convening authority will dispose of one or more charges and specifications; and

"(B) limitations on the sentence that may be adjudged for one or more charges and specifications.

"(2) The military judge of a general or special court-martial may not participate in discussions between the parties concerning prospective terms and conditions of a plea agreement.

"(b) ACCEPTANCE OF PLEA AGREEMENT.—Subject to subsection (c), the military judge of a general or special court-martial shall accept a plea agreement submitted by the parties, except that—

"(1) in the case of an offense with a sentencing parameter under section 856 of this title (article 56), the military judge may reject a plea agreement that proposes a sentence that is outside the sentencing parameter if the military judge determines that the proposed sentence is plainly unreasonable; and

"(2) in the case of an offense with no sentencing parameter under section 856 of this title (article 56), the military judge may reject a plea agreement that proposes a sentence if the military judge determines that the proposed sentence is plainly unreasonable.

"(c) LIMITATION ON ACCEPTANCE OF PLEA AGREEMENTS.—The military judge of a general or special court-martial shall reject a plea agreement that—

"(1) contains a provision that has not been accepted by both parties;

"(2) contains a provision that is not understood by the accused; or

"(3) except as provided in subsection (d), contains a provision for a sentence that is less than the mandatory minimum sentence applicable to an offense referred to in section 856(b)(2) of this title (article 56(b)(2)).

"(d) LIMITED CONDITIONS FOR ACCEPTANCE OF PLEA AGREEMENT FOR SENTENCE BELOW MANDATORY MINIMUM FOR CERTAIN OFFENSES.—With respect to an offense referred to in section 856(b)(2) of this title (article 56(b)(2))—

"(1) the military judge may accept a plea agreement that provides for a sentence of bad conduct discharge; and

"(2) upon recommendation of the trial counsel, in exchange for substantial assistance by the accused in the investigation or prosecution of another person who has committed an offense, the military judge may accept a plea agreement that provides for a sentence that is less than the mandatory minimum sentence for the offense charged.

"(e) BINDING EFFECT OF PLEA AGREEMENT.—Upon acceptance by the military judge of a general or special court-martial, a plea agreement shall bind the parties and the military judge.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 717 would create a new section, Article 53a, transferring the statutory authority for plea agreements from Article 60 to the new Article 53a. The proposed new article would provide basic rules for: (1) the construction and negotiation of plea agreements concerning the charge and the sentence; (2) allowing the convening authority and the accused to enter into binding agreements regarding the sentence that may be adjudged at a court-martial; and (3) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement in a general or special court-martial. Under the amended statute, the military judge would review the entire agreement, including any negotiated sentence agreement, prior to determining whether to accept the agreement and adjudge the sentence. If the agreement contains a negotiated sentencing range, the military judge would enter a sentence within that range unless the judge determines that the negotiated sentencing range is plainly unreasonable or otherwise unlawful. The new statute would preserve current law pertaining to plea agreements involving offenses with mandatory minimum sentences.

Implementing rules for the new Article 53a would address a number of issues concerning plea agreements, including the structure and procedures for sentence agreements; the opportunity for negotiated sentencing ranges; a requirement that, if the military judge determines that a sentence agreement is plainly unreasonable, the judge must set forth on the record the findings of fact and conclusions of law supporting that determination; plea agreements in summary courts-martial; and the role of the victim in plea agreements, with particular emphasis on the rules structuring the convening authority's decision-making with respect to acceptance of plea agreements proposed by the defense.

Article 54 – Record of Trial
10 U.S.C. § 854

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 54 to facilitate the use of modern court reporting technology in the recording, certification, and distribution of court-martial records and would facilitate the provision of courts-martial records to victims of crime.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 54 requires a complete record of the proceedings and testimony: (1) in each general court-martial in which the sentence includes death, dismissal, a punitive discharge, or a punishment in excess of that which could be adjudged by special court-martial; and (2) when the adjudged sentence includes a punitive discharge, confinement for more than six months, or forfeitures of pay for more than six months. Under the statute, the military judge must authenticate the record of each general court-martial, subject to exceptions when the judge is unable to authenticate the record. The records of special and summary courts-martial are authenticated under rules prescribed by the President. Article 54(d) provides that a copy of the record of each general and special court-martial must be given to the accused as soon as it is authenticated. In a case involving rape, sexual assault, or another offense under Article 120, Article 54(e) provides that the record also must be given to the victim of the offense, without charge, if the victim testified at the proceedings.

Article 54 authorizes the President to prescribe rules and procedures concerning what must be included in courts-martial records of trial, and focuses on the authentication requirements for the record in each court-martial proceeding. The specific requirements for the preparation and content of records of trial are defined in Article 1(14) and the implementing rules. Article 1(14) defines "record" as an official written transcript, written summary, or other writing relating to the proceedings; or an official audiotape, videotape, or similar material from which sound, or sound and visual images depicting the proceedings may be reproduced. R.C.M. 1103 primarily implements Article 54.

3. Historical Background

When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, Article 54 provided that each general court-martial was to keep a separate record of its proceedings, with a requirement that both the president of the court-martial and the law officer authenticate the record.[1] The President implemented this provision in the Manual for Courts-Martial with a requirement for a verbatim record in general courts-martial.[2] In addition, subsection (b) of the original statute authorized the President to prescribe the contents and authentication requirements for special courts-martial. The President implemented this provision by requiring a verbatim transcript in special courts-martial that adjudged a bad-conduct discharge, and a summarized record in all other special courts-martial, along with a requirement for authentication of special courts-martial by the president of the court-martial and the trial counsel.[3] The legislation also directed that a copy of the record of the proceedings should be provided to the accused, with copies of all documentary exhibits.[4] In the Military Justice Act of 1968, Congress codified the records requirement in special courts-martial, and provided for authentication of the record of trial in general courts-martial by the signature of the military judge.[5]

In 1983, Congress amended Article 54 to include a new subsection (c) that required a "complete" record.[6] In the same legislation, Congress included a new definition in Article 1(14) for the term "record."[7] The "record" could include "an official audiotape, videotape, or similar material from which sound or sound and visual images, depicting the proceedings may be reproduced."[8] The purpose of this change was to "reflect modern trends by authorizing use of videotape and audiotape as a means of recording the proceeding in order to take advantage of the developing technology on use of such materials to serve as a record of trial or depositions."[9] Congress was concerned that the limitation on the record of trial to be in writing did not permit the military to "take advantage of the developing technology on use of audiotape, videotape, and similar materials to serve as a record of trial."[10] The Senate Report indicated that the Manual for Courts-Martial should provide procedures enabling trial and defense counsel to obtain transcripts of audio or visual materials where they are entitled to the record in connection with the convening authority's action.[11]

The President implemented the 1983 amendments to Article 54 and Article 1(14) in R.C.M. 1103 of the 1984 MCM. The rule included a provision for recording courts-martial by videotape or audiotape, and also for preparation of a written record, with limited exceptions.[12] This preference for a written record was based on a consideration that written records would be easier to use and easier to produce in multiple copies.[13] In 2008, R.C.M. 1103 was changed to recognize that military exigencies could prevent preparation of a written transcript, in either its verbatim or summary form. In such cases, if an accurate record exists, the rule allows audiotape, videotape, or other material to be authenticated and forwarded in accordance with R.C.M. 1104 (Records of trial: Authentication; service; loss; correction; forwarding).

In NDAA FY 2012, Congress amended Article 54 to include a new subsection (e), similar to subsection (d), requiring that a copy of the record of court-martial proceedings be provided not only to the accused, but also to the victim in any case involving Article 120 offenses where the victim testified during the proceedings.[14] Under the statute, the record of the proceedings must be provided free of charge and as soon as the records are authenticated.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 54 through R.C.M. 1103. Under current law, a "complete record" is required in each general and special court-martial in which the adjudged sentence included a dismissal or a bad-conduct discharge, or confinement or forfeitures greater than six months. R.C.M. 1103 defines a "complete record" as including a "verbatim transcript" of all sessions except sessions closed for deliberations and voting.[15] Summary courts-martial and special courts-martial with an adjudged sentence of less than six months and no bad-conduct discharge do not require a verbatim transcript, but may utilize a summarized report of the proceedings.[16] In addition, R.C.M. 1103 sets forth a list of "other matters" that must be included in the "complete record." The list includes, among other items, exhibits received in evidence, the charge sheet, and a copy of the convening order.[17] Currently, a complete record usually includes a substantially verbatim transcript, authenticated by a military judge.[18]

Generally, the record for a general or special court-martial begins as an audio file that is transcribed by a court reporter or transcription service.[19] The transcript is normally first reviewed and corrected by the trial counsel, followed by the defense counsel, and finally reviewed and authenticated by the military judge.[20] The authenticated record is then copied and forwarded to the accused and to any victim of an offense under Article 120 who testified at the proceedings. Copies are usually standard paper copies, but some jurisdictions provide scanned copies of authenticated records of trial on compact disks instead of, or in addition to, paper copies.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The procedure for creating, maintaining, and distributing records of trial in federal criminal trials differs substantially from military practice. In federal civilian practice, although a verbatim record is kept in most cases, it is not transformed into a written document unless there is a request from a party or an appellate court for a transcript of designated portions of the record or the full record.[21] The record is certified by the reporter, not the trial judge. There is no requirement for either the prosecutor or the trial judge to conduct a line-by-line review or otherwise authenticate the accuracy of the record.[22] To the extent that a question arises about the accuracy of a specific portion of the record, it is addressed through a motion for correction.[23]

6. Recommendations and Justification

Recommendation 54.1: Amend Article 54 to require certification of the record by a court reporter.

This proposal would align military practice with the practice in federal civilian courts by placing the responsibility for certification of the record on the court reporter rather than on the prosecutor or presiding judge.

The federal record on appeal consists of the original papers and exhibits filed in the district court, the transcript of proceedings ordered by the appellant—either the entire transcript or a partial transcript, if any—and a certified copy of the docket entries prepared by the district clerk. It is the appellant's duty to order from the reporter a transcript of any parts of the proceedings not already on file that the appellant considers necessary for the appeal.

[22] See Mayer v. Chicago, 404 U.S. 189, 194 (1971) (holding that the Constitution requires a record of sufficient completeness to allow consideration of what occurred at trial, but not necessarily a verbatim transcript); 28 U.S.C. § 753(b) (requiring that each session of court be recorded verbatim by shorthand, mechanical means, electronic sound recording equipment, or "any other method" subject to regulations and the judge's discretion, the district court judge electing the method of recording).

In Part II of this Report, the proposed amendments to the rules implementing Article 54 will address the opportunity to file a motion to correct the record, utilizing procedures similar to those available in the federal civilian courts.

Recommendation 54.2: Amend Article 54 to require a complete record in any general or special court-martial in which confinement or forfeitures exceed six months.

Article 54, which currently requires a "complete record" in all cases involving death, dismissal, or a discharge, contains an anomaly with respect to cases involving confinement. The current law requires a complete record in all special courts-martial involving confinement or forfeitures in excess of six months irrespective of whether the sentence includes a discharge, but does not require a complete record in similar general courts-martial unless the period of confinement or forfeitures is greater than 12 months.[24] This proposal would require a complete record anytime a sentence includes death, dismissal, discharge, or confinement or forfeitures in excess of six months. Thus, the proposal would eliminate any distinction between the types of court-martial, to include the anomaly where the requirements for a complete record are less stringent at a general court-martial than at a special court-martial. Part II of this Report will address the requirements for the record in other cases that are subject to review in the Court of Criminal Appeals.

As under current law, the requirements for a "complete" record will be set forth by the President in the R.C.M. Part II of the Report will address these rules, including the circumstances under which a written transcript will be prepared and the procedures for preparing a written transcript. In the near term, the rules will provide for the availability of a written transcript during the appellate process in the types of cases in which a written transcript is available under current military practice, subject to rules similar to the federal rule for requesting all or part of a transcript.[25]

Part II of the Report will also address the potential in the future for use in the appellate process of electronic transcriptions to the extent that the development and use of such technology for legal proceedings provides for increasing comfort and familiarity with electronic formats.

Recommendation 54.3: Amend Article 54 to provide all victims who testify at a court-martial with access to records of trial.

This proposal would amend Article 54 to provide that all victims who testify at court-martial would be entitled to access to the record of trial. Currently, only victims of sex-related offenses under Article 120 are entitled to such access.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating the practices used in federal district courts insofar as practicable in military practice. By allowing the services to certify a verbatim recording, whether that means audio, video, or any other method, the proposal will allow the military services to take advantage of developing technology, especially in the area of voice recognition software.

The proposal reflects an opportunity to reduce the need for review of written records, as a result of changes in appellate procedures recommended elsewhere in this Report. To the extent that the services decide to retain procedures not required by statute—especially for purposes of transition—they may choose to do so.

This proposal is related to the proposed changes in Articles 60, 66, and 69. The proposed amendments would streamline the preparation and distribution of the record of trial, in light of the convening authority's reduced scope of post-trial review. The proposals for Articles 66 and 69 recommend revising the current appellate system into an appeal of right model. A written transcript would be needed only to the extent necessary for the accused to determine whether to file an appeal, the government to respond to a filing, and the court to decide the appeal. While a verbatim transcript of the trial may be needed in many cases, it would not be needed in all cases.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 718. RECORD OF TRIAL.

Section 854 of title 10, United States Code (article 54 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) by striking subsection (a) and inserting the following:

"(a) GENERAL AND SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL.—Each general or special court-martial shall keep a separate record of the proceedings in each case brought before it. The record shall be certified by a court-reporter, except that in the case of death, disability, or absence of a court reporter, the record shall be certified by an official selected as the President may prescribe by regulation.";

(2) in subsection (b)—

(A) by striking "(b) Each special and summary court-martial" and inserting "(b) SUMMARY COURT-MARTIAL.—Each summary court-martial"; and

(B) by striking "authenticated" and inserting "certified";

(3) by striking subsection (c) and inserting the following:

"(c) CONTENTS OF RECORD.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the record shall contain such matters as the President may prescribe by regulation.

"(2) In accordance with regulations prescribed by the President, a complete record of proceedings and testimony shall be prepared in any case of a sentence of death, dismissal, discharge, confinement for more than six months, or forfeiture of pay for more than six months.".

(4) in subsection (d)—

(A) by striking "(d) A copy" and inserting "(d) COPY TO ACCUSED.— A copy"; and

(B) by striking "authenticated" and inserting "certified"; and

(5) in subsection (e)—

(A) by striking "involving a sexual assault or other offense covered by section 920 of this title (article 120)" in the first sentence and inserting "upon request,"; and

(B) by striking "authenticated" in the second sentence and inserting "certified".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 718 would amend Article 54, which provides the basic rules and procedures for producing, authenticating, and distributing records of proceedings in general, special, and summary courts-martial. The amendments would facilitate the use of modern court reporting technology in the recording, certification, and distribution of court-martial records. The use of this technology would streamline preparation and distribution of the record of trial in light of recent amendments that reduce or eliminate post-trial proceedings under Article 60. In addition, the proposed amendments would increase the availability of court-martial records to victims of crime.

The amendments to Article 54 would: (1) require the court reporter, instead of the military judge or the prosecutor, to certify the record of trial; (2) require a complete record of trial in any general or special court-martial if the sentence includes death, dismissal, discharge, or confinement or forfeitures for more than six months; and (3) provide all victims who testify at a court-martial with access to records of trial, eliminating the distinction in the statute that currently provides such access only to victims of sex-related offenses under Article 120.

Changes in the rules implementing Article 54 would address the opportunity to file a motion to correct the record, utilizing procedures similar to those available in the federal civilian courts. Implementing rules also would address the rules for providing a "complete" record of trial, including the circumstances under which a written transcript will be prepared and the procedures for preparing a written transcript. In the near term, the statute's implementing rules would provide for the availability of a written transcript during the appellate process in the types of cases in which a written transcript is available under current military practice, subject to rules similar to the federal rule for requesting all or part of a transcript. Implementing rules also would address the potential in the future for use in the appellate process of electronic transcriptions to the extent that the development and use of such technology for legal proceedings provides for increasing comfort and familiarity with electronic formats.

Subchapter VIII. Sentences

Article 55 – Cruel and Unusual Punishment Prohibited
10 U.S.C. § 855

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 55. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 55.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 55 prohibits any cruel and unusual punishment in the armed forces. Article 55 specifically prohibits the historical military punishments of flogging, branding, marking, or tattooing on the body. Also prohibited is the use of irons or handcuffs, except for the purpose of safe custody.

3. Historical Background

Article 55 was included in the UCMJ as enacted in 1950. It incorporated then-present Army and Navy provisions prohibiting flogging, branding, marking or tattooing as forms of punishment.[1] It has remained unchanged since the UCMJ's enactment.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, the primary test military appellate courts use for determining whether punishment qualifies as "cruel and unusual" is whether the conditions can be said to be cruel and unusual under contemporary standards of decency.[3] Such conditions include, but are not limited to: (1) conditions which result in a clear and serious deprivation of basic human needs; (2) conditions which deprive inmates of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities; and (3) conditions which result in punishment grossly disproportionate to the inmate's offenses.[4] In practice, the President's limitation on authorized punishments in R.C.M. 1003 has made appellate litigation on what constitutes cruel and unusual punishment rare.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 55 is similar to the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution, which states that excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 55: No change to Article 55.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 55's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 55.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Articles 56-56a – Maximum and Minimum Limits & Sentence of Confinement for Life without Eligibility for Parole

10 U.S.C. §§ 856-56a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align court-martial sentencing procedures with this Report's proposal for judicial sentencing in all noncapital general and special courts-martial. The proposal would enable military sentencing to benefit from the experiences of state and federal civilian courts in sentencing reform, while adapting the lessons learned from those experiences to the special needs of the military justice system.

The sentencing reforms proposed by this Report are made possible by the amendments to Article 53 providing for judicial sentencing, and come in three parts.

First, as discussed in the proposal for Article 53, the current adversarial sentencing process (which utilizes many of the same procedural and evidentiary rules applicable during findings) would be modified to more closely align with the process used in civilian courts, in which all relevant information is presented to aid the judge in fashioning an appropriate sentence. Part II of this Report will set forth the rules for such sentencing proceedings, taking into account the interests of the government, the accused, and any victims in having a thorough, balanced, and transparent proceeding.

Second, this proposal would replace the current requirement to adjudge a unitary sentence, in which a single sentence is adjudged for all offenses for which there has been a finding of guilty without the need to identify which portions of the sentence are attributable to which offense. Under the proposal, which follows the practice used in most civilian proceedings, the judge would pronounce a distinct sentence for those portions of a sentence that can be segmented and attributed to a specific offense—confinement and fines—with a requirement to designate whether any segmented portions will run concurrently or consecutively in the sentence.

Third, this proposal implements sentencing parameters and criteria to guide the discretion of the military judge in determining a sentence for each guilty finding. This proposal would establish a Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board to develop parameters and criteria. The sentencing parameters and criteria proposed by the Board would be subject to approval by the President. As in many civilian courts, a parameter for an offense would set a boundary on the judge's discretion, subject to a departure for case specific reasons set forth by the judge in the record. Sentencing parameters would not be required for those offenses for which it would be impracticable to set a parameter, such as unique military offenses that vary greatly in seriousness depending on the context. The Board would establish sentencing criteria for those offenses without parameters. The implementation of parameters and criteria would draw upon best practices at the federal and state level, and would replace the current practice of adjudging sentences with little or no guidance.

This proposal provides for a four-year period to develop sentencing parameters and criteria. This four-year implementation period allows for the Board to collect and analyze sentencing data—especially the data made available after the implementation of segmented sentencing.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 56 provides the authority for the President to set maximum punishments for UCMJ violations. The President has exercised this authority in two ways: First, the President has limited the types of punishments that may be imposed at a court-martial to those specified in R.C.M. 1003, which prohibits punishments other than reprimands, forfeitures, fines, reductions in grade, restriction, hard labor, confinement, punitive discharges, and death. Second, for most offenses, the President has limited the amount of confinement, forfeitures, or the type of punitive discharge that may be imposed. The President's authority is subject to any maximum or mandatory punishments Congress establishes in the UCMJ.

Article 56(b), added to the statute in 2014, mandates that an accused convicted of certain sex offenses (and attempts of those crimes), be discharged from the military with a dishonorable discharge or a dismissal. An enlisted accused who pleads guilty to rape or sexual assault may receive a bad-conduct discharge, in lieu of a dishonorable discharge, as a term of a plea agreement.

Article 56a authorizes the punishment of confinement for life without the possibility of parole any time confinement for life is an authorized punishment. A sentence to life without parole may be reduced only by: (1) the convening authority, pursuant to a pretrial agreement;[1] (2) the convening authority, upon recommendation of trial counsel after the accused has provided substantial assistance in another investigation or prosecution;[2] (3) the appellate courts;[3] (4) the Service Secretary (personally, and non-delegable);[4] or (5) through a pardon by the President.[5]

3. Historical Background

The sentencing procedures in courts-martial have changed substantially throughout the history of military law. Under the early Articles of War, sentences were determined by majority vote.[6] Although the Articles of War provided for several mandatory sentences,[7] most offenses were punished entirely within the discretion of the court-martial. In 1890, Congress authorized the President to establish maximum sentences in times of peace.[8]

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress provided the President with the authority to promulgate rules on sentencing under Article 36; in Article 56, Congress specifically authorized the President to determine the maximum punishments for violations of the UCMJ.[9] As originally enacted, the only offenses in the UCMJ that included mandatory minimum sentences were premeditated murder (life in prison); felony murder (life in prison) and spying (mandatory death).[10] In 1960, Congress enacted Article 58a to establish mandatory reductions for the enlisted grades as a collateral effect of a court-martial sentence, subject to exceptions in Service regulations.[11] In 1996, Congress enacted Article 58b to require mandatory forfeitures, if not adjudged at trial, during certain periods of confinement.[12] In 1997, Congress enacted Article 56a, to provide for the punishment of confinement for life without parole and restricted clemency authority for such sentences.[13] In 2013, Congress amended Article 56 to provide for mandatory punitive discharges for rape and sexual assault.[14]

There is no specific statutory requirement for restitution as part of court-martial practice, although restitution has been recognized as a valid term of a plea agreement since at least 1977.[15] When Congress enacted the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act of 1996, it did not specifically address victims of crimes tried by courts-martial.[16]

4. Contemporary Practice

Currently, military practice utilizes unitary sentencing, in which a court-martial adjudges a single sentence for the accused, regardless of the number of offenses for which the accused has been found guilty. This practice is specifically required by the Rules for Courts-Martial,[17] and is implicitly required by Article 52's requirement for panel voting.[18] If the accused has been found guilty of multiple offenses, the maximum authorized sentence is the sum of the maximum punishments for all offenses individually.[19]

R.C.M. 1002 provides the rule for sentence determination in courts-martial. The rule states that the sentence "is a matter within the discretion of the court-martial." Pursuant to this rule, except for the few offenses that have mandatory minimum sentences—which include premeditated murder and the sexual offenses described earlier—the court is free to arrive at a sentence anywhere from no punishment to the maximum established by the President under Article 56(a). The appropriate sentence for an accused is generally within the discretion of the court-martial, and the court may adjudge any lawful sentence, from no punishment to the maximum established by the President. With a few exceptions, there are few constraints on the discretion of the sentencing authority in courts-martial.

With respect to restitution, under current law, victims who suffer property losses are allowed to file a claim for payment under Article 139. However, such claims are not part of the formal court-martial process, and are limited to instances of willful destruction of property. Article 139 claims do not cover, for example, medical bills, missed wages, or other economic losses recoverable in federal court.[20] Under current practice, restitution is addressed primarily through the use of pretrial agreements between the convening authority and the accused.[21]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Military practice and federal civilian practice differ significantly in the areas of sentence determination, restitution, and appeals of sentences.

[17] R.C.M. 1006(c).

[18] To sentence an accused to more than ten years confinement requires a concurrence of three-fourths of the panel members. A sentence of less than 10 years requires a two-thirds concurrence. These voting requirements would not work in a non-unitary sentencing model, for example, when each individual sentence was less than 10 years but the combined sentence was more than 10 years. Additionally, a single sentence has long been military practice. WILLIAM WINTHROP, MILITARY LAW AND PRECEDENTS 404 (photo reprint 1920) (2d ed. 1896).

[19] R.C.M. 1003(c)(1)(C).

[20] Article 139 claims provide superior victim rights to restitution awarded in federal court in one limited manner: they generally require proof only by a preponderance of the evidence that the accused committed the alleged offense.

Prior to the Sentencing and Reform Act of 1984,[22] a federal district judge exercised "virtually unlimited discretion to sentence a convicted defendant anywhere within the range created by the statutory maximum and minimum penalties for the offense or offenses of conviction."[23] During the 1970s and 1980s, academics, the public, and eventually policymakers grew concerned about sentencing disparities in the federal courts. A political consensus arose in the early 1980s that the prevailing system of indeterminate sentencing no longer adequately fulfilled the primary objectives of the criminal justice system. Criticisms of the system at the time echo current criticisms of courts-martial and included sentencing disparity and loss of public confidence.[24] In 1984, Congress established the U.S. Sentencing Commission, directing it to create federal sentencing guidelines.

Statutory provisions required the original Commission to promulgate a sentencing guidelines grid, based on the offense and criminal history of the defendant, with 258 different "boxes." While initially intended as binding, the Supreme Court later declared mandatory guidelines unconstitutional as a violation of the Sixth Amendment.[25] Since the Court's Booker decision, the guidelines have been advisory only; district courts are required to take them into account, but are not bound to apply them when determining an appropriate sentence for an accused. Federal judges may depart upward or downward from an advisory sentencing range for an offense due to "an array of mitigating and aggravating factors listed under 18 U.S.C. § 3553(b)"—including circumstances not adequately taken into consideration by the Sentencing Commission in formulating the guidelines that should result in a sentence different from that described.[26] The federal

Fourth, indeterminate sentencing was thought to erode public faith in the criminal justice system. Because defendants rarely served anything close to the amount of time the judge announced, observers unfamiliar with the system's rituals saw the system as fraudulent. . . . guidelines have been criticized on a variety of grounds, including for being unnecessarily complex.[27]

In brief, the federal sentencing guidelines operate as follows:

As with courts-martial, in federal district court the maximum sentence is determined by the statute criminalizing the offense. The appropriate sentence range is often determined by judicial fact-finding, made with the aid of a presentence report. The guideline range is determined by two factors: (1) the defendant's criminal history category; and (2) the offense level.

A defendant's criminal history category is determined by the defendant's previous interactions with the criminal justice system. A defendant who previously received substantial prison sentences, or who committed the current offense while still under probation, will receive a higher criminal history category, and in most cases a higher sentencing guideline range.

The U.S. Sentencing Guidelines assign most criminal violations of federal law an offense level ranging from 1-43. The offense level is adjusted based on the severity of the crime, victim status, the role of the defendant in the crime, and the defendant's acceptance of responsibility, among other factors. If the defendant played a small role in the offense, assisted the prosecution, and took responsibility for his role in the crime, the offense level can be decreased substantially. Thus, two defendants convicted of the same offense may face different sentencing guideline ranges based on the manner in which they committed the offense and their prior criminal histories. Different charging decisions, different government priorities, and the exercise of sentencing discretion by different judges may also result in markedly different sentences, even if two individuals are sentenced within the guideline range for the same offense.

Generally, the federal judge will repeat this process for every offense, although there are rules for grouping offenses—for example, offenses involving the same victim and the same act. Although the judge is required to consider the sentencing guidelines, the judge is not required to apply the guidelines when determining the appropriate sentence for a defendant. In addition, federal civilian judges must determine whether multiple terms of imprisonment imposed on a defendant will run concurrently or consecutively.[28]

With respect to restitution, federal law provides for mandatory restitution for victims of crimes of violence, crimes against property, and any crime for which the victim suffers a pecuniary loss.[29] Restitution is determined as part of the sentencing proceedings,[30] and

With respect to sentencing appeals, in federal civilian practice both the government and defense may appeal a sentence if it is unreasonable.[34] A government appeal of a sentence may not be prosecuted without the approval of the Solicitor General or Deputy Solicitor General.[35]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 56.1: Amend Article 56 to replace the court-martial practice of "unitary" sentencing with "segmented sentencing" where, if confinement is adjudged for guilty findings, the amount of confinement for each guilty finding would be determined separately. This proposal also would provide for segmented sentencing for fines.

This proposal would increase transparency in military sentencing by allowing the parties and the public to know the specific punishments for each offense. Additionally, for cases involving a victim (or multiple victims), identifying the sentence associated with their injury may provide clarity and increase confidence in the results of the court-martial.

(though they overlap with) the purposes of tort law); Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U. S. 36, 49, n.10 (1986) (noting that restitution is, inter alia, "an effective rehabilitative penalty"); United States v. Serawop, 505 F.3d 1112, 1122-1123, (10th Cir. 2007) (finding restitution is not punitive and summarizing the circuit split).

[30] Prior to sentencing, the district court directs a probation officer to collect, (as part of the presentence report or as a separate document), sufficient information for the court to fashion an appropriate restitution order. Each defendant is required to file an affidavit describing his or her financial resources with the probation officer. The government provides the probation officer with the amount of restitution due each victim. Victims may also independently provide input. The court may request additional information, and may receive evidence in camera. The burden is on the government to establish the amount of loss sustained by a victim; the burden of establishing the financial resources of the defendant is on the defense. 18 U.S.C. § 3664(a), (d)(2)-(4).

If there are multiple defendants, the court may order each defendant liable for the full amount. If the defendant knowingly fails to pay restitution, the court may resentence the defendant to any sentence which may have been originally imposed, but may not increase punishment if the failure to pay is "solely" because of the defendant's indigence. 18 U.S.C. § 3664(f)(3)(A).

On appeal, segmented sentencing will increase the efficiency of appellate review and may result in fewer remands for resentencing. Under current law, when an appellate court sets aside a guilty specification, the appellate court can reassess the sentence if it can be assured "that the sentence is no greater than that which would have been imposed if the prejudicial error had not been committed."[36] If not, the case may be remanded for a new sentencing proceeding. Non-unitary sentencing would simplify this burden for appellate courts.

Segmented sentencing should provide practitioners and policy makers with more accurate information about punishments in courts-martial, particularly in the development and refinement of sentencing parameters and criteria. As most cases involve convictions for more than one offense, it is challenging to assemble reliable sentencing data in courts-martials. More accurate data would allow policy makers to know how the sentencing system is functioning, which is a significant prerequisite to evaluating its effectiveness and proposing changes.

Segmented sentencing requires protections to ensure that an accused is not unfairly sentenced twice for what is essentially one offense. This proposal therefore also would require that the military judge determine whether terms of confinement will run concurrently, or consecutively. Under segmented sentencing, an accused convicted of two offenses would receive a term of confinement appropriate for each offense. If the offenses involved the same transaction, victim, and harm, the sentence could be overly severe for what was essentially one criminal act. This is of special concern in the military justice system where the UCMJ has several ambiguous offenses, unknown in the civilian practice, that increase the potential for unreasonable multiplication of charges;[37] where prosecutors are expected to charge all known offenses at a single trial;[38] and the accused must reach a high bar to have charges severed.[39]

Under the proposed amendments, military judges would need to make a determination, on the record, as to the appropriate amount of confinement for each offense. At the same time, the military judge would determine whether the sentences should run concurrently or consecutively. This proposal is rooted in the federal system, where federal district courts generally have broad discretion to impose a consecutive or concurrent sentence.[40] The [40] Sester v. United States, 132 S.Ct. 1463, 1468 (2012); 18 U.S.C. § 3584. Exercise of that discretion, however, is predicated on the court's consideration of the factors listed in 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a), including any applicable guidelines or policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission. For example, under U.S. Sentencing Guidelines § 3D1.1 and 3D1.2, all counts involving "substantially the same harm" are grouped together into a single group if they 1) involve the same victim and the same act or transaction; 2) involve the same victim and two or more acts or transactions connected by a common criminal objective or constituting part of a

Supreme Court has made clear, however, that double-jeopardy principles prohibit imposing consecutive sentences for "the same offense," unless the legislature specifically authorizes multiple sentences.[41]

This proposal would not apply segmented sentencing to unique military punishments that affect the accused's status in the service (e.g., discharges, forfeitures, reductions in pay grade, or reprimands). These punishments are best determined by looking at the sum of the accused's crimes in relation to the accused's potential for future service. The case of a servicemember convicted of more than one minor offense, for example, may warrant a punitive discharge, even though no one offense, standing alone, would warrant such punishment.

Recommendation 56.2: Establish sentencing parameters and criteria to provide guidance to military judges in determining an appropriate sentence.

This proposal would establish a more structured sentencing system that draws upon practice and experience in the civilian sector, including under the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines, while utilizing an approach that reflects that an effective military justice system requires a range of punishments and procedures that have no direct counterpart in civilian criminal trials.

Criminal sentencing systems face two competing goals: consistency and individualized consideration. Consistency in sentencing (similar offenses by similar accused receiving similar sentences) may serve to increase deterrence, predictability, and public confidence in criminal sentences. Individualized sentencing tailors a sentence to the accused and the particular circumstances of his or her crime. Despite similar goals, direct application of the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines presents several concerns. First, military judges do not have the equivalent logistical support and staff to mirror the duties of a federal district court.[42] Second, federal sentencing guidelines were developed for federal crimes. While the UCMJ common scheme or plan; 3) when one of the counts embodies conduct that is treated as a specific offense characteristic in, or other adjustment to, the guideline applicable to another of the counts; and 4) when the offense level is determined largely on the basis of the total amount of harm or loss, the quantity of the substance involved, or some other measure of aggregate harm, or if the offense behavior is ongoing or continuous in nature and the offense guideline is written to cover such behavior. See United States Sentencing Guidelines, § 3D1.2.

[41] See Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 368 (1983) (Where unequivocal legislative intent was to impose consecutive sentences for even arguably same conduct, such sentences do not violate double-jeopardy principles); Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 344 (1981) ("[T]he question of what punishments are constitutionally permissible is no different from the question of what punishment the Legislative Branch intended to be imposed. Where Congress intended, as it did here, to impose multiple punishments, imposition of such sentences does not violate the Constitution.").

[42] The Administrative Office of the United States Courts has over 32,000 employees, with almost 100,000 criminal cases processed each year. The military justice system, by contrast, tried less than 2500 cases in 2013, and military judges often cover a large geographical area and may not even have a single clerk. http://www.uscourts.gov/FederalCourts/UnderstandingtheFederalCourts/AdministrativeOffice.aspx; http://www.uscourts.gov/Statistics/JudicialBusiness/2013/judicial-caseload-indicators.aspx; Annual Report Submitted to the Committees on Armed Services of the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives (2013).

includes offenses common to the federal code, many offenses are unique to the military and have no counterpart in civilian criminal law. Third, military justice has as an additional purpose: the maintenance of good order and discipline. Finally, military justice has traditionally focused on rehabilitation, to include the possibility of return to service in appropriate cases, and most offenders have no prior criminal record. As an overriding constraint, a court-martial sentencing scheme must be effective during peacetime and war, state-side and overseas.

In view of these considerations, this proposal differs from the approach taken in the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines in several key respects:

First, the proposal would establish a maximum of 12 offense categories, as compared to the 43 in the US Sentencing Guidelines. Broad offense categories ensure that there is a sufficiently large sentencing range to capture an offense. With no more than 12 categories to cover offenses from petty theft to premeditated murder, each offense category must be broad.

Second, this proposal would require that the sentencing parameter for any given offense be based on the offense at findings, not on other factors. Under the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines, a defendant's guideline sentence is often based on judicial fact-finding made during the presentencing proceeding. In the extreme situation, a federal judge can find, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant committed additional misconduct—and therefore deserves a higher offense category—even if the jury acquitted him of that same misconduct.

Third, some military unique offenses are unsuitable for parameters entirely. Some military offenses are so varied in their nature that they escape any reasonable categorization. The effect of disobeying an order ranges from the trivial to the perilous, and this fact is reflected in the range of lawful punishment.

A sentencing system in the military must reflect the unique offenses under the UCMJ, and must serve the dual goals of justice and discipline. This proposal is therefore designed around the key principle of flexibility. A military sentencing scheme must be flexible enough to adjudge any lawful sentence when appropriate. Crimes committed in combat, for example, may severely aggravate an offense if the accused put the unit or mission at risk, or may mitigate an offense committed during or after intense operations. Courts-martial, while often trying crimes similar to those in civilian courts, need to have the flexibility to impose an appropriate sentence stemming from extreme situations (or unique military contexts).

Accordingly, this proposal directs the establishment of two forms of guidance for military judges in determining an appropriate sentence: "sentencing parameters" and "sentencing criteria." A sentencing parameter would provide an upper and lower limit on the sentence that may be imposed, but one that the military judge could depart from when warranted by the facts of a case and to fashion an individualized sentence for the offender. Sentencing criteria would consist of factors that aggravate or mitigate the severity of an offense and that the military judge must consider, but would not constrain the development of an appropriate sentence.

In short, this proposal would retain flexibility in sentences, recognizing the unique offenses and circumstances of military justice; it would continue the current emphasis on rehabilitation of an accused; and it would alter current practice by providing guidance to the judge on how to fashion an appropriate sentence.

The proposal would be implemented as follows:

Interim Period. This Report's proposals generally become effective one year after enactment. For sentencing parameters and criteria, this proposal calls for implementation within four years of enactment. This transitional period allows time for the Board to collect and analyze sentencing data, propose sentencing parameters and criteria, and submit the proposals to the President for approval. This proposal also requires the President to establish interim guidance during this period until parameters become effective.

Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board. Upon enactment, the proposed amendment of Article 56 would establish a Board within the Department of Defense to develop sentencing parameters and criteria, as well as review and recommend changes to sentencing rules and procedures. The Board would develop and propose either sentencing parameters or criteria for all military offenses. Proposals for sentencing parameters and criteria would require approval by the President to take effect. The five-member board would be composed of the chief trial judge from each service (plus a designated trial judge from either the Navy or Marine Corps, depending on the service affiliation of the chief trial judge of the Navy-Marine Corps Trial Judiciary). The Secretary of Defense would designate one member to serve as Chair, and one as Vice-Chair. Ex-officio members would be designated by the Attorney General, the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Department of Defense General Counsel. Board members would serve as a collateral duty. The Department of Defense would provide a full-time staff. The Board's proposals would be developed in consultation with advisory groups comprised of senior officers and enlisted members and practitioners selected by the services.

Sentencing Parameters. The proposal for Article 56 requires, within four years of enactment, the establishment of sentencing parameters for most offenses under the UCMJ. Similar to federal sentencing guidelines, a sentencing parameter anchors the discretion of a military judge within a specified range, but allows the military judge to exercise discretion in deviating from the established parameter.

Sentencing Criteria. For military unique offenses unsuitable for sentencing parameters this proposal would require the development of sentencing criteria. Sentencing criteria are offense specific factors that the military judge must consider in determining a proper sentence, but that do not direct a particular sentence. Sentencing criteria apply to all offenses for which a sentencing parameter is not established. Sentencing criteria may also provide guidance about when a punishment is appropriate or inappropriate, and the proper consideration of collateral effects of a sentence. For example, a punitive discharge deprives a servicemember of substantially all benefits administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Defense. In cases with a retirement eligible accused, a punitive discharge deprives the accused, and their dependents, of receiving retired pay and benefits.[43] Sentencing criteria established by the President could assist the military judge in determining how to determine an appropriate sentence, but would not direct any particular sentence.

When sentencing parameters and criteria take effect, this proposal would sunset the mandatory punitive discharge provisions in Article 56(b). This would eliminate a current incongruity in the system where designated sex offenses result in mandatory discharge, but there is no equivalent mandatory discharge for other serious crimes such as murder. Mandatory discharges have the potential to distort sentencing proceedings in an undesirable fashion. As a collateral consequence of a dishonorable discharge or dismissal an accused loses essentially all benefits administered by their Service and the Department of Veterans Affairs. The mandatory discharge provisions prohibit alternative resolutions of a case (such as confinement and administrative separation). A purpose of establishing sentencing parameters is to provide sufficient guidance to military judges as to make mandatory minimum sentences unnecessary. This recommendation, combined with the proposal to allow for government appeals of sentences, provides sufficient protections against improper sentences, but also eliminates the current incongruity where only one type of offense has a mandatory discharge.

Appeals. Under this proposal, Article 56 would address the standards for appealing sentences. Both the government and the accused could appeal a sentence, although under different circumstances. Both the government and the accused could file an appeal if the sentence was unlawful, incorrectly calculated, or plainly unreasonable. The government would not be permitted to file an appeal during the interim period prior to the establishment of sentencing parameters, and an appeal by the government after parameters are established would require the approval of the Judge Advocate General.

The general structure of this subsection is adopted from 18 U.S.C. § 3742, with modifications that reflect military practice.

Recommendation 56.3: Incorporate Article 56a into Article 56 without substantive change.

Article 56a allows for a sentence of confinement for life without the eligibility of parole any time a life sentence is authorized. The article also specifies the limited circumstances under which a sentence to life without parole can be reduced. Relief is limited to action under Article 60, appellate review, a Presidential pardon, and clemency personally granted by the Service Secretary under Article 74.[44] Clemency by the Secretary may not be taken until after 20 years.

[44] The 2014 amendment to Article 60 limited the convening authority's power to reduce the punishment in most serious offenses (i.e. a case where LWOP was adjudged).

This Report does not recommend any substantive change to Article 56a, but as part of the review of the UCMJ recommends that Article 56a be incorporated into Article 56, and that Article 56a be stricken.

Recommendation 56.4: Additional study of restitution in courts-martial.

Article 6b(a)(6) provides that a victim has the "right to receive restitution as provided in law." As a matter of current practice, non-statutory restitution may be included in pretrial agreements in guilty plea cases,[45] and a limited form of restitution related to property damage is available outside the sentencing process in the form of deductions from pay under Article 139. The congressionally-chartered Judicial Proceedings Panel is considering whether additional options for restitution should be provided in connection with sexual offense proceedings.[46] Given the limited jurisdiction of courts-martial over personal property and assets, it may be necessary to consider options outside the military sentencing process, and beyond the scope of this Report, for purposes of developing an effective restitution program. Because such options would include consideration of administrative and judicial procedures outside the military justice system, this Report recommends that development of any statutory changes regarding restitution take place after the Judicial Proceedings Panel presents its recommendations.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by more closely aligning the UCMJ with federal civilian practice, while accounting for unique circumstances specific to military practice.

The substantive recommendations in this proposal assume enactment of this Report's proposal for judge-alone sentencing, as sentencing parameters and non-unitary sentencing are infeasible for panels. First, the instructions necessary for a panel to implement sentencing parameters would be onerously complex. Second, the voting requirements would be difficult to apply if the panel were to vote on individual sentences for each offense.

"(6) VOTING REQUIREMENT.—An affirmative vote of at least three members is required for any action of the Board under this subsection.

"(C) the sentence is plainly unreasonable.

"(2) An appeal under this subsection must be filed within 60 days after the date on which the judgment of a court-martial is entered into the record under section 860c of this title (article 60c).

"(3) The Government may appeal a sentence under this section only after sentencing parameters are first prescribed under subsection (f).".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 856a of title 10, United States Code (article 56a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is repealed.

(c) IMPLEMENTATION OF SENTENCING PARAMETERS AND CRITERIA.—(1) Not later than four years after the date of the enactment of this Act, the President shall prescribe the regulations for sentencing parameters and criteria required by subsection (d) of section 856 of title 10, United States Code (article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(2) Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the President shall prescribe interim guidance for use in sentencing at courts-martial before the implementation of sentencing parameters and criteria pursuant to the regulations referred to in paragraph (1). Insofar as the President considers practicable, the interim guidance shall be consistent with the purposes and procedures set forth in subsections (c) and (d) of section 856 of title 10, United States Code (article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), taking into account the interim nature of the guidance. For purposes of sentencing under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the interim guidance shall be treated as sentencing parameters and criteria.

(3) The President shall prescribe the effective dates of the regulations referred to in paragraph (1) and of the interim guidance referred to in paragraph (2).

(d) PROSPECTIVE REPEAL OF SENTENCE MINIMUMS FOR CERTAIN OFFENSES.—Upon the taking effect of sentencing parameters for offenses specified in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of section 856 of title 10, United States Code (article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as in effect on the day after the date of the enactment of this Act—

(1) section 856 of title 10, United States Code (article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(A) in subsection (a), by striking "(a) SENTENCE MAXIMUMS.—"; and

(B) by striking subsection (b); and

(2) section 853a of title 10, United States Code (article 53a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking subsections (c) and (d) and inserting the following new subsection:

"(c) LIMITATION ON ACCEPTANCE OF PLEA AGREEMENTS.—The military judge shall reject a plea agreement that—

"(1) contains a provision that has not been accepted by both parties; or

"(2) contains a provision that is not understood by the accused.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 801 would amend Article 56, which provides the authority for the President to set maximum punishments for UCMJ violations, subject to any maximum or mandatory punishments Congress has established in the UCMJ. The President has exercised this authority in two ways: (1) by limiting the types of punishments that may be imposed at a court-martial to those specified in R.C.M. 1003; and (2) by limiting the amount of confinement, forfeitures, or the type of punitive discharge that may be imposed at a court-martial.

The proposed amendments would align court-martial sentencing procedures with the proposal for judicial sentencing in all non-capital general and special courts-martial. See Section 716, supra. The amendments are designed to be phased in over a four-year period to enable military sentencing to benefit from the experiences of state and federal civilian courts in sentencing reform, while adapting the lessons learned from those experiences to the special needs of the military justice system. The amendments also would increase the transparency of military sentencing practices and provide additional structure in sentencing, while retaining flexibility in determining an appropriate sentence for the individual.

Phase One. The first phase would begin on the date the legislation is enacted. During the first phase, the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board (the Board) would begin the process of gathering sentencing data for the development of sentencing parameters and criteria. During this Phase, the President would establish interim guidance, to become effective upon the effective date of the legislation. The Board would be primarily responsible for developing the interim guidance. In this phase, judicial sentencing in all non-capital general and special courts-martial would take effect. See Section 716, supra. Under judicial sentencing, the current adversarial sentencing process (which utilizes many of the procedural and evidentiary rules applicable during findings) would be modified to more closely align with the process used in civilian courts, in which all relevant information is presented to aid the judge in fashioning an appropriate sentence. The sentencing process during the first phase also would replace the current requirement to adjudge a unitary sentence, in which a single sentence is adjudged for all offenses for which there has been a finding of guilty without any explanation as to how the sentence was reached or which portions of the sentence are attributable to which offense.

In the first phase, which would be completed within four years after the legislation is enacted, the Board also would develop sentencing parameters and criteria to replace the interim guidance. The sentencing parameters and criteria proposed by the Board would be subject to approval by the President. As in many civilian courts, a sentencing parameter for an offense would set a boundary on the judge's discretion, subject to a departure for case specific reasons set forth by the judge in the record. Sentencing parameters would not be required for those offenses for which it would be impracticable to set a parameter, such as unique military offenses that vary greatly in seriousness depending on the context. The Board also would establish sentencing criteria—factors that a judge must consider when sentencing a case, but that do not propose a specific punishment. The implementation of parameters and criteria would draw upon best practices at the federal and state level, and would replace the current practice of adjudging sentences with little or no guidance. Until the parameters and criteria are implemented, the sentencing process would utilize the procedures set forth in Phase One.

Phase Two. In the second phase, which would begin four years after the legislation is enacted, the parameters and criteria approved by the President would apply to sentencing proceedings for general and special courts-martial. Military judges would utilize the parameters and criteria in conjunction with the segmented sentencing procedures and other changes in the sentencing process developed during Phase One. Military judges would retain discretion to sentence outside parameters in order to fashion individualized sentences, subject to a requirement to set forth on the record reasons for any departure.

Finally, once sentencing parameters are in place, this proposal would authorize government appeals of sentences and eliminate the requirement for mandatory minimum discharges. By addressing sentencing discretion through the use of parameters, Article 56 would reduce the need for rigid mandatory minimum sentences.

Section 801(a) would amend Article 56 in its entirety. As amended, Article 56 would contain the following provisions:

Article 56(a)-(b) would retain current law regarding maximum and minimum sentences, subject to Section 801(d), infra.

Article 56(c)(1) would enumerate factors the court-martial would be required to consider before imposing a sentence. The proposed factors are adapted from 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a).

Article 56(c)(2) would require the military judge to determine a sentence in accordance with the sentencing parameters established by the President. Consistent with federal civilian practice, a military judge could sentence outside the parameter based upon written factual findings that such a sentence is justified. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(3) would require the military judge to consider sentencing criteria established by the President when determining a sentence. The sentencing criteria would provide factors for the military judge to consider, and would not direct any specific punishment. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(4) would require the military judge to determine the appropriate amount of fine and confinement for each separate offense of which the accused is found guilty. The assignment of a specific sentence for each offense is designed to provide additional transparency to the parties and the public and advance the purposes of sentencing. With respect to all other punishments (discharges, reductions, forfeitures, and similar unique military punishments), the current practice of awarding a single sentence for all offenses would be retained, as these punishments are not readily segmented. To ensure the accused is not punished twice for what is substantially one offense, the military judge would be required to determine whether periods of confinement should run concurrently or consecutively. The requirement to determine whether sentences should run concurrently or consecutively is in the statute, and the process for making the determination is left to the Rules for Courts-Martial. A sentence to confinement for one offense that runs concurrently with the sentence to confinement of another offense would not increase the total period of confinement for purposes of determining whether the period of confinement satisfies a jurisdictional predicate (i.e., confinement for more than six months) for an appeal as of right to the Court of Criminal Appeals under proposed revisions to Article 66(b)(1)(A). In general, this subsection envisions requiring military judges to impose concurrent sentences when the offenses involve the same act, transaction, or criminal objective and the same victim. This would be similar to the rules governing the grouping of offenses under § 3D1.2(a-b) of the United States Sentencing Commission Guidelines Manual. In other circumstances, the decision to have sentences run concurrently would be left to the discretion of the judge, informed by consideration of the purposes of sentencing. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(5) would provide that sentencing parameters and criteria do not apply to the issue of whether an offense should be punished by death.

Article 56(c)(6) would incorporate Article 56a (Sentence of confinement for life without eligibility for parole) into Article 56 without substantive change. Article 56a would be repealed. See Section 801(b), infra.

Article 56(d)(1) would require the President to establish sentencing parameters and criteria.

Article 56(d)(2) would establish the requirements for sentencing parameters. Except for unique military offenses, all violations of the UCMJ would be assigned to between seven and twelve offense categories. Each offense category would specify a range of confinement and may include an appropriate range for other punishments such as discharges. The subsection also would prescribe the minimum requirements for each sentencing parameter.

Article 56(d)(3) defines sentencing criteria as factors that the military judge must consider when sentencing. Under the proposal, there are two types of sentencing criteria: criteria that inform how to punish a violation of a specific offense (e.g., factors that aggravate or mitigate the harm of a military offense); and criteria that inform when certain punishments may be appropriate or inappropriate (e.g., factors that inform when a reduction or discharge may be appropriate).

Article 56(d)(4) would create the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board to develop parameters and criteria. The Board would be created within the Department of Defense, and would be composed of the chief trial judge of each service, subject to the opportunity to detail alternate members when required by circumstances applicable to the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. The chief trial judges would be detailed by the Judge Advocate General of each military Service and the Secretary of Defense would select a chair and vice-chair of the Board. Service on the Board would be a collateral duty. The Board would have non-voting members designated by the Attorney General, the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the General Counsel of the Department of Defense. The Department of Defense would provide full-time staff to assist the Board.

Article 56(d)(5) would prescribe the duties of the Board. The Board would be required to develop sentencing parameters, criteria, and sentencing rules for submission to the President. The Board also could promulgate non-binding policies on sentencing. In fulfilling its duties, the Board would be required to consult with commanders, enlisted leaders, practitioners, and others. The Board would be required to establish two advisory groups. The first advisory group would be composed of senior officer and enlisted members who provide guidance on the effectiveness of military justice on discipline. The second advisory group would be composed of military justice practitioners.

Article 56(e) would provide for limited appeal of sentences by the government. This right would be available only after the establishment of sentencing parameters. Similar to 18 U.S.C. § 3742(b)(4), the government would be required to obtain the approval of the Judge Advocate General before filing an appeal on the sentence. Finally, such appeals would be limited to whether the sentence is illegal, calculated incorrectly, or is plainly unreasonable. In determining whether a sentence is plainly unreasonable, a Court of Criminal Appeals could, but would not be required to, presume that a sentence within a sentencing parameter is reasonable. The core of the subsection is taken from 18 U.S.C. § 3742, modified for military practice and reflecting the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).

Section 801(c) would require the President to prescribe the regulations for sentencing parameters and criteria required by Article 56(d), as amended, not later than four years after enactment of the bill. It also would require the President to prescribe interim guidance.

Section 801(d) would repeal Article 56(b) and Article 53a(d) upon the taking effect of sentencing parameters for the offenses specified in Article 56(b)(2) that have mandatory minimum punishments. See also Section 717, supra.

Articles 57, 57a, and 71 – Effective Date of Sentences; Deferment of Sentences; & Execution of Sentence; Suspension of Sentence

10 U.S.C. §§ 857-57a, 871

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would consolidate Articles 57, 57a, and 71 into Article 57 (Effective Date of Sentences). The proposal would address in a single article the effective date for all punishments that could be adjudged at a court-martial. This proposal also would make conforming changes to reflect the proposed changes to Article 60 (Action of Convening Authority), Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals), Article 69 (Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General), and the proposed Article 60c (Entry of Judgment).

2. Summary of the Current Statutes

Articles 57, 57a, and 71 address related aspects of court-martial sentences, as follows:

- Article 57 (Effective date of sentences): Article 57 establishes when punishments adjudged by a court-martial become effective. Article 57(a) provides that a sentence to forfeitures or a reduction in pay-grade becomes effective either fourteen days after the sentence is adjudged, or when the convening authority approves the sentence, whichever is earlier. The convening authority may defer the effective date of a sentence of forfeitures or reduction until the convening authority approves the sentence under Article 60. A deferral may be rescinded at any time. Under Article 57(b), a sentence to confinement begins to run on the day the sentence is adjudged, excluding periods when the confinement is deferred or suspended. Subsection (c) provides that all other punishments become effective when ordered executed by the convening authority or other authorized person.

- Article 57a (Deferment of sentences): Article 57a authorizes the convening authority to defer a sentence to confinement for any of three conditions. First, under subsection (a), at the request of the accused, the convening authority may defer the service of confinement until the convening authority orders the sentence executed. Second, under subsection (b), a convening authority may defer a sentence to confinement without the consent of the accused, in limited circumstances when the accused is in the custody of a state or territory of the United States or a foreign government. Finally, under subsection (c), the Service Secretary may defer a sentence to confinement when the Judge Advocate General has certified the case for review to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces under Article 67(a)(2).

- Article 71 (Execution of sentences; suspension of sentence): Article 71 authorizes and limits the convening authority's ability to order a sentence executed. Article 71(a) requires that a sentence of death must be approved by the President. Subsection (b) requires that a dismissal of an officer, cadet, or midshipman must be approved by the Service Secretary (with limited delegation authority). Subsection (c) requires that, in addition to the requirements of subsections (a)-(b), the part of a sentence that includes death or a punitive discharge may be executed only after a final judgment on the legality of the proceedings (i.e. completion of appellate review). Article 71(c)(2) provides that all other punishments included in a sentence may be ordered executed when the convening authority approves the sentence under Article 60. Article 71(d) authorizes the convening authority to suspend any sentence except for a death sentence. By reference to Article 60, the authority to suspend a sentence or any part thereof is limited to: (1) offenses that have a maximum punishment of two years or less, and when the sentence did not include a punitive discharge or confinement for more than six months; (2) pretrial agreements; and (3) instances when the accused has provided substantial assistance in the investigation or prosecution of another case.

3. Historical Background

Under the Articles of War, court-martial sentences did not become effective until they were approved and ordered executed by the convening authority.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Article 57 provided that confinement could begin to run on the day the sentence was adjudged.[2] Article 57a (Deferment of sentences) was added to the Code in 1968.[3] In 1996, Congress passed several reforms aimed at stopping convicted servicemembers from receiving most pay and allowances while confined.[4] Included in the reforms was an amendment to Article 57 providing that a sentence of forfeiture of pay or reduction in rank would take effect no later than fourteen days after the sentence was adjudged.[5] Article 71 prohibits executing a discharge until after the completion of appellate review and has remained relatively unchanged since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[6]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Articles 57, 57a, and 71 through R.C.M. 1108 (Suspension of execution of sentence; remission) and R.C.M. 1113 (Execution of sentences). Under current law and practice, a sentence to confinement takes effect on the day the sentence is announced. A sentence that includes reduction in pay grade or forfeitures takes effect when the sentence is approved, or fourteen days after the sentence is announced, whichever is earlier. The convening authority may defer confinement and forfeitures and reduction until the convening authority approves the sentence and orders it executed. When approving the sentence, consistent with Article 71, the convening authority will normally order the sentence executed except for the part of the sentence that includes a punitive discharge or death. Typically, a sentence that includes a fine, restriction, reprimand, or hard labor takes effect when the convening authority approves the sentence and orders it executed.

For capital cases, the President must approve the sentence; this includes the authority to commute or suspend any part of the sentence other than death. In cases involving the dismissal of an officer, cadet, or midshipman, the Service Secretary (or designated deputy or assistant secretary) must approve the dismissal; this includes the authority to commute or set aside any part of the sentence.

In addition to the requirement for approval by the President or Service Secretary, a sentence that includes a punitive discharge or death may not be executed until a final judgment as to the legality of the proceedings is complete (i.e. the completion of appellate review). Appellate review is complete when the appeal is waived under Article 61, or when the Court of Criminal Appeals has reviewed the case and any petition to a higher court for review has been addressed, or the time to petition higher courts has expired. After the completion of appellate review (and approval by the President or the Secretary concerned, if required), the convening authority may order the remaining part of the sentence executed. In practice, the services have generally designated a single convening authority to address the execution of discharges.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, the district court judge enters the judgment and the sentence is executed in accordance with the court's judgment or order.[7] A sentence of death is stayed automatically if the defendant files an appeal.[8] For other punishments, a district court judge has broad discretion to stay a sentence.

6. Recommendations and Justification

Recommendation 57.1: Combine the relevant portions of Article 57 and 57a that govern deferment of sentence into a single subsection within Article 57 ("Deferment").

As a conforming change to the proposal for an entry of judgment under Article 60c, the deferment of a sentence would terminate at entry of judgment instead of action by the convening authority under Article 60. No substantive change in the convening authority's ability to defer, rescind a deferral, or other change is proposed.

Recommendation 57.2: Combine the relevant provisions of Articles 57 and 71 that govern when sentences become effective into a single subsection within Article 57 ("Effective date of sentences").

The proposed new subsection would continue current practices for when a sentence becomes effective (e.g. immediately for confinement, upon completion of appellate review for discharges). As a conforming change to the proposal for an entry of judgment under Article 60c, the requirement that a sentence be ordered executed would be removed.

Also, in order to conform with the proposed changes to Article 60c, punishments that currently become effective when the convening authority takes action under Article 60 would become effective upon entry of judgment. Under this proposal, all punishments (other than punitive discharges and death sentences) would be effective upon entry of judgment by operation of law. Discharges would be issued after the completion of appellate review in accordance with service regulations, but would not require action by a convening authority ordering the discharge executed. No change is proposed to the requirement for presidential and secretarial approval for death and dismissals, respectively.

This proposal would allow all parties to more clearly understand when sentences become effective and reduce the possibility of error. For example, under current law, a convening authority may defer confinement, forfeitures and reduction. However, the authority for deferment is contained in two different articles,[9] which have slightly different definitions of when a deferment ends,[10] and differ on which "convening authority" is authorized to defer the sentence.[11]

Recommendation 57.3: Remove from Article 71 the authority for a convening authority to suspend a sentence under Article 71(d).

This is a conforming change to the proposal for Article 60a, which addresses suspension authority.

Recommendation 57.4: Delete Articles 57a and 71.

As described above, the authorities contained in Articles 57a and 71 will be placed within Article 57.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal incorporates several conforming changes related to proposed changes to the post-trial and appellate process. Under the proposal for Article 60c, an "entry of judgment" would serve as a substitute for the convening authority's "action" in stating the results of the court-martial. For purposes of determining when a discharge can be effectuated, the proposed revision of review procedures under Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals) and Article 69 (Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General) require conforming changes.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing ambiguities in related statutory authorities that are currently spread across three different UCMJ articles.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 802. EFFECTIVE DATE OF SENTENCES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 857 of title 10, United States Code (article 57 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§857. Art. 57. Effective date of sentences

"(a) EXECUTION OF SENTENCES.—A court-martial sentence shall be executed and take effect as follows:

"(1) FORFEITURE AND REDUCTION.—A forfeiture of pay or allowances shall be applicable to pay and allowances accruing on and after the date on which the sentence takes effect. Any forfeiture of pay or allowances or reduction in grade that is included in a sentence of a court-martial takes effect on the earlier of—

"(A) the date that is 14 days after the date on which the sentence is adjudged; or

"(B) in the case of a summary court-martial, the date on which the sentence is approved by the convening authority.

"(2) CONFINEMENT.—Any period of confinement included in a sentence of a court-martial begins to run from the date the sentence is adjudged by the court-martial, but periods during which the sentence to confinement is suspended or deferred shall be excluded in computing the service of the term of confinement.

"(3) APPROVAL OF SENTENCE OF DEATH.—If the sentence of the court-martial extends to death, that part of the sentence providing for death may not be executed until approved by the President. In such a case, the President may commute, remit, or suspend the sentence, or any part thereof, as the President sees fit. That part of the sentence providing for death may not be suspended.

"(4) APPROVAL OF DISMISSAL.—If in the case of a commissioned officer, cadet, or midshipman, the sentence of a court-martial extends to dismissal, that part of the sentence providing for dismissal may not be executed until approved by the Secretary concerned or such Under Secretary or Assistant Secretary as may be designated by the Secretary concerned. In such a case, the Secretary, Under Secretary, or Assistant Secretary, as the case may be, may commute, remit, or suspend the sentence, or any part of the sentence, as the Secretary sees fit. In time of war or national emergency he may commute a sentence of dismissal to reduction to any enlisted grade. A person so reduced may be required to serve for the duration of the war or emergency and six months thereafter.

"(5) COMPLETION OF APPELLATE REVIEW.—If a sentence extends to death, dismissal, or a dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, that part of the sentence extending to death, dismissal, or a dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge may be executed, in accordance with service regulations, after completion of appellate review (and, with respect to death or dismissal, approval under paragraph (3) or (4), as appropriate).

"(6) OTHER SENTENCES.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, a general or special court-martial sentence is effective upon entry of judgment and a summary court-martial sentence is effective when the convening authority acts on the sentence.

"(b) DEFERRAL OF SENTENCES.—(1) On application by an accused, the convening authority or, if the accused is no longer under his jurisdiction, the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused is currently assigned, may, in his or her sole discretion, defer the effective date of a sentence of confinement, reduction, or forfeiture. The deferment shall terminate upon entry of judgment or, in the case of a summary court-martial, when the convening authority acts on the sentence. The deferment may be rescinded at any time by the officer who granted it or, if the accused is no longer under his jurisdiction, by the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused is currently assigned.

"(2) In any case in which a court-martial sentences a person referred to in paragraph (3) to confinement, the convening authority may defer the service of the sentence to confinement, without the consent of that person, until after the person has been permanently released to the armed forces by a State or foreign country referred to in that paragraph.

"(3) Paragraph (2) applies to a person subject to this chapter who—

"(A) while in the custody of a State or foreign country is temporarily returned by that State or foreign country to the armed forces for trial by court-martial; and

"(B) after the court-martial, is returned to that State or foreign country under the authority of a mutual agreement or treaty, as the case may be.

"(4) In this subsection, the term 'State' includes the District of Columbia and any Commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States.

"(5) In any case in which a court-martial sentences a person to confinement, but in which review of the case under section 867(a)(2) of this title (article 67(a)(2)) is pending, the Secretary concerned may defer further service of the sentence to confinement while that review is pending.

"(c) APPELLATE REVIEW.—(1) Appellate review is complete under this section when—

"(A) a review under section 865 of this title (article 65) is completed; or

"(B) an appeal is filed with a Court of Criminal Appeals or the sentence includes death, and review is completed by a Court of Criminal Appeals and—

"(i) the time for the accused to file a petition for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has expired and the accused has not filed a timely petition for such review and the case is not otherwise under review by that Court;

"(ii) such a petition is rejected by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces; or

"(iii) review is completed in accordance with the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and—

"(I) a petition for a writ of certiorari is not filed within the time limits prescribed by the Supreme Court;

"(II) such a petition is rejected by the Supreme Court; or

"(III) review is otherwise completed in accordance with the judgment of the Supreme Court.

"(2) The completion of appellate review shall constitute a final judgment as to the legality of the proceedings.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Subchapter VIII of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking section 857a (article 57a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(2) Subchapter IX of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking section 871 (article 71 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(3) The second sentence of subsection (a)(1) of section 858b of title 10, United States Code (article 58b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "section 857(a) of this title (article 57(a))" and inserting "section 857 of this title (article 57)".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 802(a) would consolidate Articles 57, 57a, and 71 into Article 57 (Effective date of sentences) to address in a single article the effective date for all punishments that could be adjudged at a court-martial. Article 57, as amended, would contain the following provisions:

Article 57(a) would establish when the punishment adjudged at a court-martial sentence becomes effective. The proposed subsection combines portions of Articles 57, 57a, and 71, and removes the distinction between when a sentence becomes effective and when it is ordered executed. With the exception of death and punitive discharges, sentences would be effective by operation of law without any additional approval upon entry of judgment. This is a conforming change to the proposed changes in Article 60 (Post-trial processing in general and special courts-martial) and the proposed enactment of Articles 60a (Limited authority to act on sentence in specified post-trial circumstances), 60b (Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial), and 60c (Entry of judgment).

Article 57(a)(1) would address when forfeitures and reduction become effective. The first sentence of this paragraph is taken without modification from Article 57(a)(3). The remainder of this paragraph is taken from Article 57(a)(1).

Article 57(a)(2) is taken, without change, from Article 57(b). Article 57(b) would be modified to apply only to summary courts-martial.

Article 57(a)(3) is taken, without change, from Article 71(a).

Article 57(a)(4) is taken, without change, from Article 71(b).

Article 57(a)(5) is taken from Article 71(c)(1) with modification. The provisions of Article 71(c)(1) regarding waiver or withdrawal of an appeal and the definition of what constitutes a final appeal are consolidated in subsection (c).

Article 57(a)(6) is taken from Article 57(c) with modification. As a conforming change to the proposal for Article 60c, in general and special courts-martial "entry of judgment" is substituted for "on the date ordered executed." See Section 904, infra. For consistency, a summary court-martial sentence would become effective when approved by the convening authority.

Article 57(b)(1) is a combination of Article 57(a)(2), authorizing the deferment of forfeitures and reduction, and Article 57a(a), authorizing the deferment of confinement. The definition of convening authority is taken from Article 57a(a). As a conforming change to the proposal for Article 60c, the deferment of a sentence would terminate upon entry of judgment.

Article 57(b)(2)-(4) are taken from Article 57a(b)(1)-(3), with no substantive changes.

Article 57(b)(5) is taken from Article 57a(c) with conforming changes to reflect the proposed new section, Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Section 904, infra.

Article 57(c)(1) is taken from Article 71(c)(1)-(2) with modification to reflect the proposal for an appeal of right. Under the revised language, appellate review would be complete when an Article 65 review is finished, or when the Court of Criminal Appeals has reviewed the case and any petition to a higher court for review has been addressed, or the time to petition higher courts has expired. Paragraph (2) incorporates the current provision in Article 71(c)(1) that the completion of appellate review is a final determination on the legality of the proceedings.

Section 802(b) contains conforming amendments to strike Articles 57a and 71 and an additional conforming amendment to Article 58b.

Article 58 – Execution of Confinement
10 U.S.C. § 858

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 58. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 58.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 58 concerns the execution of confinement of members who have been found guilty and sentenced to confinement. Article 58 is a permissive article, allowing a sentence of confinement to be executed in any military confinement facility, any penal or correctional facility of the United States, or in any facility that the United States is allowed to use. Under the statute, the Service Secretaries are authorized to provide additional instructions on the execution of confinement. Article 58 specifies that an accused's military status does not relieve him or her from the same discipline as other persons confined in the same institution. Under Article 58(b), "[t]he omission of the words 'hard labor' from any sentence of a court-martial adjudging confinement does not deprive the authority executing that sentence of the power to require hard labor as a part of the punishment."

3. Historical Background

Congress enacted Article 58 as part of the original UCMJ in 1950.[1] The article was derived from Articles 37 and 42 of the Articles of War, and Article 7 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy, which allowed flexibility in the places of confinement for an accused in order to maximize rehabilitative potential.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current practice, if a military confinement facility is not available, the Department of Defense specifically allows for military prisoners to be confined in civilian facilities used by the U.S. Marshals Service. If a facility used by the U.S. Marshals Service is not available, then a facility accredited by the American Correctional Association or by the State in which the prisoner is to be confined may be used.[3]

In 2005, the Defense Base Closure and Realignment Commission (BRAC) recommended the reduction and realignment of a number of military confinement facilities to create five Joint Regional Correctional Facilities.[4] The closure of many local facilities created a logistical difficulty on bases located long distances from any of the regional confinement facilities. As a result, most services contract with civilian confinement facilities when there is not a nearby military facility.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Attorney General controls and manages. Federal penal and correctional institutions outside of military and naval institutions.[6] For the purpose of providing suitable quarters for the safekeeping, care and subsistence of prisoners, the Attorney General can contract with the proper authorities of any State, Territory, or political subdivision for the imprisonment, subsistence, care, and proper employment of prisoners.[7] If there are no suitable or sufficient facilities available in a State, Territory, or political subdivision, the Attorney General can order the creation of a new place of confinement.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 58: No change to Article 58.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 58's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 58a – Sentences: Reduction in Enlisted Grade upon Approval

10 U.S.C. § 858a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would sunset this article when the sentencing parameters and criteria established under the proposal for Article 56 take effect.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 58a provides a mechanism to order a reduction of enlisted members to the grade of E-1 whenever the approved sentence of a court-martial includes a punitive discharge, confinement, or hard labor without confinement, irrespective of whether the adjudged and approved sentence includes a reduction to that grade.

3. Historical Background

Congress enacted Article 58a in 1960, requiring automatic reduction in grade by law unless otherwise provided for in service regulations.[1] The precursor to Article 58a was paragraph 126(e) of the 1951 Manual for Courts Martial, which required that an enlisted member be reduced to the lowest pay grade upon receiving a sentence that included a punitive discharge, confinement, or hard labor without confinement.[2] In 1959, in United States v. Simpson, the Court of Military Appeals held that the Manual provision operated improperly to increase the sentence of courts-martial.[3] The Comptroller General disagreed with the court's decision and directed servicemembers to be paid at the reduced grade.[4] To resolve the dispute, Congress enacted Article 58a, which has remained unchanged since its enactment in 1960.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The Service Secretaries have taken different approaches in exercising their authority under Article 58a. The Air Force and Coast Guard Secretaries have essentially exempted their services from automatic reduction in pay grade. Regardless of whether a punitive discharge was approved or the length of confinement approved by the convening authority, an enlisted member in the Air Force or Coast Guard will be reduced in pay grade only if a reduction was part of the adjudged sentence.[6] Under Army regulations, an accused is reduced to pay grade E-1 whenever the approved sentence includes a punitive discharge or confinement in excess of six months.[7] And in the Navy and Marine Corps, automatic reduction to E-1 is triggered by the convening authority's approval of three months or more confinement or a punitive discharge, but is at the discretion of the convening authority.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

A reduction in rank or status based on the sentence awarded at a trial is unique to the military, with no civilian counterpart. The most comparable provision in federal civilian practice is a provision of the U.S. Code that specifies a conviction for certain specified offenses results in forfeiture of civilian retirement pay.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 58a: Amend Article 58a by sunsetting the statute after the implementation of the proposed changes to Article 56 punishments.

This proposal is consistent with the accompanying proposals for judge-alone sentencing (Article 53) and the requirement for sentencing parameters and criteria (Article 56). The goal of these related proposals is to improve military sentencing by giving the decision making authority to judges, providing the sentencing judges with objective standards through sentencing parameters and criteria.

Currently, the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps impose automatic reduction to pay grade E-1 based upon two different standards, and the Air Force and the Coast Guard do not impose automatic reduction to pay grade E-1 at all. Eliminating Article 58a would address the substantial discrepancies between the services' different approaches to automatic reductions.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by applying provisions uniformly across the Services to the extent practicable.

SEC. 803. SENTENCE OF REDUCTION IN ENLISTED GRADE.

Section 858a of title 10, United States Code (article 58a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) by striking "as approved by the convening authority" and inserting "as set forth in the judgment of the court-martial entered into the record under section 860c of this title (article 60c)"; and

(B) in the matter after paragraph (3), by striking "of that approval" and inserting "on which the judgment is so entered"; and

(2) in subsection (b), by striking "disapproved, or, as finally approved" and inserting "reduced, or, as finally affirmed".

SEC. 804. REPEAL OF SENTENCE REDUCTION PROVISION WHEN PARAMETERS TAKE EFFECT.

Effective on the effective date of sentencing parameters prescribed by the President under section 856 of title 10, United States Code (article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 801, section 858a of title 10, United States Code (article 58a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is repealed.

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 803 would amend Article 58a (Sentences: reduction in enlisted grade upon approval), which provides a mechanism for the individual services to order a reduction of enlisted members to the grade of E-1 whenever the approved sentence of a court-martial includes a punitive discharge, confinement, or hard labor without confinement. The amendments would conform the statute to the changes proposed in post-trial procedure under Article 60 and the proposed Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Section 904, infra.

Section 804 would sunset Article 58a after the enactment of sentencing parameters and criteria under Article 56. This sunset provision is consistent with the proposals for judge-alone sentencing under Article 53 and for sentencing parameters and criteria under Article 56. See Sections 716 and 801, supra. The sentencing parameters and criteria proposed in Section 801 would include objective factors for the military judge to consider in determining whether a sentence should include a reduction in pay grade.

Article 58b – Sentences: Forfeiture of Pay and Allowances During Confinement

10 U.S.C. § 858b

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 58b. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 58b.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 58b provides for forfeiture of pay and allowances due during any period of confinement or parole for certain categories of courts-martial sentences. Sentences subject to forfeiture include death, confinement for more than six months, or confinement of six months or less combined with a punitive discharge or dismissal. The extent of the forfeitures differs depending upon the court-martial forum. In general courts-martial, the statute requires all pay and allowances to be forfeited. In special courts-martial, two-thirds of all pay due must be forfeited. If the accused has dependents, the person exercising Article 60 authority may waive any or all of the forfeitures of pay and allowances for up to six months. The money from the waived forfeitures will be paid directly to the dependents. If the sentence of an accused who forfeits pay and allowances is set aside or disapproved, or if the sentence approved does not trigger automatic forfeitures, the accused will receive the previously forfeited money.

3. Historical Background

Article 58b was enacted in 1996 and, with the exception of two minor amendments, has not been changed since then.[1] The statute was a response to Congressional concern that some military servicemembers continued to receive active duty pay and allowances while serving extended prison sentences.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, the Article 60 authority (normally the convening authority) can act on a request for waiver of automatic forfeitures at any time prior to or at the time of action. A request for a waiver is a common term in pretrial agreements for an accused with dependents. Absent a deferment or waiver, automatic forfeitures go into effect fourteen days after the sentence is adjudged or when the convening authority takes action, whichever occurs first.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although the concept of forfeiture of property is present in federal civilian practice,[3] the concept of automatic forfeitures as a collateral consequence of an awarded sentence is a predominantly military-specific concept.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 58b: No change to Article 58b.

In view of the policy considerations that led to the statutory requirements for forfeiture of pay during specified periods of confinement, and the well-developed case law addressing Article 58b, no statutory change is needed.

Subchapter IX. Post-Trial Procedure and Review of Courts-Martial

Article 59 – Error of Law; Lesser Included Offense
10 U.S.C. § 859

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 59. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 59.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 59(a) provides that "[a] finding or sentence of court-martial may not be held incorrect on the ground of an error of law unless the error materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused." Article 59(b) provides that "[a]ny reviewing authority with the power to approve or affirm a finding of guilty may approve or affirm, instead, so much of the finding as includes a lesser included offense."

3. Historical Background

Article 59(a) was derived from Article 37 of the Articles of War and Section 472 of Navy Courts and Boards, and is intended to preclude reversals "for minor technical errors that do not prejudice the rights of the accused."[1] The committee drafting the original UCMJ noted in particular the statement in Section 472 of the Navy Courts and Boards manual requiring that "[i]f there has been no miscarriage of justice, the finding of the court should not be set aside or a new trial granted because of technical errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the accused." Article 59(b) was derived from Articles 47 and 49 of the Articles of War and Article 39 of the proposed Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] and the 1951 Manual for Courts-Martial provided guidance incorporating the federal harmless error rule then in effect, based on the Supreme Court's opinion in Kotteakos v. United States.[4]

In addition to harmless error review, military appellate courts embrace the concept of plain error on appeal.[5] The military courts commonly cite to federal law when reviewing for plain error, while acknowledging the constraints of Article 59(a).[6] For example, in 1951, the Court of Military Appeals looked to the federal plain-error rule in assessing a trial error asserted for the first time on appeal:

> We adopt and follow the rule announced by the federal courts in those cases where error is asserted for the first time on appeal. . . . The admitted normal rule is that an appellate court will not consider matters which are alleged as error for the first time on appeal. . . . However, an exception exists in criminal cases where the alleged error would result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, or would 'seriously affect the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings.'[7]

In 1998, in United States v. Powell, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces explained that, although Courts of Criminal Appeals may notice otherwise forfeited errors, they are constrained by Article 59(a), because they may not reverse for legal error unless the error "materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused."[8]

4. Contemporary Practice

Military appellate courts test errors under both "harmless error" and "plain error" standards of review, depending on whether the error was raised at trial or noticed for the first time on appeal. The standard for demonstrating harmlessness may vary, depending on whether the type of error being assessed is a constitutional error or a non-constitutional error.[9] These standards of review largely track with federal appellate standards of review, with some variation due to the language of Article 59(a) and the unique appellate authority of the military Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66(c). Article 59(a) limits the appellate court's authority to reverse a finding or sentence for an error of law unless the

the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 84 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1065, 1066 (1994) (citing FED. R. CRIM. P. 52(b) advisory committee's note). As early as 1896, the Supreme Court recognized that "if a plain error was committed in a matter so absolutely vital to defendants, we feel ourselves at liberty to correct it, even though the defendants in the case had not 'duly excepted' to the error at trial." Wilborg v. United States, 163 U.S. 632, 658 (1896). Forty years later, the Court reaffirmed that, "in exceptional circumstances, especially in criminal cases, appellate courts . . . may . . . notice errors to which no exception has been taken, if the errors are obvious, or if they otherwise seriously affect the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings. United States v. Atkinson, 297 U.S. 157, 160 (1936). Eventually, the federal common law on plain error was codified in FED. R. CRIM. P. 52(b).

Stringer, 16 C.M.R. 68, 72-3 (C.M.A. 1954) (applying Atkinson plain error test to consider whether the error, alleged for the first time on appeal, would "seriously affect the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings.").

error "materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused."[10] Accordingly, when conducting plain error review, military appellate courts have articulated a three-part test. An appellant has the burden of demonstrating: (1) that there is error; (2) that the error is plain or obvious; and (3) that the error materially prejudiced a substantial right of the accused."[11]

The President has implemented Article 59, in part, through M.R.E. 103(a).[12] This rule provides that error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless the ruling "materially prejudices a substantial right of the party" and a timely objection was made. M.R.E. 103(a) was adapted from the corresponding federal rule of evidence, with the exception that the military rule requires that the ruling "materially prejudices a substantial right," whereas the federal rule requires that the error "affects a substantial right."[13] The formulation of the harmless error language in M.R.E. 103(a) is required by Article 59(a).[14]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The federal standards for harmless error and plain error review are articulated in Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a) and (b), and are similar to military standards of review under Article 59. Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a) provides: "Any error, defect, irregularity, or variance that does not affect substantial rights must be disregarded."[15] Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b) provides: "A plain error that affects substantial rights may be considered even though it was not brought to the court's attention." These rules are restatements of the common law. The meanings of "harmless error" and "plain error" are not defined in the rules, but have developed through the case law.

Currently, the federal courts articulate "plain error" slightly differently than in military appellate practice. In federal civilian appellate practice, plain error doctrine allows, but does not require, an appellate court to correct an error not raised at trial only when the appellant demonstrates that: (1) there is error; (2) the error is clear or obvious; (3) the error affected the appellant's substantial rights; and (4) the error seriously affects the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings.[16] In United States v.

Dominguez Benitez, the Supreme Court further refined the plain-error test for a guilty-plea case, stating that relief for Rule 11 error must be tied to prejudicial effect.[17] Under the test, in order to demonstrate that an error affected substantial rights, the appellant must show that the error had a prejudicial effect on the outcome of a judicial proceeding. The Court held that "a defendant who seeks reversal of his conviction after a guilty plea, on the ground that the . . . court committed plain error under Rule 11 . . . must show a reasonable probability that, but for the error, he would not have entered the guilty plea."[18]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 59: No change to Article 59.

Litigation in the military justice system concerning review for error takes place in the context of a well-developed and evolving area of law. To the extent that specific aspects of military justice practice need a particular formula for identifying and addressing error, those matters will be addressed in the statutes and rules governing the specific substantive or procedural issues involved. For example, the accompanying proposal to amend Article 45 (Pleas of the accused) would codify harmless error review for guilty pleas. As part of a larger effort to improve the effectiveness of appellate review in the military, that proposal would apply harmless error review to deviations from the requirements of the guilty plea inquiry that were properly preserved at trial. It also would encourage the accused to identify errors in the guilty plea process and bring them to the attention of the trial judge to correct, rather than raise such errors for the first time on appeal and face the more stringent plain error review.

In addition, Part II of the Report will propose two new plain error rules for the Manual for Courts-Martial. It will consider including a broadly-applicable rule for plain error, similar to Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b), with language appropriate to the military justice system, and will also consider including a new sentence addressing plain error in R.C.M. 910(j), regarding errors in guilty plea inquiries that are not brought to the attention of the trial judge prior to entry of judgment.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to federal criminal trials insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 59(b) authorizes a reviewing authority to affirm a lesser included offense to a finding of guilty.

Article 60 (Current Law) – Action by the Convening Authority &
Articles 60a, 60b, and 60c (New Provisions)
10 U.S.C. §§ 860-60c

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 60 (Action by the convening authority), retitling that provision as "Post-trial processing," and would create three new provisions—Article 60a (Limited authority to act on sentence in specified post-trial circumstances); Article 60b (Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial); and Article 60c (Entry of judgment). These provisions would align the convening authority's post-trial review responsibilities with current law and with this Report's proposed changes to related statutory provisions. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 60 and the proposed new statutory provisions in Articles 60a, 60b, and 60c.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Legislation enacted by Congress in 2013 significantly altered the convening authority's post-trial role under Article 60.[1] Prior to the 2013 legislation, a convening authority possessed virtually unlimited power to disapprove or modify the findings and sentence of a general or special court-martial.

Under the recently revised statute, the convening authority cannot set aside or modify the findings as to any offense unless the offense meets all four of the following criteria: (1) the authorized maximum period of confinement that could have been adjudged in the case must not exceed two years; (2) the sentence adjudged in the case must not include confinement for more than six months; (3) the sentence adjudged in the case must not include a punitive discharge; and (4) the offense must not be a violation of Articles 120(a)-(b), 120b, 125 or any such other offense the Secretary of Defense may specify by regulation. In all other cases, Congress has removed the convening authority's power to disapprove or modify the findings.

In the revised statute, Congress also removed the convening authority's power to disapprove or modify a punitive discharge, or disapprove or modify a sentence to confinement for more than six months, subject to two narrow exceptions: (1) the convening authority still maintains the authority to reduce a sentence pursuant to a pretrial agreement; and (2) upon recommendation by the trial counsel, the convening authority may reduce the sentence of the accused if the accused provided substantial assistance in the investigation or prosecution of another person. As a practical matter, these results have reduced the scope of the convening authority's discretion to acting only on a narrow range of punishments, such as forfeitures, reductions, fines, and confinement for six months or less.

3. Historical Background

Historically, the convening authority's post-trial role in courts-martial has been both executive and quasi-judicial. Prior to the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950, the judgment and sentence of a court-martial was "incomplete and inconclusive, being in the nature of a recommendation only" to the military commander who convened the court-martial.[2] The commander's authority to disapprove or approve in whole or in part the findings and sentence was a matter wholly within the commander's discretion.[3]

Under Article 60 of the UCMJ, as enacted in 1950, the convening authority retained broad authority to modify the findings and sentence so long as the modification did not increase the findings or sentence.[4] The convening authority thus initiated the court-martial (by convening the court and referring charges under Article 34), and terminated it (by taking action on the case under Article 60). In this regard, Article 60 served several important purposes. First, it required prompt reporting to the convening authority of the results of the court-martial to facilitate a timely review. Second, it provided an accused with an opportunity to submit matters for consideration by the convening authority. Third, in many cases it provided for the first-level review by a legal officer (typically the convening authority's staff judge advocate). Fourth, it provided the convening authority with broad discretion to modify the findings or the sentence for legal errors, unjust findings, onerous sentences, or as an act of clemency.[5] Fifth, it required the convening authority to take action on the sentence to effectuate the findings and sentence. Sixth, it empowered the convening authority to order proceedings in revision or rehearings to correct apparent errors or omissions, or improper action by the court-martial with respect to the findings and sentence that could be rectified without material prejudice to accused's substantial rights. Seventh, the convening authority's action terminated the court-martial and transferred the case for appellate review.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current practice, after the announcement of sentence, the military judge authenticates the record of trial for general and special courts-martial pursuant to R.C.M.

[5] In 1983, Congress removed the requirement for the convening authority to conduct a legal review or otherwise act as an "appellate tribunal," but retained the convening authority's power to modify the findings and sentence as a matter of "command prerogative." S. REP. NO. 98-53, at 7, 19, 21 (1983).

1104. Under this rule, trial counsel serves a copy of the record of trial on the accused, who may submit matters to the convening authority for consideration prior to taking action. In cases involving a victim, the victim may submit matters to the convening authority. The staff judge advocate also must make a recommendation to the convening authority for all general courts-martial and any special court-martial case that includes a punitive discharge or confinement for one year or more. The accused has an opportunity to respond to the staff judge advocate recommendation. As noted above, under the recent amendments to Article 60, the convening authority does not have the power to take any substantive action based upon these submissions except in a limited number of cases involving relatively light sentences. The convening authority's "action" on the court-martial terminates the convening authority's ability to order new trials and proceedings in revision, and transfers jurisdiction of the case to the appellate system, for review under either Article 64 (Review by a judge advocate), Article 69 (Review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General), or Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals), depending on the type of court-martial involved and the severity of the sentence.

Although the NDAA FY 2014 amendments substantially reduced the convening authority's power over all but a limited set of cases, the legislation did not revise the comprehensive and time-consuming post-trial process that had been used to inform the discretion previously exercised by the convening authority. As a result, the recent modifications have created some anomalies in the application of Article 60's statutory requirements. For example, the staff judge advocate recommendation is not required under the statute for many cases in which the convening authority's power to act on the qualifying offense was retained; on the other hand, the statute continues to require a staff judge advocate's recommendation in many cases where the convening authority no longer has the power to modify the findings or a sentence of confinement or punitive discharge.[6] Additionally, some cases are now too serious to qualify for discretionary relief from the convening authority under Article 60, but are not serious enough to qualify for automatic appellate review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals.[7]

[6] In special courts-martial, if the sentence includes a bad-conduct discharge, the staff judge advocate must provide a written recommendation to the convening authority providing advice on the disposition of the case. This written advice is served on the accused, who has an opportunity to respond; the staff judge advocate often then writes an addendum to incorporate issues raised by the accused. However, no written advice is required under Article 60 for special courts-martial that do not involve a bad-conduct discharge. After the recent amendments to Article 60, the convening authority cannot modify the sentence in any case involving a punitive discharge or confinement for more than six months, and can modify the findings in only a limited class of cases constituting relatively minor offenses. Accordingly, in many special courts-martial, written legal advice to the convening authority is required under Article 60 when the convening authority cannot modify the findings or sentence, and no written advice is required when the convening authority has substantial discretion to do so.

[7] This is the result of the intersection of qualifying offenses under Articles 60, and the requirements under Article 66 to qualify for appellate review. These cases fall into one of two categories: (1) cases in which the confinement adjudged was for six months or less, no punitive discharge was awarded, but the offense was punishable by more than two years of confinement; and (2) cases in which the accused was sentenced to between six and twelve months of confinement, and did not receive a punitive discharge.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 60 has no direct counterpart in federal civilian practice. The closest approximation to the convening authority's role in "approving" the findings and sentence of a court-martial is the "entry of judgment" under Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(k). That rule describes the entry of judgment in federal cases as follows:

> In the judgment of conviction, the court must set forth the plea, the jury verdict or the court's findings, the adjudication, and the sentence. If the defendant is found not guilty or is otherwise entitled to be discharged, the court must so order. The judge must sign the judgment, and the clerk must enter it.

The entry of judgment is the tool by which the jurisdiction of the district court terminates and the case may be appealed. The time of entry of judgment fixes the time within which an appeal may be taken.

With respect to suspending a sentence, federal district court judges have broad authority to place a defendant on supervised release.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 60.1: Clarify and streamline the statutes governing post-trial processing of courts-martial.

This proposal would revise Article 60, creating three new articles and dividing the convening authority's post-trial powers among these articles.

Article 60. This proposal would amend Article 60 to provide for prompt forwarding of trial results to the parties, any victim, and the convening authority. As amended, Article 60 also would establish the authority for post-trial hearings to address any motions that may arise after the trial adjourns.

Article 60a. The proposed Article 60a would—

Retain the current prohibition on the convening authority to disapprove, commute, suspend, or modify a punitive discharge or a sentence to confinement if the total confinement running consecutively in the case exceeds six months;

Retain the convening authority's limited power to modify the remaining parts of an adjudged sentence in every case—including, for example, fines, forfeitures, reductions in rank, reprimands, and hard labor without confinement;

Provide the convening authority in all cases with a new limited authority to suspend a sentence of confinement or a punitive discharge upon a recommendation of the military judge (discussed below under Recommendation 60.2); and

[8] 18 U.S.C. §3583(a).

Preserve the convening authority's current authority in any case to reduce a sentence when an accused provides substantial assistance to the government (with a clarifying adjustment to the applicable time frame, discussed below under Recommendation 60.3).

Article 60b. This article would preserve the convening authority's discretion to act on the findings and sentence in a narrowly limited class of cases.

In all summary courts-martial, the convening authority would have the power to act on the findings and sentence. In view of the nature of a summary court-martial—a proceeding in which a judge does not preside and the accused does not have the right to counsel—the opportunity for corrective action by the convening authority is particularly important.

In addition, this proposal would maintain the convening authority's current discretion to act on the findings and sentence in general and special courts-martial in which: (1) the adjudged sentence does not include a punitive discharge; (2) the total of all confinement running consecutively does not exceed six months; (3) the maximum possible confinement that may be adjudged for any offense is two years or less; and (4) the adjudged offenses do not include Article 120(a)–(b), 120b, 125, or any other offense designated by the Secretary of Defense.

Article 60c. This Article would establish a new requirement for the military judge to make an entry of judgment into the record of trial in every case. This proposal is discussed in more detail below under Recommendation 60.5.

Recommendation 60.2: Under the proposed Article 60a, provide a limited authority to suspend sentences in cases where the military judge recommends suspension and the convening authority acts within the scope of the military judge's recommendation.

The NDAA FY 2014 amendments removed the convening authority's discretion to suspend a sentence of confinement for more than six months or a punitive discharge, with two exceptions: (1) upon recommendation of the trial counsel in recognition of substantial assistance by the accused in the investigation or prosecution of another person who has committed an offense; and (2) when called for in a pretrial agreement.

Because military judges lack suspension authority, these changes have created a gap in the military justice system: Neither the judge nor the convening authority may suspend a punitive discharge or sentence to confinement for more than six months. Suspensions, however, may be appropriate in limited circumstances where the armed forces have invested substantially in training a servicemember, the member has committed misconduct warranting a period of confinement, and the member has demonstrated rehabilitative potential.

This proposal would provide a limited authority for suspension, but only in circumstances when a military judge recommends in writing that part of a sentence be suspended, and the convening authority determines that a period of suspension, not to exceed the suspension recommendation of the military judge, would be warranted. Under this proposal, a suspended sentence would require the concurrence of the military judge (who sentenced the accused and saw the evidence) and the convening authority (whose act of suspension may allow the accused to return to the unit).

Recommendation 60.3: Under the proposed Article 60a, provide an expanded timeframe within which a convening authority can modify a sentence for an accused who provides substantial assistance in another case.

The current power of the convening authority to reduce a sentence for substantial assistance generally terminates when the convening authority acts on the case under Article 60. That is, an accused who provides assistance after he is sentenced for his own crimes may only be eligible for relief until convening authority action—a relatively short time period for the accused to notify the government of the ability to assist, provide the assistance in a separate prosecution or investigation, and then seek relief from the convening authority. An accused who is unable to assist the government until after convening authority action—for example, by becoming aware of evidence only after convening authority action—currently cannot receive relief under Article 60.

This proposal would extend the convening authority's timeframe to reduce the sentence of an accused who assists the government in prosecuting or investigating another person. Under this proposal, the authority to grant sentencing relief would not be triggered until the accused's provision of substantial assistance, encouraging timely cooperation by an accused. Part II of this Report will propose rules implementing this provision modeled on Fed. R. Crim. P. 35(b).

Recommendation 60.4: Streamline post-trial administrative requirements to match the changes to the convening authority's post-trial powers.

This proposal would revise post-trial procedural requirements to reflect the recent legislation that has substantially reduced the convening authority's power to modify the findings and sentence in most cases. The recent modifications to Article 60 reduced the convening authority's power in the post-trial process, but did not modify post-trial administrative requirements, which were developed at a time when the convening authority had broad power to modify the findings and sentence in every case.

This proposal would eliminate the requirement for a Staff Judge Advocate Recommendation and update the current requirement in Article 60 regarding the submission of matters by the accused and victim. Part II of this Report will propose flexible rules governing post-trial legal advice to the convening authority and will continue the current provisions for the accused and victim to submit matters to the convening authority.

This proposal would eliminate the requirement for the convening authority to take action in every special and general court-martial. Under the proposal, the military judge will be notified either that the convening authority has taken a specific action in the case or that the convening authority will not act on the case.

Part II of this Report will propose changes to the implementing rules to include eliminating the requirement for the preparation of written, authenticated transcripts prior to post-trial processing.

Recommendation 60.5: Require the military judge to make an "entry of judgment" to reflect the results of the court-martial as part of the proposed Article 60c.

Under this proposal, the military judge would enter the judgment of the court-martial into the record of trial. The entry of judgment would include the findings and sentence, and would incorporate any relevant terms of a plea agreement. In cases where the convening authority modifies the findings or sentence under Articles 60a or 60b, the entry of judgment would incorporate the convening authority's action. The entry of judgment would terminate the court-martial at the trial level.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to federal court insofar as practicable in military practice, and by ensuring that the court-martial process appropriately balances the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces generally with procedures designed to ensure protection of rights that are provided under military law.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by enhancing efficiency during the post-trial phase of the court-martial process.

This proposal is related to the proposed creation of Article 53a (Plea Agreements) and the proposed amendments to Article 54 (Record of Trial).

SEC. 903. POST-TRIAL ACTIONS IN SUMMARY COURTS-MARTIAL AND CERTAIN GENERAL AND SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Subchapter IX of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 860a (article 60a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 902, the following new section (article):

SEC. 904. ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

"(B) Any modifications of, or supplements to, the Statement of Trial Results by reason of—

"(i) any post-trial action by the convening authority; or

"(B) made available to the public.

"(b) SUMMARY COURT-MARTIAL JUDGMENT.—The findings and sentence of a summary court-martial, as modified by any post-trial action by the convening authority under section 860b of this title (article 60b), constitutes the judgment of the court-martial and shall be recorded and distributed under rules prescribed by the President.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Sections 901-904 concern post-trial processing and post-trial action by the convening authority. These processes are currently prescribed under Article 60 (Action by the convening authority). These sections would amend Article 60 of the UCMJ in its entirety.

Section 901 would amend Article 60 to provide for the distribution of the trial results and to authorize the filing of post-trial motions with the military judge in general and special courts-martial. The convening authority's role in post-trial processing would be moved to new Articles 60a and 60b. See Sections 902-903, infra. Article 60, as amended, would include the following provisions:

Article 60(a) would require the military judge to immediately enter into the record the Statement of Trial Results, consisting of the pleas of the accused, the findings and sentence of the court-martial, and any other information required by the President. The statute would require that copies be provided to the convening authority, the accused, and any victim of any offense. The statement of trial results would serve as the basis for the entry of judgment under Article 60c.

Article 60(b) would require the President to establish rules governing submission of post-trial motions to the military judge. The implementing rules would establish filing deadlines for the parties and provide explicit authority for the military judge and convening authority to direct post-trial hearings when necessary to address allegations of legal error. The authority to order post-trial hearings would replace the previous authority to order proceedings in revision. See Article 60(f)(1)-(2).

Section 902 would create a new section, Article 60a (Limited authority to act on sentence in specified post-trial circumstances), which would retain current limitations on the convening authority's post-trial actions in most general and special courts-martial, subject to a narrowly limited suspension authority under Article 60a(c) and a revised authority related to substantial assistance under Article 60a(d). Article 60a, as proposed, would contain the following provisions:

Article 60a(a)-(b) would retain and clarify existing limitations on the convening authority's post-trial actions in general and special courts-martial in which: (1) the maximum sentence of confinement for any offense is more than two years; (2) adjudged confinement exceeds six months; (3) the sentence includes dismissal or discharge; or (4) the accused is found guilty of designated sex-related offenses. Under current law, the convening authority in such cases is prohibited from modifying the findings of the court-martial, or reducing, commuting, or suspending a punishment of death, confinement of more than six months, or a punitive discharge.

Article 60a(c) would provide a limited suspension authority in specified circumstances. For the convening authority to exercise this authority, the military judge would be required to make a specific suspension recommendation in the Statement of Trial Results. The suspension authority under subsection (c) would be limited to punishments of confinement in excess of six months and punitive discharges.

Article 60a(d) would retain, with clarifying amendments, the key features of current law with respect to the convening authority's power to reduce the sentence of an accused who assists in the prosecution or investigation of another person. As amended, the President may prescribe rules providing for a convening authority to exercise this power after entry of judgment. This provision is designed to allow for the reduction of a sentence of an accused who provides substantial assistance in the prosecution of another person, even well after his own trial is over and appellate review is complete. The implementing rules will be modeled on Fed. R. Crim. P. 35(b).

Article 60a(e) would allow the accused and a victim of the offense to submit matters to the convening authority for consideration. The implementing rules would establish the timelines for submitting matters under this subsection and procedures for responding to submissions. The implementing rules also would require the accused and victim to have a copy or access to the recording of the open sessions of the court-martial and admitted unsealed exhibits.

Article 60a(f) would require the decision of the convening authority to be forwarded to the military judge. If the convening authority modified the sentence of the court-martial, the convening authority would be required to explain the reasons for the modification. An explanation for the convening authority's decision would only be required when the convening authority modifies the sentence. No approval of the findings or sentence would be required. The decision of the convening authority would be forwarded to the military judge, who would incorporate any change in the sentence into the entry of judgment. In a case where the accused provides substantial assistance under subsection (d) and a designated convening authority reduces the sentence of the accused after entry of judgment, the convening authority's action would be forwarded to the chief trial judge, who would be responsible for ensuring appropriate modification of the entry of judgment.

Because a modification might happen during or after the completion of appellate review, the modified entry of judgment would be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General for appropriate action.

Section 903 would create a new section, Article 60b (Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial). The new section would retain and clarify the convening authority's post-trial authorities and responsibilities with respect to the findings and sentence of a court-martial not covered by subsection (a)(2) of new Article 60a. This post-trial authority would be available in summary courts-martial and a limited number of general and special courts-martial which, because of the offenses charged and the sentence adjudged, would not be covered under Article 60a. Consistent with existing law, the convening authority in such cases would be authorized to act on the findings and the sentence, and could order rehearings, subject to certain limitations. The procedural requirements under Article 60b, to include consideration of matters submitted by the accused and victim, would be the same as those provided in Article 60a. In summary courts-martial, the convening authority would be required to act on the sentence, and would have discretion to act on the findings, as under current law.

Section 904 would create a new section, Article 60c (Entry of judgment). The entry of judgment would require the military judge to enter the judgment of the court-martial into the record in all general and special courts-martial, and would mark the conclusion of trial proceedings. The judgment would reflect the Statement of Trial Results, any action by the convening authority on the findings or sentence, and any post-trial rulings by the military judge. The judgment also would indicate the time when the accused's case becomes eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66, or for review by the Judge Advocate General under Article 65. This requirement for an entry of judgment is modeled after Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(k). The findings and sentence of a summary court-martial, as modified by any post-trial action by the convening authority under Article 60b, would constitute the judgment of the court-martial.

Article 61 – Waiver or Withdrawal of Appeal
10 U.S.C. § 861

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would make conforming changes to Article 61 to align it with proposed revisions to Articles 60, 65, and 69, as well as the proposal to enact a new Article 60c (Entry of judgment). This proposal also would modify references in Article 61 to Articles 66 and 69, to conform the statute to proposed changes to those articles and to the appellate process generally. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 61 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 61 provides that an accused may file a statement with the convening authority after he or she takes action expressly waiving the right to appellate review under Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals) or Article 69 (Review by the Office of the Judge Advocate General), unless the approved sentence includes death. The waiver must be signed by both the accused and defense counsel, and must be filed within 10 days after the accused is served with a copy of the convening authority's action under Article 60(c). The convening authority may extend this timeline for good cause for not more than 30 days. In addition, an accused may withdraw an appeal at any time, unless the approved sentence includes death.

3. Historical Background

Before 1983, appellate review could not be waived. In the Military Justice Act of 1983, Congress provided a narrow timeframe during which an accused could waive appellate review in non-capital cases.[1] Congress enacted this provision to "accommodate convicted servicemembers who were eager to be separated immediately—albeit, with a punitive discharge—and whose continued retention in the service hindered the military mission."[2] The waiver could be filed only within a 10-day period after the convening authority acted and the action was served on the accused or defense counsel.[3] The mandatory delay in waiving appellate review until after the convening authority's action provided the accused time to reflect on the consequences of the conviction and sentence, as approved by the convening authority, before weighing grounds to appeal, and to ensure that the court-martial produces "an accurate result and not merely one that an accused is willing to accept."[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 61 through R.C.M. 1110, which provides additional rules and procedures concerning waiver and withdrawal from appellate review, including the right to counsel, the form and effect of waivers and withdrawals, and the applicable time limits for submission by the accused. Waiver of and withdrawal from appellate review occurs infrequently in military practice. In accordance with case law addressing the statute and the implementing rules, in order for a waiver under Article 61 to be accepted, it must be accompanied by proof that it was voluntary after full advice from counsel.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 61 has no direct counterpart in federal civilian practice. In federal court, the accused must request appellate review by filing a notice of appeal.[6] There is no automatic appellate review, even in capital cases.[7] In civilian practice, "[t]he right to appeal can be waived in a plea agreement."[8] By way of comparison, Article 61 permits a waiver only after the convening authority approves the finding and sentence, and not as part of a plea agreement. Likewise, R.C.M. 705(c)(1)(B) prohibits any term or condition in a pretrial agreement that deprives the accused of the complete and effective exercise of post-trial and appellate rights. Given the unique pressures and circumstances of military life, the military system has retained the opportunity for appellate review "to ensure judicially that the accused's plea was provident, that the accused entered the plea agreement voluntarily, and that sentencing proceedings met acceptable standards."[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 61: Amend Article 61 to align the statute with proposed amendments to Articles 60, 65, and 69.

This is a conforming change only.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to federal courts insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 905. WAIVER OF RIGHT TO APPEAL AND WITHDRAWAL OF APPEAL.

Section 861 of title 10, United States Code (article 61 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§861. Art. 61. Waiver of right to appeal; withdrawal of appeal

"(a) WAIVER OF RIGHT TO APPEAL.—After entry of judgment in a general or special court-martial, under procedures prescribed by the Secretary concerned, the accused may waive the right to appeal. Such a waiver shall be —

"(1) signed by the accused and by defense counsel; and

"(2) attached to the record of trial.

"(b) WITHDRAWAL OF APPEAL.—In a general or special court-martial, the accused may withdraw an appeal at any time.

"(c) DEATH PENALTY CASE EXCEPTION.—Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b), an accused may not waive the right to appeal or withdraw an appeal with respect to a judgment that includes a sentence of death.

"(d) WAIVER OR WITHDRAWAL AS BAR.—A waiver or withdrawal under this section bars review under section 866 of this title (article 66).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 905 would amend Article 61, which provides that an accused may file a statement with the convening authority expressly waiving the right to appellate review under Article 66 or Article 69. The amendments would conform the statute to the changes proposed in Articles 60, 65, and 69 concerning post-trial processing. See Sections 901-904, supra; Sections 909, 913, infra.

Article 62 – Appeal by the United States
10 U.S.C. § 862

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align interlocutory appeals in the military more closely with federal civilian practice. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 62.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 62 provides a limited basis for government interlocutory appeals. Under the statute, such appeals generally are limited to: (1) cases that may award a punitive discharge; (2) dismissal of specifications; (3) rulings and orders dealing with classified information; and (4) the exclusion of key government evidence. Currently, there is no jurisdiction under Article 62 for the government to appeal a military judge's decision to set aside a panel's guilty verdict based on legally insufficient evidence.

3. Historical Background

In the Military Justice Act of 1983, Congress amended Article 62 to provide authority for interlocutory government appeals.[1] Congress based this statutory change on 18 U.S.C. § 3731, the statute applicable to the trial of criminal cases in the federal district courts, with the goal of "allow[ing] appeal by the government under procedures similar to an appeal by the United States in a federal civilian prosecution."[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 62 through R.C.M. 908, which provides the rules and procedures for government appeals. Under the rule, appeals are limited to courts-martial presided over by a military judge where a bad-conduct discharge could be adjudged.[3] Government appeals are limited to rulings and orders excluding key evidence, dismissing charges or specifications, or involving the protection of classified information.[4] After a military judge issues such a ruling, a trial counsel may request a 72-hour delay to decide whether to appeal the order.[5] To pursue an appeal, the trial counsel must file a notice of appeal with the judge within that same 72-hour period. An appeal cannot be taken for the purposes of delay. In general, notice of appeal stays the court-martial, with two exceptions. First, an appeal under Article 62 does not prohibit the military judge from addressing motions unrelated to the matter being appealed. Second, the affected charges may be severed under R.C.M. 906, or with the concurrence of all parties. The rule provides that the government shall diligently prosecute the appeal, and that the Court of Criminal Appeals shall prioritize the appeal over other issues if practical.[6]

5. Relationship to Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, government appeals are authorized under 18 U.S.C. § 3731. Although Article 62 is based upon this Title 18 provision, there are several differences between the two provisions. First, under Section 3731, the government may appeal the release of a defendant from confinement.[7] Such appeals must be taken within thirty days of the judge's determination and must be "diligently prosecuted." Second, the government may appeal a finding of not guilty under Section 3731 as long as there is no violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause (e.g. upon motion by the defense, the judge enters a finding of not guilty after the jury returns a guilty verdict).[8] Third, the Courts of Appeals are required to liberally construe the provisions in Section 3731 authorizing government interlocutory appeals.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 62.1: Amend Article 62 to authorize the government to appeal a decision that terminates the proceedings as to a specification, except in cases where such an appeal would violate Article 44's prohibitions on double jeopardy.

This proposal would provide for government appeals in the same manner as federal civilian practice. Consistent with that practice, it would authorize an appeal when, upon defense motion, the military judge sets aside a panel's finding of guilty because of legally insufficient evidence.

Recommendation 62.2: Amend Article 62 to align the rule of construction with the similar rule applicable to the interlocutory appeals in federal civilian courts.

[9] 18 U.S.C. § 3731 ("The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its purposes"). Article 62 does not contain a similar rule of construction. See, e.g., United States v. Wuterich, 67 M.J. 63, 74 (2008); United States v. Vargas, 74 M.J. 1 (2014).

The final sentence in 18 U.S.C. § 3731, which authorizes interlocutory appeals in federal civilian courts, states that "[t]he provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its purposes"[10] The federal civilian courts consider that rule of construction when interpreting provisions in Section 3731 that are similar to the provisions in Article 62. This proposal would better align Article 62 with the rule of construction applicable in federal civilian courts under 18 U.S.C. § 3731.

Recommendation 62.3: Amend Article 62 to conform to the proposed revisions to the review and appeal provisions under Articles 66 and 69.

Currently, the government may not file an interlocutory appeal in cases where a punitive discharge is not authorized. The prohibition on interlocutory appeals in cases where no punitive discharge may be adjudged reflects the fact that those cases were not entitled to appellate court review, except when certified by the Judge Advocate General.

This proposal amends Article 62 to eliminate the requirement that the court-martial must be able to adjudge a bad-conduct discharge as a jurisdictional prerequisite to filing an Article 62 appeal.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by: (1) employing the standards and procedures applicable to government interlocutory appeals in the federal civilian practice insofar as practicable in military criminal practice; (2) ensuring that the court-martial process appropriately balances the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces generally with procedures designed to ensure protection of rights that are provided under military law; (3) enhancing efficiency during the post-trial phase of the court-martial process; and (4) addressing ambiguities and inconsistencies among Article 62, its implementing rules, and the case law interpreting the statute concerning applicable rule of construction, thereby reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area.

Under the related provisions of Articles 66, the accused would have an opportunity to seek direct review of the findings in a case where the government had invoked interlocutory review under Article 62, including cases not otherwise eligible for direct review under Article 66. The Article 66 provision would ensure continuity in appellate review of a case.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 906. APPEAL BY THE UNITED STATES.

Section 862 of title 10, United States Code (article 62 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

[10] 18 U.S.C. § 3731.

(1) in paragraph (1) of subsection (a)—

(A) in the matter before subparagraph (A), by striking "court-martial" and all that follows through the colon at the end and inserting "general or special court-martial or in a pretrial proceeding under section 830a of this title (article 30a), the United States may appeal the following:"; and

(B) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(G) An order or ruling of the military judge entering a finding of not guilty with respect to a charge or specification following the return of a finding of guilty by the members.";

(2) in paragraph (2) of subsection (a)—

(A) by striking "(2)" and inserting "(2)(A)"; and

(B) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(B) An appeal of an order or ruling may not be taken when prohibited by section 844 of this title (article 44)."; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

"(d) The United States may appeal a ruling or order of a military magistrate in the same manner as had the ruling or order been made by a military judge, except that the issue shall first be presented to the military judge who designated the military magistrate or to a military judge detailed to hear the issue.

"(e) The provisions of this article shall be liberally construed to effect its purposes.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 906 concerns government interlocutory appeals. Presently, Article 62 provides a limited basis for government interlocutory appeals. This section would amend Article 62 to better align interlocutory appeals in the military with federal civilian practice, by authorizing an appeal when, upon defense motion, the military judge sets aside a panel's finding of guilty because of legally insufficient evidence. Additionally, the amendments would better align Article 62 with the rule of construction applicable to 18 U.S.C. § 3731, by directing military courts to liberally construe the statute's provisions to effect its purposes. As amended, the authority for interlocutory appeals under Article 62 would be extended to all general and special courts-martial, which would replace the current limitation authorizing such appeals only if the offense at issue carries the potential for a punitive discharge.

Article 63 – Rehearings
10 U.S.C. § 863

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 63 to align the sentencing limitations at a rehearing with federal civilian practice in two circumstances. First, if an accused at a rehearing has changed a prior plea of guilty to a plea of not guilty or otherwise has not complied with the terms of a pretrial agreement, the sentence would not be limited to the sentence imposed at the earlier trial. Second, if the government on appeal obtains an order for a rehearing on the sentence under this Report's proposal for Article 56, the sentence at the rehearing is not limited to the sentence erroneously adjudged at the earlier trial. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 63 that will be necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 63 limits the findings and sentences that may be adjudged at a rehearing. For findings, the statute precludes a rehearing on any offense for which the accused was found not guilty by the first court-martial. In this respect, Article 63 is consistent with the Double Jeopardy Clause.[1] With respect to sentencing, Article 63 prohibits the court-martial from imposing a higher sentence at a rehearing than was approved by the convening authority at the first trial, with three exceptions: (1) when the accused is convicted of offenses at the rehearing that were not part of the prior trial; (2) when a mandatory minimum sentence is required by law; and (3) when the accused pleaded guilty at the first trial pursuant to a pretrial agreement and the accused at the rehearing either changes the plea to not guilty with respect to the offenses covered by the pretrial agreement or fails to comply with the terms of the pretrial agreement. When a case falls within the third category, Article 63 limits the sentence that can be approved after a rehearing to the sentence adjudged by the court-martial at the first trial.

3. Historical Background

Article 63, which was derived from Article 52 of the Articles of War, contained a prohibition against any increase in the sentence upon a rehearing.[2] As pretrial agreements came into general use in the 1950s and 1960s, the rigidity of the prohibition on any increase in punishment at a rehearing had an unintended consequence: An accused who entered a not guilty plea at the rehearing could nonetheless retain the benefit of the sentence cap resulting from the plea agreement at the original trial because, under then-existing law, the sentence at rehearing could not exceed the sentence approved by convening authority after the first trial.[3] This took into account the fact that appeal of the accused's conviction was automatic. The statute was amended in 1983 to permit a limited increase in the sentence at a rehearing if the accused changed his plea from guilty to not guilty. Under Article 63, as amended, the sentence at the rehearing may exceed the sentence approved by the convening authority at the first court-martial but may not exceed the sentence that was adjudged by the first court-martial.[4] Other than this change, the statute has not been amended significantly since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 63 through R.C.M. 810, which provides additional rules and procedures applicable to rehearings and new trials. When the accused at the rehearing changes a plea from guilty to not guilty, the accused benefits from the first court-martial's consideration of the guilty plea as a mitigating factor, and the sentence at the rehearing is accordingly limited to the sentence adjudged at the first trial even though the plea has changed at the rehearing.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, federal defendants whose convictions are reversed on appeal are subject to retrial, and "neither the double jeopardy provision nor the Equal Protection Clause imposes an absolute bar to a more severe sentence upon reconviction."[6] This result rests on the premise that a defendant's original conviction is nullified at his behest, with the "slate wiped clean," as a direct result of the appeal.[7] In Alabama v. Smith, a unanimous Supreme Court held that a sentence could be increased at a retrial when a defendant changes a plea from guilty to not guilty.[8] Additionally, in federal civilian practice either a defendant or the government may appeal a sentence adjudged by the District Court. A sentence may be appealed because it is unlawful, the district judge misapplied the sentencing guidelines, or the sentence is unreasonable.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 63: Amend Article 63 to remove the sentence limitation at a rehearing in cases in which: (1) an accused changes the plea from guilty to not guilty, or otherwise fails to comply with the terms a pretrial agreement; or (2) as a conforming change to the proposal under Article 56, a sentence is set aside based on a government appeal.

This proposal would better align military practice with federal civilian practice with respect to rehearings when an accused changes his or her plea or otherwise fails to comply with the terms of a plea agreement. Under the proposed amendments, an accused in these situations would be in the same position as if the guilty plea had not been taken in the first trial. This change would restore the parties to the position they were in at the beginning of the first trial with respect to the possible range of punishments.

Under the proposal for Article 56, after the establishment of sentencing parameters and criteria, the government would be able to appeal a sentence under certain conditions. As a conforming change to that proposal, this proposal amends Article 63 to allow a remedy after a successful government appeal.

The proposed amendments would continue the remaining limitations on the sentence that could be imposed at a rehearing. An accused who enters the same plea at the rehearing as at the first trial, or changes the plea from not guilty to guilty, would not face the possibility of an increased sentence at rehearing.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by better aligning military practice with federal civilian practice with respect to rehearings and new trials in the same case.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 907. REHEARINGS.

Section 863 of title 10, United States Code (article 63 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" before "Each rehearing";

(2) in the second sentence, by striking "may be approved" and inserting "may be adjudged";

(3) by striking the third sentence; and

(4) by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(b) If the sentence adjudged by the first court-martial was in accordance with a plea agreement under section 853a of this title (article 53a) and the accused at the rehearing does not comply with the agreement, or if a plea of guilty was entered for an offense at the first court-martial and a plea of not guilty was entered at the rehearing, the sentence as to those charges or specifications may include any punishment not in excess of that which could have been adjudged at the first court-martial.

"(c) If, after appeal by the Government under section 856(e) of this title (article 56(e)), the sentence adjudged is set aside and a rehearing on sentence is ordered by the Court of Criminal Appeals or Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the court-martial may impose any sentence that is in accordance with the order or ruling setting aside the adjudged sentence.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 907 would amend Article 63 to remove the sentence limitation at a rehearing in cases in which: (1) an accused changes his or her plea from guilty to not guilty, or otherwise fails to comply with the terms a pretrial agreement; or (2) a sentence is set aside based on a government appeal. The amendments would better align military practice with federal civilian practice in the area of rehearings.

Article 64 – Review by a Judge Advocate
10 U.S.C. § 864

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 64 to limit its applicability to summary courts-martial. As amended, the article would address only the initial review of summary courts-martial, since they are not eligible for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66 (Review by Courts of Criminal Appeals). In a related proposal, Article 65 (Transmittal and Review of Records) would address the initial review of general and special courts-martial that are not eligible for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 64 required by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 64 provides for review of court-martial cases following the convening authority's action approving findings of guilty under Article 60 (Action of Convening Authority). Review under Article 64 applies to those cases not subject to automatic review under Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals) and Article 69(a) (Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General). Article 64 applies to all summary courts-martial, and to special courts-martial in which a bad-conduct discharge was not adjudged. Article 64 currently requires a judge advocate to provide a written review of the case that includes conclusions as to jurisdiction, whether the charges and specifications stated offenses, and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed by law. This review is also required to address any allegations of error submitted in writing by the accused. If the reviewing judge advocate recommends corrective action (and in certain other circumstances), the case is transmitted to the general court-martial convening authority, who has authority to take appellate corrective action on the case. If the convening authority disagrees with the recommendation, the case is transmitted to the Judge Advocate General for review under Article 69(b).

3. Historical Background

Since its inception, the UCMJ has required some form of legal review for minor cases. This review was initially required under Article 65.[1] In 1983, as part of the Military Justice Reform Act, the requirement was moved to Article 64.[2] Article 64 is the only direct appellate review available for summary court-martials. The summary court-martial is a unique military proceeding, designed to dispense justice promptly for relatively minor offenses under a simple form of procedure. Because of its summary nature, the Supreme Court has stated that a summary court-martial is disciplinary in nature, rather than punitive, and does not result in a "criminal conviction."[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 64 through R.C.M. 1112.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The summary court-martial is without a civilian counterpart. The closest comparison to summary court-martial offenses in the federal civilian system would be "Class C misdemeanors," punishable by confinement for thirty days or less but more than five days; and "infractions," punishable by confinement for five days or less.[4] Subject to limitations, such offenses may be tried by a magistrate judge in federal court. A federal defendant is entitled to an "appeal as of right" from a misdemeanor conviction, sentence, judgment or order by a U.S. magistrate judge to "a judge of the district court of the district in which the offense was committed."[5] A federal defendant is also entitled to an "appeal as of right" from a judgment or order of a federal district court to a circuit court of appeals.[6] Although there is no express provision for an appeal of right from a judgment of the district court affirming a magistrate's conviction, such appeals have been allowed as a matter of course.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 64: Amend Article 64 to apply only to summary courts-martial.

This proposal would amend Article 64 so that it applies only to the initial review of summary courts-martial. The proposal for Article 65 addresses the review of all general and special courts-martial that do not qualify for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals.

This proposal would make no substantive change to the procedures or scope of review of summary courts-martial. Part II of this Report will address the opportunity for an accused to consult with counsel before filing any matter in connection with an Article 64 review.

The statutory grant to the courts of appeals of jurisdiction to review "all final decisions" of district courts is literally sufficient to include final decisions reviewing criminal convictions before magistrates, and no reason for excluding them from its embrace appears. Indeed, the assurance of that further review in the courts of appeals encourages use of magistrates' trials for minor offenses.") (quoting 28 U.S.C. § 1291).

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by ensuring that the court-martial process appropriately balances the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces generally with procedures designed to ensure protection of rights that are provided under military law.

SEC. 908. JUDGE ADVOCATE REVIEW OF FINDING OF GUILTY IN SUMMARY COURT-MARTIAL.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 864 of title 10, United States Code (article 64 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking the first two sentences and inserting the following:

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, each summary court-martial in which there is a finding of guilty shall be reviewed by a judge advocate. A judge advocate may not review a case under this subsection if the judge advocate has acted in the same case as an accuser, preliminary hearing officer, member of the court, military judge, or counsel or has otherwise acted on behalf of the prosecution or defense.".

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) The heading for such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"§864. Art. 64. Judge advocate review of finding of guilty in summary court-martial".

(2) Subsection (b) of such section is amended—

(A) by striking "(b) The record" and inserting "(b) RECORD.—The record";

(B) by inserting "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(C) by striking paragraph (2); and

(D) by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (2).

(3) Subsection (c)(3) of such section (article) is amended by striking "section 869(b) of this title (article 69(b))." and inserting "section 869 of this title (article 69).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 908 concerns review of court-martial cases not otherwise subject to appellate review under Article 66 or review by the Office of the Judge Advocate General under Article 69. Under current law, Article 64 provides for judge advocate review of such cases, including conclusions as to jurisdiction, whether the charges and specifications stated offenses, and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed by law. This section would amend Article 64 to apply only to the initial review of summary courts-martial. Article 65, as amended, would provide for review of general and special courts-martial that do not qualify for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. No substantive changes to the procedures or scope of review of summary courts-martial would be made. Implementing rules will address the opportunity for an accused to consult with counsel before filing any matter in connection with an Article 64 review.

Article 65 – Disposition of Records
10 U.S.C. § 865

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 65 to provide additional guidance on the disposition of records of trial. The proposed amendments would require that the record of trial be forwarded to appellate defense counsel for review whenever the case is eligible for direct review under Article 66. For those cases that are not eligible for direct appellate review under Article 66, the proposal would provide for a limited form of review similar to the limited review that currently is provided under Article 64. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 65 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 65 concerns the disposition of court-martial records. It requires that the records of trial in all cases subject to review under either Article 66 (review by Court of Criminal Appeals) or Article 69 (review in the office of the Judge Advocate General) be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General for appropriate action unless the accused has waived the right to review or an appeal has been withdrawn. The transmitted records of trial are then either forwarded to the Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66 or reviewed by the Office of the Judge Advocate General under Article 69. All other records are handled in accordance with service regulations.

3. Historical Background

Article 65 was derived from Articles 35 and 36 of the Articles of War and proposed Articles 21 and 39 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] The original statute required that a judge advocate review any court-martial that was not subject to any other appellate review (i.e. summary courts-martial and special courts-martial without a bad-conduct discharge).[2] In 1983, Congress amended Article 65 by moving the requirement for a review by a judge advocate to Article 64.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 65 through R.C.M. 1111. Under the rule, the records of trial in all general courts-martial and in special courts-martial in which a bad-conduct discharge was adjudged are forwarded to the Judge Advocate General unless the accused waives appeal. Cases forwarded to the Judge Advocate General are then reviewed under Article 66 (review by Court of Criminal Appeals) or Article 69 (review in the office of the Judge Advocate General), depending on the sentences adjudged. Cases not forwarded to the Judge Advocate General are reviewed by a judge advocate under Article 64 (review by a judge advocate).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian practice and military practice differ in the treatment of records of trial. Under federal practice, the appellant has the responsibility to identify and request a transcript of those parts of the proceedings the appellant considers to be necessary for the appeal.[4] After ordering transcripts, it is the appellant's duty to "do whatever else is necessary to enable the clerk to assemble and forward the record."[5] The court clerk then forwards the record of trial to the appellate court.[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 65.1: Amend Article 65 by requiring that the record of trial be forwarded to appellate defense counsel for review whenever the case is eligible for an appeal under Article 66.

Under the related proposal concerning Article 66, any sentence that exceeds six months of confinement, includes a punitive discharge, or where the government has previously appealed under Article 62 would be eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals. This proposal would require the Judge Advocate General to notify the accused of the right to appeal in all such cases and to provide appellate defense counsel with a copy of the record of trial. The appellate defense counsel would then be required to review the record and advise the accused on the merits of filing an appeal. Upon request of the accused, appellate defense counsel would file an appeal on behalf of the accused.

This proposal would continue to require mandatory appellate review in all cases that include a sentence of death.

Recommendation 65.2: Amend Article 65 to require a review by the Judge Advocate General of all general and special court-martial cases not eligible for direct appeal under Article 66.

The proposed review would be similar to the review currently conducted under Article 64, and would apply to cases in which the sentence does not contain a punitive discharge and includes confinement for six months or less, and where the government has not previously appealed under Article 62 (i.e., cases that do not qualify for direct review in the Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66). The review would be conducted by an attorney in the Office of the Judge Advocate General or designated by the Judge Advocate General. For this review, the accused would have an opportunity to submit a list of legal errors in writing. This review would state conclusions as to whether the court had jurisdiction over the accused and the offense; whether the charge and specification stated an offense; and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed as a matter of law. It also would provide a response to each allegation of error made in writing by the accused.

Under the related proposed amendments to Article 64, summary courts-martial would be reviewed under the procedures of that Article.

General and special courts-martial reviewed under this proposal also would be eligible for further review by the Judge Advocate General under the standards set forth in the proposed revision to Article 69. All cases reviewed under Article 69, including summary courts martial, would then become eligible for appellate review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals, either by certification of the Judge Advocate General or through an application from the accused for discretionary review.[7]

Recommendation 65.3: Amend Article 65 to require a review of all general and special courts-martial cases that are eligible for an appeal under Article 66, but where appeal has been waived, withdrawn, or not filed.

This proposed review would be similar to the review currently conducted under Article 64 and would be conducted by an attorney in the Office of the Judge Advocate General or another attorney designated under rules established by the military department concerned. These rules could include review in the field, as under the current version of Article 64. The limited review would focus on whether the court-martial had jurisdiction over the accused and the offense, whether the charges and specifications each stated an offense, and whether the adjudged sentence was within the limits prescribed as a matter of law.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating, insofar as practicable, the appellate practices used in U.S. district courts.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by enhancing efficiency during the post-trial phase of the court-martial process.

[7] The proposal for Article 69 would end the automatic review of general courts-martial under Article 69(a), but would provide for review upon request.

8. Legislative Proposal

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 909 would amend Article 65 to conform the statute to the changes proposed in Articles 66 and 69. See Sections 910, 914, infra. As amended, Article 65 would: (1) provide additional guidance on the disposition of records; (2) require that the record of trial be forwarded to appellate defense counsel for review whenever the case is eligible for direct review under Article 66; and (3) provide for appellate review of all cases that are not subject to direct appellate review by a Court of Criminal Appeals, similar to the current review under Article 64. As amended, Article 65 would contain the following provisions:

Article 65(a) would require the record of trial in all general and special courts-martial in which there is a finding of guilty to be transmitted to the Office of the Judge Advocate General. In all other cases, the records of trial would be transmitted and disposed of in accordance with service regulations.

Article 65(b) would address the processing of records of trial in cases eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals. Under paragraph (1), consistent with current practice, if the judgment of the court-martial included a sentence of death, the Judge Advocate General would be required to forward the record of trial to the Court of Criminal Appeals for automatic review. Paragraph (2) would address processing of records of trial in cases eligible for direct review by a Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66(b)(1). The Judge Advocate General would be required to forward a copy of the record to an appellate defense counsel, who would be detailed to review the case and, upon request of the accused, to represent the accused before the Court of Criminal Appeals. The appellate defense counsel would review the record, advise the accused on the merits of an appeal, and, upon request, file the appeal with the Court of Criminal Appeals. The accused would be able to request that a copy of the record of trial be forwarded to civilian counsel provided by the accused. These provisions would not apply if the accused waived the right to appeal under Article 61 or declined representation by appellate defense counsel.

Article 65(c) would require the Judge Advocate General to provide a "Notice of the Right to Appeal" to an accused eligible to file an appeal under Article 66(b)(1).

Article 65(d) would provide for limited review by an attorney within the Office of Judge Advocate General, or another attorney designated under service regulations, in cases not eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals under Articles 66(b). Cases not eligible for direct review under Article 66 would be those in which a punitive discharge was not imposed and confinement imposed was for six months or less. The review would focus on three issues: whether the court-martial had jurisdiction over the accused and the offense; whether each charge and specification stated an offense; and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed as a matter of law. The review also would include a response to any allegation of error submitted by the accused in writing. Under paragraph (3), this limited review—except for the response to allegations of error—also would be provided when an accused who is eligible to file an appeal for direct review under Article 66 waives or withdraws from appellate review, and when an accused fails to file an appeal under Article 66. This limited and expeditious review would satisfy a condition precedent to execution of certain sentences under Article 57 (Effective date of sentences), as amended. See Section 802, supra.

Article 65(e) would provide that, if the attorney conducting the review under subsection (d) believes corrective action may be required, the record shall be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, who may set aside the findings or sentence, in whole or in part. If the Judge Advocate General sets aside the findings or sentence, he or she would be required to either order a rehearing or dismiss the charges. In addition, where the Judge Advocate General sets aside the findings or sentence and orders a rehearing, if the convening authority determines that a rehearing would be impractical, the convening authority should dismiss the charges.

Under the related proposal for Article 64, summary courts-martial would still be reviewed under the procedures contained in that statute. General and special courts-martial reviewed under Article 65, as well as summary courts-martial reviewed under Article 64, would be eligible for further review by the Judge Advocate General under the standards set forth in Article 69, as amended. See Section 913, supra. Those cases would then become eligible for appellate review by the Court of Criminal Appeals, either by certification of the Judge Advocate General or through application of the accused for discretionary review.

Article 66 – Review by Court of Criminal Appeals
10 U.S.C. § 866

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would: (1) replace automatic review in non-capital cases with a filing procedure similar to the appeal as of right process used in the federal civilian appellate courts; (2) retain mandatory review in capital cases; (3) expand the opportunity for servicemembers to request review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals; (4) provide statutory standards for factual sufficiency review, sentence appropriateness review, and review of excessive post-trial delays; and (5) provide a statutory framework for cases involving remands and rehearings.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 66 provides for the establishment of Courts of Criminal Appeals and provides the procedures for appellate review. Under Article 66(a)-(b), each Judge Advocate General is required to establish a Court of Criminal Appeals; to designate a chief judge for the court; and to refer to the court the record of each court-martial in which the sentence approved by the convening authority includes a punitive discharge, confinement for one year or more, or death. The statute also specifies court composition, and the court's authority to reconsider its decisions.

Under Article 66(c), the court may act only with respect to the findings and sentence approved by the convening authority, and may affirm only such findings and sentence as it finds correct in law and fact and which it determines, on the basis of the entire record, should be approved. In considering the record, the court may weigh the evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses, and determine controverted questions of fact, recognizing that the trial court saw and heard the witnesses.

Article 66(d) authorizes the Court of Criminal Appeals to order a rehearing in cases where the court sets aside the findings and sentence, except in those cases where the court dismisses the findings of a court-martial due to either factual or legal insufficiency. If the Court of Criminal Appeals sets aside the findings and sentence but does not order a rehearing, the court must dismiss the charges. In those cases where the court has ordered a rehearing, the convening authority may decide that a rehearing is impractical and may dismiss the charges.

Article 66(e) and Article 66(f) authorize the Judge Advocates General to instruct convening authorities with respect to decisions of the Courts Criminal Appeals; to prescribe rules of procedure for the Courts of Criminal Appeals; and to meet periodically with the courts to formulate policies for review of courts-martial.

Article 66(g) and Article 66(h) prohibit members of a Court of Criminal Appeals from preparing, reviewing, or submitting in any way a performance review or other fitness review concerning the assignment or promotion or retention of another member of a Court of Criminal Appeals; and from reviewing the record in a trial if the member previously served as an investigating officer in the case or member of the court-martial or as judge, or trial or defense counsel in the case.

In addition to direct review under Article 66, the Courts of Criminal Appeals, as well as the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, may consider petitions for extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. §1651(a).[1]

3. Historical Background

Before Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, each military service operated under its own unique statutory authority, with limited appellate processes.[2] Following complaints against the military justice system during and after World War I, the Army developed a regulatory procedure for reviewing cases with significant punishments by a board of judge advocates.[3] In the 1920 Articles of War, Congress provided statutory authority for the Army's review process, requiring the Judge Advocate General of the Army to establish one or more Boards of Review to review specified types of cases.[4] Prior to the UCMJ's enactment, the Navy did not have Boards of Review.[5] In 1948, in the Elston Act, Congress authorized these Boards of Review to weigh the evidence in addition to determining matters of law, and to modify the findings and sentence when "deemed necessary to the ends of justice," even where the verdict was legally sufficient.[6]

These amendments were made in recognition that the "absence of this authority [to weigh the evidence in addition to determining matters of law] heretofore has been a common cause of criticism." H. REP. NO. 80-1034, at 7 (1948). In the Elston Act amendments, Congress also established a body above the board of review, known as the Judicial Council,

When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, it established Boards of Review (now the Courts of Criminal Appeals) for all of the services, and provided the Boards with the power to issue decisions binding on the Judge Advocates General.[7] The UCMJ provisions reflected the prior Army practice of limiting the jurisdiction of the Boards of Review to cases with at least a set minimum punishment, designating certain cases for review at the unit level, and designating other cases for review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General. Accordingly, the Boards of Review automatically reviewed all cases in which the approved sentence included death, confinement for one year or more, a punitive separation, or affected a general or flag officer.[8] Such cases were subject to further review by the Court of Military Appeals (now the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces). The Judge Advocate General automatically reviewed all general courts-martial that were not reviewed by the Boards of Review. The Judge Advocate General could submit such cases to the Boards of Review, but they were not subject to further review by the Court of Military Appeals. The remaining cases—special courts-martial not involving a punitive discharge and summary courts-martial—were reviewed by judge advocates at the unit level.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 66 through R.C.M. 1203. Pursuant to Article 66(f), the Judge Advocates General prescribed Uniform Rules of Procedure for the Courts of Criminal Appeals.[9] The scope of the Courts of Criminal Appeals' review authority is well-established on matters such as automatic review, errors of law, factual sufficiency and fact-finding, sentence appropriateness, and the Court's authority to affirm only such findings and sentence as it finds correct in law and fact, and which it determines, on the basis of the entire record, should be approved.[10]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian appellate practice can be differentiated from military appellate practice primarily by: (1) the right of any person convicted of a criminal offense to appeal his or her conviction and sentence to a court of record; and (2) the lack of automatic appellate review, even in capital cases.[11]

Federal civilian defendants are entitled to "appeals as of right" from judgments or orders of a federal district courts,[12] and from misdemeanor convictions or sentences by a U.S. magistrate judges.[13] Appeals are required to be filed within 14 days of the entry of judgment or order by the district judge or the filing of the government's notice of appeal, whichever is later.[14] The notice of appeal must identify the judgment or final ruling that is being appealed.[15] The appellant also is required to file a brief which must contain, inter alia, "a statement of the issues presented," "a concise statement of the case setting out the facts relevant to the issues," and "argument, which must contain appellant's contentions and the reasons for them."[16] There is no requirement for the appellate court to look for errors not raised by the defendant, and federal courts regularly hold that a defendant forfeits claims of error not raised or not fully developed in their brief.[17] When appealing a criminal conviction, the record of trial consists generally of the original exhibits from trial and "the transcript of proceedings (if any)."[18]

Federal appellate courts do not perform a de novo review of the facts. Generally, federal courts review verdicts only for legal sufficiency.[19] However, federal civilian trial courts have the discretionary authority to order a retrial "in the interest of justice" if they conclude the verdict is so contrary to the "weight of the evidence" that a new trial is required.[20] With respect to sentence appeals, in federal civilian practice, both the defendant and the government have the right to appeal the sentence if "(1) imposed in violation of law; (2) imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines; (3) is greater than or less than the sentence specified in the applicable guideline range [with additional caveats]; or (4) was imposed for an offense for which there is no sentencing guideline and is plainly unreasonable."[21]

Every state jurisdiction provides some means of appellate review by a court for defendants in criminal cases. The intermediate appellate courts in New York exercise a scope of review over felony cases similar to that exercised by the Courts of Criminal Appeals in terms of authority to review cases for factual sufficiency and to determine whether a sentence is unduly harsh or severe.[22]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 66.1: Amend Article 66 to establish an appeal as of right in non-capital cases similar to federal civilian appellate courts, and expand the opportunity for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals of courts-martial convictions.

This proposal would retain automatic review of all cases that include a sentence determined by the members in a capital case including a sentence of death. The finality of the punishment, role of members in determining the sentence, and other unique procedural and substantive requirements of capital cases warrant no change in this area.

For non-capital cases that are subject to automatic review under current law, this proposal would require the accused to file an appeal in order to obtain direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. This proposal would expand the opportunity for servicemembers to request review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals, through an appeal of right, in cases that are not now eligible for direct review at the request of the accused. Currently, direct review in non-capital cases is limited to cases in which the sentence includes confinement for a year or more or a punitive separation. Under this proposal, cases with a sentence that includes confinement for more than six months, or a punitive separation, would be eligible for direct appellate review. The opportunity to request direct appellate review also would be available to the accused in cases where the government appeals the sentence under proposed Article 56(p), or where the government has previously filed an interlocutory appeal under Article 62 in the same case. An additional opportunity to obtain review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals is addressed in the proposed revision to Article 69.[23]

[21] 18 U.S.C.S. § 3742(a)-(b). Under the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 245 (2005), the Guidelines are treated as advisory.

[22] N.Y. CRIM. PROC. § 470.15 ("The kinds of determinations of reversal or modification deemed to be on the facts include, but are not limited to, a determination that a verdict of conviction resulting in a judgment was, in whole or in part, against the weight of the evidence."); People v. Romero, 7 N.Y.3d 633 (2006).

[23] Under the proposal for Article 69 (Review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General), servicemembers whose general, special, or summary courts-martial resulted in sentences of confinement for six months or less and who otherwise do not qualify for direct review under Article 66 would have a pathway to review by a Court of Criminal Appeals. Such accused would be required to file an application for review with the Court of Criminal Appeals and such review would be at the discretion of the court.

This proposal would preserve complete review of the record by appellate defense counsel in cases eligible for review under Article 66 and eliminate the requirement for automatic record review by Courts of Criminal Appeals. This proposal also would require the accused and appellate defense counsel to decide whether to appeal, and, if so, which issues to appeal. The courts would only review the record after the accused files an appeal, and then with the benefit of issues identified and briefed by counsel. The courts would retain the ability to specify issues for briefing, argument, and decision, and to review for plain error. Consistent with past military practice, military accused would continue to be represented by appellate defense counsel at no cost and without regard to the accused's ability to pay. In those cases where an accused chooses not to exercise an appeal, the decisions of the trial court would be subject to limited review under proposed amendments to Article 65.[24]

Recommendation 66.2: Amend Article 66 to provide statutory standards for factual sufficiency review, sentence appropriateness review, and review of excessive post-trial delay.

Current law requires the Court of Criminal Appeals to independently review every case for the factual sufficiency of every conviction. This proposal would require the accused to raise any factual sufficiency issues regarding the findings and would authorize the Courts of Criminal Appeals to dismiss a finding that it is clearly convinced is contrary to the weight of the evidence.

The proposal draws upon New York state practice, in a manner that reflects military practice since 1948.[25] Under this proposal: (1) the accused would be required to raise the issue and to make a specific showing of deficiencies in proof; and (2) the court could then set aside the finding if it is clearly convinced the finding was against the weight of the evidence. Although the court could weigh the evidence and determine controverted questions of fact, it would be required to give deference to the trial court on those matters. Similar to current practice, the court could affirm a lesser finding. If a finding is dismissed because the finding was against the weight of the evidence as a factual matter, retrial would be prohibited.

[24] See the related proposal for Article 65 (Disposition and Review of Records), in which limited review of the record would be conducted when the accused fails to timely file an appeal or waives or withdraws from appellate review.

[25] In New York, upon request of the defendant, the intermediate appellate court must conduct a weight of the evidence review. New York Criminal Procedure Law 470.15 [5]. This weight of evidence review is a two-step process: (1) the court must "determine whether an acquittal would not have been unreasonable"; and (2) "[i]f so, the court must weigh conflicting testimony, review any rational inferences that may be drawn from the evidence and evaluate the strength of such conclusions. Based on the weight of the credible evidence, the court then decides whether the jury was justified in finding the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." People v. Danielson, 9 N.Y.3d 342, 348 (2007) (citing People v Crum, 272 N.Y. 348 (1936)). If the appellate court concludes that the trier of fact has failed to give the evidence the weight it should be accorded, then the appellate court may set aside the verdict. People v. Bleakley, 69 N.Y. 2d 490, 495; People v. Romero, 7 N.Y. 3d 633, 644 (N.Y.C.A. 2006).

The proposal would provide authority for sentence review under the standards set forth in the proposed amendments to Article 56. The standard for providing relief for excessive post-trial delay is contained in the proposed amendment to Article 66(d)(3).

Recommendation 66.3: Amend Article 66 to provide the Courts of Criminal Appeals with explicit authority to order a hearing, rehearing or remand for further proceedings as may be necessary to address a substantial issue.

This proposal would expressly provide the authority for the court to remand a case for additional proceedings as may be necessary to address a substantial issue. This proposal would incorporate current practice (i.e., "Dubay" hearings) and could include orders to either a convening authority or Chief Trial Judge for delegation to a military judge.[26] The procedure for such additional proceedings would be addressed in regulations prescribed by the President. Part II of this Report will address these procedures.

This proposal would generally comport with practice in the federal civilian courts.[27]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by employing the standards and procedures applicable to appellate rights and practice in the civilian sector.

The elimination of automatic review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals in all but capital cases and the creation of an appeal of right system would better align with practice in the federal and state courts. The proposal has the potential for increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the appellate process by focusing the courts on issues raised by the parties. Key to these benefits is the accused's right to assistance of qualified appellate defense counsel, at no cost, to include review of the record by appellate defense counsel in all cases with a sentence including a punitive discharge, confinement in excess of six months, or where the government has previously filed an interlocutory or sentence appeal.

8. Legislative Proposal

"(e) CONSIDERATION OF THE EVIDENCE.—

"(1) In an appeal of a finding of guilty under paragraph (1)(A), (1)(B), or (2) of subsection (b), the Court of Criminal Appeals, upon request of the accused, may consider the weight of the evidence upon a specific showing of deficiencies in proof by the accused. "(2) When considering a case under paragraph (1)(A), (1)(B), or (2) of subsection (b), the Court may weigh the evidence and determine controverted questions of fact, subject to—

"(A) appropriate deference to the fact that the court-martial saw and heard the witnesses and other evidence; and

"(B) appropriate deference to findings of fact entered into the record by the military judge.

"(f) CONSIDERATION OF SENTENCE.—(1) In considering a sentence on appeal, other than as provided in section 856(e) of this title (article 56(e)), the Court of Criminal Appeals may consider—

"(A) whether the sentence violates the law;

"(B) whether the sentence is inappropriately severe—

"(i) if the sentence is for an offense for which there is no sentencing parameter under section 856(d) of this title (article 56(d)); or

"(ii) in the case of an offense with a sentencing parameter under section 856(d) of this title (article 56(d)), if the sentence is above the upper range under subsection (d)(2)(B)(iii).

"(2) In an appeal under this subsection or section 856(e) of this title (article 56(e)), other than review under subsection (b)(2), the record on appeal shall consist of—

"(i) may affirm any lesser included offense; and

"(ii) may, except when prohibited by section 844 of this title (article 44), order a rehearing.

"(B) If the Court of Criminal Appeals orders a rehearing on a charge and the convening authority finds a rehearing impracticable, the convening authority may dismiss the charge.

"(C) If the Court of Criminal Appeals sets aside the findings and does not order a rehearing, the Court shall order that the charges be dismissed.

"(2) If the Court of Criminal Appeals sets aside the sentence, the Court may—

"(A) modify the sentence to a lesser sentence; or

"(B) order a rehearing.

"(3) If the Court determines that additional proceedings are warranted, the Court may order a hearing as may be necessary to address a substantial issue, subject to such limitations as the Court may direct and under such regulations as the President may prescribe.".

(c) ACTION WHEN REHEARING IMPRACTICABLE AFTER REHEARING ORDER.—Subsection (h) of such section (article), as redesignated by subsection (b)(1), is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking "convening authority" and inserting "appropriate authority"; and

(2) by striking the last sentence.

(d) SECTION HEADING.—The heading for such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"§866. Art. 66. Courts of Criminal Appeals.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 910 would amend Article 66 to revise the scope of review and enlarge the category of cases eligible for review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. Specifically, the proposed amendments would: (1) replace automatic review in non-capital cases with a filing procedure similar to the appeal as of right process used in the federal civilian appellate courts; (2) retain mandatory review in capital cases; (3) provide for discretionary review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals in cases that are not eligible for an appeal as of right; (4) provide standards of review for appeals; and (5) codify the authority of Courts of Criminal Appeals to remand cases and order rehearings. As amended, Article 66 would contain the following provisions:

Article 66(a) would require the President to establish minimum tour lengths, with appropriate exceptions, for appellate military judges, and would require the Judge Advocate General of each service to certify the qualifications of appellate military judges consistent with the proposed amendment to Article 26 regarding the assignment and qualifications of military judges. See Section 504(b), supra. Implementing rules will reflect the Services' role and discretion in applying exceptions to the minimum tour lengths.

Article 66(b) would expand the categories of cases in which servicemembers may seek direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. It would replace automatic review in non-capital cases with an appeal of right. It also would continue to require automatic review of all capital cases. The amendments would provide every servicemember found guilty of an offense by a court-martial with a pathway to review by a court of record. As amended, there would be two prerequisites for review of non-capital cases by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66(b): (1) entry of the court-martial judgment into the record by a military judge under proposed Article 60c; and (2) timely filing of an appeal. The Court of Criminal Appeals would be able to review: (1) any case with a sentence to a punitive separation or confinement of more than six months; (2) any case that was previously the subject of an appeal by the United States under Article 62 or Article 56; and (3) any other case in which an application for discretionary review under Article 69(e)(2) was granted. For purposes of this subsection, the term "confinement for more than six months" would mean the total period of confinement adjudged, but would not aggregate periods of confinement running concurrently.

Article 66(c) prescribes jurisdictional timelines for appellate review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals.

Article 66(d) defines the duties of the Courts of Criminal Appeals, which would be consistent with current practice except that the obligation to review every case for factual sufficiency and sentence appropriateness would be eliminated. Under paragraph (3), the Courts of Criminal Appeals could provide relief for post-trial errors and excessive post-trial delay.

Article 66(e) details the limited authorities of the Courts of Criminal Appeals to weigh and consider evidence. The Court's authority to set aside a finding that is contrary to the weight of the evidence would be retained, but would require the accused to identify deficiencies in the proof and would allow the Court to set aside such findings only if "clearly convinced that the finding was against the weight of the evidence." This would channel the exercise of such authority through standards that are more deferential to the factfinder at trial and more reviewable by higher courts.

Article 66(e)(2) would address consideration of the entire case, including a finding of guilty and the sentence. The Court's authority to weigh the evidence and to determine controverted questions of fact would be retained, but would channel the exercise of such authority through standards that are more deferential to the factfinder at trial. This change would enable application of differing standards of review tailored to widely varied matters, including rulings on pretrial motions, the findings and sentence adjudged by the court-martial, and sentences of death determined by members.

Article 66(f) would provide standards of review applicable to sentences adjudged both before and after sentencing parameters are implemented under the proposed amendments to Article 56. See Section 801, supra. The proposed standards of review would provide the accused with several avenues to appeal a court-martial sentence. First, the accused would be able to appeal a sentence that was unlawful, or that resulted from incorrect application of a sentencing parameter. Second, consistent with the government's ability to appeal a sentence under Article 56(e) (as amended) the accused could appeal a sentence on the grounds that it is plainly unreasonable. See Section 801, supra. The term "plainly unreasonable" is taken from 18 U.S.C. § 3742 and is intended to provide substantial deference to the trial judge. Third, in cases where an adjudged offense has no sentencing parameter, or where the sentence imposed was above the applicable sentencing parameter for the offense, the accused would be able to appeal the sentence as inappropriately severe. This provision recognizes that a sentence may be "inappropriately severe" despite being reasonable. Finally, in the case of a sentence determined by a panel in a capital case, consistent with current practice, the Court would be required to determine whether the sentence is appropriate.

Article 66(g)(3) would codify the authority of Courts of Criminal Appeals to remand a case for additional proceedings as may be necessary to address substantial issues. This authority would be subject to any limitations the Court may direct or the President may prescribe by regulation. This provision would codify current practice (i.e., DuBay Hearings). See United States v. Dubay, 37 C.M.R. 411 (1967).

In addition to the authority to review specific types of cases designated in Article 66, the Courts of Criminal Appeals consider interlocutory appeals under Article 62 and petitions for extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a). See, e.g., Noyd v. Bond, 395 U.S. 683, 695 n.7 (1969); Clinton v. Goldsmith, 526 U.S. 529 (1999); United States v. Denedo, 556 U.S. 904 (2009). The Courts of Criminal Appeals also review cases sent to the Court by the Judge Advocate General under Article 69. Under the proposed amendments to Article 56, the Courts of Criminal Appeals also would review sentence appeals filed by the Government under Article 56(e). The procedures applicable to proceedings arising under Article 56, like the procedures applicable to proceedings arising under Article 62, Article 69, and the All Writs Act, may be set forth in the rules for the Courts of Criminal Appeals prescribed under Article 66.

Article 67 – Review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces
10 U.S.C. § 867

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would make a conforming change to Article 67 to align the statute with the creation of an "entry of judgment" in Article 60c and related amendments to Articles 60 and 66. In addition, this proposal would provide for notification to the Judge Advocates General in connection with a decision to certify a case for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 67 authorizes review in the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces of cases from the Courts of Criminal Appeals. Review is mandatory in capital cases and in cases certified by one of the Judge Advocates General. Review is discretionary on petition by the accused upon a showing of good cause. The Court's review is limited to questions of law.[1]

3. Historical Background

Under the Articles of War, review of courts-martial relied primarily on review by commanders in the field and senior civilian officials, with judicial review by civilian courts limited to a narrow class of cases subject to collateral review through procedures such as habeas corpus.[2] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] Congress established the Court of Military Appeals to provide for review by a civilian appellate court with judges appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation.[4] The Report of the House Armed Services Committee accompanying the legislation emphasized that the new court would be "completely removed from all military influence of persuasion."[5] The Military Justice Act of 1983 authorized direct Supreme Court review of decisions by the Court.[6] Congress revised

Article 67 in 1989 to provide for a five-judge court and revised statutes governing the court's organization and administration.[7] The legislation transferred the provisions concerning organization and administration of the Court to Articles 141 through 146.[8] In 1994, Congress renamed the Court the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.[9]

4. Contemporary Practice

The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces considers appeals from decisions of the Courts of Criminal Appeals, including decisions that address the approved findings and sentence of a court-martial, interlocutory appeals, and writ appeals.[10] The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces also considers original petitions for extraordinary writs.[11]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In the Article III civilian courts, both the government and the defendant have the right to appeal a judgment or an order of a federal district court to a circuit court of appeals.[12] Except in capital and certified cases, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has discretion to accept or decline review.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 67.1: Provide conforming changes to Article 67(c) to align the provision with proposed creation of an "entry of judgment" in Article 60c and related amendments to Articles 60 and 66.

This is a conforming change. The proposal would not expand or otherwise alter the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Recommendation 67.2: Amend Article 67 by adding a notification requirement to the certification process under Article 67(a)(2).

The addition of a notification requirement to the certification process under Article 67(a)(2) is designed to ensure that each of the Judge Advocates General has a meaningful opportunity to share views on any proposed certification of an issue before the certification is filed with the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

The proposed change would not limit the discretion or authority of a Judge Advocate General to certify issues to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. It is intended to ensure that each Judge Advocate General has an opportunity to provide input on the decision to appeal cases that have the potential for impacting the law that affects all the services.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by enhancing efficiency during the appellate phase of the court-martial process.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 911. REVIEW BY COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE ARMED FORCES.

(a) JAG NOTIFICATION.—Subsection (a)(2) of section 867 of title 10, United States Code (article 67 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by inserting after "the Judge Advocate General" the following: ", after appropriate notification to the other Judge Advocates General,".

(b) BASIS FOR REVIEW.—Subsection (c) of such section (article) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(c)";

(2) by designating the second sentence as paragraph (2);

(3) by designating the third sentence as paragraph (3);

(4) by designating the fourth sentence as paragraph (4); and

(5) in paragraph (1), as designated by paragraph (1) of this subsection, by striking "only with respect to" and all that follows through the end of the sentence and inserting the following:

"only with respect to—

"(A) the findings and sentence set forth in the entry of judgment, as affirmed or set aside as incorrect in law by the Court of Criminal Appeals; or

"(B) a decision, judgment, or order by a military judge, as affirmed or set aside as incorrect in law by the Court of Criminal Appeals.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 911 would amend Article 67, which sets forth the procedures for the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces to review cases from the Courts of Criminal Appeals, to conform the statute to proposed changes in Articles 60 and 66, including the creation of an "entry of judgment" in the proposed Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Sections 901-904, 910, supra. In addition, the amendments would provide for notification by a Judge Advocate General to the other Judge Advocates General prior to certifying a case for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The recommendation for "appropriate notification to the other Judge Advocates General" would apply only to cases the Judge Advocate General intends to certify to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces pursuant to Article 67(a)(2). This change is intended to ensure that each Judge Advocate General has an opportunity to provide meaningful input on the decision to appeal cases that have the potential to impact the law applicable to all the services. The change would not alter the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces over these cases nor would it limit the discretion or authority of a Judge Advocate General to certify issues to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Article 67a – Review by the Supreme Court
10 U.S.C. § 867a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would make a technical amendment to Article 67a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 67a specifies that decisions of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces are subject to review at the U.S. Supreme Court by a writ of certiorari, except in cases where the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has refused to grant a petition for review. For cases subject to Supreme Court review under the statute, the accused is not required to submit an affidavit demonstrating indigency as a precondition to filing a petition for a writ of certiorari without prepayment of fees and costs.

3. Historical Background

Prior to the enactment of the Military Justice Act of 1983, decisions of the Court of Military Appeals (now the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces) were not subject to direct review by the Supreme Court.[1] In a limited number of cases, the accused could seek collateral review through an extraordinary writ, but the government had no opportunity of review.[2] The Military Justice Act of 1983 provided the first avenue of direct review by the Supreme Court.[3] This review was limited to cases that the Court of Military Appeals had itself already reviewed, or for which the court had otherwise granted relief.[4] This limitation was placed in the statute out of concern about the volume of cases from the military justice system that might be the subject of petitions for review.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 67a through R.C.M. 1205, which tracks the statutory provisions closely. All capital cases under the UCMJ are eligible for Supreme Court review.[6] The government can ensure the eligibility of any case in which it has an interest by certifying the case to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Any such certified case must be decided by the Court of Appeals, and any case in which the government does not prevail is eligible for review.[7] Legislation to provide servicemembers with a similar degree of access to the Supreme Court has been introduced but not enacted.[8] Since enactment of the Military Justice Act of 1983, the number of petitions for certiorari filed in the Supreme Court seeking review of courts-martial has turned out to be lower than expected. Even in those cases eligible for Supreme Court review, petitions to the Supreme Court have been filed in only a fraction of the cases.[9]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Every federal criminal case is eligible for Supreme Court review at the request of either the government or the defense. Every state criminal case is eligible for Supreme Court review of federal issues at the request of either the government or the defense. Every trial of an alien unprivileged enemy belligerent before military commission is eligible for Supreme Court review at the request of the government or the accused.[10] In contrast, a court-martial is not eligible for Supreme Court review unless it is a capital case, a case certified by the Judge Advocate General, or a case in which the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces grants review or otherwise grants relief.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 67a: Consult all three branches of government regarding enhanced access by members of the armed forces to review by the Supreme Court.

The issue of whether servicemembers should be provided with the same level of access to the Supreme Court available to defendants in federal and state criminal proceedings, as well as in military commissions, is a matter that requires consultation among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government. Pending such consultation, the proposal includes a technical amendment to Article 67a (setting forth the full name of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces).

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

The proposed amendments to Articles 60-67 endeavor to align more closely appellate review within the military justice system with the scope of review generally available to litigants throughout the American legal system. Consultation among the three branches of government will provide an opportunity to consider whether similar changes are needed in the access of accused servicemembers to direct review by the Supreme Court.

The second sentence of subsection (a) of section 867a of title 10, United States Code (article 67a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by inserting before "Court of Appeals" the following: "United States".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 912 would make a technical amendment to Article 67a.

Article 68 – Branch Offices
10 U.S.C. § 868

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 68. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 68.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 68 authorizes the Service Secretary to direct the Judge Advocate General to establish branch offices within any command.

3. Historical Background

Article 68 was modeled after Article 50(c) of the Articles of War.[1] As enacted, Article 68 required Presidential direction to establish a branch office with a "distant command."[2] In 1968, the statute was amended to substitute the Service Secretary for the President, and removed the limitation that branch offices could be established only in a "distant command."[3] In 1994, Article 68 was amended to substitute "Court of Criminal Appeals" for "Court of Military Review."[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

No service currently has a branch office established pursuant to Article 68. Advances in electronic communication have made the possibility of establishing branch offices less likely.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, the U.S. Courts of Appeals are established by statute. Except for the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the courts of appeals are geographically located within their jurisdiction.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 68: No change to Article 68.

Article 68 allows for efficient appellate review during times of mass mobilization and geographic isolation. While the current force structure and advances in electronic communication have lessened the importance of Article 68, it continues to serve a purpose in ensuring that the UCMJ remains flexible enough to account for all future environments.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 69 – Review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General
10 U.S.C § 869

1. Summary of Proposal

The proposal would align the procedures for review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General under Article 69 with the proposed revisions in the appellate process under Article 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals), and with the related revisions in the review process under Articles 64 (Review by a judge advocate) and 65 (Disposition of records). The proposal also would provide servicemembers with an opportunity to apply to the applicable Court of Criminal Appeals for judicial review of decisions made under Article 69. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 69 provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 69 authorizes the Judge Advocate General of each service to review courts-martial that are not subject to direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. Article 69 provides two forms of review. The first form of review, set forth in Article 69(a), is automatic and applies to those general courts-martial in which the sentence does not include a punitive discharge, confinement for 12 months or more, or capital punishment—unless, pursuant to Article 61 (waiver or withdrawal of appeal), the accused has waived or withdrawn the right to Article 69(a) review. If, during the Article 69(a) review, the Judge Advocate General determines that any part of the findings or sentence is unsupported in law or that sentence reassessment is appropriate, the Judge Advocate General may modify or set aside the findings or sentence or both.

The second form of review, set forth in Article 69(b), applies to any case that did not receive direct review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General under Article 69(a) or in a Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. In general, these cases are summary and special courts-martials that were reviewed under Article 64, as well as any case where the accused waived or withdrew appeal under Article 61. In such cases, the findings, the sentence, or both may be modified or set aside on the basis of newly discovered evidence, fraud on the court, lack of jurisdiction, prejudicial error, or sentence appropriateness. If not automatically forwarded as part of the review under Article 64, an accused must apply for this review within two years after the convening authority approves the results of trial under Article 60; an extension may be granted when the accused shows good cause for the failure to file within the two-year period.

Article 69(c) provides that, under both forms of Article 69 review, the power of the Judge Advocate General to modify or set aside the sentence includes the power to order a rehearing or dismiss charges in specified circumstances. Decisions by the Judge Advocate General under Article 69(a)-(b) may be reviewed by the Courts of Criminal Appeals only upon certification by the Judge Advocate General. In such cases, appellate review is limited to matters of law.

3. Historical Background

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[1] Congress adapted the review process for courts-martial from the review system under the Articles of War.[2] Article 69 initially was limited to review of general courts-martial. The Judge Advocate General automatically reviewed all general courts-martial that did not receive automatic review by the boards of review.[3] At that time, the Judge Advocate General was authorized to certify issues to the then Courts of Military Review, because "even minor cases may involve major differences of interpretation of the law."[4] The remaining cases—special courts-martial not involving a punitive discharge and summary courts-martial—were reviewed in the field.

The Military Justice Act of 1968 expanded the review authority of the Judge Advocate General to include special and summary courts-martial.[5] In addition, the legislation authorized the Judge Advocate General to vacate or modify the findings or sentence in any court-martial case which had been finally reviewed, but which had not been reviewed by a court of military review, because of newly discovered evidence, fraud on the court, lack of jurisdiction over the accused or the offense, or error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused.[6] In 1981, Congress imposed a two-year limit on the statutory right to apply for Article 69 relief, unless the accused established good cause for failure to file within that time.[7] The legislative history of the 1981 amendment reflects a desire to limit the time for application of review in order to bring finality to these courts-martial.[8] The two-year time limit was adopted because that was the same limit applicable to a petition for a new trial

This amendment was considered in concert with the amendment to extend the time for submitting a petition for a new trial under Article 73. under Article 73.[9] The Military Justice Act of 1983 further amended the text of Article 69 to include Articles 69(a)-(c).[10]

In 1989, Congress established procedures for the Judge Advocates General to certify cases to the Courts of Criminal Appeals that were not otherwise subject to automatic review under Article 66.[11] The authority of the appellate courts under such cases is limited to "matters of law."[12]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 69 through R.C.M. 1201(b). Under current law, the accused cannot obtain judicial review of an Article 69 decision within the military justice system unless the case is certified to the Court of Criminal Appeals by the Judge Advocate General.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 69 has no direct federal counterpart. In the federal civilian system, offenses punishable by confinement for one year or less are classified as misdemeanors, and, subject to limitations, may be tried in U.S. magistrate court or federal district court.[13] A defendant in federal court is entitled to an "appeal as of right" from a misdemeanor conviction, sentence, judgment or order of a U.S. magistrate judge to "a judge of the district court of the district in which the offense was committed."[14] A federal civilian defendant is also entitled to an "appeal as of right" from a judgment or order of a federal district court to a circuit court of appeals.[15] Although there is no express provision for an appeal of right from a judgment of the district court affirming a magistrate's conviction, such appeals have been allowed as a matter of course.[16] In an appeal from a magistrate court to a district court, the

The statutory grant to the courts of appeals of jurisdiction to review 'all final decisions' of district courts is literally sufficient to include final decisions reviewing criminal convictions before magistrates, and no reason for excluding them from its embrace appears. Indeed, the assurance of that further review in the courts of appeals encourages use of magistrates' trials for minor offenses.") (citing 28 USCS § 1291).

"defendant is not entitled to trial de novo by a district judge [and] [t]he scope of appeal shall be the same as an appeal from a judgment of a district court to a court of appeals."[17] Every state provides some means of appellate review by a court for defendants in criminal cases, including review of misdemeanors. "In misdemeanor cases, defendants commonly have a right of review in the general trial court (in some states, by trial de novo) with subsequent discretionary appellate review."[18]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 69: Amend Article 69 to provide the accused with an opportunity to apply for review by a court of criminal appeals.

Article 69 provides servicemembers with an opportunity to obtain corrective action in cases that do not qualify for appellate review in a judicial forum before the Courts of Criminal Appeals. Under current law, an accused cannot obtain judicial review of Article 69 decisions unless the case is certified to the Court of Criminal Appeals by the Judge Advocate General.

This proposal would provide access to judicial review for servicemembers whose general, special, or summary courts-martial resulted in sentences of confinement for six months or less upon application by the accused. Such access would be at the discretion of the Court of Criminal Appeals following completion of review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General and would run in parallel with the Judge Advocate General's discretionary authority to send such cases to the Court of Criminal Appeals for review.

This proposal would more closely align appellate review of minor offenses with the practice in the state and federal civilian courts. Under the proposal, appellate review would be akin to the review process for a defendant convicted in federal magistrate court with a right of appeal to a district court, and with the additional right to appeal the district court's decision to a circuit court of appeals.

The proposed amendments would improve the appellate process by providing an accused who believes that his case includes legal error with an opportunity to apply directly to a court for appellate review.

Consistent with the proposed revision of Article 66 to require the filing of an appeal with the Court of Criminal Appeals in more serious cases with punishments including a punitive discharge or confinement for more than six months, this proposal would eliminate automatic review of general courts-martial under Article 69. Instead, the proposed change to Article 69 would require an accused to request review by a Judge Advocate General. This proposal would preserve the authority of the Judge Advocate General to take direct corrective action in those cases reviewable under Article 69.

In the related proposals to amend Articles 64 and 65, this Report recommends that all general and special courts-martial not reviewed under Article 66 first should be reviewed automatically under Article 65, and that all summary courts-martial should continue to be first reviewed under Article 64. Then, an accused who is dissatisfied with the results of the Article 64 or Article 65 review would have one year to request further review under Article 69. However, if an accused can show good cause for a failure to file within one year, the Judge Advocate General can consider the application so long as it is filed within a three year period, which is consistent with the time limit for a petition for new trial under Article 73. After the Article 69 review is complete, the accused will have an additional 60 days to apply for review at the Court of Criminal Appeals. The Court of Criminal Appeals would have discretion to grant or deny the application for review if the accused demonstrates a "substantial basis for concluding that the action on review [by the Judge Advocate General] constituted prejudicial error." The Courts of Criminal Appeals' authority to take action on such cases would be limited to matters of law, reflecting the current standard under Article 69(e).

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by ensuring that the court-martial process appropriately balances the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces generally with procedures designed to ensure protection of rights that are provided under military law.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 913. REVIEW BY JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Section 869 of title 10, United States Code (article 69 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§869. Art. 69. Review by Judge Advocate General

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Upon application by the accused and subject to subsections (b), (c), and (d), the Judge Advocate General may modify or set aside, in whole or in part, the findings and sentence in a court-martial that is not reviewed under section 866 of this title (article 66).

"(b) TIMING.—To qualify for consideration, an application under subsection (a) must be submitted to the Judge Advocate General not later than one year after the date of completion of review under section 864 or 865 of this title (article 64 or 65), as the case may be. The Judge Advocate General may, for good cause shown, extend the period for submission of an application, but may not consider an application submitted more than three years after such completion date.

"(c) SCOPE.—(1)(A) In a case reviewed under section 864 or section 865(d) of this title (article 64 or 65(d)), the Judge Advocate General may set aside the findings or sentence, in whole or in part on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, fraud on the court, lack of jurisdiction over the accused or the offense, error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, or the appropriateness of the sentence.

"(B) In setting aside findings or sentence, the Judge Advocate General may order a rehearing, except that a rehearing may not be ordered in violation of section 844 of this title (Article 44).

"(C) If the Judge Advocate General sets aside findings and sentence and does not order a rehearing, the Judge Advocate General shall dismiss the charges.

"(D) If the Judge Advocate General sets aside findings and orders a rehearing and the convening authority determines that a rehearing would be impractical, the convening authority shall dismiss the charges.

"(2) In a case reviewed under section 865(d) of this title (article 65(d)), review under this section is limited to the issue of whether the waiver, withdrawal, or failure to file an appeal was invalid under the law. If the Judge Advocate General determines that the waiver, withdrawal, or failure to file an appeal was invalid, the Judge Advocate General shall order appropriate corrective action under rules prescribed by the President.

"(d) COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.—(1) A Court of Criminal Appeals may review the action taken by the Judge Advocate General under subsection (c)—

"(A) in a case sent to the Court of Criminal Appeals by order of the Judge Advocate General; or

"(B) in a case submitted to the Court of Criminal Appeals by the accused in an application for review.

"(2) The Court of Criminal Appeals may grant an application under paragraph (1)(B) only if—

"(A) the application demonstrates a substantial basis for concluding that the action on review under subsection (c) constituted prejudicial error; and

"(B) the application is filed not later than the earlier of—

"(i) 60 days after the date on which the accused is notified of the decision of the Judge Advocate General; or

"(ii) 60 days after the date on which a copy of the decision of the Judge Advocate General is deposited in the United States mails for delivery by first-class certified mail to the accused at an address provided by the accused or, if no such address has been provided by the accused, at the latest address listed for the accused in his official service record.

"(3) The submission of an application for review under this subsection does not constitute a proceeding before the Court of Criminal Appeals for purposes of section 870(c)(1) of this title (article 70(c)(1)).

"(e) Notwithstanding section 866 of this title (article 66), in any case reviewed by a Court of Criminal Appeals under subsection (d), the Court may take action only with respect to matters of law.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 913 would amend Article 69 to more closely align appellate review of minor offenses with the practice in the federal civilian courts. Presently, Article 69 authorizes the Judge Advocate General to conduct a post-final review of courts-martial that are not subject to direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66 and that were not previously reviewed under Article 69. As amended, the accused would have a one-year period in which to file for review under Article 69 in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, extendable to three years for good cause. The three-year upper limit for filing is consistent with the proposed amendments to Article 73 (Petition for a new trial) to allow an accused to petition for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence or fraud on the court. See Section 916, supra. A review under Article 69, as amended, could consider issues of newly discovered evidence, fraud on the court, lack of jurisdiction over the accused or the offense, error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, or the appropriateness of the sentence. The statute would permit the accused, after a decision is issued by the Office of the Judge Advocate General, to apply for discretionary review by the Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. The Judge Advocate General's authority to certify cases for review at the appellate courts would be retained.

Article 70 – Appellate Counsel
10 U.S.C. § 870

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 70 by requiring to the greatest extent practicable that, in appeals of courts-martial in which the death penalty has been adjudged, at least one appellate defense counsel representing an accused must be learned in the law applicable to capital cases.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 70 requires that appellate government counsel represent the government before the Courts of Criminal Appeals, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, and, when requested by the Attorney General, before the Supreme Court. The statute also requires that appellate defense counsel represent the accused before those appellate courts when requested by the accused, or when counsel represents the government. Article 70(d) establishes the right of the accused to provide for his or her own representation by civilian counsel in these same appellate courts. Article 70(e) provides that the Judge Advocates General may direct military appellate counsel to perform other functions in connection with review of courts-martial.

3. Historical Background

Article 70 was included in the UCMJ as enacted in 1950 to provide for representation of the parties in conjunction with the establishment of the Boards of Review and the Court of Military Appeals (now Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces) as appellate courts within the military justice system.[1] The statute reflected a congressional desire to create a centralized group of appellate defense attorneys within the office of the Judge Advocate General.[2] Amendments in the Military Justice Act of 1983 expanded the responsibility of appellate counsel to represent the government and the accused before the Supreme Court under certain circumstances in conjunction with the enactment of authority for direct appellate review by the Supreme Court.[3] Subsequent amendments consisted of conforming changes to the legislation renaming the Courts of Criminal Appeals and the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 70 through R.C.M. 1202, which largely repeats the statutory provisions. Under Article 70 and R.C.M. 1202, an accused has the right to effective representation by counsel when a case will be reviewed by a Court of Criminal Appeals, and, in appropriate cases, at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces under Article 67.[5] The rights under Article 70 are limited to the appellate level.[6] There is no right for the accused to be represented by trial defense counsel on appeal, nor is there a right to representation by appellate counsel at a later rehearing.[7]

Article 70 and Article 27(b) both address the qualifications of appellate defense counsel, and specify that counsel must be a judge advocate who is a graduate of an accredited law school or a member of the bar of a federal court or of the highest court of a state, and certified as competent to perform duties by the Judge Advocate General. In military death penalty cases, no unique qualifying criteria are imposed on defense counsel at trial or on appeal, other than the competency standards applicable in all cases.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies to all criminal defendants, with the state required to provide counsel to an indigent defendant.[9] The Supreme Court extended the right to counsel to the first appeal granted by state law as a matter of right,[10] and at other "critical" stages of the criminal proceedings.[11] Once a state grants a defendant the right of appeal, it cannot condition that right in a manner that violates the constitutional guarantee of equal protection. Although the Constitution does not require a state to provide an indigent with counsel when seeking a second-level, discretionary review, as a matter of practice, the Supreme Court and the state high courts appoint counsel once review has been granted.[12] State and federal public defenders usually continue their representation to include the certiorari petition when warranted.[13] State laws vary with respect to the appointment of counsel for second-tier, discretionary review.[14] With respect to collateral attacks on a conviction under state post-conviction relief procedures, the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution does not require the state to supply a lawyer.[15] However, by statute, Congress has provided for the appointment of counsel for indigents seeking collateral relief in federal court, including the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006(a), and Rules 6 and 8 of the Rules Governing §2254 and §2255 proceedings.[16]

The civilian criminal justice system and the Military Commissions Act of 2009 both require unique qualifications for appellate defense counsel in capital cases, commonly referred to as "learned counsel." Federal law requires that, in a capital case in federal court, the defendant is entitled to at least two attorneys, one of whom "shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases."[17] The Military Commissions Act also provides that a defendant is entitled to be represented "to the greatest extent practicable, by at least one additional counsel who is learned in applicable law relating to capital cases and who, if necessary, may be a civilian and compensated in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense . . . ."[18] The supporting regulations for the Military Commissions Act extend this obligation through appellate review. The "Regulation for Trial by Military Commission" provides:

> The Chief Defense Counsel shall establish . . . a section dedicated to providing appellate representation for the accused on appeal, to include appellate representation by counsel learned in the law applicable to capital cases for cases in which the appellant has been sentenced to death, and shall establish procedures for the appointment of appellate counsel to represent an accused before the United States Court of Military Commission Review, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and the United States Supreme Court. Appellate defense counsel shall meet the requirements for counsel appearing before military commissions.[19]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 70: Amend Article 70 by requiring to the greatest extent practicable that, in appeals of courts-martial in which the death penalty has been adjudged, at least one appellate defense counsel representing an accused must be learned in the law applicable to capital cases.

This proposed amendment would better align the appellate counsel rights of servicemembers with the rights provided to defendants facing the death penalty in in the military commissions and in federal civilian appellate courts.

Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 70, with particular attention to the applicable procedures for assigning qualified appellate defense counsel in capital cases.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

The proposal to assign "learned counsel" on appeal in capital cases, and the assistance of counsel for petitions for review by the military Courts of Criminal Appeals after Article 69 review, is consistent with the practice in the federal and state courts and the requirements at the trial level under the proposed amendments to Article 27.

As noted in the discussion of the proposed amendments to Article 69, the opportunity to submit an application to the Court of Criminal Appeals for review of an Article 69 decision would not establish a right to the assistance of government furnished counsel in preparing the submission. If, however, the Court of Criminal Appeals grants the application, the accused would receive the assistance of counsel under Article 70 in proceedings on the merits of the case before the Court of Criminal Appeals.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 914. APPELLATE DEFENSE COUNSEL IN DEATH PENALTY CASES.

Section 870 of title 10, United States Code (article 70 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f) To the greatest extent practicable, in any capital case, at least one defense counsel under subsection (c) shall, as determined by the Judge Advocate General, be learned in the law applicable to such cases. If necessary, this counsel may be a civilian and, if so, may be compensated in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 914 would amend Article 70 to require, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one appellate defense counsel shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases in any case in which the death penalty was adjudged at trial. This change would provide the accused with the same access to an expert in death penalty litigation that is currently provided to defendants in Article III courts and before military commissions under Chapter 47a of Title 10.

Article 71 – Execution of Sentence; Suspension of Sentence

10 U.S.C. § 871

This Report would consolidate Articles 57 (Effective date of sentences), Article 57a (Deferment of sentences), and Article 71 (Execution of sentence; suspension of sentence) into Article 57. See Article 57, supra. Accordingly, the proposed legislation would strike Article 71.

Article 72 – Vacation of Suspension
10 U.S.C. § 872

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 72 to authorize a special court-martial convening authority to detail a judge advocate to preside at the hearing that must be held before a suspended sentence can be vacated.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 72 establishes the due process requirements to vacate a suspended court-martial sentence. In all general courts-martial and in special courts-martial where a bad-conduct discharge was adjudged, the special court-martial convening authority must personally conduct a hearing on the alleged violation. The special court-martial convening authority then forwards the record of the hearing to the general court-martial convening authority, who may vacate the suspension. In all other special courts-martial and summary courts-martial cases, Article 72 does not prescribe specific procedural requirements.[1]

3. Historical Background

Article 72 has not been substantially revised since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Vacation proceedings are conducted pursuant to R.C.M. 1109. A vacation hearing utilizes the rules applied in Article 32 proceedings under R.C.M. 405(g), (h)(1) and (i). In view of the impending changes to R.C.M. 405(g) implementing the recent amendments to Article 32, Part II of this report will address whether additional changes are needed to ensure that R.C.M. 1109 contains adequate procedural rules.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.1 governs the procedures for revoking a probationary or suspended sentence. Under the rule, a magistrate judge first conducts a probable cause hearing to determine if there is probable cause to believe that a violation occurred. If there is probable cause, a revocation hearing is held. At the revocation hearing the defendant is entitled to discovery and may present evidence and cross-examine adverse witnesses. The rules of evidence do not apply at a revocation hearing,[4] and a violation does not need to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.[5] If the judge finds that the defendant violated the terms of the suspension or probation, the judge may revoke the suspension and resentence the defendant.[6] Revocation is mandatory if the defendant possessed a firearm, a controlled substance, or refused to take required drug tests.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 72: Amend Article 72 to allow the special court-martial convening authority to detail a judge advocate to conduct the vacation hearing.

This proposal removes the requirement that the special court-martial convening authority personally hold the vacation hearing. Instead, a judge advocate could be detailed to conduct the hearing.

This change would enable the convening authority to assign the responsibilities to an individual experienced in hearing procedures. As under current law, the results of the hearing would be provided to the general court-martial convening authority, who would continue to exercise discretion as to whether the suspension should be vacated.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to vacation proceedings in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice, and by enhancing efficiency during the post-trial phase of the court-martial process.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 915. AUTHORITY FOR HEARING ON VACATION OF SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE TO BE CONDUCTED BY QUALIFIED JUDGE ADVOCATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 872 of title 10, United States Code (article 72) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "The special court-martial convening authority may detail a judge advocate, who is certified under section 827(b) of this title (article 27(b)), to conduct the hearing.".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—Such section (article) is further amended—

(1) in the last sentence of subsection (a), by striking "if he so desires" and inserting "if the probationer so desires"; and

(2) in the second sentence of subsection (b)—

(A) by striking "If he" and inserting "If the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction"; and

(B) by striking "section 871(c) of this title (article 71(c))." and inserting "section 857 of this title (article 57)).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 915 would amend Article 72, which establishes the process for vacating a suspended court-martial sentence. The amendments would authorize a special court-martial convening authority to detail a judge advocate qualified under Article 27(b) to preside at the vacation hearing, which must be held before a suspended sentence can be vacated. The detailed judge advocate would replace the special court-martial convening authority at the hearing and would make factual determinations about whether a violation occurred. Under current law, the procedures applicable at vacation hearings under Article 72 are prescribed by cross-reference to R.C.M. 405, which provides the rules and procedures applicable at Article 32 hearings. The recent changes to Article 32 (Preliminary hearing) and R.C.M. 405 no longer provide a hearing structure that can be used in vacation proceedings. The implementing rules for Article 72 will be updated to reflect this change and to provide procedures applicable at vacation hearings.

Article 73 – Petition for a New Trial
10 U.S.C. § 873

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 73 by increasing the period to file a petition for a new trial from two to three years, the time period provided in similar civilian proceedings.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 73 permits an accused to petition the Judge Advocate General for a new trial because of "newly discovered evidence or fraud on the court." Under the statute, the time to file a petition is limited to two years from when the convening authority approved the sentence. If the case is pending on appeal, the Judge Advocate General must forward the petition to the appellate court for an appropriate decision.

3. Historical Background

When the UCMJ was first enacted in 1950, an accused's ability to petition the Judge Advocate General for a new trial was more limited. Petitions were only allowed within one year and were limited to cases that included at least a bad-conduct discharge or confinement of at least a year.[1] In 1968, the ability to file a petition was expanded to include all courts-martials and the time to file a petition was extended to two years.[2] Other than minor changes, the statute has not changed substantively since 1968.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 73 through R.C.M. 1210, which restricts the circumstances when a petition for a new trial may be granted. Under the rule, a petition for new trial, for example, may not be granted because of newly discovered evidence when an accused pled guilty to an offense, or when the new evidence could have been discovered by the petitioner through the exercise of due diligence. In practice, most petitions are filed when the case is still pending before an appellate court and are resolved at that time.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, a motion for new trial because of newly discovered evidence may be filed within three years of the verdict.[3]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 73: Amend Article 73 to expand the time to file a petition for a new trial from two years to three years.

This proposal would align military justice practice with federal civilian practice. In 1968, when Article 73 was amended to increase the time period for filing a petition for a new trial to two years, this was consistent with federal civilian practice. When the federal rules were amended to expand the time period to three years in 1998, no similar change was made to Article 73.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to petitions for a new trial in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 916. EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PETITION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The first sentence of section 873 of title 10, United States Code (article 73 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "two years after approval by the convening authority of a court-martial sentence," and inserting "three years after the date of the entry of judgment under section 860c of this title (article 60c).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 916 would amend Article 73 to conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 60 and to increase the time period for an accused to petition for a new trial from two years to three years, consistent with the three-year period in Fed. R. Crim. P. 33(b)(1).

Articles 74-75 – Remission and Suspension & Restoration

10 U.S.C. §§ 874-75

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 75 to authorize regulations governing eligibility for pay and allowances during the period after a court-martial sentence is set aside or disapproved until any sentence is imposed upon a new trial or rehearing. Part II of the Report will propose rules implementing the change to Article 75. This Report recommends no change to Article 74.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 74 provides the Service Secretaries and their designees the power to remit or suspend any part of an unexecuted part of any sentence, with two exceptions: (1) the power to act on a death sentence is retained by the President under Article 71(a); and (2) with respect to a sentence to life without parole, the Secretary concerned can only act after the accused has served no less than 20 years confinement, and may not delegate this power. Article 74 also gives the Service Secretaries the ability to substitute an administrative discharge for a punitive discharge or dismissal.

Article 75 concerns restoration of a member's rights, privileges and property following a court-martial conviction. The statute is divided into three subsections. Subsection (a) authorizes the President to prescribe regulations for the restoration of all rights, privileges, and property affected by an executed part of a court-martial sentence, except discharge or dismissal, which has been set aside or disapproved unless a new trial or rehearing is ordered and such executed part is included in a sentence imposed upon the new trial or rehearing. Subsection (b) provides that if a previously executed sentence of dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge is not imposed at a new trial, the Service Secretary can either allow the accused to serve out the remainder of his or her enlistment, or shall substitute an appropriate administrative discharge. Subsection (c) provides that if a previously executed sentence of dismissal is not imposed on a new trial, the Secretary concerned shall substitute an appropriate administrative discharge, and the commissioned officer dismissed by the sentence may be reappointed by the President alone to the commissioned grade and rank that, in the opinion of the President, the former officer would have attained had he or she not been dismissed.

3. Historical Background

Article 74 has remained unchanged since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950, except for one amendment in 2000 that added a restriction on the Service Secretary's authority to delegate powers for sentences of life without parole.[1] Article 75 has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was first enacted.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

DOD Instruction 1325.7 guides the services' implementation of Articles 74 and 75. The Instruction governs the administration of military correctional facilities, clemency and parole, restoration, and reenlistment. Under the Instruction, each Service Secretary is required to establish a Clemency and Parole Board to assist the Secretary to exercise clemency, parole, and mandatory supervised release authority, and to serve as the primary authority for administration of clemency, parole, mandatory supervised release, restoration to duty, and reenlistment actions. The Military Department Clemency and Parole Board has approval authority for nearly all clemency, parole, mandatory supervised release, restoration to duty, and reenlistment actions. The Boards strive to achieve uniformity, effectiveness, and efficiency in the administration of corrections functions and clemency and supervision programs, and are instructed to foster the safe and appropriate release of military offenders under terms and conditions consistent with the needs of society, the rights and interests of victims, and the rehabilitation of the prisoner.

Currently, the Army, Navy and Air Force each independently operate separate clemency and parole boards. The Coast Guard operates an independent clemency board, but utilizes the Navy board for matters relating to parole. To promote consistency in action, representatives from the Military Department Clemency and Parole Boards must meet at least semiannually to exchange views on clemency, parole, and mandatory supervised release philosophy; procedures; significant cases; and similar matters. Outside of the military justice system, as an additional check and balance, Congress has enabled the Service Secretaries, acting primarily through administrative boards, to correct military records and review discharges or dismissals.[3] These boards are not intended to circumvent the military justice system, but only to review matters submitted under certain guidelines and to act when necessary to correct an error or remove an injustice.[4]

There has been litigation on whether an accused, while pending a rehearing, is entitled to pay and allowances at his or her former grade. As a result of this litigation, current law has been interpreted as providing that an accused will not receive pay and allowances at the former grade, even if performing full military duties while awaiting the rehearing.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The federal parole system was created in 1910 and granted the power of parole over prisoners sentenced to terms of one year or more to boards of parole at several penitentiaries and prisons.[6] In 1930, Congress materially altered the parole system by disbanding the multiple board concept for a single parole board in the Department of Justice.[7] In 1987, the adoption of sentencing guidelines precipitated the removal of parole for all defendants whose offenses were committed on or after November 1, 1987.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendations 74: No change to Article 74.

In light of the well-developed case law and stable practice concerning Article 74, a statutory change is not necessary. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 74.

Recommendation 75: Amend Article 75 to require the President to establish rules governing the eligibility for pay and allowances during the period after a court-martial sentence is set aside or disapproved.

Under this proposal, the President would establish rules governing the eligibility criteria for pay and allowances during the period after a court-martial sentence is set aside or disapproved. This would clarify the circumstances under which pay and allowances would be authorized during the pendency of the new trial.

The proposed amendment would clarify the authority to provide pay and allowances to a servicemember who is performing duties while pending rehearing to receive pay and allowances. Part II of this Report will propose rules limiting this provision to periods when an accused is not in confinement while awaiting the rehearing.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Articles 74 and 75 are in addition to the Service Secretaries' clemency and parole authority under 10 U.S.C. §§ 951-954.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 917. RESTORATION.

Section 875 of title 10, United States Code (article 75 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(d) The President shall prescribe regulations, with such limitations as the President considers appropriate, governing eligibility for pay and allowances for the period after the date on which an executed part of a court-martial sentence is set aside.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 917 would amend Article 75, which provides the basic rules and procedures for the restoration of a member's rights, privileges, and property when a court-martial conviction is set aside during review. As amended, the statute would authorize the President to establish regulations governing when an accused may receive pay and allowances while pending a rehearing. The implementing rules will set forth the authority to provide pay and allowances to an accused who is pending a rehearing, performing duties, and not in confinement.

Article 76 – Finality of Proceedings, Findings, and Sentences
10 U.S.C. § 876

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 76. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 76.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 76 concerns the finality of courts-martial. Under the statute, the findings and sentence of a court-martial that have been approved, reviewed, or affirmed as required by the UCMJ are final and conclusive on all courts and agencies of the United States.

3. Historical Background

Other than minor changes, Article 76 has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 76 serves to provide finality to court-martial verdicts and to limit the collateral review of courts-martial by other courts and agencies. The Supreme Court has addressed Article 76 in the context of identifying the standards and procedures applicable to collateral review of courts-martial.[2] The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has addressed Article 76 in the context of collateral review within the military justice system.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice, a federal judgment generally becomes final for appellate review and claim preclusion purposes when the district court "disassociates" itself from the case, leaving nothing to be done except the execution of the judgment.[4] United States district court orders that are properly appealed may be reviewed by an appellate court.[5] For cases

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 76's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 76.

Article 76a – Leave Required to be Taken Pending Review of Certain Court-Martial Convictions

10 U.S.C. § 876a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align the language of Article 76a with proposed changes in Article 60 (Action by the Convening Authority) and the proposed new Article 60c (Entry of judgment), with no substantive changes. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 76a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 76a authorizes the services, at their discretion, to involuntarily place an accused on leave if the accused has been sentenced to an unsuspended punitive discharge or dismissal that has been approved by the convening authority.

3. Historical Background

Article 76a was enacted in 1981, and was amended in 1983 to address the status of personnel who had been convicted at courts-martial but whose cases were in the process of appellate review.[1] The statute was designed to give the services the option of placing the accused on involuntary leave following a court-martial conviction where the accused's sentence included a dismissal or a punitive discharge. Prior to Article 76a, the services had no other option for an accused in this scenario but to retain the individual in a full-pay status pending completion of review.

4. Contemporary Practice

The term "appellate leave" is used to refer to both involuntary appellate leave of Article 76a and voluntary appellate leave. The accused frequently requests to be placed on appellate leave either through an obligation in a pretrial agreement or on the accused's own volition. A servicemember in appellate leave status has access to medical, dental, exchange, and commissary benefits. The member is placed in a no-pay status, except for payments attributable to accrued leave.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Although largely a military specific issue, appellate leave draws some similarities to circumstances in which certain public officials are placed on involuntary administrative leave without pay pending the conclusion of a criminal or administrative investigation.[2]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 76a: Amend Article 76a to align the statute with proposed changes in Articles 60, 60a, 60b, and 60c, with no substantive changes.

Given the well-developed case law addressing Article 76a's provisions, a substantive statutory change is not necessary. The statute allows the government to remove personnel from a unit who have been convicted at courts-martial and whose sentence includes dismissal or a punitive discharge. This serves to preserve good order and discipline within the unit and restricts expenditures on pay and allowances for those sentenced to discharge or dismissal. In some cases convicted members find appellate leave advantageous in terms of early separation from the military environment and an opportunity to transition to civilian life.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 918. LEAVE REQUIREMENTS PENDING REVIEW OF CERTAIN COURT-MARTIAL CONVICTIONS.

Section 876a of title 10, United States Code (article 76a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking ", as approved under section 860 of this title (article 60),"; and

[2] 5 U.S.C. § 7532.

(2) in the second sentence, by striking "on which the sentence is approved under section 860 of this title (article 60)" and inserting "of the entry of judgment under section 860c of this title (article 60c).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 918 would align the language of Article 76a with proposed changes in Article 60 (Action by the Convening Authority) and the proposed new Article 60c (Entry of Judgment), with no substantive changes. Article 76a currently authorizes the services, at their discretion, to involuntarily place an accused on leave if the accused has been sentenced to an unsuspended punitive discharge or dismissal that has been approved by the convening authority.

Article 76b – Lack of Mental Capacity or Mental Responsibility: Commitment of Accused for Examination and Treatment

10 U.S.C. § 876b

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 76b. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 76b.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 76b provides the rules and procedures applicable when an accused is found either mentally incompetent to stand trial, or not guilty by reason of lack of mental responsibility. Under subsection (a) of the statute, when an accused is found incompetent to stand trial, the accused is committed to the custody of the Attorney General. The Attorney General must then follow the requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d). After an initial period of required hospitalization, the accused is either returned to the custody of the convening authority (if the accused is determined to be competent) or indefinitely hospitalized until found competent pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4246. Under subsection (b), when an accused is found not guilty by reason of lack of mental responsibility, the court-martial must conduct a hearing pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4243. During that hearing, the accused must prove by clear and convincing evidence that he no longer poses a threat of bodily injury or serious property damage due to mental disease or defect. If the charged crime did not involve bodily injury or serious damage to property, the accused's burden is only by a preponderance of the evidence. If the accused fails to meet this standard, he may be committed to the custody of the Attorney General. The Attorney General must then follow the procedures of 18 U.S.C. § 4243 concerning the accused's hospitalization.

3. Historical Background

Article 76b was added to the Code in 1996, the same year that the principal underlying federal statute (18 U.S.C. § 4243—Hospitalization of a person found not guilty only by reason of insanity) was last amended.[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 76b, in part, through R.C.M. 909, which provides the procedures for incompetence determination hearings. Findings of mental incompetency and findings of not guilty due to lack of mental responsibility are exceptionally rare in military practice.[2] When these matters are raised, the procedures of Article 76b and R.C.M. 909 are generally followed without issue.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The rules and procedures applicable under Article 76b largely mirror the rules and procedures applicable in federal civilian practice with respect to commitment of the accused for mental examination and treatment, as codified in 18 U.S.C. §§ 4241-4247. Given the purposeful modeling of Article 76b off of the corollary Title 18 statutes cited above, there is little variation in military practice and federal civilian practice in this area.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 76b: No change to Article 76b.

Article 76b reflects current federal law and practice.

The statute and the rule implementing the statute are uncontroversial and stable, and there are no reported problems with the statute in its current form.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures of the civilian sector insofar as practicable in the area of mental incapacity and lack of mental responsibility.

Subchapter X. Punitive Articles

Article 77 – Principals
10 U.S.C. § 877

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 77. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 77.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 77 sets forth a standard of accountability that applies to all offenses under the UCMJ. Under Article 77, a person is liable as a principal if the person: (1) commits an offense under the UCMJ; (2) aids, abets, counsels, commands, or procures the commission of an offense under the UCMJ; or (3) causes the commission of an offense under the UCMJ.

3. Historical Background

Principal liability was a common-law concept used in American military law from 1775 to 1949.[1] The inclusion of Article 77 in the UCMJ as enacted in 1950 provided a specific statutory provision and replaced the common-law distinctions between aider and abettor and accessory-before-the-fact liability. Article 77 has not been amended since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 77—which applies the doctrine of principals to all offenses under the UCMJ—does not establish a separate offense. In addition to covering perpetrators, criminal liability under Article 77 extends to others who assist, encourage, advise, instigate, counsel, command, or procure another person to commit an offense; or who assist, encourage, or advise another in the commission of the offense.[3]

[2] 10 U.S.C. § 877.

[3] Article 77 is often used to charge and hold accountable servicemembers as principals under an aiding and abetting theory. See, e.g., United States v. Mitchell, 66 M.J. 176, 180 (C.A.A.F. 2008) (accused was guilty of indecent assault for encouraging perpetrator to have sex with the victim). But see, e.g., United States v. Bennitt, 72 M.J. 266, 269 (C.A.A.F. 2013) (accused was not guilty of involuntary manslaughter for a death caused by overdose after he prepared the drug for the victim); United States v. Simmons, 63 M.J. 89, 93-94 (C.A.A.F. 2006) (accused was not guilty of a physical assault when he failed to intervene and stop the fight because he did not share assailant's criminal intent).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2 (Principals) is nearly identical to Article 77.[4] The only difference between 18 U.S.C. § 2 and Article 77 is that the former includes the word "induces" in the list of actions describing principal liability, whereas Article 77 does not.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 77: No change to Article 77.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 77's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by minimizing change when established military law is similar to the law applied in U.S. district courts.

[4] The legislative history of Article 77 indicates that Congress intended both statutes to share the same scope. Uniform Code of Military Justice, Hearings on H.R. 2498 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Armed Services, 81st Cong. 1240 (1949).

[5] Compare Article 77 ("Any person punishable under this chapter who . . . aids, abets, counsels, commands, or procures its commission. . . ") with 18 U.S.C. § 2 ("Whoever . . . aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission . . . .") (emphasis added).

Article 78 – Accessory After the Fact
10 U.S.C. § 878

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 78. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 78.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 78 prohibits a person subject to the UCMJ from receiving, comforting, or assisting an offender for the purpose of hindering or preventing the apprehension, trial, or punishment of the offender.

3. Historical Background

Article 78 was derived from 18 U.S.C. § 3 and conforms to prior military practice.[1] Article 78 has not been amended since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 78 imposes criminal liability on those who knowingly render assistance to offenders after the offender has committed the crime, provided that those giving assistance do so knowing that an offense punishable by the UCMJ has been committed.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 3 (Accessory after the fact) is nearly identical to Article 78. The only difference between 18 U.S.C. § 3 and Article 78 is that the former includes the word "relieves" in the list of actions describing accessory after the fact, whereas Article 78 does not.[3]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 78: No change to Article 78.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 78's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance of minimizing change when established military law is the law applied in U.S. district courts.

Article 79 – Conviction of Lesser Included Offense
10 U.S.C. § 879

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 79 to authorize the President to designate an authoritative but non-exhaustive list of lesser included offenses for all punitive articles in the UCMJ. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual provisions implementing Article 79 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 79 defines lesser included offenses under military law as those "necessarily included" in a greater offense, or attempts to commit either the charged offense or an offense necessarily included. Article 79 does not otherwise provide a list of lesser included offenses to specific punitive articles in the UCMJ.

3. Historical Background

Article 79 was derived[1] from the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[2] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[3] In the 1951 Manual, the President provided a list of lesser included offenses for the punitive articles, styled as the "Table of Commonly Included Offenses."[4] However, the introduction to this Table cautioned practitioners that it was only intended as a guide; it was neither an all-inclusive list nor could it be applied mechanically in every case.[5]

[2] Before the UCMJ was enacted, the military employed by regulation a "lesser kindred offense" doctrine. The Articles of War did not contain a statutory provision for lesser included offenses. For example, in 1890, an Army instruction manual provided that, "[i]f the evidence proves the commission of an offense less than that specified, yet kindred thereto, the court may except words of the specification, substitute others instead, pronounce the guilt and innocence of the substituted and excepted words respectively, and then find the accused not guilty of the charge, but guilty of the lesser kindred offense." P. HENRY RAY, INSTRUCTIONS FOR COURTS-MARTIAL AND JUDGE ADVOCATES (1890). It was not until 1921 that the MCM for the first time employed the phrase "lesser included offense." 4. Contemporary Practice

The lesser included offense doctrine provides the accused with notice of potential offenses that the accused should be prepared to defend against at trial as well as the basis to plead double jeopardy in a later case.[6]

Article 79 mirrors Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 31(c) defining lesser included offenses, and the test for determining whether an offense is a lesser included offense under Article 79 – the elements test – is derived from the test used by the federal civilian courts under Rule 31(c).[7] Under the elements test, an offense is necessarily included in a greater offense when the elements of the lesser offense are a subset of the elements of the charged offense.[8]

Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial, which covers substantive offenses, provides a list of lesser included offenses for many of the punitive articles. The listing of lesser included offenses in Part IV has been treated as constituting persuasive but not binding authority.[9]

Applying the elements test as the basis for satisfying Article 79 has resulted in exclusion of Article 134 offenses as lesser included offenses of any enumerated punitive article.[10] This is because the terminal element of Article 134, requiring an offense to be of a nature to discredit the armed forces or prejudicial to good order and discipline, is neither articulated nor inherent in any of the enumerated punitive articles. As a result, offenses that otherwise would be factually subsumed within a greater offense, e.g. negligent homicide as a lesser included offense of murder, do not currently qualify as a lesser included offense because of the terminal element of Article 134.[11]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 31(c) is identical to Article 79. Both military and federal courts utilize the "elements test" to determine "necessarily included" lesser offenses. A minority of the states follow this approach as well.[12] However, the "elements

test" is not constitutionally required if the accused receives notice of the lesser included offenses.[13] Accordingly, the majority of states employ one of the three alternate theories: (1) cognate-pleadings approach;[14] (2) cognate evidence approach;[15] and (3) inherently-related offense approach.[16] One example is the approach taken by the State of Florida, where the Florida Supreme Court provides notice by publishing an exhaustive list of lesser included offenses for the state's criminal code.[17]

[13] Federal courts considering the issue have held that the due process notice requirement may be satisfied even if the indictment or information was deficient so long as the defendant received actual notice of the charges against him and the inadequate indictment did not lead to a trial with an unacceptable risk of convicting the innocent. See Hartman v. Lee, 283 F.3d 190, 195 (4th Cir. 2002); Parks v. Hargett, 188 F.3d 519, *3 (10th Cir. 1999) ("need not decide whether the charging information in this case was sufficiently specific because it is clear that Parks received actual notice of the specific charges against him"); Hulstine v. Morris, 819 F.2d 861, 864 (8th Cir.1987) ("Due process requirements may be satisfied if a defendant receives actual notice of the charges against him, even if the indictment or information is deficient.").

For a general discussion of the superiority of actual notice to constructive notice, see Espinosa v. United Student Aid Funds, Inc., 553 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Because due process does not require actual notice of a pending action, it follows a fortiori that actual notice satisfies due process"), aff'd 559 U.S. 260, 261 (2010) ("[A]ctual notice more than satisfied due process rights").

[14] The cognate-pleadings approach uses the pleadings, rather than the statutory elements, to determine whether a lesser-included offense charge is acceptable. States using this approach compare the elements, as modified by the defendant's charging instrument, to the elements of the proposed lesser-included offense. At least seven states utilize this approach, including California, Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Washington. Id. at 240 (citations omitted).

[15] The cognate-evidence approach allows a court to examine all the evidence admitted during the course of the trial in determining whether an offense is truly a lesser-included offense. Commentators have noted that this approach often results in a larger universe of available lesser included offenses at trial with the added likelihood that defendants may be deprived of due process "notice" as to which criminal theories of liability they should be prepared to defend themselves against. See Peters, supra note 12, at 240 (citations omitted). Nonetheless, at least five states still employ this approach, including: Alabama; Alaska; Kentucky; Oklahoma; and Utah. Id. at 241 (citations omitted).

[16] The inherently-related offense approach is the most liberal construction theory applied in the United States and is utilized by the fewest states. It permits a lesser included offense instruction even if the proof of one offense does not invariably require proof of the others as long as the two offenses serve the same legislative goals. This is the approach championed by the Model Penal Code, Section 107(4) (1980), and at least four states currently employ this test: Illinois, Mississippi, Montana, and New Jersey. See Peters, supra note 12, at 242 (citations omitted).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 79: Amend Article 79 to provide statutory authority for the President to designate lesser included offenses.

The military justice system has a significant number of unique, but closely related, military offenses, which are not "necessarily included" lesser offenses under the "elements test." If authorized by statute, the President could publish an authoritative, non-exhaustive list of "reasonably included" lesser offenses. Convening authorities could then refer to trial only the charges that capture the gravamen of the accused's misconduct, instead of having to file additional, alternative charges, which unnecessarily expose the accused to excessively greater criminal liability. The President's list would afford trial participants actual notice of lesser included offenses pertinent to the case, compared to the "elements test," which only gives constructive notice of these offenses.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1002. CONVICTION OF OFFENSE CHARGED, LESSER INCLUDED OFFENSES, AND ATTEMPTS.

Section 879 of title 10, United States Code (article 79 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§879. Art. 79. Conviction of offense charged, lesser included offenses, and attempts

"(a) IN GENERAL.—An accused may be found guilty of any of the following:

"(1) The offense charged.

"(2) A lesser included offense.

"(3) An attempt to commit the offense charged.

"(4) An attempt to commit a lesser included offense, if the attempt is an offense in its own right.

"(b) DEFINITION.—In this section (article), the term 'lesser included offense' means—

"(1) an offense that is necessarily included in the offense charged; and

"(2) any lesser included offense so designated by regulation prescribed by the President.

"(c) REGULATORY AUTHORITY.—Any designation of a lesser included offense in a regulation referred to in subsection (b) shall be reasonably included in the greater offense.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1002 would amend Article 79 and retitle the statute as "Conviction of offense charged, lesser included offenses, and attempts." As amended, Article 79 would authorize the President to designate an authoritative, but non-exhaustive, list of lesser included offenses for each punitive article of the UCMJ in addition to judicially determined lesser included offenses. This change would provide actual notice of applicable lesser included offenses to all parties. Implementing provisions will provide the President with the flexibility to designate factually similar offenses as lesser included offenses under a "reasonably included" standard. The "reasonably included" standard would enhance actual notice by requiring a measurable relationship between the greater offense and the listed offense.

Presidentially designated lesser included offenses under Article 79 and the implementing provisions and judicially determined lesser included offenses would work in concert at trial. The statute's implementing provisions would explain to practitioners that potential lesser included offenses may be established at trial either by: (1) designation by the President; or (2) by the military judge at trial when the military judge determines that an offense raised by the evidence at trial is "necessarily included within the greater offense."

Article 80 – Attempts
10 U.S.C. § 880

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 80. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 80.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 80 prohibits an act by a person subject to the UCMJ done with the intent to commit an offense under the UCMJ. The act must amount to more than mere preparation but need not result in commission of the offense.

3. Historical Background

Article 80 was derived from prior military practice under the Articles of War and Articles for Government of the Navy.[1] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 80 imposes criminal liability on offenders who perform an overt act with the specific intent to commit an offense under the UCMJ. Article 80 requires more than mere preparation to commit the target offense; the overt act must constitute a "substantial step" that directly tends to accomplish the unlawful purpose.[3] Article 79 (conviction of lesser included offense) designates attempts as lesser-included offenses with respect to every punitive article of the UCMJ.

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Attempt: the same maximum punishment as the underlying offense, except that the death penalty shall not be adjudged, the mandatory minimum punishment provisions shall not apply, and, other than for attempted murder, no confinement exceeding 20 years shall be adjudged.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 80 has no direct counterpart in federal law. Unlike the UCMJ and state law, federal law has no generally applicable crime of attempt; instead, Congress has outlawed the attempt to commit a number of individual federal crimes. Generally, it is not a crime to attempt to commit most federal offenses.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 80: No change to Article 80.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 80's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 81 – Conspiracy
10 U.S.C. § 881

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 81. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 81.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 81(a) prohibits a person from entering into an agreement with one or more other individuals to commit an offense under the UCMJ. Article 81(b) provides that in time of war, the offense is punishable by death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Enacted in 1950, Article 81 was derived from 18 U.S.C. § 371.[1] In 2006, the statute was amended to add subsection (b) which makes conspiracy in violation of the law of war that results in death an offense punishable by the death penalty at a court-martial or military commission.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under Article 81, one or more of the conspirators must do some overt act to affect the object of the conspiracy.[3] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Conspiracy: the maximum punishment authorized for the offense which is the object of the conspiracy, except that the death penalty may not be adjudged.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 371 (Conspiracy to commit offense or to defraud the United States) is nearly identical to Article 81.

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 82 – Solicitation
10 U.S.C. § 882

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would consolidate all solicitation offenses into one punitive Article. The general offense of soliciting another to commit an offense currently in Article 134 (the General Article) [1] would be migrated into Article 82 (Solicitation) to create a comprehensive "solicitation" offense which criminalizes soliciting the commission of any offense punishable under the UCMJ.[2] The punishments for all solicitation offenses would remain the same. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 82 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 82 prohibits a person from soliciting or advising others to commit any of the following four offenses: Desertion (Article 85); Mutiny (Article 94); Sedition (Article 94); or Misbehavior Before the Enemy (Article 99). Article 82 provides that if the offense solicited is attempted or committed, the accused may be punished with the punishment provided for in the commission of the offense, but if the offense solicited is not attempted or committed, the accused may be punished as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Solicitation was not an enumerated offense in either the Articles of War or the Articles for Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] Article 82 has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, the government must charge a solicitation offense under either Article 82 or Article 134, depending upon the crime solicited. Article 82 prohibits a servicemember from soliciting others to commit the offenses of desertion (Article 85), mutiny (Article 94), sedition (Article 94), or misbehavior before the enemy (Article 99), each of which has been a matter of deep concern for commanders since the inception of military justice.[5]

The maximum punishments for "solicitation" were based upon corollary Title 18 solicitation statutes.[6] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Solicitation under Article 82:

If the solicited offense has been committed, then the maximum punishment is the same as that authorized for the committed offense (including the death penalty for capital offenses); and

If the solicited offense has only been attempted, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on the specifics of the underlying offense, confinement for up to 10 years.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal law sets forth similar offenses to Article 82, including solicitation of others to commit crimes of violence,[8] bribing public officials,[9] and soliciting gifts.[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 82: Transfer the general solicitation offense defined under Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶105), to Article 82.

The proposed amendments would align solicitation offenses under Article 82.

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1003. SOLICITING COMMISSION OF OFFENSES.

Section 882 of title 10, United States Code (article 82 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§882. Art. 82. Soliciting commission of offenses

"(a) SOLICITING COMMISSION OF OFFENSES GENERALLY.—Any person subject to this chapter who solicits or advises another to commit an offense under this chapter (other than an offense specified in subsection (b)) shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) SOLICITING DESERTION, MUTINY, SEDITION, OR MISBEHAVIOR BEFORE THE ENEMY.—Any person subject to this chapter who solicits or advises another to violate section 885 of this title (article 85), section 894 of this title (article 94), or section 99 of this title (article 99)—

"(1) if the offense solicited or advised is attempted or is committed, shall be punished with the punishment provided for the commission of the offense; and

"(2) if the offense solicited or advised is not attempted or committed, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1003 would amend Article 82 and retitle the statute as "Soliciting commission of offenses." The amendments would migrate the general solicitation offense under Article 134 into Article 82, as a separate subsection before the specific solicitation offenses in the existing statute. The general solicitation offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality. Implementing provisions will maintain the same punishments for all solicitation offenses as under current law.[11]

Article 82 – Solicitation – Addendum
(Soliciting Another to Commit an Offense)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of soliciting another to commit an offense currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article) into Article 82 (Soliciting commission of offenses). Part II of this Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶105, the offense consists of soliciting or advising another to commit an offense under the UCMJ other than the four offenses of desertion, mutiny, sedition, or misbehavior before the enemy listed in Article 82, with the intent that the offense actually be committed. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated the offense of solicitation under Article 134 in the 1984 MCM.[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, the government must charge a solicitation offense under either Article 82 or Article 134, depending upon the crime solicited. The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Soliciting Another to Commit an Offense: 5 years confinement or the maximum punishment for the underlying solicited offense, whichever is less.[2]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal law sets forth similar offenses to Article 134, ¶105, including solicitation of others to commit crimes of violence,[3] bribing public officials,[4] and soliciting gifts.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-105: Migrate the general solicitation offense defined under Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶105), to Article 82.

The offense of soliciting another to commit an offense is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 83 (Current Law) – Fraudulent Enlistment, Appointment, or Separation

10 U.S.C. § 883

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 83, except to redesignate it under Article 104a as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing the new Article 104a as necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 83 prohibits servicemembers from joining or leaving the military through false or fraudulent means, or by deliberate concealment as to qualifications for enlistment or appointment or eligibility for separation.

3. Historical Background

Article 83 is derived from Article 54 of the 1920 Articles of War and Article 22(b) of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[2] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

When servicemembers enlist, they obligate themselves contractually for a term of service. This private contract between the individual and the U.S. government confers military status and jurisdiction on the individual. A fraudulent enlistment or separation does not affect the previously created status.[3]

Article 83 (Fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation) is a companion article to Article 84 (Unlawful enlistment, appointment, or separation), which concerns the criminal liability of servicemembers who assist others in obtaining a fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation.

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Fraudulent enlistment, appointment or separation: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for up to 5 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 83 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 83: No change to Article 83, except to redesignate it as Article 104a.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 83's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

This recommendation is related to this Report's recommended amendment to Article 43, which would extend the statute of limitations for Article 83 cases to the length of the period of enlistment or appointment or five years, whichever period is longer.

Article 84 (Current Law) – Unlawful Enlistment, Appointment, or Separation

10 U.S.C. § 884

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 84, except to redesignate it as Article 104b as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing the new Article 104b as necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 84 prohibits servicemembers from assisting another in joining or leaving the military through false or fraudulent means.

3. Historical Background

Article 84 derived from Article of War 55 and Article for the Government of the Navy 19.[1] Article 84 first appeared in its current form in the UCMJ. Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[2] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 84 (Unlawful enlistment, appointment, or separation) is a companion article to Article 83 (Fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation) and concerns the criminal liability of servicemembers who assist others in obtaining a fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation of officer or enlisted personnel.

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Unlawful enlistment, appointment, or separation: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for five years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 84 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

Article 84 (New Location) – Breach of Medical Quarantine
10 U.S.C. § 884

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of breaking a medical quarantine currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] into the newly re-designated Article 84 (Breach of Medical Quarantine). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual provisions implementing the new Article 84 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶100, the offense of breaking a medical quarantine requires a showing that a person who had been ordered into quarantine went beyond the limits of the quarantine before being released. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The concept of a medical quarantine is firmly rooted in nautical history: the word is derived from the Italian word "quaranta," which meant "forty," or the number of days that a ship suspected of containing diseased persons or animals would be isolated and detained before being permitted to make landfall.[2] The President first designated breaking a medical quarantine as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Each service empowers its installation commanders to declare medical quarantines in the event of a public health emergency.[4]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of breaching a medical quarantine: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 6 months and confinement for 6 months.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

42 U.S.C § 271 (Penalties for violation of quarantine laws) provides a similar offense to the offense of breaking a medical quarantine in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-100: Redesignate the offense of breaking a medical quarantine in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶100) as Article 84.

Migrating the offense of breaking medical quarantine to its own punitive article (newly redesignated Article 84, Breach of medical quarantine) locates the offense near similar "place of duty" offenses under the Code. Breach of a medical quarantine is recognized under federal criminal law and is also inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, the offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1005. BREACH OF MEDICAL QUARANTINE.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 883 (article 83 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1004, the following new section (article):

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶100.e.

"§884. Art. 84. Breach of medical quarantine

"Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is ordered into medical quarantine by a person authorized to issue such order; and

"(2) who, with knowledge of the quarantine and the limits of the quarantine, goes beyond those limits before being released from the quarantine by proper authority;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1005 would migrate the offense of "Quarantine: medical, breaking" from Article 134, the General article, to redesignated Article 84 (Breach of medical quarantine). The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 85 – Desertion
10 U.S.C. § 885

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 85. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 85.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 85 prohibits servicemembers from deserting or permanently quitting their military unit or branch of military service, or wrongfully absenting themselves to avoid hazardous duty; it also prohibits those who have not been regularly separated from enlisting or accepting an appointment in the same or another one of the armed forces without fully disclosing the fact that they have not been regularly separated; it also prohibits servicemembers from entering a foreign armed service without authority; it is punishable by death in time of war.

3. Historical Background

Desertion is one of the oldest military offenses, punishable under American military law since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] Article 85 was derived from Articles 28 and 58 of the 1948 Articles of War and Articles 4, 8, and 10 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Desertion: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on whether the absence was terminated by apprehension or with the intent to avoid hazardous duty, confinement for 2, 3, or 5 years, and, in time of war, death.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 85 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

Recommendation 85: No change to Article 85.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 85's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

Article 86 – Absence Without Leave
10 U.S.C. § 886

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 86. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 86.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 86 prohibits servicemembers from, without authority, failing to go to their place of duty or temporarily absenting themselves from their place of duty.

3. Historical Background

Like desertion, "absence without leave" has been punishable under American military law since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] Article 86 was derived from Article 61 of the 1948 Articles of War and Articles 4 and 8 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Unlike Article 85 (desertion), Article 86 (absence without leave) punishes temporary, rather than permanent, absence. And unlike the offense of desertion, which requires a specific intent to remain away from the unit or service, the offense of absence without leave requires only the general intent to be absent.[4]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Absence Without Leave, depending on the length of the absence and whether it was terminated by apprehension: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement from 1 month to 18 months.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 86 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 86: No change to Article 86.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 86's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

Article 87 – Missing Movement
10 U.S.C. § 887

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of jumping from a vessel into the water currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] into Article 87, retitling the statute as "Missing movement; jumping from vessel." Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 87 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 87 prohibits servicemembers from, by neglect or design, missing the movement of a ship, aircraft, or unit with which they are required to move.

3. Historical Background

During World War II, the United States military experienced difficulties when members of units or crews failed to show up when their units or ships moved out. The offense of missing movement was created to address this issue. This offense was designed to address the gray area between the less egregious offense of AWOL in violation of Article 86 and the more serious offense of desertion in violation of Article 85.[2] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 87 (missing movement) is a companion to Article 85 (desertion) and Article 86 (absence without leave).

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Missing Movement, depending on whether it was by design or neglect: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for up to 2 years.[4]

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶11.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 87 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 87: Transfer the offense of jumping from a vessel into the water defined under Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶¶107 & 91), to Article 87.

This change would align Missing Movement under Article 87 with jumping from a vessel into the water.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1006. MISSING MOVEMENT; JUMPING FROM VESSEL.

Section 887 of title 10, United States Code (article 87 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§887. Art. 87. Missing movement; jumping from vessel

"(a) MISSING MOVEMENT.—Any person subject to this chapter who, through neglect or design, misses the movement of a ship, aircraft, or unit with which the person is required in the course of duty to move shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) JUMPING FROM VESSEL INTO THE WATER.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully and intentionally jumps into the water from a vessel in use by the armed forces shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1006 would consolidate the offenses of "Missing movement" in existing Article 87 and "Jumping from vessel into the water" in Article 134 (the General article) into a single offense under Article 87 (Missing movement; jumping from vessel). The consolidated offense would prohibit servicemembers from, by neglect or design, missing the movement of a ship, aircraft, or unit with which they are required to move or jumping from a vessel into the water. These offenses are well-recognized concepts in military criminal law. Accordingly, they do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.[5]

[5] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 87 – Missing Movement; Jumping from Vessel – Addendum

(Jumping from Vessel into the Water)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of jumping from a vessel into the water currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] into Article 87 (Missing Movement; Jumping from Vessel). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶91, the offense prohibits servicemembers from engaging in such conduct when it is wrongful and intentional. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated jumping from a vessel into the water as an Article 134 offense in the 1984 MCM[2], although a conviction for this offense under Article 134 had been affirmed as early as 1964.[3] The offense is designed to target the dangerous and disruptive practice of individuals intentionally jumping from vessels in use by the Armed Forces, thereby endangering the safe operation of military vessels, their own lives, and the lives of would-be rescuers.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Jumping from a Vessel into the Water: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[5]

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶91.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The offense of jumping from a vessel into the water is a unique military offense with no direct counterpart in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-91: Migrate the offense of jumping from a vessel into the water in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶92) to Article 87.

Migrating the offense of jumping from a vessel into the water to Article 87 (Missing Movement) aligns the offense with the other similar subject matter offenses under the UCMJ. Intentional, wrongful jumping into the sea from a vessel is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline as it needlessly disrupts operations and possibly endangers military lives and property in follow-on rescue efforts. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 87b (New Provision) – Offenses against Correctional Custody and Restriction

10 U.S.C. § 887b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of breaking restriction currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 87b (Offenses against correctional custody and restriction). Part II of the Report will address changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 87b (Offenses against correctional custody and restriction).

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶70, the offense requires a showing that the accused went beyond the limits of the restriction in which he had been placed. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized restriction breaking since the 1921 MCM.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President designated restriction breaking as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Restriction is a form of moral restraint imposed by an order directing a person to remain within certain specified limits.[4] Servicemembers may be placed in restriction in lieu of arrest while awaiting trial by court-martial as an authorized punishment imposed via Article 15 nonjudicial punishment; or by the sentence of a court-martial.[5] Restriction can also be imposed for reasons unrelated to military justice, "in the interests of training, operations, security, or safety."[6]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Breaking Restriction: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 1 month and confinement for 1 month.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Breaking restriction is a unique military offense with no direct counterpart in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-102: Migrate the offense of breaking restriction in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶102) to Article 87b.

Migrating the restriction breaking offense to Article 87b aligns the offense with other similar subject matter offenses under the UCMJ involving violations of various forms of custody. Breaking restriction involves a direct flouting of command authority and thus is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1007. OFFENSES AGAINST CORRECTIONAL CUSTODY AND RESTRICTION.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 887a (article 87a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(2), the following new section (article):

---

[7] MCM, Part IV, ¶102.e.

"§887b. Art. 87b. Offenses against correctional custody and restriction

"(a) ESCAPE FROM CORRECTIONAL CUSTODY.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is placed in correctional custody by a person authorized to do so;

"(2) who, while in correctional custody, is under physical restraint; and

"(3) who escapes from the physical restraint before being released from the physical restraint by proper authority;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) BREACH OF CORRECTIONAL CUSTODY.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is placed in correctional custody by a person authorized to do so;

"(2) who, while in correctional custody, is under restraint other than physical restraint; and

"(3) who goes beyond the limits of the restraint before being released from the correctional custody or relieved of the restraint by proper authority;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) BREACH OF RESTRICTION.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is ordered to be restricted to certain limits by a person authorized to do so; and

"(2) who, with knowledge of the limits of the restriction, goes beyond those limits before being released by proper authority;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1007 would migrate and consolidate the offenses of "Restriction, breaking" and Correctional custody – offenses against" from Article 134 (the General article) to a new section, Article 87b (Offenses against correctional custody and restriction). These offenses are well-recognized concepts in criminal law. Accordingly, they do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.[8]

[8] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 87b (New Provision - Addendum) – Offenses against Correctional Custody and Restriction

(Correctional Custody – Offenses Against)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of "Correctional custody—offenses against" currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 87b (Offenses against correctional custody and restriction). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 87b necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶70, the offense requires a showing that the accused escaped from correctional custody or breached a restraint while in correctional custody. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

Correctional custody first came into existence in 1962 as a form of nonjudicial punishment imposed under Article 15, UCMJ.[2] The Court of Military Appeals first recognized breach of correctional custody as an Article 134 offense in 1965.[3] Thereafter, the President designated it as an Article 134 offense in the 1968 MCM.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the Offenses Against Correctional Custody: for escape, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year; for a breach of custody, bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The offenses against correctional custody are unique military offenses, with no counterpart in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-70: Migrate the offenses against correctional custody in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶70) to Article 87b.

Migrating the correctional custody offenses to Article 87b logically aligns the offense with existing UCMJ "custody" breaking offenses.[6] Correctional custody offenses are not reliant on the terminal elements of Article 134 as the act is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline.[7]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 88 – Contempt toward Officials
10 U.S.C. § 888

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 88. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 88.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 88 prohibits an officer from using contemptuous words towards certain government officials: the President, the Vice President, Congress, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of any military department, the Secretary of Homeland Security, or the governor or legislature of any State, Commonwealth, or possession in which the officer is on duty or present.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized contemptuous words towards public officials by servicemembers since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] Historically, the Articles of War criminalized contemptuous words toward public officials by officer and enlisted personnel alike.[2] The current Article 88 was derived from Article 62 of the 1920 Articles of War, however, Article 88 applies the offense to commissioned officers only.[3] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[4] Article 88 has remained virtually unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

There has only been one reported appellate case for a violation of Article 88,[5] although there have been many non-judicial proceedings and adverse administrative actions based on Article 88.[6]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Contempt toward Officials: dismissal, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 88 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 88: No change to Article 88.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 88's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

Article 89 – Disrespect Toward a Superior Commissioned Officer
10 U.S.C. § 889

1. Summary of Proposal

This would amend Article 89 by transferring the offense of assaulting a superior commissioned officer, currently under Article 90 (MCM, Part IV, ¶14), to Article 89 (Disrespect toward superior commissioned officer; assault of superior commissioned officer).[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 89 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 89 prohibits servicemembers from engaging in disrespectful behavior toward a superior commissioned officer.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized assaults against superior commissioned officers since the Revolutionary War.[2] The current Article 89 was derived from Article 63 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under Article 89, the term "superior commissioned officer" means someone within the same armed service as the accused who is a commissioned officer superior in grade to the accused, or superior in command to the accused.[5]

When the accused and the victim are members of different armed services, the superior commissioned officer must also be in the accused's chain of command or, except for

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Disrespect toward a Superior Commissioned Officer: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 89 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 89: Amend Article 89 by transfering "assaulting a superior commissioned officer" from Article 90 to Article 89.

This proposal would align similar offenses under Article 89 with technical amendments.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment .

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1008. DISRESPECT TOWARD SUPERIOR COMMISSIONED OFFICER; ASSAULT OF SUPERIOR COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

Section 889 of title 10, United States Code (article 89 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

[6] Id. at ¶13.c(1)(b).

"§889. Art. 89. Disrespect toward superior commissioned officer; assault of superior commissioned officer

"(a) DISRESPECT.—Any person subject to this chapter who behaves with disrespect toward that person's superior commissioned officer shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) ASSAULT.—Any person subject to this chapter who strikes that person's superior commissioned officer or draws or lifts up any weapon or offers any violence against that officer while the officer is in the execution of the officer's office shall be punished—

"(1) if the offense is committed in time of war, by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; and

"(2) if the offense is committed at any other time, by such punishment, other than death, as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1008 would amend Article 89 and retitle the statute as "Disrespect toward superior commissioned officer; assault of superior commissioned officer." As amended, Article 89 would include the offense of "Assaulting a superior commissioned officer," which would be transferred from Article 90. This change would align these closely related provisions in Articles 89.

Article 90 (Current Law) – Assaulting or Willfully Disobeying Superior Commissioned Officer

10 U.S.C. § 890

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 90 by transferring the offense of assaulting a superior commission officer, currently included in Article 90, to Article 89 in order to consolidate factually similar offenses.[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 90 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 90 prohibits servicemembers from both striking and disobeying a superior commissioned officer. In time of war, the offense is punishable by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized assaulting and disobeying superior commissioned officers since the Revolutionary War.[2] The current Article 90 was derived from Article 64 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 4 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Under Article 90, the term "superior commissioned officer" means someone within the same armed service as the accused who is a commissioned officer superior in grade to the accused, or superior in command to the accused, regardless of rank.[5]

When the accused and the victim are members of different armed services, the superior commissioned officer must also be in the accused's chain of command or, except for medical officers or chaplains, the superior commissioned officer and the accused must both be detained by a hostile entity.[6]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Assaulting or Willfully Disobeying a Superior Commissioned Officer: if in time of war, by death; otherwise, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for up to 10 years (for assault), or for up to 5 years (for disobedience)[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 90 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 90: Amend Article 90 to transfer the offense of "assaulting a superior commissioned officer" to Article 89.

This proposal would align similar offenses under Article 89 and amend the statute to use gender-neutral terms.

Part II of the Report will address the definition of "superior commissioned officer" when the accused and victim are in different uniformed services.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1009. WILLFULLY DISOBEYING SUPERIOR COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

Section 890 of title 10, United States Code (article 90 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

---

[7] Id. at ¶14.e.

"§890. Art. 90. Willfully disobeying superior commissioned officer

"Any person subject to this chapter who willfully disobeys a lawful command of that person's superior commissioned officer shall be punished—

"(1) if the offense is committed in time of war, by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; and

"(2) if the offense is committed at any other time, by such punishment, other than death, as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1009 would amend Article 90 by transferring the offense of "Assaulting a superior commissioned officer" to Article 89 and retitling the statute as "Willfully disobeying superior commissioned officer." This change would realign closely related provisions in Articles 89 and focus the Article as amended on the willful disobedience of a lawful command of a superior commissioned officer.

Article 91 – Insubordinate Conduct Toward Warrant Officer, Noncommissioned Officer, or Petty Officer

10 U.S.C. § 891

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 91. Part II of the Report will address any changes that may be needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 91.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 91 prohibits enlisted servicemembers and warrant officers from assaulting, disobeying, or disrespecting warrant, noncommissioned, or petty officers in the execution of their office.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized disrespectful behavior towards superior noncommissioned officers since the 1806 Articles of War.[1] The current Article 91 was derived from Article 65 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 4 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Unlike Articles 89 and 90 (which punish similar conduct toward superior commissioned officers), Article 91 does not require a superior-subordinate relationship.[4]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Insubordinate Conduct Toward Warrant Officer, Noncommissioned Officer, or

Petty Officer: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending of the specifics of the underlying offense, confinement for 3 months to 5 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 91 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart. There are, however, federal statutes that prohibit encouraging insubordination or disloyalty among the armed forces.[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 91: No change to Article 91.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 91's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Article 92 – Failure to Obey Order or Regulation
10 U.S.C. § 892

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 92. Part II of the Report will address any changes that may be needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 92.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 92 prohibits violations of a general order or regulation; violations of "other lawful orders"; and dereliction of military duties.

General orders or regulations are those published by the President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of Homeland Security (for the Coast Guard), the service secretaries of the various military departments, general court-martial convening authorities, and general and flag officers in command.[1] "Other lawful orders" include "local orders" whose violations are not prohibited by Article 90(2), 91, or 92(1).[2] Military duties may be created by treaty, statute, regulation, lawful order, standard operating procedure, or custom of the service.[3] For instance, Article 92 has been used to address violations of the international law of armed conflict and the failure to report such violations.[4]

3. Historical Background

Concern for disobedience to orders and derelictions of duty are as old as the military itself and violations were typically prosecuted under the "General Article" of the Articles of War.[5] Article 92 was derived from Article 96 (the "general article") of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[6] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 92 covers a broad range of orders and duties. An order is presumed lawful.[7] However, this is a rebuttable presumption determined as a matter of law by the military judge.[8]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Failure to Obey Order or Regulation: Dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on the violation and whether it was willful or through neglect, confinement for 3 months to 2 years.[9]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 92 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

In civilian employment practice, misconduct is typically addressed through administrative or employment related proceedings.[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 92: No change to Article 92.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 92's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

Article 93 – Cruelty and Maltreatment
10 U.S.C. § 893

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 93. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 93.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 93 prohibits abuses of authority by superior ranking military members over persons subject to their orders. Misconduct includes assaults on subordinates, imposing improper punishments, and sexual harassment.[1] The alleged physical or mental maltreatment must satisfy an objective standard, which involves ascertaining whether the conduct reasonably could have caused physical or mental harm or suffering.[2] The imposition of legitimate military duties does not constitute this offense, regardless of whether those duties are arduous, hazardous, or both.[3]

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized maltreatment of a subordinate by a superior since the nineteenth century.[4] The current Article 93 was derived from Article 96 (the "general article") of the 1948 Articles of War, and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[5] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[6] the statute has remained unchanged.

[6] Act of May 5, 1950, Pub. L. No. 81-506, ch. 169, 64 Stat. 108.

4. Contemporary Practice

The essence of the offense is abuse of authority.[7] In practice, there is considerable overlap between misconduct addressed by both Article 93 (Cruelty and Maltreatment) and Article 92 (Failure to Obey Order or Regulation). Although Article 93 addresses a wide range of potential misconduct, each service also has published punitive orders and regulations addressing specific misconduct, such as hazing, sexual harassment, and inappropriate sexual acts between recruiters and recruits and between trainers and trainees.

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Cruelty and Maltreatment: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for one year.[8] By contrast, the maximum punishment for a violation of Article 92 (Failure to Obey Order or Regulation) is 2 years.[9]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 93 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart. 18 U.S.C. § 2191 (Cruelty to Seamen) is the closest federal civilian equivalent offense to maltreatment; in practice it has been used primarily to establish tort liability in maltreatment cases in federal civil disputes.[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 93: No change to Article 93.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 93's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

Article 93a – Prohibited Activities with Military Recruit or Trainee by Person in Position of Special Trust

10 U.S.C. § 893a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would add a new provision, Article 93a, to the UCMJ. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 93a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

The proposed statute has not yet been enacted.

3. Historical Background

The existing Article 93 (Cruelty and Maltreatment) prohibits conduct that would be an "abuse of authority" by superior ranking military members toward persons subject to their orders. Under current law, however, a consensual sexual relationship between a subordinate and a superior, without more, does not constitute "maltreatment."[1]

The 2014 National Defense Authorization Act, § 1741 ("Enhanced Protections for Prospective Members and New Members of the Armed Forces During Entry-Level Processing and Training"), directed the DoD to take the following actions:

§ 1741(a): maintain policies defining and proscribing inappropriate and prohibited relationships, communications, conduct, and contact (including consensual interactions) between recruits and trainees and their respective recruiters and trainers;

§ 1741(b): ensure any military member engaging in conduct referenced in 1741 (a) be subject to prosecution.

According to the Report on Protections for Prospective Members and New Members of the Armed Forces During Entry-Level Processing and Training (May 2014), "statutes and regulations are in place to hold offenders appropriately accountable when prospective and new members of the military are victimized by servicemembers who exercise control over them."[2]

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Fuller, 54 M.J. 107, 110-11 (C.A.A.F. 2000) (holding that E-3's voluntary sexual acts with her E-5 training cadre did not constitute maltreatment).

[2] DEP'T OF DEFENSE, REPORT ON PROTECTIONS FOR PROSPECTIVE MEMBERS AND NEW MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES DURING ENTRY-LEVEL PROCESSING AND TRAINING 1, 12-13 (May 2014).

4. Contemporary Practice

Currently, all of the services prohibit by regulation sexual relations between recruiters and recruits, and trainers and trainees.[3] Accordingly, prohibited sexual relations can be punished under Article 92 (Failure to Obey Order or Regulation) with confinement for 2 years.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal law criminalizes sexual acts between prison guards and prisoners in a federal prison.[4] A conviction for this offense requires sex offender registration.[5]

Thirty states criminalize sexual relations between teachers and students,[6] with seven states prohibiting sex even if the student is over the age of 18.[7] In all 30 states, a conviction for this offense requires sex offender registration.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 93a: Enact new Article 93a.

This proposal provides enhanced accountability for sexual misconduct committed by recruiters and trainers in the recruiting and basic military training environments.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by enacting a unique punitive article that promotes the military's interest in ensuring a qualified, effective armed force.

The Judicial Proceedings Panel decided to study whether Article 120 should provide for a strict liability offense (which necessarily would qualify as a sex offender registration offense) or whether non-Art. 120 offenses would be appropriate for this misconduct, and if so, whether they should be sex offender registration offenses.[8]

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1010. PROHIBITED ACTIVITIES WITH MILITARY RECRUIT OR TRAINEE BY PERSON IN POSITION OF SPECIAL TRUST.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 893 (article 93 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

"§893a. Art. 93a. Prohibited activities with military recruit or trainee by person in position of special trust

"(a) ABUSE OF TRAINING LEADERSHIP POSITION.—Any person subject to this chapter—

[7] Those seven states include Alabama (19 years old); Arkansas (21 years old); Connecticut (high school students); Michigan (high school students over 18 years old); North Carolina; Washington (students over 18, but teacher must be at least 5 years older); Utah (persons under the age of 21 receiving state services).

[8] JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL—INITIAL REPORT 15, 37-43 (February 4, 2015), ("[T]he 2012 version of Article 120 does not sufficiently criminalize sexual relationships between senior and subordinates when force or the threat of force is not overt.").

"(1) who is an officer, a noncommissioned officer, or a petty officer;

"(2) who is in a training leadership position with respect to a specially protected junior member of the armed forces; and

"(3) who engages in prohibited sexual activity with such specially protected junior member of the armed forces;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) ABUSE OF POSITION AS MILITARY RECRUITER.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is a military recruiter and engages in prohibited sexual activity with an applicant for military service; or

"(2) who is a military recruiter and engages in prohibited sexual activity with a specially protected junior member of the armed forces who is enlisted under a delayed entry program;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) CONSENT.—Consent is not a defense for any conduct at issue in a prosecution under this section (article).

"(d) DEFINITIONS.—In this section (article):

"(1) SPECIALLY PROTECTED JUNIOR MEMBER OF THE ARMED FORCES.—The term 'specially protected junior member of the armed forces' means—

"(A) a member of the armed forces who is assigned to, or is awaiting assignment to, basic training or other initial active duty for training, including a member who is enlisted under a delayed entry program;

"(B) a member of the armed forces who is a cadet, a midshipman, an officer candidate, or a student in any other officer qualification program; and

"(C) a member of the armed forces in any program that, by regulation prescribed by the Secretary concerned, is identified as a training program for initial career qualification.

"(2) TRAINING LEADERSHIP POSITION.—The term 'training leadership position' means, with respect to a specially protected junior member of the armed forces, any of the following:

"(A) Any drill instructor position or other leadership position in a basic training program, an officer candidate school, a reserve officers' training corps unit, a training program for entry into the armed forces, or any program that, by regulation prescribed by the Secretary concerned, is identified as a training program for initial career qualification.

"(B) Faculty and staff of the United States Military Academy, the United States Naval Academy, the United States Air Force Academy, and the United States Coast Guard Academy.

"(3) APPLICANT FOR MILITARY SERVICE.—The term 'applicant for military service' means a person who, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, is an applicant for original enlistment or appointment in the armed forces.

"(4) PROHIBITED SEXUAL ACTIVITY.—The term 'prohibited sexual activity' means, as specified in regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, inappropriate physical intimacy under circumstances described in such regulations.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1010 would create a new section, Article 93a (Prohibited activities with military recruit or trainee by person in position of special trust). The new section would provide enhanced accountability for sexual misconduct committed by recruiters and trainers during the various phases within the recruiting and basic military training environments. The term "officer" as used in subsection (a)(1) of this statute would have the same meaning ascribed to it as in 10 U.S.C. § 101(b)(1). The term "applicant for military service" would include persons in the process of applying for an original enlistment or appointment in the armed services as defined in applicable service regulations. The primary focus of the new statute is on recruiting and initial entry training. Because of the unique nature of military training and the different training environments among the services, the statute would authorize the Service Secretaries to publish regulations designating the types of physical intimacy that would constitute a "prohibited sexual activity" under subsections (a) and (b) of the new statute.

Article 93a would cover military recruiters and trainers who knowingly engage in prohibited sexual activity with prospective recruits or junior members of the armed forces in initial training environments. Consent would not be a defense to this offense.

Article 93a is intended to address specific conduct and is not intended to supersede or preempt service regulations governing professional conduct by staff involved in recruiting, entry level training, or other follow on training programs. The Secretary concerned could prescribe by regulation any additional initial career qualification training programs related to servicemembers they determine should fall under this statute. Implementing rules will address appropriate maximum punishments for the new offense.

Article 94 – Mutiny or Sedition
10 U.S.C. § 894

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 94. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 94.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 94 prohibits mutiny and sedition, and prohibits officers from failing to do their utmost to suppress them. Mutiny is the usurping or overriding of lawful military authority. Sedition is the overthrow or destruction of lawful civil authority. The offense is punishable by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized mutiny and sedition since the Revolutionary War.[1] Article 94 was derived from Articles 66 and 67 of the 1948 Articles of War and from Articles 4 and 8 from the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for all offenses under Article 94: death.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. §§ 2383 (Rebellion or insurrection), 2384 (Seditious conspiracy), 2385 Advocating overthrow of Government), 2387 (Activities affecting armed forces generally), and 2388 (Activities affecting armed forces during war) set forth similar offenses to Article 94.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 94: No change to Article 94.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 94's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 95 (Current Law) – Resistance, Flight, Breach of Arrest, and Escape

10 U.S.C. § 895

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 95, except to redesignate it as Article 87a as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 87a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 95 prohibits resisting arrest or apprehension, fleeing apprehension, breaking arrest, and escaping from custody or confinement.

3. Historical Background

Article 95 was derived from Article 69 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 22 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[2] the statute has been amended only once, to insert the word "flight."[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Military apprehension is the same as civil arrest,[4] and military arrest is the same as restriction to specified limits.[5]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Resistance, Flight, Breach of Arrest, and Escape: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for five years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. §§ 751-58 applies to offenses similar to Article 95, prohibiting escape, attempts to escape, or assisting escape from custody of the Attorney General or his or her representatives.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 95: No change to Article 95, except to redesignate it as Article 87a.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 95's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal is consistent with the GC Terms of Reference directive to conduct a comprehensive review of the military justice system.

Article 95 (New Location) – Offenses by Sentinel or Lookout

10 U.S.C. § 895

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the loitering portion of offenses against or by sentinel or lookout, which is currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article),[1] to the new Article 95 (Offenses by sentinel or lookout). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶104, the offense prohibits misconduct toward or by sentinel or lookout not addressed in Article 113, Misbehavior of Sentinel or Lookout. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated offenses against or by a sentinel or lookout under Article 134 in the 1951 MCM.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Offenses Against or By Sentinel or Lookout. If a sentinel or lookout wrongfully loiters or sits upon a post in time of war or while receiving special pay, the maximum punishment authorized is a dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 2 years; otherwise, bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months. If a servicemember shows disrespect towards a sentinel or lookout, the maximum punishment authorized is forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for three months and confinement for 3 months.[3]

[2] MCM 1984, App. 6c, ¶166.

[3] MCM, Part IV, ¶104.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Offenses against or by a sentinel or lookout are unique military offenses. For civilians in the federal government who hold security positions, these acts are typically characterized as "neglect of duty" infractions and addressed through adverse administrative actions that can result in reprimands, suspensions, or terminations of employment.[4]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-104: Migrate Article 134 (¶104) to the new Article 95.

Offenses against or by a lookout addresses conduct that is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

This Report also proposes that the disrespect portion currently addressed under Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶104b(1)) be migrated to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 95a (Disrespect Towards Sentinel or Lookout).

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1011. OFFENSES BY SENTINEL OR LOOKOUT.

Section 895 of title 10, United States Code (article 95 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(8), is amended to read as follows:

"§895. Art. 95. Offenses by sentinel or lookout

[4] 5 C.F.R. § 752.603—Standard for Action (2014). Federal agencies are empowered to take adverse administrative action against an employee for "reasons of misconduct, neglect of duty, malfeasance, or failure to accept a directed reassignment or to accompany a position in a transfer of function." 5 C.F.R. § 752.603(a); see also 5 U.S.C. § 7503(b).

"(a) DRUNK OR SLEEPING ON POST, OR LEAVING POST BEFORE BEING RELIEVED.—Any sentinel or lookout who is drunk on post, who sleeps on post, or who leaves post before being regularly relieved, shall be punished—

"(1) if the offense is committed in time of war, by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; and

"(2) if the offense is committed other than in time of war, by such punishment, other than death, as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) LOITERING OR WRONGFULLY SITTING ON POST.—Any sentinel or lookout who loiters or wrongfully sits down on post shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1011 would migrate the loitering portion of the offense of "Sentinel or lookout: offenses against or by" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 95 (Offenses by sentinel or lookout). The wrongfulness of loitering by a sentinel or lookout is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[5]

Article 95a (New Provision) – Disrespect Toward Sentinel or Lookout

10 U.S.C. § 895a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the disrespect offense currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 95a (Disrespect towards sentinel or lookout). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 95a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶104, the offense prohibits misconduct toward or by sentinel or lookout not addressed in Article 113, Misbehavior of Sentinel or Lookout. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated offenses against or by a sentinel or lookout under Article 134 in the 1951 MCM.[2]

If a servicemember shows disrespect towards a sentinel or lookout, the maximum punishment authorized is forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for three months and confinement for three months.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Offenses against or by a sentinel or lookout are unique military offenses. For civilians in the federal government who hold security positions, these acts are typically characterized as

"neglect of duty" infractions and addressed through adverse administrative actions that can result in reprimands, suspensions, or terminations of employment.[4]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-104: Migrate Article 134 (¶104) to the redesignated Article 95.

Offenses against or by a lookout addresses conduct that is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

This Report also proposes migrating the loitering portion of offenses against or by sentinel or lookout currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶104b(2)) to a new Article 95 (Offenses by Sentinel or Lookout).

See the Legislative Proposal for §913. Art. 113. Misbehavior of Sentinel or Lookout, for the loitering portion of the offense.

SEC. 1012. DISRESPECT TOWARD SENTINEL OR LOOKOUT.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 895 (article 95 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 1011, the following new section (article):

"§895a. Art. 95a. Disrespect toward sentinel or lookout hearing of the sentinel or lookout, who is in the execution of duties as a sentinel or lookout, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1012 would create a new section, Article 95a (Disrespect toward a sentinel or lookout). The new statute would include the disrespect portion of the offense of "Sentinel or lookout: offenses against or by," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[5]

Article 96 (Current Law) – Releasing Prisoner Without Proper Authority

10 U.S.C. § 896

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would retain the existing provisions of Article 96 and migrate into the statute the offense of drinking liquor with a prisoner currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Article 96 would be retitled as "Release of prisoner without authority; drinking with prisoner." Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 96 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 96 prohibits servicemembers who are responsible for prisoners from releasing them without proper authority, or allowing them to escape.

3. Historical Background

Article 96 was derived from Article 73 of the 1948 Articles of War.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Releasing Prisoner without Proper Authority: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 2 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 USC § 752 (Instigating or assisting escape) sets forth a similar offense to Article 96. It proscribes instigating, aiding or assisting in the escape of a prisoner from custody or confinement.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 96: Migrate the offense of drinking liquor with prisoner in Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶74), to Article 96.

This change would align offenses concerning custody of prisoners under Article 96.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1013. RELEASE OF PRISONER WITHOUT AUTHORITY; DRINKING WITH PRISONER.

Section 896 of title 10, United States Code (article 96 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§896. Art. 96. Release of prisoner without authority; drinking with prisoner

"(a) RELEASE OF PRISONER WITHOUT AUTHORITY.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who, without authority to do so, releases a prisoner; or

"(2) who, through neglect or design, allows a prisoner to escape; shall be punished as a court-martial may direct, whether or not the prisoner was committed in strict compliance with the law.

"(b) DRINKING WITH PRISONER.—Any person subject to this chapter who unlawfully drinks any alcoholic beverage with a prisoner shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1013 would amend Article 96 and retitle the statute as "Release of prisoner without authority; drinking with prisoner." As amended, Article 96 would include the offense of "Drinking liquor with prisoner," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The latter offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[5]

[5] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 96 – Release of Prisoner without Authority; Drinking with Prisoner – Addendum

(Drinking Liquor with Prisoner)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of drinking liquor with prisoner currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 96 (Releasing prisoner without proper authority; drinking with prisoner). Part II of this Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶74, the offense requires a showing that a person with charge over a prisoner drank liquor with that prisoner. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized "drinking liquor with a prisoner" via the "General Article" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated "drinking liquor with a prisoner" as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of drinking liquor with prisoner: forfeiture of two-thirds pay for three months and confinement for three months.[4]

[3] MCM 1951, App. 6c, ¶133.

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶74.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1791 (Providing or Possessing Contraband in Prison) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of drinking liquor with a prisoner in Article 134. It imposes a maximum of 1 year of confinement for providing alcohol to any federal prison inmate.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-74: (1) Modify drinking liquor with a prisoner to (a) apply to all alcoholic beverages; and (b) apply to all persons subject to the code; (2) migrate the offense of drinking liquor with prisoner in Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶74), to Article 96.

Fraternizing with prisoners by consuming alcohol with them in violation of confinement facility rules erodes discipline regardless of whether it is a prison guard or any other person subject to the UCMJ.

Migrating the offense drinking liquor with a prisoner to Article 96 logically aligns the offense with the existing UCMJ prisoner-related offenses. Drinking liquor with a prisoner would ordinarily be in violation of confinement facility regulations. Accordingly, it is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline and is not reliant upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.[6]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

Article 97 – Unlawful Detention
10 U.S.C. § 897

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 97. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 97.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 97 prohibits the unlawful arrest, apprehension or confinement of another person.

3. Historical Background

Article 97 is derived from Article 96 (the "General Article") of the 1948 Articles of War, as well as Navy court-martial practice under the Navy Courts and Boards Manual, § 101.[1] Article 97 was designed to prevent abuse of authority by military law enforcement personnel and other individuals with confinement authority, and to punish such abuses.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 97 applies to military law enforcement personnel acting under "color of authority" for their official duties.[4] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Unlawful Detention: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Fourth Amendment to the Constitution prohibits the seizure of a person without probable cause. In addition, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 permits civil actions to vindicate violations of

Article 98 (Current Law) – Noncompliance with Procedural Rules
10 U.S.C. § 898

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 98, except to redesignate it as Article 131f as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 131f.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 98 prohibits commanders and other persons with duties related to the administration of military justice from unnecessarily delaying disposition of a case or knowingly and intentionally failing to enforce or comply with any provisions of the UCMJ.

3. Historical Background

Article 98 was derived from Article 70 of the 1948 Articles of War.[1] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1951,[2] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Noncompliance with Procedural Rules: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Hyde Amendment, which is widely published as a "legislative note" attached to 18 U.S.C. § 3006A (popularly entitled "The Criminal Justice Act"), authorizes federal courts to award attorneys' fees and court costs to criminal defendants "where the court finds that the position of the United States was 'vexatious, frivolous, or in bad faith.'" In view of the well-developed law addressing Article 98's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Article 99 – Misbehavior Before the Enemy
10 U.S.C. § 899

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 99. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 99.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 99 prohibits misbehavior before the enemy, including surrendering or through disobedience, neglect, or intentional misconduct endangering the safety of a command. The offense is punishable by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Misbehavior before the enemy has been criminalized under American military law since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] Article 99 is derived from Article 75 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Cowardice is defined under Article 99 as misbehavior motivated by fear.[4] Military appellate courts have held that while fear itself is a natural feeling of apprehension when going into battle, the mere display of apprehension is not enough to constitute this offense.[5]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed death as the maximum punishment for the offense of Misbehavior before the Enemy.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 99 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

Article 100 – Subordinate Compelling Surrender

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 100. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 100.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 100 prohibits a subordinate from compelling or attempting to compel the commander of any place, vessel, aircraft, unit or other military property, to give it up to an enemy or to abandon it. Article 100 also prohibits any attempt to surrender without proper authority. The offense is punishable by death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has forbid subordinates compelling their commander to surrender since the Revolutionary War.[1] Article 100 was derived from Article 76 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 4 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

Article 101 – Improper Use of Countersign
10 U.S.C. § 901

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 101. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 101.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 101 prohibits the unauthorized disclosure of the parole or countersign in time of war. A "countersign" is a word, signal, or procedure given from the principal headquarters of a command to aid guards and sentinels in their scrutiny of persons who apply to pass the lines.[1] It consists of a secret challenge and a password, signal, or procedure.[2] By contrast, a "parole" is a word used as a check on the countersign; it is given only to those who are entitled to inspect guards and to commanders of guards.[3] In time of war, this offense is punishable by death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Countersigns and parole are used to control specific areas of military significance, and they have been in existence since commanders set pickets and sentries stood their posts.[4] In American military law, improper use of a countersign has constituted a military offense since the Revolutionary War.[5] Article 101 was derived from Article 77 of the 1948 Articles of War.[6] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[7] the statute has remained unchanged.

Article 102 – Forcing a Safeguard
10 U.S.C. § 902

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 102. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the Article 102.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

A safeguard is a "detachment, guard, or detail posted by a commander for the protection of persons, places, or property of the enemy, or of a neutral affected by the relationship of belligerent forces in their prosecution of war . . . ."[1] Article 102 prohibits the forcing of a violation of the protection of a safeguard. In time of war, or in circumstances amounting to a state of belligerency short of war, the offense is punishable by death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized forcing a safeguard since the Revolutionary War.[2] The current Article 102 was derived from Article 78 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The Manual for Courts-Martial states that a formal "time of war" is not required for Article 102 to apply; the offense also is punishable during "a state of belligerency short of formal war."[5] The legislative history to Article 102 indicates the drafters of the UCMJ were concerned that safeguards may be necessary in times when a formal state of war did not

Article 103 (Current Law) – Captured or Abandoned Property
10 U.S.C. § 903

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 103, except to redesignate it as Article 108a as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing the new Article 108a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 103 prohibits the misuse or neglect of captured or abandoned property, to include buying, selling, or trading in captured or abandoned property, and engaging in looting or pillaging.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized wrongful disposition of captured property since the Revolutionary War.[1] The current Article 103 was derived from Articles 79 and 80 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Captured or Abandoned Property: for looting and pillaging, any punishment, other than death, that a court-martial may direct; otherwise, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 103 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

Article 104 (Current Law) – Aiding the Enemy
10 U.S.C. § 904

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 104, except to redesignate it as Article 103b as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 103b.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 104 prohibits aiding the enemy, or attempting to do so, with arms, ammunition, supplies, money, or other things; or by harboring, protecting, or giving intelligence to or communicating with the enemy.[1] The offense is punishable by death, or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized "aiding the enemy" since the Revolutionary War.[2] The current Article 104 was derived from Article 81 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 4 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[3] The statute remains unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Aiding the Enemy: death, or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.[4]

Article 104 (New Location) – Public Records Offenses
10 U.S.C. § 904

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of altering, concealing, removing, mutilating, obliterating, or destroying a public record, which is currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article) to the redesignated Article 104 (Public record offenses).[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶99, the offense of altering a public record requires a showing that the accused altered, concealed, removed, mutilated, obliterated, destroyed, or took a public record with the intent to do any of those actions. A public record includes "records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth the activities of the office or agency, or matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which there was a duty to report."[2] Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated altering a public record as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3] The offense of altering a public record was derived from 18 U.S.C. § 2071.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Altering, Concealing, Removing, Mutilating, Obliterating, or Destroying a

Public Record: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 6 months and confinement for 6 months.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2071 (Concealment, removal, or mutilation generally) sets forth a similar offense to the offense in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-99: Migrate the offense of altering, concealing, removing, mutilating, obliterating, or destroying a public record in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶99) to Article 104.

Destroying or altering public records is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1015. PUBLIC RECORDS OFFENSES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 903b (article 103b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as redesignated by section 1001(5), the following new section (article):

"§904. Art. 104. Public records offenses

"Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully and unlawfully—

"(1) alters, conceals, removes, mutilates, obliterates, or destroys a public record; or

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶99.e.

"(2) takes a public record with the intent to alter, conceal, remove, mutilate, obliterate, or destroy the public record;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1015 would migrate the offense of "Public record: altering, concealing, removing, mutilating, obliterating, or destroying" from Article 134 (the General article) to redesignated Article 104 (Public records offenses). The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 105 (Current Law) – Misconduct as Prisoner
10 U.S.C. § 905

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 105, except to redesignate it as Article 98 as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing the new Article 98.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 105 prohibits misconduct by those subject to the UCMJ, while in the hands of the enemy in time war, from securing favorable treatment from their captors in a manner contrary to law, custom, or regulation.[1] Article 105 also prohibits those in position of authority over such persons from maltreating them.

3. Historical Background

Although the Articles of War did not include a specific Article proscribing misconduct while held as an enemy prisoner, prior to enactment of the UCMJ such misconduct was punishable under the "General Article."[2] Article 105 established a new offense when the UCMJ was enacted, and stemmed from episodes of prisoner misconduct during World War II.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 105: No change to Article 105, except to redesignate it as Article 98.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 105's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 105a (New Provision) – False or Unauthorized Pass Offenses

10 U.S.C. § 905a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of false or unauthorized pass, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a newly designated punitive article, Article 105a (False or unauthorized pass offenses). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 105a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶77, the offense of false or unauthorized pass offenses requires proof that the accused wrongfully made or altered an official pass, permit, certificate, identification card, or similar document; wrongfully sold or transferred such a document; or wrongfully used such a document. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized use and production of "false passes" via the "General Article" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated "false or unauthorized pass offenses" as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

In practice, this offense prohibits a wide variety of fraud and wrongful use of identification documents, discharge certificates, official passes and other military permits.[4]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of False or Unauthorized Pass Offenses: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[5]

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶77.c(1).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 499 (Military, naval, or official passes) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of false or unauthorized pass offenses in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-77: Migrate the offense of false or unauthorized pass offenses in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶77) to Article 105a.

Migrating the false or unauthorized pass offenses to Article 105a aligns the offense with the relocated and similar subject matter Article 105 forgery offense. Producing or using false or unauthorized passes is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, it does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1016. FALSE OR UNAUTHORIZED PASS OFFENSES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 905 (article 105 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(12), the following new section (article):

"§905a. Art. 105a. False or unauthorized pass offenses

"(a) WRONGFUL MAKING, ALTERING, ETC.—Any person subject to this chapter who, wrongfully and falsely, makes, alters, counterfeits, or tampers with a military or official pass, permit, discharge certificate, or identification card shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶77.e.

"(b) WRONGFUL SALE, ETC.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully sells, gives, lends, or disposes of a false or unauthorized military or official pass, permit, discharge certificate, or identification card, knowing that the pass, permit, discharge certificate, or identification card is false or unauthorized, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) WRONGFUL USE OR POSSESSION.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully uses or possesses a false or unauthorized military or official pass, permit, discharge certificate, or identification card, knowing that the pass, permit, discharge certificate, or identification card is false or unauthorized, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1016 would create a new section, Article 105a (False or unauthorized pass offenses). The new statute would include the offense of "False or unauthorized pass offenses," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). This offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 106 (Current Law) – Spies
10 U.S.C. § 906

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 106 by aligning the death penalty provision in the offense with the standard set forth in Article 106a (Espionage) and in the other capital offenses under the UCMJ. This proposal would revise the current provision to reflect the standard used for other capital offenses, under which an accused guilty of a capital offense may be sentenced to "death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct." This proposal also recommends redesignating the offense as Article 103 (Spies) as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 103 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 106 prohibits any person in time of war from spying for the enemy, by lurking or acting as a spy in or about any place, aircraft, or vessel, within the control or jurisdiction of the armed forces, or in or about any shipyard, any manufacturing or industrial plant, or in any other place engaged in the work in aid of the prosecution of the war by the United States. It is the only offense in the UCMJ in which the court-martial has no option at sentencing other than death.

3. Historical Background

The death penalty has not always been a mandatory punishment for spies in American military justice. It was not mandatory in the Articles of War during the Revolutionary War;[1] became mandatory only for aliens in 1806,[2] and then in 1862 became the mandatory penalty for all persons convicted of spying under the Articles of War.[3] In the Navy, death was not a mandatory punishment for spying until 1950 when the UCMJ was enacted.[4]

Article 106 was derived from Article 82 of the Articles of War.[5] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[6] the statute has remained unchanged.

More recently, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which applies to alien unprivileged enemy belligerents, makes the death penalty discretionary for spies.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

There are no reported cases of a prosecution under Article 106.[8] Article 106 prescribes the following mandatory punishment for the offense of spying: death.[9]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 794 (Gathering or delivering defense information to aid foreign government) sets forth a similar offense to Article 106, with the death penalty available, but not mandatory. The statute authorizes punishment "by death or by imprisonment for any term of years or for life."[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 106: Amend Article 106 to make the death penalty discretionary, and to redesignate it as Article 103.

This proposed amendment would return the authorized punishment to what it was previously in the armed forces, and would align the authorized punishment for spying to closely related punitive articles, and with federal practice and the military commissions.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing inconsistencies in the current Article 106 with similar provisions in the UCMJ and in U.S. law.

Article 106a prohibits espionage and includes the death penalty as an available punishment, but does not make the death penalty a mandatory punishment.

SEC. 1014. PENALTY FOR ACTING AS A SPY.

Section 903 of title 10, United States Code (article 103 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(7), is amended by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: "or such other punishment as a court-martial or a military commission may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1014 would amend Article 103 (Spies), as transferred and redesignated by Section 1001(7), supra, by replacing the mandatory death penalty currently required with a discretionary death penalty similar to that authorized under existing Article 106a (Espionage) and for all other capital offenses under the Code.

Article 106 (New Location) – Impersonating a Commissioned, Warrant, Noncommissioned, or Petty Officer, or an Agent or Official

10 U.S.C. § 906

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of impersonating a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned or petty officer, or an agent or official, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new stand-alone enumerated punitive article, Article 106 (Impersonation of officer, noncommissioned or petty officer, or agent or official). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶86, the offense of impersonating a military official requires a showing that the accused willfully and wrongfully impersonated a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned, or petty officer, or an agent of superior authority of one of the armed forces of the United States, or an official of a certain government. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized "impersonating an officer" via the "General Article" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated "impersonating an officer" as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3] In one of the first cases to construe the new Article 134 version of the "impersonating an officer" offense, the (then) Court of Military Appeals succinctly explained the gravamen of the offense: "It requires little imagination to conclude that a spirit of confusion and disorder, and lack of discipline in the military would result if enlisted personnel were permitted to assume the role of officers and masquerade as persons of high rank."[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

In its modern form, the offense forbids impersonation not only of military officials, but also other governmental agents or officials.[5] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Impersonating a Commissioned, Warrant, Noncommissioned or Petty Officer, or an Agent or Official: if with intent to defraud, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years; otherwise, bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

U.S. Code Title 18, Chapter 43 (False Personation) sets forth a series of factually similar offenses to impersonating an officer under Article 134, in particular 18 U.S.C. § 912 (Officer or employee of the United States).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-86: Migrate the offense of impersonating a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned or petty officer, or an agent or official to the new stand-alone Article 106, and conform the article to the definition of "officer" in 10 U.S.C. § 101(1).

Migrating the impersonating an officer offense to its own enumerated punitive article—Article 106 (Impersonation of officer, noncommissioned or petty officer, or agent or official)—would align the offense with the other similar subject matter offenses under the UCMJ (i.e., "wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, etc." migrating from Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶113) to Article 106a). Impersonating a commissioned officer, warrant officer, noncommissioned officer, or petty officer is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1017. IMPERSONATION OFFENSES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 905a (article 105a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1016, the following new section (article):

"§906. Art. 106. Impersonation of officer, noncommissioned or petty officer, or agent or official

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter who, wrongfully and willfully, impersonates—

"(1) an officer, a noncommissioned officer, or a petty officer;

"(2) an agent of superior authority of one of the armed forces; or

"(3) an official of a government;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) IMPERSONATION WITH INTENT TO DEFRAUD.—Any person subject to this chapter who, wrongfully, willfully, and with intent to defraud, impersonates any person referred to in paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of subsection (a) shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) IMPERSONATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL WITHOUT INTENT TO DEFRAUD.—Any person subject to this chapter who, wrongfully, willfully, and without intent to defraud, impersonates an official of a government by committing an act that exercises or asserts the authority of the office that the person claims to have shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1017 would migrate the offense of "Impersonating a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned, petty officer or agent of official" from Article 134 (the General article) into the redesignated Article 106 (Impersonation of officer, noncommissioned or petty officer, or agent or official). The term "officer" as used in subsection (a)(1) of the statute would have the same meaning ascribed to it as in 10 U.S.C. § 101(b)(1). This offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[7]

[7] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 106a (Current Law) – Espionage
10 U.S.C. § 906a

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 106a, except to redesignate it as Article 103a as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of this Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 103a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 106a prohibits espionage during peacetime. It is the peacetime equivalent to Article 106 (Spies). The offense of Espionage is punishable by death or other such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Article 106a was added to the Code in 1985.[1] The statute has remained unchanged since then.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Espionage: death, or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.[2]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. §§ 792-99 (Espionage and Censorship) set forth a similar offenses to Article 106a.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 106a: No change to Article 106a, except to redesignate it as Article 103a.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 106a's provisions, change to the content of the statute is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 106a (New Location) – Wearing Unauthorized Insignia, Decoration, Badge, Ribbon, Device, or Lapel Button

10 U.S.C. § 906a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive Article 106a (Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 106a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶113, the offense of wearing unauthorized insignia requires proof that the accused willfully and wrongfully wore an unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized the wearing of unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] The first commander in chief, General George Washington, created the very first "honorary badges of distinction" for service in our country's military; he established a rigorous system to ensure that these awards would be received and worn by only the truly deserving.[3] The President designated wearing unauthorized wearing insignia, etc. as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Wearing Unauthorized Insignia, Decoration, Badge, Ribbon, Device, or Lapel Button: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 704 (Military medals or decorations) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button in Article 134. However, in 2012 the Supreme Court did declare the statute unconstitutional as to civilians.[6]

"Article 106a" is likely constitutional in the military context. In light of Congress' legislative authority under the Constitution to regulate the armed forces,[7] any similar criminal enactment under the special auspices of the UCMJ gains constitutional strength and enjoys significant judicial deference. This owes to the unique attributes of military society and the specialized need for discipline within that society, as repeatedly recognized by the Supreme Court.[8] Also, similar subject matter statutes currently exist under the UCMJ.[9] Finally, legal authority to criminalize the wearing of unauthorized medals is further bolstered by U.S. Supreme Court precedent establishing that false factual statements enjoy little First Amendment protection.[10]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-113: Migrate the offense of wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶113) to the new Article 106a.

This proposal would align similar offenses under Article 106a.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1018. INSIGNIA OFFENSES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 906 (article 106 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1017, the following new section (article):

"§906a. Art. 106a. Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button

"Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is not authorized to wear an insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button; and

"(2) who wrongfully wears such insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button upon the person's uniform or civilian clothing;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1018 would create a new section, Article 106a (Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button), and would migrate the offense of "Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. When committed by servicemembers, the offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[11]

Article 107 – False Official Statements
10 U.S.C. § 907

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would retain the existing provisions in Article 107 and migrate into the statute the offense of false swearing, which is currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Article 107 would be retitled as "False official statements; false swearing." Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 107 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 107 prohibits the making, with intent to deceive, of false official statements. Statements are "official" if they relate to the military duties of either the speaker or the hearer.[2]

3. Historical Background

Article 107 was derived from Articles 56 and 57 of the 1948 Articles of War, and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of False Official Statement: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1001 (Statements or entries generally) sets forth a similar offense to Article 107.

Recommendation 107: Migrate the offense of false swearing from Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶79), to Article 107.

This change would align similar offenses under Article 107.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1019. FALSE OFFICIAL STATEMENTS; FALSE SWEARING.

Section 907 of title 10, United States Code (article 107 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§907. Art. 107. False official statements; false swearing

"(a) FALSE OFFICIAL STATEMENTS.—Any person subject to this chapter who, with intent to deceive—

"(1) signs any false record, return, regulation, order, or other official document, knowing it to be false; or

"(2) makes any other false official statement knowing it to be false;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) FALSE SWEARING.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who takes an oath that—

"(A) is administered in a matter in which such oath is required or authorized by law; and

"(B) is administered by a person with authority to do so; and

"(2) who, upon such oath, makes or subscribes to a statement;

if the statement is false and at the time of taking the oath, the person does not believe the statement to be true, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1019 would amend Article 107 and retitle the statute as "False official statements; false swearing." As amended, Article 107 would include the offense of "False swearing," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The offense of false swearing is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

[6] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 107 – False Official Statements; False Swearing – Addendum
(False Swearing)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of false swearing currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] into Article 107 (False Official Statements; False Swearing). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶79, the offense requires a showing of false statements made under oath. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized "false swearing" (distinct from perjury) since the 1921 MCM.[2] The President designated false swearing as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3] While originally designated in the 1951 MCM as a lesser included offense of perjury,[4] under current law false swearing does not apply to statements made in judicial proceedings.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The UCMJ provides three separate charges for prosecuting false or deceptive acts or statements: Article 107 (False Official Statement); Article 132 (Perjury); and Article 134 (para. 80) (False Swearing). False swearing differs from a false official statement in that the statement does not have to be official,[6] nor does it have to be made with the intent to deceive the recipient.[7] False swearing differs from Article 131 perjury in that it does not apply to statements made at a judicial proceeding.[8] Accordingly, the typical false swearing case involves a statement made under oath to law enforcement during an investigation.[9]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of False Swearing: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[10]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1621 (Perjury) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of false swearing in that the federal statute covers false statements both in and out of judicial proceedings.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-79: Migrate the offense of false swearing in Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶79), to Article 107.

Migrating the false swearing to Article 107 aligns the offense with the other nonjudicial false statements offense under the UCMJ. False swearing is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, it does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable.

Article 107a (New Provision) – Parole Violation
10 U.S.C. § 907a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of violation of parole currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 107a (Parole violation). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶97a, the offense requires a showing that a prisoner, having been released on his word of honor from the correctional system and subject to an agreed-upon plan, has violated his word of honor and breached the terms and conditions of the plan. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated violation of parole as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM[2]. However, the President only first provided elements and an explanation of the offense within Part IV of the MCM in 1998.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The military corrections system provides parole eligibility for all persons convicted under the code sentenced with unsuspended sentences of confinement for more than twelve months up to life imprisonment (with the possibility of parole).[4] To qualify for parole, an inmate must have served at least 1/3 of the adjudged sentence (or 20 years for a life sentence), and in no case less than 6 months of the sentence.[5]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Violation of Parole: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 6 months, and confinement for 6 months.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

While the federal penal system has discontinued parole, the Title 18 equivalent is "supervised release." Under 18 U.S.C. § 3583 a court may require the convict to complete a period of supervised release following the completion of his confinement, adhering to specific conditions set forth by the court for a period of time not exceeding 5 years. Violation of supervised release may result in revocation and re-incarceration for up to 5 years (if the underlying offense prompting supervised release was a class A felony); 3 years (class B felony); 2 years (class C or D felony); or 1 year (misdemeanors).[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-97a: Migrate the offense of violation of parole in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶97a) to the new Article 107a.

Parole violation (or in the federal criminal system, supervised release violation) is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, parole violation offenses do not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for their criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1020. PAROLE VIOLATION.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 907 (article 107 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 1019, the following new section (article):

"§907a. Art. 107a. Parole violation

"Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who, having been a prisoner as the result of a court-martial conviction or other criminal proceeding, is on parole with conditions; and

"(2) who violates the conditions of parole;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1020 would create a new section, Article 107a (Parole violation), and would migrate the offense of "Parole, Violation of" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[8]

Article 108 – Military Property of United States – Sale, Loss, Damage, Destruction, or Wrongful Disposition

10 U.S.C. § 908

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 108. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 108.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 108 prohibits the misuse and abusing military property, whether by design or through neglect; misuse and abuse of military property includes selling, damaging, destroying, and losing it; military property includes all property, real or personal.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized the loss, damage or sale of military property since the Revolutionary War.[1] The current Article 108 was derived from Articles 83 and 84 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Sale, Loss, Damage, Destruction, or Wrongful Disposition of Military Property: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1361 (Government property or contracts) sets forth a similar offense to Article 108.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 108: No change to Article 108.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 108's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 109 – Property other than Military Property of the United States – Waste, Spoilage, or Destruction

10 U.S.C. § 909

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 109. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 109.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 109 prohibits the willful or reckless wasting, spoiling, destroying or damaging of property other than military property of the United States.[1]

3. Historical Background

Articles 108 and 109 are companion articles. Article 108 concerns military property, while Article 109 concerns property "other than military property of the United States." Article 109 was derived from Article 89 of the 1948 Articles of War.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Waste, Spoilage, or Destruction of Property other than Military Property of the United States: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[4]

---

[1] This category of applicable property is broad, encompassing both real and personal property. "Wasting" and "spoiling" pertains only to real property. MCM, Part. IV, ¶33.c(1). Whereas "damaging" and "destroying" pertains only to the personal property of another. Id. at ¶33.c(2).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. §§ 1362-67 set forth similar offenses to Article 109; these provisions concern damage or injury to instrumentalities or items used in interstate and foreign commerce.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 109: No change to Article 109.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 109's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 109a (New Provision) – Mail Matter, Taking, Opening, etc.
10 U.S.C. § 909a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing mail, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 109a (Mail matter, taking, opening, etc). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶93, the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully took, opened, secreted, destroyed or stole certain mail. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

Previously, the offenses of "failing to deliver the mail, or opening the mail" were charged under the General Article of the Articles of War of 1874.[2] The President first designated the "mail offenses" as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3] The military offenses of taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing mail are designed to ensure continuous protection of mail matter regardless of whether it is part of the United States Postal Service system or the military mail system.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Mail: Taking, Opening, Secreting, Destroying, or Stealing: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1702 (Obstruction of correspondence) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing mail Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-93: Migrate the offense of taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing mail in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶93) to the new Article 109a.

The offense of taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing mail is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1021. WRONGFUL TAKING, OPENING, ETC. OF MAIL MATTER

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 909 (article 109 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

"§909a. Art. 109a. Mail matter: wrongful taking, opening, etc.

"(a) TAKING.—Any person subject to this chapter who, with the intent to obstruct the correspondence of, or to pry into the business or secrets of, any person or organization, wrongfully takes mail matter before the mail matter is delivered to or received by the addressee shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) OPENING, SECRETING, DESTROYING, STEALING.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully opens, secretes, destroys, or steals mail matter before the mail matter is delivered to or received by the addressee shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1021 would create a new section, Article 109a (Mail matter: wrongful taking, opening, etc.), and would migrate the offense of "Mail: taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 110 – Improper Hazarding of Vessel
10 U.S.C. § 910

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 110 (Improper hazarding of vessel) to also address improper hazarding of aircraft. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 110.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 110 prohibits hazarding or suffering another to hazard a vessel of the armed forces, whether by design or through negligence. "Hazard" means to put in danger of loss or injury.

3. Historical Background

Military law has criminalized hazarding a vessel since the first Articles for the Government of the Navy in 1799.[1] The current Article 110 was derived from Articles 8 and 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] As construed by the MCM, "vessel" pertains only to "watercraft."[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] Article 110 has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Since no punitive article directly addresses the improper hazarding of aircraft, the military has had to resort to other punitive articles to respond to misconduct relating to aircraft, such as Article 92 (Dereliction of duty) (confinement for 2 years) and Article 108 (Military property of the United States – sale, loss, damage, destruction, or wrongful disposition) (confinement for 10 years).[5] However, these other offenses do not carry the same maximum punishment as Article 110 (Improper hazarding of vessel).

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Improper Hazarding of Vessel: if done willfully and wrongfully, death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; otherwise, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 2 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1115 (Misconduct or neglect of ship officers) and § 2280 (violence against maritime navigation) set forth a similar offenses to Article 110.

By contrast, 18 U.S.C. § 32 (Destruction of aircraft or aircraft facilities) sets forth an offense not covered by Article 110. Additionally, 10 U.S.C. § 950t(23) (Military Commissions Act) also sets forth an offense regarding the crime of hijacking or hazarding a vessel or aircraft, which is broader than Article 110.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 110: Amend Article 110 to also address improper hazarding of aircraft.

No punitive article currently addresses the potential for catastrophic loss of life and property, as well as harm to the strategic interests of the United States, caused by the improper hazarding of an aircraft.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to offenses involving aircraft in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1022. IMPROPER HAZARDING OF VESSEL OR AIRCRAFT.

Section 910 of title 10, United States Code (article 110 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§910. Art. 110. Improper hazarding of vessel or aircraft

"(a) WILLFUL AND WRONGFUL HAZARDING.—Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully and wrongfully, hazards or suffers to be hazarded any vessel or aircraft of the armed forces shall be punished by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) NEGLIGENT HAZARDING.—Any person subject to this chapter who negligently hazards or suffers to be hazarded any vessel or aircraft of the armed forces shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1022 would amend Article 110 (Improper hazarding of vessel) to also prohibit improper hazarding of an aircraft. Although other punitive articles, such as Article 92 (dereliction of duty) and Article 108 (destruction of military property) may speak to the loss or destruction of government property generally, no punitive article captures the act of improper hazarding of an aircraft, considering the potential for catastrophic loss of life and property, as well as harm to the strategic interests of the United States. This amendment would align the conduct involving an aircraft with the maximum punishments authorized under Article 110.

Article 111 (Current Law) – Drunken or Reckless Operation of Vehicle, Aircraft, or Vessel

10 U.S.C. § 911

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 111 to specify a breath or blood alcohol content (BAC) limit of .08, consistent with federal and state practice. This Report also proposes that it be redesignated as Article 113 as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing the new Article 111 as necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 111 prohibits operating or controlling any vehicle, vessel, or aircraft (1) in a reckless manner; (2) while drunk or impaired; or (3) when the alcohol concentration in the accused's blood equals or exceeds 0.10 grams of alcohol per 1000 milliliters of blood, or 0.10 grams per 210 liters of breath (or lower, depending upon the jurisdiction of the offense).

3. Historical Background

Drunk driving first appeared in military law as a designated offense under Article 96 of the 1948 Articles of War.[1] In 1950, the offense of drunk driving was included in the UCMJ as Article 111.[2] The statute has been amended five times since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950: in 1986 it was amended to prohibit the operation of a vehicle "while impaired by a substance,"[3] in 1992 it was expanded to cover the "operation of a vehicle, aircraft or vessel,"[4] and in 1993 the blood alcohol level of 0.10 grams "or more" of alcohol was specified.[5] In 2003, Article 111 was amended to provide that the BAC limit could be .010 or the limit under the law of the state where the conduct occurred, whichever was lower.[6]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Drunken or Reckless Operation of Vehicle, Aircraft, or Vessel: if the operation of the vehicle resulted in personal injury, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for up to 18 months; otherwise, bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 13 (Laws of States adopted for areas within federal jurisdiction), the "Assimilative Crimes Act" adopts state law on federal enclaves of exclusive or concurrent federal jurisdiction. As a matter of federal regulation, 0.08 is the applicable blood alcohol level on federal national parks.[8]

Since July of 2004, every state, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico have enacted 0.08 BAC per se drunk driving laws.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 111: Redesignate Article 111 as Article 113, and amend it to specify a breath or BAC limit of .08.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to driving under the influence in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Subsection (b)(3) of section 913 of title 10, United States Code (article 113 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(9), is amended—

(1) by striking "0.10 grams" both places it appears and inserting "0.08 grams"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new sentence: "The Secretary may by regulation prescribe limits that are lower than the limits specified in the preceding sentence, if such lower limits are based on scientific developments, as reflected in Federal law of general applicability.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1025 would amend Article 113 (Drunken or reckless operation of vehicle, aircraft, or vessel), as transferred and redesignated by Section 1001(9), supra, to align the BAC limits in the offense to the prevailing legal standard in the United States. All other jurisdictions in the United States, including all fifty states, each territory, the District of Columbia, and the national parks, have established BAC limits no higher than .08 for the offense of drunk driving. The amendment also would provide flexibility for the Department of Defense to prescribe lower breath/blood alcohol limits should scientific developments or other factors in the civilian sector lead to lower limits.

Article 111 (New Location) – Leaving Scene of Vehicle Accident

10 U.S.C. § 911

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of fleeing the scene of any accident currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new enumerated punitive article, Article 111 (Leaving scene of vehicle accident). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶82, the offense of fleeing the scene of an accident requires a showing that the accused was either the driver or senior passenger of a vehicle involved in an accident and that the accused either drove away from the scene of the accident or wrongfully ordered or permitted the driver to do so, without providing assistance to an injured victim or providing identification. "Senior passenger" means a person who was the superior commissioned or noncommissioned officer of the driver.[2] Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated "fleeing the scene of an accident" as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3] The offense targets reckless or negligent disregard for the safety of others; it does not require an identifiable victim to be placed in apprehension of receiving immediate bodily harm.[4] The offense is intended to deter drivers of motor vehicles involved in accidents from seeking to avoid civil or criminal liability by escaping before their identity can be established, to avoid leaving persons injured in an accident in distress or danger for want of proper medical care, and to avoid the prejudice to good order and discipline or discredit to the armed forces that would occur if servicemembers committed hit-and-run accidents with impunity.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The primary distinction between military and civilian "hit and run" statutes is that the UCMJ imposes an affirmative responsibility on the senior passenger (if a noncommissioned or commissioned officer) to prevent a driver from fleeing the scene after an accident. The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Fleeing the Scene of an Accident: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no direct Title 18 counterpart to "fleeing the scene of an accident." However other federal law (i.e. District of Columbia Statute § 50-2201.05(a)(1)-(3)), criminalizes fleeing the scene of an accident, and every state has adopted a "hit and run" statute.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-82: Migrate the offense of fleeing the scene of an accident in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶82) to Article 111.

Migrating the fleeing the scene of an accident offense to its own enumerated punitive article: Article 111, aligns the offense with similar subject matter offenses involving misuse of vehicles under the UCMJ. While the UCMJ is unique in imposing liability upon a "senior passenger" for a "hit and run", fleeing the scene of an accident itself is a well recognized area of criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 910 (article 110 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 1022, the following new section (article):

"§911. Art. 111. Leaving scene of vehicle accident

"(a) DRIVER.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is the driver of a vehicle that is involved in an accident that results in personal injury or property damage; and

"(2) who wrongfully leaves the scene of the accident—

"(A) without providing assistance to an injured person; or

"(B) without providing personal identification to others involved in the accident or to appropriate authorities;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) SENIOR PASSENGER.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who is a passenger in a vehicle that is involved in an accident that results in personal injury or property damage;

"(2) who is the superior commissioned or noncommissioned officer of the driver of the vehicle or is the commander of the vehicle; and

"(3) who wrongfully and unlawfully orders, causes, or permits the driver to leave the scene of the accident—

"(A) without providing assistance to an injured person; or

"(B) without providing personal identification to others involved in the accident or to appropriate authorities;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1023 would amend Article 111 and retitle the statute as "Leaving scene of vehicle accident." As amended, the statute would include the offense of "Fleeing the scene of an accident," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article) to place it next to other offenses under the UCMJ involving misuse of vehicles. The offense of fleeing the scene of an accident is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[8]

Article 112 – Drunk on Duty
10 U.S.C. § 912

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would retain the current provisions under Article 112, with minor changes, and would migrate into the statute the offenses of incapacitation for the performance of duties and drunk prisoner, both of which currently are addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Article 112 would be retitled as "Drunkenness and Other Incapacitation Offenses." Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 112.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 112 prohibits a person, other than sentinels or look-outs (who are covered in Article 113), from being drunk on duty.

3. Historical Background

American military law has forbidden drunkenness while on duty since the Revolutionary War.[2] Article 112 was derived from Article 85 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

According to the MCM, "duty" means military duty and includes any duty that a servicemember is legally required to perform by a superior authority; a commander is always on duty when in the actual exercise of command; in areas of active hostilities, all members of a command are continuously on duty.[5]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Drunk on Duty: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances and confinement for 9 months.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 112 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 112: Migrate the offenses of incapacitation for the performance of duties and drunk prisoner (currently in Article 134, MCM, Part IV, ¶¶75, 76) to Article 112.

This proposal would align similar offenses under Article 112.

The exclusion of sentinels and lookouts from liability under Article 112 (Drunk on Duty) would be removed in order to resolve the ambiguity between Articles 112 and 113 (Misbehavior of sentinel) concerning the "on post" status of sentinels and lookouts.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1024. DRUNKENNESS AND OTHER INCAPACITATION OFFENSES.

Section 912 of title 10, United States Code (article 112 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§912. Art. 112. Drunkenness and other incapacitation offenses

"(a) DRUNK ON DUTY.—Any person subject to this chapter who is drunk on duty shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) INCAPACITATION FOR DUTY FROM DRUNKENNESS OR DRUG USE.—Any person subject to this chapter who, as a result of indulgence in any alcoholic beverage or any drug, is incapacitated for the proper performance of duty shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) DRUNK PRISONER.—Any person subject to this chapter who is a prisoner and, while in such status, is drunk shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1024 would amend Article 112 and retitle the statute as "Drunkenness and other incapacitation offenses." As amended, Article 112 would include the offenses of "Drunkenness—incapacitation for performance of duties through prior wrongful indulgence in intoxicating liquor or any drug" and "Drunk prisoner," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The express exclusion of sentinels and lookouts under Article 112 would be removed in order to resolve the ambiguity between Articles 112 and 113 concerning the "on post" status of sentinels and lookouts. The wrongfulness of being incapacitated for duty or as a prisoner is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[7]

Article 112 – Drunkenness and Other Incapacitation Offenses – Addendum 1

(Drunkenness – Incapacitation for Performance of Duties through Prior Wrongful Indulgence in Intoxicating Liquor or any Drug)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of drunkenness (incapacitation for performance of duties through prior wrongful indulgence in intoxicating liquor or any drug) currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 112 (Drunkenness and other incapacitation offenses). Part II of this Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM Part IV, ¶76, the offense of incapacitating drunkenness for performance of duties requires proof that the accused had wrongfully indulged in intoxicating liquor or any drug and, as a result, was incapacitated to properly perform certain duties. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized "drunken incapacitation for duty" via the "General Article" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated drunken incapacitation for duty as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3]

(citations omitted).

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of incapacitating drunkenness for the performance of duties: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 3 months and confinement for 3 months.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The offense of incapacitating drunkenness for the performance of duties is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-76: Migrate the offense of incapacitating drunkenness for the performance of duties (currently in Article 134, Part IV, ¶76), to Article 112.

Migrating the offense of drunken incapacitation for duty to Article 112 aligns the offense with the existing UCMJ drunkenness offense. Drunken incapacitation for duty is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, it does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.[5]

Article 112 – Drunkenness and Other Incapacitation Offenses – Addendum 2
(Drunk Prisoner)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of drunk prisoner currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 112 (Drunkenness and other incapacitation offenses). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶75, the offense of drunk prisoner requires proof that the accused was drunk, disorderly, or both, upon a ship or some other place. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized "drunk and disorderly conduct" generally via the "General Article" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] However, neither the Articles of War nor UCMJ Article 112 (Drunk on duty) addressed the circumstance of a drunk prisoner specifically. The President has designated "drunk prisoner" as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of drunk prisoner: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 3 months and confinement for 3 months.[4]

(citations omitted).

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶75.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1791 (Providing or Possessing Contraband in Prison) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of drunk prisoner.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-75: Migrate the offense of drunk prisoner (currently in Article 134, Part IV, ¶75), to Article 112.

Migrating the offense drunk prisoner to Article 112 aligns the offense with the existing UCMJ drunkenness offenses. Drinking while incarcerated would ordinarily be in violation of confinement facility regulations. Accordingly, it is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline and is not reliant upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality. Prisoners using drugs, as opposed to alcohol, may be punished under Article 112a, Article 92, or Article 134 as appropriate.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 112a – Wrongful Use, Possession, etc., of Controlled Substances

10 U.S.C. § 112a

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 112a. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 112a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 112a prohibits the wrongful use, possession, manufacture, distribution, importation into or export out of the customs jurisdiction of the United States, or the introduction into an installation, vessel, vehicle, or aircraft any prohibited controlled substance.

3. Historical Background

The wrongful use or possession of a controlled substance was punished as a violation of the General Article under Article 96 of the 1948 Articles of War.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, unlawful drug use and possession continued to be prosecuted as a violation of the General Article under Article 134.[2] Article 112a was enacted in 1983, prohibiting wrongful use and possession of certain controlled substances and incorporating prohibitions against other substances as defined by the Controlled Substances Act.[3] Article 112a has remained unchanged since then.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for offenses under Article 112a: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on the controlled substance and whether it was distributed, confinement for up to 15 years.[4] The services in some instances may also prosecute use and possession of intoxicating substances not proscribed by the Controlled Substances Act as a violation of Article 92 if the substance has been prohibited by a lawful general order or regulation.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

21 U.S.C. § 841(a) (Drug abuse prevention and control) sets forth similar offenses to Article 112a. The primary distinction between Title 21 drug offenses and UCMJ drug offenses are: (1) Title 21 does not separately criminalize unauthorized "use" of a controlled substance;[6] and (2) the MCM provides for increased punishments when a drug offense occurs in a deployed environment.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 112a: No change to Article 112a.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 112a's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 113 (Current Law) – Misbehavior of Sentinel
10 U.S.C. § 913

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would redesignate Article 113 as Article 95 and migrate into the statute the loitering portion of the sentinel or lookout offenses, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 95 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 113 prohibits misbehavior by a person on guard duty or while a lookout. Misbehavior includes being found drunk or sleeping, or leaving a post before being regularly relieved. In time of war, the offense is punishable by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized misconduct by a sentinel since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] The current Article 113 was derived from Article 86 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 4 of the 1930 Articles for Government of the Navy.[3] The word lookout was added to cover Navy terminology.[4] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 113 encompasses only those specifically assigned as sentinels or lookouts, and is not applicable to an officer or enlisted person of the guard, or of a ship's watch.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 113 is a unique military offense, with no counterpart in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 113: Redesignate Article 113 as Article 95 and migrate the loitering portion of the sentinel or lookout offenses (currently in Article 134, the General Article, Part IV, ¶104) to the new Article 95.

Article 114 (Current Law) – Dueling
10 U.S.C. § 914

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would retain the existing provisions in Article 114 and migrate into the statute the offenses of reckless endangerment, dueling, discharge of firearm/endangering human life, and carrying of a concealed weapon—all of which are currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Article 114 would be retitled as "Endangerment offenses." Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 114 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 114 prohibits fighting, promoting, or failing to report a challenge to a duel. A duel is defined as combat between two persons for private reasons fought with deadly weapons by prior agreement.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized dueling since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] The current Article 114 was derived from Article 91 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 114's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1026. ENDANGERMENT OFFENSES.

Section 914 of title 10, United States Code (article 114 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§914. Art. 114. Endangerment offenses

"(a) RECKLESS ENDANGERMENT.—Any person subject to this chapter who engages in conduct that—

"(1) is wrongful and reckless or is wanton; and

"(2) is likely to produce death or grievous bodily harm to another person;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) DUELING.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who fights or promotes, or is concerned in or connives at fighting a duel; or

"(2) who, having knowledge of a challenge sent or about to be sent, fails to report the facts promptly to the proper authority;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) FIREARM DISCHARGE, ENDANGERING HUMAN LIFE.—Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully and wrongly, discharges a firearm, under circumstances such as to endanger human life shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(d) CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPON.—Any person subject to this chapter who unlawfully carries a dangerous weapon concealed on or about his person shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1026 would migrate the offenses of "Reckless endangerment," "Firearm, discharging—willfully, under such circumstances as to endanger human life," and "Weapon: concealed carrying" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 114 (Endangerment offenses), which currently includes the offense of "Dueling." The wrongfulness of failing to maintain weapon discipline is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, these offenses do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.[6]

Article 114 – Endangerment Offenses
Addendum 1
(Reckless Endangerment)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of reckless endangerment currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the newly redesignated Article 114 (Endangerment offenses). Part II of the Report will address changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 114 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶100a, the offense requires proof that the accused was wrongfully engaged in reckless or wanton conduct that was likely to produce death or grievous bodily harm to another person. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated reckless endangerment as an Article 134 offense in 1999.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Reckless Endangerment: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no Title 18 equivalent offense to reckless endangerment. However, the Model Penal Code contains the offense of recklessly endangering another person,[4] which is similar to the military offense of reckless endangerment.

[3] MCM, Part IV, ¶100a.e.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-100a: Migrate the offense of reckless endangerment (currently in Article 134, MCM, Part IV, ¶100a), to Article 114.

Migrating the reckless endangerment offense to Article 114 (Endangerment Offenses) aligns the offense with other similar subject matter offenses which are also migrating to Article 114 (e.g. willful discharge of a firearm endangering human life). Wanton and reckless conduct creating a likelihood of inflicting death or grievous bodily harm is a recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, reckless endangerment does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 114 – Endangerment Offenses – Addendum 2
(Firearm, Discharging – Willfully, Under Such Circumstances as to Endanger Human Life)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of willful discharge of a firearm/endangering human life currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 114 (Endangerment offenses). Part II of this Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶81 the offense requires a showing that the accused discharged a firearm, willfully and wrongfully, and that the discharge was under circumstances such as to endanger human life. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated "willful discharge of a firearm/endangering human life" as an Article 134 offense in 1951.[2] The offense targets reckless or negligent disregard for the safety of others; it does not require an identifiable victim to be placed in apprehension of receiving immediate bodily harm.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The offense requires that there is a "reasonable potential" that human life could have been endangered.[4] It does not require human life to have been actually endangered by the willful discharge of a firearm. Under this standard, firing a weapon into an empty barracks room that an accused does not know to be unoccupied[5]; firing several rounds across a highway used as a main supply route;[6] firing rounds into the ground near other soldiers[7] all constitute "willful discharge of a firearm under circumstances to threaten human life."

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Willful Discharge of Firearm/Endangering Human Life: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The offense of willful discharge of firearm/endangering human life has no direct federal civilian counterpart. Many states, however, have some type of comparable law, such as firing a weapon within city limits, or firing from a vehicle or building.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-81: Migrate the offense of willful discharge of firearm/endangering human life (currently in Article 134, MCM, Part IV, ¶81), to Art. 114.

Migrating the willful discharge of a firearm under circumstances to endanger human life offense to Article 114 Endangerment Offenses logically aligns the offense with the other offenses involving criminal use of firearms under the UCMJ. Failure to maintain weapon discipline that creates an actual risk of bodily harm to others is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 114 – Endangerment Offenses – Addendum 3
(Weapon Concealed/Carry)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of carrying a concealed weapon currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the newly redesignated Article 114 (Endangerment offenses). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual provisions implementing the new Article 114.

2. Summary of the Current Statute.

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶112, the offense requires a showing that the accused unlawfully carried a dangerous concealed weapon on or about his person. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated carrying a concealed weapon as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Unlawfully carrying a concealed weapon is a general-intent crime; there is no requirement to prove that the accused intended to violate the law so long as he had the intent to conceal the weapon on or about his person.[3] A weapon is "concealed" under this offense if it is readily available to the accused and is kept from sight.[4]

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶112.c.(1).

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of carrying a concealed weapon: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal law authorizes only law enforcement officers and retired law enforcement officers to carry concealed weapons. 18 U.S.C. §§ 926B, 926C. Most states authorize lay citizens to carry a concealed weapon, but require persons to have a permit.[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-112: Migrate the offense of carrying a concealed weapon (currently in Article 134, MCM, Part IV, ¶112), to Article 114.

Migrating the carrying a concealed weapon offense logically aligns the offense with the other weapons based offenses under the newly reconstituted Article 114. Carrying a concealed weapon, without authorization, is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.[7]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area.

Article 115 (Current Law) – Malingering
10 U.S.C. § 915

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends a technical change to the existing Article 115, and proposes that it be redesignated as Article 83. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 83 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 115 prohibits the feigning of illness, physical disablement, mental lapse or derangement, or from intentionally inflicting self-injury, to avoid work, duty, or service.

3. Historical Background

Article 115 was derived primarily from the proposed Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[2] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Malingering: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 115 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 115: Redesignate Article 115 as Article 83, with a technical amendment.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 115's provisions, other than this technical amendment, change to the statute's contents is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1004. MALINGERING.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 882 (article 82 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 1003, the following new section (article):

"§883. Art. 83. Malingering

"Any person subject to this chapter who, with the intent to avoid work, duty, or service—

"(1) feigns illness, physical disablement, mental lapse, or mental derangement; or

"(2) intentionally inflicts self-injury;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

8. Sectional Analysis

Section 1004 would transfer and redesignate Article 115 (Malingering) as Article 83, and would make a technical change to the statute's provisions. The technical change would replace the words "for the purpose of avoiding" with the words "with the intent to avoid" to better address the mens rea required for the offense.

Article 115 (New Location) – Communicating Threats
10 U.S.C. § 915

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of communicating a threat, and the offense of communicating a threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear, both of which currently are addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new stand-alone enumerated punitive article, Article 115 (Communicating threats).[2] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 115.

2. Narrative Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶110 ("Threat, communicating"), the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully communicated a threat to injure the person, property, or reputation of another person. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶ 109 ("Threat or hoax designed to cause panic or public fear"), the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully communicated a threat to commit harm by means of an explosive or other material, or maliciously communicated a false threat to commit harm by those means. Because these offenses fall under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the charged misconduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated communicating a threat as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[3] The President designated communicating a threat or hoax designed to create public fear as an Article 134 offense in the 1984 MCM.[4] Prior to that time, threats or hoaxes designed to create public fear were charged as a violation of Article 134 under either Clause 1 or Clause 3.[5] The offense covers bomb threats and bomb hoaxes.

4. Contemporary Practice

To fall within the prohibition of communicating a threat under current law, the accused must both understand that the language constitutes a threat (regardless of whether the accused actually intended to do the injury threatened) and that a reasonable person would perceive the statement to be a true threat.[6] A declaration made under circumstances which reveal it to be in jest or for an innocent or legitimate purpose, or which contradict the expressed intent to commit the act, does not constitute the offense.[7]

Under current law, a bomb threat occurs when an accused wrongfully communicates certain language amounting to a threat to commit harm by means of an explosive.[8] A bomb hoax occurs when an accused knowingly and maliciously communicates or conveys certain false information concerning an attempt being made or to be made by means of an explosive to kill, injure, or intimidate a person, or to damage or destroy certain property.[9] The law does not require the accused to have actually intended to carry out the threat.[10]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of communicating a threat: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years. The President has prescribed the following maximum punishment for an offense involving a threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[11]

The Supreme Court recently utilized similar reasoning in an appeal arising from a defendant's conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 875(c), addressing the mental state requirement for communicating a threat. See Elonis v. United States, No. 13-983, slip. op. at 11 (June 1, 2015). The Court found that the mental state requirement for a threat "turns on whether a defendant knew the character of what was sent, not simply its contents and context." Id. (emphasis in original).

[10] MCM, Part IV, ¶ 109.c.(1).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Title 18, Chapter 41 of the U.S. Code addresses offenses involving threats and extortion. 18 U.S.C. § 844(e), which proscribes bomb threats, sets forth a similar offense to the Article 134 offense of Threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-109: Migrate the offense of "Threat, communicating," along with the offense of "Threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear," both currently in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶¶109, 110), to the newly redesignated Article 115.

The offenses of Threat, communicating, and Threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear are well-recognized concepts in criminal law. Accordingly, these offenses do not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for their criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1027. COMMUNICATING THREATS.

Section 915 of title 10, United States Code (article 115 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§915. Art. 115. Communicating threats

"(a) COMMUNICATING THREATS GENERALLY.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully communicates a threat to injure the person, property, or reputation of another shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) COMMUNICATING THREAT TO USE EXPLOSIVE, ETC.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully communicates a threat to injure the person or property of another by use of (1) an explosive, (2) a weapon of mass destruction, (3) a biological or chemical agent, substance, or weapon, or (4) a hazardous material, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) COMMUNICATING FALSE THREAT CONCERNING USE OF EXPLOSIVE, ETC.—Any person subject to this chapter who maliciously communicates a false threat concerning injury to the person or property of another by use of (1) an explosive, (2) a weapon of mass destruction, (3) a biological or chemical agent, substance, or weapon, or (4) a hazardous material, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct. As used in the preceding sentence, the term 'false threat' means a threat that, at the time the threat is communicated, is known to be false by the person communicating the threat.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1027 would migrate the offenses of "Threat, communicating," and "Threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 115 (Communicating threats). These offenses are well-recognized concepts in criminal law. Accordingly, these offenses do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality. The guidance in the Manual for Courts-Martial will continue to reflect the limitations on these offenses established in the applicable case law.[12]

Article 116 – Riot or Breach of Peace
10 U.S.C. § 916

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 116. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 116.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 116 prohibits causing or participating in a riot or breach of the peace.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized both rioting, and a superior officer's failure to quell a riot, since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] The current Article 116 was derived from Article 89 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 22 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Riot or Breach of Peace: for riot, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years; for breach of peace, forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 6 months and confinement for 6 months.[4]

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶41.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2101 (Riots) sets forth a similar offense to Article 116.[5] The primary difference between the Title 18 and UCMJ "riot" statutes is that the UCMJ contains a lower level "breach of the peace" offense whereas Title 18 does not.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 116: No change to Article 116.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 116's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports the MJRG Operational Guidance of minimizing change when established military law is similar to the law applied in U.S. district courts.

[5] Compare MCM, Part IV, ¶41.c(1) (defining "riot" as "a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three or more persons assembled together in furtherance of a common purpose . . . in such a violent and turbulent manner as to cause or be calculated to cause a public terror") (emphasis added) with 18 U.S.C. § 2102(a) (defining "riot" as "an act or act of violence by one or more persons part of an assemblage of three or more persons, which acts shall constitute a clear and present danger to the property of any other person or to the person of any individual") (emphasis added).

Article 117 – Provoking Speeches or Gestures
10 U.S.C. § 917

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 117. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in Part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial implementing Article 117.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 117 prohibits using provoking or reproachful words or gestures towards any other person subject to the UCMJ.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized "provoking speeches and gestures" since the 1775 Articles of War.[1] The current Article 117 was derived from Article 90 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 8 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[2] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Provoking Speeches or Gestures: forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for 6 months and confinement for 6 months.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 117 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart. The Supreme Court has held that the First Amendment does not protect some types of speech, such as "fighting words" or other communications designed to incite violence.[5]

Recommendation 117: No change to Article 117.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 116's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Article 118 – Murder
10 U.S.C. § 918

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends a technical amendment to conform Article 118 to this Report's proposed clarification that forcible sodomy is punishable under Article 120. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 118.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 118 prohibits the unlawful killing of a human being, when done by a premeditated design to kill, with an intent to kill or inflict great bodily harm, by an act that is inherently dangerous to another and evinces a wanton disregard of human life; or while engaged in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of burglary, sodomy, rape, rape of a child, sexual assault, sexual assault of a child, aggravated sexual contact, sexual abuse of a child, robbery or aggravated arson. The offense is punishable by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

3. Historical Background

Until 1916, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over murder only when the murder occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[1] In 1916, Congress amended the Articles of War to provide jurisdiction over murder and rape anytime the murder occurred outside of the territorial boundaries of the United States.[2] The current Article 118 applies anywhere, anytime, and was derived from Article 92 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 6 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] The statute was amended in 1992,[4] 2006,[5] and 2011,[6] to add the felony offenses of rape of a child, sexual assault, sexual assault of a child, aggravated sexual contact, sexual abuse of a child for the commission of felony murder.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 118 has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of premeditated murder (Article 118(1)): death or life imprisonment.[7] All other forms of murder under Article 118 (2)-(4) are punishable by "any punishment less than death."[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1111 (Murder) sets forth a similar offense to Article 118.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 118: Amend Article 118(4) to conform to the proposed amendment to Article 125 (which has the effect of clarifying that forcible sodomy is included within the sexual offenses punishable under Article 120).

This technical change reflects the revision of Article 125 proposed by this Report.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1028. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO MURDER.

Section 918(4) of title 10, United States Code (article 118(4) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "forcible sodomy.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1028 would make a technical amendment to Article 118 (Murder).

Article 119 – Manslaughter
10 U.S.C. § 919

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to the existing Article 119. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 119.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 119 prohibits the unlawful and intentional killing of another human being in the heat of sudden passion caused by adequate provocation (manslaughter), and the unlawful killing of another by culpable negligence or while perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate an offense (involuntary manslaughter) other than those offenses named in Article 118 (Murder).

3. Historical Background

Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over manslaughter only when the killing occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[1] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over manslaughter and a list of other common law offenses.[2] The current Article 119 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Manslaughter: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and,

18 U.S.C. § 1112 (Manslaughter) sets forth a similar offense to Article 119.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 119: No change to Article 119.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 119's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

Article 119a – Death or Injury of an Unborn Child
10 U.S.C. § 919a

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 119a. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 119a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 119a prohibits the unlawful killing or infliction of bodily injury to an unborn child. Article 119a does not apply to a consensual abortion, medical treatment for mother or the unborn child, or to the mother of the unborn child.[1]

3. Historical Background

Article 119a was added to the UCMJ in 2004.[2] The statute has remained unchanged since then.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Death or Injury of an Unborn Child: such punishment, other than death, as a court-martial may direct.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1841 (Protection of unborn children) sets forth a similar offense to Article 119a.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 119a: No change to Article 119a.

The case law concerning Article 119a does not demonstrate a current need for statutory revisions.

Article 119b (New Provision) – Child Endangerment

10 U.S.C. § 919b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of child endangerment currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the new enumerated punitive article, Article 119b (Child endangerment). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 119b necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In Part IV, ¶68a, the offense of child endangerment requires a showing that the accused had a duty to care for a child under the age of sixteen years, and that the accused endangered the child's mental or physical health, safety, or welfare, through design or culpable negligence. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces first recognized "child endangerment" (without resulting physical harm) as qualifying misconduct under Article 134 in 2003.[2] The President then designated "child endangerment" as an Article 134 offense in the 2008 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

At least thirty-three States and the District of Columbia currently have child endangerment statutes.[4]

[2] United States v. Vaughn, 58 M.J. 29, 32-33 (C.A.A.F. 2003) (holding military custom, state statutes, and military regulations provided the accused constructive notice that leaving a child unattended for prolonged number of hours violated Article 134).

[3] MCM 2008, Part IV, ¶68a.

[4] Vaughn, 58 M.J. at 32 n.2, Appendix (citing 33 States and the District of Columbia child endangerment statutes).

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Child Endangerment: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, if the endangerment was by design, confinement for 8 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The military offense of child endangerment has no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-68a: Migrate the offense of child endangerment in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶68a) to the new Article 119b.

Migrating the offense of child endangerment to the new Article 119b aligns the offense with Article 119a—Death or Injury of an Unborn Child. Child endangerment is well recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, it does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1029. CHILD ENDANGERMENT.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 919a (article 119a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

"§919b. Art. 119b. Child endangerment

"Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who has a duty for the care of a child under the age of 16 years; and

"(2) who, through design or culpable negligence, endangers the child's mental or physical health, safety, or welfare;

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶68a.e.

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1029 would create a new section, Article 119b (Child endangerment), and would migrate the offense of "Child endangerment" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The new section would align with the closely related offense of "Death or injury of an unborn child" under Article 119a. The offense of child endangerment is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 120 – Rape and Sexual Assault Generally
10 U.S.C. § 920

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would conform the definition of "sexual act" in Article 120(g)(1) to the definition of "sexual act" in the comparable Title 18 provision, 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by this statutory amendment.

Any changes in addition to the definition of "sexual act" should await further recommendations of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel is conducting an extensive examination of whether further changes to Article 120 are warranted and recommended the Secretary of Defense establish a subcommittee of experts for that purpose.[1] The Judicial Proceedings Panel is also examining whether the definitions of rape and sexual assault should be amended to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.[2] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual provisions necessitated by this statutory amendment.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 120 prohibits rape, sexual assault, aggravated sexual contact, and abusive sexual contact on another person.

Article 120(g)(1)(B) defines "sexual act", in pertinent part, as "(b) penetration, however slight, of the vulva or anus or mouth of another by any part of the body or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

3. Historical Background

Until 1916, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over "rape" only when the rape occurred in wartime or under the General Article (i.e. "conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline").[3] In 1916, Congress amended the Articles of War to provide jurisdiction over

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of "Rape and Sexual Assault Generally" under Article 120: for rape, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for life without eligibility for parole; for sexual assault, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 30 years; for aggravated sexual contact, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 20 years; and for abusive sexual contact, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 7 years.[13]

[13] Exec. Order 13643 of May 15, 2013. The current version of the MCM (2012) does not yet contain the President's maximum punishment designations for Article 120.

The current definition of "sexual act" in Article 120(g)(1)(B) includes non-sexual acts. Specifically, the definition extends to "the penetration, however slight of the vulva or anus or mouth of another by any part of the body or by any object."[14]

18 U.S.C. § 2246(2), the comparable provision in Title 18, defines the term "sexual act" in a similar context to mean "the penetration, however slight, of the anal or genital opening of another by a hand or finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse, or gratify the sexual desire of any person."

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 120: Amend the definition of "sexual act" in Article 120(g)(1) to conform it to 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(c).

As there are no military specific reasons for having a unique military definition for "sexual act," this report conforms Article 120 to its civilian counterpart.[15]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal is consistent with MJRG Terms of Reference to employ the standards and procedures applicable to federal criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Any changes in addition to amending the definition of "sexual act" should await further recommendations of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, which is conducting an extensive examination of whether further changes to Article 120 are warranted, and has recommended the Secretary of Defense establish a subcommittee of experts for that purpose.[16]

The Judicial Proceedings Panel is also examining whether the definitions of rape and sexual assault should be amended to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act by abusing their position in the chain of command to gain access to or coerce the other person. [17] This Report proposes a new statute, Article 93a, to prohibit improper acts with recruits and trainees, addressing a specific category of abuse of position in the chain of command.

SEC. 1030. DEFINITION OF SEXUAL ACT FOR RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT OFFENSES.

(a) RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT GENERALLY.—Paragraph (1) of section 920(g) of title 10, United States Code (article 120(g) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(1) SEXUAL ACT.—The term 'sexual act' means—

"(A) contact between the penis and the vulva or the penis and the anus, and for purpose of this subparagraph contact involving the penis occurs upon penetration, however slight;

"(B) contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus; or

"(C) the penetration, however slight, of the anal or genital opening of another by a hand or finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.".

(b) [Omitted. See Article 120b.]

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1030 would amend the definition of "sexual act" in both Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally) and Article 120b (Rape and sexual assault of a child) to conform to the definition of that term in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(A)-(C). The current definition of "sexual act" under Articles 120 and 120b is both overly broad (it captures non-sexual acts) and unduly narrow (it does not include all of the prohibited acts involving children listed in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(D)).

Article 120a (Current Law) – Stalking
10 U.S.C. § 920a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would update the current law to address cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners. Article 120a would be redesignated as Article 130. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 130 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 120a prohibits a person from engaging in a course of conduct that would cause a reasonable person to fear death or bodily harm, including sexual assault, to themselves or a member of their immediate family.

3. Historical Background

Article 120a was added to the UCMJ in 2006 based on the 2000 version of 18 U.S.C. § 2261A (Interstate Stalking).[1] While Article 120a has remained unchanged since 2006,[2] 18 U.S.C. § 2261A was amended by the Violence Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2006 and the Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act of 2013.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of stalking: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2261A (Interstate stalking) sets forth a similar offense to Article 120a. 18 U.S.C. § 2261A differs from Article 120a in that the Title 18 offense requires a specific intent to "kill, injure, harass, or intimidate" and also prohibits conduct that "causes . . . or would be reasonably expected to cause substantial emotional distress." Section 2261A also has been broadened to cover the use of technology in stalking, or cyber-stalking.[5] Paragraph (1) of §

2261A requires that a defendant "engages in conduct." Paragraph (2) of § 2261A and Article 120a require a "course of conduct.."[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 120a: Amend Article 120a to address cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners, and redesignate Article 120a as Article 130.

As amended, the offense of "stalking" would include conduct that uses surveillance, the mails, an interactive computer service, an electronic communication service, or an electronic communication system. The offense also would include a definition of "intimate partner" to cover threats to former spouses and individuals who have been in an intimate relationship with the targeted person.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to stalking in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1043. STALKING.

Section 930 of title 10, United States Code (article 130 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as transferred and redesignated by section 1001(11), is amended to read as follows:

"930. Art. 130. Stalking

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who wrongfully engages in a course of conduct directed at a specific person that would cause a reasonable person to fear death or bodily harm, including sexual assault, to himself or herself, to a member of his or her immediate family, or to his or her intimate partner;

"(2) who has knowledge, or should have knowledge, that the specific person will be placed in reasonable fear of death or bodily harm, including sexual assault, to himself or herself, to a member of his or her immediate family, or to his or her intimate partner; and is guilty of stalking and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

"(1) The term 'conduct' means conduct of any kind, including use of surveillance, the mails, an interactive computer service, an electronic communication service, or an electronic communication system.

"(2) The term 'course of conduct' means—

"(A) a repeated maintenance of visual or physical proximity to a specific person;

"(B) a repeated conveyance of verbal threat, written threats, or threats implied by conduct, or a combination of such threats, directed at or toward a specific person; or

"(C) a pattern of conduct composed of repeated acts evidencing a continuity of purpose.

"(3) The term 'repeated', with respect to conduct, means two or more occasions of such conduct.

"(4) The term 'immediate family', in the case of a specific person, means—

"(A) that person's spouse, parent, brother or sister, child, or other person to whom he or she stands in loco parentis; or

"(B) any other person living in his or her household and related to him or her by blood or marriage.

"(5) The term 'intimate partner' in the case of a specific person, means—

"(A) a former spouse of the specific person, a person who shares a child in common with the specific person, or a person who cohabits with or has cohabited as a spouse with the specific person; or

"(B) a person who has been in a social relationship of a romantic or intimate nature with the specific person, as determined by the length of the relationship, the type of relationship, and the frequency of interaction between the persons involved in the relationship.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1043 would redesignate Article 120a (Stalking) as Article 130, and would update current law to address cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners. The proposed amendments would continue to address stalking activity involving a broad range of misconduct including, but not limited to, sexual offenses. The redesignated stalking statute would not preempt service regulations that specify additional types of misconduct that may be punishable at court-martial, including under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), nor would it preempt other forms of misconduct from being prosecuted under other appropriate Articles, such as under Article 134 (General article). These uniquely military offenses are available to address similar misconduct that, for example, causes substantial emotional distress or targets professional reputation.

Article 120a (New Location) – Mails: Deposit of Obscene Matter

10 U.S.C. § 920a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in the mails currently under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the new Article 120a (Mails: deposit of obscene matter) as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶94 the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully deposited or caused to be deposited in the mails certain matter for mailing and delivery. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President designated depositing obscene matters in the mail as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[2] Minor amendments to definitions in the offense were made in the 1984 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Depositing or Causing to be Deposited Obscene Materials in the Mails: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1461 (Mailing obscene or crime-inciting matter) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in the mails.

[3] MCM 1984, Part IV, ¶94.

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶94.e.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-94: Migrate the offense of depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in the mails (currently under Article 134, the General Article, MCM, Part IV, ¶94), to create a new Article 120a.

The offense of depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in the mails is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1031. DEPOSIT OF OBSCENE MATTER IN THE MAIL.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 920 (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

"§920a. Art. 120a. Mails: deposit of obscene matter

"Any person subject to this chapter who, wrongfully and knowingly, deposits obscene matter for mailing and delivery shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1031 would redesignate Article 120a as "Mails: deposit of obscene matter" and would migrate the offense of "Mails: depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in" from Article 134 (the General article) into the redesignated statute. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[5]

[5] For further discussion of the concept of "migration" see supra, Exec. Sum., and infra Art. 134 (Gen. Art.).

Article 120b – Rape and Sexual Assault of a Child
10 U.S.C. § 920b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would conform the definition of "sexual act" in Article 120b(h)(1) to the definition of "sexual act" in the comparable Title 18 provision, 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 120b prohibits the rape, sexual assault, or commission of "lewd acts" with a child. Lewd acts under the statute fall into four categories: (1) any sexual contact (as defined by Article 120(g)); (2) exposing one's genitalia, buttocks, or nipples to a child (either in person or via any communication technology); (3) communicating "indecent language" to a child, by any means[1]; and (4) a "catch all" indecent conduct provision.[2]

3. Historical Background

Until 2012, the UCMJ addressed rape and sexual assault of a child under Article 120.[3] The current Article 120b was enacted in 2012.[4] It consolidates the child sexual offenses contained in the 2007 version of Article 120(b), (d), (f), (g), (i), (j).[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for Article 120b: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement

[1] Article 120b(h)(5)(A)-(C).

[2] "Indecent conduct" would capture any act directed at a child that "amounts to a form of immorality relating to sexual impurity which is grossly vulgar, obscene, and repugnant to common propriety, and tends to excite sexual desire or deprave morals with respect to sexual relations." Article 120b(h)(5)(D).

[3] From 1950 to 2006 Article 120 classified child sex offenses as "carnal knowledge." 10 U.S.C. § 920(b) (2006) amended by NDAA FY 2006, Pub. L. No. 109-16 Div A, Title V, Subtitle E, § 552, 119 Stat. 3136, 3256 (2006)).

for life without eligibility for parole.[6] The Secretary of Defense lists every offense under Article 120b as a sex offender registration offense.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2241 (Aggravated sexual abuse), §2243 (Sexual abuse of a minor or ward), §2244 (Abusive sexual contact), and §2251 (Sexual exploitation of children) set forth similar offenses to Article120b.

The current definition of "sexual act" in Article 120b(h)(1) does not include all of the acts proscribed by its federal counterpart definition, 18 U.S.C. 2246(2)(D). Specifically, §2246(2)(D) extends to intentional touching of the genitalia without requiring insertion of the genitalia into the mouth or "penetration, however slight" as Article 120b currently does.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 120b: Amend the definition of "sexual act" in Article 120b(h)(1) to conform it to 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(A)-(D).

This Report already recommends conforming the definition of "sexual act" under Article 120 to the federal definition in 18 U.S.C. §2246. Consistent with that recommendation, and as there is no military specific reason for having a unique military definition for "sexual act" as it pertains to a child under the age of 16, this report also recommends conforming the definition of "sexual act" in Article 120b to conform with the federal definition of "sexual act" set forth in 18 U.S.C. §2246.[9]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the MJRG Operational Guidance to employ the standards and procedures applicable to federal criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

JPP INITIAL REPORT at 14-15. In that context, this report recommends no further amendments to Article 120b, beyond the conforming changes recommended herein.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1030. DEFINITION OF SEXUAL ACT FOR RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT OFFENSES.

(a) [Omitted. See Article 120.]

(b) RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT OF A CHILD.—Section 920b of title 10, United States Code (article 120b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended in subsection (h)(1) by inserting before the period at the end the following:

", except that the term 'sexual act' also includes the intentional touching, not through the clothing, of the genitalia of another person who has not attained the age of 16 years with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1030 would amend definition of "sexual act" in both Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally) and Article 120b (Rape and sexual assault of a child) to conform to the definition of that term in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(A)-(C). The current definition of "sexual act" under Articles 120 and 120b is both overly broad (it captures non-sexual acts) and unduly narrow (it does not include all of the prohibited acts involving children listed in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(D)).

Article 120c – Other Sexual Misconduct
10 U.S.C. § 920c

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to the current Article 120c. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions for this statute.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 120c prohibits the indecent viewing, recording, or broadcasting of the private area of another person. In addition, the statute prohibits forcible pandering and indecent exposure.

3. Historical Background

Article 120c was enacted in 2012.[1] Prior to 2011, the offenses were defined in the 2007 Article 120(k), (l), and (n).[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for Article 120c: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 12 years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1801 (Video Voyeurism) sets forth a similar offense to Article 120c(a) (Indecent Viewing/Visual Recording/Broadcasting). 18 U.S.C. §§ 1591 and 2422 set forth similar offenses to Article 120c(b) (Forcible Pandering). There is no Title 18 equivalent to Article 120c(c) (Indecent Exposure).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 120c: No change to Article 120c.

The case law concerning Article 120c does not demonstrate a current need for statutory revisions.

Article 121 – Larceny and Wrongful Appropriation
10 U.S.C. § 921

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 121. Part II of the Report will address any changes that may be needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 121.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 121 prohibits the wrongful taking, obtaining, or withholding from the possession of another person of any item of personal property with the intent to permanently (larceny) or temporarily (wrongful appropriation) deprive or defraud another person of the use and benefit of the property.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized larceny of government property since the 1874 Articles of War.[1] Until 1920, however, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over larceny of non-military property only when the offense occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over larceny and a list of other "common law" offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[3] The current Article 121 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[4] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 121 combines the common law theories of larceny into a single statute, including: larceny by trick and device, larceny by asportation, obtaining property by false pretenses, and embezzlement.[6] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Larceny and Wrongful Appropriation: if the stolen property was military property and its value was over $500.00, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years; otherwise, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for up to 5 years.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 641 (Public money, property, or records) sets forth a similar offense to Article 121.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 121: No change to Article 121.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 121's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary, except for the proposed new offense that would address offenses involving credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Offenses involving credit cards and debit cards, charged at courts-martial in current practice under Article 121 as a larceny by false pretenses, are addressed in this Report in "Article 121a – Fraudulent Use of Credit Cards, Debit Cards, and Other Access Devices."

Article 121a (New Provision) – Fraudulent Use of Credit Cards, Debit Cards, and Other Access Devices

10 U.S.C. § 921a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create a new statute: Article 121a (Fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices) similar to 18 U.S.C. § 1029 (Fraud and related activity in connection with access devices). Part II of this Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 121a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

This proposal would create a new statute.

3. Historical Background

The theft and misuse of "access devices," such as credit, debit, or ATM cards or numbers has been prosecuted at courts-martial as a larceny by false pretenses under Article 121 (Larceny). The offense requires a correct identification of the victim incurring the ultimate loss, which may be difficult to determine, because of the complex contractual arrangements of the cardholder, the bank, and the merchant. The theft or misuse of a credit or debit card to obtain goods is "usually a larceny of those goods from the merchant offering them," while such misuse to obtain money from an automated teller machine is "usually a larceny of money from the entity presenting the money."[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

Reliance on the offense of larceny to address credit card offenses has proved problematic, particularly in terms of identifying whether the cardholder, the merchant, or the bank is the victim.[2]

[1] MCM, Part IV, ¶46.c.(1)(h)(vi).

[2] See, e.g., United States v. Lubasky, 68 M.J. 260, 263-264 (C.A.A.F. 2010) (accused's unauthorized use of credit cards to obtain cash advances and goods was a larceny against the cards' issuers or the business establishments where the goods were purchased, not against the cards' owner); United States v. Cimball-Sharpton, 73 M.J. 299, 302 (C.A.A.F. 2014) (victim of accused's credit card larceny was the Air Force, which paid for the unauthorized charges, rather than bank which issued the card or merchants which sold the goods purchased.); United States v. Endsley, (sum. disp.) __ M.J. __, No. 15-0202/AR (C.A.A.F. 14 January 2015) (the proper victims were the merchants who provided the goods upon false pretenses, not the debit cardholder), reversing 73 M.J. 909 (A. Ct. Crim. App. 2014).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In the 1980s, nearly every state, the District of Columbia, and the federal government enacted legislation specifically penalizing the misuse of credit cards and other access devices.[3] 18 U.S.C. § 1029 (Fraud and related activity in connection with access devices) sets forth a similar offense to the proposed Article 121a. The statute focuses on the wrongfulness of a misuse of a credit or debit card, done without authorization for personal gain; it avoids the need to identify the victim suffering the ultimate loss. The approach in 18 U.S.C. § 1029 presents a practical alternative to charging access-device related offenses as a larceny under the UCMJ.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 121a: Enact Article 121a.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing ambiguities in the current Article 121 case law concerning offenses involving credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices, thereby reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1032. FRAUDULENT USE OF CREDIT CARDS, DEBIT CARDS, AND OTHER ACCESS DEVICES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 921 (article 121 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

[3] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW, VOL. 3, § 19.7(j)(6) (2d ed. 2003). For an index of state statutes addressing credit card and other access device-related offenses see State Credit Card Fraud Laws, available at http://statelaws.findlaw.com/criminal-laws/credit-card-fraud.html.

"§921a. Art. 121a. Fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter who, with intent to defraud, uses—

"(1) a stolen credit card, debit card, or other access device;

"(2) a revoked, cancelled, or otherwise invalid credit card, debit card, or other access device; or

"(3) a credit card, debit card, or other access device without the authorization of a person whose authorization is required for such use; to obtain money, property, services, or anything else of value shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) DEFINITION.—In this section (article), the term 'access device' has the meaning given that term in section 1029 of title 18.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1032 would create a new section, Article 121a (Fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices). Article 121a is designed specifically to address the misuse of credit cards, debit cards, and other electronic payment technology, also known as "access devices." This article is modeled on 18 U.S.C. § 1029. It would provide a more effective and efficient means of prosecuting crimes committed with credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices than under current practice, in which such crimes are prosecuted as a larceny by false pretenses under Article 121 (Larceny and wrongful appropriation). When a government-issued credit card, debit card, or other access device is misused, the authorized sentence can be addressed in the Manual through the President's delegated powers under Article 56, which is the current sentencing approach for theft of government property under Article 121.

Article 121b (New Provision) – False Pretenses to Obtain Services

10 U.S.C. § 921b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of obtaining services under false pretenses currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the new enumerated punitive article, Article 121b (False pretenses to obtain services). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 121b necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶78, the offense is similar to the offenses of larceny or wrongful appropriation except that the object of the obtaining is services, for example telephone services, rather than money, an item of personal property, or items of value of any kind. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

Traditionally, American military law did not recognize "theft of services" as a type of larceny punishable at courts-martial.[2] The President did not initially designate an "obtaining services under false pretenses" offense under Article 134 in the 1951 MCM.[3] In 1965, the Court of Military Appeals first recognized "obtaining services under false pretense" as qualifying misconduct under Article 134.[4] The President designated obtaining services under false pretenses as an offense under Article 134 in the 1968 MCM.[5]

McCracken, 19 C.M.R. 876, 877 (A.F.B.R. 1955) (holding that obtaining the use of a rental car under false pretenses was not larceny within the meaning of Article 121); United States v. Jones, 23 C.M.R. 818, 821 (A.F.B.R. 1956) (theft of telephone services did not constitute Article 121 larceny).

[4] United States v. Herndon, 36 C.M.R. 8, 11 (C.M.A. 1965) (holding that theft of telephone services was akin to fraud and constituted "service discrediting" misconduct under Article 134).

[5] MCM 1968, App. 6c, ¶148.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Obtaining Services under False Pretenses: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on the value of the services obtained, confinement for up to 5 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The offense of obtaining services by false pretenses under Article 134 has no direct federal civilian counterpart. However, Chapter 31, Title 18 of the U.S. Code includes a number of theft and embezzlement offenses that may address the conduct punishable under the Article 134 offense.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-78: Redesignate the offense of obtaining services by false pretenses (currently in Article 134, MCM, Part IV, ¶78) as Article 121b.

Migrating the offense of obtaining services under false pretenses to its own enumerated punitive article: Article 121b, aligns the offense with the other UCMJ "larceny" offenses. Obtaining services by false pretenses is now well recognized in criminal law.[7] Accordingly, it does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1033. FALSE PRETENSES TO OBTAIN SERVICES.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 921a (article 121a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1032, the following new section (article):

---

[6] MCM 2012, Part IV, ¶78.e.

[7] See MODEL PENAL CODE §2.23.7 (1980).

"§921b. Art. 121b. False pretenses to obtain services

"Any person subject to this chapter who, with intent to defraud, knowingly uses false pretenses to obtain services shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1033 would create a new section, Article 121b (False pretenses to obtain services), and would migrate the offense of "False pretenses, obtaining services under" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. This change would align the offense of false pretenses with the related UCMJ "larceny" offenses. Obtaining services by false pretenses is now well recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[8]

Article 122 – Robbery
10 U.S.C. § 922

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 122 to conform to the offense of robbery under 18 U.S.C. § 2111. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 122 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 122 prohibits the taking of anything of value from the person or in the presence of another, against his will, by means of force or violence or fear of immediate or future injury to his person or property or to the person or property of a relative or member of his family or of anyone in his company.

3. Historical Background

Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over robbery only when the offense occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[1] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over robbery and a list of other common law offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[2] The current Article 122 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] The statute remains unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Robbery: if committed with a firearm, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 15 years; otherwise, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[5]

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶47.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2111 sets forth a similar offense to Article 122. It differs from the UCMJ, however, in that it simply requires a forcible taking of property without requiring proof of an "intent to deprive permanently" because the gravamen of robbery is the forcible taking of another's property, in their presence.[6]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 122: Amend Article 122 by removing the intent to permanently deprive requirement.

The gravamen of robbery is the forcible taking of another's property, not the duration of time the accused intends to possess the property. To align Article 122 with federal practice, Article 122 should be amended to remove "with the intent to steal" (i.e. permanently deprive) as a statutory prerequisite and convert it into a potential maximum punishment enhancer under the MCM.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1034. ROBBERY.

Section 922 of title 10, United States Code (article 122 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§922. Art. 122. Robbery

"Any person subject to this chapter who takes anything of value from the person or in the presence of another, against his will, by means of force or violence or fear of immediate or future injury to his person or property or to the person or property of a relative or member of his family or of anyone in his company at the time of the robbery, is guilty of robbery and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1034 would amend Article 122 (Robbery) to conform the statute to the offense of robbery under 18 U.S.C. § 2111. Article 122 prohibits the taking of anything of value from the person or in the presence of another, against his will, by means of force or violence or fear of immediate or future injury to his person or property or to the person or property of a family member or others present. Article 122 would be amended to align with 18 U.S.C. § 2111 by removing the words "with the intent to steal" from the statute, thereby eliminating the requirement to show that the accused intended to permanently deprive the victim of his property. The amendments would focus the statute on the true gravamen of this offense: the forcible taking of the property by the accused from the victim, in the presence of the victim.

Article 122a (New Provision) – Receiving Stolen Property

10 U.S.C. § 922a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of receiving stolen property currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the new punitive article, Article 122a (Receiving stolen property). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶106, the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully received, bought, or concealed stolen property of some value belonging to another person. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

Under the UCMJ, the President first designated knowingly receiving, buying, or concealing stolen property as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

When an accused is not the actual thief who can be found liable as a principal to a larceny, then he may be convicted for receiving stolen property under Article 134. The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Receiving Stolen Property: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and depending on the value of the stolen property, confinement for up to 3 years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 662 (Receiving stolen property within special maritime and territorial jurisdiction) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of receiving stolen property in Article 134.

[1] MCM, Part IV, ¶106.

[2] MCM 1951, App. 6c, ¶169.

[3] MCM, Part IV, ¶106.e.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-106: Migrate the offense of receiving stolen property (currently in Article 134, the General Article, MCM, Part IV, ¶106) to Article 122a.

The offense of receiving stolen property is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1035. RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 922 (article 122 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as amended by section 1034, the following new section (article):

"§922a. Art. 122a. Receiving stolen property

"Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully receives, buys, or conceals stolen property, knowing the property to be stolen property, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1035 would create a new section, Article 122a (Receiving stolen property), and would migrate the offense of "Stolen property: knowingly receiving, buying, concealing) from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The offense of receiving stolen property is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[4]

Article 123 (Current Law) – Forgery
10 U.S.C. § 923

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 123, except to redesignate it as Article 105 as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 105.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 123 prohibits a person from falsely making or altering a signature to a writing which would, if genuine, impose a legal liability on another person or change his legal right or liability to his prejudice; it also prohibits a person from uttering, offering, issuing, or transferring such a writing, known by them to be so made or altered.

3. Historical Background

American military law has specifically criminalized forgery involving frauds against the government since the 1874 Articles of War.[1] Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over non-government related forgeries only when the offense occurred either in wartime or when charged as an offense "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over larceny and a list of other common law offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[3] The current Article 123 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[4] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[5]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Forgery: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 470, et. seq (Counterfeiting and forgery) set forth similar offenses to Article 123.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 123: No change to Article 105, except to redesignate it as Article 105.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 123's provisions, change to the statute is not necessary.

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 123 (New Provision) – Offenses Concerning Government Computers

10 U.S.C. § 923

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create a new enumerated Article 123 (Offenses concerning Government computers), similar to 18 U.S.C. § 1030 (Fraud and related activity in connection with computers). Part II of the Report will address the Manual provisions implementing the new Article 123.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

The proposal would create a new statute.

3. Historical Background

The proposal would create a new statute.

4. Contemporary Practice

If a computer crime is committed in the United States by a person subject to the UCMJ, military prosecutors can charge federal civilian offenses under Article 134, clause 3. But if the crime is committed elsewhere, the government is limited to charging the offense under Article 134, clause 1 (conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline) or clause 2 (service discrediting conduct), which require the government to charge and prove both the civilian offense and the terminal element of clause 1 or clause 2 when charging the federal statute. Prosecutors can also charge computer offenses under existing articles of the UCMJ, such as Article 92 (Failure to obey an order or regulation), with an authorized maximum confinement period of two years. Article 108 (Military property of the United States-sale, loss, destruction, or wrongful disposition) may also apply to misconduct involving government computers, with a maximum authorized confinement period of ten years.[1]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1030 (Fraud and related activity in connection with computers) sets forth a similar offense to the proposed Article 123, Computer Crime. The federal statute addresses conduct that targets computer systems.[2] The law protects computer systems from unauthorized access, threats, damage, espionage, and from being corruptly used as instruments of fraud. Conspiracy to commit and attempts to commit these crimes are also crimes under 18 U.S.C. § 1030(b).[3]

Two terms are common to most prosecutions under section 1030, and are thus key definitions for applying the statute: "protected computer" and "authorization." The term "protected computer," defined at 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(2), is a statutory term of art, applicable to computers used in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce and computers used by the federal government and financial institutions. With respect to "authorization," persons who "exceed authorized access" are generally insiders (e.g., employees using a victim's corporate computer network),[4] while persons who access computers "without authorization" will typically be outsiders (e.g., hackers).[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 123.1: Enact Article 123, Offenses concerning Government computers.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to computer offenses in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the MJRG Terms of Reference by incorporating practices used in U.S. district courts with respect to computer offenses.

[4] Applying the definition of "exceeding authorized access" under 18 U.S.C. § 1030 has presented a recurrent challenge for federal courts. The most commonly litigated issue about "exceeding unauthorized access" in reported opinions is whether a particular defendant exceeded authorized access for a particular purpose. See, e.g., United States v. John, 597 F.3d 263, 272 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Access to a computer and data that can be obtained from that access may be exceeded if the purposes for which the access has been given are exceeded."); see also United States v. Nosal, 676 F.3d 854, 864 (9th Cir. 2012) (phrase "exceeds authorized access," within the meaning of CFAA, is limited to access restrictions, not use restrictions). Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 922a (article 122a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1035, the following new section (article):

"§923. Art. 123. Offenses concerning Government computers

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter who—

"(1) knowingly accesses a Government computer, with an unauthorized purpose, and by doing so obtains classified information, with reason to believe such information could be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, and intentionally communicates, delivers, transmits, or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted such information to any person not entitled to receive it;

"(2) intentionally accesses a Government computer, with an unauthorized purpose, and thereby obtains classified or other protected information from any such Government computer; or

"(3) knowingly causes the transmission of a program, information, code, or command, and as a result of such conduct, intentionally causes damage without authorization, to a Government computer;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

"(1) The term 'computer' has the meaning given that term in section 1030 of title 18.

"(2) The term 'Government computer' means a computer owned or operated by or on behalf of the United States Government.

"(3) The term 'damage' has the meaning given that term in section 1030 of title 18.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1036 would amend Article 123 in its entirety and retitle the statute as "Offenses concerning Government computers." The new enumerated punitive article would be similar to 18 U.S.C. § 1030 (Fraud and related activity in connection with computers). Computers are used extensively throughout the armed forces, and this proposed offense would facilitate prosecuting computer-related offenses at courts-martial. The new statute would provide a UCMJ punitive article to address computer-related offenses where the gravity of the offense may make Article 92-level punishment inappropriately low, but the misconduct may not meet the criteria of existing punitive articles such as Espionage. The new offense is modeled on 18 U.S.C. § 1030, tailored to address the needs of military justice. It would apply only to persons subject to the UCMJ, and it would be directed only at U.S. government computers and U.S. government protected information.

Article 123 would not supersede or preempt the prosecution of 18 U.S.C. § 1030 or other Title 18 offenses under Article 134, Clause 3. Further, service and DoD regulations provide a broadly applicable and flexible means to prosecute less serious computer offenses under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), and the proposed offense does not supersede or preempt those regulations. Article 108 (Military property of United States—Loss, damage, destruction, or wrongful disposition) covers computer files that have been altered or damaged by the accused through deletion or destruction of computer files or programs for purposes of the offense of willfully destroying military property.

The Manual for Courts-Martial guidance for Article 123 will define and clarify terms, including the term "with an unauthorized purpose," which includes circumstances involving more than one unauthorized purpose, as well as circumstances involving an unauthorized purpose in conjunction with an authorized purpose. The guidance also will reference the UCMJ Article 1(15) definition for "classified information," and will define "protected information" to include information that has been designated as For Official Use Only (FOUO), or as Personally Identifiable Information (PII).

Article 123a – Making, Drawing, or Uttering Check, Draft, or Order Without Sufficient Funds

10 U.S.C. § 923a

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 123a. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 123a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 123a prohibits the writing, making, drawing, or uttering of checks with the intent to defraud or deceive when the servicemember knows there are insufficient funds to cover the cost of the check.

3. Historical Background

Congress enacted Article 123a in 1961[1] to criminalize "intentional disruption of the flow and undermining the soundness of commercial paper" in courts-martial.[2] Prior to Article 123a's enactment, bad check cases were prosecuted under Articles 121 (larceny), 123 (forgery) and 134 (general article), each of which presented technical difficulties in pleading and proof.[3] Article 123a remains unchanged since its enactment.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Making, Drawing, or Uttering Check, Draft, or Order Without Sufficient Funds: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1344 (Bank fraud) sets forth a similar offense to Article 123a.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation Article 123a: No change to Article 123a.

Article 124 (Current Law) – Maiming
10 U.S.C. § 924

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 124, except to redesignate it as Article 128a as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 128a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 124 prohibits the intentional disfigurement, disablement, or infliction of any other serious physically debilitating injury upon another person.

3. Historical Background

Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over maiming only when the offense occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[1] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over maiming and a list of other common law offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[2] The current Article 124 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The MCM makes clear that "maiming" does not require a specific intent to "maim," it only requires a specific intent to harm.[5] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Maiming: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 20 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 114 (Maiming within maritime and territorial jurisdiction) and other federal statutes[7] set forth similar offenses to Article 124.[8] There are however two primary differences between the UCMJ and Title 18 maiming offenses. First, the text of Article 124, provides broader categories of possible qualifying "maiming" injuries, whereas 18 U.S.C. § 114 is limited to a specific statutory list of injuries. Second, Article 124 only requires a specific intent to harm whereas Title 18 requires a specific intent to torture, maim, or disfigure.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 124: No change to Article 124, except to redesignate it as Article 128a.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 124's provisions, change to the statute's contents is not necessary.

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

[8] The MCM and 18 U.S.C. § 114 provide a similar list of injuries qualifying as maiming., e.g. "putting out a person's eye, to cut off a hand, foot, or finger, to knock out a tooth; to cut off an ear; to scar a face with acid; MCM, Part IV, ¶50.c(1); "cuts, bites, or slits the nose, ear, or lip, cuts/disables the tongue, puts out/disables an eye, cuts off/disables a limb, or pours scalding water, acid, or a corrosive substance upon another." 18 U.S.C. § 114.

Article 124a (New Location) – Bribery
10 U.S.C. § 924a

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends migrating the offense of bribery currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new section, Article 124a (Bribery). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 124a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶66, the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully asked, offered, received, promised, or gave a thing of value to a certain person who occupied an official position or had official duties, with the intent to influence the decision or actions, or be influenced in a decision or action in an official matter in which the United States was interested. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized bribery via the General Article since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated bribery (in conjunction with graft) as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3] The current military bribery offense was derived from what was then 18 U.S.C. § 202 (now 18 U.SC. § 201) (Bribery of Public Officials and Witnesses).[4] The offenses were designed to target public corruption by military members abusing their official position for personal financial gain.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Bribery: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 201 (Bribery of public officials and witnesses) sets forth a similar offense to the military offense of Bribery in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 132: Migrate the offense of bribery currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶66)) to Article 124a Bribery.

Migrating the offense of bribery to the new Article 124a aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and graft offenses under the UCMJ. Bribery is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

This Report also recommends no change to the existing Article 132 (Frauds against the United States), except to redesignate it as Article 124.

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) PROMISING, OFFERING, OR GIVING THING OF VALUE.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully promises, offers, or gives a thing of value to another person, who occupies an official position or who has official duties, with the intent to influence the decision or action of the other person with respect to an official matter in which the United States is interested, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1037 would create a new section, Article 124a (Bribery), and would migrate the offense of bribery from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating the offense of bribery to the new Article 124a aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and graft offenses under the UCMJ. Bribery is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[7]

[7] For further discussion of the concept of "migration," see Executive Summary, supra, and Article 134—General Article (10 U.S.C. § 934), infra.

Article 124b (New Location) – Graft
10 U.S.C. § 924b

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends migrating the offenses of graft currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 124b (Graft). Part II of the Report will address the Manual provisions implementing the new Article 124b.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶66, the offense requires a showing that the accused wrongfully asked, accepted, or received a thing of value in an official matter when no compensation was due. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized graft via the General Article since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated graft (in conjunction with bribery) as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3] The current military graft offense was derived from what was then 18 U.S.C. § 202 (now 18 U.SC. § 201) (Bribery of Public Officials and Witnesses).[4] The offense was designed to target public corruption by military members abusing their official position for personal financial gain.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

Bribery and Graft are both currently listed as a combined offense under Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶66). The primary distinction between the two offenses is that "bribery" requires an intent to be influenced as an essential element, whereas "graft" does not.[6] Accordingly, graft is a lesser included offense of bribery.[7]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Frauds against the United States: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 201 (Bribery of public officials and witnesses) sets forth a similar offense to the military offense of Bribery in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 132: Migrate the offense of graft currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶66)) to Article 124b Graft.

Migrating the offense of graft to the new Article 124b aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and bribery offenses under the UCMJ. Graft is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

The proposed amendments would align similar offenses under Article 124 and Article 124a.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1038. GRAFT.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 924a (article 124a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1037, the following new section (article):

[8] MCM, Part IV, ¶66.e(2).

"§924b. Art. 124b. Graft

"(a) ASKING, ACCEPTING, OR RECEIVING THING OF VALUE.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who occupies an official position or who has official duties; and

"(2) who wrongfully asks, accepts, or receives a thing of value as compensation for or in recognition of services rendered or to be rendered by the person with respect to an official matter in which the United States is interested;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) PROMISING, OFFERING, OR GIVING THING OF VALUE.—Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully promises, offers, or gives a thing of value to another person, who occupies an official position or who has official duties, as compensation for or in recognition of services rendered or to be rendered by the other person with respect to an official matter in which the United States is interested, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1038 would create a new section, Article 124b (Graft), and would migrate the offense of graft from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating the offense of graft to the new Article 124b aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and bribery offenses under the UCMJ. Graft is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[9]

Article 125 (Current Law) – Sodomy
10 U.S.C. §925

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report proposes to address the offense of forcible sodomy under Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally), and to address the sexual abuse of an animal, along with other types of animal abuse, under a new Article 134 offense. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 125 prohibits forcible, non-consensual oral sex or anal sex between two persons, and it prohibits all sexual activity between humans and animals.

3. Historical Background

The current Article 125 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 9 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] The statute was amended in 2013 to eliminate the offense of consensual sodomy, while retaining the provisions addressing forcible sodomy and bestiality.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Currently, the same sexual acts of non-consensual oral or anal sex that may be charged under Article 125 (Sodomy) can also be charged under Article 120 (Rape and Sexual Assault Generally).[3]

There is currently no comprehensive animal abuse offense in the UCMJ; sexual acts with animals may be prosecuted under the current Article 125, and offenses committed against government-owned animals, such as military working dogs, may be prosecuted under Article 134 (para. 61)-Abusing a Public Animal. In 2012, the Joint Services Committee proposed an animal abuse offense under Article 134.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 125 has no direct federal civilian counterpart. Instead, the Title 18 sexual assault statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2241 (Aggravated sexual abuse), addresses a broad spectrum of sexual acts, encompassing sexual acts defined as sodomy in Article 125.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 125: Address the offense of forcible sodomy under Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally), and address the sexual abuse of an animal under a new comprehensive animal abuse offense in Article 134.

A new animal cruelty offense under Article 134 would cover the misconduct currently addressed under Articles 125 and 134, and also would address other forms of animal abuse. Article 125 would serve as the location for the offense of kidnapping which would be migrated from Article 134 as set forth in the following section of this Report.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 125 (New Location) – Kidnapping
10 U.S.C. §925

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of kidnapping currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to the new Article 125 (Kidnapping) as part of the realignment of the punitive articles. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶92, the offense of kidnapping requires a showing that the accused seized, inveigled, decoyed, or carried away a person and then held them against their will. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated the offense of kidnapping under Article 134 in the 1984 MCM.[2] The intent of the offense's designation in Article 134 was to "end prosecutions under assimilated state law, put to a rest uncertainty concerning kidnapping offenses, and ensure the uniform treatment of the offense regardless of location."[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Kidnapping: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for life without eligibility for parole.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1201 (Kidnapping) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of kidnapping under Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-92: Migrate the offense of kidnapping in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶92) to the amended Article 125.

The offense of kidnapping is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1039. KIDNAPPING

Section 925 of title 10, United States Code (article 125 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§925. Art. 125. Kidnapping

"Any person subject to this chapter who wrongfully—

"(1) seizes, confines, inveigles, decoys, or carries away another person; and

"(2) holds the other person against that person's will;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1039 would migrate the offense of "Kidnapping" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 125 (Kidnapping). The offense of kidnapping is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality. The removal of sodomy from Article 125 conforms the statute to the proposed treatment of the offense of forcible sodomy under Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally) and the proposal to provide comprehensive guidance on the treatment of animal abuse offenses, including bestiality, under Article 134.

Article 126 – Arson
10 U.S.C. § 926

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of burning with intent to defraud currently addressed in Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 126 (Arson; burning property with intent to defraud). This Report recommends no other changes to Article 126. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 126.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 126 prohibits the willful and malicious burning or setting on fire of a dwelling or other structure. The article sets out two forms of aggravated arson and one form of simple arson.

3. Historical Background

Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over "arson" only when the offense occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over arson and a list of other "common law" offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[3] The current Article 126 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[4] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Arson: depending on whether the structure was inhabited and its value, dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 20 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 81 (Arson within maritime and territorial jurisdiction) sets forth a similar offense to Article 126.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 126: Migrate the offense of burning with intent to defraud (currently in Article 134, the General Article, MCM, Part IV, ¶67), to Article 126.

This proposal would align similar offenses, and migrate the offense of Burning with Intent to Defraud from Article 134 to an enumerated punitive article, where the terminal element under Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) is not necessary to demonstrate criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1040. ARSON; BURNING PROPERTY WITH INTENT TO DEFRAUD.

Section 926 of title 10, United States Code (article 126 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§926. Art. 126. Arson; burning property with intent to defraud

"(a) AGGRAVATED ARSON.—Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully and maliciously, burns or sets on fire an inhabited dwelling, or any other structure, movable or immovable, wherein, to the knowledge of that person, there is at the time a human being, is guilty of aggravated arson and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) SIMPLE ARSON.—Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully and maliciously, burns or sets fire to the property of another is guilty of simple arson and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) BURNING PROPERTY WITH INTENT TO DEFRAUD.—Any person subject to this chapter who, willfully, maliciously, and with intent to defraud, burns or sets fire to any property shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1040 would migrate the offense of "Burning with intent to defraud" from Article 134 (the General article) to redesignated Article 126 (Arson; burning property with intent to defraud). Article 126 currently prohibits the willful and malicious burning or setting on fire of a dwelling or other structure. Article 126 sets out two forms of aggravated arson and one form of simple arson. The offense of burning with intent to defraud is similar to those offenses and is itself a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[7]

Article 126 – Arson – Addendum
(Burning with Intent to Defraud)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of burning with intent to defraud currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 126. Article 126 would be retitled as "Arson; burning property with intent to defraud." Part II of this Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. MCM, Part IV, ¶67 requires a showing that the accused willfully and maliciously burned or set fire to the property of a certain person with the intent to defraud a certain person or organization. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The Court of Military Appeals first recognized the burning of an uninhabited building with the intent to defraud as qualifying misconduct under Article 134 in 1958.[2] The President then designated "burning with intent to defraud" as an Article 134 offense in the 1968 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Burning with the intent to defraud is a form of aggravated arson that falls outside of the current scope of Article 126 because it does not involve the burning of an inhabited dwelling or other structure. In practical terms, the offense is intended to criminalize burning property with intent to defraud an insurance provider.[4]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Burning with Intent to Defraud: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 81 (Arson within maritime and territorial jurisdiction) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of burning with intent to defraud in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-67: Migrate the offense of burning with intent to defraud in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶67) to Article 126.

Migrating the offense of burning with intent to defraud to Article 126 aligns the offense with the existing UCMJ arson offense. Burning with the intent to defraud is an aggravated form of arson well recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, it does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.[6]

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

Article 127 – Extortion
10 U.S.C. § 927

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 127. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed to the provisions in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 127.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 127 prohibits the communication of threats to another person with the intention to obtain anything of value.

3. Historical Background

Prior to enactment of the UCMJ, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over "extortion" only when the offense occurred under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline" in violation of the "general article."[1] The current Article 127 was derived from practice under Article 96 of the 1948 Articles of War.[2] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[3] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Military courts broadly construe the word "threats" when interpreting Article 127.[4] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Extortion: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 871 et seq. (Extortion and threats) set forth similar offenses to Article 127.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 127: No change to Article 127.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 127's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

This Report proposes that Communicating a Threat, previously addressed in MCM Part IV, ¶110, will be included under Article 115.

Article 128 – Assault
10 U.S.C. § 928

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 128 to adopt the aggravated assault provision of 18 U.S.C. § 113. This proposal would further migrate into Article 128 the general offense of assault with intent to commit certain specified offenses currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article).[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual provisions implementing Article 128 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 128 prohibits assaults (offers or attempts to do bodily harm to another person), batteries (harmful or offensive touching of another person), and aggravated assaults (using a weapon or other means or force likely to produce grievous bodily harm, or when grievous bodily harm has been intentionally inflicted with or without a weapon).

3. Historical Background

"Assaults" (including simple assault, battery, and aggravated assault) have their origins in the common law, and have been proscribed under military law since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] The current Article 128 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[4] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Assaults: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and depending on the nature of the assault, confinement for up to 10 years.[5]

---

[1] MCM, Part IV, ¶64. The offense assault with intent to commit murder, etc., is discussed in the Report under "Article 128 – Assaults – Addendum." The "specified offenses" under that provision include voluntary manslaughter, rape, robbery, sodomy, arson, burglary, or housebreaking.

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶54.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 113 (Assaults within maritime and territorial jurisdiction) sets forth a similar offense to Article 128. 18 U.S.C. § 113(a)(3), the aggravated assault provision in the offense, differs from Article 128(b)(1)'s aggravated assault provision; Article 128(b)(1) is narrower, because it requires that any dangerous weapon or other instrumentality be used in a manner "likely to produce death or grievous bodily harm."[6] 18 U.S.C. § 113 requires only that an accused use "a dangerous weapon with the intent to do bodily harm"; the statute focuses on the nature of the weapon and the accused's intent rather than the "likelihood of harm." Under federal case law, a "dangerous weapon" is "an instrument capable of inflicting death or serious bodily injury."[7]

Finally, while Article 128 recognizes two categories of harm: (1) bodily harm; and (2) grievous bodily harm; 18 U.S.C. § 113 recognizes these plus a third: "substantial bodily harm." It provides a middle tier of harm under the statute and is defined as a "temporary but substantial disfigurement; or a temporary but substantial loss or impairment of the function of any bodily member, organ, or mental faculty."[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 128: Amend Article 128 to conform to 18 U.S.C. 113(a)(3) and migrate the general offense of assault in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶64) to Article 128.

This proposal improves Article 128 in three respects: (1) adopting the 18 U.S.C. § 113(a)(3) definition of aggravated assault provides clarity for "aggravated assault" and better accountability for malicious intent by focusing more on the intent of the accused rather than the "likelihood of harm";

(2) Adopting the 18 U.S.C. § 113(b)(1) "middle tier" of harm: "substantial bodily injury," into Article 128 aligns military law with federal practice and will better calibrate courts-martial punishments relative to the amount of harm caused;

(3) Removing Article 128(b)(1)'s higher "specific intent" threshold for aggravated assault (i.e. requiring specific intent to inflict grievous bodily harm) and adopting 18 U.S.C. §113's more modest "intent to cause bodily harm" standard will permit offenders to be held accountable for aggravated assault to the same extent under federal and military law.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to assault in federal civilian practice insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1041. ASSAULT.

Section 928 of title 10, United States Code (article 128 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§928. Art. 128. Assault

"(a) ASSAULT.—Any person subject to this chapter who, unlawfully and with force or violence—

"(1) attempts to do bodily harm to another person;

"(2) offers to do bodily harm to another person; or

"(3) does bodily harm to another person; is guilty of assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) AGGRAVATED ASSAULT.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who, with the intent to do bodily harm, offers to do bodily harm with a dangerous weapon; or

"(2) who, in committing an assault, inflicts substantial bodily harm, or grievous bodily harm on another person; is guilty of aggravated assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(c) ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT SPECIFIED OFFENSES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter who commits assault with intent to commit an offense specified in paragraph (2) shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(2) OFFENSES SPECIFIED.—The offenses referred to in paragraph (1) are murder, voluntary manslaughter, rape, sexual assault, rape of a child, sexual assault of a child, robbery, arson, burglary, and kidnapping.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1041 would amend Article 128 (Assault) to employ a standard that focuses attention on the malicious intent of the accused rather than the speculative "likelihood" of the activity actually resulting in harm, consistent with federal civilian practice.

This section also would migrate the offense of "Assault—with intent to commit murder, voluntary manslaughter, rape, robbery, sodomy, arson, burglary, or housebreaking" from Article 134 (the General article) to Article 128. The offense of assault with intent to commit a serious felony is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[9]

Article 128 – Assault – Addendum
(Assault – with Intent to Commit Murder, Voluntary Manslaughter, Rape, Robbery, Sodomy, Arson, Burglary, or Housebreaking)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offenses of assault with intent to commit murder, voluntary manslaughter, rape, robbery, sodomy, arson, burglary, or housebreaking offense currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article),[1] with slight modifications to the qualifying list of offenses, into Article 128 (Assault). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶64, the offense of assault with intent to commit a specified offense requires a showing that the accused committed an assault upon another person with the intent to commit murder, voluntary manslaughter, rape, robbery, sodomy, arson, burglary, or housebreaking. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law and court-martial practice has criminalized assault with intent to commit murder and other offenses via the General Article since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated assault with attempt to commit specified crimes as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishments for the offense of Assault with the Intent to Commit [a specified offense]: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and, depending on the underlying felony intended during the assault, confinement for up to 20 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 113(a)(1)(2) (Assault within maritime and territorial jurisdiction) sets forth a similar offense to the assault offense in Article 134. It differs in that it encompasses assault with intent to commit any felony.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-64: Migrate the offense of assault with intent to commit an enumerated felony defined in Art. 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶64) to Art. 128.

This series of offenses currently listed in MCM, Part IV, ¶64 are aggravated forms of assault already embraced by Article 128. Migrating this series of "assault with intent to commit" offenses to Article 128 also aligns Article 128 with federal practice under 18 U.S.C. § 113(a)(1), (2).

The list of qualifying offenses under MCM, Part IV, ¶64 should be updated to include the current Article 120b (Rape and Sexual Assault of a Child) and Kidnapping (current MCM, Part IV, ¶83). These offenses are sufficiently serious to warrant placement within the current list of qualifying offenses. Consistent with the MJRG's other realignment recommendations, "sodomy" and "housebreaking" should be deleted from the list as they are subsumed within "rape" and "burglary."

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable in federal civilian practice insofar as practicable.

Article 129 – Burglary
10 U.S.C. § 929

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 129 (Burglary) by removing the obsolete common law elements that the breaking and entering occur: (1) at a private dwelling; and (2) at nighttime. This proposal would also migrate the housebreaking provisions under Article 130 and the offense of unlawful entry under Article 134 (the General Article) into Article 129.[1] Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 129 necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 129 prohibits the breaking and entering of a dwelling house of another during the nighttime with the specific intent to commit any offense punishable under Article 118-128 (excluding Article 123a (Making/Drawing/Uttering Checks without sufficient funds).

3. Historical Background

Until 1920, courts-martial exercised jurisdiction over burglary only when the offense occurred either in wartime or under circumstances which were "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over burglary and a list of other common law offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[3] The current Article 129 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[4] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Burglary: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 10 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2117 (Breaking or entering of carrier facilities) and 18 U.S.C. § 2118 (Robberies and burglaries involving controlled substances) set forth similar offenses to Article 129. Neither 18 U.S.C. § 2117 nor § 2118 require a "breaking and entering" at nighttime; and they do not require that it be in the personal dwelling of another.

The modern trend, reflected in federal law and the Model Penal Code,[7] and followed by the majority of states is to use the factors of a "personal dwelling" and/or "nighttime" as aggravating factors for punishment purposes only, not as elements of burglary.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 129: Amend Article 129 by removing the "private dwelling" and "nighttime" elements, and migrate the provisions under Article 130 and the offense of unlawful entry in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶111) to Article 129.

Modernizing and consolidating Article 129 Burglary with housebreaking and unlawful entry aligns the UCMJ with federal and state practice and enables natural alignment of statutory lesser included offenses. There is no unique military reason to deviate from federal and state practice and require all burglaries to take place "at night" and in a "personal dwelling" as a statutory prerequisite rather than as a punishment enhancer.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to burglary in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1042. BURGLARY AND UNLAWFUL ENTRY.

Section 929 of title 10, United States Code (article 129 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and section 929a of such title (article 129a), as redesignated by section 1001(10), are amended to read as follows:

"§929. Art. 129. Burglary; unlawful entry

"(a) BURGLARY.—Any person subject to this chapter who, with intent to commit an offense under this chapter, breaks and enters the building or structure of another shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) UNLAWFUL ENTRY.—Any person subject to this chapter who unlawfully enters—

"(1) the real property of another; or

"(2) the personal property of another which amounts to a structure usually used for habitation or storage;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1042 would amend Article 129 and retitle the statute as "Burglary; unlawful entry." In the amended statute, the common-law "personal dwelling" and "nighttime" elements would be removed to align Article 129 with the majority rule reflected in federal and state law. As part of the realignment of closely related offenses, the offense of "Housebreaking" would be incorporated into Article 129.

The offense of "Unlawful entry" would migrate as a separate subsection from Article 134 (the General article). Illegally accessing someone else's property is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense of unlawful entry does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[9]

Article 129 – Burglary – Addendum
(Unlawful Entry)

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of unlawful entry currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to Article 129 (Burglary; Unlawful Entry). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶111, the offense requires a showing that the accused entered the real or personal property of another without lawful authority. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated "Unlawful Entry" as an Article 134 offense in the 1951 MCM.[2] The military offense of "unlawful" entry was based upon a 1901 provision of the District of Columbia (later amended in 1951).[3] The Court of Military Appeals first affirmed a conviction for this offense under Article 134 in 1954 in United States v. Love.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

Unlawful entry is a "general intent" crime.[5] The property protected under unlawful entry is broader than that for burglary (personal dwelling) or housebreaking (property used for habitation or storage), and unlike burglary, there is no "breaking" requirement.[6]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Unlawful Entry: bad-conduct discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 6 months.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Title 18 does not provide a counterpart to "unlawful entry" under the UCMJ. However, state law punishes unlawful entry as criminal trespassing.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-111: Migrate the offense of unlawful entry currently in Article 134, the General Article (MCM, Part IV, ¶111), to Article 129.

Migrating the unlawful entry offense aligns the offense with the other criminal trespass to property offenses under the newly reconstituted Article 129 (Burglary). Illegally accessing someone else's property is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

Article 130 (Current Law) – Housebreaking
10 U.S.C. § 930

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends transferring the substance of Article 130 Housebreaking to the amended Article 129 (Burglary) as part of the revision of that offense. Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 129.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 130 prohibits the unlawful entry into a building or structure with the intent to commit any criminal offense therein (excluding "purely military offenses").[1] The term "housebreaking" is a misnomer; the statute does not require that it be a dwelling or a separate structure; the place entered can be a room, shop, store, apartment building, compartment of a vessel, an inhabitable trailer, a tent, or a houseboat.[2] Furthermore, no "breaking" is required, only "unlawful entry."[3]

3. Historical Background

No specific "housebreaking" offense existed under the Articles of War until 1920.[4] During this time, conduct approximating housebreaking could only be prosecuted under the "general article" of the Articles of War which required proof that the offense was "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[5] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over housebreaking and a list of other "common law" offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[6]

The current Article 130 was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[7] Since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950,[8] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

Housebreaking is a lesser included offense of burglary.[9] Like burglary, it is a specific intent crime.[10] The offense of housebreaking should be viewed on a continuum with burglary and unlawful entry. Housebreaking is the middle tier of the three offenses. There are three primary differences between burglary and housebreaking: the property protected under housebreaking is broader than that for burglary (personal dwelling); unlike burglary, there is no "breaking" requirement; and the list of qualifying crimes includes any offense under the UCMJ which is not a "purely military offense."[11]

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Housebreaking: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[12]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 130 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.[13]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 130: Migrate the substance of Article 130 Housebreaking to the amended Article 129 (Burglary).

This change would align similar offenses under Article 129.

The term "housebreaking" is a misnomer; the statute does not require that the structure entered be the dwelling place of another or that an actual "breaking" occur. Accordingly, transferring the substance of Article 130 (Housebreaking) (which is a lesser included offense of Article 129 (Burglary)) would aid in the realignment of closely related offenses.

Article 131 – Perjury
10 U.S.C. § 931

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to the Article 131. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 131.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 131 prohibits the willful giving of false testimony or subscribing to a false statement in a judicial proceeding or in a course of justice. The testimony or statement must be made under oath or penalty of perjury as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1746. In the case of testimony, the oath or affirmation must be recognized or authorized by law and administered by someone having legal authority.[1]

3. Historical Background

American military law has made perjury punishable at courts-martial since the 1775 Articles of War, via prosecution under the General Article as conduct "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War, enacting Article of War 93 to provide jurisdiction over perjury and a list of other "common law" offenses, without requiring proof of prejudice to good order and discipline.[3] Article 131, as enacted in 1950[4], was derived from Article 93 of the 1948 Articles of War.[5] The only substantive amendment to the statute occurred in 1976,[6] which conformed Article 131 to 28 U.S.C. § 1746 (unsworn declarations under penalty of perjury).

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, Article 131 divides perjury into two general categories; the first category is giving false testimony, while the second category is subscribing false

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1621(Perjury) sets forth a nearly identical offense to Article 131.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 131: No change to Article 131.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 131's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by minimizing change when established military law is similar to the law applied in U.S. district courts.

Article 131a (New Provision) – Subornation of Perjury

10 U.S.C. § 931a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of subornation of perjury currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new Article 131a (Subornation of Perjury). Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 131a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶98, the offense requires a person to persuade someone else to commit perjury in court. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized suborning perjury as a violation of the General Article since the Articles of War of 1775.[2] Under the UCMJ, the President has designated subornation of perjury as an Article 134 offense since the 1951 MCM.[3] The offense of subornation of perjury is designed to prevent the corruption of the trial process by false testimony.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Subornation of Perjury: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[5]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1622 (Subornation of perjury) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of subornation of perjury in Article134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-98: Migrate the offense of subornation of perjury in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶98) to Article 131.

Migrating the offense of subornation of perjury to Article 131 aligns the offense with the other similar subject matter offenses under the UCMJ. Suborning perjury is a well recognized concept in criminal law and is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline as it corrupts the trial process and interferes with the administration of justice. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1044. SUBORNATION OF PERJURY.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931 (article 131 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the following new section (article):

"§931a. Art. 131a. Subornation of perjury

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter who induces and procures another person—

"(1) to take an oath; and

"(2) to falsely testify, depose, or state upon such oath; shall, if the conditions specified in subsection (b) are satisfied, be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"(b) CONDITIONS.—The conditions referred to in subsection (a) are the following:

"(1) The oath is administered with respect to a matter for which such oath is required or authorized by law.

"(2) The oath is administered by a person having authority to do so.

"(3) Upon the oath, the other person willfully makes or subscribes a statement.

"(4) The statement is material.

"(5) The statement is false.

"(6) When the statement is made or subscribed, the person subject to this chapter and the other person do not believe that the statement is true.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1044 would create a new section, Article 131a (Subornation of perjury), and would migrate the offense of "Perjury: subornation of" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating this offense would place it alongside similar offenses in the UCMJ. The offense of suborning perjury is a well-recognized concept in criminal law as it corrupts the trial process and interferes with the administration of justice. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 131b (New Provision) – Obstructing Justice
10 U.S.C. § 131b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of obstructing justice currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new Article 131b (Obstruction of Justice). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 131b.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶96, the offense requires a showing that the accused did a wrongful act in the case of a person subject to criminal proceedings,[2] with the intent to influence, impede or otherwise obstruct the due administration of justice. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The military offense of obstructing justice began as an undesignated Article 134 offense.[3] In 1952, the Court of Military Appeals determined that a servicemember could also be prosecuted under the first two clauses of Article 134 for obstruction or interference with the administration of military justice, independent of other federal statutes.[4] The President first designated the offense of obstruction of justice under Article 134 in the 1969 Manual for Courts-Martial.[5]

[5] MCM 1969, App 6(c), ¶165.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Obstructing Justice: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

MCM, Part IV, ¶96, addresses a broad spectrum of conduct analogous to, though not controlled by, offenses codified in Title 18, Chapter 73 (Obstruction of Justice) of the U.S. Code.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-96: Migrate the offense of obstructing justice in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶96) to the new Article 131b.

The offense of obstructing justice is well recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

As amended, Article 131b would cover conduct by an accused in the case of a person against whom the accused has reason to believe there were or would be "criminal or disciplinary proceedings pending." The addition of the word "disciplinary" is intended to clarify that the pending proceeding may include a summary court-martial proceeding, consistent with the proposal under Article 20 to clarify that the summary court-martial is a non-criminal forum.

Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 131b, including the provisions defining "criminal or disciplinary proceedings," which are intended to include non-judicial punishment and summary court-martial proceedings.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

This proposal is related to the proposed amendment to Article 20 to clarify that the summary court-martial is a non-criminal forum.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1045. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931a (article 131a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1044, the following new section (article):

"§931b. Art. 131b. Obstructing justice

"Any person subject to this chapter who engages in conduct in the case of a certain person against whom the accused had reason to believe there were or would be criminal or disciplinary proceedings pending, with intent to influence, impede, or otherwise obstruct the due administration of justice shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1045 would create a new section, Article 131b (Obstructing justice), and would migrate the offense of "Obstructing justice" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. The offense of obstructing justice is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[8]

Article 131c (New Provision) – Misprision of Serious Offense

10 U.S.C. § 931c

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of misprision of serious offense currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new Article 131c (Misprision of serious offense). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 131c.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶95, the offense requires a showing that the accused knew that a particular person committed a serious offense and not only failed to report the offense to authorities, but actively aided in concealing it. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The offense of misprision of a serious offense was first designated by the President in the 1951 MCM.[2] Although it is rarely charged, the crime of misprision of a serious offense is well established in military law.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Misprision of Serious Offense: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 3 years.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 4 (Misprision of felony) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of misprision of serious offense in Article 134.

[4] MCM, Part IV, ¶95e.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-95: Migrate the offense of misprision of serious offense in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶95) to the new Article 131c.

Migrating misprision of a serious offense to its own enumerated punitive article: Article 131c, aligns the offense with similar subject matter offenses involving obstruction of justice under the UCMJ. Obstruction of justice and wrongful concealment of information from law enforcement officials is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1046. MISPRISION OF SERIOUS OFFENSE.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931b (article 131b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1045, the following new section (article):

"§931c. Art. 131c. Misprision of serious offense

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any person subject to this chapter—

"(1) who knows that another person has committed a serious offense; and

"(2) wrongfully conceals the commission of the offense and fails to make the commission of the offense known to civilian or military authorities as soon as possible;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1046 would create a new section, Article 131c (Misprision of serious offense), and would migrate the offense of "Misprision of serious offense" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[5]

Article 131d (New Provision) - Wrongful Refusal to Testify
10 U.S.C. § 931d

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of wrongful refusal to testify currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article) to a new Article 131d (Wrongful refusal to testify). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 131d.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶108, the offense of wrongful refusal to testify requires a showing that the accused refused to qualify as a witness in a court proceeding or refused to answer a certain question in the proceeding. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

The offense is a type of contempt, and is designed to punish witnesses subject to the Code who wrongfully refuse to testify. A good faith but legally mistaken belief in the right to remain silent is not a defense to a charge of wrongful refusal to testify.[1]

3. Historical Background

The President designated the offense of wrongful refusal to testify under Art. 134 in 1951.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Wrongful Refusal to Testify: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

28 U.S.C. § 1826 (Recalcitrant Witnesses) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of wrongful refusal to testify in Article 134.

[1] MCM, Part IV, ¶108.c.

[2] MCM 1951, App. 6c, ¶164.

[3] MCM, Part IV, ¶108.e.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-108: Migrate the offense of wrongful refusal to testify in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶108) as Article 131d.

The offense of wrongfully refusing to testify addresses conduct that is a well recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Art. 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable in federal civilian practice insofar as practicable.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1047. WRONGFUL REFUSAL TO TESTIFY.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931c (article 131c of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1046, the following new section (article):

"§931d. Art. 131d. Wrongful refusal to testify

"Any person subject to this chapter who, in the presence of a court-martial, a board of officers, a military commission, a court of inquiry, preliminary hearing, or an officer taking a deposition, of or for the United States, wrongfully refuses to qualify as a witness or to answer a question after having been directed to do so by the person presiding shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1047 would create a new section, Article 131d (Wrongful refusal to testify), and would migrate the offense of "Testify: wrongful refusal" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Article 131e (New Provision) – Prevention of Authorized Seizure of Property

10 U.S.C. § 931e

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent seizure, currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article),[1] to the new Article 131e (Prevention of authorized seizure of property). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 131e.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. Under MCM, Part IV, ¶103, the offense requires a showing that an accused, knowing that authorized persons are in the process of lawfully seizing certain property, destroys, removes, or otherwise disposes of the property with intent to frustrate the seizure. Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent seizure as an Article 134 offense in the 1984 MCM.[2] This offense is based on 18 USC § 2232 - "Destruction or removal of property to prevent seizure."[3] Prior to 1984, destruction or removal of property to prevent seizure was charged by assimilating the federal statute under Clause 3 of Article 134.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Destruction, Removal, or Disposal of Property to Prevent Seizure: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 1 year.[5]

[5] MCM, Part IV, ¶103.e.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 2232 (Destruction or removal of property to prevent seizure) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent seizure in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-103: Migrate the offense of destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent seizure in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶103) as Article 131e.

The offense of destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent seizure addresses conduct that is well recognized in criminal law and is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline and of a nature to discredit the armed forces. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the terminal element of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative proposal

SEC. 1048. PREVENTION OF AUTHORIZED SEIZURE OF PROPERTY.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931d (article 131d of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1047, the following new section (article):

"§931e. Art. 131e. Prevention of authorized seizure of property

"Any person subject to this chapter who, knowing that one or more persons authorized to make searches and seizures are seizing, are about to seize, or are endeavoring to seize property, destroys, removes, or otherwise disposes of the property with intent to prevent the seizure thereof shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1048 would create a new section, Article 131e (Prevention of authorized seizure of property), and would migrate the offense of "Seizure: destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.[6]

Article 131g (New Provision) – Wrongful Interference with Adverse Administrative Proceeding

10 U.S.C. § 931g

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would migrate the offense of wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding currently addressed under Article 134 (the General Article)[1] to a new Article 131g (Wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 131g.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. In MCM, Part IV, ¶96a, the offense occurs when an accused, knowing or having reason to believe there is an adverse administrative proceeding underway or pending against a certain person, commits certain wrongful acts with the intent to "influence, impede, or obstruct the conduct of such administrative proceeding, or otherwise obstruct the due administration of justice."[2] Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The President first designated wrongful interference in an adverse administrative proceeding as an Article 134 offense in the 1994 MCM.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The wording of the offense and its interpretation is similar to the offense of obstructing justice.[4] The purpose of the offense is to extend an "obstruction of justice" protection to

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Wrongful Interference with an Adverse Administrative Proceeding: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1505 (Obstruction of proceedings before departments, agencies, and committees) sets forth a similar offense to the offense of wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding in Article 134.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134-96a: Migrate the offense of wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding in Article 134 (MCM, Part IV, ¶96a) to the new Article 131g.

Migrating the offense of wrongful interference in an adverse administrative proceeding to Article 131g aligns the offense with the existing UCMJ "obstruction of justice" offenses. Wrongful interference and obstruction of official government proceedings is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, interference and obstruction offenses do not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for their criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to criminal law in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1049. WRONGFUL INTERFERENCE WITH ADVERSE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDING.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931f (article 131f of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as [5] Id. at App. 21 at A21-105.

[6] MCM, Part IV, ¶96a.e.

transferred and redesignated by section 1001(3), the following new section (article):

"§931g. Art. 131g. Wrongful interference with adverse administrative proceeding

"Any person subject to this chapter who, having reason to believe that an adverse administrative proceeding is pending against any person subject to this chapter, wrongfully acts with the intent—

"(1) to influence, impede, or obstruct the conduct of the proceeding; or

"(2) otherwise to obstruct the due administration of justice;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1049 would create a new section, Article 131g (Wrongful interference with adverse administrative proceeding), and would migrate the offense of "Wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. The administrative proceedings addressed by this offense would include any administrative proceeding or action initiated against a servicemember that could lead to discharge, loss of special or incentive pay, administrative reduction in grade, loss of a security clearance, bar to reenlistment, or reclassification. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

If, however, a servicemember wrongfully interferes with an administrative proceeding not addressed under this offense, and that interference takes place under circumstances that are prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting, the new Article 131g is not intended to preempt prosecution for wrongful interference in those other administrative proceedings under clauses 1 or 2 of Article 134.

Article 132 (Current Law) – Frauds Against the United States

10 U.S.C. § 932

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to the existing Article 132, except to redesignate it as Article 124. Part II of the Report will address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 124.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 132 prohibits making a false or fraudulent claim against the federal government.

3. Historical Background

American military law has made fraudulent claims against the federal government punishable at courts-martial since the 1775 Articles of War via prosecution under the "General Article" as conduct "prejudicial to good order and discipline."[1] In Article 60 of the 1874 Articles of War [2] and Article 94 of the 1920 Articles of War,[3] Congress enacted specific stand-alone statutes criminalizing frauds against the government. The current Article 132 was derived from Article 94 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 14 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[4] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment(s) for the offense of Frauds against the United States: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[6]

18 U.S.C. § 1001 (Statements or entries generally) and § 1031 (Major frauds against the United States) set forth similar offenses to Article 132.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 132: No change to Article 132, except to redesignate it as Article 124.

The proposed amendments would align similar offenses under Article 124 and Article 124a.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 132 (New Provision) – Retaliation
10 U.S.C. § 932

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create a new Article 132 (Retaliation). Part II of the Report will address the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing the new Article 132.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134, the General Article, prohibits conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting. MCM, Part IV, ¶96 (Obstructing Justice) requires a showing that the accused did a wrongful act in the case of a person subject to criminal proceedings, with the intent to influence, impede or otherwise obstruct the due administration of justice. This offense addresses a broad spectrum of conduct analogous to, though not controlled by, offenses codified in Title 18, Chapter 73 (Obstruction of Justice) of the U.S. Code.[1] Because the offense falls under Article 134, the prosecution also must prove that the offense was prejudicial to good order and discipline or that it was service discrediting.

3. Historical Background

The military offense of obstructing justice began as an Article 134 clause 3 offense, assimilating the federal statute.[2] In 1952, the Court of Military Appeals determined that a servicemember also could be prosecuted under the first two clauses of Article 134 for obstruction or interference with the administration of military justice, independent of other federal statutes.[3] The President first designated the offense of obstruction of justice under Article 134 in the 1969 MCM.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Obstructing Justice: dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for 5 years.[5] The analysis to ¶96 in the Manual for Courts-Martial makes specific reference to 18 U.S.C. § 1513 (Retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).[6] Additionally, retaliatory conduct in the military that is in violation of Department of Defense and service regulations may be punished under Article 92 or as conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline under Article 134.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 1501 et seq. (Obstruction of Justice) set forth similar offenses to the offense of obstructing justice in Article 134. 18 U.S.C. § 1513(e) (Retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant) prohibits retaliation against witnesses, victims, and other persons who provide truthful information to law enforcement relating to the commission or possible commission of a federal offense.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 132: Enact a new enumerated Article 132 (Retaliation).

The offense of retaliation is inherently prejudicial to good order and discipline and of a nature to discredit the armed forces. Accordingly, this offense does not rely upon additional proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 as the basis for its criminality.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to the offense of retaliation against victims and witnesses in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

SEC. 1050. RETALIATION.

Subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 931g (article 131g of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1049, the following new section (article):

"§932. Art. 132. Retaliation

"Any person subject to this chapter who, with the intent to retaliate against any person for reporting or planning to report a criminal offense, or with the intent to discourage any person from reporting a criminal offense—

"(1) wrongfully takes or threatens to take an adverse personnel action against any person; or

"(2) wrongfully withholds or threatens to withhold a favorable personnel action with respect to any person;

shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1050 would amend Article 132 in its entirety and retitle the statute as "Retaliation." This new offense would provide added protection for witnesses, victims, and persons who report or plan to report a criminal offense to law enforcement or military authority. Article 132 would not preempt service regulations that specify additional types of retaliatory conduct that may be punishable at court-martial under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), nor would it preempt other forms of retaliatory conduct from being prosecuted under other appropriate Articles, such as Article 109 (destruction of property), Article 93 (Cruelty and maltreatment), Article 128 (Assault), Article 131b (Obstructing justice), Article 130 (Stalking), or Article 134 (General article).

Article 133 – Conduct Unbecoming an Officer and a Gentleman

10 U.S.C. § 933

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 133. Part II of the Report will address any changes needed to the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions implementing Article 133.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 133 prohibits conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. Article 133 is intended to punish actions or behaviors of an officer, cadet or midshipman in both their official and private capacity when they dishonor or disgrace the person as an officer and seriously compromise the officer's character as a gentleman. The term "gentleman" includes both male and female commissioned officers, cadets, and midshipmen."[1]

3. Historical Background

American military law has criminalized "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" since the 1775 Articles of War.[2] The current Article 133 was derived from Article 95 of the 1948 Articles of War.[3] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[4] Article 133 has remained unchanged. The language of the statute has been broadly written, from the 1775 Articles of War[5] up through the UCMJ, and the offense has been used to address misconduct by officers not otherwise addressed in the punitive articles.

4. Contemporary Practice

Military custom and practice identifies typical examples of conduct unbecoming an officer to include, but not limited to: dishonesty, unfair dealing, indecency, indecorum, lawlessness, injustice, and cruelty to subordinates.[6] Military courts limit the broad applicability of Article 133 by enforcing due process requirements for fair notice of misconduct applicable to Article 133. Although Article 133 applies to a broad spectrum of misconduct, the U.S. Supreme Court has determined that the offense is neither overly broad nor unconstitutionally vague under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[7] The President, under Article 56, has prescribed the following maximum punishment for the offense of Conduct Unbecoming an Officer and a Gentleman: dismissal, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for the same period as that authorized by the most analogous offense, or if none is prescribed, for 1 year.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 133 is a unique military offense with no direct federal civilian counterpart.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 133: No change to Article 133.

In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 133's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

[7] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 733 (1974).

[8] MCM, Part IV, ¶59.e. The term "gentleman" connotes failings in an officer's personal character, regardless of gender. See, e.g., United States v. Newak, 25 M.J. 564, 566 (A.F.C.M.R. 1987) (affirming conviction of female officer for violating Article 133, alluding to integrity without using the term "gentleman" where accused's misconduct constituted "conduct unbecoming an officer, . . . compromised her status as an officer, . . . [and] mortally wounded the confidence and respect others have for the authority of the officer corps."). Consistent with the MJRG guiding principles, this Report does not recommend an amendment where the case law is stable. If, however, consideration is given to replacing "gentleman" with a gender-neutral term, a phrase such as "person of integrity" could provide an option.

Article 134 – General Article
10 U.S.C. § 934

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 134, clause 3, to clarify that it applies "extraterritorially" so as to permit prosecution of certain federal civilian "crimes and offenses, not capital" consistent with the principle of the worldwide applicability of the UCMJ as expressed by Congress in Article 5.[1]

The Report also proposes migrating 36 of the 53 presidentially designated offenses contained in the Manual for Courts-Martial under Article 134 to the enumerated punitive articles.[2]

The Report proposes a technical change to clarify that all forms of court-martial can take cognizance of offenses under Article 134.

Part II of the Report will address the designated offenses that are not recommended for migration to a punitive article; it will also discuss whether the remaining offenses should be retained and, if so, whether they should be modified. Part II of the Report will also address changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial provisions necessitated by these statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 134 creates three categories of offenses not specifically mentioned in an enumerated punitive article under the Code: (clause 1) all disorders and neglects prejudicial to good order and discipline; (clause 2) all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces; and (clause 3) certain "crimes and offenses, not capital."

Clause 1 requires proof that the accused did or failed to do a certain act, and that, under the circumstances, the accused's conduct was to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces.

Clause 2 requires proof that the accused did or failed to do a certain act, and that, under the circumstances, the accused's conduct was of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces.

Clause 3 enables prosecution of non-capital crimes which violate federal civilian law. The phrase "crimes and offenses, not capital" includes non-capital federal offenses under Title 18, United States Code, and state law offenses occurring on the exclusive or concurrent federal jurisdiction enclaves, described in 18 U.S.C. § 7 (Special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States defined), to the same extent permitted under 18 U.S.C. § 13 (Federal Assimilative Crimes Act).

3. Historical Background

The General Article has existed in military law since the 1775 Articles of War.[3] The current General Article, Article 134, was derived from Article 96 of the 1948 Articles of War and Article 22 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[4] Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[5] the statute has remained unchanged.

Like the current version, the predecessors to Article 134 provided for "the trial and punishment of any and all military offences not expressly made cognizable by court-martial in the other more specific Articles, and thus to prevent the possibility of a failure of justice in the army."[6] The scope of misconduct punishable under Article 134 is broad, and includes conduct punishable at a court-martial which is not otherwise criminalized in civilian society. The Supreme Court explained this distinction in Parker v. Levy, noting that because of the factors differentiating the military from civilian society, Congress may legislate with greater breadth and flexibility in the military context.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

Exercising the authority under Article 56 to designate maximum punishments for offenses under the Code,[8] the President currently designates offenses under clauses 1 and 2 of Article 134 and lists them in the MCM at Part IV, ¶61-113.[9] These listed offenses help provide servicemembers with notice of the scope of potential misconduct under Article 134. Furthermore, pursuant to Article 5, presidentially designated offenses under clause 1 and 2 apply in all places, i.e., they have worldwide applicability.[10]

Lingenfelter, 30 M.J. 302, 305 (C.M.A. 1990) (holding the President's designation of "elements" within the MCM function as factual "sentencing escalating elements" consistent with Article 56).

[10] MCM, Part IV, ¶ 60.e(4)(a).

Federal offenses under clause 3 (crimes and offenses not capital) are not "extra-territorial," unless the federal offenses themselves are of general applicability.[11] Otherwise, the government must charge federal crimes only indirectly by utilizing clauses 1 and 2, along with the terminal element. The main difficulty with the indirect method of charging federal civilian crimes under Article 134 is that, for most crimes committed outside the United States, the terminal element must also be alleged and proven in addition to the elements of the federal crime, while the terminal element does not have to be alleged and proven for crimes committed in the United States. This discrepancy undermines the uniform treatment of military members under the UCMJ.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

18 U.S.C. § 3261 (Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA)) is analogous to Article 134, clause 3. The statute applies to civilians accompanying the military outside of the United States; MEJA is broader than Article 134, clause 3, because it explicitly extends extraterritorial jurisdiction to all Title 18 non-capital offenses.[12]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 134: Amend Article 134 to provide world-wide applicability of federal offenses charged under clause 3; migrate 36 of the 53 presidentially designated offenses to enumerated punitive articles.

The terminal element under Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) is not necessary to demonstrate criminality in the context of an enumerated offense. Accordingly, this Report would migrate offenses unless there is a military-specific reason for utilizing the terminal element under Article 134.[13]

Martinelli, 62 M.J. 52, 57 (C.A.A.F. 2005) (holding that for Article 134 clause 3 purposes legislation of Congress applies only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States unless explicitly indicated otherwise in the statute) (citations omitted).

No 106-778, Judiciary Committee Report on the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 pt. 1 at 14 (2000) (reciting "Constitutional Authority Statement" for MEJA, including Art I, § 8, clauses 10, 14, 16, and 18). Federal courts have affirmed the constitutionality of MEJA. United States v. Plummer, 221 F.3d 1298, 1304 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Congress unquestionably has the authority to enforce its laws beyond the territorial boundaries of the United States."); United States v. King, 552 F.2d 833, 850 (9th Cir. 1976) ("There is no constitutional bar to the extraterritorial application of penal laws.").

[13] The MJRG recommends not migrating offenses in which the terminal element is essential to establishing the underlying criminality of the offense in a military context. Accordingly, this Report recommends not migrating the following offenses: (1) Abusing public animal (MCM, Part IV, ¶61); (2) Adultery (MCM, Part IV, ¶62); (3) Bigamy (¶65); (4) Check, worthless, making and uttering—dishonorably failing to maintain funds) (¶68); (5) Child Pornography (¶68b); (6) Cohabitation, wrongful (¶69); (7) Debt, Dishonorably failing to pay (¶71); (8) Disloyal Statements (¶72); (9) Drunk and Disorderly (¶73); (10) Firearm, discharging—through negligence(¶80); (11) Fraternization (¶83); (12) Gambling with subordinate (¶84); (13) Negligent Homicide (¶85); (14) Indecent Language (¶89); (15) Pandering and prostitution (¶97); (16) Self Injury without intent to avoid service (¶103a); and (17) Straggling (¶107). Part II of the Report will consider whether any modifications are needed in the provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial that address these 17 offenses.

Migrating Article 134 offenses to the enumerated punitive articles arranges similar subject matter offenses together, providing a cohesive, thematic arrangement similar to state and federal criminal codes. It also enables the alignment of "lesser included offenses" in circumstances where a current Article 134 offense would be a lesser included offense of an enumerated punitive article, but for the existence of the Article 134 terminal element.[14]

Providing extraterritorial jurisdiction for Article 134, clause 3 ("all crimes not capital") aligns jurisdiction over civilians employed by or accompanying the military and servicemembers that commit federal crimes abroad.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment, and supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to extraterritorial jurisdiction in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1051. EXTRATERRITORIAL APPLICATION OF CERTAIN OFFENSES.

Section 934 of title 10, United States Code (article 134 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "As used in the preceding sentence, the term 'crimes and offenses not capital' includes any conduct engaged in outside the United States, as defined in section 5 of title 18, that would constitute a crime or offense not capital if the conduct had been engaged in within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, as defined in section 7 of title 18.".

---

[14] See United States v. Jones, 68 M.J. 465, 473 (C.A.A.F. 2010) (holding that the Article 134 terminal element is a unique element that disqualifies Article 134 offense from qualifying as a lesser included offense under the "necessarily included" requirement of Article 79, as determined by the "elements test"); United States v. Miller, 67 M.J. 385, 388–89 (C.A.A.F. 2009) (holding that the Article 134 terminal elements of "conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline" and "service discrediting" are not inherently included in every enumerated punitive article) overruling United States v. Foster, 40 M.J. 140, 143 (C.M.A. 1994).

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1051 would amend Article 134, the General article, to cover all non-capital federal crimes of general applicability under clause 3, regardless of where the federal crime is committed. This change would make military practice uniform throughout the world and would better align it with the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3261.

Subchapter XI. Miscellaneous Provisions

Article 135 – Courts of Inquiry
10 U.S.C. § 935

1. Summary of the Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 135 to provide individuals employed by the Department of Homeland Security (the department in which the Coast Guard operates) with the same rights regarding courts of inquiry that are provided to employees of the Department of Defense. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 135 required as a result of this proposal.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 135 provides for a court of inquiry as an administrative fact-finding body, convened by a general court-martial convening authority, and consisting of at least three commissioned officers. It may be convened either on the initiative of the convening authority or upon request of the individual under investigation. Under Article 47, courts of inquiry have the same power as courts-martial to compel the appearance and testimony of witnesses. Article 135(c) allows courts of inquiry to designate as parties individuals who are either the subject of the investigation, or persons who have a direct interest in the subject of the investigation. These parties have the right to be present, to be represented by counsel, to cross-examine witnesses, and to present evidence; however the current statute limits such "directly interested" persons to "[a]ny person subject to this chapter or employed by the Department of Defense . . . ." Article 135(d) requires the court of inquiry to make findings of fact regarding the subject of its investigation, but prohibits the court from expressing opinions or making recommendations except as requested by the convening authority. Where otherwise admissible and as prescribed under Article 50, the transcript of a court of inquiry may be used as evidence in a court-martial, and under certain conditions the proceeding may also be used as a substitute for the preliminary hearing required under Article 32.

3. Historical Background

Article 135 was based on Articles 97 to 103 of the Articles of War and Articles 42 to 44 of the proposed Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] At that time, an Army court of inquiry could be convened only at the request of the individual whose conduct was the subject of the investigation, while in Navy practice courts of inquiry could be convened for any formal investigation.[2] The drafters chose to incorporate the Navy's broader power into Article 135.[3] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[4]

[1] Uniform Code of Military Justice: Hearings on H.R. 2498 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Armed Services, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., 1235 (1949).

4. Contemporary Practice

Courts of inquiry were originally used primarily to investigate the conduct of officers, whereas boards of investigation, where sworn testimony was not taken, were generally used in cases involving enlisted members. In current practice, however, courts of inquiry are not 'courts' as the term is commonly used; they are formal administrative investigations charged with examining and inquiring into a more significant incident or accident, especially where there is a need to designate parties, take sworn testimony, and issue subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses. The results of a court of inquiry may be a significant aid to the convening authority in determining whether additional administrative action, or potentially the referral of criminal charges to court-martial for trial, is warranted.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 135 has no direct counterpart in federal practice, although in some ways courts of inquiry function similarly to civilian grand juries—both with respect to their investigative capabilities and their utility in assisting the proper authority to determine whether to dispose of the charges by referring them to court-martial for trial.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 135: Amend Article 135 to include the Department of Homeland Security and the Coast Guard.

This proposal would extend the Court of Inquiry protections to individuals employed by the Department of Homeland Security, as the department in which the Coast Guard operates, the same as employees of the Department of Defense, ensuring consistent application of this statute for all military services.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment and that, to the extent practicable, UCMJ articles and MCM provisions should apply uniformly across the military services.

---

[2] Id.

[3] Id. In addition, the drafters chose to incorporate the provision in the proposed Navy Articles that allowed Department of Defense employees whose conduct may be involved in the inquiry to intervene in order to protect their rights and reputation. See A Bill to Amend the Articles for the Government of the Navy to Improve the Administration of Naval Justice, H.R. 3687, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947) (proposed Article 42(d)) ("Any person subject to these articles, or in the employ of the naval service, who has an interest in the subject of the inquiry, shall have a right to be present and to be represented by counsel of his own choice."). This provision became the basis for Article 135(c).

[4] Act of May 5, 1950, Pub. L. No. 81-506, ch. 169, 64 Stat. 108.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing an inconsistency in the current Article 135 concerning Courts of Inquiry, thereby reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1101. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Section 935(c) of title 10, United States Code (article 135(c) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) by striking "(c) Any person" and inserting "(c)(1) Any person";

(2) by designating the second and third sentences as paragraphs (2) and (3), respectively; and

(3) in paragraph (2), as so designated, by striking "subject to this chapter or employed by the Department of Defense" and inserting "who is (A) subject to this chapter, (B) employed by the Department of Defense, or (C) employed by the Department of Homeland Security with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, and".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1101 would amend Article 135 (Courts of inquiry) to provide individuals employed by the Department of Homeland Security, the department under which the Coast Guard operates, the right to be designated as parties in interest when they have a direct interest in the subject of a court of inquiry convened under Article 135. This change would align the rights of employees of the Department of Homeland Security with the rights of employees of the Department of Defense, ensuring consistent application of this statute for all military services.

Article 136 – Authority to Administer Oaths and to Act as Notary

10 U.S.C. § 936

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would modify the heading of Article 136 to reflect the text of the statute, with no substantive changes.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 136 provides statutory authority for the administering of oaths for purposes of military administration, including military justice; and it specifies the persons and positions that may administer oaths, including "all judge advocates." The heading of the statute, but not the text, also refers to the power to act as a notary.

3. Historical Background

Article 136 was based on Article 114 of the Articles of War and Article 69 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] As originally enacted, the statute included the authority to administer oaths as well as the authority to act as a notary.[2] The statute remained unchanged until 1991, when the authority to act as a notary was transferred from Article 136 to 10 U.S.C. § 1044a.[3] The title of Article 136, however, was not amended accordingly.

4. Contemporary Practice

10 U.S.C. § 1044a (Authority to act as notary) provides general powers of a notary public to: all judge advocates, including reserve judge advocates when not in a duty status; all civilian attorneys serving as legal assistance attorneys; all adjutants, assistant adjutants, and personnel adjutants, including reserve members when not in a duty status; all other members of the armed forces, including reserve members when not in a duty status, who are designated by regulations of the armed forces or by statute to have those powers; and for the performance of notarial acts at locations outside the United States, all employees of a military department or the Coast Guard who are designated by regulations of the Secretary concerned or by statute to have those powers for exercise outside the United States.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 136 is fairly consistent with similar federal civilian standards and procedures concerning oaths. 5 U.S.C. § 2903 provides that "[a]n employee of an Executive agency designated in writing by the head of the Executive agency, or the Secretary of a military department with respect to an employee of his department, may administer . . . any other oath required by law in connection with employment in the executive branch."[4]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 136: Amend Article 136 by removing "and to act as notary" from the section heading.

This is a technical change to conform the heading of Article 136 to the text.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by removing an inconsistency in the statutory provision concerning the authority to administer oaths and act as a notary.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1102. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 136.

Section 936 of title 10, United States Code (article 136 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking the last five words in the section heading.

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1102 would make a technical amendment to Article 136 (Authority to administer oaths and to act as notary) to remove from the section heading the authority to act as a notary, which is not provided for in the text of the statute.

[4] 5 U.S.C. § 2903(b)(2).

Article 137 – Articles to Be Explained
10 U.S.C. § 937

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 137 to require mandatory training on the UCMJ for officers, including a requirement for focused training to commanders with authority to impose non-judicial punishment or to act as convening authority on their roles and responsibilities under the UCMJ, in addition to the current training requirements under the statute for enlisted members. This proposal would further require the Secretary of Defense to maintain and update electronic versions of the UCMJ and MCM that would be readily accessible on the Internet by members of the armed forces and the public.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 137 directs that enlisted members receive training on the UCMJ—specifically regarding Articles 2, 3, 7-15, 25, 27, 31, 37, 38, 55, 77-134, and 137-139—no later than fourteen days following their initial entrance into active duty or a duty status with a reserve component. Subsection (a)(2) of the statute requires that these articles be explained again to each enlisted member after the member has completed six months of active duty and when he or she reenlists; and, in the case of reserve members, after the member has completed basic training. Article 137(b) provides that the text of the UCMJ shall be made available to all military members upon their request.

3. Historical Background

Article 110 of the 1943 Articles of War required certain articles to be explained to every soldier at the time of enlistment.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Article 137 was based on this previous statute.[2] The drafters expressly provided that the specified articles were to be "explained"—as opposed to being read by the enlisted member—"as it [was] felt that a careful explanation is of more value than a mere readings."[3] In 1996, Congress amended the statute to provide for a fourteen-day window for the required explanation to be provided, as opposed to the previous six-day requirement. Other than this minor change, the statute has remained relatively unchanged since its enactment.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, each of the services promulgates regulations implementing the requirements set forth in Article 137.[5] The services also incorporate military justice instruction into a variety of continuing professional education programs for officers and non-commissioned officers.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no provision directly equivalent to Article 137 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 137.1: Amend Article 137 to include specific UCMJ training requirements for officers, officers in command, and combatant commanders.

In its current form, Article 137 ensures that enlisted members—but not officers—are made aware of certain, important provisions of the UCMJ. The training occurs at the time of enlistment, at a point early in a member's initial service, and upon each reenlistment. This proposal would establish a similar requirement for officers.

In addition, the proposal would establish a statutory requirement for periodic training of all commanders who exercise responsibility for the imposition of non-judicial punishment or the exercise of convening authority powers. This training would be administered under regulations prescribed by each service, and by the Secretary of Defense with respect to those who exercise similar responsibilities in Joint and Combatant Commands.

This proposal takes into account the recommendation of the Response System to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel) to "ensure all officers preparing to assume senior command positions at the grade of 0-6 and above receive dedicated legal training that fully prepares them to exercise authorities assigned to them under the UCMJ."[6]

Recommendation 137.2: Amend Article 137 to require the Secretary of Defense to maintain and update an electronic version of the UCMJ and MCM for general reference by active and reserve members of the armed forces.

This proposal would require the maintenance of updated versions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Manual for Courts-Martial.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the DoD General Counsel's guiding principle to consider the recommendations of the Response Systems Panel.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing an inconsistency in the current Article 137, which prescribes a UCMJ training requirement only to enlisted members, and not to officers.

This proposal is related to all other proposals in this report, to the extent that it would facilitate timely training on the impact of all of these proposals with respect to the administration of military law in the armed forces by enlisted members and officers alike.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1103. ARTICLES OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE TO BE EXPLAINED TO OFFICERS UPON COMMISSIONING.

Section 937 of title 10, United States Code (article 137 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking "(a)(1) The sections of this title (articles of the Uniform Code of Military Justice)" and inserting "(a) ENLISTED MEMBERS.—(1) The sections (articles) of this chapter (the Uniform Code of Military Justice)";

(2) by striking subsection (b); and

(3) by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsections:

"(b) OFFICERS.—(1) The sections (articles) of this chapter (the Uniform Code of Military Justice) specified in paragraph (2) shall be carefully explained to each officer at the time of (or within six months after)—

"(A) the initial entrance of the officer on active duty as an officer; or

"(B) the initial commissioning of the officer in a reserve component.

"(2) This subsection applies with respect to the sections (articles) specified in subsection (a)(3) and such other sections (articles) as the Secretary concerned may prescribe by regulation.

"(c) TRAINING FOR CERTAIN OFFICERS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, officers with the authority to convene courts-martial or to impose non-judicial punishment shall receive periodic training regarding the purposes and administration of this chapter. Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, officers assigned to duty in a combatant command, who have such authority, shall receive additional specialized training regarding the purposes and administration of this chapter.

"(d) AVAILABILITY AND MAINTENANCE OF TEXT.—The text of this chapter (the Uniform Code of Military Justice) and the text of the regulations prescribed by the President under this chapter shall be—

"(1) made available to a member on active duty or to a member of a reserve component, upon request by the member, for the member's personal examination; and

"(2) maintained by the Secretary of Defense in electronic formats that are updated periodically and made available on the Internet.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1103 would amend Article 137 (Articles to be explained) to require that officers, in addition to enlisted personnel, receive training on the UCMJ upon entry to service, and periodically thereafter. The amendments would provide for specific military justice training for military commanders and convening authorities, and would require the Secretary of Defense to prescribe regulations for additional specialized training on the UCMJ for combatant commanders and commanders of combined commands. Article 137(d), as amended, would require the Secretary of Defense to maintain an electronic version of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial that would be updated periodically and made available on the Internet for review by servicemembers and the public.

Article 138 – Complaints of Wrongs
10 U.S.C. § 938

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 138. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 138.

2. Narrative Summary of the Current Statute

Article 138 provides an avenue of relief for servicemembers who believe themselves wronged by their commanding officer. The statute allows such members to file a complaint of wrong seeking redress from a senior military commander. The statute requires the officer exercising general court-martial convening authority over the commanding officer who is the subject of the complaint to examine the complaint; to take proper measures to redress the wrong complained of; and to send to the Secretary concerned a statement of the complaint, as well as any proceedings had to address the complaint.

3. Historical Background

Article 138 was derived from Article 121 of the Articles of War.[1] The Navy provided a similar procedure by regulation.[2] Article 138 has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 138 is implemented through service regulations.[4] When military members feel they have been wronged by their commanding officer, they may also seek redress under service-specific and Department of Defense Inspectors General programs,[5] which afford whistleblower protections with respect to a servicemember's ability to communicate with the Inspector General or with Members of Congress.[6]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Administrative procedures that are similar to Article 138 apply in the civilian sector, including inspector general programs, whistleblower protection laws, and related administrative procedures.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 138: No change to Article 138.

A statutory change is not required for this article.

Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 138.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice that helps to counterbalance the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces with procedures that ensure protection of those rights that are provided under military law.

Article 139 – Redress of Injuries to Property
10 U.S.C. § 939

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 139.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 139 provides for the direct payment of a claim for property willfully damaged or wrongfully taken due to the riotous, violent, or disorderly conduct of military personnel.

3. Historical Background

Article 139 was derived from Article 105 of the Articles of War.[1] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 139 is a claims payment provision. Although payments under Article 139 may result from conduct that is separately prosecuted under the UCMJ, a determination of liability under this statute is not dependent upon referral or disposition of UCMJ charges. Article 139 is implemented through service regulation.[3] If the claim is payable, and assessed against a military member, the claim is paid from that service-member's pay. Military appellate courts have had to consider Article 139 only occasionally.[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 139 has no direct federal counterpart. However, federal law permits persons to file administrative claims under the Federal Torts Claims Act or the Military Claims Act for damages caused by federal employees acting within the scope of their employment.[5]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 139: No change to Article 139.

In view of the well-settled practice addressing Article 139's provisions, a statutory change is not needed.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

Article 140 – Delegation by the President
10 U.S.C. § 940

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 140. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 140.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 140 provides that the President may delegate any authority vested in him under the Code, and may also provide for the sub-delegation of any such authority.

3. Historical Background

Article 140 has remained substantially unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[1]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has retained authority under Article 36 for prescribing the Manual for Courts-Martial, including the Rules for Courts-Martial and the Military Rules of Evidence. The President also has retained authority under Article 56 to specify the maximum authorized punishments for UCMJ offenses. From time to time, the President has exercised discretion under Article 140 to delegate other authorities under the Code.[2]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 140 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 140: No change to Article 140

In view of the well-established method of Presidential delegation of authority through Code provisions, as well as judicial decisions recognizing this practice, a statutory change is not necessary. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 140.

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

Article 140a (New Provision) – Case Management; Data Collection and Accessibility

10 U.S.C. § 940a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would promote the development and implementation of case management, data collection, and data accessibility programs for the military justice system under standards and criteria prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

There is currently no UCMJ provision addressing the standards and criteria for case management, data collection, or data accessibility programs.

3. Historical Background

The military justice system developed as a highly decentralized process, with the primary responsibility for administration resting with local authorities. As a result, the responsibility for preparing records, collecting data, and providing public access to military justice information has been viewed largely as a local function, with funding responsibilities vested in officials at the installation level. Practices have varied widely among the services, and within the services, in terms of developing and implementing a modernized case management and data collection system.

4. Contemporary Practice

The UCMJ currently does not require the services to collect and maintain data for the military justice system outside of the broad categories of data collected for the annual reports required by Article 146. Each service collects, manages, and makes disclosure decisions regarding court-martial case information and documents differently through service-specific systems. The services have different programs for providing information on court-martial cases through public affairs channels. Other information typically is released only upon a request that complies with the often time-consuming requirements of the Freedom of Information Act.[1]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian practice currently uses an electronic service called PACER (Public Access to Court Electronic Records) for United States federal court documents. PACER is a fee-based system, with specified opportunities for waiver of fees. In the field of case management, the

[1] 5 U.S.C. § 552.

Federal district courts use the Case Management/Electronic Case Files (CM/ECF) system. This system allows courts to accept filings and provide access to filed documents online. In the field of data collection, the National Criminal Incident Center maintains a computerized index of criminal incidents, including information on criminal offenders and on property. Civilian law enforcement agencies nationwide use and update this system. Additionally, the United States Sentencing Commission and the Administrative Office of the United States Courts maintain and publish data relating to federal sentences, criminal caseloads, and categories of cases.[2] State courts employ similar systems, with the degree of modernization, centralization, and cost of access varying from state to state.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 140a: Enact a new Article 140a requiring the development and implementation of case management, data collection, and data accessibility programs for the military justice system under standards and criteria prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The separate case management, data access, and data collection practices currently in use by the services makes it difficult to collect and analyze military justice data on a system-wide basis very difficult. As noted by the Response Systems Panel in its 2014 Report to Congress, ". . . the lack of uniform, offense-specific sentencing data from military courts-martial makes meaningful comparison and analysis of sentencing outcomes in military and civilian courts difficult, if not impossible."[3]

This proposal would require the development of standards in the Manual for Courts-Martial outlining the minimum data collection requirements for military justice activities and statistics from across the Department of Defense and the Coast Guard.

A baseline of similarly collected and reported data would help facilitate periodic reviews of the military justice system by the Code Committee or its successor.

This proposal would better align military justice data collection with the Uniform Federal Crime Reporting Act of 1988, the victim and witness notifications mandated under the Crime Victims Fund pursuant to 42 U.S.C. §10601, the Victim's Rights and Restitution Act of 1990, and the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act of 1993.

Utilizing the experience of federal and state systems, there are significant opportunities to improve the efficiency of case management and the effectiveness of systemic analysis, by levering technology and best practices in the civilian sector. Similar considerations apply to the concept of accessibility. The civilian courts have developed systems that balance public access with the need to protect privacy, sensitive financial data, and classified information. There are well-developed models in the civilian sector which can be applied in a balanced manner to provide timely access to dockets, filings, and rulings.

[3] REPORT OF THE RESPONSE SYSTEMS TO ADULT SEXUAL ASSAULT CRIMES PANEL 136-137 (June 2014).

To ensure timely and effective action, the proposal requires the Secretary of Defense to develop a set of standards and criteria that would form the framework for modernization.

The Services would have the capability to add service specific requirements to the baseline. The proposal would require the Secretary of Defense to develop standards and procedures within two years after enactment of the legislation, and the services would be required to implement new systems within four years after enactment of the legislation.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating the recommendations of the Response Systems Panel concerning military justice data reporting and collection.

This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by adopting standards and procedures applicable to criminal justice data collection in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

The collection and analysis of that data will provide a critical foundation to the development of sentencing parameters and guidelines under Article 56, and would facilitate the periodic evaluation of the military justice called for in this report under Article 146. This proposal would enable military justice managers to better take advantage of the opportunities for efficiency created by the amendments proposed in this report.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 1104. MILITARY JUSTICE CASE MANAGEMENT; DATA COLLECTION AND ACCESSIBILITY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter XI of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new section (article):

"§940a. Art. 140a. Case management; data collection and accessibility

"The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe uniform standards and criteria for conduct of each of the following functions at all stages of the military justice system, including pretrial, trial, post-trial, and appellate processes, using, insofar as practicable, the best practices of Federal and State courts:

"(1) Collection and analysis of data concerning substantive offenses and procedural matters in a manner that facilitates case management and decision making within the military justice system, and that enhances the quality of periodic reviews under section 946 of this title (article 146).

"(2) Case processing and management.

"(3) Timely, efficient, and accurate production and distribution of records of trial within the military justice system.

"(4) Facilitation of access to docket information, filings, and records, taking into consideration restrictions appropriate to judicial proceedings and military records.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) Not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall carry out section 940a of title 10, United States Code (article 140a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by subsection (a).

(2) Not later than 4 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, the standards and criteria under section 940a of title 10, United States Code (article 140a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by subsection (a), shall take effect.

9. Sectional Analysis

*Section 1104(*a) would create a new section, Article 140a (Case management; data collection, and accessibility), which would require the Secretary of Defense to prescribe uniform standards and criteria for case processing and management, military justice data collection, production and distribution of records of trial, and access to case information. The purpose of this section is to enhance the management of cases, the collection of data necessary for evaluation and analysis, and to provide appropriate public access to military justice information at all stages of court-martial proceedings. At a minimum, the system developed for implementation should permit timely and appropriate access to filings, objections, instructions, and judicial rulings at the trial and appellate level, and to actions at trial and in subsequent proceedings concerning the findings and sentences of courts-martial.

Section 1104(b) provides the timeline for implementation of Section 1104(a). In order to provide appropriate time for implementation, this section would require promulgation of standards by the Secretary of Defense not later than two years after enactment of Section 1104, with an effective date for such standards not later than four years after enactment.

Subchapter XII. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces

Articles 141-145 – United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces

10 U.S.C. §§ 941-45

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Articles 141-145.

2. Summary of the Current Statutes

Articles 141-145 provide the framework for the organization and administration of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, including: (1) establishing the Court as a court of record under Article I of the Constitution; (2) governing the appointment, qualification, and removal procedures for judges on the Court; (3) defining the eligibility requirements to serve as chief judge and the terms for the chief judge, judges, and certain attorney positions; (4) authorizing the Court to prescribe its own rules of procedure and to determine the number of judges required to constitute a quorum; and (5) authorizing retirement annuities for judges and their survivors. [1]

3. Historical Background

In 1989, Congress enacted comprehensive legislation to enhance the effectiveness and stability of the Court of Military Appeals for the Armed Forces.[2] In 1994, Congress gave the Court its current designation, the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces is an independent court under Article I of the Constitution.[4] The Court consists of five judges who are appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.[5]

[4] Article 141.

[5] Article 142(a).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There are 12 regional United States Circuit Courts of Appeals and the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which are standing courts under Article III of the Constitution. The regional Circuit Courts of Appeals hear appeals from the district courts located within each circuit, as well as appeals from decisions of federal administrative agencies. The statutory provisions for judges appointed to the Courts of Appeals are contained in Chapter 3 of Title 28.[6] While similar in some ways to the provisions of Articles 141-145, the provisions for Article III judges reflect their lifetime appointment and, except for the Federal Circuit, the geographic boundaries of the twelve Circuit Courts of Appeal. The chief judge of a circuit serves for a seven-year term and is generally the circuit judge who is senior in commission, with additional requirements based on age and experience.[7] In the Article III Courts of Appeals, the number of judges that sit on a panel is as the court directs.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendations 141-145: No change to Articles 141-145.

Articles 141 through 145 primarily concern matters related to the internal organization and administration of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. In view of the judicial independence of the Court, the Department of Defense, as a matter of policy, typically has deferred to the Court with respect to initiating any legislative proposal that might be necessary in the interests of judicial administration. In that context, this Report does not recommend any changes in Articles 141 through 145.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

[8] 28 U.S.C. § 46(a).

Article 146 – Code Committee & Article 146a (New Provision) – Annual Reports

10 U.S.C. §§ 946-46a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of the UCMJ by establishing a blue ribbon panel of experts to conduct a periodic evaluation of military justice practices and procedures on a regular basis. This proposal also would create a new statute, Article 146a, to retain the valuable informational aspects of the annual reports issued individually by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Judge Advocates General, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 146 provides for a Code Committee, consisting of the judges of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the individual service Judge Advocates General, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and two members of the public appointed by the Secretary of Defense. The statute requires the Code Committee to meet at least once a year, to make an annual survey, and to submit an annual report to designated congressional and executive branch officials containing military justice data and any recommendations from the Committee regarding sentence uniformity, proposed amendments, or any other matter that the Committee considers appropriate.

3. Historical Background

Congress established the Code Committee under Article 67 of the UCMJ as enacted in 1950, consisting of the Judges of the Court of Military Appeals (the original title of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces) and the Judge Advocates General.[1] Since 1950, Congress has added two public members and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps to the Committee; Congress also has added various data items for inclusion in Committee's annual reports.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

Since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, the Code Committee's mission and function has evolved. Today, the Committee primarily concentrates its efforts on preparing an annual report that focuses mainly on military justice data, recent developments in the law, and related matters. In recent decades the Committee has not served as a vehicle for recommending substantive amendments to the UCMJ or the Manual for Courts-Martial.[3]

From time to time, Congress has established various blue ribbon advisory groups to address specific aspects of the military justice system.[4] The Services and outside entities have also conducted reviews that are often cited by military justice practitioners.[5]

Within the executive branch, the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice exercises the primary responsibility for recommending changes to the UCMJ and the MCM.[6] The members of the Joint Service Committee and its working group all have other major responsibilities, and serve on the Joint Service Committee as a collateral duty. Neither the Code Committee nor the Joint Service Committee has the full-time staffing necessary to conduct comprehensive periodic reviews of a complex governmental process, such as the military justice system, on a regular basis. As a result, the Code Committee has focused on the collection of information required for the annual report, and the Joint Service Committee has focused on targeted issues.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Congress has, from time to time, provided legislative authority for the Supreme Court to prescribe rules of procedure for the lower courts of the United States.[7] In 1948, Congress created the Judicial Conference, with the Chief Justice of the United States as the presiding officer.[8] Over time, the work and oversight of the rulemaking process has been delegated by the Court to committees of the Judicial Conference, the principal policy-making body of the United States Courts. The Judicial Conference is required to:

Make a comprehensive survey of the conditions of business in the courts of the United States;

Prepare plans for the assignment of judges to or from courts of appeals or district courts, where necessary;

Submit suggestions to the various courts in the interest of promoting uniformity of management procedures and the expeditious conduct of court business;

Exercise authority provided in the United States Codes for the review of circuit council conduct and disability orders filed under that chapter; and

Carry on a continuous study of the operation and effect of the general rules of practice and procedure in use within the federal courts, as prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to law.[9]

The advisory committees on appellate, bankruptcy, civil, criminal, and evidence rules evaluate suggestions for rules amendments in the first instance. If an advisory committee pursues a proposal, it may seek permission from the Standing Committee to publish a draft of the contemplated amendment. Based on comments from the bench, bar, and general public, the advisory committee may then choose to discard, revise, or transmit the amendment as contemplated to the Standing Committee. The Standing Committee independently reviews the findings of the advisory committees and, if satisfied, recommends changes to the Judicial Conference, which in turn recommends changes to the Supreme Court. The Court considers the proposals and, if it concurs, typically promulgates the revised rules by order before May 1, to take effect no earlier than December 1 of the same year unless Congress enacts legislation to reject, modify, or defer the pending rules.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 146.1: Establish a blue ribbon committee—the Military Justice Review Panel—composed of experts in military law and civilian criminal law, to conduct periodic reviews of the military justice system.

The proposed Military Justice Review Panel would be composed of thirteen members. Each of the following officials would select one person to serve on the Panel: the Secretary of Defense (in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security), the Attorney General, the Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. The remaining members of the Panel would be selected by the Secretary of Defense based upon the recommendations of the each of the following: the chairman and ranking minority member of the House Armed Services Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The Secretary of Defense would designate one member as the Chair; the Panel would have a full-time staff.

The Panel would issue its first report four years after the effective date of the legislation, focusing on the implementation of any recent amendments to the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Eight years after the effective date of the legislation, the Panel would issue its first comprehensive review of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Thereafter, the Panel would issue comprehensive reports every eight years. Within each eight year cycle the Panel would issue targeted reports at the mid-point of each cycle, and could issue additional reports on matters referred to the Panel by the Secretary of Defense or Congress.

This proposal is based on the concept that periodic review needs to be scheduled on a regular basis, but that it should not be so frequent that the constant process of review and change becomes more disruptive than helpful to judges and lawyers who must have a degree of stability in order to engage in effective practice. Accordingly, the comprehensive reviews are scheduled on an eight year schedule.

This proposal also relies on the expectation that the Joint Service Committee will continue to conduct its vital role within the executive branch addressing the type of targeted adjustments in law and regulation that are required on a more frequent basis to address specific issues in the law.

Recommendation 146.2: Retain the valuable informational aspects of the annual reports issued individually by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Judge Advocates General, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps and set forth those requirements in a new statute, Article 146a.

This proposal would create a new statute, Article 146a. The proposal anticipates that the individual reports will be compiled into a single volume using the procedures currently employed to combine individual reports into a consolidated report under the present version of Article 146.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

Establishing a blue ribbon panel with the responsibility for periodic review of the UCMJ and MCM will enhance the potential for those responsible for military justice to fulfill their mission in a manner that adjusts to the evolution of legal and national requirements.

8. Legislative Proposal

"§946a. Art. 146a. Annual reports

"(a) COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE ARMED FORCES.—Not later than December 31 of each year, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces shall submit a report that, with respect to the previous fiscal year, provides information on the number and

"(1) to the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives; and

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 1201 would amend Article 146 (Code committee) and retitle the statute as "Military Justice Review Panel." The Military Justice Review Panel would replace the Code Committee. The Military Justice Review Panel would be an independent, blue ribbon panel of experts tasked to conduct a periodic evaluation of military justice practices and procedures on a regular basis, thereby enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the UCMJ and the Code's implementing regulations.

The proposed Military Justice Review Panel would be composed of thirteen members. Each of the following officials would select one person to serve on the Panel: the Secretary of Defense (in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security), the Attorney General, the Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. The remaining members of the Panel would be selected by the Secretary of Defense based upon the recommendations of each of the following: the chairman and ranking minority member of the House Armed Services Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The Secretary of Defense would designate one member as the Chair; the Panel would have a full-time staff.

The Panel would issue its first report four years after the effective date of the legislation, focusing on the implementation of any recent amendments to the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Eight years after the effective date of the legislation, the Panel would issue its first comprehensive review of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Thereafter, the Panel would issue comprehensive reports every eight years. Within each eight year cycle, the Panel would issue targeted reports at the mid-point of each cycle, and could issue additional reports on matters referred to the Panel by the Secretary of Defense or Congress.

This proposal is based on the concept that periodic review needs to be scheduled on a regular basis, but that it should not be so frequent that the constant process of review and change becomes more disruptive than helpful to judges and lawyers who must have a degree of stability in order to engage in effective practice. Accordingly, the comprehensive reviews are scheduled on an eight-year schedule.

This proposal also relies on the expectation that the Joint Service Committee will continue to conduct its vital role within the executive branch addressing the type of targeted adjustments in law and regulation that are required on a more frequent basis to address specific issues in the law.

Section 1202 would create a new section, Article 146a (Annual reports), to retain the valuable informational aspects of the annual reports issued individually by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Judge Advocates General, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. The proposal anticipates that the individual reports will be compiled into a single volume using the procedures currently employed to combine individual reports into a consolidated report under the present version of Article 146.

"(J) The Federal Advisory Committee Act shall not apply with respect to the Board or any advisory group established by the Board.

"(6) VOTING REQUIREMENT.—An affirmative vote of at least three members is required for any action of the Board under this subsection.

Section D.
Section-by-Section Analysis

Military Justice Act of 2015

Section-by-Section Analysis

Section 1 contains the short title of the bill and a table of contents for the bill.

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 101 contains amendments to Article 1 of the UCMJ concerning the definitions of "military judge" and "judge advocate," as follows:

Section 101(a) would amend the definition of "military judge" in Article 1(10) to reflect the changes in Articles 16, 19, 26, and 30a regarding the detailing of military judges. See Sections 401, 403, 504, and 602, infra.

Section 101(b) would make a technical amendment to Article 1 to reflect the 2003 name change from the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Department" to the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Corps."

Section 102 would amend Article 2(a)(3) of the UCMJ to clarify jurisdiction over reserve component members performing periods of inactive-duty training. The amendment would provide commanders clearer authority to address misconduct that takes place during periods incident to inactive-duty training, and during intervals between inactive-duty training on consecutive days.

Section 103 would amend Article 6, which concerns the assignment for duty of judge advocates and the role of staff judge advocates and legal officers in military justice matters. Article 6(c) currently disqualifies military judges, trial and defense counsel, investigating officers, and panel members from later acting as a staff judge advocate or legal officer to any reviewing authority in a case in which they previously participated. The proposed amendments would expressly cover military magistrates when presiding over pre-referral proceedings under Article 30a, or when presiding, with the parties' consent, over cases referred to judge-alone special courts-martial, under Article 19. See Sections 403, 602, infra. The amendments also would revise the disqualification provision under Article 6(c) to include appellate judges and counsel (including victims' counsel) who have participated previously in the same case or in any proceeding before a military judge (to include a military magistrate designated under Articles 19 or 30a), preliminary hearing officer, or appellate court in the same case.

Section 104 would amend Article 6a of the UCMJ to align the statute with the changes proposed in Article 19 and the proposed new sections, Articles 26a and 30a, concerning military magistrates. See Sections 403, 507, and 602, infra. Article 6a directs the President to prescribe procedures for the investigation and disposition of charges, allegations, or information pertaining to the fitness of military judges and military appellate judges to perform their judicial duties. The proposed amendment would add "military magistrate" to the list of officials whose fitness to perform duties shall be subject to investigation and disposition under regulations prescribed by the President, consistent with federal law concerning the investigation and disposition of matters relating to the fitness of federal magistrate judges in the performance of their judicial duties.

Section 105 contains amendments related to the rights of victims under Article 6b of the UCMJ, as follows:

Section 105(a) would clarify the procedure for appointment of individuals to assume the rights of a victim who is under 18 years of age, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased, consistent with the similar provision in the Crime Victims' Rights Act. This change would conform military law to federal civilian law with respect to the procedure for appointment of individuals to assume the rights of certain victims.

Section 105(b) would clarify the relationship between the rights provided to victims under the UCMJ and the exercise of disposition discretion under Articles 30 and 34, consistent with a similar provision in the Crime Victims' Rights Act concerning the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. This change would conform military law to federal civilian law with respect to the relationship between the rights of victims and the duties of government officials to investigate crimes and properly dispose of criminal offenses.

Section 105(c) would move the recently enacted provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses from Article 46(b) into Article 6b and would extend those provisions to victims of all offenses, consistent with related victims' rights provisions.

Implementing regulations would address a number of matters concerning the rights of victims under Article 6b, to include: the ability of victims to be heard on the plea, confinement, release, and sentencing (including through an unsworn statement); the victim's input on the disposition of offenses to the convening authority; the right to notice of proceedings and the release or escape of the accused; the right not to be excluded from proceedings absent a required showing; and the right to submit post-trial matters to the convening authority.

TITLE II—APPREHENSION AND RESTRAINT

Section 201 would amend Article 10 to conform the language of the statute to current practice and related statutory provisions concerning restraint of persons charged with offenses and the actions that must be taken by military commanders and convening authorities when persons subject to the Code are held for trial by court-martial. The amendments would clarify the general provisions concerning restraint under Article 10, and would incorporate into Article 10 the requirement under Article 33 for prompt forwarding of charges in cases involving pretrial confinement. The amendments would expand the requirement for prompt forwarding to cover special courts-martial as well as general courts-martial, and would require the establishment of prompt processing timeframes in the Manual for Courts-Martial. Implementing rules would address pre-referral review of confinement orders by military magistrates and military judges under the proposed Article 30a, as well as the requirements for prompt disposition of offenses by military commanders and convening authorities.

Section 202 would amend Article 12 to limit the prohibition on confinement of military members with foreign nationals to situations where the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war. Under current law, it is a violation of Article 12 if a military member is held in "immediate association" with enemy prisoners or foreign nationals who are not members of the armed forces. Under current practice, however, it is not uncommon for non-U.S. citizens to be held in the same civilian confinement facilities where our military members are held during periods of pretrial or post-trial confinement. This practice was not anticipated by the drafters of the UCMJ in 1949. The proposed amendment to Article 12 would maintain the current strict prohibition against confining military members in immediate association with enemy prisoners of war, while clarifying that the restrictions in Article 12 relating to confinement of military member with "foreign nationals" are limited to situations in which the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war. This change would ease the administrative burden placed on civilian confinement facilities that hold confined military members, and would prevent military members in these facilities from being isolated unnecessarily.

TITLE III—NON-JUDICIAL PUNISHMENT

Section 301 contains amendments concerning non-judicial punishment under Article 15. Non-judicial punishment under Article 15 provides commanders with a range of disciplinary measures for minor offenses to promote good order and discipline in the armed forces and correct deficiencies in servicemembers without the stigma of a court-martial conviction. Article 15, as amended, would retain the wide range of punishments available to commanders to address misconduct through non-judicial proceedings, while precluding punishment in the form of a diet consisting only of bread and water. Implementing rules would address several issues concerning the administration of non-judicial punishment under Article 15, including the standard of evidence at non-judicial punishment proceedings, the administrative consequences of non-judicial punishment for minor disciplinary offenses, and the circumstances qualifying for the "vessel exception."

TITLE IV—COURT-MARTIAL JURISDICTION

Section 401 contains amendments concerning courts-martial classifications under Article 16 of the UCMJ. Under current law, general courts-martial consist of a military judge and not less than five members in non-capital cases, or a military judge alone upon the election of the accused. Special courts-martial consist of not less than three members, a military judge and not less than three members, or a military judge alone upon the election of the accused. Because there is a variable number of members in each case, the number of votes required for a conviction under Article 52 can fluctuate from case to case without any guiding principle to ensure consistency. See Section 715, infra (discussing voting by the court-martial panel under Article 52). The proposed amendments seek to enhance military justice and improve the consistency of court-martial panel deliberations by establishing standard panel sizes: twelve members in capital general courts-martial, eight members in non-capital general courts-martial, and four members in special courts-martial. As amended, Article 16 would include references to Article 25a (addressing panel size in capital cases), Article 25(d) (addressing the initial detailing of members by the convening authority), and Article 29 (addressing the impaneling of members and the impact of excusals on panel composition).

Article 16(c), as amended, would require a military judge to be detailed to all special courts-martial, reflecting current military practice and similar federal and state civilian practice. The amendments also would add the option of referral to a non-jury (judge-alone) special court-martial. Such a forum is common among civilian criminal jurisdictions. See 18 U.S.C. § 3559; Fed. R. Crim. P. 58(b)(2); United States v. Merrick, 459 F.2d 644 (4th Cir. 1972). Providing commanders with this option would generate greater efficiencies in the military justice system for the adjudication of low-level, misdemeanor-equivalent offenses. As provided in the proposed amendments to Article 19, punishments at this forum could include confinement and forfeitures limited to no more than six months and would not include a punitive discharge. In addition, a military magistrate designated by the detailed military judge could preside when authorized under service regulations and with the consent of the parties. See Section 403, infra. Implementing provisions in the Manual for Courts-Martial would establish limits on the types of offenses that could be referred for trial at this forum.

Section 402 would make conforming changes to Article 18 of the UCMJ to align the statute with the revised descriptions of types of courts-martial under Article 16. The amendments also would modify Article 18 to specify the sexual offenses (currently listed by cross-reference to Article 56(b)(2)) over which general courts-martial have exclusive jurisdiction. This would accommodate the proposal under Section 801, infra, to repeal Article 56(b) following the enactment of sentencing parameters under Article 56(d).

Section 403 would amend Article 19 to align the statute with proposed changes in Article 16 regarding the composition of special courts-martial. See Section 401, supra.

Section 404 would amend Article 20 to clarify the status of the summary court-martial as a non-criminal forum. In Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976), the Supreme Court held that a summary court-martial does not constitute a criminal prosecution. Although a summary court-martial appropriately may result in administrative and personal consequences, it does not have the collateral consequences of a criminal conviction because it does not reflect a determination made by a judicial, criminal forum. The proposed amendment would clarify that, because of its non-judicial nature, a summary court-martial is not a "criminal prosecution," within the traditional due process understanding of a criminal prosecution (i.e., presided over by a judicial officer, and where the accused has a right to counsel) and that a finding of guilty at a summary court-martial does not constitute a "criminal conviction."

TITLE V—COMPOSITION OF COURTS-MARTIAL

Section 501 would make a technical amendment to Article 22 to reflect the current terminology for the title of an officer commanding a naval fleet, with no substantive changes.

Section 502 concerns the eligibility requirements for service on court-martial panels. The proposed amendments to Article 25 would expand the opportunity for service on a court-martial panel by permitting the detail of enlisted personnel as panel members without requiring a specific request from the accused. As amended, Article 25 would contain the following provisions:

Article 25(c)(1) and (d)(1) would retain the statutory prohibition against detailing panel members junior in rank and grade to the accused, but the statutory prohibition against detailing enlisted panel members who are of the same unit as an enlisted accused would be eliminated. There is no such limitation on the detailing of officers from the same unit as the accused under current law. As such, current law provides an unnecessary distinction between enlisted members and officers. The amendments would eliminate this outmoded distinction, and rely instead on the well-developed procedures for voir dire and challenges to address any concerns about bias or conflicts—the same process that is used to address any issues involving officers from the same unit as the accused. This change would enhance the convening authority's ability to draw from a large pool of highly qualified members, thereby expanding the opportunity for courts-martial to reflect the input of the high caliber enlisted personnel in the modern armed forces.

Article 25(c)(2) would retain the option for the accused to request a panel with at least one-third enlisted members. In addition, it would grant the accused the option to request an all-officer panel, which is the default panel composition under current practice. The Article 25(d)(2) member-selection criteria (age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament) would be retained to ensure that court-martial panels continue to be composed of the most highly qualified, eligible personnel. The statute's implementing rules would include appropriate adjustments to address requests for panels that include all officers or at least one-third enlisted representation.

Article 25(d)(3) would require that the convening authority detail a sufficient number of members for impanelment under the proposed amendments to Article 29. See Section 506, infra.

Section 503 would amend Article 25a to establish a standard panel size of twelve members in capital cases, consistent with the standard size for juries in federal civilian capital trials. Under current law, panels in capital courts-martial are composed of a variable number of members no fewer than twelve, which means that the number of members can vary from case to case without any guiding principle to ensure consistency. Under the statute, as amended, in the event a case becomes non-capital as a result of developments after referral but prior to impanelment, the case would proceed in accordance with the membership requirements under Articles 16 and 29. If the case becomes non-capital after twelve members have been impaneled, it would proceed with twelve members subject to the excusal provisions in Articles 29.

Section 504 contains amendments to Article 26 pertaining to the detailing and qualifications of military judges, as follows:

Section 504(a) would amend Article 26(a) to conform to the proposed amendments to Article 16 and to reflect current practice in which a military judge is detailed to every general and special court-martial.

Section 504(b) would amend Article 26(b) to provide that the Judge Advocates General certify officers to be military judges who are most qualified to serve by virtue of meeting statutory criteria and through an evaluation of their individual education, training, experience, and judicial temperament.

Section 504(c) would amend Article 26(c) to provide for Manual provisions concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges. Implementing rules would enable the Services to apply appropriate exceptions to the minimum tour lengths.

Section 504(d) would add a new subsection (f) to Article 26 to expressly authorize cross-service detailing of military judges. Although such detailing has been addressed in the Rules for Courts-Martial, these amendments would provide clear statutory authority for this practice.

Section 504(e) would further amend Article 26 by adding a new subsection (g) to codify the position of chief trial judge. Under implementing regulations, the chief judge could detail subordinate military judges to particular cases, and carry out additional duties as directed by the Judge Advocates General or as identified in the UCMJ, MCM, and service regulations.

The proposed amendments to Article 26 also would remove the phrase "or his designee" from Article 26 in the three instances where it occurs. This change would conform the statute to current practice under the UCMJ, in which the Judge Advocate General has designated other officials to perform duties without express statutory reference to the ability to designate.

Section 505 would amend Article 27, which concerns the detailing of trial and defense counsel to courts-martial, prescribes minimum qualification requirements for counsel, and disqualifies persons who have acted as the investigating officer, military judge, or a court member from later acting as trial or defense counsel in the same case.

Section 505(1) would broaden the disqualification provision under Article 27(a)(2) to include appellate judges who have participated previously in the same case.

Section 505(2) would amend Article 27(b) to extend the qualification requirement to any assistant defense counsel detailed to a general court-martial.

Section 505(3) would amend Article 27(c)(1) by requiring any defense counsel or assistant defense counsel detailed to a special court-martial to be qualified under Article 27(b). Article 27(c)(2), as amended, would retain the authority for the Services to detail individuals such as law students preparing to become judge advocates to serve as trial counsel in special courts-martial and assistant trial counsel in both general and special courts-martial without a requirement for certification under Article 27(b), so long as such individuals are determined to be competent to perform such duties by the Judge Advocate General. These changes are consistent with current practice, applicable federal civilian practice, and with the proposed changes to Articles 16 and 26, which would require a military judge to preside at all special courts-marital.

Section 505(3) also would add a new subsection (d) to Article 27. The new provision would require, to the greatest extent practicable, in any capital case, at least one defense counsel shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases, reflecting the standard applicable in capital cases tried in the Article III courts and before military commissions.

Section 506 contains amendments to Article 29 pertaining to the assembly, impaneling, and excusal of members, and the detailing of new court members and military judges. As amended, Article 29 would contain the following provisions:

Article 29(a) would clarify the function of assembly in general and special courts-martial with members, and the limited situations in which a member may be absent or excused after assembly of the court-martial.

Article 29(b)-(c) would require the military judge to impanel the number of members required under Articles 16 and 25a: twelve members in a capital case; eight members in a non-capital general court-martial; and four members in a special court-martial. The military judge would impanel any alternate members authorized by the convening authority in a specific case, and would then excuse any member who was detailed but not impaneled.

Article 29(d) would provide for the detail of new members if, as a result of excusals after the members have been impaneled, the membership on the panel is reduced below the following: twelve members in a capital general court-martial; six members in a non-capital general court-martial; and four members in a special court-martial. Because excusal of a member for good cause mid-trial is not a common occurrence, this provision should be used only in unusual situations. As under current law, the prohibition on further trial proceedings when the panel membership falls below the required number of members does not preclude sessions under Article 39.

Article 29(e) would address the detailing of a new military judge when the military judge is unable to proceed as a result of physical disability or otherwise.

Article 29(f) would establish the procedure for presenting the prior trial proceedings to the newly detailed members or judge. In addition to retaining the current procedure for reading a transcript of the prior proceedings, the amendment would permit the previously admitted evidence to be presented to the new members through play-back of a recording.

Section 507 would create a new section, Article 26a, which would set forth minimum qualifications under which the Judge Advocates General, in accordance with service regulations, could certify military magistrates who could preside over proceedings under Articles 19 and 30a when designated by the detailed military judge.

Under Article 26a(b), military magistrates also could be assigned to non-judicial duties if so authorized under regulations of the Secretary concerned. This provision recognizes that the services have programs through which qualified officers may be detailed to perform duties of a non-judicial nature—that is, duties that do not have to be performed by a military judge—such as issuing search authorizations or serving as a summary court-martial officer, preliminary hearing officer, or pretrial confinement review officer.

TITLE VI—PRE-TRIAL PROCEDURE

Section 601 would amend Article 30, which provides basic statutory requirements for the initial signing and swearing of criminal charges against a military accused, and for the disposition of charges and specifications by military commanders and convening authorities exercising various levels of disciplinary authority over persons subject to the Code. By reorganizing Article 30 into three subsections and removing the requirement for commanders to take "immediate steps" to dispose of charges and specifications, the amendments would improve the functionality of the statute and better align the statute's provisions with current practice.

Section 602 would create a new section, Article 30a, to authorize military judges to preside over certain pretrial issues that arise prior to referral of charges in a case. The authority under this section would extend only to issues: (1) that would be subject to post-referral review by a military judge at a general or special court-martial; and (2) that are designated expressly by the President as eligible for pre-referral review under this section. To the extent identified by the President in implementing regulations, judicial proceedings under this section could include matters currently reviewed in post-referral proceedings, such as search authorizations; requests for mental competency evaluations, individual military counsel, depositions, and subpoenas; review of pretrial confinement determinations; and enforcing victims' rights in pretrial proceedings under Article 6b. The rules prescribed by the President would set forth the procedures military judges should use under this section, and would limit the available remedies to those expressly identified by the President. Any pre-referral judicial consideration of these select issues would occur after an appropriate authority had the opportunity to take action to resolve them.

Article 30a(c) would allow the detailed military judge to designate a military magistrate to preside over the proceeding. The statute would provide for the creation of regulations by which military judges could formally review a military magistrate's rulings on pretrial matters. In addition to acting on pretrial matters, military magistrates also could preside over special court-martial cases referred as judge-alone trials, as proposed in Article 19, with the parties' consent. See Section 403, supra.

Section 603 would amend Article 32 to clarify current law concerning the requirement for and the conduct of preliminary hearings before referral of charges and specifications to general courts-martial for trial. The amendments would focus the preliminary hearing on an initial determination of probable cause, jurisdiction, and the form of the charges, and would provide for the production of evidence and the examination of witnesses to assist the preliminary hearing officer in making these determinations. In addition, the amendments would revise the requirement for a disposition recommendation—currently provided as a fourth, distinct purpose of the preliminary hearing—to focus the preliminary hearing officer more directly on providing a thorough analysis of the information developed at the hearing. The purpose of this analysis would be to inform the staff judge advocate's recommendation and the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision with respect to the charges and specifications in the case, rather than providing a disposition recommendation in summary form without supporting analysis. The report and the analysis contained within it would be advisory in nature and would be designed to assist the staff judge advocate and the convening authority. The analysis contained within the report would not provide a basis for complaint or relief when in substantial compliance with the requirements of the amended Article 32. As amended, Article 32 would contain the following provisions:

Article 32(a) would state the issues for determination at the preliminary hearing: (1) whether or not the specification alleges an offense under the UCMJ; (2) whether or not there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offense charged; and (3) whether or not the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the accused and over the offense.

Article 32(b) would retain and clarify current law concerning the qualifications of the preliminary hearing officer.

Article 32(c) would require the preliminary hearing officer's report to include an analysis of whether each specification alleges an offense; whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense; any necessary modifications to the form of the charges and specifications; the state of the evidence supporting the elements of each offense; a summary of witness testimony and documentary evidence; a statement regarding the availability and admissibility of evidence; additional information relevant to disposition of charges and specification under Articles 30 and 34; and a discussion of any uncharged offenses. The proposed amendments recognize that the primary responsibility for a disposition recommendation resides with the staff judge advocate under Article 34. Also, while not requiring the preliminary hearing officer to make a recommendation, the proposed legislation does not preclude the preliminary hearing officer from doing so, either when required by service regulations or by the convening authority in a particular case.

Article 32(c)(2) would provide the parties and any victim with the opportunity to submit additional information to the preliminary hearing officer for transmission for consideration by the convening authority with respect to disposition. The procedure for submission of additional information would be separate from the hearing, reflecting the broader range of information that may be pertinent to the exercise of disposition discretion. The implementing regulations would provide procedures for sealing or otherwise protecting sensitive or personal material in the additional information submitted by the parties or the victim.

Article 32(d)(3) would clarify that a victim's declination to participate in the Article 32 hearing "shall not serve as the sole basis for ordering a deposition" under Article 49. This change would ensure that a victim's declination under Article 32(d)(3) is not used to circumvent the limited purpose of depositions under Article 49: to preserve prospective witness testimony for use at trial, generally in cases where the prospective witness will be unavailable to testify in person. See Section 711, infra.

The proposed changes are based in part on a recognition that the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision depends on a broad range of factors relating to good order and discipline—of which the preliminary hearing officer may not be aware and which may not directly relate to the legal or factual strengths or weaknesses of the limited case as presented at the preliminary hearing—including those factors contained in the disposition guidance under the proposed new Article 33. In addition, consistent with the proposed amendments to Articles 46 and 47 (and as will be more fully developed in the Rules for Courts-Martial), the authority to issue pre-referral investigative subpoenas would be governed by a uniform policy that will apply throughout the process prior to referral, and would not be limited narrowly to Article 32 proceedings.

Section 604 contains a complete revision of Article 33. The current statute concerning forwarding of charges in general courts-martial when the accused is in confinement would be incorporated into the closely related provisions in Article 10. Article 33, as amended, would require the establishment and maintenance of non-binding guidance regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline under Articles 30 and 34. This disposition guidance would draw upon the Principles of Federal Prosecution in the United States Attorneys' Manual, with appropriate modifications to reflect the unique purposes and requirements of military law. In doing so, the proposed guidance would enhance the disposition decision-making process and better align military charging practice with the standards and principles applicable in most civilian jurisdictions. The proposed disposition guidance would be issued by the Department of Defense, and would be included in the Manual for Courts-Martial as an appendix.

Section 605 would amend Article 34, which concerns the relationship between the staff judge advocate and the convening authority in the disposition decision-making process in general court-martial cases. The section would amend Article 34 to clarify ambiguities in the language of the current statute, to require judge advocate consultation before referral of charges to special courts-martial, and to expressly tie the staff judge advocate's pre-referral disposition recommendation in general courts-martial to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" standard for disposition of charges and specifications under Article 30. As amended, Article 34 would contain the following provisions:

Article 34(a) would replace and clarify the provisions concerning staff judge advocate advice before referral to general courts-martial currently contained in Article 34(a)-(b). Article 34(a)(2) would expressly tie the staff judge advocate's disposition recommendation to the "in the interest of justice and discipline" disposition standard under Article 30.

Article 34(b) would require that convening authorities consult a judge advocate on relevant legal issues before referral of charges and specifications to special courts-martial for trial, consistent with current practice.

Article 34(c) would allow formal corrections to the charges and specifications to be made before referral in both general and special courts-martial.

Article 34(d) would define "referral," in the context of Article 34, to mean "the order of the convening authority that charges and specifications against an accused be tried by a specified court-martial," consistent with current implementing regulations.

The changes to Article 34 are intended to solidify and enhance the decision-making partnership between judge advocates and court-martial convening authorities, ensuring that the interests of justice and discipline are well-considered and appropriately balanced in each individual case. Implementing regulations will address additional changes in the rules implementing Article 34, with particular focus on the content of advice with respect to the staff judge advocate's conclusion regarding probable cause and jurisdiction, and with respect to those matters in which the staff judge advocate disagrees with the conclusions of the preliminary hearing officer. Implementing regulations also would address the baseline requirements for pre-referral judge advocate consultation on relevant legal issues in special courts-martial.

Section 606 would amend Article 35, which requires the trial counsel to ensure that a copy of the charges and specifications is served upon the accused following referral of charges. Article 35 also provides the accused with the opportunity, in time of peace, to object to the commencement of trial until the completion of a statutory period following service of charges—three days for special courts-martial, and five days for general courts-martial. These requirements, consistent with similar procedural requirements in federal district court, would ensure that military accused receive sufficient notice of the charges upon which they are to be tried by court-martial, and sufficient time to prepare for trial with their defense counsel. The present statute contains ambiguities with respect to each of these statutory requirements. The proposed revision would address these ambiguities and make other clarifying and conforming changes, none of which alter the purposes of Article 35.

TITLE VII—TRIAL PROCEDURE

Section 701 would amend Article 38 to conform it to the proposed amendments in Article 27 concerning the requirement for all defense counsel in general and special courts-martial to be qualified under Article 27(b).

Section 702 would amend Article 39 to codify current practice, in which military judges preside at arraignments. The amendments also would conform the statute to the proposed amendments to Articles 16, 19, and 53 requiring military judges to be detailed to preside over and to sentence the accused in all non-capital general courts-martial and all special courts-martial.

Section 703 would make a technical amendment to Article 40 to clarify that "a summary court-martial" is the narrow exception to the general rule that the authority to grant continuances is vested solely in the military judge, with no substantive change to the law. This change would conform the statute to the proposed amendments to Articles 16 and 19 requiring military judges to be detailed to preside over all general and special courts-martial, and would better align military practice regarding continuances with federal civilian practice.

Section 704 would amend Article 41 to conform the statute to the changes proposed in Article 16 concerning standard panel sizes in general and special courts-martial and the elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge. The statute's implementing rules would address application of the "liberal grant mandate" with respect to "for cause" challenges by each party in a general or special court-martial. See United States v. Smart, 21 M.J. 15 (C.M.A. 1985) (addressing the importance of ensuring that the court-martial panel is composed of individuals with a fair and open mind).

Section 705 contains amendments to Article 43 pertaining to the statute of limitations for certain UCMJ offenses. The statute would be amended as follows:

Section 705(a) would extend the statute of limitations applicable to child abuse offenses under Article 43 from the current five years or the life of the child, whichever is longer, to ten years or the life of the child, whichever is longer, thereby aligning Article 43(b)(2)(A) with 18 U.S.C. § 3283 (Offenses against children).

Section 705(b) would create a new subsection (h), extending the statute of limitations for Article 83 (fraudulent enlistment) cases from five years, as it currently stands, to (1) the length of the enlistment, in the case of enlisted members; (2) the length of the appointment, in the case of officers; or (3) five years, whichever is longer.

Section 705(c) would create a new subsection (i), extending the statute of limitations until a period of time following the implication of an identified person by DNA testing that is equal to the otherwise applicable limitations period.

Section 705(d) contains conforming amendments based on the proposed realignment of the punitive articles.

Section 705(e) establishes the applicability of the amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) to the prosecution of any offense committed before, on, or after the date of the enactment of the statute if the applicable limitations period has not yet expired.

Section 706 would amend Article 44 (Former jeopardy) to align the military more closely with federal civilian standards concerning double jeopardy.

Section 707 contains amendments to Article 45 concerning the pleas of the accused.

Section 707(a) would amend Article 45(b) to permit an accused to plead guilty in a capital case when the death penalty is not a mandatorily prescribed punishment. It would further amend the statute to conform to the proposed changes in Articles 16 and 19 to require a military judge to be detailed to all general and special courts-martial, and to eliminate the unnecessary requirement under current law for members to enter a finding of guilty where the military judge has already accepted the accused's guilty plea.

Section 707(b) would codify a harmless error rule in a new subsection (c) of Article 45. The proposed language is adapted from Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(h), using the language of Article 59(a) by substituting the phrase "materially prejudice the substantial rights of the accused" for the phrase "affects" substantial rights. See Article 59(a) ("A finding or sentence of court-martial may not be held incorrect on the ground of an error of law unless the error materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused."); United States v. Davis, 64 M.J. 445, 449 (C.A.A.F. 2007) (describing Article 59(a) as the military counterpart to Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a)). These changes would reflect federal practice and procedure with respect to harmless error and plain error review, while recognizing the unique aspects of military practice.

The proposed amendments to Article 45 aim to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of appellate review of unconditional guilty pleas, while also preserving the unique procedural protections in the military system to ensure a guilty plea is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The amendments fit within the larger goal of encouraging error correction at the trial stage and would make no change to the responsibilities of the military judge under Article 45(a). The changes seek to eliminate the sanction of reversal for harmless errors, and would conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 66 (replacing automatic review in non-capital cases with review based upon the accused's right to file an appeal). Subsection (c) addresses only harmless error. Implementing rules will prescribe plain error review for matters not properly preserved at trial. The addition of subsection (c) reflects the specific structure of Article 45, and is not intended to disturb the longstanding application of standards of review, including a harmless error test, to other aspects of the Code that are not accompanied by a statutory standard of review.

Section 708 contains several amendments to Article 46 pertaining to the opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence and the use of subpoenas and other process for courts-martial and for investigative purposes. Currently, Article 46 states only that process issued in "court-martial cases" for witnesses and evidence shall be similar to process issued in federal district court, with no explicit subpoena authority provided, and with no distinction made between different types of proceedings under the UCMJ and the different authorities for subpoenaing witnesses and evidence at different stages in the court-martial process. The proposed changes would maintain and enhance the core features of Article 46, while strengthening the relationships among related provisions in Articles 46, 47, and 49.

Section 708(a) would revise Article 46 as follows:

Article 46(a) would be amended to clarify the provisions governing the opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence in cases referred to trial by court-martial.

The limitations and conditions on defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses currently in Article 46(b) would be moved to Article 6b and expanded to cover all crime victims, consistent with related victims' rights provisions under that statute.

Article 46(b) would restate the current provisions of Article 46(c).

Article 46(c) would clarify current law concerning the issuance of subpoenas or other process to compel witnesses to appear and testify before a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other court or board, or at a deposition under Article 49.

Article 46(d) would provide for subpoenas to compel the production of evidence before a court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or other court or board, or at a deposition under Article 49. It would also include an additional paragraph providing authority to issue subpoenas duces tecum for investigations of offenses under the UCMJ, if authorized by a general court-martial convening authority. This provision would enhance the government's ability to issue investigative subpoenas prior to trial, consistent with federal and state practice, and would replace the provision currently contained in Article 47(a)(1) concerning the issuance of subpoenas duces tecum for Article 32 preliminary hearings. In addition, Article 46(d) would authorize military judges to issue warrants or court orders for information pertaining to stored electronic communications in the same manner as U.S. district court judges under the Stored Communications Act (Chapter 121, Title 18) subject to limitations prescribed by the President. This new provision would ensure military criminal investigative organizations and military prosecutors have access to electronic evidence during the investigative stages of court-martial cases, similar to their federal counterparts, and under the same limitations and conditions applicable in federal district court.

Article 46(e) would add a new subsection to provide explicit authority for military judges to modify, quash, or order compliance with subpoenas before and after referral of charges.

Section 708(b) would make conforming amendments to 18 U.S.C. §§ 2703 and 2711(3) to include process issued in court-martial proceedings.

Section 709 contains amendments to Article 47, which provides for criminal prosecution in U.S. district court of civilians who fail to comply with military subpoenas issued under Article 46. The amendments would retain current law under Article 47(a), while updating and clarifying the statute's provisions and the relationship between Articles 46 and 47.

Section 710 would amend Article 48, which provides statutory authority for the punishment of acts of contempt and violations of court orders and rules in courts-martial and other proceedings under the UCMJ. In 2011, Congress made significant amendments to Article 48 that provided a more direct means for military judges to enforce court orders and military subpoenas, and better aligned the contempt authority and procedures in military courts with those in federal district courts. However, the language of the statute as amended is ambiguous with respect to the contempt power of judges serving on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the military Courts of Criminal Appeals.

Section 710(a) would clarify the recent amendments to Article 48 by defining the judicial officers who may exercise the contempt authority to include judges of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals; military judges detailed to courts-martial, provost courts, military commissions, or any other proceeding under the UCMJ (including the proposed Article 30a proceedings); military magistrates designated under Articles 19 or 30a; commissioned officers detailed as summary courts-martial; and presidents of courts of inquiry.

Section 710(b) would transfer the review function for contempt punishments issued by military and appellate judges from the convening authority to the appropriate appellate court. This change would strengthen the contempt power and would ensure that persons held in contempt of court by military judges and appellate judges—particularly civilian attorneys and witnesses—are afforded a fair appellate review process, comparable to the review process applicable in civilian criminal courts and appellate courts across the country. The convening authority's review function would be retained for contempt punishments issued by summary courts-martial and courts of inquiry.

Section 711 contains a complete revision of Article 49. Article 49 provides statutory authority for the taking of depositions by the parties of a court-martial; it also places statutory restrictions on the conduct of depositions and on their use as a substitute for live witness testimony at trial. Consistent with Article 36, the proposed amendments would conform Article 49's substantive provisions, to the extent practicable, to the procedures and principles of law pertaining to depositions applicable in federal district court. These amendments also would conform the statute to the Confrontation Clause. As revised, Article 49 would contain the following provisions:

Article 49(a) would better align military deposition practice under Article 49 with federal and state deposition practice, and with the authority to issue and enforce subpoenas for witnesses under Articles 46 and 47, by ensuring that depositions of prospective witnesses will generally be ordered only when it is likely that the witness's trial testimony otherwise would be lost. By eliminating the reference to Article 32 preliminary hearings, the proposed amendments would ensure that depositions are permitted only for the purpose of preserving testimony for trial, not for pretrial discovery purposes. As amended, subsection (a) would conform to the proposed Article 30a concerning pre-referral duties of military judges. As amended, the authority to order depositions could be exercised by military judges detailed under Articles 26 or 30a (consistent with the definition of "military judge" proposed under Article 1(10)), as well as military magistrates designated by the detailed military judge under Articles 19 or 30a.

Article 49(a)(3) would replace and clarify the requirement for notice currently contained in subsection (b).

Article 49(a)(4) would replace and update subsection (c), providing greater consistency between Articles 49 and 32 with respect to the qualifications of deposition officers and preliminary hearing officers.

Article 49(b) would replace and update the counsel provisions currently contained in subsection (a), ensuring that the parties at a deposition will be represented by counsel detailed in the same manner as under Articles 27 and 38.

Article 49(c) would update and replace obsolete provisions in subsection (d) concerning the admissibility of depositions as evidence at trial. These changes would reflect the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence in 1980 and provide greater consistency with federal civilian deposition practice.

Article 49(d) would update and replace subsections (e) and (f) to clarify the prohibition on the use of depositions in capital cases by the government.

Section 712 would amend Article 50 to update the statute to permit sworn testimony from a court of inquiry to be played from an audiovisual recording if the deposed witness is unavailable at trial and the evidence is otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence.

Section 713 would amend Article 50a to conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 16 to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge.

Section 714 would amend Article 51, which concerns voting by members of a court-martial and rulings by military judges. These amendments would remove statutory references to courts-martial without a military judge, reflecting the proposed amendments to Article 16 to require the detailing of a military judge in all general and special courts-martial. The amendments would retain current law and procedures for voting on the findings and sentence, and for rulings by the military judge, other than those aspects of Article 51 and the implementing rules which specifically concern courts-martial without a detailed military judge.

Section 715 would amend Article 52 concerning the number of votes required for the findings in members cases, and for the findings and sentence in capital cases. Under current law, because the requirement for a two-thirds vote on the findings (and on most sentences) in Article 52 establishes a floor, not a fixed requirement, none of the parties or the public knows at the outset of a court-martial how many votes will be required for a conviction. The percentage required for a conviction and for a specific sentence can be affected significantly by the number of members detailed to a court-martial and the number of members removed through excusal, challenges for cause, and peremptory challenges. As a result, it is not unusual to see variations in voting requirements ranging from 67 percent to 80 percent of the members of the court-martial panel. The proposed amendments, in conjunction with the proposal for standard panel sizes under Article 16, would standardize the voting requirement in each type of court-martial at three-fourths (75 percent) in non-capital members cases, and unanimous on the findings and the sentence in capital cases. The proposal also would make conforming changes to align Article 52 with the proposed changes in Articles 16, 25a, and 53 with respect to capital cases and judge-alone sentencing. Implementing rules would address the procedures concerning voting on sentences of death, life without the possibility of parole, and other lawful sentences.

Section 716 would amend Article 53 to provide for judicial sentencing in all general and special courts-martial. This change would better align military sentencing practice with federal civilian sentencing practice, as well as the practice in the majority of state jurisdictions. Judicial sentencing would create the opportunity for greater uniformity and consistency in court-martial sentences, enhanced efficiency and cost-savings, and would facilitate further reforms in military sentencing practices and procedures.

Article 53(c), as amended, would provide that, for capital offenses, members will determine whether the sentence shall include death, life without eligibility for parole, or such other lesser punishments as may be determined by the military judge. The military judge would sentence the accused in accordance with the determination of the members, including to other lesser punishments in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President.

Implementing rules would address procedures for sentencing proceedings and sentence determination in the context of judge-alone sentencing, including with respect to: releasing the members, subject to recall, after the findings are announced in a non-capital case; the admissibility of sentencing information offered by the parties and the grounds for objection to such information; the rights of victims to participate in sentencing proceedings; the use of victim impact statements during sentencing; the duties of trial and defense counsel before and during the proceeding; the rules and factors to guide military judges in their sentence determinations

(similar to 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)); and rules pertaining to appellate review of military judge sentence determinations and findings.

Section 717 would create a new section, Article 53a, transferring the statutory authority for plea agreements from Article 60 to the new Article 53a. The proposed new article would provide basic rules for: (1) the construction and negotiation of plea agreements concerning the charge and the sentence; (2) allowing the convening authority and the accused to enter into binding agreements regarding the sentence that may be adjudged at a court-martial; and (3) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement in a general or special court-martial. Under the amended statute, the military judge would review the entire agreement, including any negotiated sentence agreement, prior to determining whether to accept the agreement and adjudge the sentence. If the agreement contains a negotiated sentencing range, the military judge would enter a sentence within that range unless the judge determines that the negotiated sentencing range is plainly unreasonable or otherwise unlawful. The new statute would preserve current law pertaining to plea agreements involving offenses with mandatory minimum sentences.

Implementing rules for the new Article 53a would address a number of issues concerning plea agreements, including the structure and procedures for sentence agreements; the opportunity for negotiated sentencing ranges; a requirement that, if the military judge determines that a sentence agreement is plainly unreasonable, the judge must set forth on the record the findings of fact and conclusions of law supporting that determination; plea agreements in summary courts-martial; and the role of the victim in plea agreements, with particular emphasis on the rules structuring the convening authority's decision-making with respect to acceptance of plea agreements proposed by the defense.

Section 718 would amend Article 54, which provides the basic rules and procedures for producing, authenticating, and distributing records of proceedings in general, special, and summary courts-martial. The amendments would facilitate the use of modern court reporting technology in the recording, certification, and distribution of court-martial records. The use of this technology would streamline preparation and distribution of the record of trial in light of recent amendments that reduce or eliminate post-trial proceedings under Article 60. In addition, the proposed amendments would increase the availability of court-martial records to victims of crime.

The amendments to Article 54 would: (1) require the court reporter, instead of the military judge or the prosecutor, to certify the record of trial; (2) require a complete record of trial in any general or special court-martial if the sentence includes death, dismissal, discharge, or confinement or forfeitures for more than six months; and (3) provide all victims who testify at a court-martial with access to records of trial, eliminating the distinction in the statute that currently provides such access only to victims of sex-related offenses under Article 120.

Changes in the rules implementing Article 54 would address the opportunity to file a motion to correct the record, utilizing procedures similar to those available in the federal civilian courts. Implementing rules also would address the rules for providing a "complete" record of trial, including the circumstances under which a written transcript will be prepared and the procedures for preparing a written transcript. In the near term, the statute's implementing rules would provide for the availability of a written transcript during the appellate process in the types of cases in which a written transcript is available under current military practice, subject to rules similar to the federal rule for requesting all or part of a transcript. Implementing rules also would address the potential in the future for use in the appellate process of electronic transcriptions to the extent that the development and use of such technology for legal proceedings provides for increasing comfort and familiarity with electronic formats.

TITLE VIII—SENTENCES

Section 801 would amend Article 56, which provides the authority for the President to set maximum punishments for UCMJ violations, subject to any maximum or mandatory punishments Congress has established in the UCMJ. The President has exercised this authority in two ways: (1) by limiting the types of punishments that may be imposed at a court-martial to those specified in R.C.M. 1003; and (2) by limiting the amount of confinement, forfeitures, or the type of punitive discharge that may be imposed at a court-martial.

The proposed amendments would align court-martial sentencing procedures with the proposal for judicial sentencing in all non-capital general and special courts-martial. See Section 716, supra. The amendments are designed to be phased in over a four-year period to enable military sentencing to benefit from the experiences of state and federal civilian courts in sentencing reform, while adapting the lessons learned from those experiences to the special needs of the military justice system. The amendments also would increase the transparency of military sentencing practices and provide additional structure in sentencing, while retaining flexibility in determining an appropriate sentence for the individual.

The amendments proposed in Section 801 would take effect in two phases, as follows:

Phase One. The first phase would begin on the date the legislation is enacted. During the first phase, the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board (the Board) would begin the process of gathering sentencing data for the development of sentencing parameters and criteria. During this Phase, the President would establish interim guidance, to become effective upon the effective date of the legislation. The Board would be primarily responsible for developing the interim guidance. In this phase, judicial sentencing in all non-capital general and special courts-martial would take effect. See Section 716, supra. Under judicial sentencing, the current adversarial sentencing process (which utilizes many of the procedural and evidentiary rules applicable during findings) would be modified to more closely align with the process used in civilian courts, in which all relevant information is presented to aid the judge in fashioning an appropriate sentence. The sentencing process during the first phase also would replace the current requirement to adjudge a unitary sentence, in which a single sentence is adjudged for all offenses for which there has been a finding of guilty without any explanation as to how the sentence was reached or which portions of the sentence are attributable to which offense.

In the first phase, which would be completed within four years after the legislation is enacted, the Board also would develop sentencing parameters and criteria to replace the interim guidance. The sentencing parameters and criteria proposed by the Board would be subject to approval by the President. As in many civilian courts, a sentencing parameter for an offense would set a boundary on the judge's discretion, subject to a departure for case specific reasons set forth by the judge in the record. Sentencing parameters would not be required for those offenses for which it would be impracticable to set a parameter, such as unique military offenses that vary greatly in seriousness depending on the context. The Board also would establish sentencing criteria—factors that a judge must consider when sentencing a case, but that do not propose a specific punishment. The implementation of parameters and criteria would draw upon best practices at the federal and state level, and would replace the current practice of adjudging sentences with little or no guidance. Until the parameters and criteria are implemented, the sentencing process would utilize the procedures set forth in Phase One.

Phase Two. In the second phase, which would begin four years after the legislation is enacted, the parameters and criteria approved by the President would apply to sentencing proceedings for general and special courts-martial. Military judges would utilize the parameters and criteria in conjunction with the segmented sentencing procedures and other changes in the sentencing process developed during Phase One. Military judges would retain discretion to sentence outside parameters in order to fashion individualized sentences, subject to a requirement to set forth on the record reasons for any departure.

Finally, once sentencing parameters are in place, this proposal would authorize government appeals of sentences and eliminate the requirement for mandatory minimum discharges. By addressing sentencing discretion through the use of parameters, Article 56 would reduce the need for rigid mandatory minimum sentences.

Section 801(a) would amend Article 56 in its entirety. As amended, Article 56 would contain the following provisions:

Article 56(a)-(b) would retain current law regarding maximum and minimum sentences, subject to Section 801(d), infra.

Article 56(c)(1) would enumerate factors the court-martial would be required to consider before imposing a sentence. The proposed factors are adapted from 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a).

Article 56(c)(2) would require the military judge to determine a sentence in accordance with the sentencing parameters established by the President. Consistent with federal civilian practice, a military judge could sentence outside the parameter based upon written factual findings that such a sentence is justified. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(3) would require the military judge to consider sentencing criteria established by the President when determining a sentence. The sentencing criteria would provide factors for the military judge to consider, and would not direct any specific punishment. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(4) would require the military judge to determine the appropriate amount of fine and confinement for each separate offense of which the accused is found guilty. The assignment of a specific sentence for each offense is designed to provide additional transparency to the parties and the public and advance the purposes of sentencing. With respect to all other punishments (discharges, reductions, forfeitures, and similar unique military punishments), the current practice of awarding a single sentence for all offenses would be retained, as these punishments are not readily segmented. To ensure the accused is not punished twice for what is substantially one offense, the military judge would be required to determine whether periods of confinement should run concurrently or consecutively. The requirement to determine whether sentences should run concurrently or consecutively is in the statute, and the process for making the determination is left to the Rules for Courts-Martial. A sentence to confinement for one offense that runs concurrently with the sentence to confinement of another offense would not increase the total period of confinement for purposes of determining whether the period of confinement satisfies a jurisdictional predicate (i.e., confinement for more than six months) for an appeal as of right to the Court of Criminal Appeals under proposed revisions to Article 66(b)(1)(A). In general, this subsection envisions requiring military judges to impose concurrent sentences when the offenses involve the same act, transaction, or criminal objective and the same victim. This would be similar to the rules governing the grouping of offenses under § 3D1.2(a-b) of the United States Sentencing Commission Guidelines Manual. In other circumstances, the decision to have sentences run concurrently would be left to the discretion of the judge, informed by consideration of the purposes of sentencing. This paragraph would not apply to summary courts-martial.

Article 56(c)(5) would provide that sentencing parameters and criteria do not apply to the issue of whether an offense should be punished by death.

Article 56(c)(6) would incorporate Article 56a (Sentence of confinement for life without eligibility for parole) into Article 56 without substantive change. Article 56a would be repealed. See Section 801(b), infra.

Article 56(d)(1) would require the President to establish sentencing parameters and criteria.

Article 56(d)(2) would establish the requirements for sentencing parameters. Except for unique military offenses, all violations of the UCMJ would be assigned to between seven and twelve offense categories. Each offense category would specify a range of confinement and may include an appropriate range for other punishments such as discharges. The subsection also would prescribe the minimum requirements for each sentencing parameter.

Article 56(d)(3) defines sentencing criteria as factors that the military judge must consider when sentencing. Under the proposal, there are two types of sentencing criteria: criteria that inform how to punish a violation of a specific offense (e.g., factors that aggravate or mitigate the harm of a military offense); and criteria that inform when certain punishments may be appropriate or inappropriate (e.g., factors that inform when a reduction or discharge may be appropriate).

Article 56(d)(4) would create the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board to develop parameters and criteria. The Board would be created within the Department of Defense, and would be composed of the chief trial judge of each service, subject to the opportunity to detail alternate members when required by circumstances applicable to the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. The chief trial judges would be detailed by the Judge Advocate General of each military Service and the Secretary of Defense would select a chair and vice-chair of the Board. Service on the Board would be a collateral duty. The Board would have non-voting members designated by the Attorney General, the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the General Counsel of the Department of Defense. The Department of Defense would provide full-time staff to assist the Board.

Article 56(d)(5) would prescribe the duties of the Board. The Board would be required to develop sentencing parameters, criteria, and sentencing rules for submission to the President. The Board also could promulgate non-binding policies on sentencing. In fulfilling its duties, the Board would be required to consult with commanders, enlisted leaders, practitioners, and others. The Board would be required to establish two advisory groups. The first advisory group would be composed of senior officer and enlisted members who provide guidance on the effectiveness of military justice on discipline. The second advisory group would be composed of military justice practitioners.

Article 56(e) would provide for limited appeal of sentences by the government. This right would be available only after the establishment of sentencing parameters. Similar to 18 U.S.C. § 3742(b)(4), the government would be required to obtain the approval of the Judge Advocate General before filing an appeal on the sentence. Finally, such appeals would be limited to whether the sentence is illegal, calculated incorrectly, or is plainly unreasonable. In determining whether a sentence is plainly unreasonable, a Court of Criminal Appeals could, but would not be required to, presume that a sentence within a sentencing parameter is reasonable. The core of the subsection is taken from 18 U.S.C. § 3742, modified for military practice and reflecting the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).

Section 801(b) is a conforming amendment.

Section 801(c) would require the President to prescribe the regulations for sentencing parameters and criteria required by Article 56(d), as amended, not later than four years after enactment of the bill. It also would require the President to prescribe interim guidance.

Section 801(d) would repeal Article 56(b) and Article 53a(d) upon the taking effect of sentencing parameters for the offenses specified in Article 56(b)(2) that have mandatory minimum punishments. See also Section 717, supra.

Section 802(a) would consolidate Articles 57, 57a, and 71 into Article 57 (Effective date of sentences) to address in a single article the effective date for all punishments that could be adjudged at a court-martial. Article 57, as amended, would contain the following provisions:

Article 57(a) would establish when the punishment adjudged at a court-martial sentence becomes effective. The proposed subsection combines portions of Articles 57, 57a, and 71, and removes the distinction between when a sentence becomes effective and when it is ordered executed. With the exception of death and punitive discharges, sentences would be effective by operation of law without any additional approval upon entry of judgment. This is a conforming change to the proposed changes in Article 60 (Post-trial processing in general and special courts-martial) and the proposed enactment of Articles 60a (Limited authority to act on sentence in specified post-trial circumstances), 60b (Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial), and 60c (Entry of judgment).

Article 57(a)(1) would address when forfeitures and reduction become effective. The first sentence of this paragraph is taken without modification from Article 57(a)(3). The remainder of this paragraph is taken from Article 57(a)(1).

Article 57(a)(2) is taken, without change, from Article 57(b). Article 57(b) would be modified to apply only to summary courts-martial.

Article 57(a)(3) is taken, without change, from Article 71(a).

Article 57(a)(4) is taken, without change, from Article 71(b).

Article 57(a)(5) is taken from Article 71(c)(1) with modification. The provisions of Article 71(c)(1) regarding waiver or withdrawal of an appeal and the definition of what constitutes a final appeal are consolidated in subsection (c).

Article 57(a)(6) is taken from Article 57(c) with modification. As a conforming change to the proposal for Article 60c, in general and special courts-martial "entry of judgment" is substituted for "on the date ordered executed." See Section 904, infra. For consistency, a summary court-martial sentence would become effective when approved by the convening authority.

Article 57(b)(1) is a combination of Article 57(a)(2), authorizing the deferment of forfeitures and reduction, and Article 57a(a), authorizing the deferment of confinement. The definition of convening authority is taken from Article 57a(a). As a conforming change to the proposal for Article 60c, the deferment of a sentence would terminate upon entry of judgment.

Article 57(b)(2)-(4) are taken from Article 57a(b)(1)-(3), with no substantive changes.

Article 57(b)(5) is taken from Article 57a(c) with conforming changes to reflect the proposed new section, Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Section 904, infra.

Article 57(c)(1) is taken from Article 71(c)(1)-(2) with modification to reflect the proposal for an appeal of right. Under the revised language, appellate review would be complete when an Article 65 review is finished, or when the Court of Criminal Appeals has reviewed the case and any petition to a higher court for review has been addressed, or the time to petition higher courts has expired. Paragraph (2) incorporates the current provision in Article 71(c)(1) that the completion of appellate review is a final determination on the legality of the proceedings.

Section 802(b) contains conforming amendments to strike Articles 57a and 71 and an additional conforming amendment to Article 58b.

Section 803 would amend Article 58a (Sentences: reduction in enlisted grade upon approval), which provides a mechanism for the individual services to order a reduction of enlisted members to the grade of E-1 whenever the approved sentence of a court-martial includes a punitive discharge, confinement, or hard labor without confinement. The amendments would conform the statute to the changes proposed in post-trial procedure under Article 60 and the proposed Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Section 904, infra.

Section 804 would sunset Article 58a after the enactment of sentencing parameters and criteria under Article 56. This sunset provision is consistent with the proposals for judge-alone sentencing under Article 53 and for sentencing parameters and criteria under Article 56. See Sections 716 and 801, supra. The sentencing parameters and criteria proposed in Section 801 would include objective factors for the military judge to consider in determining whether a sentence should include a reduction in pay grade.

TITLE IX—POST-TRIAL PROCEDURE AND REVIEW OF COURTS-MARTIAL

Sections 901-904 concern post-trial processing and post-trial action by the convening authority. These processes are currently prescribed under Article 60 (Action by the convening authority). These sections would amend Article 60 of the UCMJ in its entirety.

Section 901 would amend Article 60 to provide for the distribution of the trial results and to authorize the filing of post-trial motions with the military judge in general and special courts-martial. The convening authority's role in post-trial processing would be moved to new Articles 60a and 60b. See Sections 902-903, infra. Article 60, as amended, would include the following provisions:

Article 60(a) would require the military judge to immediately enter into the record the Statement of Trial Results, consisting of the pleas of the accused, the findings and sentence of the court-martial, and any other information required by the President. The statute would require that copies be provided to the convening authority, the accused, and any victim of any offense. The statement of trial results would serve as the basis for the entry of judgment under Article 60c.

Article 60(b) would require the President to establish rules governing submission of post-trial motions to the military judge. The implementing rules would establish filing deadlines for the parties and provide explicit authority for the military judge and convening authority to direct post-trial hearings when necessary to address allegations of legal error. The authority to order post-trial hearings would replace the previous authority to order proceedings in revision. See Article 60(f)(1)-(2).

Section 902 would create a new section, Article 60a (Limited authority to act on sentence in specified post-trial circumstances), which would retain current limitations on the convening authority's post-trial actions in most general and special courts-martial, subject to a narrowly limited suspension authority under Article 60a(c) and a revised authority related to substantial assistance under Article 60a(d). Article 60a, as proposed, would contain the following provisions:

Article 60a(a)-(b) would retain and clarify existing limitations on the convening authority's post-trial actions in general and special courts-martial in which: (1) the maximum sentence of confinement for any offense is more than two years; (2) adjudged confinement exceeds six months; (3) the sentence includes dismissal or discharge; or (4) the accused is found guilty of designated sex-related offenses. Under current law, the convening authority in such cases is prohibited from modifying the findings of the court-martial, or reducing, commuting, or suspending a punishment of death, confinement of more than six months, or a punitive discharge.

Article 60a(c) would provide a limited suspension authority in specified circumstances. For the convening authority to exercise this authority, the military judge would be required to make a specific suspension recommendation in the Statement of Trial Results. The suspension authority under subsection (c) would be limited to punishments of confinement in excess of six months and punitive discharges.

Article 60a(d) would retain, with clarifying amendments, the key features of current law with respect to the convening authority's power to reduce the sentence of an accused who assists in the prosecution or investigation of another person. As amended, the President may prescribe rules providing for a convening authority to exercise this power after entry of judgment. This provision is designed to allow for the reduction of a sentence of an accused who provides substantial assistance in the prosecution of another person, even well after his own trial is over and appellate review is complete. The implementing rules will be modeled on Fed. R. Crim. P. 35(b).

Article 60a(e) would allow the accused and a victim of the offense to submit matters to the convening authority for consideration. The implementing rules would establish the timelines for submitting matters under this subsection and procedures for responding to submissions. The implementing rules also would require the accused and victim to have a copy or access to the recording of the open sessions of the court-martial and admitted unsealed exhibits.

Article 60a(f) would require the decision of the convening authority to be forwarded to the military judge. If the convening authority modified the sentence of the court-martial, the convening authority would be required to explain the reasons for the modification. An explanation for the convening authority's decision would only be required when the convening authority modifies the sentence. No approval of the findings or sentence would be required. The decision of the convening authority would be forwarded to the military judge, who would incorporate any change in the sentence into the entry of judgment. In a case where the accused provides substantial assistance under subsection (d) and a designated convening authority reduces the sentence of the accused after entry of judgment, the convening authority's action would be forwarded to the chief trial judge, who would be responsible for ensuring appropriate modification of the entry of judgment. Because a modification might happen during or after the completion of appellate review, the modified entry of judgment would be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General for appropriate action.

Section 903 would create a new section, Article 60b (Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial). The new section would retain and clarify the convening authority's post-trial authorities and responsibilities with respect to the findings and sentence of a court-martial not covered by subsection (a)(2) of new Article 60a. This post-trial authority would be available in summary courts-martial and a limited number of general and special courts-martial which, because of the offenses charged and the sentence adjudged, would not be covered under Article 60a. Consistent with existing law, the convening authority in such cases would be authorized to act on the findings and the sentence, and could order rehearings, subject to certain limitations. The procedural requirements under Article 60b, to include consideration of matters submitted by the accused and victim, would be the same as those provided in Article 60a. In summary courts-martial, the convening authority would be required to act on the sentence, and would have discretion to act on the findings, as under current law.

Section 904 would create a new section, Article 60c (Entry of judgment). The entry of judgment would require the military judge to enter the judgment of the court-martial into the record in all general and special courts-martial, and would mark the conclusion of trial proceedings. The judgment would reflect the Statement of Trial Results, any action by the convening authority on the findings or sentence, and any post-trial rulings by the military judge. The judgment also would indicate the time when the accused's case becomes eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66, or for review by the Judge Advocate General under Article 65. This requirement for an entry of judgment is modeled after Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(k). The findings and sentence of a summary court-martial, as modified by any post-trial action by the convening authority under Article 60b, would constitute the judgment of the court-martial.

Section 905 would amend Article 61, which provides that an accused may file a statement with the convening authority expressly waiving the right to appellate review under Article 66 or Article 69. The amendments would conform the statute to the changes proposed in Articles 60, 65, and 69 concerning post-trial processing. See Sections 901-904, supra; Sections 909, 913, infra.

Section 906 concerns government interlocutory appeals. Presently, Article 62 provides a limited basis for government interlocutory appeals. This section would amend Article 62 to better align interlocutory appeals in the military with federal civilian practice, by authorizing an appeal when, upon defense motion, the military judge sets aside a panel's finding of guilty because of legally insufficient evidence. Additionally, the amendments would better align Article 62 with the rule of construction applicable to 18 U.S.C. § 3731, by directing military courts to liberally construe the statute's provisions to effect its purposes. As amended, the authority for interlocutory appeals under Article 62 would be extended to all general and special courts-martial, which would replace the current limitation authorizing such appeals only if the offense at issue carries the potential for a punitive discharge.

Section 907 would amend Article 63 to remove the sentence limitation at a rehearing in cases in which: (1) an accused changes his or her plea from guilty to not guilty, or otherwise fails to comply with the terms a pretrial agreement; or (2) a sentence is set aside based on a government appeal. The amendments would better align military practice with federal civilian practice in the area of rehearings.

Section 908 concerns review of court-martial cases not otherwise subject to appellate review under Article 66 or review by the Office of the Judge Advocate General under Article 69. Under current law, Article 64 provides for judge advocate review of such cases, including conclusions as to jurisdiction, whether the charges and specifications stated offenses, and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed by law. This section would amend Article 64 to apply only to the initial review of summary courts-martial. Article 65, as amended, would provide for review of general and special courts-martial that do not qualify for direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. No substantive changes to the procedures or scope of review of summary courts-martial would be made. Implementing rules will address the opportunity for an accused to consult with counsel before filing any matter in connection with an Article 64 review.

Section 909 would amend Article 65 to conform the statute to the changes proposed in Articles 66 and 69. See Sections 910, 914, infra. As amended, Article 65 would: (1) provide additional guidance on the disposition of records; (2) require that the record of trial be forwarded to appellate defense counsel for review whenever the case is eligible for direct review under Article 66; and (3) provide for appellate review of all cases that are not subject to direct appellate review by a Court of Criminal Appeals, similar to the current review under Article 64. As amended, Article 65 would contain the following provisions:

Article 65(a) would require the record of trial in all general and special courts-martial in which there is a finding of guilty to be transmitted to the Office of the Judge Advocate General. In all other cases, the records of trial would be transmitted and disposed of in accordance with service regulations.

Article 65(b) would address the processing of records of trial in cases eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals. Under paragraph (1), consistent with current practice, if the judgment of the court-martial included a sentence of death, the Judge Advocate General would be required to forward the record of trial to the Court of Criminal Appeals for automatic review. Paragraph (2) would address processing of records of trial in cases eligible for direct review by a Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66(b)(1). The Judge Advocate General would be required to forward a copy of the record to an appellate defense counsel, who would be detailed to review the case and, upon request of the accused, to represent the accused before the Court of Criminal Appeals. The appellate defense counsel would review the record, advise the accused on the merits of an appeal, and, upon request, file the appeal with the Court of Criminal Appeals. The accused would be able to request that a copy of the record of trial be forwarded to civilian counsel provided by the accused. These provisions would not apply if the accused waived the right to appeal under Article 61 or declined representation by appellate defense counsel.

Article 65(c) would require the Judge Advocate General to provide a "Notice of the Right to Appeal" to an accused eligible to file an appeal under Article 66(b)(1).

Article 65(d) would provide for limited review by an attorney within the Office of Judge Advocate General, or another attorney designated under service regulations, in cases not eligible for direct appeal to a Court of Criminal Appeals under Articles 66(b). Cases not eligible for direct review under Article 66 would be those in which a punitive discharge was not imposed and confinement imposed was for six months or less. The review would focus on three issues: whether the court-martial had jurisdiction over the accused and the offense; whether each charge and specification stated an offense; and whether the sentence was within the limits prescribed as a matter of law. The review also would include a response to any allegation of error submitted by the accused in writing. Under paragraph (3), this limited review—except for the response to allegations of error—also would be provided when an accused who is eligible to file an appeal for direct review under Article 66 waives or withdraws from appellate review, and when an accused fails to file an appeal under Article 66. This limited and expeditious review would satisfy a condition precedent to execution of certain sentences under Article 57 (Effective date of sentences), as amended. See Section 802, supra.

Article 65(e) would provide that, if the attorney conducting the review under subsection (d) believes corrective action may be required, the record shall be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, who may set aside the findings or sentence, in whole or in part. If the Judge Advocate General sets aside the findings or sentence, he or she would be required to either order a rehearing or dismiss the charges. In addition, where the Judge Advocate General sets aside the findings or sentence and orders a rehearing, if the convening authority determines that a rehearing would be impractical, the convening authority should dismiss the charges.

Under the related proposal for Article 64, summary courts-martial would still be reviewed under the procedures contained in that statute. General and special courts-martial reviewed under Article 65, as well as summary courts-martial reviewed under Article 64, would be eligible for further review by the Judge Advocate General under the standards set forth in Article 69, as amended. See Section 913, supra. Those cases would then become eligible for appellate review by the Court of Criminal Appeals, either by certification of the Judge Advocate General or through application of the accused for discretionary review.

Section 910 would amend Article 66 to revise the scope of review and enlarge the category of cases eligible for review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. Specifically, the proposed amendments would: (1) replace automatic review in non-capital cases with a filing procedure similar to the appeal as of right process used in the federal civilian appellate courts; (2) retain mandatory review in capital cases; (3) provide for discretionary review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals in cases that are not eligible for an appeal as of right; (4) provide standards of review for appeals; and (5) codify the authority of Courts of Criminal Appeals to remand cases and order rehearings. As amended, Article 66 would contain the following provisions:

Article 66(a) would require the President to establish minimum tour lengths, with appropriate exceptions, for appellate military judges, and would require the Judge Advocate General of each service to certify the qualifications of appellate military judges consistent with the proposed amendment to Article 26 regarding the assignment and qualifications of military judges. See Section 504(b), supra. Implementing rules will reflect the Services' role and discretion in applying exceptions to the minimum tour lengths.

Article 66(b) would expand the categories of cases in which servicemembers may seek direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals. It would replace automatic review in non-capital cases with an appeal of right. It also would continue to require automatic review of all capital cases. The amendments would provide every servicemember found guilty of an offense by a court-martial with a pathway to review by a court of record. As amended, there would be two prerequisites for review of non-capital cases by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66(b): (1) entry of the court-martial judgment into the record by a military judge under proposed Article 60c; and (2) timely filing of an appeal. The Court of Criminal Appeals would be able to review: (1) any case with a sentence to a punitive separation or confinement of more than six months; (2) any case that was previously the subject of an appeal by the United States under Article 62 or Article 56; and (3) any other case in which an application for discretionary review under Article 69(e)(2) was granted. For purposes of this subsection, the term "confinement for more than six months" would mean the total period of confinement adjudged, but would not aggregate periods of confinement running concurrently.

Article 66(c) prescribes jurisdictional timelines for appellate review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals.

Article 66(d) defines the duties of the Courts of Criminal Appeals, which would be consistent with current practice except that the obligation to review every case for factual sufficiency and sentence appropriateness would be eliminated. Under paragraph (3), the Courts of Criminal Appeals could provide relief for post-trial errors and excessive post-trial delay.

Article 66(e) details the limited authorities of the Courts of Criminal Appeals to weigh and consider evidence. The Court's authority to set aside a finding that is contrary to the weight of the evidence would be retained, but would require the accused to identify deficiencies in the proof and would allow the Court to set aside such findings only if "clearly convinced that the finding was against the weight of the evidence." This would channel the exercise of such authority through standards that are more deferential to the factfinder at trial and more reviewable by higher courts.

Article 66(e)(2) would address consideration of the entire case, including a finding of guilty and the sentence. The Court's authority to weigh the evidence and to determine controverted questions of fact would be retained, but would channel the exercise of such authority through standards that are more deferential to the factfinder at trial. This change would enable application of differing standards of review tailored to widely varied matters, including rulings on pretrial motions, the findings and sentence adjudged by the court-martial, and sentences of death determined by members.

Article 66(f) would provide standards of review applicable to sentences adjudged both before and after sentencing parameters are implemented under the proposed amendments to Article 56. See Section 801, supra. The proposed standards of review would provide the accused with several avenues to appeal a court-martial sentence. First, the accused would be able to appeal a sentence that was unlawful, or that resulted from incorrect application of a sentencing parameter. Second, consistent with the government's ability to appeal a sentence under Article 56(e) (as amended) the accused could appeal a sentence on the grounds that it is plainly unreasonable. See Section 801, supra. The term "plainly unreasonable" is taken from 18 U.S.C. § 3742 and is intended to provide substantial deference to the trial judge. Third, in cases where an adjudged offense has no sentencing parameter, or where the sentence imposed was above the applicable sentencing parameter for the offense, the accused would be able to appeal the sentence as inappropriately severe. This provision recognizes that a sentence may be "inappropriately severe" despite being reasonable. Finally, in the case of a sentence determined by a panel in a capital case, consistent with current practice, the Court would be required to determine whether the sentence is appropriate.

Article 66(g)(3) would codify the authority of Courts of Criminal Appeals to remand a case for additional proceedings as may be necessary to address substantial issues. This authority would be subject to any limitations the Court may direct or the President may prescribe by regulation. This provision would codify current practice (i.e., DuBay Hearings). See United States v. Dubay, 37 C.M.R. 411 (1967).

In addition to the authority to review specific types of cases designated in Article 66, the Courts of Criminal Appeals consider interlocutory appeals under Article 62 and petitions for extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a). See, e.g., Noyd v. Bond, 395 U.S. 683, 695 n.7 (1969); Clinton v. Goldsmith, 526 U.S. 529 (1999); United States v. Denedo, 556 U.S. 904 (2009). The Courts of Criminal Appeals also review cases sent to the Court by the Judge Advocate General under Article 69. Under the proposed amendments to Article 56, the Courts of Criminal Appeals also would review sentence appeals filed by the Government under Article 56(e). The procedures applicable to proceedings arising under Article 56, like the procedures applicable to proceedings arising under Article 62, Article 69, and the All Writs Act, may be set forth in the rules for the Courts of Criminal Appeals prescribed under Article 66.

Section 911 would amend Article 67, which sets forth the procedures for the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces to review cases from the Courts of Criminal Appeals, to conform the statute to proposed changes in Articles 60 and 66, including the creation of an "entry of judgment" in the proposed Article 60c (Entry of judgment). See Sections 901-904, 910, supra. In addition, the amendments would provide for notification by a Judge Advocate General to the other Judge Advocates General prior to certifying a case for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The recommendation for "appropriate notification to the other Judge Advocates General" would apply only to cases the Judge Advocate General intends to certify to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces pursuant to Article 67(a)(2). This change is intended to ensure that each Judge Advocate General has an opportunity to provide meaningful input on the decision to appeal cases that have the potential to impact the law applicable to all the services. The change would not alter the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces over these cases nor would it limit the discretion or authority of a Judge Advocate General to certify issues to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Section 912 would make a technical amendment in Article 67a.

Section 913 would amend Article 69 to more closely align appellate review of minor offenses with the practice in the federal civilian courts. Presently, Article 69 authorizes the Judge Advocate General to conduct a post-final review of courts-martial that are not subject to direct review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66 and that were not previously reviewed under Article 69. As amended, the accused would have a one-year period in which to file for review under Article 69 in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, extendable to three years for good cause. The three-year upper limit for filing is consistent with the proposed amendments to Article 73 (Petition for a new trial) to allow an accused to petition for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence or fraud on the court. See Section 916, supra. A review under Article 69, as amended, could consider issues of newly discovered evidence, fraud on the court, lack of jurisdiction over the accused or the offense, error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, or the appropriateness of the sentence. The statute would permit the accused, after a decision is issued by the Office of the Judge Advocate General, to apply for discretionary review by the Court of Criminal Appeals under Article 66. The Judge Advocate General's authority to certify cases for review at the appellate courts would be retained.

Section 914 would amend Article 70 to require, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one appellate defense counsel shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases in any case in which the death penalty was adjudged at trial. This change would provide the accused with the same access to an expert in death penalty litigation that is currently provided to defendants in Article III courts and before military commissions under Chapter 47a of Title 10.

Section 915 would amend Article 72, which establishes the process for vacating a suspended court-martial sentence. The amendments would authorize a special court-martial convening authority to detail a judge advocate qualified under Article 27(b) to preside at the vacation hearing, which must be held before a suspended sentence can be vacated. The detailed judge advocate would replace the special court-martial convening authority at the hearing and would make factual determinations about whether a violation occurred. Under current law, the procedures applicable at vacation hearings under Article 72 are prescribed by cross-reference to R.C.M. 405, which provides the rules and procedures applicable at Article 32 hearings. The recent changes to Article 32 (Preliminary hearing) and R.C.M. 405 no longer provide a hearing structure that can be used in vacation proceedings. The implementing rules for Article 72 will be updated to reflect this change and to provide procedures applicable at vacation hearings.

Section 916 would amend Article 73 to conform the statute to the proposed changes in Article 60 and to increase the time period for an accused to petition for a new trial from two years to three years, consistent with the three-year period in Fed. R. Crim. P. 33(b)(1).

Section 917 would amend Article 75, which provides the basic rules and procedures for the restoration of a member's rights, privileges, and property when a court-martial conviction is set aside during review. As amended, the statute would authorize the President to establish regulations governing when an accused may receive pay and allowances while pending a rehearing. The implementing rules will set forth the authority to provide pay and allowances to an accused who is pending a rehearing, performing duties, and not in confinement.

Section 918 would align the language of Article 76a with proposed changes in Article 60 (Action by the Convening authority) and the proposed new Article 60c (Entry of judgment), with no substantive changes. Article 76a currently authorizes the services, at their discretion, to involuntarily place an accused on leave if the accused has been sentenced to an unsuspended punitive discharge or dismissal that has been approved by the convening authority.

TITLE X—PUNITIVE ARTICLES

Section 1001 would reorganize the punitive articles by transferring and redesignating 16 articles within Subchapter X of the UCMJ. In the context of the substantive changes in various punitive articles proposed in Title X of the bill, the reorganization of articles listed in section 1001 would serve to more closely group related offenses. The substantive amendments to the punitive articles, including the articles reorganized under Section 1001, are set forth in Sections 1002-1051.

Section 1001(1) would transfer and redesignate Articles 83 (Fraudulent enlistment, appointment, or separation) and 84 (Unlawful enlistment, appointment, or separation) as Articles 104a and 104b, respectively.

Section 1001(2) would transfer and redesignate Article 95 (Resistance, flight, breach of arrest, and escape) as Article 87a.

Section 1001(3) would transfer and redesignate Article 98 (Noncompliance with procedural rules) as Article 131f.

Section 1001(4) would transfer and redesignate Article 103 (Captured or abandoned property) as Article 108a.

Section 1001(5) would transfer and redesignate Article 104 (Aiding the enemy) as Article 103b.

Section 1001(6) would transfer and redesignate Article 105 (Misconduct as prisoner) as Article 98.

Section 1001(7) would transfer and redesignate Articles 106 (Spies) and 106a (Espionage) as Articles 103 and 103a, respectively.

Section 1001(8) would transfer and redesignate Article 113 (Misbehavior of sentinel) as Article 95.

Section 1001(9) would transfer and redesignate Article 111 (Drunken or reckless operation of a vehicle, aircraft, or vessel) as Article 113.

Section 1001(10) would transfer and incorporate Article 130 (Housebreaking) as part of the amended Article 129a.

Section 1001(11) would transfer and redesignate Article 120a (Stalking) as Article 130.

Section 1001(12) would transfer and redesignate Article 123 (Forgery) as Article 105.

Section 1001(13) would transfer and redesignate Article 124 (Maiming) as Article 128a.

Section 1001(14) would transfer and redesignate Article 132 (Frauds against the United States) as Article 124.

Section 1002 would amend Article 79 and retitle the statute as "Conviction of offense charged, lesser included offenses, and attempts." As amended, Article 79 would authorize the President to designate an authoritative, but non-exhaustive, list of lesser included offenses for each punitive article of the UCMJ in addition to judicially determined lesser included offenses. This change would provide actual notice of applicable lesser included offenses to all parties. Implementing provisions will provide the President with the flexibility to designate factually similar offenses as lesser included offenses under a "reasonably included" standard. The "reasonably included" standard would enhance actual notice by requiring a measurable relationship between the greater offense and the listed offense.

Presidentially designated lesser included offenses under Article 79 and the implementing provisions and judicially determined lesser included offenses would work in concert at trial. The statute's implementing provisions would explain to practitioners that potential lesser included offenses may be established at trial either by: (1) designation by the President; or (2) by the military judge at trial when the military judge determines that an offense raised by the evidence at trial is "necessarily included within the greater offense."

Section 1003 would amend Article 82 and retitle the statute as "Soliciting commission of offenses." The amendments would migrate the general solicitation offense under Article 134 into Article 82, as a separate subsection before the specific solicitation offenses in the existing statute. The general solicitation offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality. Implementing provisions will maintain the same punishments for all solicitation offenses as under current law.

Section 1004 would transfer and redesignate Article 115 (Malingering) as Article 83, and would make a technical change to the statute's provisions. The technical change would replace the words "for the purpose of avoiding" with the words "with the intent to avoid" to better address the mens rea required for the offense.

Section 1005 would migrate the offense of "Quarantine: medical, breaking" from Article 134, the General article, to redesignated Article 84 (Breach of medical quarantine). The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1006 would consolidate the offenses of "Missing movement" in existing Article 87 and "Jumping from vessel into the water" in Article 134 (the General article) into a single offense under Article 87 (Missing movement; jumping from vessel). The consolidated offense would prohibit servicemembers from, by neglect or design, missing the movement of a ship, aircraft, or unit with which they are required to move or jumping from a vessel into the water. These offenses are well-recognized concepts in military criminal law. Accordingly, they do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.

Section 1007 would migrate and consolidate the offenses of "Restriction, breaking" and Correctional custody – offenses against" from Article 134 (the General article) to a new section, Article 87b (Offenses against correctional custody and restriction). These offenses are well-recognized concepts in criminal law. Accordingly, they do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.

Section 1008 would amend Article 89 and retitle the statute as "Disrespect toward superior commissioned officer; assault of superior commissioned officer." As amended, Article 89 would include the offense of "Assaulting a superior commissioned officer," which would be transferred from Article 90. This change would align these closely related provisions in Articles 89.

Section 1009 would amend Article 90 by transferring the offense of "Assaulting a superior commissioned officer" to Article 89 and retitling the statute as "Willfully disobeying superior commissioned officer." This change would realign closely related provisions in Articles 89 and focus the Article as amended on the willful disobedience of a lawful command of a superior commissioned officer.

Section 1010 would create a new section, Article 93a (Prohibited activities with military recruit or trainee by person in position of special trust). The new section would provide enhanced accountability for sexual misconduct committed by recruiters and trainers during the various phases within the recruiting and basic military training environments. The term "officer" as used in subsection (a)(1) of this statute would have the same meaning ascribed to it as in 10 U.S.C. § 101(b)(1). The term "applicant for military service" would include persons in the process of applying for an original enlistment or appointment in the armed services as defined in applicable service regulations. The primary focus of the new statute is on recruiting and initial entry training. Because of the unique nature of military training and the different training environments among the services, the statute would authorize the Service Secretaries to publish regulations designating the types of physical intimacy that would constitute a "prohibited sexual activity" under subsections (a) and (b) of the new statute.

Article 93a would cover military recruiters and trainers who knowingly engage in prohibited sexual activity with prospective recruits or junior members of the armed forces in initial training environments. Consent would not be a defense to this offense.

Article 93a is intended to address specific conduct and is not intended to supersede or preempt service regulations governing professional conduct by staff involved in recruiting, entry level training, or other follow on training programs. The Secretary concerned could prescribe by regulation any additional initial career qualification training programs related to servicemembers they determine should fall under this statute. Implementing rules will address appropriate maximum punishments for the new offense.

Section 1011 would migrate the loitering portion of the offense of "Sentinel or lookout: offenses against or by" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 95 (Offenses by sentinel or lookout). The wrongfulness of loitering by a sentinel or lookout is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1012 would create a new section, Article 95a (Disrespect toward a sentinel or lookout). The new statute would include the disrespect portion of the offense of "Sentinel or lookout: offenses against or by," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1013 would amend Article 96 and retitle the statute as "Release of prisoner without authority; drinking with prisoner." As amended, Article 96 would include the offense of "Drinking liquor with prisoner," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The latter offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1014 would amend Article 103 (Spies), as transferred and redesignated by Section 1001(7), supra, by replacing the mandatory death penalty currently required with a discretionary death penalty similar to that authorized under existing Article 106a (Espionage) and for all other capital offenses under the Code.

Section 1015 would migrate the offense of "Public record: altering, concealing, removing, mutilating, obliterating, or destroying" from Article 134 (the General article) to redesignated Article 104 (Public records offenses). The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1016 would create a new section, Article 105a (False or unauthorized pass offenses). The new statute would include the offense of "False or unauthorized pass offenses," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). This offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1017 would migrate the offense of "Impersonating a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned, petty officer or agent of official" from Article 134 (the General article) into the redesignated Article 106 (Impersonation of officer, noncommissioned or petty officer, or agent or official). The term "officer" as used in subsection (a)(1) of the statute would have the same meaning ascribed to it as in 10 U.S.C. § 101(b)(1). This offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1018 would create a new section, Article 106a (Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button), and would migrate the offense of "Wearing unauthorized insignia, decoration, badge, ribbon, device, or lapel button" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. When committed by servicemembers, the offense is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon proof of the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1019 would amend Article 107 and retitle the statute as "False official statements; false swearing." As amended, Article 107 would include the offense of "False swearing," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The offense of false swearing is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1020 would create a new section, Article 107a (Parole violation), and would migrate the offense of "Parole, Violation of" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1021 would create a new section, Article 109a (Mail matter: wrongful taking, opening, etc.), and would migrate the offense of "Mail: taking, opening, secreting, destroying, or stealing" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1022 would amend Article 110 (Improper hazarding of vessel) to also prohibit improper hazarding of an aircraft. Although other punitive articles, such as Article 92 (dereliction of duty) and Article 108 (destruction of military property) may speak to the loss or destruction of government property generally, no punitive article captures the act of improper hazarding of an aircraft, considering the potential for catastrophic loss of life and property, as well as harm to the strategic interests of the United States. This amendment would align the conduct involving an aircraft with the maximum punishments authorized under Article 110.

Section 1023 would amend Article 111 and retitle the statute as "Leaving scene of vehicle accident." As amended, the statute would include the offense of "Fleeing the scene of an accident," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article) to place it next to other offenses under the UCMJ involving misuse of vehicles. The offense of fleeing the scene of an accident is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1024 would amend Article 112 and retitle the statute as "Drunkenness and other incapacitation offenses." As amended, Article 112 would include the offenses of "Drunkenness—incapacitation for performance of duties through prior wrongful indulgence in intoxicating liquor or any drug" and "Drunk prisoner," which would be migrated from Article 134 (the General article). The express exclusion of sentinels and lookouts under Article 112 would be removed in order to resolve the ambiguity between Articles 112 and 113 concerning the "on post" status of sentinels and lookouts. The wrongfulness of being incapacitated for duty or as a prisoner is a well-recognized concept in military criminal law. Accordingly, this offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1025 would amend Article 113 (Drunken or reckless operation of vehicle, aircraft, or vessel), as transferred and redesignated by Section 1001(9), supra, to align the BAC limits in the offense to the prevailing legal standard in the United States. All other jurisdictions in the United States, including all fifty states, each territory, the District of Columbia, and the national parks, have established BAC limits no higher than .08 for the offense of drunk driving. The amendment also would provide flexibility for the Department of Defense to prescribe lower breath/blood alcohol limits should scientific developments or other factors in the civilian sector lead to lower limits.

Section 1026 would migrate the offenses of "Reckless endangerment," "Firearm, discharging—willfully, under such circumstances as to endanger human life," and "Weapon: concealed carrying" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 114 (Endangerment offenses), which currently includes the offense of "Dueling." The wrongfulness of failing to maintain weapon discipline is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, these offenses do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality.

Section 1027 would migrate the offenses of "Threat, communicating," and "Threat or hoax designed or intended to cause panic or public fear" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 115 (Communicating threats). These offenses are well-recognized concepts in criminal law. Accordingly, these offenses do not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for their criminality. The guidance in the Manual for Courts-Martial will continue to reflect the limitations on these offenses established in the applicable case law.

Section 1028 would make a technical amendment to Article 118 (Murder).

Section 1029 would create a new section, Article 119b (Child endangerment), and would migrate the offense of "Child endangerment" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The new section would align with the closely related offense of "Death or injury of an unborn child" under Article 119a. The offense of child endangerment is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1030 would amend the definition of "sexual act" in both Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally) and Article 120b (Rape and sexual assault of a child) to conform to the definition of that term in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(A)-(C). The current definition of "sexual act" under Articles 120 and 120b is both overly broad (it captures non-sexual acts) and unduly narrow (it does not include all of the prohibited acts involving children listed in 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(D)).

Section 1031 would redesignate Article 120a as "Mails: deposit of obscene matter" and would migrate the offense of "Mails: depositing or causing to be deposited obscene materials in" from Article 134 (the General article) into the redesignated statute. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1032 would create a new section, Article 121a (Fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices). Article 121a is designed specifically to address the misuse of credit cards, debit cards, and other electronic payment technology, also known as "access devices." This article is modeled on 18 U.S.C. § 1029. It would provide a more effective and efficient means of prosecuting crimes committed with credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices than under current practice, in which such crimes are prosecuted as a larceny by false pretenses under Article 121 (Larceny and wrongful appropriation). When a government-issued credit card, debit card, or other access device is misused, the authorized sentence can be addressed in the Manual through the President's delegated powers under Article 56, which is the current sentencing approach for theft of government property under Article 121.

Section 1033 would create a new section, Article 121b (False pretenses to obtain services), and would migrate the offense of "False pretenses, obtaining services under" from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. This change would align the offense of false pretenses with the related UCMJ "larceny" offenses. Obtaining services by false pretenses is now well recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1034 would amend Article 122 (Robbery) to conform the statute to the offense of robbery under 18 U.S.C. § 2111. Article 122 prohibits the taking of anything of value from the person or in the presence of another, against his will, by means of force or violence or fear of immediate or future injury to his person or property or to the person or property of a family member or others present. Article 122 would be amended to align with 18 U.S.C. § 2111 by removing the words "with the intent to steal" from the statute, thereby eliminating the requirement to show that the accused intended to permanently deprive the victim of his property. The amendments would focus the statute on the true gravamen of this offense: the forcible taking of the property by the accused from the victim, in the presence of the victim.

Section 1035 would create a new section, Article 122a (Receiving stolen property), and would migrate the offense of "Stolen property: knowingly receiving, buying, concealing) from Article 134 (the General article) into the new statute. The offense of receiving stolen property is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1036 would amend Article 123 in its entirety and retitle the statute as "Offenses concerning Government computers." The new enumerated punitive article would be similar to 18 U.S.C. § 1030 (Fraud and related activity in connection with computers). Computers are used extensively throughout the armed forces, and this proposed offense would facilitate prosecuting computer-related offenses at courts-martial. The new statute would provide a UCMJ punitive article to address computer-related offenses where the gravity of the offense may make Article 92-level punishment inappropriately low, but the misconduct may not meet the criteria of existing punitive articles such as Espionage. The new offense is modeled on 18 U.S.C. § 1030, tailored to address the needs of military justice. It would apply only to persons subject to the UCMJ, and it would be directed only at U.S. government computers and U.S. government protected information.

Article 123 would not supersede or preempt the prosecution of 18 U.S.C. § 1030 or other Title 18 offenses under Article 134, Clause 3. Further, service and DoD regulations provide a broadly applicable and flexible means to prosecute less serious computer offenses under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), and the proposed offense does not supersede or preempt those regulations. Article 108 (Military property of United States—Loss, damage, destruction, or wrongful disposition) covers computer files that have been altered or damaged by the accused through deletion or destruction of computer files or programs for purposes of the offense of willfully destroying military property.

The Manual for Courts-Martial guidance for Article 123 will define and clarify terms, including the term "with an unauthorized purpose," which includes circumstances involving more than one unauthorized purpose, as well as circumstances involving an unauthorized purpose in conjunction with an authorized purpose. The guidance also will reference the UCMJ Article 1(15) definition for "classified information," and will define "protected information" to include information that has been designated as For Official Use Only (FOUO), or as Personally Identifiable Information (PII).

Section 1037 would create a new section, Article 124a (Bribery), and would migrate the offense of bribery from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating the offense of bribery to the new Article 124a aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and graft offenses under the UCMJ. Bribery is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1038 would create a new section, Article 124b (Graft), and would migrate the offense of graft from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating the offense of graft to the new Article 124b aligns the offense with the relocated fraud and bribery offenses under the UCMJ. Graft is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1039 would migrate the offense of "Kidnapping" from Article 134 (the General article) to the redesignated Article 125 (Kidnapping). The offense of kidnapping is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality. The removal of sodomy from Article 125 conforms the statute to the proposed treatment of the offense of forcible sodomy under Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally) and the proposal to provide comprehensive guidance on the treatment of animal abuse offenses, including bestiality, under Article 134.

Section 1040 would migrate the offense of "Burning with intent to defraud" from Article 134 (the General article) to redesignated Article 126 (Arson; burning property with intent to defraud). Article 126 currently prohibits the willful and malicious burning or setting on fire of a dwelling or other structure. Article 126 sets out two forms of aggravated arson and one form of simple arson. The offense of burning with intent to defraud is similar to those offenses and is itself a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1041 would amend Article 128 (Assault) to employ a standard that focuses attention on the malicious intent of the accused rather than the speculative "likelihood" of the activity actually resulting in harm, consistent with federal civilian practice.

This section also would migrate the offense of "Assault—with intent to commit murder, voluntary manslaughter, rape, robbery, sodomy, arson, burglary, or housebreaking" from Article 134 (the General article) to Article 128. The offense of assault with intent to commit a serious felony is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1042 would amend Article 129 and retitle the statute as "Burglary; unlawful entry." In the amended statute, the common-law "personal dwelling" and "nighttime" elements would be removed to align Article 129 with the majority rule reflected in federal and state law. As part of the realignment of closely related offenses, the offense of "Housebreaking" would be incorporated into Article 129.

The offense of "Unlawful entry" would migrate as a separate subsection from Article 134 (the General article). Illegally accessing someone else's property is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense of unlawful entry does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1043 would redesignate Article 120a (Stalking) as Article 130, and would update current law to address cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners. The proposed amendments would continue to address stalking activity involving a broad range of misconduct including, but not limited to, sexual offenses. The redesignated stalking statute would not preempt service regulations that specify additional types of misconduct that may be punishable at court-martial, including under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), nor would it preempt other forms of misconduct from being prosecuted under other appropriate Articles, such as under Article 134 (General article). These uniquely military offenses are available to address similar misconduct that, for example, causes substantial emotional distress or targets professional reputation.

Section 1044 would create a new section, Article 131a (Subornation of perjury), and would migrate the offense of "Perjury: subornation of" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. Migrating this offense would place it alongside similar offenses in the UCMJ. The offense of suborning perjury is a well-recognized concept in criminal law as it corrupts the trial process and interferes with the administration of justice. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1045 would create a new section, Article 131b (Obstructing justice), and would migrate the offense of "Obstructing justice" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. The offense of obstructing justice is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1046 would create a new section, Article 131c (Misprision of serious offense), and would migrate the offense of "Misprision of serious offense" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1047 would create a new section, Article 131d (Wrongful refusal to testify), and would migrate the offense of "Testify: wrongful refusal" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1048 would create a new section, Article 131e (Prevention of authorized seizure of property), and would migrate the offense of "Seizure: destruction, removal, or disposal of property to prevent" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. This offense is a well-recognized in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

Section 1049 would create a new section, Article 131g (Wrongful interference with adverse administrative proceeding), and would migrate the offense of "Wrongful interference with an adverse administrative proceeding" from Article 134 (the General article) to the new statute. The administrative proceedings addressed by this offense would include any administrative proceeding or action initiated against a servicemember that could lead to discharge, loss of special or incentive pay, administrative reduction in grade, loss of a security clearance, bar to reenlistment, or reclassification. The offense is a well-recognized concept in criminal law. Accordingly, the offense does not need to rely upon the "terminal element" of Article 134 (that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting) as the basis for its criminality.

If, however, a servicemember wrongfully interferes with an administrative proceeding not addressed under this offense, and that interference takes place under circumstances that are prejudicial to good order and discipline or service discrediting, the new Article 131g is not intended to preempt prosecution for wrongful interference in those other administrative proceedings under clauses 1 or 2 of Article 134.

Section 1050 would amend Article 132 in its entirety and retitle the statute as "Retaliation." This new offense would provide added protection for witnesses, victims, and persons who report or plan to report a criminal offense to law enforcement or military authority. Article 132 would not preempt service regulations that specify additional types of retaliatory conduct that may be punishable at court-martial under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation), nor would it preempt other forms of retaliatory conduct from being prosecuted under other appropriate Articles, such as Article 109 (destruction of property), Article 93 (Cruelty and maltreatment), Article 128 (Assault), Article 131b (Obstructing justice), Article 130 (Stalking), or Article 134 (General article).

Section 1051 would amend Article 134, the General article, to cover all non-capital federal crimes of general applicability under clause 3, regardless of where the federal crime is committed. This change would make military practice uniform throughout the world and would better align it with the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3261.

Section 1052 provides the amended table of sections for the beginning of Subchapter X, the punitive articles, reflecting all proposed new sections and proposed amendments to section headings.

TITLE XI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 1101 would amend Article 135 (Courts of inquiry) to provide individuals employed by the Department of Homeland Security, the department under which the Coast Guard operates, the right to be designated as parties in interest when they have a direct interest in the subject of a court of inquiry convened under Article 135. This change would align the rights of employees of the Department of Homeland Security with the rights of employees of the Department of Defense, ensuring consistent application of this statute for all military services.

Section 1102 would make a technical amendment to Article 136 (Authority to administer oaths and to act as notary) to remove from the section heading the authority to act as a notary, which is not provided for in the text of the statute.

Section 1103 would amend Article 137 (Articles to be explained) to require that officers, in addition to enlisted personnel, receive training on the UCMJ upon entry to service, and periodically thereafter. The amendments would provide for specific military justice training for military commanders and convening authorities, and would require the Secretary of Defense to prescribe regulations for additional specialized training on the UCMJ for combatant commanders and commanders of combined commands. Article 137(d), as amended, would require the Secretary of Defense to maintain an electronic version of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial that would be updated periodically and made available on the Internet for review by servicemembers and the public.

*Section 1104(*a) would create a new section, Article 140a (Case management; data collection, and accessibility), which would require the Secretary of Defense to prescribe uniform standards and criteria for case processing and management, military justice data collection, production and distribution of records of trial, and access to case information. The purpose of this section is to enhance the management of cases, the collection of data necessary for evaluation and analysis, and to provide appropriate public access to military justice information at all stages of court-martial proceedings. At a minimum, the system developed for implementation should permit timely and appropriate access to filings, objections, instructions, and judicial rulings at the trial and appellate level, and to actions at trial and in subsequent proceedings concerning the findings and sentences of courts-martial.

Section 1104(b) provides the timeline for implementation of Section 1104(a). In order to provide appropriate time for implementation, this section would require promulgation of standards by the Secretary of Defense not later than two years after enactment of Section 1104, with an effective date for such standards not later than four years after enactment.

TITLE XII—MILITARY JUSTICE REVIEW PANEL AND ANNUAL REPORTS

Section 1201 would amend Article 146 (Code committee) and retitle the statute as "Military Justice Review Panel." The Military Justice Review Panel would replace the Code Committee. The Military Justice Review Panel would be an independent, blue ribbon panel of experts tasked to conduct a periodic evaluation of military justice practices and procedures on a regular basis, thereby enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the UCMJ and the Code's implementing regulations.

The proposed Military Justice Review Panel would be composed of thirteen members. Each of the following officials would select one person to serve on the Panel: the Secretary of Defense (in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security), the Attorney General, the Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. The remaining members of the Panel would be selected by the Secretary of Defense based upon the recommendations of each of the following: the chairman and ranking minority member of the House Armed Services Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The Secretary of Defense would designate one member as the Chair; the Panel would have a full-time staff.

The Panel would issue its first report four years after the effective date of the legislation, focusing on the implementation of any recent amendments to the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Eight years after the effective date of the legislation, the Panel would issue its first comprehensive review of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Thereafter, the Panel would issue comprehensive reports every eight years. Within each eight year cycle, the Panel would issue targeted reports at the mid-point of each cycle, and could issue additional reports on matters referred to the Panel by the Secretary of Defense or Congress.

This proposal is based on the concept that periodic review needs to be scheduled on a regular basis, but that it should not be so frequent that the constant process of review and change becomes more disruptive than helpful to judges and lawyers who must have a degree of stability in order to engage in effective practice. Accordingly, the comprehensive reviews are scheduled on an eight-year schedule.

This proposal also relies on the expectation that the Joint Service Committee will continue to conduct its vital role within the executive branch addressing the type of targeted adjustments in law and regulation that are required on a more frequent basis to address specific issues in the law.

Section 1202 would create a new section, Article 146a (Annual reports), to retain the valuable informational aspects of the annual reports issued individually by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Judge Advocates General, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. The proposal anticipates that the individual reports will be compiled into a single volume using the procedures currently employed to combine individual reports into a consolidated report under the present version of Article 146.

TITLE XIII—CONFORMING AMENDMENTS AND EFFECTIVE DATES

Section 1301 contains 25 conforming amendments to the tables of sections necessitated by proposed amendments to section titles.

Section 1302 establishes the effective date of amendments contained in the legislation. The amendments would become effective on the first day of the first month that begins a year after enactment, subject to exceptions for ongoing proceedings, prior offenses, and specific effective dates within the bill.

MEMORANDUM FOR SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

SUBJECT: (U) Recommendation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with respect to a Holistic Review of the Uniform Code of Military Justice

1. [redacted] During a recent Tank session on Sexual Assault Prevention and Response, the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) discussed the current state of the military justice system.

2. [redacted] The U.S. Armed Forces operated under the Articles of War from 1775 until 1950. In 1950, President Truman signed the first Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) into law. We noted that the last comprehensive review and update of the UCMJ took place in 1984. Much has changed since then, to include the end of the Cold War, the successful integration of the All-Volunteer Force, and the enactment of the Goldwater-Nichols Act of 1986. The JCS concluded that, given the changes in the force and society since 1984, a DOD-led holistic review of the UCMJ and the military justice system would be appropriate.

3. [redacted] Accordingly, the JCS and I recommend that you direct the Department of Defense General Counsel to conduct a comprehensive, holistic review of the UCMJ and the military justice system. This proposal should not be taken to signal a sense among the JCS that the UCMJ has proved inadequate to its purpose, or as a measure intended to forestall criticism of the manner in which any case or cases are handled within the military justice system. The review is solely intended to ensure that our system most effectively and efficiently does justice consistent with due process and good order and discipline. The JCS recognizes that such a review would be broader than the work ongoing with the 576 Response Systems Panel and that the Services will need to support this holistic review by providing military justice experts for extended periods of time.

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

SUBJECT: Comprehensive Review of the Uniform Code of Military Justice

As proposed by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the other members of the Joint Chiefs, I direct the General Counsel to conduct a comprehensive review of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and the military justice system with support from military justice experts provided by the Services.

Such a comprehensive review is appropriate given the many amendments to the UCMJ since the Military Justice Act of 1983 and to the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM) since 1984. The review should include an analysis of not only the UCMJ, but also its implementation through the MCM and Service regulations. The review should consider any report and recommendations issued by the Response Systems Panel. I direct that a report including a recommendation for any appropriate amendments to the UCMJ be submitted within 12 months and that a second report recommending any appropriate amendments to the MCM be submitted within 18 months. The General Counsel will submit an Issue Nomination to the Director, Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation, describing the additional resources necessary for this review.

APPENDIX C:
Terms of Reference with Addendum dated March 12, 2014

Terms of Reference for Military Justice Review Committee

January 2014

1. Objectives and Scope. These Terms of Reference set forth the objectives for the Secretary of Defense-directed comprehensive review of the military justice system, including the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM), and implementing Service regulations. The review will be conducted by the Military Justice Review Committee (MJRC). The MJRC will submit a report including recommended UCMJ amendments no later than October 20, 2014. The MJRC will submit a second report including recommended MCM amendments no later than April 20, 2015.

2. Background.

a. The last time our system of military justice underwent a comprehensive review was in 1984. That was before passage of the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986, which resulted in fundamental changes to the organization of the Department of Defense and the operation of U.S. military forces. It was also before the terrorist attacks of 9/11, years of ensuing armed conflict, and the current security environment. Indeed, much has changed over the past 30 years, from advancements in information and communications technologies to efforts to address issues related to gender, sexual orientation and sexual assault. While there have been numerous amendments to the Uniform Code of Military Justice in response to discrete challenges, it has been a very long time since the Department has undertaken to examine and update the Code in a systematic fashion.

b. A comprehensive review of the military justice system was proposed by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the other members of the Joint Chiefs in an August 5, 2013, memorandum to the Secretary of Defense. This memorandum stated, in part, that "the Services will need to support this holistic review by providing military justice experts for extended periods of time."

c. On September 18, 2013, the Acting General Counsel recommended that the Secretary of Defense direct the General Counsel to conduct a comprehensive review of the military justice system with support from military justice experts provided by the Services. The Acting General Counsel estimated that such a review "would require a budget estimated at $2.35 to $2.95 million over the review's 18-month timespan and would require extensive ongoing internal coordination among the Military Departments and external coordination with the Department of Homeland Security." The Acting General Counsel also noted that the Services have a limited ability to contribute personnel due to increased demands on their military justice resources and severe financial constraints affecting the Services. As a result, conducting a comprehensive review of the military justice system "may require extensive use of DoD civilian attorneys (including new hires)."

d. Along with his recommendation, the Acting General Counsel submitted a budget justification to the Secretary of Defense that outlined the estimated costs and requirements for the proposed review, to include numbers of personnel and their qualifications. The budget justification assumed a staff of 22 DoD personnel (the Coast Guard would be invited to provide up to three additional personnel). The budget justification also proposed that any new hires from outside the government, including the project's director, would be hired as full-time Highly Qualified Experts (HQE), and that the MJRC's staff would be co-located.

e. On October 18, 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed the General Counsel "to conduct a comprehensive review of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and military justice system with support from military justice experts provided by the Services." He directed that the review include "an analysis of not only the UCMJ, but also its implementation through the [Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM)] and Service regulations." He further directed that "a report including a recommendation for any appropriate amendments to the UCMJ be submitted within 12 months and that a second report recommending any appropriate amendments to the MCM be submitted within 18 months."

3. Committee and Advisors.

a. MJRC Chairman. The General Counsel will designate a Chairman of the MJRC. That Chairman will be a civilian employee of the United States Government and may be hired for that purpose as an HQE or in another appropriate status. The Chairman will perform his duties subject to the direction of the General Counsel.

b. MJRC Members. The General Counsel will designate the members of the MJRC, who will be either civilian employees of the United States Government or military personnel. Each Military Service within DoD will nominate at least one military justice expert in the grade of O-6 or O-5, two judge advocates in the grade of O-4 or O-3, and one enlisted member in the grade of E-5 or higher with an MOS or AFSC in the legal field to be detailed to the MJRC. The Coast Guard will be invited to nominate a military justice expert in the grade of O-6 or O-5 and one or two judge advocates in the grade of O-4 or O-3 to be detailed to the MJRC. Non-judge advocate military personnel and/or retired military personnel (who will be recalled to active duty or employed as HQEs or in another appropriate civilian status) may also be designated as members of the MJRC. An attorney in the Office of the Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy) will serve as Staff Director of the MJRC.

c. Senior Advisors. The General Counsel may appoint one or more Senior Advisors to support the MJRC. Such a Senior Advisor may be hired for that purpose as an HQE or provided another appropriate status. If one or more of those Senior Advisors is not a full-time government employee or permanent part-time employee, he or she will be consulted on an individual basis only. The Chairman will consult with any such Senior Advisors as the Chairman deems appropriate.

d. Department of Justice Advisor. The General Counsel of the Department of Defense will request the Department of Justice to designate an advisor to the MJRC who is an expert in the litigation of criminal trials in United States district courts.

4. Guiding Principles. The MJRC will apply the following guiding principles to the comprehensive review:

a. Use the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

b. Where they differ with existing military justice practice, consider the extent to which the principles of law and the rules of procedure and evidence used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts should be incorporated into military justice practice.

c. To the extent practicable, UCMJ articles and MCM provisions should apply uniformly across the Military Services.

d. Consider any recommendations, proposals, or analysis relating to military justice issued by the Response Systems Panel established under Section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, Pub. L. No. 112-239, 126 Stat. 1632, 1760 (2013).

e. Consider, as appropriate, the recommendations, proposals, and analysis in the report of the Defense Legal Policy Board, including the report of that Board's Subcommittee on Military Justice in Combat Zones.

5. Process.

a. The MJRC will consider such information and perform such analysis as it deems appropriate. The expectation is that the judge advocates on the MJRC will have experience as military judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, and victim's counsel, or access to others in their organizations with those perspectives. They may also draw on their experience as staff judge advocates advising military commanders as convening authorities. In addition, at a point in the review process where the Chairman believes it would be most useful, the MJRC will solicit the views of general and flag officers with experience as general court-martial convening authorities. The Chairman may ask the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (CJCS Legal Counsel) to assist in convening a meeting or meetings with a suitable group of officers for this purpose.

b. The MJRC will coordinate proposed amendments to either the UCMJ or MCM on an ongoing "rolling" basis. The goal of this coordination process will be to achieve consensus on proposed reforms or identify points of disagreement, so that the MJRC will know whether a proposal has been accepted or rejected before dealing with other UCMJ articles or MCM provisions that may be affected by that proposal.

c. The Chairman has the sole discretion and authority to forward any proposal for coordination. Such coordination will be with the Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy), the Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the CJCS Legal Counsel. The Chairman will determine the frequency and level of detail with which such proposals will be forwarded for coordination. The Chairman may group related proposed changes for this coordination process. The Chairman should exercise this discretion in a manner that will allow final decisions to be made on major reform proposals at an early point in the review process.

d. A failure to concur or non-concur within seven duty days of receipt of a request for concurrence will be deemed to be a concurrence unless, upon request, the Chairman extends the period for concurrence. Any proposal that does not receive unanimous concurrence or non-concurrence will be presented to the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, and, as appropriate, via the General Counsel to the Secretary of Defense or Deputy Secretary of Defense for resolution.

6. Suspense Dates The MJRC will submit to the General Counsel a report including recommended UCMJ amendments no later than September 22, 2014. The MJRC will submit to the General Counsel a second report including recommended MCM amendments no later than March 20, 2015.

7. Support.

a. The members of the MJRC will be co-located at One Liberty Center, 875 North Randolph Street, Arlington, VA 22203.

b. The Office of General Counsel will coordinate human resources, office/facilities, and other support for the MJRC.

c. The Military Departments and other DoD Components will provide full support to the MJRC with detailed personnel, information (including but not limited to review of documents and interviews of personnel), analytical capacity as determined necessary, and any other support as requested.

Addendum to the January 24, 2014 "Terms of Reference for Military Justice Review Committee"

1. The name of the organization conducting the Secretary of Defense-directed comprehensive review of the military justice system is the Military Justice Review Group. That word "Group" is substituted for the word "Committee" at each point the latter appears in the January 24, 2014 Terms of Reference. The abbreviation "MJRG" is substituted for "MJRC" at each point the latter appears in the January 24, 2014 Terms of Reference.

2. The title of the head of the Military Justice Review Group is Director. The word "Director" is substituted for "Chairman" at each point the latter appears in paragraphs 3, 5.c., and 5.d of the January 24, 2014 Terms of Reference. Paragraph 5.a is revised to read as follows:

a. The MJRG will consider such information and perform such analysis as it deems appropriate. The expectation is that the judge advocates on the MJRG will have experience as military judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, and victim's counsel, or access to others in their organizations with those perspectives. They may also draw on their experience as staff judge advocates advising military commanders as convening authorities. In addition, at a point in the review process where the Director believes it would be most useful, the MJRG will consult with general and flag officers who have had experience as general court-martial convening authorities. The Director may ask the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (CJCS Legal Counsel) to assist in convening a meeting or meetings with a suitable group of officers for this purpose.

MEMORANDUM FOR DIRECTOR, MILITARY JUSTICE REVIEW GROUP

SUBJECT: Recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel

On August 21, 2014, the Secretary of Defense directed that the Department review the recommendations made by the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel to assess whether the recommendations should be approved, approved in part, or disapproved. Our office has reviewed the recommendations and has identified 14 recommendations that could benefit from an assessment by the Military Justice Review Group.

As you continue to review the military justice system, I request that you consider the 14 recommendations as part of your review. The 14 recommendations are attached.

I am grateful for the Military Justice Review Group's expertise and the important work it is performing in analyzing and proposing improvements to the military justice system.

Attachment:
As stated

RSP Recommendation 37: Congress not further limit the authority under the UCMJ to refer charges for sexual assault crimes to trial by court-martial beyond the recent amendments to the UCMJ and DoD policy.

RSP Recommendation 39: Congress repeal Section 1744 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, which requires a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed by a higher general court-martial convening authority or the Service Secretary, depending on the circumstances, due to the real or perceived undue pressure it creates on staff judge advocates to recommend referral, and on convening authorities to refer, in situations where referral does not serve the interests of victims or justice.

RSP Recommendation 40: If Congress does not repeal Section 1744 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, and the requirement for elevated review of non-referred case files continues, the Secretary of Defense direct a standard format be developed for declining prosecution in a case, modeled after the contents of civilian jurisdiction declination statements or letters. The DoD should coordinate with the Department of Justice, or with state jurisdictions that are more familiar with the sensitive nature of sexual assault cases, to develop a standard format for use by all Services. Any such form should require a sufficient explanation without providing too much detail so as to ensure the written reason for declination to prosecute does not jeopardize the possibility of a future prosecution or contain victim-blaming language.

RSP Recommendation 41: Congress not enact Section 2 of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014, which would require the next higher convening authority or Service Secretary to review a case if the senior trial counsel disagreed with the staff judge advocate's recommendation against referral or the convening authority's decision not to refer one of these sexual assault cases. The staff judge advocate is the general court-martial convening authority's legal advisor on military justice matters; there is no evidence that inserting the senior trial counsel into the process will enhance the fair administration of military justice.

RSP Recommendation 42: Congress not adopt additional amendments to Article 60 of the UCMJ beyond the significant limits on discretion already adopted, and the President should not impose additional limits to the post-trial authority of convening authorities.

RSP Recommendation 43: Congress amend Section 1702(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 to allow convening authorities to grant clemency as formerly permitted under the UCMJ to protect dependents of convicted Service members by relieving them of the burden of automatic and adjudged forfeitures.

RSP Recommendation 44: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to extend the opportunity for special victim counsel representation, although not necessarily the same special victim counsel, to a victim so long as a right of the victim exists and is at issue.

RSP Recommendation 113: The Judicial Proceedings Panel and Joint Service Committee consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120.

RSP Recommendation 114: Congress not enact Section 3(b) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014, which requires the convening authority to give "great weight" to a victim's preference where the sexual assault case be tried, in civilian or military court. The Services do not have control over the civilian justice system, and jurisdiction must be based on legal authority, not the victim's personal preferences, so this decision should remain within the discretion of the civilian prosecutor's office and the convening authority.

RSP Recommendation 115: The Judicial Proceedings Panel assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers.

RSP Recommendation 121: Congress should enact Section 3(g) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014 because it may increase victim confidence. Further changes to the military rules of evidence regarding character evidence are not necessary at this time.

RSP Recommendation 123: The Secretary of Defense recommend amendments to the Manual for Courts-Martial and UCMJ to impose sentences which require the sentencing authority to enumerate the specific sentence awarded for each offense and to impose sentences for multiple offenses consecutively or concurrently to the President and Congress, respectively.

RSP Recommendation 124: The Panel does not recommend the military adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases at this time.

RSP Recommendation 125: Congress not enact further mandatory minimum sentences in sexual assault cases at this time.

SUBJECT: Recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel

Over the past year, the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP) conducted a comprehensive review of the response systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate crimes involving adult sexual assault and related offenses. The RSP issued its report on June 27, 2014; the report contained 132 recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of such systems. The Secretary of Defense appreciates your efforts in supporting the work of the RSP by responding to numerous requests for information and making your personnel available to address questions. Now that the RSP has concluded its work, the Department must consider its recommendations. The work of the RSP affords a unique opportunity to consider the input from numerous subject matter experts in a broad range of disciplines, as well as victims, to inform our efforts to eradicate sexual assault from our ranks.

Please provide your views on whether to approve, approve in part, or disapprove each of the attached recommendations to the DoD General Counsel by September 5, 2014. The General Counsel should also refer the RSP's recommendations for assessment to the Military Justice Review Group and the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice, as appropriate. A tentative assignment of responsibility for implementing each recommendation (if approved) is included in the list of recommendations. Your coordination or comments on these tentative assignments should also be provided to the General Counsel by September 5, 2014. As the sponsor to the RSP, the General Counsel will consolidate the views provided and submit them with a proposed implementation plan to the Secretary of Defense for his consideration by October 8, 2014. Dear Chairmen, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit the report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP), fulfilling the requirements of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, Section 576. This report represents the culmination of our twelve-month review and assessment of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate adult sexual assault crimes in the military and our recommendations to improve the effectiveness of such systems.

In gathering the facts that form the basis for this report, the RSP held 14 days of public meetings and the RSP and its three subcommittees held an additional 65 subcommittee meetings and preparatory sessions, as well as site visits to several military installations and civilian agencies. During these meetings and site visits, we heard from military leaders, both officer and enlisted, active duty and retired; foreign military leaders; sexual assault survivors; sexual assault advocacy groups; DoD and civilian victim services personnel; military and civilian prosecutors and defense counsel; military and civilian victim counsel; academics and subject matter experts; Senators; and private citizens. We also received thousands of pages of documents from the Department of Defense, the Military Services, and civilian victim advocacy organizations in response to our requests for information.

We make a total of 132 recommendations in the areas of victim services; victim rights; the role of the commander in the military justice process; and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assault. Some of our recommendations represent relatively minor adjustments to already existing programs, but some recommendations represent fundamentally different approaches to current programs and processes. The wealth of evidence we have gathered over the course of the last year gives us a high degree of confidence in our conclusions and recommendations. In drafting our report and recommendations, we have been mindful to balance the need to increase victim confidence in the system and victim rights with the rights of those accused of sexual assault.

The RSP expresses sincere appreciation to everyone who contributed to this report. We especially want to thank the sexual assault survivors who participated in our meetings, provided public comment, and willingly told their very personal stories in an effort to help others.

Respectfully submitted,

Honorable Barbara S. Jones, Chair

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE RESPONSE SYSTEMS PANEL

Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to establish the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("Response Systems Panel" or "Panel") to conduct a twelve-month independent review and assessment of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate crimes involving adult sexual assault and related offenses for the purpose of developing recommendations regarding how to improve the effectiveness of such systems. The Secretary of Defense appointed five members to the Response Systems Panel, and the Chairperson and Ranking Members of the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives each appointed one member. The Honorable Barbara S. Jones (Retired) served as the Panel's chair. The nine-member Panel held its first public meeting on June 27, 2013.

Congress directed the Panel to address fifteen objectives; the Acting General Counsel for the Department of Defense requested the Panel address one additional objective:

- Using criteria the panel considers appropriate, an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the systems, including the administration of the Uniform Code of the Military Justice (UCMJ), and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes during the period 2007 through 2011;

- A comparison of military and civilian systems for the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes. This comparison shall include an assessment of differences in providing support and protection to victims and the identification of civilian best practices that may be incorporated into any phase of the military system;

- An assessment of advisory sentencing guidelines used in civilian courts in adult sexual assault cases and whether it would be advisable to promulgate sentencing guidelines for use in courts-martial;

- An assessment of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, including their experience in defending or prosecuting adult sexual assault crimes and related offenses, as compared to prosecution and defense counsel for similar cases in the Federal and State court systems;

- An assessment and comparison of military court-martial conviction rates with those in the Federal and State courts and the reasons for any differences;

- An assessment of the roles and effectiveness of commanders at all levels in preventing sexual assaults and responding to reports of sexual assault;

- An assessment of the strengths and weakness of proposed legislative initiatives to modify the current role of commanders in the administration of military justice and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crime;

- An assessment of the adequacy of the systems and procedures to support and protect victims in all phases of the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes, including whether victims are provided the rights afforded by Section 3771 of Title 18, United States Code, Department of Defense Directive 1030.1, and Department of Defense Instruction 1030.2;

- An assessment of the impact, if any, that removing from the chain of command any disposition authority regarding charges preferred under the UCMJ, would have on overall reporting and prosecution of sexual assault cases;

- An assessment regarding whether the roles, responsibilities, and authorities of Special Victims' Counsel to provide legal assistance to victims of alleged sex-related offenses should be expanded to include legal standing to represent the victim during investigative and military justice proceedings in connection with the prosecution of the offense;

- An assessment of the feasibility and appropriateness of extending to victims of crimes covered by the UCMJ the right afforded a crime victim in civilian criminal legal proceedings under subsection 17 (a)(4) of Section 3771 of Title 18, United States Code, and the legal standing to seek enforcement of crime victim rights provided by subsection (d) of such section;

- An assessment of the means by which the name, if known, and other necessary identifying information of an alleged offender that is collected as part of a restricted report of a sexual assault could be compiled into a protected searchable database accessible only to military criminal investigators, sexual assault response coordinators, or other appropriate personnel only for the purposes of identifying individuals who are subjects of multiple accusations of sexual assault and encouraging victims to make an unrestricted report of sexual assault in those cases in order to facilitate increased prosecutions, particularly of serial offenders;

- An assessment of the opportunities for clemency provided in the military and civilian systems, the appropriateness of clemency proceedings in the military system, the manner in which clemency is used in the military system, and whether clemency in the military justice system could be reserved until the end of the appeals process;

- An assessment of whether the Department of Defense should promulgate, and ensure the understanding of and compliance with, a formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response, as a means for addressing those issues within the Armed Forces. If the response systems panel recommends such a formal statement, the response systems panel shall provide key elements or principles that should be included in the formal statement;

- Study the advisability of adopting mandatory minimum sentences for the most serious sexual assault offenses, including rape and sodomy and assess the possible collateral consequences of such mandatory minimum sentences including likely effects on sexual assault reporting, the ratio of guilty pleas to contested cases, and conviction rates; and

- Such other matters and materials the panel considers appropriate.

To assist the Panel in accomplishing these tasks, the Secretary of Defense, at the request of the Chair, established three subcommittees that helped to assess different aspects of the Panel's charter: Comparative Systems, Role of the Commander, and Victim Services. The Panel and subcommittees held 79 days of meetings, heard from more than 600 witnesses, and reviewed thousands of pages of documents and submissions. The subcommittees presented their reports and recommendations to the Panel for its consideration in May 2014, and the Panel deliberated, arriving at 132 recommendations.

OVERVIEW OF PANEL RECOMMENDATIONS

Based on a year-long comprehensive review and assessment of both military and civilian response systems to adult sexual assault, the Panel's recommendations fall into seven major areas:

1. Measuring the Scope of Sexual Assault in the Military and Civilian Communities;
2. Assessing the Role of the Commander: Commander Responsibility and Accountability, Sexual Assault Prevention, and the Commander as Convening Authority;
3. Strengthening the Special Victim Counsel Program, Victim Rights, Support, and Services;
4. Ensuring Fairness and Due Process to those Suspected or Accused of Sexual Assault;
5. Improving Military Justice Procedures;
6. Sustaining and Adequately Funding Promising Department of Defense Programs and Initiatives; and
7. Conducting Independent Audits and Assessments.

MEASURING THE SCOPE OF SEXUAL ASSAULT IN THE MILITARY AND CIVILIAN COMMUNITIES

Article 120 of the UCMJ sets forth the major criminal sexual violence offenses proscribed by military law, which Congress substantially overhauled twice since 2006. The major criminal sexual violence offenses in the current version of Article 120 include the penetrative offenses of rape and sexual assault and the non-penetrative contact offenses of aggravated sexual contact and abusive sexual contact. In addition, Article 125 of the UCMJ prohibits forcible sodomy, and Article 80 of the UCMJ proscribes attempts to commit these offenses.

Measuring the Scope of Sexual Assault in the Military

Before determining the most effective legal and policy responses to sexual assault in the military, it is crucial to understand the scope of the problem. Currently, the Department of Defense (DoD) and Congress rely on the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (WGRA) to estimate the prevalence—the number of individuals who have been victimized at least once—of sexual assault within the military.

This biannual survey collects a large amount of data that is useful public health information. If used correctly, this data can aid leaders in better evaluating readiness, assessing the health of the force, identifying patterns and trends in behavior, directing efforts in prevention of and response to sexual assault and sexual harassment across the force, and assessing victim satisfaction.

However, this survey is not meant to—and does not—accurately reflect the number of sexual assault incidents that occur in a given year, nor can it be used to extrapolate crime victimization data. For example, the definition of unwanted sexual contact used in the survey covers a wide range of conduct that may not rise to the level of a crime.

To more accurately assess the actual number of unreported sexual assault crimes in the military, the Panel recommends the DoD develop and implement a military crime victimization survey, in coordination with the Bureau of Justice Statistics, that relies on the best available research methods. Such a survey would adopt a criminal justice approach and would seek to account for unreported incidents of criminal sexual misconduct and measure the scope of unreported sexual offenses. This type of survey would provide data that can be more readily compared to other crime victimization surveys and potentially aid in the comparison of military and civilian crime statistics. Importantly, if implemented, the Secretary of Defense should direct that military crime victimization surveys use the UCMJ definitions of current penetrative sexual assault offenses, including rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these acts.

Civilian Communities

As noted above, Congress tasked the Response Systems Panel to compare civilian and military conviction rates of sexual assault cases. This proved difficult for several reasons. First, the offenses that fall within Article 120 of the UCMJ span a wide range of conduct, whereas many civilian jurisdictions use data that account for only felony-level crimes such as rape. Second, few civilian jurisdictions maintain or publish prosecution data on reported sexual assaults, and differences in disposition data make comparison difficult. The DoD data do not reflect disposition by specific offenses. For example, prosecution of a sexual assault offense may result in conviction of a non-sexual assault offense, and current data do not distinguish between the two. Third, procedures used to account for and resolve cases vary in the civilian sector and among the Services, so data is not truly comparable. The Panel learned that in some civilian jurisdictions, responding police officers or detectives can determine an allegation is "unfounded," that is, false or baseless, and close a case before a prosecutor ever receives it. In such instances, the case closed as "unfounded" is not accounted for in civilian prosecution rates.

In contrast, the Services track every reported sexual assault from report through disposition, including reports to authorized officials who are not affiliated with law enforcement agencies. In addition, the Services measure prosecution rates differently and follow different procedures for closing cases at the investigation stage. Because the military collects much more detailed data on every reported sexual assault than civilian jurisdictions, attempting to compare military and civilian prosecution rates for sexual assaults is difficult at best, and misleading at worst.

Congress and the Secretary of Defense should not measure success solely by comparing military and civilian prosecution and conviction rates. Based on its review, the Panel concludes the military's performance in addressing sexual assault crimes cannot be addressed solely by relying on military prosecution and conviction rates, or by comparing them to civilian prosecution and conviction rates. For a number of reasons, prosecuting a reported sexual assault may not be in the best interest of a particular victim or serve the ends of justice and good order and discipline.

However, to enable data comparison among the Services, and potentially with civilian jurisdictions, the Services should use a single, standardized methodology to track the number and rates of judicial or other dispositions in sexual assault cases, and to calculate prosecution and conviction rates across all the Services. Additionally, the Services should standardize the process for determining if a case is "unfounded" at the investigation stage. Only those reports of sexual assault that are determined to be false or baseless should be unfounded, and the Services should standardize the authority and processes for making those determinations.

ASSESSING THE ROLE OF THE COMMANDER: COMMANDER RESPONSIBILITY AND ACCOUNTABILITY, SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION, AND THE COMMANDER AS CONVENING AUTHORITY

Commander Responsibility and Accountability

Military commanders are essential to the prevention of sexual assault. Commanders lead their units and organizations in war and peace, and are responsible for ensuring mission readiness, including maintaining good order and discipline within their units. Commanders must establish organizational climates that are intolerant of the behaviors and beliefs that contribute to sexual assaults. When a sexual assault does occur, military commanders must lead decisive response efforts and ensure care for victims. They must also take appropriate administrative and criminal action against those determined to be offenders while respecting the due process rights of those suspected or accused of sexual assault. A commander's success or failure in fulfilling these responsibilities should be considered in his or her performance evaluation, as it directly reflects on the quality of a commander's leadership and effectiveness. It should also be weighed in promotion decisions and the officer's ability to advance in the Armed Services. The Department of Defense, the Services, and senior leaders must ensure all commanders understand their responsibilities, are held accountable, and fairly evaluated on their execution of these critical tasks.

Commanders must take the lead in implementing and overseeing DoD's prevention programs and strategies. But it is also important for all subordinate leaders, noncommissioned officers, and civilian supervisors to be held accountable and fairly evaluated on how they execute these critical duties. The Panel heard testimony from a number of victims that it was often subordinate leaders who perpetrated the sexual assault itself, ignored it when it was reported, or engaged in retaliation towards the victim afterwards. Training and accountability for these leaders is imperative. Experts and leaders agree that preventing sexual assaults and changing the attitudes and behaviors that contribute to these crimes is a primary responsibility for all leaders throughout the DoD.

Sexual Assault Prevention

Sexual assault prevention policies and requirements the DoD adopted since 2012 reflect its work with leading national experts and resources, including the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). Installation-level initiatives reflect prevention best practices.

The Department of Defense should continue to work with the CDC and other appropriate agencies to continue to improve its current efforts and to develop new and effective prevention strategies and programs. Specific focus areas for prevention strategies and programs should include the following:

- Male-on-Male Sexual Assault. The Secretary of Defense should direct DoD SAPRO and the Services to enhance their efforts to prevent and respond to male-on-male sexual assault.
    - Prevention efforts should ensure commanders directly acknowledge the potential for male-on-male sexual assault in their commands and directly confront the stigma associated with it.
    - Prevention efforts should also ensure Service members understand that sexually demeaning or humiliating behaviors that may have been minimized as hazing or labeled as "horseplay" in the past are not tolerated and may constitute punishable offenses.
    - DoD SAPRO should fund research and seek expert assistance to understand the risk and protective factors that are unique to male-on-male sexual assault in the military and should develop targeted prevention programs for male-on-male sexual assault offenses.

- Bystander Intervention. According to the CDC and leading sexual assault prevention research experts and organizations, effective bystander intervention programs encourage peer groups to guard against attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors that contribute to a climate in which sexual violence is more likely to occur. This includes language and behaviors such as sexist comments, sexually objectifying jokes, and vulgar gestures. The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries should direct DoD SAPRO and the Services, respectively, to review bystander intervention programs to ensure they do not rely upon common misconceptions or overgeneralized perceptions. In particular, programs should not overemphasize the problems created by serial rapists and other sexual "predators" and should also emphasize encouraging Service member attention and vigilance toward seemingly harmless attitudes and behaviors that increase the potential for sexual assault.

- Alcohol Mitigation. The Secretary of Defense should direct appropriate DoD authorities to work with researchers to determine how best to implement promising, evidence-based alcohol mitigation strategies (e.g., those that affect pricing, outlet density, and the availability of alcohol). The Secretary of Defense should ensure DoD's strategic policies emphasize these strategies and direct DoD SAPRO to coordinate with the Services to evaluate promising programs some local commanders have initiated to mitigate alcohol consumption.

- Prior Victimization. The Secretary of Defense should direct DoD SAPRO to evaluate development of risk-management programs directed toward populations with particular risk and protective factors that are associated with prior victimization. In particular, DoD SAPRO should work with researchers to determine to what extent prior sexual victimization increases Service members' risk for sexual assault in the military to develop effective programs to protect against re-victimization. In addition, the Secretary of Defense should direct DoD SAPRO to consult with the CDC and other appropriate agencies to develop and expand services for military members who experienced sexual abuse prior to joining the military, this should include developing strategies to encourage utilization of these services to protect survivors from further victimization and to help them to develop or maintain skills necessary to fully engage in military activities and requirements.

The Commander as Convening Authority

Significant attention in the public and policy debate about the military's sexual assault response efforts has focused on the role of commanders under the UCMJ, and more specifically on the authority assigned to designated senior commanders to convene courts-martial and refer criminal offenses for trial. Legislative proposals were made that Congress should dissolve the authority vested in senior commanders to convene courts-martial for sexual assault offenses, and in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA), Congress enacted several provisions limiting convening authority discretion. For example, Congress substantially reduced convening authorities' formerly unlimited discretion to grant clemency to Service members convicted of crimes under the UCMJ.

The Panel determined and concluded (with two members dissenting) that Congress should not further limit the authority of convening authorities under the UCMJ to refer charges for sexual assault crimes to trial by court-martial beyond the recent amendments to the UCMJ and DoD policy. After reviewing the practices of Allied militaries and available civilian statistics, and hearing from many witnesses, the Panel determined the evidence does not support a conclusion that removing convening authority from senior commanders will reduce the incidence of sexual assault, increase reporting of sexual assaults, or improve the quality of investigations and prosecutions of sexual assault cases in the Armed Forces. In addition, proposals for systemic changes to the military justice system should be considered carefully in the context of the many changes that have recently been made to the form and function of the military justice system. The numerous and substantive changes recently enacted require time to be implemented and then assessed prior to enacting additional reforms.

At the same time, the Panel recommends Congress repeal Section 1744 of the FY14 NDAA, and Congress not enact Section 2 of the Victims Protection Act of 2014, both of which require higher-level review of a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases to trial. The Panel believes these sections may cause undue pressure on convening authorities and their legal advisors to refer cases to trial in situations where referral does not serve the interests of victims or justice. Even if convening authorities are not affected by these provisions, they create the perception that decisions not to refer such cases are not favored.

STRENGTHENING THE SPECIAL VICTIM COUNSEL PROGRAM, VICTIM RIGHTS, SUPPORT, AND SERVICES

Special Victim Counsel

Victim rights, support, and services are essential components to addressing sexual assault in the military and throughout society. Congress directed the Panel to assess the adequacy of military systems and procedures to support and protect sexual assault victims and to compare military and civilian systems for victim support. Having done this, the Panel finds that the military uses best practices in its support of victims and that these systems compare favorably with the civilian systems. Most notably, the Services' Special Victim Counsel Programs, begun in 2013, offer an attorney free of charge to every Service member who is a victim of sexual assault to represent him or her throughout the process. This program goes far beyond any currently found in civilian jurisdictions, state or federal.

Special victim counsel will be especially important in advising sexual assault victims of their rights under the newly adopted Article 6b of the UCMJ, which affords military crime victims many of the same rights as those afforded to victims in civilian criminal proceedings under the Crime Victims' Rights Act (CVRA). The Panel fully endorses the program, and encourages improving and expanding it, including the following recommendations:

First, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to extend the opportunity for special victim counsel representation to a victim so long as a right of the victim exists and is at issue, even if it is not necessarily the same special victim counsel. Second, the Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Service Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information, through counsel, that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right. Third, the Manual for Courts-Martial should clarify that a victim's right to be heard includes the right to be heard on legal issues through counsel. Fourth, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to implement additional selection criteria for their individual Special Victim Counsel programs to require that counsel have appropriate trial experience, whenever possible, prior to being selected as special victim counsel. Finally, the Secretary of Defense should direct the creation and implementation of mechanisms, where not currently in place, requiring trial counsel to convey the victim's specific concerns and preferences to the convening authority regarding case disposition. These procedures should take into account the convening authority's role in the disposition of cases under the military justice system and create a process more analogous to a victim's right to confer with a prosecutor under the CVRA.

Victim Rights

In order to align victims' rights in the military with those under the federal CVRA, as an initial matter, the Panel recommends the Secretary clarify that victims have legal standing to enforce their rights throughout the court-martial process. Specifically, the Panel recommends that a victim have the right be heard regarding pretrial agreements or plea negotiations and the right to make an unsworn victim impact statement at a sentencing hearing. Similarly, the Panel recommends that trial counsel (military prosecutors) be required to verify, on the record, they have afforded victims their rights under statute and policy.

Victim Support

Just as in the civilian population, sexual assaults in the military remain chronically underreported when compared to reporting rates for other forms of violent crime. However, sexual assault victims in the military face certain barriers to reporting that do not exist in the civilian world. Primarily, military victims face the possibility of prosecution and punishment for their own minor collateral misconduct associated with their assault. Examples include underage drinking, adultery, drug use, or dereliction of duty. Such conduct is rarely prosecuted – or may not even be criminal – in the civilian system. Military victims also may fear negative career consequences will result from their reporting an incident. The DoD must address these barriers, and the Secretary of Defense should direct an expedited study of low-level collateral misconduct in sexual assault cases and examine whether a standardized procedure for granting limited immunity for victims should be implemented in the future.

The Panel also recommends that victims who make restricted reports be permitted to speak with military investigators without the report automatically becoming unrestricted and triggering a law enforcement investigation. Although investigators should be prohibited from using any information they obtain if it would result in the disclosure of the victim's identity, the additional information may serve as useful criminal intelligence data in identifying serial offenders and in other circumstances. In addition, the Service Secretaries should create a means by which sexual assault victims who file restricted reports may request an expedited transfer without their reports automatically becoming unrestricted.

ENSURING FAIRNESS AND DUE PROCESS TO THOSE SUSPECTED OR ACCUSED OF SEXUAL ASSAULT

An allegation of sexual assault against a Service member has profound impacts even absent a prosecution and conviction. Effective response systems to sexual assault in the military require appropriate measures to hold offenders accountable. It is equally important, however, to ensure that the rights of those Service members who are suspected or accused of sexual assault are not denigrated and the presumption of innocence is not degraded. The Panel makes several recommendations relating to fairness and due process that are essential to securing the confidence in the military justice system of both victim and accused Service members, the Armed Forces as a whole, and the public.

First, Service members who are suspected or accused of these crimes should be represented by adequately trained military defense counsel with experienced supervisory oversight. Those accused must continue to have access to witnesses and other resources for their defense as well as impartial panels (military juries) and military judges to determine guilt or innocence and adjudge punishments appropriate under the individual circumstances of each case. Case disposition decisions and courts-martial results must not be corrupted or tainted by unlawful command influence, long recognized as the "mortal enemy of military justice."

Second, the Panel seeks to correct an obvious imbalance between prosecution and defense resources, particularly in light of the substantial additional efforts in recent years to enhance prosecution capabilities. The Secretary of Defense should direct the Services provide independent, deployable defense investigators in order to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the defense mission and the fair administration of justice.

Third, the Service Secretaries should ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced with funding and personnel. This includes defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts. In addition, the Service Judge Advocates Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should review military defense counsel training for adult sexual assault cases to ensure funding of defense training opportunities is on par with that of trial counsel.

Fourth, the Service Judge Advocates General and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should sustain and broaden the emphasis on developing and maintaining shared resources, expertise, and experience in prosecuting and defending adult sexual assault crimes.

Finally, the Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries should ensure prevention programs address concerns about unlawful command influence. In particular, commanders and leaders must ensure sexual assault prevention and response training programs and other initiatives do not create perceptions among those who may serve as panel members (military jurors) at courts-martial that commanders expect particular findings or sentences at trials or compromise an accused Service member's presumption of innocence, right to fair investigation and disposition, and access to witnesses or evidence. Judge advocates with knowledge and expertise in criminal law should review sexual assault preventive training materials to ensure the materials neither taint potential panel members nor present inaccurate legal information.

IMPROVING MILITARY JUSTICE PROCEDURES

The Panel closely studied the military justice process as a primary component of our overall assessment of the response systems to sexual assault. While many components of the process closely resemble or replicate features of civilian criminal justice systems, there are some critical differences. Some of the necessary distinctions result from the convening authority's role in the military justice process and the military justice system's role in maintaining good order and discipline across the Armed Forces.

The Panel concludes, however, that some of these military-specific procedures are no longer necessary even in the context of a separate and unique military justice system. In particular, the Panel recommends the unitary sentencing practice, which adjudges a single sentence for all offenses of which an accused is convicted, should be discarded. This will make it easier to measure sentencing trends and ascertain accountability for sexual assault. Conversely, the Panel also determined that certain procedures used in some state and federal systems are not warranted in the military at this time. The Panel does not recommend the military adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases, nor does the Panel recommend Congress enact further mandatory minimum sentences in sexual assault cases at this time.

Finally, other potential changes require in-depth study before deciding whether they are appropriate or desired changes to current procedures. It is the sense of the Panel that the military judge should be involved in the military justice process sooner than referral to court-martial, which may better protect the rights of the victim and accused, and facilitate access to witnesses, documents, and experts, thereby minimizing trial delays. The Panel recommends the Secretary of Defense direct the Military Justice Review Group or Joint Service Committee to evaluate the feasibility and consequences of involving military judges at an earlier stage.

SUSTAINING AND ADEQUATELY FUNDING PROMISING DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROGRAMS AND INITIATIVES

Over the course of the Panel's study, witnesses expressed a recurring concern about sustaining and adequately funding effective but resource-intensive programs in the coming years during a time of decreasing defense budgets and other fiscal constraints. DoD's progress in combating sexual assault is tied in part to the resources and funding available for prevention and response efforts. Congress, the Secretary of Defense, the Service Secretaries, and senior Service officials must maintain their commitment to resolving the problem of sexual assault by ensuring effective prevention and response programs are adequately resourced.

Specifically, Congress should appropriate sufficient funds and personnel authorizations annually to DoD to ensure the Services are able to sustain a robust Special Victim Counsel program. The Services must also ensure proper training of investigators and judge advocates to maintain the expertise necessary to investigate and litigate sexual assault cases in spite of the turnover created by personnel rotations. It is also vital to develop and sustain the expertise of prosecutors, investigators, victim witness liaisons, and paralegals in handling these cases. Finally, the Service Secretaries should direct that current training efforts and programs be sustained so that military defense counsel are competent, prepared, and equipped.

CONDUCTING INDEPENDENT AUDITS AND ASSESSMENTS

Since the inception of DoD's comprehensive program in 2005, Congress has mandated and the Department has initiated numerous policies and programs directed toward sexual assault prevention and response. However, DoD has not sufficiently evaluated its initiatives to determine which are effective and which are not, which should be continued or expanded, or which should be discontinued or limited. To enhance overall program effectiveness and ensure the best use of resources, DoD should evaluate the programs and initiatives dealing with sexual assault. Additionally, the Department should assess the roles and responsibilities of sexual assault prevention and response personnel to ensure they operate effectively.

To verify the efforts of the DoD and enhance public confidence, the Department should seek external reviews of sexual assault prevention and response programs and performance. Evaluations of overall or specific programs by independent organizations, such as an audit of sexual assault investigations by persons or entities outside DoD, would serve to validate or disprove the Department's own internal assessments and would provide useful feedback on its programs, policies, and procedures.

Finally, the Panel renews a recommendation made previously by the 2004 Care for Victims of Sexual Assault Task Force and the 2009 Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in the Military Services. The Secretary of Defense should establish an advisory panel, composed of persons external to DoD, to offer the Secretary and other senior Department leaders independent assessment and feedback on the effectiveness of sexual assault prevention and response programs and policies.

CONCLUSION

Spurred by vigorous public debate, Congress recently enacted significant reforms to address sexual assault in the military, and the Department of Defense implemented numerous changes and additions to policies and programs to improve oversight and response. Preliminary indicators, demonstrated in recent increased reporting trends, suggest that these efforts are having a positive impact in increasing victim confidence. Nonetheless, these reforms and changes have not yet been fully implemented or evaluated, and it is not possible at this time to assess their full impact or the satisfaction of victims. Having considered these reforms and the current state of affairs, it is the Panel's view that the additional changes recommended in this report will advance the military's efforts in this area. The Response Systems Panel submits these recommendations to further improve the Department of Defense's response systems to adult sexual assault crimes.

PANEL RECOMMENDATIONS

I. MEASURING THE SCOPE OF SEXUAL ASSAULT IN THE MILITARY AND CIVILIAN COMMUNITIES

Collecting and Comparing Data

RSP Recommendation 1: The Secretary of Defense direct the development and implementation of a military crime victimization survey, in coordination with the Bureau of Justice Statistics, that relies on the best available research methods and provides data that can be more readily compared to other crime victimization surveys than current data.

- The Department of Defense (DoD) Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (WGRA) is an unbounded (does not have mechanisms to detect events that are reported outside the specified time period) prevalence survey that uses a public-health methodological approach. The National Crime Victimization Survey is a time-bounded incidence survey that uses a justice system-response methodological approach. The two surveys cannot be accurately compared.

RSP Recommendation 2: Congress and the Secretary of Defense utilize results from the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members for its intended purpose—to assess attitudes, identify areas for improvement, and revise workplace policies, as needed—rather than to estimate the incidence of sexual assault within the military.

- Surveying and collecting data on sexual assault victimization is challenging and costly. There are two primary approaches to surveying sexual assault. The first is a public health approach, which casts a broad net to assess the scope of the number of those injured by coercive sexual behavior. The second is a criminal justice approach, which seeks to account for unreported incidences of criminal sexual misconduct and measure the scope of unreported sexual offenses.
- Data received from the WGRA provides important information about attitudes and perceptions, but the survey was not intended to, and does not accurately, measure the incidence of criminal acts committed against Service members.

RSP Recommendation 3-A: The Secretary of Defense direct the Service Secretaries to use a single, standardized methodology to calculate prosecution and conviction rates. The Panel recommends a methodology, based on the current Army model, which will provide accurate and comparable rates by tracking the number and rates of acquittals and alternate dispositions in sexual assault cases.

RSP Recommendation 3-B: Once the Services standardize definitions, procedures, and calculations for reporting prosecution and conviction rates in sexual assault cases, the Secretary of Defense direct a highly qualified expert, external to the military, to study the disposition process in sexual assault cases.

The study should at least assess the following:

- the rate at which the Services unfound sexual assault reports using the Uniform Crime Reporting Program definition and the characteristics of such cases to determine whether any additional changes to policies or procedures are warranted;
- the rates at which referral of cases to courts-martial against the advice of the Article 32 investigating or hearing officer resulted in acquittal or conviction; and
- the role victim cooperation plays in determining whether to refer or not refer a case to court-martial, and whether the case results in a dismissal, acquittal or conviction.

- DoD and the Services do not currently use standardized methods to calculate prosecution or conviction rates in sexual assault or other cases. In addition to different procedures, Services also use different definitions, which make meaningful comparisons of prosecution and conviction rates for sexual assault across the Services impracticable. In the absence of a standardized methodology, any attempt to compare military prosecution or conviction rates for sexual assault among the Services or between military and civilian jurisdictions is apt to be misleading.

RSP Recommendation 4: Congress and the Secretary of Defense not measure success solely by comparing military and civilian prosecution and conviction rates.

- Civilian and military prosecution rates are not comparable because of systemic differences including civilian police discretion to dispose of a case and the alternate dispositions that apply only to the military. Various jurisdictions also use different definitions, procedures, and criteria throughout the process.
- National data collection by the Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program traditionally focused on forcible rape of women, although beginning in January 2013, the definition of rape was expanded to include gender-neutral nonconsensual penetrative offenses. The UCR Program also collects data about some other sex offenses which some civilian police agencies may classify as assault. In contrast, DoD includes data on all reported penetrative and contact sexual offenses ranging from unwanted touching to rape.

RSP Recommendation 5: Congress enact legislation to amend Section 1631(b)(3) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2011 and the related provisions in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 and the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 to require the Service Secretaries provide the number of "unfounded cases," (i.e., those cases that were deemed false or baseless), as well as a synopsis of all other unrestricted reports of sexual assault with a known offender within the military's criminal jurisdiction. Eliminating the requirement to provide information about "substantiated cases" will result in DoD and the Services providing information that more accurately reflects the disposition of all unrestricted reports of sexual assault within the military's jurisdiction.

- DoD and the Services must comply with several mandates to report sexual assault data to multiple sources, including Congress, with each report containing different requirements, calculations, and definitions.
- Section 1631 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2011 mandates an annual report to Congress with a full synopsis of "substantiated cases" of sexual assaults committed against Service members. The term "substantiated" is not otherwise used by DoD or the Services through the investigative or disposition decision process in sexual assault cases, resulting in confusion and inaccuracy in the reports to Congress.

Independent Evaluation of WGRA Data and Designing Future Surveys

RSP Recommendation 6: The Secretary of Defense direct that raw data collected from all surveys related to workplace environments and crime victimization be analyzed by independent research professionals to assess how DoD can improve responses to military sexual assault. For example: the survey's non-response bias analysis plan should be published so that independent researchers can evaluate it; the spectrum of behaviors included in "unwanted sexual contact" should be studied to inform targeted prevention efforts; and environmental factors such as time in service, location, training status, and deployment status should be analyzed as potential markers for increased risk.

- The 2012 WGRA collected a large amount of data that is useful public health information and can be analyzed to provide DoD leadership with better insight into areas of concern, patterns and trends in behavior, and victim satisfaction. If used correctly, this data can aid leaders in: better evaluating readiness, assessing the health of the force, identifying patterns and trends in behavior, directing efforts in prevention of, and response to, sexual assault and sexual harassment across the force, and assessing victim satisfaction.
- The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) conducts a public health survey called the National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS) to measure the prevalence of contact sexual violence. In 2010, the NISVS was designed and launched with assistance from the National Institute of Justice and DoD. NISVS includes a random sample of active duty women and female spouses of active duty members. The NISVS revealed that the overall risk of contact sexual violence is the same for military and civilian women, after adjusting for differences in age and marital status.

RSP Recommendation 7: The Secretary of Defense direct the creation of an advisory panel of qualified experts from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and the National Academy of Sciences' Committee on National Statistics to consult with the RAND Corporation, selected to develop and administer the 2014 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members, and any other agencies or contractors that develop future surveys of crime victimization or workplace environments, to ensure effective survey design.

- The RAND Corporation will develop, administer, collect, and analyze data for the 2014 WGRA. The RAND Corporation has partnered with Westat, the same company the Bureau of Justice Statistics uses for survey expertise assistance.

RSP Recommendation 8: If implemented, the Secretary of Defense direct that military crime victimization surveys use the Uniform Code of Military Justice's (UCMJ) definitions of sexual assault offenses, including: rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these acts.

- The definition of "unwanted sexual contact" used in the 2012 WGRA does not match the definitions used by the DoD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) or the UCMJ, making it more helpful as a public health assessment than an assessment of crime.
- DoD SAPRO evaluates the scope of unreported sex offenses by contrasting prevalence data of unwanted sexual contact extrapolated from the WGRA with reported sexual assault incidents and sexually based crimes under the UCMJ. The variances in definitions lead to confusion, disparity, and inaccurate comparisons of reporting rates within DoD. While the wide range of behaviors described in the 2012 WGRA are appropriate subjects of a public health survey, the WGRA's broad questions do not enable accurate or precise determination of sexual assault crime victimization.
- Crime victimization surveys must be designed to mirror law enforcement reporting practices and legal definitions of crimes so that data can be analyzed, compared, and evaluated to assess the relative success of sexual assault prevention and response programs.

Survey Response Rates and Survey Fatigue

RSP Recommendation 9: The Secretary of Defense seek to improve response rates to all surveys related to workplace environments and crime victimization to improve the accuracy and reliability of results.

- In 2012, the Defense Manpower Data Center sent the WGRA to 108,000 active duty Service members. Approximately 23,000 survey recipients, or 24%, responded. Twenty-four percent is considered a low response rate when compared to rates from other civilian public health surveys.

RSP Recommendation 10: DoD and the Services be alert to the risk of survey fatigue, and DoD SAPRO and Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute monitor and assess what impact increased survey requirements have on survey response rates and survey results.

- The recent dramatic increase in the use and frequency of surveys administered by Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute (DEOMI) last year raises concerns about survey fatigue. Personnel who are tasked repeatedly to complete surveys for their immediate unit and its parent commands may become less inclined to participate or provide meaningful input.

Sentencing Data

RSP Recommendation 11: The Secretary of Defense direct the Service Secretaries to provide sentencing data, categorized by offense type, particularly for all rape and sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ, forcible sodomy under Article 125 of the UCMJ, or attempts to commit those acts under Article 80 of the UCMJ, into a searchable DoD database, to: (1) conduct periodic assessments, (2) identify sentencing trends, or (3) address other relevant issues. This information should be posted to a website or made available in a forum that is easily accessible to the public.

- Sentencing data from the different Services is not easily accessible to the public. The Services use different systems to internally report data from installations around the world. If the Services' software programs and data fields (in the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database (DSAID), for example) are modified to include sentencing information, it would not be overly burdensome for the Services to provide this data to DoD.

RSP Recommendation 12: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to release sentencing outcomes in all cases on a monthly basis to increase transparency and confidence in the military justice system.

II. ASSESSING THE ROLE OF THE COMMANDER: COMMANDER RESPONSIBILITY AND ACCOUNTABILITY, SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION, AND THE COMMANDER AS CONVENING AUTHORITY

Sexual Assault Prevention

RSP Recommendation 13: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO and the Services to enhance their efforts to prevent and respond to male-on-male sexual assault.

- Prevention efforts should ensure commanders directly acknowledge the potential for male-on-male sexual assault in their commands and directly confront the stigma associated with it.
- Prevention efforts should also ensure Service members understand that sexually demeaning or humiliating behaviors that may have been minimized as hazing or labeled as "horseplay" in the past are not tolerated and may constitute punishable offenses.
- DoD SAPRO should fund research on and seek expert assistance to understand the risk and protective factors that are unique to male-on-male sexual assault in the military and should develop targeted prevention programs for male-on-male sexual assault offenses.

RSP Recommendation 14: The Service Secretaries ensure commanders focus on effective prevention strategies. Commanders must demonstrate leadership of DoD's prevention approach and its principles, and they must ensure members of their commands are effectively trained by qualified and motivated trainers who are skilled in teaching methods that will keep participants tuned in to prevention messages.

RSP Recommendation 15: The Secretary of Defense direct appropriate DoD authorities to work with researchers to determine how best to implement promising, evidence-based alcohol mitigation strategies (e.g., those that affect pricing, outlet density, and the availability of alcohol). The Secretary of Defense should ensure DoD's strategic policies emphasize these strategies and direct DoD SAPRO to coordinate with the Services to evaluate promising programs some local commanders have initiated to mitigate alcohol consumption.

- The CDC and leading private prevention organizations agree there is no silver bullet answer to stop the occurrence of sexual assault. A prevention strategy has greater potential to impact behavior if it applies multiple and varied strategies that target risk factors at the individual, family/peer, community, and societal levels, because this comprehensive approach creates a "surround sound" effect that causes people to hear the same message in multiple ways from multiple influencers.
- DoD's prevention policies and requirements adopted since 2012 reflect Department efforts to coordinate with the CDC and leading private organizations like the National Sexual Violence Resource Center. Moreover, installation-level initiatives described to the Panel largely reflect prevention best practices.
- The CDC and leading private prevention organizations identify bystander intervention and alcohol mitigation as two promising sexual violence prevention strategies that warrant further research into their impact on behavior change.
- Alcohol use and abuse are major factors in military sexual assault affecting both the victim and the offender. Based on available studies, the CDC has identified pricing, outlet density, and college campus restrictions as promising alcohol policy strategies for reducing the incidence of sexual violence.
- DoD strategic documents have not mandated any of the alcohol mitigation strategies emphasized as promising by the CDC, such as pricing strategies, outlet density, and restrictions on availability. Nevertheless, some local commanders have developed innovative alcohol-mitigation programs, on their own, that warrant wider evaluation.
- By spearheading additional research and implementing prevention strategies that are based on the best available science, DoD can share knowledge it gains with civilian organizations and thereby become a national leader in preventing sexual violence.

RSP Recommendation 16: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to evaluate development of risk-management programs directed toward populations with particular risk and protective factors that are associated with prior victimization. In particular, DoD SAPRO should work with researchers to determine to what extent prior sexual victimization increases Service members' risk for sexual assault in the military to develop effective programs to protect against re-victimization.

- Research underscores the importance of developing programs to identify Service members who are victimized prior to entering the military and strengthen these members' resiliency in order to deal with the consequences of prior victimization and avoid being victimized again.

RSP Recommendation 17: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to consult with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and other appropriate agencies to develop and expand services for military members who experienced sexual abuse prior to joining the military, and to develop strategies to encourage utilization of these services to prevent re-victimization and develop or maintain skills necessary to fully engage in military activities and requirements.

- Results from the 2012 WGRA survey indicate that 19% of men and 45% of women in Armed Forces who said they experienced unwanted sexual contact while in the military also indicated they experienced unwanted sexual contact before entering military service.

Training the Force on Sexual Assault Prevention

RSP Recommendation 18: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries direct DoD SAPRO and the Services, respectively, to review bystander intervention programs to ensure they do not rely upon common misconceptions or overgeneralized perceptions. In particular, programs should not overemphasize serial rapists and other sexual "predators" and should instead emphasize preventive engagement, encouraging Service member attention and vigilance toward seemingly harmless attitudes and behaviors that increase the potential for sexual assault.

- According to the CDC and leading sexual assault prevention research experts and organizations, effective bystander intervention programs encourage peer groups to guard against attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors that contribute to a climate in which sexual violence is more likely to occur. This includes language and behaviors such as sexist comments, sexually objectifying jokes, and vulgar gestures.

RSP Recommendation 19: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to establish specific training and policies addressing retaliation toward peers who intervene and/or report.

- Bystander intervention programs for Service members include training that emphasizes the importance of guarding against such retaliation.
- DoD and Service policies and requirements ensure protection from retaliation against not just victims, but also the peers who speak out and step up on their behalf.
- Commanders encourage members to actively challenge attitudes and beliefs that lead to offenses and interrupt and/or report them when they occur.

RSP Recommendation 20: The Secretary of Defense continue to develop and implement training for all members of the military, including new recruits, with examples of male-on-male sexual assault, including hazing and sexual abuse by groups of men. The training should emphasize the psychological damage done by sexual assault against male victims.

- Recent policies and training initiatives have sought to identify special populations within the military to prevent sexual assault. However, male victims of sexual assault are often left out of conversations about how sexual assault occurs in the military. This omission deters some male victims from reporting sexual assault.

RSP Recommendation 21: The Service Secretaries direct commanders of military entrance processing stations to determine how to best provide sexual assault prevention information to new recruits immediately upon entry into the Service that include the definition of sexual assault, possible consequences of a conviction for sexual offenses in the military and information about the DoD Safe Helpline and other avenues for assistance. This recommendation expands upon the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in the Services' recommendation to make available, and to visibly post, sexual assault prevention and awareness campaign materials at military entrance processing stations.

- Pursuant to Section 574 of the Fiscal Year 2013 NDAA and current DoD policy, all of the Services now provide sexual assault prevention and response (SAPR) training to Service members within the first two weeks of initial entrance on active duty.

RSP Recommendation 22: The Secretary of Defense continue to develop and implement training for all members of the military, including new recruits, emphasizing that reporting instances of sexual assault is essential for good order and discipline and protects rather than undermines morale. It is also essential that training continue to emphasize that good order and discipline require that the military justice system carries out its mission of determining guilt or innocence in an environment free from bias against an accuser or accused Service member.

- The ingrained notion of subordination of the individual to the mission that is unique to a military environment may be misinterpreted to deter reports of sexual assault and encourage retaliation against victims who come forward.
- There have been instances when military officials and Service members have ignored or retaliated against those who reported incidents of sexual assault when the offender is a high-performing Service member or superior offending against a subordinate.

RSP Recommendation 23: The Secretary of Defense continue to develop and implement training for all members of the military, including new recruits, that retaliation or harassment by Service members in response to an allegation of sexual assault violates good order and discipline.

- Harassment and retaliation against a victim in response to an allegation of sexual assault erodes unit cohesion, and the fear of harassment and retaliation deters victims from coming forward to report instances of sexual assault.
- Although current DoD policy requires commanders and senior leaders to receive training on recognizing and preventing retaliation towards a victim of sexual assault, the policy does not expressly provide that Service members receive such training.

RSP Recommendation 24: The Secretary of Defense continue to develop and implement training for all members of the military, including new recruits, explaining that implicit or explicit invitations or demands for sex or sexualized interactions from commanders or superiors are not lawful orders, should not be obeyed, violate the code of military conduct, and will be punished.

RSP Recommendation 25: The Department of Defense not promulgate at this time an additional formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response.

- FY14 NDAA directed the Panel to assess whether DoD should promulgate, and ensure the understanding of, and compliance with, a formal statement of accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response, as a means for addressing those issues within the Armed Forces.
- DoD has established comprehensive, mandatory training requirements that are designed to ensure all personnel receive tailored training on SAPR principles, reporting options and resources for victims, the roles and responsibilities of commanders and SAPR personnel, prevention strategies, and report documentation requirements.
- DoD SAPRO has established core SAPR training competencies with tailored instruction requirements for: accessions training, annual refresher training, pre- and post- deployment training, professional military education, senior leadership training, pre-command training, and response personnel training.
- In light of the SAPR training already in place, promulgating a formal statement at this time would be superfluous.

Organizational Climate Surveys

RSP Recommendation 26: DoD SAPRO and the Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute ensure survey assessments and other methods for assessing command climate accurately assess and evaluate the effectiveness of subordinate organizational leaders and supervisors in addition to commanders.

- Commanders are ultimately accountable for their unit's performance and climate, but unit climate assessments must consider the effectiveness of all leaders in the organization, including all subordinate personnel exercising leadership or supervisory authority.
- Most issues and concerns expressed by victims are with lower-level leaders, not senior commanders or convening authorities. Unit climate assessments and response measures must be sufficiently comprehensive to include leaders and supervisors at every level.
- Commanders must pay particular attention to the critical role played by noncommissioned officers and subordinate leaders and supervisors, and they must set expectations that establish appropriate organizational climate and ensure unit leaders are appropriately trained to effectively perform their roles in sexual assault prevention and response.

RSP Recommendation 27: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries ensure commanders are required to develop action plans following completion of command climate surveys that outline steps the command will take to validate or expand upon survey information and steps the command will take to respond to issues identified through the climate assessment process.

RSP Recommendation 28: DoD and the Services identify and utilize means in addition to surveys to assess and measure institutional and organizational climate for sexual assault prevention and response.

- Although surveys may provide helpful insight into positive and negative climate factors within an organization, surveys alone do not provide a comprehensive assessment of the climate in an organization.

RSP Recommendation 29: In addition to personnel surveys, DoD, the Services, and commanders identify and utilize other resources to obtain information and feedback on the effectiveness of Sexual Assault Prevention and Response programs and local command climate.

- Commanders must seek additional information beyond survey results to gain a clear picture of the climate in their organizations. However, they must ensure they do not seek out or use information that is otherwise confidential or protected.

RSP Recommendation 30: Congress not adopt Section 3(d) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014. Alternatively, the Secretary of Defense direct the formulation of a review process to be applied following each reported instance of sexual assault to determine the non-criminal factors surrounding the event. Such reviews should address what measures ought to be taken to lessen the likelihood of recurrence (e.g.; physical security, lighting, access to alcohol, off-limits establishments, etc.).

- While information about a unit's culture or climate may prove helpful or relevant in some criminal investigations, it is not clear how organizational climate surveys would be effective following each report of a sexual assault offense. Organizational climate may not be a contributing factor in every alleged crime of sexual assault. Additional survey requirements increase concerns about survey fatigue and the accuracy of the information collected.
- DoD has not formalized a standard process to review reported incidents of sexual assault to determine what additional actions might be taken in the future to prevent the occurrence of such an incident. Some organizations and commands within DoD have developed review processes that warrant evaluation by DoD.

Commander Evaluation and Accountability

RSP Recommendation 31: DoD and the Services consider opportunities and methods for effectively factoring accountability metrics into commander performance assessments, including climate survey results, indiscipline trends, sexual assault statistics, and equal opportunity data.

- While ineffective or inadequate commanders should be relieved, accountability must also include positive reinforcement that will strengthen good commanders.
- Although this provision would require assessment of the ability of commanders to foster a safe climate for crime reporting and adequately respond to allegations of sexual assault, Section 3(c) would not require performance appraisals to specifically address how a commander performs his or her sexual assault prevention responsibilities.
- All Services have policies and methods for evaluating commanders on their ability to foster a positive command climate, but definitions and evaluation mechanisms vary across the Services.

RSP Recommendation 32: The Service Secretaries ensure sexual assault prevention and response performance assessment requirements extend below unit commanders to include subordinate leaders, including officers, noncommissioned officers, and civilian supervisors.

- While performance appraisals in each Service now directly impact promotion potential and future assignments, including command selection, the evaluation scope and level of detail required vary among the Services.
- If performance evaluation assessment increases attention to and support of SAPR programs, differences among the Services in assessment requirements may result in uneven support and attention among subordinate leaders and personnel.
- Subordinate leaders in a unit play a significant role in the success or failure of SAPR efforts, and accountability should extend beyond commanders to junior officers, noncommissioned officers, and civilian supervisors.
- SAPR program effectiveness will be limited without the full investment of subordinate leaders.
- Section 3(c) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014 would extend evaluation requirements to all Service members.

RSP Recommendation 33: The Service Secretaries ensure assessment of commander performance in sexual assault prevention and response incorporates more than results from command climate surveys.

- Commanders should be measured according to clearly defined and established standards for SAPR leadership and performance.
- Mandated reporting of command climate surveys to the next higher level of command has the potential to improve command visibility of climate issues of subordinate commanders. Meaningful review by senior commanders increases opportunities for early intervention and can improve command response to survey feedback. However, commanders and leaders must recognize that surveys may or may not reflect long-term trends, and they provide only one measure of a unit's actual command climate and the commander's contribution to that climate.

RSP Recommendation 34: To ensure military leaders clearly understand their duties and responsibilities, DoD SAPRO and the Service Secretaries ensure Sexual Assault Prevention and Response programs and initiatives are clearly defined and establish objective standards when possible.

- The Navy's accountability effort, which provides specific direction and command-tailored direction on SAPR and other command climate initiatives, offers an encouraging model for ensuring compliance and fostering program success.

RSP Recommendation 35: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries ensure commanders are trained in methods for monitoring a unit's sexual assault prevention and response climate, and they should ensure commanders are accountable for monitoring their command's sexual assault prevention and response climate outside of the conduct of periodic surveys.

Role of the Commander in the Military Justice System

RSP Recommendation 36: Congress not adopt the proposals in the Sexual Assault Training Oversight and Prevention Act or the Military Justice Improvement Act to modify the authority vested in convening authorities to refer sexual assault charges to courts-martial.

- Congress has enacted significant amendments to the UCMJ to enhance the response to sexual assault in the military, and the DoD implemented numerous changes to policies and programs for the same purpose. Some changes have only just been implemented and other amendments to the UCMJ have not yet been implemented, and DoD has not yet fully evaluated what impact these reforms will have on the incidence, reporting or prosecution of sexual assault in the military.
- The Military Justice Improvement Act (MJIA) includes a statutory restriction on the expenditure of additional resources and authorization of additional personnel, yet implementing the convening authority mandate included in the MJIA will involve significant personnel and administrative costs. Resources are an issue of primacy for any legislation that creates additional structure.
- Implementing the MJIA will require reassignment of O-6 judge advocates who meet the statutory prosecutor qualifications. The existing pool of O-6 judge advocates who meet these requirements is finite; and many of these officers routinely serve in assignments related to other important aspects of military legal practice. Therefore, implementing MJIA's mandate, absent an increase in personnel resources, may result in under-staffing of other important senior legal advisor positions.

RSP Recommendation 37: Congress not further limit the authority under the UCMJ to refer charges for sexual assault crimes to trial by court-martial beyond the recent amendments to the UCMJ and DoD policy.

- Criticism of the military justice system often confuses the term "commander" with the person authorized to convene courts-martial for serious violations of the UCMJ. These are not the same thing.
- Pursuant to the Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14) NDAA amendments to the UCMJ and current practice, only a general court-martial convening authority is authorized to order trial by court-martial for any offense of rape, sexual assault, rape or sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, or attempts to commit these offenses. Subordinate officers, even when in positions of command, may not do so.
- Commanders with authority to refer a sexual assault allegation for trial by court-martial will normally be removed from any personal knowledge of the accused or victim.
- If a convening authority has something other than an official interest in a particular case, the convening authority is required to recuse himself or herself.
- Under current law and practice, the authority to make disposition decisions regarding sexual assault allegations is limited to senior commanders who must receive advice from judge advocates before determining appropriate resolution.
- The evidence does not support a conclusion that removing authority to convene courts-martial from senior commanders will reduce the incidence of sexual assault or increase reporting of sexual assaults in the Armed Forces.
- The evidence does not support a conclusion that removing authority to convene courts-martial from senior commanders will improve the quality of investigations and prosecutions or increase the conviction rate in these cases.

- Senior commanders vested with convening authority do not face an inherent conflict of interest when they convene courts-martial for sexual assault offenses allegedly committed by members of their command. As with leaders of all organizations, commanders often must make decisions that may negatively impact individual members of the organization when those decisions are in the best interest of the organization.
- Civilian jurisdictions face underreporting challenges that are similar to the military, and it is not clear that the criminal justice response in civilian jurisdictions, where prosecutorial decisions are supervised by elected or appointed lawyers, is more effective.
- None of the military justice systems employed by our Allies was changed or set up to deal with the problem of sexual assault, and the evidence does not indicate that the removal of the commander from the decision making process in non-U.S. military justice systems has affected the reporting of sexual assaults. In fact, despite fundamental changes to their military justice systems, including eliminating the role of the convening authority and placing prosecution decisions with independent military or civilian entities, our Allies still face many of the same issues in preventing and responding to sexual assaults as the United States military.
- It is not clear what impact removing convening authority from senior commanders would have on the military justice process or what consequences would result to organization discipline or operational capability and effectiveness.

RSP Recommendation 38: The Secretary of Defense ensure all officers preparing to assume senior command positions at the grade of O-6 and above receive dedicated legal training that fully prepares them to exercise authorities assigned to them under the UCMJ.

- Legal training provided to senior commanders through resident and on-site Service Judge Advocate General School hosted courses varies significantly among the Services. For example, the Army and Navy Judge Advocate General Schools provide senior commanders with resident or on-site courses on legal issues. Formal Air Force legal training is less robust and is incorporated into group and wing commander courses hosted by Air University.

Reviewing Convening Authorities' Referral Decisions

RSP Recommendation 39: Congress repeal Section 1744 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, which requires a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed by a higher general court-martial convening authority or the Service Secretary, depending on the circumstances, due to the real or perceived undue pressure it creates on staff judge advocates to recommend referral, and on convening authorities to refer, in situations where referral does not serve the interests of victims or justice.

- Establishing an elevated review of a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases may deter the convening authority from exercising his or her independent professional judgment when making a decision whether to refer a case.
- Elevated review may also impose inappropriate or illegal pressure on staff judge advocates to recommend and convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases.
- Convening authorities are better positioned to make informed decisions because they have the advice of their staff judge advocates, and are less removed from the alleged perpetrator, victim, and the impact of the offense on the unit and good order and discipline than a higher level general court-martial convening authority or Service Secretary.

RSP Recommendation 40: If Congress does not repeal Section 1744 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, and the requirement for elevated review of non-referred case files continues, the Secretary of Defense direct a standard format be developed for declining prosecution in a case, modeled after the contents of civilian jurisdiction declination statements or letters. The DoD should coordinate with the Department of Justice, or with state jurisdictions that are more familiar with the sensitive nature of sexual assault cases, to develop a standard format for use by all Services. Any such form should require a sufficient explanation without providing too much detail so as to ensure the written reason for declination to prosecute does not jeopardize the possibility of a future prosecution or contain victim-blaming language.

- There are no formal requirements for military investigators, judge advocates, or commanders to provide written opinions or justifications when declining to pursue criminal cases, including allegations of sexual assault, at any stage in the court-martial process. Staff judge advocates provide written advice to the convening authority prior to his or her decision whether to refer a case to general court-martial. In the past, if a convening authority dismissed charges or declined to prosecute a case after referral, the convening authority generally did not write a justification or declination statement.
- If a victim makes an allegation of rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, or attempts of those offenses, and the convening authority decides not to refer the allegation to court-martial, Section 1744(e)(6) of the FY14 NDAA requires a written statement explaining the convening authority's decision be included in the case file for superior authority review. DoD has not published guidance on what a declination memorandum must contain or what entity must write the letter.
- Civilian practices for recording decisions to decline cases vary. Prior to indictment, the common procedure is for the prosecutor to send the case back to the investigator to be closed. If the prosecutor declines a case after indictment, some offices informally include a note in the file, others complete a standard form, but none provide lengthy written justifications. When civilian offices decline to prosecute a case, there usually is no other alternate disposition or adverse action taken against the suspect.

RSP Recommendation 41: Congress not enact Section 2 of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014, which would require the next higher convening authority or Service Secretary to review a case if the senior trial counsel disagreed with the staff judge advocate's recommendation against referral or the convening authority's decision not to refer one of these sexual assault cases. The staff judge advocate is the general court-martial convening authority's legal advisor on military justice matters; there is no evidence that inserting the senior trial counsel into the process will enhance the fair administration of military justice.

- Most "senior trial counsel" assigned to cases are more junior and less experienced than the staff judge advocate advising the convening authority. This provision inappropriately elevates the assessments of generally more junior judge advocates and would likely prove to be unproductive, disruptive, and unnecessary to ensuring the fair disposition of cases.

Convening Authority and Clemency

RSP Recommendation 42: Congress not adopt additional amendments to Article 60 of the UCMJ beyond the significant limits on discretion already adopted, and the President should not impose additional limits to the post-trial authority of convening authorities.

- Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA, which modifies Article 60 of the UMCJ, significantly limits the post-trial authority and discretion of convening authorities for serious sexual offenses by precluding them from disapproving findings and reducing their discretion to reduce the court-martial sentence for such offenses.

RSP Recommendation 43: Congress amend Section 1702(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 to allow convening authorities to grant clemency as formerly permitted under the UCMJ to protect dependents of convicted Service members by relieving them of the burden of automatic and adjudged forfeitures.

- In civilian jurisdictions, each State has its own rules for handling clemency matters, but many provide the Governor with the power to pardon criminals and commute sentences as the final act after the person convicted exhausts the judicial appellate process. The convening authority normally exercises clemency authority under the recently amended Article 60 of the UCMJ after the findings and sentence of a court-martial, before appellate review. The scope of appellate review varies by the length of sentence approved.
- One unintended consequence from the recent amendments to Article 60 of the UCMJ is that the convening authority may no longer provide relief from forfeitures of pay to dependents of convicted Service members.

III. STRENGTHENING THE SPECIAL VICTIM COUNSEL PROGRAM, VICTIM RIGHTS, SUPPORT, AND SERVICES

Special Victim Counsel

RSP Recommendation 44: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to extend the opportunity for special victim counsel representation, although not necessarily the same special victim counsel, to a victim so long as a right of the victim exists and is at issue.

- According to individual Service policies, the special victim counsel and victim have a privileged attorney-client relationship from their initial meeting through the final disposition of a case or transfer of the special victim counsel to another duty station.

RSP Recommendation 45: The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Services Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right.

- A special victim counsel's right to access records is no greater than his or her client's access rights. Currently, the government trial counsel may, but is not expressly required to, disclose information and records to the special victim counsel. Further, when disclosing information, the trial counsel is limited by the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act.

RSP Recommendation 46: The Secretary of Defense recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and prescribe appropriate regulations to clarify a victim's right to be heard includes the right to be heard on legal issues through counsel.

- The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the highest military court, composed of civilian judges has addressed the issue of whether a victim has the right to be heard through counsel with regard to certain issues, but the scope of representation set forth by the FY14 NDAA is more expansive than the issues addressed in case law.
- Litigation about a victim's right to be heard includes through counsel will likely continue unless DoD issues formal clarification.

RSP Recommendation 47: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to implement additional selection criteria for their individual Special Victim Counsel programs to require that counsel have appropriate trial experience, whenever possible, prior to being selected as special victim counsel.

- Special victim counsel are required to meet the same qualifications as other legal assistance attorneys (i.e., judge advocate or a civilian attorney who is a member of the bar of a federal court or of the highest court of a state) and be certified as competent to be designated as a special victim counsel by the Service Judge Advocate General. In addition to these statutory requirements, special victim counsel selection considers other factors, such as previous military justice experience, maturity and sound judgment, and desire to serve in the position in the selection process.
- The length of time the individual served in a military justice position varies throughout each Service; it is unclear if actual trial experience is required across the Services.

RSP Recommendation 48: In addition to assessing victim satisfaction with the Special Victim Counsel program, the Service Secretaries survey convening authorities, staff judge advocates, prosecutors, defense counsel, military judges, and investigators to assess the effects of the program on the administration of military justice.

- Military trial and defense counsel, sexual assault response coordinator, and victim advocate personnel reported that they have positive working relationships with special victim counsel, but some counsel foresee potential issues such as privilege, confidentiality, or delays which could affect the relationships.

Sustain Special Victim Counsel

RSP Recommendation 49: Congress appropriate sufficient funds and personnel authorizations annually to DoD to ensure the Services are able to sustain a robust Special Victim Counsel program.

- Initial survey results from the Air Force, the only Service to have currently implemented a victim satisfaction survey, revealed responses were overwhelmingly positive and show the effectiveness of the Special Victim Counsel program. Witnesses who had been assigned special victim counsel told the Panel that their special victim counsel were critical to their ability to understand the process and participate effectively as witnesses against their accuser.
- Congress authorized $25 million to the Department of Defense in the FY14 NDAA to assist the Services with the cost of implementation, staffing, and operations for their individual Special Victim Counsel programs. However, the Services anticipate significant operating costs and increased staffing requirements to sustain effective Special Victim Counsel programs.

RSP Recommendation 50: The Service Secretaries establish and disseminate collaborative methods for special victim counsel between and among the Services, including an inter-Service website where special victim counsel may access resources and training materials, and receive training on best practices including the provision of advice and resources to sexual assault victims for issues related to negative personnel actions encountered as a result of being a victim or seeking treatment.

- While the Air Force and Army have created special victim counsel training courses, the Special Victim Counsel program is still a relatively new program and even the most experienced special victim counsel has limited experience as an advocate for victim rights. Further, because the program is in its infancy, limited case law exists to guide special victim counsel in their practice.
- The fear of damage to one's military career deters victims from reporting a sexual assault, and victims may seek guidance from special victim counsel regarding career implications for seeking treatment or reporting a sexual assault.

Assess Special Victim Counsel

RSP Recommendation 51: The Service Secretaries develop a standard evaluation mechanism in consultation with an independent evaluator with appropriate metrics to determine the effectiveness of the Special Victim Counsel program in each Service on an annual basis. This includes annually evaluating the effectiveness of the organizational structure of the Service Special Victim Counsel programs and assessing the individual Service policies on eligibility requirements for obtaining a special victim counsel.

- The Services currently do not have a standard evaluation of effectiveness for the Special Victim Counsel program.

RSP Recommendation 52: The Secretary of Defense establish an inter-Service working group to assess the practices of all Service Special Victim Counsel programs. The inter-Service working group should discuss, deliberate, and decide upon the best practices being utilized by all the Services. The working group should then ensure each Service implements the best practices of the Special Victim Counsel programs. The working group should consist of, at a minimum, the Special Victim Counsel program heads from each Service. The first meeting should occur within twelve months from the date of this report. Thereafter, the working group should meet at least annually.

- On August 14, 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed the Service Secretaries to establish a special victim's advocacy program best suited for the individual Service. Furthermore, he directed the Services to determine their own best practices and periodically share those practices with the other Services. No standards or requirements have been established outlining how and when these best practices should be shared.
- The Special Victim Counsel program managers of the respective Special Victim Counsel programs regularly reach out to one another via email and telephone to communicate special victim counsel issues and exchange lessons learned/best practices generated by their respective Services. On a more formal basis, the Special Victim Counsel program managers meet monthly to discuss a variety of Special Victim Counsel program issues.

Victim Rights

RSP Recommendation 53: The Secretary of Defense clarify that victims have legal standing to enforce their rights listed in Article 6b of the UCMJ at any relevant time in the proceedings, including before, during, and after trial.

- The FY14 NDAA did not address legal standing and did not specify enforcement mechanisms for the rights of victims set forth in Article 6b of the UCMJ. It instead requires the Secretary of Defense to recommend changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and to prescribe appropriate regulations to implement mechanisms to ensure enforcement of the rights.
- The Crime Victims' Rights Act (CVRA) expressly provides legal standing for victims to assert their rights in district court, which will then immediately decide any motion asserting a victim's right.
- The CVRA expressly provides for an expedited review of any trial court decision on a victim's right. The CVRA allows a victim to petition the court of appeals for a writ of mandamus and the appellate court shall review the issue within seventy-two hours of the filing of the petition.

RSP Recommendation 54-A: The Secretary of Defense recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and prescribe appropriate regulations that provide victims a right to be heard regarding a pretrial agreement.

RSP Recommendation 54-B: The proposed changes provide victims the right to be heard by the convening authority regarding a plea, with appropriate consideration to account for military pretrial agreement practice.

RSP Recommendation 54-C: The recommended changes ensure the right to be heard before the convening authority decides to accept, reject, or propose a counteroffer to a pretrial agreement offer submitted by an accused. The convening authority should retain discretion to determine the best means to comply with this right and consider the victim's opinion (e.g., submission in writing, in person).

- The FY14 NDAA extended most of the rights afforded to civilian crime victims under the CVRA to crime victims under the military justice system by adding these rights into the UCMJ as Article 6b, except the right to be reasonably heard on the plea.
- Neither Article 6b nor DoD policy includes the victim's right to be reasonably heard on the plea before the accused and the convening authority come to an agreement.
- The military justice system handles pretrial agreements differently than civilian court proceedings, so opportunities in military and civilian systems to provide for a victim's right to be heard on the plea may not be analogous.
- The opportunity for victim input in the military justice system is before the convening authority decides to accept, reject, or propose a counter offer to a pretrial agreement submitted by an accused.

RSP Recommendation 55: The Secretary of Defense direct the creation and implementation of mechanisms, where not currently in place, requiring trial counsel to convey the victim's specific concerns and preferences to the convening authority regarding case disposition. These procedures will take into account the convening authority's role in the disposition of cases under the military justice system and create a process more analogous to a victim's right to confer with a prosecutor under the Crime Victims' Rights Act.

- The right to confer with the attorney for the government under the CVRA is not directly analogous to the right to confer with trial counsel under the military justice system since the convening authority, not the trial counsel, makes decisions on how to dispose of cases under the UCMJ.
- DoD policy, the CVRA, and the newly enacted Article 6b provide a crime victim the right to confer with the attorney for the government in the case.
- In the military justice system, a victim may confer with trial counsel on matters such as whether to pursue court-martial, nonjudicial punishment or administrative action in the case. If pursuing courts-martial, a victim may confer with the trial counsel regarding what level of court-martial may be appropriate for the particular charges.

RSP Recommendation 56: The Secretary of Defense recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and prescribe appropriate regulations to provide victims the right to make an unsworn victim impact statement, not subject to cross examination during the presentencing proceeding, with the following safeguards:

- The members should be instructed similarly to the instruction they receive when the accused makes an unsworn statement;
- The substance of the unsworn statement, including all material facts, should be in writing, available to the defense counsel before sentencing and be subject to the same objections available to the government regarding the accused's unsworn statement; and
- If there is "new matter" that could affect the sentence brought up in the victim's unsworn statement, a military judge may take appropriate corrective action.

- The CVRA includes the opportunity for a victim to be reasonably heard at sentencing by allowing him or her to make a statement that is neither under oath nor subject to cross-examination.
- Under military rules, in the sentencing proceeding a sexual assault victim may present evidence of financial, social, psychological, and medical impact of an offense the accused committed.
- Military procedural rules covering the court-martial sentencing proceeding require the victim and other witnesses—except the accused—to appear and testify under oath, subject to the rules of evidence and defense cross-examination. Unless there is an agreement from the defense, the victim must testify under oath, and is subject to cross-examination.

RSP Recommendation 57: The Service Secretaries ensure trial counsel comply with their obligations to afford military crime victims the rights set forth in Article 6b of the UCMJ and DoD policy by, in cases tried by courts-martial, requiring military judges to inquire, on the record, whether trial counsel complied with statutory and policy requirements.

- Congress and the Services have established various points in the judicial process where military crime victims have the right to confer or consult with trial counsel. These requirements mirror the discussions civilian prosecutors routinely engage in with victims in sexual assault cases. In some civilian jurisdictions, the trial judge asks the prosecutor, on the record, if he or she has conferred with the victim and to present the victim's opinions to the court, even if the victim's opinions diverge from the government's position.

RSP Recommendation 58: The Secretary of Defense recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and prescribe appropriate regulations to ensure that military investigators, prosecutors and other DoD military and civilian employees engaged in the detection, investigation, or prosecution of crime use their best efforts to notify and accord victims the rights specified in Article 6b of the UCMJ.

- The CVRA requires prosecutors and investigators to use their "best efforts" to see that crime victims are notified of, and accorded, the rights under the CVRA. The court is responsible for ensuring that crime victims are afforded the rights guaranteed under the CVRA.
- The FY14 NDAA did not place a similar requirement on military investigators, prosecutors, or military courts to ensure that crime victims in military proceedings have been afforded the rights specified in Article 6b of the UCMJ. Instead, the FY14 NDAA requires the Secretary of Defense to recommend changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial to the President and to prescribe appropriate regulations to implement mechanisms for ensuring that victims are notified of and accorded their rights.

RSP Recommendation 59: The Secretary of Defense assess the effectiveness of the processes to receive and investigate complaints relating to violations of or failures by military and civilian employees of all the Services to provide the rights guaranteed by Article 6b, UCMJ, and to determine whether a more uniform process is needed.

- To promote compliance, the CVRA directed the U.S. Attorney General to establish regulations that designate an administrative authority within the Department of Justice to receive and investigate complaints relating to the provision or violation of crime victim's rights. The Department of Justice established the Office of the Victims' Rights Ombudsman to receive and investigate complaints filed by crime victims against its employees.
- The FY14 NDAA requires the Secretary of Defense (and the Secretary of Homeland Security with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a Service in the Navy) to designate an authority within each Service to receive and investigate complaints relating to the provision or violation of such rights.
- Designation of a separate authority within each Service to receive and investigate complaints could result in disparate procedures, rules, and standards for making and investigating complaints.

Reporting

RSP Recommendation 60: The Secretary of Defense direct an expedited study of what constitutes low-level collateral misconduct in sexual assault cases and examine whether a procedure for granting limited immunity should be implemented in the future.

- Military sexual assault victims may anticipate they will face negative consequences for collateral misconduct such as underage drinking, fraternization, disobeying orders, and other military-specific offenses.
- Collateral misconduct by the victim of a sexual assault is a significant barrier to reporting because of the victim's fear of punishment.
- Under current DoD policy, commanders can defer action on victims' collateral misconduct until final disposition of the case, if appropriate, so as to encourage reporting of sexual assault and continued victim cooperation.
- The Services do not support a military-level immunity policy for victims who may have committed some collateral misconduct. The Services assert that granting blanket immunity could undermine discipline and increase challenges to the credibility of victims and the veracity of victim reports.

RSP Recommendation 61: The Secretary of Defense develop and implement policy and regulations such that sexual assault victims have the right and ability to consult with a special victim counsel before deciding whether to make a restricted or unrestricted report, or no report at all. Communication made during this consultation would be confidential and protected under the attorney-client privilege.

RSP Recommendation 62: The Secretary of Defense develop and implement policy that, when information comes to military police about an instance of sexual assault by whatever means, the first step in an investigation is to advise the victim that she or he has the right to speak with a special victim counsel before determining whether to file a restricted or unrestricted report, or no report at all.

- To be eligible for special victim counsel representation, an adult victim of sexual assault must make an unrestricted or restricted report of sexual assault under the UCMJ and otherwise be entitled to legal assistance under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e. It is not clear whether a victim of sexual assault would know that he or she may seek the advice of a special victim counsel before reporting or electing not to report.

RSP Recommendation 63: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO, in coordination with the Services and the DoD Inspector General, to change restricted reporting policy to allow a victim who has made a restricted report to provide information to a military criminal investigative organization agent, but only when a victim advocate and/or special victim counsel is present, without the report automatically becoming unrestricted and triggering a law enforcement investigation. This should be a voluntary decision on the part of the victim. The policy should prohibit military criminal investigative organizations from using information obtained in this manner to initiate an investigation or title an alleged offender as a subject, unless the victim chooses, or changes, his or her preference to an unrestricted report. The Secretary of Defense should require this information be provided the same safeguards as other criminal intelligence data to protect against misuse of the information.

- Under current DoD policy, a victim who makes a restricted report of sexual assault cannot provide information to a military criminal investigative organizations (MCIO) investigator without the report becoming unrestricted.
- Some civilian police agencies allow a police officer or detective to speak to a sexual assault victim without automatically triggering an investigation.

RSP Recommendation 64: The Secretary of Defense implement policy that protects victims of sexual assault in the military from suffering damage to their military careers (including but not limited to weakened performance evaluations or lost promotions, security clearances, or personnel reliability certifications) based on having been a victim of sexual assault, having reported sexual assault, or having sought mental health treatment for sexual assault.

- Fear of damage to one's military career deters victims from reporting a sexual assault. Victims specifically noted concerns that mental health counseling may negatively impact their careers.

RSP Recommendation 65: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to ensure sexual assault reporting options are clarified to ensure all members of the military, including the most junior personnel, understand their options for making a restricted or unrestricted report and the channels through which they can make a report.

- Sexual assault victims currently have numerous channels outside the chain of command to report incidents of sexual assault, and they are not required to report to anyone in their military unit or any member of their chain of command. Reporting channels are broadly publicized throughout the military. Military personnel in the United States may always call civilian authorities, healthcare professionals, or other civilian agencies to report a sexual assault.
- It is not clear that a sufficient percentage of military personnel understand sexual assault reporting options. Based on recent survey results, junior enlisted personnel scored lowest in understanding the options for filing a restricted report. Nearly one-half of junior enlisted personnel surveyed believed they could make a restricted report to someone in their chain of command, which is incorrect.
- Under current law and practice, unrestricted reports of sexual assault must be referred to, and investigated by, MCIO that are independent of the chain of command. No commander or convening authority may refuse to forward an allegation to the MCIO or impede an investigation. Any attempt to do so would constitute a dereliction of duty or obstruction of justice, in violation of the UCMJ.

Reporting Data

RSP Recommendation 66: The Secretary of Defense direct that adult unwanted sexual contact reports handled by the Family Advocacy Program and recorded in its database be included in the annual DoD SAPRO report of adult unwanted sexual contact cases.

- DoD initiated the Family Advocacy Program (FAP) over twenty years ago to support military families and to provide services for victims of domestic violence and child abuse. Domestic violence victims who are also victims of sexual assault are treated and supported by the FAP.
- These incidents are recorded in the separate database used by the FAP, and not in the DSAID, which was developed to track sexual assaults. Thus, sexual assault reports that are part of domestic violence cases are not included in DoD SAPRO's annual report of adult unwanted sexual contact cases.

RSP Recommendation 67: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to develop policy and procedures for sexual assault response coordinators to input information into the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database on alleged sexual assault offenders identified by those victims who opt to make restricted reports. These policies should include procedures on whether to reveal the alleged offender's personally identifying information to the military criminal investigative organization when there is credible information the offender is identified or suspected in another sexual assault, providing safeguards for that personally identifiable information.

- DoD does not currently input data on alleged offenders identified through restricted reports into DSAID, its sexual assault case management database, because current policy prohibits collecting and storing that information. DSAID has the capability to obtain information from restricted reports that could be used to identify allegations against repeat offenders.

Victim Services

RSP Recommendation 68: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to develop and implement a process to provide the installation commander, the first O-6 and first general or flag officer in the victim's chain of command with information on status and services provided to victims filing restricted reports of sexual assault within eight days of a report. When restricted reports are made, DoD SAPRO should work with the Services to ensure adequate measures are in place to protect the identity of the victim while providing sufficient information to track the victim's care.

- DoD policy requires the sexual assault response coordinator (SARC) to inform the installation commander within 24 hours of either a restricted or unrestricted report of sexual assault being filed.
- Section 1743 of the FY14 NDAA enhanced this requirement by directing the Secretary of Defense to establish a policy requiring a written incident report that details the actions taken and services offered or provided to the victim to the installation commander, if any, the first general officer, and first officer in the grade of O-6 in the chains of command of the victim and the alleged offender within eight days of a Service member filing an unrestricted sexual assault report.
- Because the FY14 NDAA does not include the same requirement for restricted reports, senior officers within the chain of command and on an installation are not provided with follow-up information on whether a victim filing a restricted report is receiving assistance and necessary support.

RSP Recommendation 69: Service Secretaries create a means by which sexual assault victims who file a restricted report may request an expedited transfer without having to make their report unrestricted.

- There is currently no mechanism that permits a sexual assault victim to maintain his or her restricted report and request an expedited transfer.
- DoD policy does not permit victims who file a restricted report of a sexual assault to request a temporary or permanent expedited transfer from their assigned command or installation, or to a different location within their assigned duty or living location.
- If the commander knows of or learns about a sexual assault, the report becomes unrestricted, even if the victim filed or intended to file a restricted report. The commander must immediately notify the MCIO and an investigation must be opened.
- By nature of their duties, a request for a transfer on behalf of another Service member from a SARC or SAPR victim advocate provides the commander with the information that a sexual assault has taken place and the identity of the victim. Under current policy, the commander will be obligated to start an investigation, even if the victim intended the report to stay restricted.

RSP Recommendation 70: Training for medical personnel, sexual assault response coordinators, and victim advocates, include the options that a commander has available to make or affect transfers when an unrestricted report is made.

- Commanders have inherent flexibility to transfer Service members or place them on limited duty status due to medical conditions. Current DoD policy allows health care personnel to convey to the victim's unit commander any possible adverse duty impact related to the victim's medical condition and prognosis, even when the sexual assault report is restricted. Under this policy, confidential communication related to the sexual assault may not be disclosed to the commander.
- Options for proposing and arranging a transfer of a victim who files an unrestricted report were not well known among medical personnel, SARCs, or victim advocates who met with Panel representatives.

RSP Recommendation 71-A: The Service Secretaries set forth clear guidance that the DoD Safe Helpline is the single military 24/7 sexual assault crisis hotline for Service members.

RSP Recommendation 71-B: The DoD Safe Helpline establish an easily remembered number similar to its website name of SafeHelpline.org.

RSP Recommendation 71-C: DoD require the Services to provide the Safe Helpline with sufficient contact information at each installation or deployed location so that local victim service providers can be reached on a 24/7 basis.

- DoD contracted with the Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network (RAINN) to develop and staff a 24-hour secure and anonymous phone line for military sexual assault victims.
- Military installations advertise the Safe Helpline as a hotline phone number, but some also advertise their own installation numbers, which are not always answered 24 hours a day, 7 days a week and instead may require the caller to leave a message.
- Contact information provided to the Safe Helpline is not always adequate or accurate to ensure that every caller can be connected upon request to local victim service personnel (e.g., an installation's SARC or victim advocate) by the Safe Helpline staff.

RSP Recommendation 72: The Service Secretaries evaluate the availability of, and access to, adequate and consistent mental healthcare for victims of sexual assault, and the option of incorporating counselors into the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response program in a manner similar to the integration in the Family Advocacy Program.

- Despite the variety of mental health professionals who work with military Service members, sexual assault victims who appeared before the Panel described having difficulty obtaining timely mental health appointments and difficulty receiving consistent care from mental health providers.

RSP Recommendation 73: The Service Secretaries direct further development of local coordination requirements both on and off the installation, and expand requirements for installation commanders to liaison with victim support agencies.

Victim Services Personnel

RSP Recommendation 74: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to determine necessary victim advocate staffing for each Service and appropriate caseload for each victim advocate to ensure that victim advocates become and remain proficient in their duties. Victim advocate duties should include partnering with or observing other professionals who provide victim services (including community providers) or other experiential work to gain further practical skills and confidence while awaiting assignment to a case.

- There are currently more than 20,000 trained and certified SARCs and victim advocates across the Services. Some part-time, uniformed SAPR victim advocates may not ever serve a victim because they are assigned to units in which there are few or no reports of sexual assault.
- It is difficult for victim advocates who do not regularly assist victims of sexual assault to develop or maintain proficiency in providing victim support.

RSP Recommendation 75: The Secretary of Defense direct that the periodic evaluations of training provided for Services' sexual assault response coordinators and victim advocates be conducted and include an assessment as to whether the training and curriculum across the Services is uniform, is effective, and reflects all existing initiatives, programs, and policies.

- In the Fiscal Year 2012 NDAA, Congress emphasized the importance of SARC and victim advocate training by codifying a requirement for the Secretary of Defense to establish a professional and uniform training and certification program for SARCs and victim advocates.
- DoD SAPRO conducted an initial evaluation of each of the Services' SARC and victim advocate training sessions in 2012. These evaluations, while providing useful information about the Services' training programs, did not use consistent criteria for evaluation across the Services; DoD SAPRO did not assess the uniformity of the programs across the Services.

Assess Sexual Assault Prevention and Response

RSP Recommendation 76: The Secretary of Defense establish an advisory panel, comprised of persons external to the DoD, to offer to the Secretary and other senior leaders in DoD independent assessment and feedback on the effectiveness of DoD's sexual assault prevention and response programs and policies.

RSP Recommendation 77: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO to evaluate and assess all programs and initiatives dealing with sexual assault and measure the effectiveness of each to determine which programs and initiatives are effective, which should be continued, expanded, and preserved, and how best to allocate funding for the effective programs and initiatives.

- Over the last five years, Congress mandated and DoD initiated dozens of additions and changes to victim service programs, many in such quick succession that SAPR personnel had to begin implementing new initiatives before fully implementing previously required programs.
- Due to the speed with which programs and initiatives have been adopted, DoD has not thoroughly assessed and evaluated all current programs to determine their effectiveness or which should be continued, expanded or are duplicative of other programs.

RSP Recommendation 78: The Secretary of Defense direct periodic and regular evaluations of individual DoD, Service, or local Sexual Assault Prevention and Response programs and performance, to be conducted by independent organizations, which would serve to validate or disprove DoD's own internal assessments and would provide useful feedback to the Department and enhance public confidence in Sexual Assault Prevention and Response programs and initiatives.

- External evaluation of institutional and installation command climate is important to achieving credible, unbiased measurement of SAPR initiatives, programs, and effectiveness.

RSP Recommendation 79: The Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO or the DoD Inspector General to assess the roles and responsibilities of sexual assault response coordinator, victim advocate, victim witness liaison, and Family Advocacy Program personnel, to ensure advocacy personnel are effectively utilized, their roles are properly delineated to allow for excellence; overlap is minimized; that sufficient positions are designated and to determine whether their roles should be modified, and whether all current victim assistance related programs should be sustained in this resource constrained environment.

- In 2013, DoD issued Instruction 6400.07, Standards for Victim Assistance Services in the Military Community, based on standards established by the National Victim Assistance Standards Consortium.
- The purpose of DoD Instruction 6400.07 was to establish a baseline of service standards for the victim services provided under the SAPR program, FAP, Victim and Witness Assistance Program (VWAP), and the Military Equal Opportunity program, and to ensure that uniform, quality victim assistance services are provided across the Services.
- Each of these programs was established independently and at different times and with somewhat differing constituents. However, there are no additional policies or requirements outside of this instruction that require identifying gaps or redundancies in victim services.

IV. ENSURING FAIRNESS AND DUE PROCESS TO THOSE SUSPECTED OR ACCUSED OF SEXUAL ASSAULT

Unlawful Command Influence

RSP Recommendation 80: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries ensure prevention programs address concerns about unlawful command influence. In particular, commanders and leaders must ensure sexual assault prevention and response training programs and other initiatives do not create perceptions among those who may serve as panel members at courts-martial that commanders expect particular findings and/or sentences at trials or compromise an accused Service member's presumption of innocence, right to fair investigation and disposition, and access to witnesses or evidence. Judge advocates with knowledge and expertise in criminal law should review sexual assault prevention training materials to ensure the materials neither taint potential panel members (military jurors) nor present inaccurate legal information.

- In addition to protecting Service members from sexual assault and responding appropriately to incidents when they occur, commanders have an equally important obligation to support and safeguard the due process rights of those accused of sexual assault crimes.

- Evidence presented to the Panel indicates it is increasingly difficult to seat military panel members in sexual assault cases because of their exposure to sexual assault prevention programs that lead some prospective panel members to draw erroneous legal conclusions, such as the idea that consuming one alcoholic drink makes consent impossible.

Defense Investigators

RSP Recommendation 81: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators in order to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the defense mission and the fair administration of justice.

- Many civilian public defender offices have investigators on their staffs, and consider them critical. Military defense counsel instead must rely solely on the MCIO investigation and defense counsel and defense paralegals, if available, to conduct any additional investigation. Although defense counsel can request an investigator be detailed to the defense team for a particular case, defense counsel stated both convening authorities and military judges routinely deny the requests.
- Military defense counsel need independent, deployable defense investigators to zealously represent their clients and correct an obvious imbalance of resources.

Military Defense Counsel Training, Funding, and Personnel

RSP Recommendation 82: The Service Secretaries ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced in funding resources and personnel, including defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts, and direct the Services assess whether that is the case.

- Maintaining adequate resources for the defense of military personnel accused of crimes, including sexual assault, is essential to the legitimacy and fairness of the military justice system.
- Unlike many civilian public defender offices, military defense counsel organizations generally do not maintain their own budget; instead, they receive funding from the convening authority, their Service legal commands, or other sources.

RSP Recommendation 83: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps review military defense counsel training for adult sexual assault cases to ensure funding of defense training opportunities is on par with that of trial counsel.

- Some defense counsel told the Panel and the Comparative Systems Subcommittee that because they do not have independent budgets, their training opportunities were insufficient and unequal to those of their trial counsel counterparts.

RSP Recommendation 84: The Service Secretaries direct that current training efforts and programs be sustained to ensure that military defense counsel are competent, prepared, and equipped.

- Defense counsel handling adult sexual assault cases in all the Services receive specialized training. Many also have previous experience as trial counsel.

RSP Recommendation 85: The Services continue to provide experienced defense counsel through regional defense organizations and from personnel with extensive trial experience and expertise in the Reserve component.

- DoD did not establish defense capabilities analogous to the Special Victim Capability in the military trial defense organizations.
- Neither civilian public defenders nor military defense counsel specialize in sexual assault cases; instead both attempt to use the most experienced attorneys to try more complex cases, including sexual assaults. The Services' regionally organized trial defense systems meet the demand for competent and independent legal representation of Service members accused of sexual assault.

RSP Recommendation 86: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps permit only counsel with litigation experience to serve as lead counsel defense counsel in a sexual assault case as well as set the minimum tour length of defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, or designee, because of exigent circumstances or to specifically enable training of defense counsel under supervision of experienced defense counsel.

- It is difficult to develop defense experience due to the relatively low number of courts-martial and personnel turnover. The Marine Corps faces particular problems with personnel turnover because their attorneys perform line duty mission requirements and may serve in defense counsel tour lengths as short as 12 months.
- Not all military defense counsel possess trial experience prior to assuming the role of defense counsel.

Assess Defending Service Members Accused of Sexual Assault

RSP Recommendation 87: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to assess military defense counsels' performance in sexual assault cases similar to performance assessment of prosecutors and identify areas that may need improvement.

- In contrast to assessment of the performance of prosecutors, there are currently no requirements or pending initiatives for the Services to measure military defense counsel performance trying sexual assault cases.

V. IMPROVING MILITARY JUSTICE PROCEDURES

Standardize Procedures for the Investigation of Reports of Sexual Assault

RSP Recommendation 88: The Secretary of Defense direct the standardization of procedures regarding the requirement for military criminal investigative organization investigators to advise victim and witness Service members of their rights under Article 31(b) of the UCMJ for minor misconduct uncovered during the investigation of a felony to ensure there is a clear process that complies with law, throughout the Services.

- Most civilian police agencies contacted during the Panel's review reported they did not routinely pursue action for minor criminal behavior on the part of victims reporting sexual assault. They do not interrupt victim interviews to advise victims of their rights for minor offenses.
- MCIO investigators reported that stopping an interview to advise a victim of his or her rights under Article 31(b) of the UCMJ for minor misconduct that is collateral to the alleged sexual assault can make the victim reluctant to continue the interview and may hinder investigation of a reported sexual assault.
- MCIOs document minor collateral misconduct information in the case file, which is provided to the victim's commander for action, but they do not follow the same practices regarding the legal requirement to stop and advise Service members of their Article 31 rights during an interview. Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) investigators told Panel members that NCIS has an unwritten policy that investigators will not read Article 31(b) rights to victims for minor collateral misconduct, regardless of the law's requirements, because NCIS only investigates felony level crimes.

RSP Recommendation 89: The Secretary of Defense direct the commanders and directors of the military criminal investigative organizations to authorize the utilization of Marine Corps Criminal Investigation Division, military police investigators, or security forces investigators to assist in the investigation of some non-penetrative sexual assault cases under the direct supervision of a special victim unit investigator to retain oversight.

- Unlike patrol officers in many civilian jurisdictions, military police have no discretion regarding the handling of sexual assault reports. They must immediately report all incidents of sexual assault to the MCIO, which assigns cases to investigators who meet specified training requirements.
- DoD policy now requires assignment of specially trained and selected MCIO investigators as the lead investigators for all sexual assault cases, which has substantially increased MCIO case loads. The policy precludes assignment of Marine Corps Criminal Investigation Division investigators, military police investigators, or security forces investigators to sexual assault investigations.

RSP Recommendation 90: The Secretary of Defense direct commanders and directors of the military criminal investigative organizations to require special victim investigators not assigned to a dedicated special victim unit coordinate with a senior special victim unit agent on all sexual assault cases.

- Large civilian police agencies and MCIOs have special victim units (SVUs) comprised of specially trained investigators who are experienced in responding to sexual assaults. Smaller agencies and offices without an SVU often have a specially trained detective to investigate sexual assaults, and they coordinate with larger offices for assistance and guidance.
- Investigators located at smaller installations are often not dedicated SVU investigators specializing in sexual assault, and there is currently no requirement for these agents to coordinate with a dedicated SVU investigator supporting the Special Victim Capability.

RSP Recommendation 91: The Secretary of Defense direct a review of the Services' procedures for approving military criminal investigative organizations agent requests to conduct timely pretext phone calls and text messages and establish a standardized procedure to facilitate and expedite military criminal investigative organizations' use of this investigative technique, in accordance with law.

- Pretext phone calls and texts are an important investigative technique commonly used to corroborate victim complaints and obtain incriminating or exculpatory statements by suspects.
- Civilian detectives indicated they have no difficulty obtaining permission for pretext calls and texts. In contrast, the Services have different procedures to approve recorded pretext phone calls and text messages, based on differing interpretations of legal standards. Some military procedures can require several days to obtain approval.

RSP Recommendation 92: The Secretary of Defense direct the appropriate agency to eliminate the requirement to collect plucked hair samples as part of a sexual assault forensic examination.

- Military and civilian laboratory examiners and medical forensic examiners told Panel members that the taking of plucked hairs was of little probative value.

RSP Recommendation 93: The Secretary of Defense direct the Service Secretaries to standardize the process for determining a case is unfounded. The decision to unfound reports should apply the Uniform Crime Reporting Program standard to determine if a case should be unfounded. Only those reports determined to be false or baseless should be unfounded.

- While various definitions used within DoD for unfounding decisions conceptually meet the same intent as the "false or baseless" definition by the UCR Program, the Services apply the term inconsistently or use additional or different definitions.
- In the Army, commanders do not determine whether to unfound cases because Army CID makes the decisions after coordinating with the trial counsel based on a probable cause standard. However, in the Air Force, the Navy, and the Coast Guard, commanders make unfounding determinations, not the MCIOs.
- The Army follows a different procedure than the other Services. Army trial counsel provide an opinion on whether there is probable cause the suspect committed the offense to the investigating agent prior to presenting a case to the commander for a disposition decision. The trial counsel's opinion as to probable cause is reflected in the case file. In Fiscal Year 2012, the trial counsel, acting in coordination with the Army Criminal Investigation Command, determined that 25% of the cases involving sexual assault allegations, 118 out of 476 cases, lacked probable cause and the cases were closed. In contrast, the other Services' MCIOs present all cases to the commanders who consult with the supporting trial counsel to determine the appropriate disposition of each case.

RSP Recommendation 94-A: The Secretary of Defense direct military criminal investigative organizations to standardize their procedures to require that military criminal investigative organization investigators coordinate with the trial counsel to review all of the evidence, and to annotate in the case file, that the trial counsel agrees all appropriate investigation has taken place, before providing a report to the appropriate commander for a disposition decision. Neither the trial counsel, nor the investigator, should be permitted to make a dispositive opinion whether probable cause exists.

RSP Recommendation 94-B: To ensure investigators continue to remain responsive to investigative requests after the commander receives the case file, the military criminal investigative organization commanders and directors continue to ensure investigators are trained that all sexual assault cases remain open for further investigation until final disposition of the case.

- Some trial counsel reported that MCIOs are not always responsive to their specific investigative requests and MCIOs do not always coordinate completed investigations with senior trial counsel prior to issuing their final reports.

Audit Investigations

RSP Recommendation 95: The Secretary of Defense direct an audit of sexual assault investigations by persons or entities outside DoD specifically qualified to conduct such audits.

- External agencies conducted audits of closed case files at several police departments to assess transparency and ensure confidence in the police response to sexual assault.
- The DoD Inspector General provides oversight of sexual assault training within the DoD investigative community, but there is currently no procedure for an entity outside DoD to review sexual assault investigations to ensure cases are appropriately investigated and classified.

Sustain and Fund Forensic and Investigative Capabilities

RSP Recommendation 96: The Secretary of Defense direct military criminal investigative organization commanders and directors to carefully select and train military investigators assigned as investigators for special victim units, and whenever possible, utilize civilians for specialized investigative oversight to maximize continuity and expertise. Military criminal investigation organization commanders and directors ensure that military personnel assigned to a special victim unit have the competence and commitment to investigate sexual assault cases.

- A best practice in civilian investigative agencies with SVUs is careful interview and selection of applicants to ensure those investigators with biases or a lack of interest in investigating sexual assault cases are not assigned, as well as reassigning those who experience "burn out."

- A best practice in the military is the assignment of civilian investigators to supervise the SVU enhancing the continuity of investigations and coordination with other agencies involved in responding to sexual assault cases.
- Based on military mission requirements and the resulting need for flexibility in personnel assignments, a military Service member agent may be assigned to support an SVU or act as the lead agent on a sexual assault investigation.
- Both military and civilian agencies recognize the possibility of potential biases or factually inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior in their officers and investigators.

RSP Recommendation 97: The Secretary of Defense direct commanders and directors of the military criminal investigative organizations to continue training of all levels of law enforcement personnel on potential biases and inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior. The Secretary of Defense direct the military criminal investigation organizations to also train investigators against the use of language that inaccurately or inappropriately implies consent of the victim in reports.

- Military investigators have more robust and specialized sexual assault investigation training than their civilian counterparts. The Services require investigators assigned to SVUs to have advanced training, but the courses vary in content and emphasis.
- A best practice in military and civilian agencies is to provide training to address potential biases and inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior, preparing officers and investigators to effectively respond to and investigate sexual assault.
- In both civilian and military law enforcement communities, bias in the terms used in documenting sexual assaults sometimes inappropriately or inaccurately implies consent of the victim.

RSP Recommendation 98: Congress appropriate funds for training of sexual assault investigation personnel. The Secretary of Defense direct the Service Secretaries to program and budget funding, as allowed by law, for the military criminal investigative organizations to provide advanced training on sexual assault investigations to special victim unit investigators.

- The MCIOs face a continual challenge to ensure adequate funding is available to send investigators to advanced sexual assault investigation training courses.

RSP Recommendation 99: The Service Secretaries direct their Surgeons General to: (1) review Section 1725 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, which requires the assignment of at least one full-time sexual assault nurse examiner to each military medical facility with a 24 hour, seven days a week emergency room, and (2) provide recommendations to amend the legislation so as to permit the most effective way to provide sexual assault forensic examinations at their facilities, given that many civilian medical facilities have more experienced forensic examiners than are typically located on a military installation and those facilities serve as the community's center of excellence for sexual assault forensic examinations.

- In civilian jurisdictions, specially trained nurses or other trained health care providers perform sexual assault forensic examinations (SAFEs). Not all civilian hospitals have a trained provider on staff. In those locations, victims may be transported to a designated location where forensic exams are routinely performed or a provider will respond to the victim's hospital. Having a pool of designated trained professionals who frequently are called to conduct SAFEs increases the level of expertise of those examiners and improves the quality of the exam.

- The FY14 NDAA requirement that all military treatment facilities with a 24 hour, seven days a week emergency room capability maintain a sexual assault nurse examiner (SANE), is overly prescriptive. Depending on the location, many civilian medical facilities serve as the community's center of excellence for SAFEs and have more experienced SANEs than are typically available on a military installation.

RSP Recommendation 100: The Secretary of Defense exempt DNA and other examiners at the Defense Forensic Science Center, as well as other critical civilian members of the criminal investigative process, from future furloughs, to the extent allowed by law.

- DNA and other examiners at the Defense Forensic Science Center/United States Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory (DFSC/USACIL) were not exempted from Federal government furloughs in 2013, which resulted in delays processing evidence and increased DNA processing times.

Train Sexual Assault Forensic Examiners

RSP Recommendation 101: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to create a working group to coordinate the Services' efforts, leverage expertise, and consider whether a joint forensic exam course open to all military and DoD practitioners, perhaps at the Joint Medical Education and Training Center, or portable forensic training and jointly designed refresher courses would help to ensure a robust baseline of common training across all Services.

- The Department of Justice national guidelines form the basis for SAFE training in the military and civilian communities; however, the Services instituted different programs and developed guidelines independently.

Special Victim Capability in Sexual Assault Cases

RSP Recommendation 102: The Secretary of Defense maintain the requirement for an investigator to notify the prosecution section of the staff judge advocate's legal office of an unrestricted sexual assault report within 24 hours, and for the special victim prosecutor to consult with the investigator within 48 hours, and monthly, thereafter. Establish milestones to insert the prosecutor into the investigative process early and to ensure that the special victim prosecutor contacts the victim or the victim's counsel as soon as possible after an unrestricted report.

- When prosecutors become involved in sexual assault cases early, including meeting with the victim, victims are more likely to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of the alleged offender.
- Military special prosecutors are on call and follow similar procedures as their civilian counterparts in large offices with ride-along programs. DoD established timelines to ensure military prosecutors' early involvement in sexual assault investigations. MCIOs inform the legal office within 24 hours of learning of a report, and the special prosecutor coordinates with the investigator within 48 hours. There is no current requirement for the prosecutor to meet with the victim as soon as possible.

RSP Recommendation 103: The Secretary of Defense direct that the Directive-Type Memorandum 14-003, the policy document that addresses the Special Victim Capability, be revised so that definitions of "covered offenses" accurately reflect specific offenses listed in the relevant version(s) of Article 120 of the UCMJ.

- Using definitions from the UCMJ will clarify responsibilities and improve resource allocation. The generic terms in the Directive-Type Memorandum could be interpreted to exclude some current sex-related offenses, including rape, or include conduct that is not a specific offense in the UCMJ, such as domestic violence.

RSP Recommendation 104: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries develop policy that does not require special victim prosecutors to handle every sexual assault under Article 120 of the UCMJ. Due to the resources required, the wide range of conduct that falls within current sexual assault offenses in the UCMJ, and the difficulty of providing the capability in remote locations, a blanket requirement for special victim prosecutors to handle every case undermines effective prevention, investigation, and prosecution.

Sustain Special Victim Capability

RSP Recommendation 105: The Service Secretaries continue to fully implement the special victim prosecutor programs within the Special Victim Capability and further develop and sustain the expertise of prosecutors, investigators, victim witness liaisons, and paralegals in large jurisdictions or by regions for complex sexual assault cases.

- The Services have implemented the Special Victim Capability Congress mandated in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 and the Panel is optimistic about this approach.

RSP Recommendation 106: The Service Secretaries continue to assess and meet the need for well-trained prosecutors to support the Services' Special Victim Capabilities, especially if there is increased reporting of sexual assaults.

- Experienced civilian advocates serve an important role in training prosecution and defense counsel in the Army, Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps. Given the attrition and transience of military counsel, civilian involvement in training ensures an enduring base level of experience and continuity, and adds an important perspective. Civilian expert advocate participation also adds transparency and validity to military counsel training programs.
- DoD has dedicated substantial resources to combat sexual assault. DoD did not authorize any additional personnel to the individual Services specifically to meet the requirement for special prosecutors within the Special Victim Capability, although the Services may have obtained additional personnel prior to the Congressional mandate.
- The Services fully fund special prosecutors' case preparation requirements.

RSP Recommendation 107-A: The Secretary of Defense assess the various strengths and weaknesses of different co-location models at locations throughout the Armed Forces to continue to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of investigation and prosecution of sexual assault offenses.

RSP Recommendation 107-B: The Service Secretaries direct that each Service's Judge Advocate General Corps and military criminal investigative organizations work together to co-locate prosecutors and investigators who handle sexual assault cases on installations where sufficient caseloads justify consolidation and resources are available. Additionally, locating a forensic exam room with special victim prosecutors and investigators, where caseloads justify such an arrangement, can help minimize the travel and trauma to victims while maximizing the speed and effectiveness of investigations. Because of the importance of protecting privileged communication with victims, the Panel does not recommend that the sexual assault response coordinator, victim advocate, special victim counsel or other victim support personnel be merged with the offices of prosecutors and investigators.

- Organizational structures of civilian prosecution offices vary. Some civilian prosecutors specialize in sexual assault cases for their entire careers or rotate through sex crime units specializing for a few years, whereas others do not specialize and handle all felony level crimes. The structure of civilian prosecution offices depends upon the size of the jurisdiction, the resources available, the caseload, as well as the leadership's philosophy for assigning these complex cases.
- Consolidated facilities can improve communication between prosecutors, investigators, and victims. These facilities may help minimize additional trauma to victims following a sexual assault by locating all of the resources required to respond, support, investigate, and prosecute sexual assault cases in one building. However, these models require substantial resources and the right mix of personnel. Co-locating prosecutors and victim services personnel may also compromise privileges for military victim advocates or cause other perception problems.

RSP Recommendation 108: The Secretary of Defense require standardization of Special Victim Capability duty titles to reduce confusion and enable comparability of Service programs, while permitting the Service Secretaries to structure the capability itself in a manner that fits each Service's organizational structure.

Assess Special Victim Capability

RSP Recommendation 109: The Secretary of Defense assess the Special Victim Capability annually to determine the effectiveness of the multidisciplinary approach and the resources required to sustain the capability, as well as continue to develop metrics such as the victim "drop-out" rate, rather than conviction rates, to determine success.

- DoD established evaluation criteria to ensure expert prosecution of special victim offense cases and appropriate care for victims by Special Victim Capability personnel. The Army also uses the victim "drop out" rate to measure the effectiveness of its Special Victim Prosecutor program. Since the Army established its program in 2009, only 6% of sexual assault victims "dropped out" or were unable to continue to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of the case. In contrast, in 2011, prior to implementing its specially trained prosecutors program and victims' counsel, the Air Force experienced a 29% victim drop-out rate.

Sustain and Fund Judge Advocate Training

RSP Recommendation 110: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps sustain or increase training of judge advocates to maintain the expertise necessary to litigate adult sexual assault cases in spite of the turnover created by personnel rotations within the Services' Judge Advocate General Corps.

- There are no national or state minimum training standards or experience for civilian prosecutors handling adult sexual assault crimes. Though each civilian prosecution office has different training practices, most sex crime prosecutor training occurs through supervised experience handling pretrial motions, trials, and appeals.
- Civilian sex crimes prosecutors usually have at least three years of prosecution experience, and often more than five. Experience can also be measured by the number of trials completed, though there is no uniform minimum required number of trials to be assigned adult sexual assault cases. Some prosecutors in medium to large offices have caseloads of at least 50-60 cases, and spend at least two days per week in court.
- All the Services have specially-trained and selected lawyers who serve as lead trial counsel in sexual assault crimes cases. Defense counsel handling adult sexual assault cases in all the Services are also trained; many previously served as trial counsel.

RSP Recommendation 111: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps sustain and broaden the emphasis on developing and maintaining shared resources, expertise, and experience in prosecuting and defending adult sexual assault crimes.

RSP Recommendation 112: The Secretary of Defense direct the establishment of a DoD judge advocate criminal law joint training working group to optimize sharing of best practices, resources, and expertise for prosecuting and defending adult sexual assault cases. The working group should produce a concise written report, delivered to the Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps at least annually, for the next five calendar years.

The working group should identify best practices, strive to eliminate redundancy, consider consolidated training, consider ways to enhance expertise in litigating sexual assault cases, and monitor training and experience throughout the Services. The working group should review training programs such as: the Army's Special Victim Prosecutor program; the Navy's Military Justice Litigation Career Track program; the Highly Qualified Expert programs used for training in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; the Trial Counsel Assistance and Defense Counsel Assistance Programs; the Navy's use of quarterly judicial evaluations of counsel; and any other potential best practices, civilian or military.

- Currently, all Services send attorneys to training courses and the Judge Advocate General schools of the other Services. The Services also informally share resources, personnel, lessons for training, and collaborate on some training. This enables counsel to share successful tactics, strategies, and approaches, but these practices are not formalized and have not led to the clarification of terms and processes that would enhance comparability and efficiency.
- Trial counsel in all the Services generally have more standardized and extensive training than some of their civilian counterparts, but fewer years of prosecution and trial experience. The Services all use a combination of experienced supervising attorneys, systematic sexual assault training, and smaller caseloads to address experience disparities. Additionally, the Navy has developed the Military Justice Litigation Career Track program for its attorneys.

- Military judges in the Navy prepare quarterly evaluations of counsel's advocacy that are forwarded to the Chief Judge of the Navy for review and shared with the Defense Counsel Assistance Program for use in training plans. The other Services do not similarly measure and assess performance following advanced training.

Military Sexual Assault Statute and Jurisdiction

RSP Recommendation 113: The Judicial Proceedings Panel and Joint Service Committee consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120.

RSP Recommendation 114: Congress not enact Section 3(b) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014, which requires the convening authority to give "great weight" to a victim's preference where the sexual assault case be tried, in civilian or military court. The Services do not have control over the civilian justice system, and jurisdiction must be based on legal authority, not the victim's personal preferences, so this decision should remain within the discretion of the civilian prosecutor's office and the convening authority.

- Jurisdiction is based on legal authority, not necessarily the victim's preferences.
- Decisions about whether civilian or military authorities will prosecute a case are routinely negotiated in cases of shared jurisdiction. The Panel did not hear of problems with coordination between civilian prosecutors and military legal offices. In fact, the opposite appears to be true. There appears to be significant coordination and cooperation between military and civilian authorities with concurrent jurisdiction.

Article 32 Proceedings

RSP Recommendation 115: The Judicial Proceedings Panel assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers.

- Civilian jurisdictions have differing approaches to victim testimony before trial. In Philadelphia, for example, victims must testify at preliminary hearings with limited exceptions; in Washington State, either party may request to interview material witnesses under oath before trial.
- In Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA, Congress enacted substantial changes to the Article 32 pretrial investigation, transforming it into a preliminary hearing and establishing that crime victims may not be compelled to testify at the proceeding. This may result in additional requests to depose victims and other witnesses.

RSP Recommendation 116: The Secretary of Defense direct the Military Justice Review Group or Joint Service Committee to evaluate if there are circumstances when a general court-martial convening authority should not have authority to override an Article 32 investigating officer's recommendation against referral of an investigated charge for trial by court-martial.

- Convening authorities should generally retain referral discretion and should not be bound in all circumstances by the recommendations of an Article 32 investigating officer.

Study Military Plea Bargaining Process

RSP Recommendation 117: The Judicial Proceedings Panel study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified.

- In civilian jurisdictions, most plea agreements between the prosecutor and defendant are for an agreed-upon sentence, which the judge accepts or rejects entirely. Some jurisdictions use plea deals that consist of agreements to sentences within a range; the judge then determines the exact sentence within that range.
- In the military justice system, the accused may negotiate a pretrial agreement (plea bargain) with the convening authority, through the staff judge advocate, that places a limit or "cap" on the maximum sentence the accused will serve in exchange for a guilty plea. The sentencing authority does not know the agreed limit prior to adjudging the sentence. The accused gets the benefit of whichever is lower, the adjudged sentence or the cap agreed to with the convening authority.
- Accused Service members plead not guilty in a large majority of military sexual assault cases, possibly due to evidentiary challenges, issues in proving sexual assault charges beyond a reasonable doubt, and the requirement to register as a sex offender if convicted.
- Some civilian defense attorneys are using sex offender risk assessments at various stages of proceedings. Evidence demonstrates that sex offender risk assessments can be used as a tool to help promote rehabilitation and prevent recidivism by identifying appropriate therapy. Defense attorneys sometimes use risk assessments when negotiating a plea bargain with the government.

Study Military Judge's Pre-Referral Role

RSP Recommendation 118: It is the sense of the Panel that military judges should be involved in the military justice process at an earlier stage to better protect the rights of victims and the accused. The Secretary of Defense direct the Military Justice Review Group or Joint Services Committee to evaluate the feasibility and consequences of involving military judges at an earlier stage.

- Civilian judges or magistrates control the proceedings in preliminary matters from the time of indictment or arrest of the defendant, whichever is earlier, while military judges do not usually become involved until a convening authority refers charges to a court-martial which can cause or result in inefficiencies in the process and ineffective or inadequate remedies for the government, accused, and victims.
- Military defense counsel currently submit requests for witnesses, experts, and resources through the trial counsel and staff judge advocate to the convening authority. Depending on Service practice, the trial counsel, as the representative of the convening authority in a court-martial, may determine whether to grant or deny defense witness requests, other than expert witness requests which require the convening authority's personal decision. Additionally, if the convening authority denies the request, the defense counsel must wait until the case is referred to submit the request to the military judge. No similar practice is found in civilian jurisdictions.

- This practice requires defense counsel to disclose more information to the trial counsel sooner than their civilian counterparts, requiring them to reveal information about defense witnesses and their theory of the case to justify the requests, which may hinder the ability of defense counsel to provide constitutionally effective representation to their clients.
- Military trial counsel request and obtain resources and witnesses without notifying the defense or disclosing a justification and, in most instances, without a specific request for the convening authority's personal decision. This leads to a perception that trial counsel have unlimited access to obtain witnesses and resources and that the process for obtaining witnesses and other evidence is imbalanced in favor of the government.
- In the civilian sector, some public defenders have subpoena power or they request subpoenas through the judge. Military defense counsel do not have subpoena power. In contrast, military trial counsel have nationwide subpoena power with rare judicial oversight.
- Giving military judges an enhanced role in pre-trial proceedings would affect the prosecution of all cases, not only sexual assaults.
- Further study is appropriate to fully assess what positive and negative impacts would result from moving some pretrial or trial responsibilities from convening authorities to military judges.

Training Military Judges

RSP Recommendation 119: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps continue to fund and expand programs that provide a permanent civilian presence in the training structure for both trial and defense counsel. The Services should continue to leverage experienced military Reservists and civilian attorneys for training, expertise, and experience.

RSP Recommendation 120: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps continue to fund sufficient training opportunities for military judges and consider more joint and consolidated programs.

Character Evidence of the Accused at Trial

RSP Recommendation 121: Congress should enact Section 3(g) of the Victim's Protection Act of 2014 because it may increase victim confidence. Further changes to the military rules of evidence regarding character evidence are not necessary at this time.

- Civilian and military rules of evidence about introducing character evidence in criminal trials are nearly identical. The rules of evidence in both military and civilian jurisdictions permit relevant character evidence at trial. The military courts have consistently ruled that a Service member's good military character may be admissible during trial as a relevant character trait.

- Section 3(g) of the VPA would modify Military Rule of Evidence 404(a) regarding the character of the accused. The provision prohibits the admission at trial of evidence of general military character to raise reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt. The proposal permits the admission of evidence of military character at trial when it is relevant to an element of an offense for which the accused has been charged. Therefore, the accused retains the ability to offer military character evidence so long as defense counsel establish a proper basis to demonstrate its relevance to an element of a charged offense.
- The Panel cautions, however, that this change is unlikely to result in significant modification of current trial practice. Military and other character evidence properly remains relevant and admissible at trial as part of the accused's defense under appropriate circumstances, and can, on its own, raise reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt.

Study Judge-Alone Sentencing

RSP Recommendation 122: The Secretary of Defense direct a study to analyze whether changes should be made to the Manual for Courts-Martial, the UCMJ, and Service regulations, respectively, to make military judges the sole sentencing authority in sexual assault and other cases in the military justice system.

- In the federal criminal justice system and 44 states, judges, not juries, impose sentences for convicted offenders in noncapital cases, including adult sexual assault cases. There are six states that allow jury sentencing in felony cases. The military retains an option for sentencing by panel members at the accused's request.

Unitary Sentencing

RSP Recommendation 123: The Secretary of Defense recommend amendments to the Manual for Courts-Martial and UCMJ to impose sentences which require the sentencing authority to enumerate the specific sentence awarded for each offense and to impose sentences for multiple offenses consecutively or concurrently to the President and Congress, respectively.

- The military system uses a unitary or aggregate sentence provision for multiple specifications (counts) of conviction. In other words, a sentence is adjudged as a total for all offenses, rather than by specific offense.
- Changes to Article 60 of the UCMJ in the FY14 NDAA restrict the convening authority's ability to set aside or commute findings of guilt, and specifically exclude offenses under Article 120(a) or 120(b), Article 120b, or Article 125 of the UCMJ. Offenders may be convicted on other non-sexual offense charges in addition to being convicted for a sexual offense. Imposing a sentence as a total rather than for each offense of conviction means the convening authority's ability to act on these additional specifications is unclear. It also obscures the punitive consequences of specified offenses and makes accountability for sexual assault difficult to ascertain.

Sentencing Guidelines

RSP Recommendation 124: The Panel does not recommend the military adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases at this time.

- There are no sentencing guidelines in the military justice system for sexual assault or any other offense. Instead, the President establishes by Executive Order a maximum punishment for each offense. In contrast, the federal system, twenty states, and the District of Columbia use some form of a sentencing guideline system.
- Sentencing guidelines are often complex and may require substantial infrastructure to support them, including sentencing commissions which study, develop, implement and amend the guidelines over time. For instance, to formulate baseline recommendations for federal sentencing guidelines, the United States Sentencing Commission collected and examined data from 100,000 cases that had been sentenced in federal courts—10,000 of which it studied in "great detail." Twenty-four states and the District of Columbia currently have sentencing commissions.
- A proper analysis of sentencing guidelines would require the appropriate time and resources to: (a) gather the data and rationale to support such a recommendation, (b) determine the form the guidelines should take, (c) and assess whether the military should adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases.
- A proper assessment of whether the military should adopt some form of sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases requires in depth study.
- The Panel heard no empirical evidence of whether inappropriate sentencing disparities exist in sexual assault or other courts-martial. After gathering evidence and testimony from federal and state experts in sentencing guidelines, the Panel recognized that a complete study would involve a comprehensive comparison to federal and state sentencing guidelines to determine whether they would be appropriate in the military justice system, and if so, what guideline model to follow.
- There are numerous complicated policy and structural issues to factor into such a decision, including:
  - The overarching goals in current state and federal sentencing guidelines vary based on the method of development, articulated purposes, structure, and application. Some common objectives include reducing sentencing disparities, achieving proportionality in sentencing, and protecting public safety.
  - There are two approaches used in creating sentencing guidelines: (1) a descriptive approach, which is data-driven and used to achieve uniformity, and (2) a prescriptive approach, which is used to promote certain sentences.
  - Different entities oversee sentencing guidelines in the state and federal systems, with some choosing judicial agencies and others choosing legislative agencies.
  - The flexibility of sentencing guidelines varies widely in the states, ranging from mandatory to presumptively applicable to completely discretionary.
  - Additional details include: (1) whether a worksheet or structured form is required, (2) whether the commission regularly reports on guidelines compliance, (3) whether compelling and substantial reasons are required for departures,(4) whether written rationales are required for departures, and (5) whether there is appellate review of defendant or government based challenges related to sentencing guidelines.

  - The actual prison sentences defendants serve in jurisdictions with sentencing guidelines also varies depending on laws affecting parole and other "truth in sentencing" issues.
- The public has an interest in military justice case outcomes, especially in adult sexual assault cases. In 2013, the Navy began publishing the results of all special and general courts-martial to the Navy Times on a monthly basis.

Mandatory Minimums

RSP Recommendation 125: Congress not enact further mandatory minimum sentences in sexual assault cases at this time.

- Very few military offenses currently require mandatory minimum sentences. A DoD-directed study of military justice in combat zones recently recommended review of "whether to amend the UCMJ to eliminate the mandatory life sentence for premeditated murder and vest discretion in the court-martial to adjudge an appropriate sentence."
- Mandatory minimum sentences remain controversial. Testimony and other evidence gathered from civilian prosecutors, civilian defense counsel, and victim advocacy organizations demonstrates that mandatory minimum sentences do not prevent or deter adult sexual assault crimes, increase victim confidence, or increase victim reporting.
- Mandatory minimum sentences may decrease the likelihood of resolving cases through guilty pleas, especially if the mandatory minimum sentences are perceived as severe.

Chapter One:

OVERVIEW OF PANEL ASSESSMENT

A. RESPONSE SYSTEMS PANEL STATUTORY CHARTER

Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to establish the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("Response Systems Panel," "RSP," or "Panel") "to conduct an independent review and assessment of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate crimes involving adult sexual assault and related offenses under Section 920 of Title 10, United States Code (Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ)), for the purpose of developing recommendations regarding how to improve the effectiveness of such systems."[1] The nine-member Panel, established in May 2013, was composed of five Secretary of Defense appointees and one member each appointed by the chairman and ranking members of the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.[2] The Honorable Barbara S. Jones (Retired) served as Panel Chair.

Congress tasked the Response Systems Panel to conduct a systemic review and assessment of military response systems to make specific recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assault related crimes. As part of its review, Congress initially assigned the following duties to the Panel:

1. Using criteria the Panel considers appropriate, an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the systems, including the administration of the Uniform Code of the Military Justice, and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes during the period 2007 through 2011;

2. A comparison of military and civilian systems for the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes. This comparison shall include an assessment of differences in providing support and protection to victims and the identification of civilian best practices that may be incorporated into any phase of the military system;

3. An assessment of advisory sentencing guidelines used in civilian courts in adult sexual assault cases and whether it would be advisable to promulgate sentencing guidelines for use in courts-martial;

4. An assessment of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, including their experience in defending or prosecuting adult sexual assault crimes and related offenses, as compared to prosecution and defense counsel for similar cases in the federal and state court systems;

5. An assessment and comparison of military court-martial conviction rates with those in the federal and state courts and the reasons for any differences;

6. An assessment of the roles and effectiveness of commanders at all levels in preventing sexual assaults and responding to reports of sexual assault;

7. An assessment of the strengths and weakness of proposed legislative initiatives to modify the current role of commanders in the administration of military justice and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crime;

8. An assessment of the adequacy of the systems and procedures to support and protect victims in all phases of the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes, including whether victims are provided the rights afforded by Section 3771 of Title 18, United States Code, Department of Defense Directive 1030.1, and Department of Defense Instruction 1030.2; and

9. Such other matters and materials the Panel considers appropriate.[3]

In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA), Congress assigned additional duties to the Panel. These included:

1. An assessment of the impact, if any, that removing from the chain of command any disposition authority regarding charges preferred under Chapter 47 of Title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), would have on overall reporting and prosecution of sexual assault cases;

2. An assessment regarding whether the roles, responsibilities, and authorities of Special Victims' Counsel to provide legal assistance under Section 1044e of Title 10, United States Code, as added by Section 1716, to victims of alleged sex-related offenses should be expanded to include legal standing to represent the victim during investigative and military justice proceedings in connection with the prosecution of the offense;

3. An assessment of the feasibility and appropriateness of extending to victims of crimes covered by [the UCMJ] the right afforded a crime victim in civilian criminal legal proceedings under subsection 17 (a)(4) of Section 3771 of Title 18, United States Code, and the legal standing to seek enforcement of crime victim rights provided by subsection (d) of such section;

4. An assessment of the means by which the name, if known, and other necessary identifying information of an alleged offender that is collected as part of a restricted report of a sexual assault could be compiled into a protected searchable database accessible only to military criminal investigators, Sexual Assault Response Coordinators, or other appropriate personnel only for the purposes of identifying individuals who are subjects of multiple accusations of sexual assault and encouraging victims to make an unrestricted report of sexual assault in those cases in order to facilitate increased prosecutions, particularly of serial offenders;

5. An assessment of the opportunities for clemency provided in the military and civilian systems, the appropriateness of clemency proceedings in the military system, the manner in which clemency is used in the military system, and whether clemency in the military justice system could be reserved until the end of the appeals process; and

6. An assessment of whether the Department of Defense should promulgate, and ensure the understanding of and compliance with, a formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response, as a means for addressing those issues within the Armed Forces. If the

Panel recommends such a formal statement, the Panel shall provide key elements or principles that should be included in the formal statement.[4]

In addition to the tasks Congress assigned the Panel, on September 4, 2013, the Acting General Counsel of the Department of Defense, on behalf of the Secretary of Defense, requested the Panel "study the advisability of adopting mandatory minimum sentences for the most serious sexual assault offenses, including rape and sodomy . . . [and] assess the possible collateral consequences of such mandatory minimum sentences (including likely effects on sexual assault reporting, the ratio of guilty pleas to contested cases, and conviction rates)."[5] Congress initially required the Panel to submit its report and recommendations to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives, through the Secretary of Defense, within eighteen months after the Panel's first public meeting on June 27, 2013. The FY14 NDAA reduced the time allotted to twelve months.

B. METHODOLOGY SUMMARY

The Panel utilized various methods to gather information and gain a comprehensive understanding to inform its findings and recommendations. Appendix D provides a complete description of the Response System Panel's methodology. To complete the Panel's expansive assessment in the time allotted, at the Chair's request, the Secretary of Defense established three subcommittees: Comparative Systems, Role of the Commander, and Victim Services, and assigned each specific objectives in support of the Panel. Four Panel members and additional subject matter experts served on each subcommittee. The subcommittees submitted reports and proposed recommendations to the Panel, which the Panel considered in its own deliberations. The subcommittees' reports to the Panel contain a wealth of information about the topics assigned to each subcommittee and are included as an Annex to the Panel's report.

Overall, the Response Systems Panel held 14 days of public meetings, heard from 154 witnesses, and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. The three subcommittees held 65 additional meetings, heard from 456 additional witnesses, and also received and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. Witnesses provided the Panel and subcommittees a wide variety of perspectives, experiences, and expertise. The Panel especially appreciates the gracious participation of our Allies from Australia, Canada, Israel, and the United Kingdom and the contributions and testimony of sexual assault survivors. In accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act,[6] the Panel also received written submissions from members of the public and heard public comments at its meetings. Appendix E provides a complete list of meetings and those who provided testimony to both the Panel and its subcommittees.

In addition to information received from witnesses at Panel and subcommittee meetings, the Panel and its subcommittees gathered information from site visits, requests for information, publicly available documents and studies, legal research, and general research to support their assessments. Panel and subcommittee members visited military installations, crime laboratories, civilian law enforcement, and victim support organizations to consult with personnel involved in military and civilian response systems. The Panel Chair sent letters with more than 150 requests for information to the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the Military Services and received more than 15,000 pages of narrative responses and supporting policies, procedures, data, correspondence, and surveys. The Panel also requested input from eighteen victim advocacy organizations, including organizations specifically addressing military sexual assault. Finally, the Panel researched publicly available information, case law on victims' rights in civilian and military justice systems, and historical trends. Appendix F provides a complete list of sources that are referenced in this report.

Information received and considered by the Panel is available on its website (http://responsesystemspanel.whs.mil/). The Panel wishes to express its gratitude to all presenters and to those who provided information and other assistance as part of this review and assessment.

C. RECENT AND ONGOING LEGISLATIVE AND POLICY INITIATIVES DIRECTED AT SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Since it directed the development of a uniform sexual assault prevention and response policy in 2005, Congress has adopted many other statutory reforms that shape programs and responses in DoD. Part of the Panel's study focused on Article 120 of the UCMJ, which proscribes the primary sexual violence offenses criminalized by the Code. Congress overhauled Article 120 twice in five years; the most recent version became effective June 28, 2012.[7]

Legislation targeting sexual assault in the military has continued at a fast pace, particularly throughout the last two years and during the pendency of the Panel's assessment. A full list of recent legislative amendments addressing sexual assault prevention and response in the military appears in Appendix G. During the Panel's review, Congress enacted a record 36 sexual assault provisions in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA)[8] in December 2013. These amendments and their potential impact on particular aspects of sexual assault prevention and response programs in DoD are discussed throughout this report.

Collectively, the 36 sexual assault related provisions included in the FY14 NDAA represent the most comprehensive modification of the military justice system in decades. Some provisions only recently took effect, others will not take effect until later this year. Because these reforms are comprehensive and their impact must be considered in practice, meaningful assessment of the cumulative impact of these changes will take time.

Contemporaneous with Congressional action, DoD has imposed substantial policy requirements to address the issue of sexual assault.[9] For example, DoD released the most recent update to its Sexual Assault Prevention Strategy on May 1, 2014.[10] Other notable recent DoD policies include establishing a special victim unit within each Service in 2012, mandating enhanced training programs for sexual assault prevention,[11] and requiring the Services in 2013 to create special victim counsel programs to represent sexual assault victims. Department of Defense policy requirements and modifications, including their impact on particular aspects of sexual assault prevention and response programs, when possible, are discussed throughout this report.

While recent legislative and policy actions to address military sexual assault have been extensive, lawmakers continue to propose additional measures to modify military sexual assault prevention and response activities. On January 14, 2014, Senator Claire McCaskill (D-MO) filed the Victims Protection Act of 2014 (VPA), which aims to provide additional enhancements to the sexual assault prevention and response activities of the Armed Forces. On March 10, 2014, the Senate unanimously passed the VPA and sent it to the House of Representatives for consideration.[12] The VPA passed the Senate during the same time period that Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) sought a vote on the Military Justice Improvement Act of 2013 (MJIA),[13] which would remove commanders from prosecutorial decisions for most major offenses under the UCMJ. The MJIA did not meet the 60-vote threshold required to proceed to a vote, although the proposal was supported by a majority of Senators.[14]

As Congress crafts the next defense authorization bill, additional measures on sexual assault are certainly forthcoming. Both versions of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2015—as passed by the House of Representatives, and the mark-up conducted by the Senate Armed Services Committee—contain numerous measures attempting to address the issue of sexual assault in the U.S. military.[15]

Chapter Two:

Assessing Sexual Assault in the Military – Defining the Scope of the Problem

Crimes of sexual violence are a national concern. Many of the same factors and barriers to improving sexual assault prevention and response efforts throughout American society persist in the military. There are also unique attributes that affect sexual assault reporting and accessing victim services in the military.

A 2010 study conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) found that nearly 1 in 5 women in the United States and 1 in 71 men are raped during their lives.[16] The numbers, however, do not tell the full story of sexual assault.[17]

The majority of sexual violence victims are young—between the ages of 16 and 24. The CDC reports that 80% of women victims are raped before they turned 25, almost half before they are 18. The college-age population in the United States, a similar age demographic to a large portion of the military, is especially at risk: 1 in 5 women are sexually assaulted while in college.[18]

Studies indicate that the risk for "contact sexual violence" for women in the military is comparable to the risk for women in the civilian sector.[19] The 2010 CDC study estimated that 40.3% of women in the general population experienced contact sexual violence during their lifetimes, compared to 36.3% of active duty women.[20] When controlled for age and marital status, the differences in results between the two surveys were not statistically significant.[21]

A. BARRIERS TO REPORTING SEXUAL VIOLENCE

Most victims of violent crimes such as robbery or aggravated assault report the crimes to the police. Victims of sexual assault, however, chronically underreport, compared to reporting rates for other forms of violent crime, in both the military and the civilian sector. Studies indicate that reporting rates among female victims are similar in the military and civilian sectors.[22] As a result, the Department of Defense and the Services have focused significant efforts on increasing sexual assault reporting, because "every report that comes forward is one where a victim can receive the appropriate care and . . . is a bridge to accountability where offenders can be held appropriately accountable."[23] However, various societal and military-specific barriers deter victims from reporting and accessing available services.

1. Societal Barriers

Experiences of sexual assault are often shrouded in silence and secrecy for many reasons, including society's tendency to blame the sexual assault victim for the crime; the victim's struggles with shame and self-blame; feelings of confusion, helplessness, and lack of control; and the fear of the consequences of reporting.[24] Further complicating the nature of sexual assaults are the circumstances surrounding such crimes. Most victims know their assailants. Young people and those who have been victimized previously are especially at risk.[25]

Victims in the civilian sector indicate a number of reasons for not reporting. Top reasons included fearing reprisal, considering the incident a personal matter, and believing that the police would not do anything to help.[26] Other reasons for not reporting included that it was not important enough to report and not wanting to get the offender in trouble with the law.[27]

A study of college-age sexual assault victims highlights additional reasons for not reporting.[28] Common reasons include that "they did not think the incident was serious enough to report," or were "unclear as to whether a crime was committed or that harm was intended."[29] Alcohol and drug abuse among college students was a significant factor in low reporting rates. Where alcohol was involved in a sexual assault to the extent that the victim could generally be described as incapacitated, 50% of victims said they did not report the incident because they felt partially or fully responsible.[30] In addition, 29% said they did not report the incident to the police because they did not want anyone to know; 31% said they did not remember or know what really happened.[31]

2. Reporting Barriers Unique to the Military

Victims of sexual assault who serve in the military face unique barriers to reporting that do not exist in the civilian world. The hierarchical structure of military service and its focus on obedience, order, and mission before self, although crucial to success in battle, may provide opportunities for sexual assault and discourage victims from reporting. Specific barriers include the duty to obey lawful orders, the close proximity in which Service members live and work, the potential for an offender to outrank or supervise a victim, the perceived likelihood of damage to a victim's military career, limited focus on male sexual assault victims, and the victim's fear of punishment for collateral misconduct such as underage drinking, fraternization, or violation of orders.[32] Military sexual assaults generally involve 18 to 24 year-old Service members who know each other, are close in rank, have consumed alcohol, and are off-duty on a military installation.[33] These particular characteristics of victims and offenders, as well as the circumstances surrounding many of the incidents, may actually enhance the difficulties inherent in overcoming barriers to reporting that are due, in part, to the very nature and essence of military organizations. Reporting sexual assault in the military is crucial because it is the first step for the victim to receive the care, support, and services he or she needs and for the system to hold those proven to be offenders appropriately accountable.

a. Retaliation and Harassment

In a June 2013 hearing, a representative from the Service Women's Action Network (SWAN) told the Senate Armed Services Committee that "Servicemembers tell us that they do not report for two reasons primarily. They fear retaliation, and they are convinced that nothing will happen to their perpetrator."[34] According to the Department of Defense's 2012 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey (WGRA),[35] 47% of women surveyed who did not report "unwanted sexual contact" indicated they were afraid of reprisal or retaliation from the person who did it, or from their friends, or thought they would be labeled a troublemaker.[36] Of those victims surveyed who did not report the unwanted contact to the chain of command, 43% of active duty women who were victims and 14% of active duty men who were victims indicated that they did not report because they heard about negative experiences of other victims who reported their situations.[37]

Service members live and work in close proximity to one another.[38] Once a sexual assault has occurred, the nearby presence of the offender can cause psychological trauma for a victim. As one victim explained, "I ended up spending a year living about 100 feet away from the man that assaulted me and that again probably did more damage than anything else."[39]

A sexual assault allegation involving members of the same military unit may divide loyalties among a close-knit group of people who should be working toward a common goal. Some unit Service members may seek to silence the victim's sexual assault allegation or retaliate against him or her to protect unit cohesion and keep the unit "whole." As one victim explained, "[I]n my unit where I worked, I mean once the report became unrestricted, they kind of turned into a choosing sides battle. I had my food stolen. I had my wallet stolen. I had to dig it out of the trash. It was just overall really bad."[40] This kind of retaliation from peers can cause psychological trauma to victims.

Another victim described how the retaliation she experienced deterred others in the same unit from reporting, saying,

> I was not the only person . . . that this drill sergeant had victimized. There were many and there was many in that same unit with me in that same bay. Once I had came forward, they saw what I had went through, all the hazing, all the harassment and they were terrified . . . [I] have asked them . . . why didn't you say anything? And they just, they all had said that they were not strong enough. They didn't feel like they could trust anybody there and they didn't want to put themselves out there and have people look at 'em funny.[41]

b. Prosecution for Collateral Misconduct

Some sexual assault victims in the military also fear they may face discipline for any collateral misconduct – underage drinking and other related alcohol offenses, adultery, fraternization, or other violations of certain regulations or orders – that occurred at the time they were assaulted.[42] The president of Protect Our Defenders told the Panel that victims "are often inappropriately threatened with collateral misconduct, and if they do go forward, targeted with a barrage of minor [disciplinary] infractions as a pretext to force them out of the Service."[43] She noted that "[t]his is often enough to silence a victim who is already intimidated or distrustful of the system."[44] The 2012 WGRA indicated that 23% of the active duty women surveyed who reported they were victims and chose not to report the unwanted sexual contact feared they or others would be punished for infractions or violations, such as underage drinking, if they reported.[45] Of the active duty men who are victims who did not report, 22% of those surveyed feared they or others would be punished for infractions or violations, such as underage drinking.[46]

As a result, the Department of Defense recognizes that "[c]ollateral misconduct by the victim of a sexual assault is one of the most significant barriers to reporting assault because of the victim's fear of punishment."[47] Commanders have discretion to defer taking disciplinary action on collateral misconduct by sexual assault victims.[48] In fact, the Coast Guard submitted information from Fiscal Year 2007 to Fiscal Year 2013 that indicated few punishments of sexual assault victims.[49] The Army submitted information for Fiscal Year 2013 that indicated that adverse actions against sexual assault victims for collateral misconduct occurred in less than 5% of cases.[50] However, these numbers are incomplete and, regardless of numbers, the perception remains.

c. Damage to Military Career

Even if consequences for collateral misconduct are not an issue, military victims often face concerns about possible impacts that reporting a sexual assault crime may have on their military service. The 2012 WGRA indicated that 28% of active duty women and 16% of active duty men who responded to the survey indicating they were victims and did not report believed that, if they had reported their sexual assaults, their performance evaluations or chances for promotion would suffer.[51] Similarly, 15% of both women and men who responded to the survey indicating they were victims believed they might lose their security clearances or personnel reliability certifications.[52]

d. Deference to Seniority

A sexual assault victim in the military may be subordinate in rank or position to her or his assailant. Particularly when an offender is a superior, victims may believe that others will ignore or tend to disbelieve their allegations of sexual assault. One victim explained that, because of the initial response she received from her senior leadership, she felt reporting was futile:

> From 2004 to 2006 . . . I was physically and sexually assaulted on numerous occasions by another soldier. The abuser was a staff sergeant, later promoted to sergeant first class while I was a sergeant E-5 at the time. He was very well respected in our unit by fellow soldiers and our command team, and though I sought help from my command on numerous occasions, my cries for help were deliberately ignored. At one point, I sought out my command sergeant major for help one-on-one in her office, and her response to me was, if you would just listen to him, he would stop hitting you.[53]

Offenders may be competent or outstanding Service members, respected by leaders and subordinates alike, which may lead victims to feel others will not believe them if they report. One victim described how "people look at just the outside," focusing on the competence and "outside character" presented by a person. She noted in her case that "[f]rom the outside this drill sergeant was stellar. He was fast-tracking on his way to first sergeant. . . . [A] lot of times people miss, they miss the, the singling out stuff, and they miss him pulling females to the side."[54]

At other times, a victim may be under an offender's direct control. A victim described that her assailant "taught our sexual harassment class and we were given instructions to report to him if we had any issues."[55] She explained that the military teaches Service members to obey lawful orders. "In boot camp, you are taught blind obedience to every order as your only option. Saying 'no' did not exist. There was no one to reach out to."[56]

e. Subordination of the Individual to the Mission

The military appropriately trains Service members to be mission-focused and willing to subordinate themselves in service of the larger goals and needs of the unit. However, an exclusive focus on the unit may deter sexual assault reporting. As one sexual assault victim told the Panel:

> I didn't have the courage at that point to pick up a phone and call 911 and have police come and get me and take me where I should have gone. Instead, I thought, I need to go home and fix this and change my clothes and get to work and do my job, because that's what I'm supposed to do. . . . Part of that was driven by my requirement to deploy. I felt that reporting it would distract my unit and distract me from that mission that I was given.[57]

f. Limited Focus on Male Sexual Assault Victims

Men who are victims of sexual assault often do not identify themselves as victims and may not report their attacks, in part, because sexual assault awareness campaigns tend to focus predominantly or exclusively on women who are victims. One victim explained to the Panel that "[o]ne of the biggest hurdles today for male survivors in the military to face is the lack of recognition of their status as survivors."[58] Additionally, cultural stigmas about homosexuality and lingering barriers that existed in the past, such as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell,"[59] still serve to limit openness about crimes of sexual violence against men.

g. Victim's Lack of Control over the Report

Results of the 2012 WGRA reported that those surveyed who indicated they were sexual assault victims in the military, responded that victims do not report because they often do not believe they can control information disclosed if they make a report of sexual assault.[60] Seventy percent of survey respondents who indicated they did not report said they did not want anyone to know of the sexual assault. Sixty-six percent felt uncomfortable making a report of sexual assault to command. Fifty-one percent indicated they did not think the report would remain confidential.[61]

B. DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE POLICY DEVELOPMENT

In February 2004, responding to concerns about allegations of sexual assault on Service members deployed to Iraq and Kuwait, the Secretary of Defense directed the formation of a Department of Defense task force to review treatment and care for victims of sexual assault.[62] Following a 90-day review of Department and Service sexual assault policies and programs, the Care for Victims of Sexual Assault Task Force, led by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Force Health, Protection, and Readiness, released its report with thirty-five findings and nine recommendations in April 2004. The Task Force's first recommendation was for the Department of Defense to "establish a single point of accountability for all sexual assault policy matters . . . ."[63] The Task Force recommended this office advise the Secretary of Defense and address gaps in the existing "stovepipe systems created by the absence of any specific sexual assault policies and programs," address the standardization of definitions, and "create outcome-based accountability for the Services."[64]

In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005, Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to develop a uniform definition of sexual assault and, based on the recommendations of the Task Force, a "comprehensive policy for [DoD] on the prevention of and response to sexual assaults involving members of the Armed Forces."[65] The Department responded by establishing the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) program "to promote prevention, encourage increased reporting of the crime, and improve response capabilities for victims."[66] In October 2005, the Department of Defense issued its initial comprehensive SAPR policy[67] and established the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) to serve as the Department's single point of authority, system accountability, and oversight for the SAPR program, except for criminal investigative matters that are the responsibility of the Department of Defense Inspector General and legal processes that are the responsibility of the Judge Advocate Generals of the Military Departments.[68] Convened by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the senior standing military oversight body for SAPR matters is the SAPR Joint Executive Council. The SAPR Joint Executive Council held its inaugural meeting in November 2012 and meets quarterly to review SAPR program performance and effectiveness across each of the Military Services.[69]

In its policy, DoD SAPRO established a uniform definition of "sexual assault," which it currently defines as "intentional sexual contact characterized by use of force, threats, intimidation, or abuse of authority or when the victim does not or cannot consent."[70] This definition of sexual assault is intended "as an overarching term . . . that encompasses a range of contact sexual offenses that are prohibited by the UCMJ and characterized by the use of force, threats, intimidation, abuse of authority, or when the victim does not or cannot consent."[71] This broad term differs from the definitions of many crimes of sexual violence in the current version of the UCMJ, including the specific offense of "sexual assault."[72] In other words, while the current DoD SAPRO definition encompasses a wide range of sexual contact, it does not literally reflect criminal sexual offenses in the military.

C. REPORTING METHODS AND DATA AND SEXUAL VIOLENCE OFFENSES UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

1. Development of Department of Defense Sexual Assault Reporting Options

In addition to its recommendation that led to the creation of DoD's SAPR program, the Care for Victims of Sexual Assault Task Force also recommended DoD establish means to "increase privacy and provide confidential disclosure for sexual assault victims."[73] In response, the October 2005 SAPR policy established unrestricted and restricted report options for a victim to choose between when reporting an incident of sexual assault. The chain of command is informed of unrestricted reports of sexual assault in the unit and the reports are investigated by the Service military criminal investigative organization (MCIO).[74] Restricted reports, responding to a victim's desire for confidentiality, do not trigger an investigation, collect limited data about the victim and the offense, and the chain of command is not informed of any information that would identify either the victim or the offender.[75]

2. Department of Defense Sexual Assault Reporting Trends

DoD SAPRO has monitored trends for unrestricted and restricted reports of sexual assault that involve a military subject or military victim since it was established in 2005.[76] Figure 1 shows the total number of sexual assault reports DoD received each year, as well as the distribution between restricted and unrestricted reports:

3. Sexual Violence Offenses under the Uniform Code of Military Justice

The definitions of crimes constituting sexual assault are broad. Restricted and unrestricted reports of sexual assault in the military include allegations ranging from rape to less severe forms of sexual criminal offenses, such as sexual contact over clothing.[78] Article 120 of the UCMJ sets forth the major criminal sexual violence offenses proscribed by military law. Congress substantially overhauled Article 120 twice since 2006. The first version of Article 120 was in effect until October 1, 2007; the second version was in effect from October 1, 2007 to June 27, 2012; and the current version took effect on June 28, 2012.[79] The following table illustrates the framework of all three iterations of Article 120.

Prior to October 1, 2007	October 1, 2007 to June 27, 2012	Since June 28, 2012
The offenses that constituted sexual assault: • Rape (Article 120, UCMJ); • Forcible Sodomy (Article 125, UCMJ); • Indecent Assault (Article 134, UCMJ); and • Attempts to Commit these Crimes (Article 80, UCMJ).	The offenses that constituted sexual assault: • Rape (Article 120, UCMJ); • Aggravated Sexual Assault (Article 120, UCMJ); • Aggravated Sexual Contact (Article 120, UCMJ); • Abusive Sexual Contact (Article 120, UCMJ); • Wrongful Sexual Contact (Article 120, UCMJ); • Forcible Sodomy (Article 125, UCMJ); and • Attempts to Commit these Crimes (Article 80, UCMJ).	Current sexual violence crimes are: • Rape (Article 120, UCMJ); • Sexual Assault (Article 120, UCMJ); • Aggravated Sexual Contact (Article 120, UCMJ); • Abusive Sexual Contact (Article 120, UCMJ); • Forcible Sodomy (Article 125, UCMJ); and • Attempts to Commit these Crimes (Article 80, UCMJ).
"Old Article 120" Elements of Rape: a) that the accused committed an act of sexual intercourse; and b) that the act of sexual intercourse was done by force and without consent.[80] Assault with intent to Commit Rape, Indecent Assault, Indecent Acts, and Indecent Exposure were separate offenses under Article 134, UCMJ.[81]	The main four offenses are: rape, aggravated sexual assault, aggravated sexual contact, and abusive sexual contact. Statutory definitions for "sexual act" and "sexual contact," along with the set of attendant circumstances identified in the statute, combine to define each of the four offenses. The attendant circumstances include: by force, by causing grievous bodily harm, by threatening death, by rendering unconscious, or by administering an intoxicant.[82] Force includes the "action to compel submission of another or to overcome or prevent another's resistance. . . ."[83] Indecent Assault, Indecent Acts, and Indecent Exposure are now offenses under Article 120, UCMJ.[84] Article 120a includes stalking.[85]	The main offenses essentially remain the same: Rape, Sexual Assault, Aggravated Sexual Contact, and Abusive Sexual Contact. Aggravated sexual assault in now called sexual assault.[86] Statutory definitions for "sexual act" and "sexual contact," along with the set of attendant circumstances identified in the statute, continue to combine to define each of the four main offenses.[87] Additional attendant circumstances are added to the statute.[88] The definition of force is modified to focus less on the actions of the victim and more on the actions of the accused, and includes "use of strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person."[89] Article 120a continues to include stalking, Article 120b now includes child sex crimes, and Article 120c includes other sexual misconduct.[90]

Lack of consent is an element of the offense which must be proven by the government beyond a reasonable doubt. In determining whether force and lack of consent occurred, a totality of the circumstances is considered. The lack of consent required is more than a mere lack of acquiescence. When the victim is capable of resisting, some force more than that required for penetration is necessary.	Lack of consent is no longer an element which must be proven by the government beyond a reasonable doubt. Consent and mistake of fact as to consent are affirmative defenses available to the main offenses.[91] Initially the accused had the burden of proving consent and mistake of fact as to consent by a preponderance of the evidence. The government would then have to disprove the defense beyond a reasonable doubt. However, this provision of the statute was determined to be unconstitutional.[92]	The 2012 Article 120 eliminated affirmative defenses specific to the statute. An accused will now use the defenses available under R.C.M. 916.[93]

Under the current framework of Article 120 of the UCMJ, criminal sexual conduct ranges broadly from minor non-penetrative touching of another person's body, with no requirement to gratify any person's sexual desire, to penetrative offenses accomplished by force.[94] Even in light of changes to Article 120, military and civilian jurisdictions categorize crimes referred to generically as "sexual assault" in different ways. "Sexual assault" in civilian jurisdictions is generally classified as either a penetrative offense or a contact offense with intent to gratify the sexual desires of some person. The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Service Committee should consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120. [RSP Recommendation 113]

As noted above, there are currently two broad categories of offenses that DoD SAPRO tracks: 1) penetrative offenses, including rape, sexual assault, and forcible sodomy; and 2) non-penetrative contact offenses, such as aggravated or abusive sexual contact and attempts to commit other sexual assault offenses. The Department of Defense reporting data from Fiscal Year 2013 indicates that 56% of unrestricted reports alleged penetrative offenses and 44% alleged non-penetrative contact offenses,[95] as shown in Figure 2.[96] While the overall number of sexual assault reports has increased since DoD SAPRO first tracked this data in Fiscal Year 2007, the ratio of penetrative to non-penetrative offenses has remained largely consistent.[7]

D. SEXUAL ASSAULT SURVEYS

Rape and sexual assault are among the most challenging criminal acts to assess through surveys.[98] Different surveys use distinct methodologies to understand and capture different statistics. Crime victimization surveys are commonly used to assess the actual incidence of crimes of sexual violence because sexual assault crimes are significantly underreported.[99] Public health surveys often measure the prevalence rate, reflecting the number of victims of sex related acts rather than number of incidents, which helps assess the services needed. Basic survey terminology is reflected below in Figure 3.

Incidence Rate: "Refers to the measure of the total number of incidents (or events) that occurred in a given period. It counts the total number of incidents or victimizations; it does not count the total number of individual victims."[100] Incidence rates are normally used in criminal justice surveys.

Prevalence Rate: "Refers to the number of victims. It counts the number of individuals who have been victimized at least once; it does not count the total number of incidents."[103] Prevalence rates are normally used in public health surveys.

Criminal Justice Surveys: "Measure criminal victimizations: 'point-in-time' events that are judged to be criminal."[101] Criminal justice surveys are designed to capture the "dark figure" of crime; that is, underreporting of crime not captured in law enforcement statistics.[102]

Public Health Surveys: Measure "victimization as a condition that endures over a period of time, and may not necessarily be criminal. These surveys are less focused on identifying point-in-time events."[104]

1. Survey Types and Methodologies

The public health approach casts a broad net to determine the number of those injured by coercive sexual behavior. Public health surveys measure prevalence, "the number of people in a population who experienced at least one event of interest."[105] Public health surveys, such as the National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS) conducted by the CDC, provide information to evaluate and characterize physical and mental health damage to victims of sexual assault. The accuracy of events reported through public health surveys is largely unverified because there is little or no follow-up to distinguish timeline, definitions, or if the reported behavior actually falls within the intended survey parameters.[108]

The criminal justice approach seeks to account for unreported incidences of criminal sexual misconduct and measure the scope of unreported sexual offenses. Criminal justice surveys are designed to determine whether a well-defined, specified criminal event falls into the time period captured by the survey; they are normally used for comparison with actual arrest and conviction statistics.[109] The method of defining a time period and ensuring that events are accurately captured within the desired time frame is known as "bounding" a survey.

Incidence surveys like the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS), conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau for the Department of Justice Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS), capture the number of criminal events rather than the number of people affected by crime.[108] The NCVS is a national survey of randomly selected households administered to all members age 12 and older residing in a selected household.[109] After selecting a household, the Census Bureau surveys the residents every six months for a period of three years and the BJS reports incidence of crime victimization on an annual basis. By conducting survey interviews every six months, the BJS can isolate criminal events and determine whether or not those events were reported to the police. In doing so, the NCVS attempts to get at the "dark figure" of crime; that is, underreporting of crime not captured in law enforcement statistics.[110]

Survey variables between different studies impact the ability to compare data and can result in estimates of sexual violence that vary by as much as a factor of ten.[111] Experts have conducted studies on survey purpose, design, methodology, phraseology in survey questions, and other variables to explain "why such widely diverging estimates of the level of rape occur."[112] Additionally, distinct differences in purpose, design, and methodology between public health and crime victimization surveys mean that information from the different types of surveys cannot be accurately compared.

The personal nature of sexual assault and barriers to reporting also lead to issues that impact assessment, such as divergent opinions of criminal behavior, reluctance to disclose personal experiences, inaccurate recollection, or respondent sensitivity.[113] Crime victimization surveys, particularly rape and sexual assault surveys, are also extremely difficult to validate because they are created to uncover events never reported to law enforcement.[114] Therefore, the information about prevalence and incidence rates garnered from surveys may be helpful, but it is not clear that the extent or nature of sexual assault can be accurately gleaned from survey results.

2. The Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (WGRA)

The DoD WGRA was designed in the 1990s as a public health survey to "research attitudes and perceptions about gender-related issues, estimate the level of sexual harassment and unwanted sexual contact, and identify areas where improvements are needed by surveying a random population of active duty personnel."[115] The information was intended to be used to formulate policies "to improve the working environment."[116] The Defense Manpower Data Center (DMDC) administers the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey (WGRS) to both active duty and Reserve members of the Armed Forces every two years, per Title 10 of the U.S. Code.[117] The Coast Guard is not included in the survey population.[118]

DMDC administered the WGRA in 1995, 2002, 2006, 2010, and 2012. The WGRA is currently web-based and self-administered. It does not include follow-up interviews or other "second-staging" to confirm that an event reported by a respondent meets the intended definition within WGRA parameters.[119] This is typical of public health surveys, which are less concerned with the event and more focused on the impact on the individual.[120] The WGRA is also an unbounded survey, meaning it does not have mechanisms to detect events that are reported outside the specified time period.[121]

DoD first incorporated questions and calculated survey data about "unwanted sexual contact" in the 2006 WGRA. Questions asked were designed to "calculate annual prevalence rates . . . of unwanted sexual contact, unwanted gender-related behaviors (i.e., sexual harassment and sexist behavior), and gender discriminatory behaviors and sex discrimination" over the course of twelve months.[122] Questions about "unwanted sexual contact" were also included in the 2010 and 2012 versions of the WGRA.[123]

The 2012 WGRA included 94 questions on all facets of job satisfaction and gender relations, including a number of questions regarding unwanted gender-related behaviors, gender discriminatory behaviors, and "unwanted sexual contact" the respondents experienced during the preceding 12 months. The 2012 WGRA defined "unwanted sexual contact" as "intentional sexual contact that was against a person's will or which occurred when the person did not or could not consent, and includes completed or attempted sexual intercourse, sodomy (oral or anal sex), penetration by an object, and the unwanted touching of genitalia and other sexually-related areas of the body."[124] The behavior surveyed ranged from unwanted touching over clothing to rape. The term "unwanted sexual contact" differs from the definition of sexual assault offenses in the UCMJ, described earlier, and is so broad it captures non-criminal conduct.[125]

For the 2012 WGRA, the DMDC sent surveys to a sample population of 108,000 active duty Service men and women from September to November 2012. DMDC received "completed" surveys[126] from 22,792 individuals, an overall weighted response rate of 24%. The following table compares the prevalence rates for men and women in the 2006, 2010, 2012 WGRAs and the extrapolated number of Service members who would be expected to have experienced unwanted sexual contact, according to data calculated from each WGRA:

	2006 WGRA[127]	2010 WGRA[128]	2012 WGRA[129]
Estimated individuals who experienced unwanted sexual contact	34,000	19,000	26,000
Rate for Males	1.8%	0.9%	1.2%
Rate for Females	6.8%	4.4%	6.1%

3. Using WGRA Survey Results

Since the introduction of questions regarding unwanted sexual contact in 2006, the WGRA has been both widely cited and widely criticized.[130] Critics commonly argue that WGRA survey data is misused or misinterpreted. Although the WGRA is administered as a public health survey, its survey results of unwanted sexual contact are often inappropriately compared against actual sexual assault reporting statistics. Data extrapolated from the WGRA include a wide range of non-criminal behavior, yet WGRA data are often misinterpreted as indicating the number of incidents of criminal sexual assault in the military. According to one sexual violence survey expert, the design used in the WGRA is "not the optimum design for assessing levels of rape and sexual assault."[131] Data received from the WGRA provides important information about attitudes and perceptions, but the survey was not intended to, and does not, accurately measure the incidence of criminal acts committed against Service members.

As a public health survey, the WGRA can assess behaviors that emotionally impact respondents, barriers to reporting, other factors related to retaliation, satisfaction with victim services, and other public health concerns. DoD leadership can appropriately use this data to assess and shape education, behavioral health, or prevention efforts, for example. They should not use the survey to estimate incidence of sexual assault crimes. Congress and the Secretary of Defense should utilize results from the WGRA for its intended purpose—to assess attitudes, identify areas for improvement, and revise workplace policies as needed—rather than to estimate the incidence of sexual assault within the military. [RSP Recommendation 2]

Studies such as the 2012 WGRA collect a large amount of data that is useful as public health information and for analysis to provide DoD leadership with better insight into areas of concern, patterns and trends in behavior, and victim satisfaction. Sexual assault survivors often experience "physical injury, mental health consequences such as depression, anxiety, low self-esteem, suicide attempts, and other health consequences."[132] Prevalence rates obtained through the WGRA can be used to measure the trend of the increase or decrease in the number of victims of sexual assault. Knowing these trends, the survey results can provide DoD with public health information and insight into the overall readiness and health of the force to inform policies and plan services.

If used correctly, data obtained through the WGRA can aid leaders in better evaluating readiness, assessing the health of the force, identifying patterns and trends in behavior, directing prevention and response efforts to sexual assault and sexual harassment across the force, and assessing victim satisfaction. Additionally, the spectrum of behaviors included in "unwanted sexual contact" should be studied to inform targeted prevention efforts as well as analyzing environmental factors such as time in service, location, training status, and deployment status as potential markers for increased risk. [RSP Recommendation 6]

4. Developing a Crime Victimization Survey

One concern with the WGRA is that the definition of "unwanted sexual contact" used in WGRA surveys does not match definitions used by either DoD SAPRO or the UCMJ. Currently, DoD SAPRO evaluates the scope of unreported sex offenses by contrasting (a) prevalence data of the number of victims who experienced unwanted sexual contact extrapolated from the WGRA with (b) reported sexual assault incidents and sexually based crimes under the UCMJ, in hopes of developing an incidence rate or the rate of unreported sexual assaults in a given year. However, the better measure of incidence rate would be a crime victimization survey designed to account for the number of criminal sexual assault incidents.

Variations in the definitions of terms used in the WGRA compared to the UCMJ lead to differences in assessments of the magnitude and nature of crimes of sexual violence. In 2009, the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in the Military Service (DTFSAMS) observed that the discrepancy in definitions was detrimental to any meaningful analysis; nonetheless the "terms, questions, and definitions of 'unwanted sexual contact' have been consistent throughout all of the WGRA surveys since 2006."[133] In June 2013, the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) Report on the FY14 NDAA noted that "[u]sing the imprecise terms 'sexual assault' and 'unwanted sexual contact' to refer to a range of sexual offenses creates confusion about the types of unwanted sexual acts that are being perpetrated against members of the military."[134] The SASC then directed the DoD to "modify language used in the annual SAPRO report and the [Workplace and Gender Related Survey (WGRS)] to clearly report the number of instances of each type of unwanted sexual act, to include rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit those acts."[135]

In order to accurately understand the extent of the crime problem, researchers must accurately measure both the incidence and prevalence of sexual violence.[136] To enable comparison of incidence data in and out of the military, the Secretary of Defense should direct the development and implementation of a military crime victimization survey, in coordination with the Bureau of Justice Statistics, that relies on the best available research methods and provides data that can be more readily compared to other crime victimization surveys than current data. [RSP Recommendation 1] This crime victimization survey should be developed using the UCMJ definitions of sexual assault offenses, including: rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these acts. [RSP Recommendation 8] Crime victimization surveys must be designed to mirror law enforcement reporting practices and legal definitions of crimes so that data can be analyzed, compared, and evaluated in order to assess the relative success of sexual assault prevention and response programs. Developing questions based on standard definitions and specifically designed to capture data about a uniform set of behaviors would provide a more accurate picture about sexual assault crimes in the military.

A tailored crime victimization survey, carefully designed with best practices from the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS), could improve the accuracy of DoD's estimates of sexual assault underreporting. Recently, the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) National Research Council studied the NCVS to determine how well it assessed national crime victimization in the areas of rape and sexual assault. Following that study, the NAS recommended that the BJS "should develop an independent survey—separate from the [NCVS]—for measuring rape and sexual assault."[137]

5. Improving the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey

The WGRA's response rate also creates concern about the survey's reliability. The DMDC reported an overall weighted response rate of 24% for the 2012 WGRA,[138] a low response rate compared to other civilian public health surveys.[139] As a result, the WGRA's data are at greater risk for sampling bias and may be, therefore, less reliable. Low response rates, while not uncommon, may indicate biases or other problems with the survey instrument.[140] To minimize potential bias, the Office of Management and Budget requires a bias-analysis plan prior to authorizing any government survey with an anticipated response rate of less than 80%.[141] The Secretary of Defense should direct that unanalyzed data collected from all surveys related to workplace environments and crime victimization be analyzed by independent research professionals to assess how DoD can improve responses to military sexual assault. [RSP Recommendation 6] The WGRA and other "web-based surveys are kind of akin to mail-in surveys, they tend to have a lower response rate than in-person or telephone surveys."[142] Evidence presented to the Panel highlighted that Service members complete numerous surveys and that too many surveys may result in "survey fatigue," leading to lower response rates.[143] The Secretary of Defense should account for these factors and seek to improve response rates to all surveys related to workplace environments and crime victimization in order to improve the accuracy and reliability of results. [RSP Recommendation 9]

To improve the WGRS, the combined WGRA and Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Reserve Component Members (WGRR), the Secretary of Defense has already directed a non-DoD entity, the RAND Corporation, to develop, administer, collect, and analyze all data for the 2014 versions of both surveys.[144] RAND will partner with Westat, which works with BJS on survey administration, for survey expertise assistance.[145] DoD SAPRO indicated to the Panel that the 2014 WGRS will include larger survey samples of approximately 500,000 people, nearly one-third of the Total Force, giving 100% of female Service members and 25% of male Service members the opportunity to take the survey.[146] RAND will also review current WGRS methodology and attempt to increase response rates and reduce non-response bias.

These efforts to improve the 2014 WGRA are encouraging, but the Department needs additional assessment measurements. As previously noted, public health surveys are not designed or intended to measure the incidence of criminal activity accurately. Surveying and collecting data on sexual assault victimization is challenging and costly, but DoD has a significant interest in obtaining accurate information about the scope of sexual assault crimes in the military and associated levels of reporting. Accurately assessing underreported crime is essential in order to accurately evaluate DoD's SAPR programs, victim services, and judicial responses.

DoD and the RAND Corporation should leverage the experience of NAS and BJS personnel, as well as the results of their studies and surveys, to develop the best possible survey instruments and practices. In addition, the Secretary of Defense should direct the creation of an advisory panel of qualified experts from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and the National Academy of Sciences' Committee on National Statistics (CNSTAT) to consult with RAND and any other agencies or contractors that develop future surveys of crime victimization or workplace environments, to ensure effective survey design. [RSP Recommendation 7]

Chapter Three:
COMMANDER AND CONVENING AUTHORITY CONCEPTS AND OVERVIEW OF MILITARY JUSTICE RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULT

A. COMMANDERS

Military commanders are a select group, comprising approximately one percent of military Service members.[147] The term "commander" has a unique and specific meaning within the military. It indicates a position of seniority, authority, and responsibility. The Rules for Courts-Martial distinguish "commander" from "convening authority;" and the two roles, while overlapping, are not interchangeable.[148] The commander is the head of a military organization and is primarily responsible for ensuring mission readiness and maintaining good order and discipline within the unit. Several commanders serve as part of the "chain of command," the succession of commanders from superior to subordinate that exercise command authority.[149]

Military officers at various ranks and experience levels may serve in command positions. Title 10 of the U.S. Code and Service regulations vest commanders with specific responsibilities including:

- implementing the sexual assault prevention and response program;
- creating a culture of prevention through risk reduction, education, and training of Service members;
- maintaining response capabilities;
- providing victim support;
- promptly responding to sexual assault reports; and
- holding offenders appropriately accountable by exercising a range of judicial, non-judicial, and administrative options.

Commanders spend much of their time attending to the prevention and victim support duties, as authorized by provisions within the UCMJ. Ultimately, the commander can utilize his or her authority in the military justice system to hold offenders accountable and appropriately dispose of cases.

B. CONVENING AUTHORITY

Criminal charges may warrant disposition at trial by court-martial. Unlike standing federal courts created by Article III of the Constitution, the military justice system convenes ad hoc courts, called courts-martial, only as needed. The individual that has the authority to convene a court-martial is the convening authority. Except for the President, Secretary of Defense, and Service Secretaries,[150] only commanders may convene courts-martial, and only a select few have that authority.

The authority to convene a court-martial is distinct from command authority. Articles 22, 23, and 24 of the UCMJ provide the statutory authority for convening authorities,[151] which attaches to certain positions and designations.[152] These are:

- General Courts-Martial Convening Authorities (GCMCA) may convene general courts-martial, as well as lesser forms of court-martial – e.g., special courts-martial. General courts-martial may impose any lawful punishment on a guilty party, including, where authorized, confinement for life without parole and death.[153] GCMCAs are typically two-star general or flag officers or higher, with upwards of twenty-five years of command experience.[154]

- Special Courts-Martial Convening Authorities (SPCMA) may convene special courts-martial, but may not convene general courts-martial. Special courts-martial are statutorily limited to imposing no more than confinement for up to one year, a bad conduct discharge and a variety of lesser punishments, regardless of the crime alleged.[155] An officer will not typically serve in a command position with SPCMCA until he or she is promoted to the grade of O-6—Colonel in the Army, Air Force, and Marine Corps or Captain in the Navy and Coast Guard. Officers serving as SPCMCAs generally have at least 20 years of service.[156]

The following table illustrates the total number of active duty personnel and commanders in each Service compared to the small number of SPCMCAs and even smaller number of GCMCAs:[157]

	Active Duty Personnel	Commanders	SPCMCAs	SPCMCAs who convened 1 or more court-martial in FY13	GCMCAs	GCMCAs who convened 1 or more court-martial in FY13
Army	521,685	7,000 (approx.)	424	Not tracked	85	70
Navy	323,930	1,422	1,080	94	200	17
Marine Corps	192,350	2,182	451	106	50	29
Air Force	330,172	3,943	97	70	58	23
Coast Guard	40,665	677	350	12	18	9

C. COMMANDER AND CONVENING AUTHORITY TRAINING

Professional development to prepare officers for this responsibility often begins before commissioning and continues through the junior officer grades as the Services prepare military officers for command positions.[158] At the earliest opportunity to command, normally at the company or platoon level, commanders receive training and guidance on command, leadership expectations, and the weight of the responsibility they hold in their positions. As officers become more senior in grade, command selection becomes more competitive and more rigorous.[159] Each Service has a command and staff college where a command-tracked officer spends "an entire year learning about and studying command."[160] As the Services prepare and develop officers for command, officers attend additional training courses and leadership schools which offer instruction on the commander's legal roles and responsibilities.[161]

Senior commanders also receive legal training to prepare them for the quasi-judicial role of convening authority. The legal training provided to senior commanders through resident and on-site Service JAG School hosted courses varies significantly among the Services. The Naval Justice School (NJS) and the Army Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School (TJAGLCS) provide commander-focused courses in military law, including the commander's role in the military justice process.[162] NJS offers courses to Navy and Marine Corps commanders through on-site training at various Navy installations.[163] TJAGLCS offers resident courses in Charlottesville, Virginia. Formal Air Force legal training for senior commanders is less robust and incorporated into group and wing commander courses hosted by Air University at Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama.[164]

Senior commander training should be uniform, to the greatest extent possible, and a prerequisite to assuming command. Further, considering DoD's recent "initial disposition authority" policy that withholds authority over the most serious sexual assault offenses to senior commanders (explained infra at Chapter 8, Section B), the Secretary of Defense should ensure all officers preparing to assume senior command positions at the grade of O-6 and above receive dedicated legal training that fully prepares them for the military justice responsibilities, particularly as the "initial disposition authority," assigned to them under the UCMJ. [RSP Recommendation 38]

D. OVERVIEW OF THE MILITARY JUSTICE RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULT CRIMES

The military justice system is designed to hold offenders accountable for criminal acts, "to promote justice, to assist in maintaining good order and discipline in the armed forces, to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the military establishment, and thereby to strengthen the national security of the United States."[165] All Service members (including National Guard and Reservists on active Federal duty or in Title 10 status) are subject to the UCMJ, which sets forth both procedural and substantive military criminal law.[166] Historically, the military commander has always been at the center of the military justice system.

Summary of the Military Justice Process for Sexual Assault Cases

The military justice system affords commanders administrative, non-judicial, and judicial tools to achieve good order and discipline. Commanders generally have discretion to choose which tools to use for a given instance of misconduct, with the advice and counsel of judge advocates.[167]

Nonjudicial punishment under Article 15 of the UCMJ is the lowest formal resolution available through the UCMJ. The nature of nonjudicial punishment depends on the rank of the commander imposing punishment and that of the Service member receiving punishment. In its most severe form, nonjudicial punishment may include restrictions on liberty short of confinement by, for example, being restricted to the unit area for up to sixty days, working additional duty hours, the loss of rank, and the loss of pay.

Commanders may also administratively separate Service members from military service. Administrative separations do not require courts-martial and are generally not considered punitive in nature. However, involuntarily administratively separated Service members suffer the loss of employment, may lose federal and state benefits, including veteran's benefits, and may be precluded from federal and state government employment, if separated with a negative characterization of service.

For allegations that warrant trial by court-martial, the UCMJ authorizes three options: (1) summary court-martial; (2) special court-martial; and (3) general court-martial. A summary court-martial, described in Articles 20 and 24 of the UCMJ, provides commanders a more severe forum to impose discipline than nonjudicial punishment or administrative options. Depending upon the rank of the accused, a summary court-martial may impose imprisonment for up to one month, loss of liberty for up to sixty days, the reduction of rank, and the forfeiture of pay.

Special and general courts-martial are judicial forums that may be convened pursuant to Article 18 and 19 of the UCMJ. A Service member convicted in one of these forums suffers a federal criminal conviction and, accordingly, a criminal record. General courts-martial are colloquially referred to as the military's felony forum because only a general court-martial may impose any lawful punishment on a guilty party.[168] Special courts-martial are colloquially referred to as the military's misdemeanor forum because, regardless of the crime alleged, the maximum punishment that may be imposed is statutorily limited to confinement for up to one year, a bad conduct discharge and a variety of lesser punishments.[169] The convicted Service member's record permanently records a guilty finding at any level of court-martial.

Figure 4 illustrates how an unrestricted report of sexual assault is resolved by court-martial under the military justice system. Requirements for reporting, investigating, and resolving sexual assault allegations through the military justice process are described and assessed in detail in Chapters 6 - 8 of this report.

E. CONVENING AUTHORITY DECISIONS TO REFER SEXUAL ASSAULTS TO COURTS-MARTIAL

The DoD SAPRO's annual report to Congress includes individual Service reports with detailed information about military justice actions commanders and convening authorities take in response to sexual assault reports.[172] These reports identify the percentage of cases in which a convening authority directed a court-martial over time.[173] DoD SAPRO's FY13 report noted that from Fiscal Year 2007 to Fiscal Year 2013, "commanders' preferral of court-martial charges against military subjects for sexual assault offenses increased from 30 percent . . . to 71 percent." During this same period, the report also indicated a substantial decrease in the percentage of reports of sexual assault that resulted in commanders imposing less severe nonjudicial and administrative actions.[174]

Significant analysis of prosecution trends in sexual assault cases, however, is difficult. Representatives of the Service Judge Advocate General Corps told the Panel they agree that the current system for calculating prosecution and conviction rates in the military "is not the model of clarity" and that the system "is ripe for recommendations" for improvement.[175] While the Services regularly collect and report a considerable amount of data on military justice results for sexual assault cases, the data is not standardized, comparable, or useful for the purpose of drawing meaningful conclusions.[176]

1. Standardizing Prosecution and Conviction Rate Methodologies

Judge advocate representatives from the Services testified to the Panel that the data they must provide to DoD SAPRO on prosecution and conviction rates is, at best, not useful and, at worst, misleading. One representative called DoD's method for tracking prosecution and conviction rates "flawed,"[177] noting several specific concerns:[178]

- Service data reflect a snapshot in time and therefore must account for pending cases. However, currently, cases pending investigation and disposition are improperly counted as "no action taken" for prosecution rate purposes.
- DoD data do not separate out the cases in which the offender is unknown or is a civilian beyond the military's jurisdiction.
- Service data include restricted reports for which investigation is prohibited and there can be no disposition.
- Service data cover a wide spectrum of eight separate offenses, from rape to unwanted touching, which distorts the representation of disposition decisions.

At the Panel's request, Dr. Cassia Spohn, an expert on criminal justice statistics and analysis, evaluated the Services' prosecution rates and compared them to civilian prosecution rates. She determined that the Services' use different definitions of what constitutes an "unfounded" case and their varied calculation procedures impact overall military prosecution and conviction rates.[179] The standard, nation-wide definition of "unfounded" means "false or baseless,"[180] but the Services use different procedures and definitions to "unfound" cases.[181]

Differences among the variables the Services use to calculate prosecution rates and reports also make comparing prosecution and conviction rates difficult. For example, one Service may include the total number of unrestricted reports in calculating the prosecution and conviction rates. This yields a lower prosecution and conviction rate, because this calculation does not exclude unknown subjects or those outside the military.

Additionally, most conviction rate information from the Services does not specifically represent the number of convictions for sexual assault. Instead, conviction rates reflect convictions for any offense in cases that included a charged sexual assault. For example, in FY11, DoD reported an 80% conviction rate in sexual assault cases.[182] Eighty percent of Service members charged with a sexual assault offense were convicted of some offense, but not necessarily convicted of a sexual assault offense. Dr. Spohn estimated the Services' true conviction rate averaged about 50%.[183]

In sum, DoD and the Services do not currently use standardized methods to calculate prosecution or conviction rates in sexual assault or other cases.[184] In addition to different procedures, the Services also use different definitions, which make meaningful comparisons of prosecution and conviction rates for sexual assault across the Military Services difficult. In the absence of a standardized methodology, any attempt to compare military prosecution or conviction rates for sexual assault among the Services or between military and civilian jurisdictions is apt to be misleading.

The Secretary of Defense should direct the Service Secretaries to use a single, standardized methodology to calculate prosecution and conviction rates.185 Figure 5 shows a suggested methodology, based on the current Army model, which will provide accurate and comparable rates by tracking the number and rates of acquittals and alternate dispositions in sexual assault cases. [RSP Recommendation 3-A]

Once the Services standardize definitions, procedures, and calculations for reporting prosecution and conviction rates in sexual assault cases, the Secretary of Defense should direct a highly qualified expert in the field, external to the military, to study the disposition process in sexual assault cases. Specifically, a study should assess the following:

- the rate at which the Services unfound sexual assault reports using the Uniform Crime Reporting Program definition and the characteristics of such cases in order to determine whether any additional changes to policies or procedures are warranted;
- the rates at which referral of cases to courts-martial against the advice of the Article 32 investigating or hearing officer resulted in acquittal or conviction; and
- the role victim cooperation plays in determining whether to refer or not refer a case to court-martial, and whether the case results in a dismissal, acquittal or conviction. [RSP Recommendation 3-B]

2. Reporting Mandates Must Track Actual Disposition of Cases

Other inconsistencies between the disposition of sexual assault cases and reporting requirements also limit the value of current information. DoD and the Services must comply with several mandates to report sexual assault data to multiple sources, including Congress, with each report containing different requirements, calculations, and definitions. Section 1631 of the FY11 NDAA[186] mandates an annual report to Congress with a full synopsis of substantiated cases of sexual assaults committed against Service members.[187] The term "substantiated" is not otherwise used by DoD or the Services through the investigative or disposition decision process in sexual assault cases, resulting in confusion and inaccuracy in the reports to Congress.

Congress should enact legislation to amend Section 1631(b)(3) of the FY11 NDAA and the related provisions in FY12 NDAA and FY13 NDAA to require the Service Secretaries provide the number of "unfounded cases," cases deemed false or baseless, as well as a synopsis of all other unrestricted reports of sexual assault with a known offender within the military's criminal jurisdiction. Eliminating the requirement to provide information about "substantiated cases" will result in DoD and the Services providing information that more accurately reflects the disposition of all unrestricted reports of sexual assault within the military's jurisdiction. [RSP Recommendation 5]

The standardized "waterfall" analysis described above in Figure 5 would present useful information. This reporting methodology would indicate:

- the number of cases that fall within the military's jurisdiction;
- the number of cases that result in court-martial;
- the number of convictions and acquittals; or
- the number of cases that result in alternate dispositions, which can be further broken down by nonjudicial punishment, resignation or discharge in lieu of courts-martial, or other adverse action.

In addition to meaningful data, percentages and statistics could be calculated to facilitate comparison of results each year to identify trends, problems, and improvements. These changes would increase confidence in data reporting and allow Congress, the Services, and the public to draw more informed conclusions about military sexual assault.

3. Comparing Military and Civilian Prosecution Statistics

Congress directed the Panel to conduct a comparison of civilian and military prosecution rates and state reasons for any differences.[188] However, as previously described, differences in civilian and military definitions, statutes, calculations, and procedures make comparing results extremely difficult. Any results from comparisons may be misleading.[189]

Civilian and military prosecution rates are not comparable because of fundamental differences in the systems, such as the discretion vested in civilian police to dispose of a case and the alternate disposition options available under the military justice system. Additionally, military and civilian jurisdictions also use different definitions, follow different procedures, and apply different criteria throughout the process.[190] For example, national data collection through the Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program traditionally focused on forcible rape of women, although beginning in January 2013, the definition of rape was expanded to include gender-neutral nonconsensual penetrative offenses.[191] The UCR also collects data about some other sex offenses which some civilian police agencies may classify as assault. In contrast, DoD includes data on all reported penetrative and contact sexual offenses ranging from unwanted touching to rape.

Accordingly, Congress and the Secretary of Defense should not measure success solely by comparing military and civilian prosecution and conviction rates. [RSP Recommendation 4]

Chapter Four:

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION IN THE MILITARY

Experts and leaders agree that commanders preventing sexual assault is paramount to the success of our military, and first-line supervisors are central to DoD's prevention efforts. The DoD's recently released sexual assault prevention strategy[192] stresses the importance of leaders' responsibilities in prevention efforts.

A. PREVENTION STRATEGIES, INITIATIVES, AND TECHNIQUES

Preventing instances of sexual assault is important to both the civilian sector and the military. As one civilian expert explained, "stopping perpetration is the only guaranteed way" to eliminate sexual violence.[193] Senior DoD leaders similarly observe that prevention "is the first and best option."[194]

1. Leading Practices in Sexual Assault Prevention Strategies

Members of the Panel heard testimony and received information from the Division of Violence Prevention of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), various practitioners, and academic researchers outlining the best available practices on preventing sexual violence. From these sources, the Panel gained valuable insight into the risk and protective factors for sexual violence, as well as effective prevention strategies and how best to implement them.

As explained below, DoD's prevention policies and requirements adopted since 2012 reflect Department efforts to coordinate with the CDC and leading private organizations like the National Sexual Violence Resource Center (NSVRC). Moreover, installation-level initiatives described to the Panel largely reflect prevention best practices.[195] For example, the Services have increased focus on bystander intervention and alcohol policy. However, the Services must ensure that prevention programs do not convey or promote common misconceptions or overgeneralizations, as described below.

a. Public Health Approach to Sexual Assault Prevention

The CDC classifies sexual assault as a public health problem. The CDC's public health approach translates strategic elements into a workable model for sexual violence prevention. As part of its public health approach to prevention, the CDC employs the social-ecological model prevention framework. This model recognizes four distinct levels or settings at which risk factors can occur: (1) the individual; (2) family/peer; (3) community; and (4) societal. This comprehensive approach creates a "surround sound" effect, such that people hear the same message in multiple ways from multiple influencers.[196]

In 2008, DoD SAPRO published its first comprehensive blueprint for DoD's prevention efforts.[197] DoD's 2008 Prevention Strategy was based on the CDC's social-ecological model and stressed the requirement of a coordinated set of interventions at the cultural, organizational, community, family, and individual levels.[198] DoD's most recent prevention strategy, the 2014-2016 Sexual Assault Prevention Strategy, further refines its adaptation of the CDC's social-ecological model by recognizing the essential role of leadership as a distinct sphere of influence for prevention efforts.[199]

To leverage partnerships, DoD SAPRO's 2008 Prevention Strategy recognized that "sexual assault prevention cannot solely be the responsibility of victim services personnel on a military base or in a combat theater."[200] Accordingly, the 2008 Strategy recommended inclusion of outside agencies and organizations such as rape crisis centers and domestic violence service providers in local prevention networks for military organizations.[201] DoD must further develop local coordination requirements both on and off the installation. Installation commanders should be coordinating with victim support agencies in their surrounding local communities. [RSP Recommendation 73]

b. Correcting Myths and Popular Misconceptions

According to the CDC, some sexual violence prevention strategies reflect incorrect popular beliefs and common misunderstandings that impede an accurate, scientifically based assessment of sexual violence issues. In particular, the CDC warns against prevention strategies that suggest to participants common misconceptions about sexual violence such as that sexual violence is perpetrated by relatively few men; that perpetrators of sexual violence tend to fit a certain profile; or that all perpetrators re-perpetrate.[202]

The Department of Defense should review its bystander intervention programs to ensure they do not rely upon such common misconceptions or overgeneralized perceptions. In particular, programs should not overemphasize serial rapists and other sexual "predators" and should instead emphasize preventive engagement, encouraging Service member attention and vigilance toward seemingly harmless attitudes and behaviors that increase the potential for sexual assault. [RSP Recommendation 18]

c. Mitigating Current Gaps in Research

A recent CDC review of 191 research studies determined certain areas of sexual assault prevention are particularly under-researched.[203] For example, there is "very little work" that examines the risk and protective factors affecting male-on-male sexual violence.[204] In addition, the CDC acknowledges a need for further research into risk and protective factors that are "military-specific" when compared to the general population. For example, the CDC suggests further study of military-specific factors, such as deployment (in particular, multiple deployments and combat deployments), as a potential military-specific risk factor as well as several military-specific positive protective factors, such as having at least one fully employed family member and access to health care, stable housing, and family support services.[205]

The Department of Defense must enhance its understanding of these distinct risk and protective factors that take on greater importance in the context of sexual assault in military populations. In particular, DoD should fund research on and seek expert assistance to understand the risk and protective factors unique to male-on-male sexual assault in the military.[206]

2. Crafting Department of Defense and Service Sexual Assault Prevention Efforts

a. Evolution of DoD's Prevention Efforts

The Department of Defense revised its strategic SAPR policy in January 2012 to reflect that sexual assault prevention programs should be standardized across the Services and supported by all commanders.[207] The uniformed leadership expressed its commitment to preventing sexual assault in the military with its Strategic Direction to the Joint Force, published in May 2012. In it, the Joint Chiefs of Staff described prevention as vitally important to developing better command climates and a more professional culture.[208] In addition, on April 17, 2012 and September 25, 2012, the Secretary of Defense directed the Services to enhance training for military leaders;[209] develop core competency training; and develop methods of assessment for the individual prevention programs.[210]

In May 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed implementation of a new SAPR strategic plan covering five "lines of effort": prevention, investigation, accountability, advocacy/victim assistance, and assessment.[211] The SAPR Strategic Plan identified commanders and first line supervisors as the center of gravity of DoD SAPRO's prevention efforts, directed an update to the 2008 strategy,[212] and identified high-priority prevention tasks such as education, training, and implementation of mitigation policies.[213] With the release of the 2013 Strategy, DoD SAPRO also conducted focused assessment of prevention strategies and programs[214] through coordination with CDC sexual violence experts and outside experts on alcohol.[215]

The Secretary of Defense introduced DoD's 2014-2016 Sexual Assault Prevention Strategy on May 1, 2014.[216] The updated prevention strategy shifts "emphasis to enhancing DoD/Service and Leader's [sic] capabilities.[217] This will ensure that leaders are prepared to establish a climate that supports sexual assault prevention while placing renewed emphasis on institutionalizing sexual assault prevention policies and practices."[218] The 2014-2016 Strategy stresses peer-to-peer mentorship, accountability, organizational support, community involvement, deterrence, communication, incentives, harm reduction, and training as successful prevention program elements.[219] The Secretary of Defense directed the immediate implementation of certain measures, such as advancing and sustaining appropriate culture, evaluating commander SAPR training, reviewing alcohol policies, improving reporting for male victims, developing collaborative forums for sexual assault prevention methods, and developing standardized and voluntary surveys for victims/survivors, to further strengthen the shared approach to prevention.[220]

Implementing the kind of robust prevention efforts described above requires great care by commanders to avoid creating the appearance of unlawful command influence.[221] Commanders must remember that, in addition to protecting Service members from sexual assault and responding appropriately to incidents when they occur, they have an equally important obligation to support and safeguard the due process rights of those accused of sexual assault crimes. By executing prevention programs in a balanced way, commanders can avoid creating the appearance of unlawful command influence. In particular, prevention programs should emphasize the presumption of innocence for anyone accused of misconduct, the right to fair investigation and resolution, and the right to seek and present witnesses and evidence. In addition, prevention programs must avoid creating perceptions among those who may serve as panel members at courts-martial that commanders expect particular findings and/or sentences at trials. [RSP Recommendation 80]

Consistent with the comprehensive approach recommended by the CDC, DoD must apply a range of strategies that target Service members and organizations in various ways. For example, in addition to the prevention strategies described below, DoD should consider general deterrence strategies, such as publicizing findings and sentences adjudged at courts-martial for sexual assault offenses.

Historically, the Services primarily implemented DoD prevention policies and initiatives through training. As part of Service training efforts, the Service Secretaries should ensure commanders focus on effective prevention strategies. Commanders must demonstrate leadership of DoD's prevention approach and its principles, and they must ensure members of their command are effectively trained by qualified and motivated trainers who are skilled in teaching methods that will keep participants tuned in to prevention messages. [RSP Recommendation 14] A brief explanation of the current efforts of commanders follows in Section B below; a detailed description can be found in the Role of the Commander Subcommittee Report, included in the Annex to this report.

b. DoD Assessment of Effectiveness of Prevention Efforts

In 2012, DoD revised its strategic SAPR policy document to mandate that the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness develop metrics for compliance and effectiveness of individual SAPR programs.[222]

In addition, following the broad reforms in the FY14 NDAA, the President directed the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to conduct a full-scale review of progress with respect to sexual assault prevention and response.[223] Pursuant to the President's directive, DoD SAPRO recently developed eleven new assessment metrics that are in addition to the six metrics currently tracked.[224] Several of these new metrics, which are in early development and use, focus on prevention efforts.[225] In the shorter term, DoD SAPRO will focus on other assessment measures such as surveys, research studies, and on-site visits.[226]

3. Effective Prevention Practices and Techniques

According to the CDC, an effective public health approach to sexual violence prevention has greater potential to impact behavior to the extent that it applies multiple and varied strategies at the different levels of a given environment.[227] For example, an effective public health approach might simultaneously target: individuals, by teaching them conflict resolution and emotion regulation; peer groups through bystander intervention education; leaders, by training them to be engaged and supportive; the community, by executing a campaign to change social norms and by monitoring locations reported to feel unsafe; and the surrounding society, by introducing alcohol restrictions and enforcing victim protection measures. Such a comprehensive approach employs cohesive and complementary skills and messages, creating a "surround sound effect" that permeates the environment.[228] The military has adopted this approach, as Figure 6 below illustrates:

a. Bystander Intervention

College campuses increasingly use bystander intervention education. Scientific studies show the military can effectively adopt it. Bystander intervention programs teach peer group members how to be "an engaged bystander," defined by the National Sexual Violence Resource Center as "someone who intervenes in a positive way before, during, or after a situation or event in which they see or hear behaviors that promote sexual violence."[229] The approach shifts prevention responsibility from the potential perpetrator or potential victim to everyone in the community.[230] Effective bystander intervention programs encourage peer groups to guard against attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors that contribute to a climate where sexual violence is more likely to occur.[231] This includes language and behaviors such as sexist comments, sexually objectifying jokes, and vulgar gestures. Studies show bystander intervention programs can be effective among both men and women.[232]

Particularly among men, however, fear of retaliation for interrupting and/or reporting offenses remains a distinct challenge for bystander intervention education.[233]

If primary prevention strategies like bystander intervention education are to succeed in the military, programs must educate Service members to guard against retaliation toward peers who intervene and/or report. Policies and requirements must ensure protection from retaliation of not just victims, but also the peers who speak out and step up on their behalf. [RSP Recommendation 19]

b. Alcohol Policy

The CDC identifies alcohol policy as a second additional domain where promising programs may be appropriate in military settings.[234] Alcohol policy strategies encompass laws and regulations at the local, state, and national level intended to regulate or modify the production, sale, and consumption of alcohol.[235] The CDC has also identified pricing strategies, outlet density, and restrictions on availability as promising strategies based on evidence from available studies.[236] While the studies focused on civilian universities, the CDC believes they may be similarly promising in military settings, given demographic and risk factor similarities.[237]

The DoD's 2008 Prevention Strategy first called for education on the interplay of alcohol and sexual assault,[238] and as a result, installations have begun implementing certain alcohol mitigation initiatives.[239] Department of Defense strategic documents, however, have not mandated any of the alcohol mitigation strategies emphasized as promising by the CDC, such as pricing strategies, outlet density, and restrictions on availability.[240] The Department of Defense should work with researchers to determine the best means of implementing these promising, evidence-based strategies across the Services, not just at isolated installations. [RSP Recommendation 15]

c. Identifying Populations with Heightened Vulnerability

In addition to alcohol consumption, studies increasingly identify prior victimization as a sexual violence risk factor. Studies show that individuals, especially women, who are sexual assault victims, are significantly more likely to suffer sexual victimization again later in their lives.[241] Nineteen percent of men and 45% of women who indicated on the 2012 WGRA survey that they experienced unwanted sexual contact in the Armed Forces also said they also experienced unwanted sexual contact prior to entering the military.[242] Programs focusing on survivors of prior sexual assault are a "secondary prevention" strategy.[243] In order for participants to be receptive to such programs, they must teach risk-reduction techniques in a way that avoids unintentional victim-blaming messages.[244]

The Department of Defense has only begun to address strategies that target populations at heightened vulnerability; increased consideration and emphasis on these populations are warranted.[245] Research underscores the importance of developing programs to identify Service members who are victimized prior to entering the military and strengthen these members' ability to deal with the consequences of prior victimization and avoid being victimized again. Through training, DoD has increased focus on special populations that may require targeted interventions, but it should do more to further develop targeted risk-management programs. [RSP Recommendation 16]

While the CDC focuses on "primary prevention" techniques that target potential perpetrators before a sexual assault occurs, it recognizes that strategies geared toward different or wider audiences may be effective, depending on particular risk and protective factors involved.[246] Thus, DoD should not restrict prevention strategies to those emphasizing primary prevention. Instead, DoD should maintain victim-focused programs that educate Service members on important risk factors that are unique to the military, such as disparity in rank. Further, DoD SAPRO should consult with the CDC and other appropriate agencies to develop and expand services for military members who have previously experienced sexual abuse, and to develop strategies to encourage utilization of these services in order to prevent re-victimization and develop or maintain skills necessary to fully engage in military activities and requirements. [RSP Recommendation 17]

B. TRAINING OF PERSONNEL IN SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Training and education play a significant role in DoD and Service prevention efforts. DoD has established comprehensive mandatory training requirements designed to ensure all personnel receive tailored training on SAPR principles, SAPR roles and responsibilities, and current prevention policies and strategies. DoD SAPRO has also established core SAPR training competencies with tailored instruction requirements for commanders, senior leaders, first responders, and SAPR personnel. While the current training requirements are in-depth and address most, if not all, of DoD's prevention policies, plans, and initiatives, some areas of prevention training could be improved.

1. General Personnel Training

One of the key objectives of the various DoD prevention policies is to "mentor, develop skills, and educate Service members to promote healthy relationships and intervene against inappropriate or unacceptable behaviors."[247] Section 585 of the FY12 NDAA required the Service Secretaries to develop a sexual assault prevention training curriculum for Service members, in consultation with outside experts.[248] The training is required to explain the differences between sexual assault and sexual harassment and that both are unacceptable forms of behavior. To illustrate the unique military setting, the training is required to ensure Service members encounter "scenario-based, real-life situations to demonstrate the entire cycle of prevention, reporting, response, and accountability procedures."[249]

Pursuant to Section 574 of the FY13 NDAA[250] and current DoD policy, all of the Services now provide SAPR training to Service members within the first two weeks of initial entrance on active duty.[251] Initial training includes information on DoD policies on prevention, available resources and procedures to obtain those resources, and bystander intervention training.[252] Following initial training, the Services now provide Service members with: prevention resources via newcomers' orientation, posters, brochures, and business cards; scenario-based training familiarizing Service members with the importance of bystander intervention and alcohol; and workshops focused on sexual assault prevention.[253] In addition to the training received during initial entry, DoD policy also requires Service members to receive tailored SAPR training at various points throughout their careers, including annual training, professional military education and leadership development, pre- and post-deployment, and prior to taking any command position.[254]

While the current prevention curriculum is expansive and prevention centric, some improvements and enhancements are necessary to ensure Service members are receiving the most effective prevention training at the earliest possible opportunity. For example, all new recruits should receive initial information and training before they enter basic training. Accordingly, the commanders of Military Entrance Processing Stations (MEPS) should determine how to best provide sexual assault prevention information to new recruits immediately upon entry into the Service. The information should include the definition of sexual assault, possible consequences of a conviction for a sexual offense, and information about resources such as the Safe Helpline.255 [RSP Recommendation 21]

In addition, the Secretary of Defense should continue to develop and implement training for all Service members emphasizing that retaliation or harassment by Service members violates good order and discipline. [RSP Recommendation 23] Harassment and retaliation against a victim in response to an allegation of sexual assault erodes unit cohesion, and the fear of harassment and retaliation deters victims from coming forward to report instances of sexual assault. Although the current DoD policy requires commanders and senior leaders to receive training on recognizing and preventing retaliation towards a victim of sexual assault, the policy does not expressly provide that Service members receive such training.[256]

The ingrained notion of subordination of the individual to the mission that is unique to a military environment may deter Service members from reporting sexual assault and may encourage retaliation by peers against victims who come forward. As such, the Secretary of Defense should direct DoD SAPRO to establish training for all Service members emphasizing that reporting incidents of sexual assault is essential for good order and discipline and protects rather than undermines morale. [RSP Recommendation 22] It is also essential that the training emphasize the importance of the investigative and adjudicative process in the military justice system.

Further, there have been instances where officials and other Service members have ignored or retaliated against victims when the offender is a stellar performer or a superior offending against a subordinate.[257] To combat such retaliation, Service member training should also emphasize that although the military ethos stresses subordination to orders, proposals by superiors for sexual interactions, whether implicit or explicit, are not lawful orders, should not be obeyed, and violate military conduct. [RSP Recommendation 24]

Recent policies and training initiatives have sought to identify special populations within the military to prevent sexual assault. However, male victims of sexual assault are often left out of conversations about how sexual assault occurs in the military. This omission is a lost opportunity to validate and encourage male victims to come forward and may even deter some male victims from reporting sexual assault. DoD prevention efforts should ensure commanders directly acknowledge the potential for male-on-male sexual assault in their commands and directly confront the stigma associated with it. They should also ensure Service members understand that sexually demeaning or humiliating behaviors that may have been minimized as hazing or labeled as "horseplay" in the past are not tolerated and may constitute punishable offenses. DoD SAPRO should fund research on, and seek expert assistance to understand, the risk and protective factors that are unique to male-on-male sexual assault in the military and should develop targeted prevention programs for male-on-male sexual assault offenses. [RSP Recommendation 13] Additionally, the Secretary of Defense should continue to develop and implement training for Service members with examples of male-on-male sexual assault, including hazing and sexual abuse by groups of men. The training should also emphasize the psychological damage done by sexual assault against male victims. [RSP Recommendation 20]

The Department of Defense has established comprehensive, mandatory training requirements that are designed to ensure all personnel receive tailored training on SAPR principles, reporting options and resources for victims, the roles and responsibilities of commanders and SAPR personnel, prevention strategies, and report documentation requirements. In addition, DoD SAPRO has established core SAPR training competencies with tailored instruction requirements for: accessions training, annual refresher training, pre- and post- deployment training, professional military education, senior leadership training, and response personnel training. Congress directed the Panel to assess whether, in addition to current training requirements, "the Department of Defense should promulgate and ensure the understanding of and compliance with, a formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response, as a means for addressing those issues within the Armed Forces."[258] Due to the current training requirements, at this time, the Department of Defense should not promulgate an additional formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities of a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response. [RSP Recommendation 25]

2. Commander Training on Prevention

The Secretary of Defense has directed enhanced prevention training and assessment programs for new military commanders and senior leaders; subsequently, the Services have created specific prevention training efforts for commanders and leaders.[259] These efforts include sexual assault prevention training tailored to specific leadership positions, integrating prevention training into critical Senior Leadership Schools and curriculums, and establishing training emphasizing the role of the commander and senior leaders in preventive efforts.[260] DoD has also required the Services to: (1) provide a dedicated, two-hour block of SAPR training in all pre-command and senior enlisted leader training courses; (2) provide commanders a SAPR "quick reference" program and information guide; (3) assess commanders' and senior enlisted leaders' understanding and mastery of key SAPR concepts; and (4) develop and implement refresher training for sustainment of SAPR skills and knowledge.[261]

Further, effective February 12, 2014, DoD policy required a SAPR training module for training new or prospective commanders at all levels. Tailored to the commanders' responsibilities and leadership requirements, the pre-command training must "foster[ ] a command climate in which persons assigned to the command are encouraged to intervene to prevent potential incidents of sexual assault."[262]

The Services implement DoD prevention training for commanders and leaders in significantly different ways:

- As Army commanders and leaders progress through their careers and levels of responsibility, they are provided SAPR training, including on bystander intervention, tailored to specific leadership positions and/or increased rank, in addition to mandatory annual training. Each year, the Army conducts a Sexual Harassment/Assault Response and Prevention Summit where commanders hear from national leaders, DoD and Army leadership, and subject matter experts, as well as exchange ideas with one another and provide feedback to Army leadership on challenges in executing SAPR responsibilities. In addition, victim service personnel receive training on how to support commander efforts to prevent sexual harassment and sexual assault.

- Air Force commanders receive training at the Wing Commanders' Course, the Squadron Commanders' Course, and throughout their time in command from their staff judge advocates and servicing legal offices. Further, as officers, these commanders received various levels of professional military education, including training and discussions of many of the personnel and command issues they face. These courses include Squadron Officer School as a junior officer, Staff College as a mid-grade officer, and War College as a senior officer.

- The Navy and Marine Corps integrate SAPR training into critical leadership training, including the Senior Enlisted Academy and Command Leadership School. Sexual Assault Prevention and Response training for Navy and Marine Corps leaders emphasizes their role in educating subordinates about sexual assault, including "the influence and power of alcohol" and "the importance of Bystander Intervention."

- All Coast Guard leadership courses include a SAPR module. Annual Coast Guard sexual assault specific training includes prevention and bystander intervention education, and is offered to victim advocates and SARCs.[263]

Chapter Five:

COMMAND ACCOUNTABILITY IN SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

A. ACCOUNTABILITY FOR SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Defining, assessing, and improving command accountability for incidents of sexual violence is central to reducing sexual assault and sex-related offenses. The Panel received overwhelming evidence that indicates the climate commanders establish in their units has a direct causal relationship to increasing reporting of sexual assaults when they occur and to the legally appropriate, timely, and compassionate response to reported sexual assaults. The Services seek to select commanders who possess the highest standards of professional competence and character to discharge their responsibilities effectively. The effort to ensure only the very best are selected for command increases proportionally, according to the level of command, with the process becoming more centralized and deliberate for levels of command that are also vested with special and general court-martial convening authority.

To enhance confidence that commanders will establish command climates that contribute to reducing sexual violence, the DoD and Congress have sought to ensure those selected for command are appropriately trained for their role in preventing and responding to sex-related offenses and, as climate assessment tools continue to develop, are held accountable when the climate within their commands undermines this effort. Determining and standardizing methods and mechanisms by which commanders are held accountable, however, is not a simple task. DoD and the Services should consider opportunities and methods for effectively factoring accountability metrics into commander performance assessments, including climate survey results, indiscipline trends, sexual assault statistics, and equal opportunity data. [RSP Recommendation 31]

1. Training and Selection of Commanders

Military commanders comprise approximately one percent of the active military service.[354] Professional development to prepare officers for this responsibility often begins before commissioning and continues through the junior officer grades as military officers are groomed for command positions.[355] From the earliest opportunity to command, normally at the company or platoon level, commanders receive training and guidance on command and leadership expectations and the weight of the responsibility they hold in their positions. As officers become more senior in grade, command selection becomes more competitive and more rigorous.[356]

To be considered for more senior command billets, an officer's record must reflect certain developmental training, key positions, high marks in performance evaluations, and demonstrated increases in leadership responsibility. Command selection boards are vetted by senior leaders who understand and can identify the quality of a military officer and whether he or she is an appropriate selection for command.[357]

Throughout their careers, military officers receive continual training and education. Each Service has a command and staff college where a command-tracked officer spends "an entire year learning about and studying command."[358] As officers develop and are prepared for command, they attend additional training courses and leadership schools, with each Service offering instruction in legal roles and responsibilities.[359] Once selected for command, officers receive tailored pre-command training and other Service-specific courses based on the level of command and nature of the unit. Commanders, who are paired with an assigned senior enlisted leader, often attend pre-command training course as a team.[270]

In January 2012, the Secretary of Defense directed a DoD-wide evaluation of pre-command SAPR training.[271] DoD SAPRO led the evaluation, after "multiple internal and external reviews of SAPR training in the Military Services have identified such training lacks standardized content, is delivered inconsistently, and is missing an evaluation of effectiveness."[272] In May 2012, DoD SAPRO completed its final evaluation, with 13 recommendations to sustain and improve pre-command SAPR training.[273] Notable among DoD SAPRO's recommendations was the proposal to create a standardized SAPR curriculum across the Services, expand training time to ensure there is ample opportunity for quality instruction, and assess training participants to ensure mastery of key SAPR concepts.[274] In a January 2013 report to the Secretary of Defense, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness noted that the Services would be implementing training enhancements which included: standard core competencies, learning objectives, and methods for assessing training effectiveness, for both pre-command and senior enlisted leader training.[275]

2. Recent Legislation and Department of Defense Initiatives on Accountability

a. Department of Defense Efforts at Enhancing Accountability of Commanders

With standardized training objectives and core competencies in sexual assault prevention and response, the DoD has attempted to develop methods to evaluate commanders and ensure accountability. In the words of one retired general officer, "Command without accountability is a failed model. It absolutely will not work."[276] Requirements in the FY13 NDAA, several of which were incorporated by the Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness into mandates for pre-command SAPR training, provided additional measures to improve commander accountability by adding a SAPR module in training for new or prospective commanders and requiring commanders to conduct regular climate assessments.[277]

In May 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed the Services to implement the 2013 DoD SAPR Strategic Plan. The Secretary also announced several additional measures to address sexual assault in the military, two of which focused on commander accountability.[278] In particular, he directed the Services to develop methods to hold military commanders accountable for command climates and required the next-superior commander to receive copies of annual command climate surveys from subordinate commanders.[279]

To ensure military leaders clearly understand their duties and responsibilities, DoD SAPRO and the Service Secretaries must ensure SAPR programs and initiatives are clearly defined and establish objective standards when possible. [RSP Recommendation 34] For example, the Navy has adopted a definition for "positive command climate" that extends beyond sexual assault prevention to include professionalism, dignity and respect, and efforts to oppose improper discrimination, sexual harassment, hazing, and other inappropriate conduct.[280] In addition, the Navy has provided tailored and specific guidance on implementation of Navy SAPR program initiatives to the entire fleet, including programs, directives, and expectations focused on "improving the safety of our Sailors and reducing incidents of sexual assault" for immediate implementation by Navy commanders.[281]

b. Assessing Commander Performance in Sexual Assault Prevention and Response

Performance evaluation reporting systems now include commander effectiveness in sexual assault prevention and response to sexual assault allegations.[282] The Deputy Chief of DoD SAPRO expressed optimism about recent Service changes adding SAPR support to performance appraisals: "My personal feeling is when you start measuring on somebody's evaluation report, it starts to change leaders' attitudes and behaviors, and they pay attention to it. So I think it will have a profound effect."[283]

Commanders should be measured according to clearly defined and established standards for SAPR leadership and performance. As described previously, command climate surveys are a principal method used by DoD to evaluate climate factors and assess a commander's performance in sustaining an appropriate unit climate. Mandated reporting of command climate surveys to the next higher level of command has the potential to improve command visibility of climate issues of subordinate commanders. Meaningful review by senior commanders increases opportunities for early intervention and can improve command response to survey feedback.

However, commanders and leaders must recognize that surveys may or may not reflect long-term trends and they provide only one measure of a unit's actual command climate and the commander's contribution to that climate. To ensure accurate assessment of subordinate command climate, commanders at all levels must be continuously engaged with subordinate commanders and their units. The Service Secretaries should ensure assessment of commander performance in sexual assault prevention and response incorporates more than results from command climate surveys. [RSP Recommendation 33]

Moreover, assessment of a commander's performance does not necessarily culminate when the commander relinquishes the position and departs the unit. Most command assignments are relatively short, with officers serving in a command position for only two years. Problems related to a commander's tenure may not be known until after the commander departs. Command climate surveys conducted by new commanders shortly after assuming command will likely provide insight into the effectiveness of previous unit leadership. This insight should be appropriately assessed and fully validated, but the Services must ensure post-command feedback on a commander's service is considered and appropriately documented.

Section 3(c) of the Victims Protection Act of 2014, which mirrors the sense of Congress expressed in Section 1751 of the FY14 NDAA, would further expand assessment of SAPR support on all performance appraisals and would require assessment of a commander's sexual assault response efforts.[284] Although this provision would require assessment of the ability of commanders to foster a safe climate for crime reporting and adequately respond to allegations of sexual assault, Section 3(c) would not require performance appraisals to specifically address how a commander performs his or her sexual assault prevention responsibilities.[285]

c. Enhancing Accountability of Subordinate Leaders

A commander may shape the climate in a command, but subordinate leaders and supervisors engaged in day-to-day interactions with unit personnel are also principal contributors to command climate. A former director of DoD SAPRO observed that accountability is essential at all levels, including "commanders, junior officers, and NCOs, because I have heard many times from victims that it's not the commander who's the problem but the supervisors in between the victim and the commander."[286]

The Secretary of Defense's May 2013 directive to the Services required each Service to develop methods and metrics for enhancing commander accountability, tailored to Service needs and structure.[287] Thereafter, each of the Services reported modification of performance evaluations as a primary initiative. The Navy, Army, and Air Force issued Service-wide, direct guidance on performance evaluations that now requires specific consideration of command climate and SAPR issues in officer and noncommissioned officer performance appraisals. While performance appraisals in each Service directly impact promotion potential and future assignments, including command selection, the evaluation scope and level of detail of consideration of command climate and SAPR issues required vary among the Services.[288] Differences among the Services' requirements for SAPR performance assessment may result in uneven support and attention among subordinate leaders and personnel.

The Service Secretaries should ensure SAPR performance assessment requirements extend below unit commanders to include subordinate leaders, including officers, noncommissioned officers, and civilian supervisors. [RSP Recommendation 32] Section 3(c) of the VPA would extend evaluation requirements to all Service members by mandating that the Service Secretaries "ensure that the written performance appraisals of members of the Armed Forces . . . include an assessment of the extent to which each such member supports the sexual assault prevention and response program of the Armed Force concerned."[289]

3. Methods of Accountability

The most fundamental way a commander may be held accountable for any failure in his or her responsibilities is relief from command.[290] Commanders serve at the discretion of their superior commanders and leaders.[291] In addition to requiring senior officers to evaluate subordinate commanders on their performance in establishing a healthy command climate, Section 1751 of the FY14 NDAA provides the sense of Congress that "the failure of commanding officers to maintain such a command climate is an appropriate basis for relief from their command positions."[292]

Other provisions of law and policy provide additional accountability. Section 1701 of the FY14 NDAA authorizes disciplinary sanctions against members who willfully or wantonly fail to comply with victim rights requirements under the recently enacted Article 6b of the UCMJ.[293] Punitive sanctions may also be imposed for illegal conduct during an investigation or trial.[294] Lesser means are also available to hold commanders accountable for SAPR performance.[295]

Commanders should be consistently held accountable in three primary instances: (1) when they are personally involved in misconduct; (2) when they fail to act in a legally or ethically proper manner in response to an incident; or (3) when a superior commander determines that there are poor climate indicators demonstrating inadequate prevention or response efforts within the organization.

Senior leaders' sexual misconduct or failure to take appropriate action in response to sexual assault reports often leads to a perception that high-ranking members are impervious to disciplinary action for wrongdoing, which results in an erosion of trust among the force and the public. Command accountability is a critical concern which needs to continually be monitored, with consistency in actions taken against members, regardless of their rank, and transparency in those disposition decisions.[296]

It is important to continue to leverage accountability mechanisms that encourage commanders to set a positive command climate that contributes to sexual assault prevention and appropriate response to sexual assault allegations. While ineffective or inadequate commanders should be relieved, accountability must also include positive reinforcement that will strengthen good commanders. DoD and the Services must pay particular attention to developing leaders who are well suited for command at every level, selecting the best among this pool for positions of command, and training them in effective leadership and oversight of SAPR issues.

B. COMMAND CLIMATE ASSESSMENT

The Department of Defense and the Services have developed tools for individual commanders and senior leaders to assess the climate within commands for sexual assault prevention and response. Congress, DoD, and the Services established baseline requirements for conducting and reporting climate assessment surveys that seek to ensure commanders are attuned to and accountable for the SAPR climate within their unit. Surveys may provide helpful information about positive or negative climate factors, but surveys alone do not provide a comprehensive assessment of the climate in an organization. The Department of Defense and the Services must develop and implement other means to assess and measure institutional and organizational climate for sexual assault prevention and response. [RSP Recommendation 28]

Additionally, external evaluation of institutional and installation command climate is important to achieving credible, unbiased measurement of SAPR initiatives, programs, and effectiveness. DoD SAPRO serves as the Department's single point of accountability and oversight for developing and implementing SAPR programs and initiatives, and it is also responsible for assessing and monitoring the effectiveness of these efforts. External, independent reviews of SAPR efforts in DoD, whether or not they validate or disprove DoD's own internal assessments, would provide useful feedback to the Department and the public on SAPR programs, initiatives, and effectiveness. [RSP Recommendation 78]

1. Assessment Methods

The Department of Defense and the Services use a variety of tools and methods to assess institutional and command effectiveness in preventing sexual assault and responding appropriately to sexual assault reports. Institutional assessment measures include metrics based on sexual assault case report information in the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database (DSAID). DoD SAPRO currently monitors DoD and Service performance on six metrics, including trends in overall reports of sexual assault and number and certification of full-time SAPR personnel; fifteen additional metrics are in development.[297] DoD SAPRO and the Services also use information from the biannual Workplace and Gender Relations Surveys, as well as the Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute (DEOMI) Equal Opportunity Climate Surveys (DEOCS) to assess DoD and Service effectiveness in sexual assault prevention and response.[298]

The Services assess the effectiveness of individual commands in sexual assault prevention and response in a variety of ways. All of the Services use command climate surveys as a primary information source to assess the SAPR climate within commands, requiring units to conduct surveys when a new commander assumes responsibility for the organization and annually thereafter. Additionally, a variety of other assessment methods, including individual incident reports, SAPR office feedback from training course evaluations or Case Management Group and Sexual Assault Response Team meetings, DoD and Service inspectors general inspections, SAPR program compliance inspections, 360-degree and other leadership assessments, and local personnel surveys are used to obtain information about the climate in a command.

2. Command Climate Surveys

DEOMI conducts command climate surveys for DoD organizations. The original command climate survey was a questionnaire designed to provide leaders with information about how assigned personnel perceived "Equal Opportunity" issues in their unit. The survey—now called the Defense Equal Opportunity Climate Survey (DEOCS)—has since evolved and expanded to address a wide variety of human relations issues, including sexual assault, sexual harassment, hazing, and bullying.[299] The DEOCS is now the primary vehicle for assessing command climate for all military commanders at all levels of command.[300] The most recent version of DEOCS, Version 4.0, includes 95 questions that assess 23 workplace climate factors, including SAPR.[301]

DEOCS Version 4.0 assesses the following factors, which impact the SAPR climate in any individual command:

- perceptions of safety;
- chain of command support;
- publicity of SAPR information;
- unit reporting climate;
- perceived barriers to reporting;

- unit prevention climate/bystander intervention; and
- knowledge of restricted reporting.[302]

While commanders are ultimately accountable for their unit's performance and climate, unit climate assessments must consider the effectiveness of all leaders in the organization, including other officers, enlisted leaders, supervisors, and noncommissioned officers. Most issues and concerns expressed by victims are with lower-level leaders, not senior commanders or convening authorities.[303] Therefore, assessment of command climate must accurately assess and evaluate the effectiveness of subordinate organizational leaders in addition to commanders. [RSP Recommendation 26] Additionally, commanders must pay particular attention to the critical role noncommissioned officers, subordinate leaders, and supervisors play. They must set expectations that establish appropriate organizational climate and ensure unit leaders are appropriately trained to effectively perform their roles in sexual assault prevention and response.

3. Frequency, Use, and Reporting of Command Climate Surveys

Prior to 2013, the Services had individual policies for frequency and use of command climate surveys. Section 572(a)(3) of the FY13 NDAA established a common command climate assessment standard, mandating that all military commanders conduct a climate assessment of the command within 120 days after assuming command and at least annually thereafter.[304] In July 2013, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness required the Secretaries of the Military Departments to establish procedures to ensure commanders of all units of 50 or more persons conduct climate assessments in accordance with the FY13 NDAA requirement.[305] Section 587(b) of the FY14 NDAA required performance evaluations for all commanders to include a statement whether required climate assessments were conducted, and Section 587(c) directed that failure to conduct required assessments must be noted in a commander's performance evaluation.[306]

In addition, DoD mandated in July 2013 that the commander at the next level in the chain of command also receive survey results and analysis within 30 days after the requesting commander received the survey results.[307] This policy took effect prior to passage of Section 587(a) of the FY14 NDAA, which mandated that results of command climate assessments must go to the individual commander and the next higher level of command.[308] The Services have since established policies in accordance with DoD's guidance for survey frequency and result reporting requirements.[309]

DEOMI's leadership notes that administering a survey does not complete assessment of a command's climate because the results obtained from a DEOCS are only the "starting point" that may "highlight issues."[310] Based on survey results, DEOMI provides additional recommendations for assessment tools, such as focus groups, interviews, or records reviews that a commander may use to better diagnose areas of concern. Additionally, DEOMI provides training tools and other resources for commanders to improve command performance in specific focus areas that are assessed through the DEOCS.[311]

With the additional mandate requiring superior commanders to receive command climate survey results for their subordinate units, DEOMI expects "the accountability level is going to go up" on command climate survey results.[312] In addition to superior commanders receiving access to results through DEOMI, each of the Services has established policies requiring commanders to brief survey results to their superior commanding officer within 30 days. In September 2013, the Marine Corps implemented a policy requiring commanders to develop an action plan that addresses concerns identified in a DEOCS report and identifies periodic evaluations for assessing the plan's effectiveness. Marine Corps commanders must brief the survey results, analysis, and action plan to the next higher-level commander, who must then approve the plan prior to implementation.[313] While other Services recently implemented similar policies for climate assessment action plans and reporting,[314] such action plans should be mandated by all Services and should outline the steps the command will take to validate or expand upon survey information. [RSP Recommendation 27]

In addition to personnel surveys, DoD, the Services, and commanders should identify other resources for feedback on SAPR programs and local command climate. [RSP Recommendation 29] Chaplains, social services providers, military judges, inspectors general, and officers and enlisted personnel participating in professional military education courses may be underutilized resources for obtaining accurate, specific, and unvarnished information about institutional and local climate. Victim satisfaction interviews may provide direct insight into climate factors and feedback on installation services and organizational support.

Commanders must seek additional information beyond survey results to gain a clear picture of the climate in their organizations. However, they must ensure they do not seek out or use information that is otherwise confidential or protected. Commanders should be trained in methods for monitoring a unit's SAPR climate and should be held accountable for monitoring their command's SAPR climate outside of the conduct of periodic surveys. [RSP Recommendation 35]

In addition to unit-level report results, DEOMI aggregates SAPR climate data from DEOCS and provides summary reports to DoD SAPRO and the Services. Monthly reports provided to DoD SAPRO include unit-level and demographic subgroup summaries of the previous four months of data collected across the DoD, and quarterly reports provide trend analyses of survey results. DEOMI prepares similar quarterly summaries for the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, National Guard, Reserve Component, and Joint Commands.[315]

As described above, surveys administered by DEOMI have increased substantially, and it appears this trend will continue based on new statutory and policy climate survey requirements. Although a climate survey can be a valuable tool for assessment, accurate and thoughtful feedback from unit members is essential to ensuring meaningful survey information.

The recent dramatic increase in the use and frequency of surveys administered by DEOMI last year raises concerns about survey fatigue. Personnel who are tasked repeatedly to complete surveys for their immediate unit and its parent commands may become less inclined to participate or provide meaningful input. DoD and the Services must be mindful of survey fatigue, and they should monitor and assess what impact increased survey requirements have on survey response rates and survey results. [RSP Recommendation 10]

Section 3(d) of the Victims Protection Act of 2014 proposes to further expand climate assessment mandates by requiring climate assessments for the commands of the accused and the victim following an incident involving a covered sexual offense. The results of these climate assessments must be provided to the MCIO investigating the offense concerned and next higher level commander of the command.

The Panel recommends that Congress not adopt Section 3(d) of the Victims Protection Act. [RSP Recommendation 30] While information about a unit's culture or climate may prove helpful or relevant in some criminal investigations, it is not clear how organizational climate surveys would be effective following each report of a sexual assault offense. Organizational climate may not be a contributing factor in every alleged sexual assault crime. Additional survey requirements increase concerns about survey fatigue and the accuracy of the information collected.

Instead, the Secretary of Defense should direct the formulation of a review process to be applied following each reported instance of sexual assault to determine the non-criminal factors surrounding the event. Such reviews should address what measures ought to be taken to lessen the likelihood of recurrence (e.g., physical security, lighting, access to alcohol, off-limits establishments, etc.). DoD has not formalized a standard process to review reported incidents of sexual assault to determine what additional actions might be taken in the future to prevent the occurrence of such an incident. Some organizations and commands within DoD have developed review processes that warrant evaluation by DoD.

Chapter Six:

SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTING, VICTIM SERVICES, AND RESOURCES

A. PERSONNEL AND PROGRAMS ENGAGED IN SEXUAL ASSAULT RESPONSE

The DoD's sexual assault response systems include the commander, victim services personnel, special victim counsel, medical and behavioral health personnel, prosecutors, law enforcement investigators, and others. This chapter describes options for sexual assault victims to report the incident and additional services available for victims in both the military and civilian sector. This chapter further describes a DoD and civilian best practice—the multidisciplinary approach to sexual assault.

The table below provides a synopsis of personnel and programs engaged in DoD and civilian response systems to adult sexual assault.

Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Personnel and Programs	Purpose[316]
The Family Advocacy Program (FAP)	A program designed to address prevention, identification, evaluation, treatment, rehabilitation, follow-up, and reporting of family violence, including sexual violence. The Family Advocacy Programs across the Services consist of coordinated efforts designed to prevent and intervene in cases of family distress and promote healthy family life.[317]
The Special Victim Counsel Program and Special Victim Counsel (SVC)	The Special Victim Counsel Program was created by the Services and mandated by Congress to support sexual assault victims and enhance their rights within the military justice system while neither causing unreasonable delay nor infringing upon the rights of an accused.[318] The Navy and Marine Corps term for this attorney is victim legal counsel (VLC). A special victim counsel's primary duty is to represent their clients' rights and interests during the investigation and court-martial process.[319] In general, special victim counsel services include, but are not limited to: accompanying and advising the victim during interviews, examinations and hearings, advocating to government counsel and commanders on behalf of the victim, and advising the victim on collateral civil matters which stem from the alleged sexual assault.[320] Special victim counsel are also able to advise a victim on the difference between a restricted and unrestricted report and on what to expect if they decide to make an unrestricted report and their case is referred to court-martial. Special victim counsel may coordinate with the sexual assault response and victim witness assistance personnel on available resources.[321]

Sexual Assault Response Coordinator (SARC)	The single point of contact at an installation or within a geographic area who oversees sexual assault awareness, prevention, and response training; coordinates medical treatment, including emergency care, for victims of sexual assault; tracks the services provided to a victim of sexual assault from the initial report through final disposition and resolution.[322]
Sexual Assault Response Team (SART)	A multidisciplinary team that provides specialized immediate response to victims of recent sexual assault. The team typically includes health care personnel, law enforcement representatives, victim advocates, prosecutors (usually available on-call to consult with first responders, although some may be more actively involved at this stage), and forensic lab personnel (typically available to consult with examiners, law enforcement, or prosecutors, but not actively involved at this stage).[323]
Sexual Assault Victim Advocate (VA) or Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Victim Advocate (SAPR VA)	Provides non-clinical crisis intervention and on-going support in addition to referrals for adult sexual assault victims. Support includes providing information on available options and resources to victims. Provides liaison assistance with other organizations and agencies on victim care matters and reports directly to the SARC when performing victim advocacy duties.[324]
Domestic Abuse Victim Advocate (DAVA)	Victim advocates in the Family Advocacy Program who provide assistance to victims of spousal or intimate partner domestic abuse, including sexual abuse and child sexual abuse.
Special Victim Capability (SVC)	A multidisciplinary, coordinated approach to investigating, prosecuting, and providing victim support for sexual assault offenses. DoD policy requires that the capability include: specially trained investigators, specially trained prosecutors, victim witness assistance personnel, and paralegals.
Specially Trained Investigators or Special Victim Unit Investigator (SVUI)	A distinct recognizable group of appropriately skilled investigators who investigate allegations of sexual assault, domestic violence involving sexual assault, and child abuse involving sexual assault.[325] DoD uses the term special victim unit investigator to refer to the MCIO agent or investigator supporting the Special Victim Capability. The MCIOs, however, refer to the military personnel as agents and civilian personnel as either agents or investigators, depending on their hiring status.
Detective	Civilian law enforcement based investigator, generally assigned to conduct investigations subsequent to a patrol officer's first response.
Investigator	A trained criminal investigator employed by prosecution or defense office to provide investigative support specifically to that office.
Victim Coordinator	An individual from the civilian law enforcement agency providing victim support through the investigative process.
Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE)	A registered nurse who receives specialized education and fulfills clinical requirements to perform the sexual assault medical forensic exam.[326]

Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examiner (SAMFE)	Medical personnel who are clinically trained to perform a sexual assault exam and have obtained an additional forensic certification to collect forensic evidence from sexual assault victims. Often, the SAMFE is a SANE nurse who has completed the forensic certification.[347]
Specially Trained Prosecutors or Special Victim Prosecutor (SVP)	Specially trained and experienced judge advocates detailed by Service TJAGs, the SJA to the Commandant of the Marine Corps (CMC), or other appropriate authority to litigate or assist with the prosecution of special victim cases and provide advisory support to MCIO investigators and responsible legal offices as part of the Special Victim Capability. Before specially trained prosecutors are detailed, their Service TJAG, SJA to CMC, or other appropriate authority has determined they have the necessary training, maturity, advocacy, and leadership skills to carry out those duties.[348] DoD uses the term specially trained prosecutors. The Army uses the term special victim prosecutor, while the Air Force and Navy refer to this person as senior trial counsel. The Marines use complex trial teams for serious sexual assault cases and rely on the regional trial counsel to provide the support for the Special Victim Capability.
Victim Witness Liaison (VWL)	An individual who works within the civilian prosecutors' office or with the military prosecutors' office to assist victims throughout the trial process. In the military, the VWL is part of the Victim Witness Assistance Program and coordinates efforts to ensure systems are in place at the installation level to provide information on available benefits and services. Assists victims and witnesses in obtaining those benefits and services.
The Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP)	A program designed to coordinate efforts and ensure that systems are in place at the installation level to provide information to victims and witnesses on available benefits and services and to provide assistance in obtaining those benefits and services. VWAP applies to all crime victims and witnesses. The local responsible official (in charge of the installation level program) establishes oversight procedures to ensure the establishment of an integrated support system capable of providing services to victims and witnesses. Ensures victims and witnesses are informed on the military justice process and available medical and social services.[349] A program that provides policies and responsibilities for assisting victims and witnesses of crimes committed in violation of the UCMJ or in violation of the law of another jurisdiction if any portion of the investigation is conducted primarily by a DoD component.[350]

B. OVERVIEW OF VICTIM SERVICES

The DoD SAPR Program is the military's flagship program devoted to preventing and responding to the crime of sexual assault "in order to enable military readiness and reduce – with a goal to eliminate – sexual assault from the military."[331] Since its inception in 2004, the DoD SAPR program has been the single source for sexual assault policy across DoD.[332]

Since 2005, DoD policy has provided a restricted reporting option for sexual assault victims who want to obtain services while maintaining confidentiality; mandated baseline and pre-deployment sexual assault prevention training for Service members and first responders (e.g., healthcare providers, victim advocates, law enforcement, criminal investigators, judge advocates, chaplains); and required SARCs and victim advocates to provide services specifically for active duty Service members and their adult dependents who are sexually assaulted. SARCS are also responsible for prevention training, management of victim advocates, maintaining reporting data, and maintaining a 24 hours per day, seven days per week capability.[333] Appendix I describes the current scope and structure of each Service's SARC and SAPR victim advocate program.

Since the inaugural DoD sexual assault policy in 2005, Congress has directed an ongoing and increasingly long list of substantial changes, additions, and improvements to DoD SAPR programs.[334] As an Army Sexual Harassment/Assault Response and Prevention Program manager commented to the Panel, "I see a real difference in the way the commanders understand the issues of sexual assault and sexual harassment. I see a 100 percent increase in the amount of attention paid to the education of all soldiers about the crime."[335]

However, Congress mandated many of the changes and new programs in such rapid succession that SAPR personnel have had to begin implementing new initiatives before fully implementing previously required programs. Due in large part to the speed with which these programs and initiatives have been adopted, DoD has not performed a thorough assessment and evaluation of all current programs to determine their effectiveness, the extent to which they may be duplicative, and conclude which programs should be continued or expanded.[336]

Therefore, DoD SAPRO should conduct a thorough evaluation and assessment of all programs and initiatives dealing with sexual assault and measure the effectiveness of each to determine which programs and initiatives are effective, which should be continued, expanded, and preserved and how best to allocate funding for the effective programs and initiatives. [RSP Recommendation 77]

C. REPORTING SEXUAL ASSAULTS IN THE MILITARY

A Service member who believes he or she has been sexually assaulted has numerous options for reporting the assault. A victim is never required to report the offense to his or her commander or any other military commander.

1. Options for Reporting

DoD policy provides that sexual assault victims may choose to make a restricted or unrestricted report of the incident. DoD implemented restricted reporting in 2005 "before [the option] was even an item of discussion" in civilian jurisdictions.[337] A restricted report is confidential and will not result in notification of law enforcement or the victim's chain of command.[338] A victim can only make a restricted report to a SARC, SAPR victim advocate or healthcare personnel.[339] Restricted reports allow victims to report confidentially and obtain the support of healthcare treatment and services of a SARC or SAPR victim advocate without being forced to initiate a criminal investigation. This option is intended to maximize support for victims without requiring them to choose between obtaining support or retaining their privacy.

After receiving a restricted report a SARC or SAPR victim advocate is required to report the fact of the assault to the installation commander,[340] but the report will not contain personally identifiable information and may not be used for investigative purposes.[341] Accordingly, the identities of the victim and the offender, if known, remain confidential in a restricted report.[342] If a victim confides in another person about a sexual assault, the victim retains the restricted reporting option, unless the confidant is a member of law enforcement or is in the victim's supervisory hierarchy or chain of command.[343]

Victims can make unrestricted reports of sexual assault to SARCs, SAPR victim advocates, and healthcare personnel, as well as chaplains,[344] judge advocates, and military or civilian law enforcement personnel.[345] Victims may also report an assault to a supervisor or their chain of command, but they are not required to do so. Under current law and practice, unrestricted reports of sexual assault must be referred to, and investigated by, MCIOs that are independent of the chain of command.[346] Service members may always call civilian law enforcement or other civilian agencies to report a sexual assault if they are not comfortable notifying military authorities.

Though several categories of military personnel are trained as initial responders to sexual assault reports, only SARCs and SAPR victim advocates are responsible for formally documenting reports.[347] The following table depicts the different reporting resources available within DoD to victims of sexual assault:

Unrestricted Reporting Resources

- Sexual Assault Response Coordinators (SARCs)
- Victim Advocates (VAs)
- Health Care Professionals or Personnel
- Chaplains[349]
- Legal Personnel
- Chain of Command
- Law Enforcement – Military Police or Military Criminal Investigative Organizations

Restricted Reporting Resources[348]

- Sexual Assault Response Coordinators (SARCs)
- Victim Advocates (VAs)
- Health Care Professionals or Personnel
- Chaplains[350]
- Legal Assistance Attorneys[351] and Special Victims Counsel

2. Ensuring Service Members Understand Reporting Options

Reporting options are broadly publicized throughout the military. DoD policy requires that all military personnel must receive tailored sexual assault prevention and response training upon initial entry to the military, annually, during professional military education and leadership development training, before and after deployments, and prior to filling a command position.[352] Training must explain available restricted and unrestricted reporting options and the advantages and limitations of each option, and it must highlight that victims may seek help or report offenses outside their chain of command.[353]

Although reporting options are well publicized, it is not clear that all members of the military fully understand them. Recent surveys conducted by DEOMI indicated that 71% of DoD personnel surveyed correctly understood restricted reporting options.[354] Junior enlisted personnel scored lowest on understanding their options for filing a restricted report, with nearly 50% of survey respondents incorrectly answering that "anyone in my chain of command" could take a restricted report of sexual assault. Sexual assault reporting options should be clarified to ensure all members of the military, including the most junior personnel, understand their options for making a restricted or unrestricted report and the channels through which they can make a report. [RSP Recommendation 65]

Special victim counsel are particularly qualified to help victims of sexual assault understand reporting options. Military sexual assault victims who make either restricted or unrestricted reports, and are otherwise entitled to legal assistance, are eligible for special victim counsel representation.[355] However, a special victim counsel is not listed as an entity that takes restricted reports. It is unclear if a victim may seek special victim counsel advice prior to making an official report.[356] The Secretary of Defense should develop and implement policy that, when information comes to military police about an instance of sexual assault by whatever means, the first step in an investigation is to advise the victim that she or he has the right to speak with special victim counsel before determining whether to file a restricted or unrestricted report, or no report at all. [RSP Recommendation 62]

3. Resolving Collateral Misconduct in Sexual Assault Reporting

As noted in Chapter 2 of this report, collateral misconduct by a sexual assault victim is a significant barrier to reporting because of the victim's fear of punishment.[357] Military sexual assault victims may anticipate they will face negative consequences for collateral misconduct such as underage drinking, fraternization, disobeying orders, and other military-specific offenses.[358] Under current DoD policy, commanders can defer action on victims' collateral misconduct until final disposition of the case, if appropriate, so as to encourage reporting of sexual assault and continued victim cooperation.[359] Only a general court-martial convening authority can grant immunity in the military justice system; the authority to grant immunity may not be delegated.[360] The lack of automatic immunity for minor collateral misconduct in sexual assault cases may contribute to reluctance among sexual assault victims to report their victimization.

Some civilian police agencies reported they usually take no action against victims for minor violations associated with a sexual assault incident. For example, in Philadelphia, the police department follows a District Attorney's Office policy not to pursue charges against victims for low-level drug or alcohol violations. For more serious offenses, such as prostitution, prosecutors will sometimes grant immunity.[361]

The Services do not support a universal immunity policy for victims who may have committed some collateral misconduct.[362] The Services cited the lack of empirical evidence that a collateral misconduct immunity policy would increase reporting and expressed concerns that it might weaken the credibility of the victim witness and increase false reporting.[363]

Previous studies also expressed concern that blanket immunity could undermine discipline and have the unintended consequence of causing alienation of the victim, especially if others are held accountable for similar misconduct.[364] These concerns about collateral misconduct require further consideration. The Panel recommends an expedited study of what may constitute low-level collateral misconduct in sexual assault cases and examination of whether a procedure for granting limited immunity should be implemented in the future. [RSP Recommendation 60]

4. Maintaining Offender Information from Restricted Reports

The DoD uses the DSAID, a secure, web-based tool to gather information to compile sexual assault statistics for required reports to Congress and to support Service SAPR program management.[365] DSAID contains information input by SARCs about both restricted and unrestricted sexual assault reports involving members of the Armed Forces. However, current DoD policy prohibits inputting personal identifying information of the alleged offender in a restricted report.[366] Consequently, incidents reported through the restricted reporting option may allow possible serial offenders to go undetected.

The FY14 NDAA required the Panel to assess "the means by which the name, if known, and other necessary identifying information of an alleged offender that is collected as part of a restricted report of a sexual assault could be compiled into a protected, searchable database accessible only to military criminal investigators."[367] DoD policy allows information from a restricted report to be released when "necessary to prevent or mitigate a serious and imminent threat to the health or safety of the victim or another person; for example, multiple reports involving the same alleged suspect (repeat offender) could meet this criteria."[368] Policy and procedures should be developed for SARCs to enter alleged offender information from restricted reports in DSAID with appropriate safeguards to protect this personally identifiable information and control its release to MCIOs. [RSP Recommendation 67] The Services noted concern that placing information from a restricted report into an MCIO's criminal intelligence database "could result in proactive or inadvertent actions by investigators searching that database that could jeopardize the confidentiality of a restricted report."[369]

5. Allowing Victims to Meet with Military Law Enforcement Investigators Prior to Selecting Reporting Option

The Panel recommends the Secretary of Defense direct DoD SAPRO, in coordination with the Services and DoD IG, to change restricted reporting policy to allow a victim who has made a restricted report the option to voluntarily provide information to an MCIO agent without the report automatically becoming unrestricted and triggering a law enforcement investigation. However, victims must have their SARC, victim advocate, or special victim counsel present during any conversation with investigators to use this option and have voluntarily decided to speak to the MCIO agent. This would allow investigators to document information for criminal intelligence purposes,[370] while developing a rapport with victims, which may in turn, encourage them to file an unrestricted report. The policy should prohibit MCIOs from using information obtained in this manner to initiate an investigation or title an alleged offender as a subject, unless the victim chooses, or changes, his or her preference to an unrestricted report. The Secretary of Defense should require this information be provided the same safeguards as other criminal intelligence data to protect against misuse of the information. [RSP Recommendation 63]

D. SPECIAL VICTIM COUNSEL PROGRAM

Following an Air Force pilot program and a mandate from the Secretary of Defense to the Services to create special victim counsel programs, Congress codified the Special Victim Counsel[371] Program to "strengthen . . . support of victims of sexual assault and enhance their rights" within the military justice system "while neither causing unreasonable delay nor infringing upon the rights of an accused."[372] An independent special victim counsel represents the interests of and advocates for the victim.[373] An overarching goal of the Special Victim Counsel Program is to instill confidence in victims so that more victims come forward and report incidents of sexual assault.[374] Appendix J describes the current scope and structure of each Service's Special Victim Counsel Program.

A special victim counsel's primary duty is to represent the clients' rights and interests during the investigation, pre-trial investigation proceedings and negotiations, including plea agreements, and the court-martial process.[375] In general, special victim counsel services include, but are not limited to, accompanying and advising the victim during interviews, examinations and hearings, advocating to government counsel, commanders, and the convening authority on behalf of the victim, and advising the victim on collateral civil matters which stem from the alleged sexual assault.[376] Special victim counsel are also able to advise a victim on reporting options and their potential outcomes.[377] Special victim counsel may coordinate with the sexual assault response and victim witness assistance personnel to ensure the victim is informed of all available services and assist victims with obtaining available resources. Following the enactment of Article 6b of the UCMJ, which codifies certain military victim rights, the special victim counsel is also responsible for ensuring the victim is aware of his or her rights within the military justice system and advocating to ensure that the victim's rights are enforced by all persons involved in the court-martial process.[378] Additionally, special victim counsel may represent the victim in courts-martial, as permitted by law, and assist victims with any post-trial submissions to the convening authority.[379]

1. Eligibility for Services

The FY14 NDAA codified the right of sexual assault victims to obtain legal services through a special victim counsel.[380] Currently, to be eligible for special victim counsel assistance, a sexual assault victim must make an unrestricted or restricted report of sexual assault under the UCMJ and otherwise be entitled to legal assistance under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e.[381] Further, pursuant to Service policy, an eligible victim must be offered special victim counsel services as soon as he or she reports an alleged sex-related offense or when he or she seeks assistance from a SARC, a victim advocate, military criminal investigator, VWL, trial counsel, healthcare provider, or any other designated personnel.[382] Appendix K describes the scope and nature of services provided to victims according to each Service's Special Victim Counsel Program.

Many sexual assault victims may not know they may seek the advice of a special victim counsel before reporting or when choosing not to report; current policy is unclear at this point. To clarify this issue and to ensure sexual assault victims receive timely advice, DoD should develop and implement policy providing sexual assault victims the right and ability to consult with a special victim counsel before deciding whether to make a restricted or unrestricted report, or no report at all. Communication made during this consultation would be confidential and protected under the attorney-client privilege. [RSP Recommendation 61] Such a policy will also assist with alleviating the fear of damage to one's career after making an official report by providing the victim with accurate information about potential courses of action and their consequences.

2. Selection of Special Victim Counsel

Pursuant to the FY14 NDAA, special victim counsel are required to meet the same qualifications as other legal assistance attorneys (i.e., judge advocate or a civilian attorney who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State) and be certified as competent to be designated as a special victim counsel by the Service Judge Advocate General.[383] In addition to these statutory requirements, the staff judge advocate, Service Judge Advocate General, or Special Victim Counsel Program officer in charge look to additional factors, such as previous military justice experience, maturity and sound judgment, and a desire to serve in the position.[384]

Although not expressly required in every Service, it is preferred that the counsel have experience as both defense and trial counsel before serving as special victim counsel.[385] The length of time the individual served in a military justice position varies throughout each Service; it is unclear if actual trial experience is required across the Services. The Services should implement additional selection criteria for their Special Victim Counsel programs that require appropriate trial experience, whenever possible, prior to being selected as a special victim counsel. [RSP Recommendation 47]

3. Assignment Length and Duration of Representation

Based on Service policy, the duration of an officer's special victim counsel assignment varies. In general, a special victim counsel will serve a minimum of one year and not more than two years.[386] If a Naval Reserve officer is activated to serve as a special victim counsel, the assignment may last three years.[387] Air Force special victim counsel remain non-deployable for the duration of their assignment.[388] The Army does not have the same limitation but provides, "[s]pecial consideration should be given to ensure that continuity is not broken between a [special victim counsel] and the victim represented. Thus, care must be [taken] when making deployment determinations that involve a [special victim counsel] who is actively representing victims."[389]

According to individual Service policies, the special victim counsel and victim have a privileged attorney-client relationship from their initial meeting through the final disposition[390] of a case or transfer of the special victim counsel to another duty station.[391] However, following final action or transfer of counsel, a right of the victim may still exist and be at issue. Therefore, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to extend the opportunity for special victim counsel representation, although not necessarily with the same special victim counsel, to a victim so long as a right of the victim exists and is at issue. [RSP Recommendation 44]

4. Assessments of the Special Victim Counsel Program

Members of the Panel had the opportunity to hear from military sexual assault victims who were assigned a special victim counsel. Each witness who had been assigned a special victim counsel testified that the special victim counsel was critical to his or her ability to understand the process and participate effectively as witnesses against their accuser.[392] The outcome of an acquittal in some of the cases did not lessen the value the victim placed on the special victim counsel's representation.[393] Initial survey results from the Air Force, the only Service to have currently implemented a victim satisfaction survey, revealed responses were overwhelmingly positive and show the effectiveness of the Special Victim Counsel program.[394] Ninety-two percent of those surveyed indicated they were "extremely satisfied" with the advice and support the [special victim counsel] provided during the court-martial process.[395]

Members of the Panel also heard testimony from trial and defense counsel, SARCs, and victim advocate personnel regarding their relationships with special victim counsel. The witnesses stated they have positive working relationships with special victim counsel, but foresee potential issues such as privilege, confidentiality, and delays which could affect the relationships.[396] Therefore, in addition to assessing victim satisfaction with the Special Victim Counsel program, the Service Secretaries should survey convening authorities, staff judge advocates, prosecutors, defense counsel, military judges, and investigators to assess the effects of the program on the administration of justice. [RSP Recommendation 48]

To evaluate the cost and effectiveness of the program, the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps are developing surveys modeled on the Air Force victim impact survey;[397] the Judge Advocate General of the Army has tasked the Army Special Victim Counsel Program manager with gathering information about the first twelve months of the Army's Special Victim Counsel Program.[398] However, the Services have neither universally defined what "effective" means nor developed any standardized method of evaluating program effectiveness.[399] To ensure the program remains effective, the Service Secretaries should develop a standard evaluation mechanism, in consultation with an independent evaluator, with appropriate metrics to determine the effectiveness of the Special Victim Counsel program on an annual basis. This includes annually evaluating the effectiveness of the organizational structure of the Service Special Victim Counsel programs and assessing the individual Service policies on eligibility requirements for obtaining a special victim counsel. [RSP Recommendation 51]

Due to early evidence of the program's success, Congress appropriated $25 million for the DoD in the FY14 NDAA to assist the Services with the cost of implementation, staffing, and operations for their individual Special Victim Programs.[400] However, for the upcoming fiscal year and beyond, each Service anticipates significant operating costs and increased staffing requirements to sustain effective Special Victim Counsel Programs.[401] Therefore, to ensure the Services are able to sustain a robust Special Victim Counsel program, Congress should appropriate sufficient funds and personnel authorizations annually to DoD. [RSP Recommendation 49]

E. ADDITIONAL VICTIM SERVICES IN THE MILITARY AND CIVILIAN COMMUNITIES

1. Select Military Sexual Assault Response Practices and Initiatives

a. Eight Day Report

DoD policy requires the SARC to inform the installation commander within 24 hours of either a restricted or unrestricted report of sexual assault being filed.[402] The FY14 NDAA enhanced this requirement by directing the Secretary of Defense to establish a policy requiring a written incident report that details the actions taken and services offered or provided to the victim to the installation commander, if any, the first general officer, and first officer in the grade of O-6 in the chains of command of the victim and the alleged offender within eight days of a Service member filing an unrestricted sexual assault report.[403] This "eight day" report allows the chain of command to ensure that unrestricted reports of sexual assault are being investigated, that any requests for expedited transfer or military protective orders are being processed, and that the sexual assault victim is referred for any necessary care and support.[404]

However, because the FY14 NDAA does not include the same requirement for restricted reports, senior officers within the chain of command and on an installation are not provided with follow-up information on whether the victim filing the restricted report is receiving assistance and necessary support. To increase awareness, oversight, and accountability for restricted reports, DoD should develop and implement a process to provide the installation commander, the first O-6 and first general or flag officer in the victim's chain of command with information on the status and services provided to victims filing restricted reports of sexual assault within eight days of a report. When restricted reports are made, DoD SAPRO should work with the Services to ensure adequate measures are in place to protect the identity of the victim while providing sufficient information to track the victim's care. [RSP Recommendation 68]

b. Expedited Transfer

Victims who make an unrestricted report of rape or sexual assault in violation of Article 120(a) or (b) of the UCMJ, and forcible sodomy in violation of Article 125 of the UCMJ, have the ability to request an expedited transfer from their assigned command or base and the Panel received positive feedback about this option.[405] Commanders also indicated that in some situations, they may exercise the option to transfer the alleged offender rather than the reporting victim.[406]

The SARC, victim advocate, or the Service member's commanding officer must notify the Service member of the option to request a temporary or permanent expedited transfer from their assigned command or installation at the time of the report, or as soon as practicable.[407] Once the victim makes the request and the commander determines that the sexual assault report is credible, the commander must process the transfer request within 72 hours.[408] If a commander denies the request for transfer, it must go to the first general officer in the chain of command, who will endorse the transfer or forward the request to a higher level to make the final determination.[409] Representatives from each Service told the Panel that the individual Services approved 99 to 100% of expedited transfer requests.[410]

Although expedited transfers are a positive option for those who file unrestricted reports, DoD policy does not permit victims who file a restricted report of a sexual assault to request a temporary or permanent expedited transfer from their assigned command or installation, or to a different location within their assigned duty or living location.[411] There is currently no mechanism that permits a sexual assault victim to maintain his or her restricted report and request an expedited transfer.

Law and DoD policy mandate that if the commander knows or learns actionable information about a sexual assault, the report becomes unrestricted, even if the victim filed or intended to file a restricted report. The commander must immediately notify the MCIO and an investigation must be opened.[412] Because an expedited transfer requires the commander's authorization, he or she will inevitably know the identity of the individual requesting such transfer. By nature of their duties, a request for a transfer on behalf of another Service member from a SARC or SAPR victim advocate provides the commander with the information that a sexual assault has taken place and the identity of the victim. Under current policy, the commander will be obligated to notify the MCIO, and the report will become unrestricted, even if the victim intended the report to stay restricted.

To reconcile the notification and investigation requirements under current law with the Panel's recommendation to provide victims who file restricted reports the option of requesting an expedited transfer, the Panel considered alternate protected avenues by which Service members may currently be reassigned from their units or duties. Commanders have the inherent authority to transfer Service members or place them on limited duty status due to medical conditions. Current DoD policy permits health care personnel to convey adverse duty impacts related to the victim's medical condition and prognosis to the victim's unit commander, even when the sexual assault report is restricted.[413] Because the communication made in connection with a restricted report is confidential, communication related to the sexual assault may not be disclosed to the commander.

The psychological health impact of daily contact with, or worse, being under the supervision of, one's attacker could understandably cause an adverse impact on a Service member's duty readiness. Therefore, to avert the problem, Service Secretaries should create a means by which sexual assault victims who file a restricted report may request an expedited transfer without having to make their report unrestricted. [RSP Recommendation 69]

Training for medical personnel, SARCs, and victim advocates should include the options that a commander has available to make or effect transfers when an unrestricted report is made. [RSP Recommendation 70] Options for proposing and arranging a transfer of a victim who files an unrestricted report were not well known among medical personnel, SARCs, or victim advocates who met with Panel representatives.[414]

c. Department of Defense Safe Helpline

The DoD contracted with the Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network (RAINN) to develop and staff a 24-hour secure and anonymous phone line for military sexual assault victims.[415] The DoD Safe Helpline, established in April 2011, is accessible worldwide and provides active duty, Reserve, and National Guard Service members, and their adult dependents who are sexual assault victims, immediate one-on-one crisis support 24 hours per day, seven days per week.[416] Service members also may log on to the DoD Safe Helpline website to receive live, one-on-one confidential help with a trained professional through a secure instant-messaging platform.[417] DoD Safe Helpline personnel provide information about reporting and accessing victim services and offer a number of online resources specifically designed for Service members.[418] DoD Safe Helpline responders can transfer callers directly to installation-based SARCs, or on-call SAPR victim advocates, as well as community rape crisis centers, Military OneSource, and to other various victim service entities.

As required by DoD policy, military installations advertise the DoD Safe Helpline. However, many also operate and advertise their own installation numbers, which may be listed as a hotline. The local lines may be displayed more prominently than the DoD Safe Helpline, or together with it, and do not distinguish which is staffed twenty-four hours per day, causing confusion for Service members seeking assistance.[419] An advertisement from the Army's Fort Bragg, North Carolina Installation website illustrates the issue:

Unlike the DoD Safe Helpline, which is staffed twenty-four hours per day, seven days per week, victims who call a local line may receive a pre-recorded message asking them to leave a phone number instead of speaking to a live person.[420]

The contact information provided to the DoD Safe Helpline is not always adequate or accurate to ensure that every caller can be connected to local victim service personnel (e.g., an installation's SARC or victim advocate) by the DoD Safe Helpline staff when requested, despite audits conducted by DoD Safe Helpline staff members.[421]

Because of the importance of ensuring timely, accurate contact information for victims, the Panel recommends that clear guidance is set forth that the DoD Safe Helpline is the single military 24-hour sexual assault crisis hotline for Service members and establish an easily remembered number similar to its website name of SafeHelpline.org. The Department of Defense should also require the Services to provide the DoD Safe Helpline with sufficient contact information at each installation or deployed location so that local victim service providers can be reached on a 24 hours per day, seven days per week basis. [RSP Recommendations 71-A through C]

d. Psychological Healthcare

Access to quality mental health care is a critical component of a robust response system for military sexual assault. Uniform and civilian psychiatrists, psychologists, mental health nurses, social workers and mental health technicians provide military mental health services to sexual assault victims and many others.[422] Mental health services are available to military sexual assault victims through mental health clinics located within military treatment facilities and imbedded within military units, Family Support Centers (FSCs), from military chaplains, or from off-base providers.[423] Unlike the FAP, which employs its own clinicians specializing in domestic and sexual violence and provides non-medical counseling services, SAPR personnel provide victim advocacy support without a professional clinical component.[424]

Despite the variety of mental health professionals who work with military Service members, sexual assault victims who appeared before the Panel described having difficulty obtaining timely mental health appointments and difficulty receiving consistent care from mental health providers.[425] Victims also described concerns that mental health counseling may negatively impact their careers; fear of damage to one's military career can deter a victim from reporting a sexual assault.[426] While evidence of the Services developing recent programs to embed counselors within units to facilitate better access to care was provided, the Panel was not able to evaluate whether the practice is a successful method to alleviate the difficulties victims experience in obtaining timely mental health, obtaining consistent therapeutic services, or reducing concern about negative impact on military careers.

The Service Secretaries should evaluate the availability of, and access to, adequate and consistent mental healthcare for victims of sexual assault and the option of incorporating counselors in the SAPR program in a manner similar to the FAP. [RSP Recommendation 72] The Department also should establish policies that protect victims of military sexual assault from suffering damage to their military careers (including but not limited to weakened performance evaluations or lost promotions, security clearances, or personnel reliability certifications) based on having been a victim of sexual assault, having reported sexual assault, or having sought mental health treatment for sexual assault. [RSP Recommendation 64]

2. Coordinating Victim Services among Victim Assistance Personnel

Victim assistance personnel are available to military sexual assault victims through a number of different programs, including SAPR, FAP, VWAP, and special victim counsel. To provide the most effective services and support to victims, it is important that the various victim assistance organizations and personnel work in concert with each other.

In 2013, DoD issued Instruction 6400.07 "Standards for Victim Assistance Services in the Military Community," based on standards established by the National Victim Assistance Standards Consortium. The purpose of the Instruction was to establish a baseline of service standards for the victim services provided under the SAPR Program, FAP, VWAP, and the Military Equal Opportunity Program, and to ensure that uniform, quality victim assistance services are provided across the Services.

Each of the victim service programs was established independently, at different times, and with somewhat different objectives. However, outside of this instruction, there are no additional policies or requirements that require the identification of gaps or redundancies in victim services, or which recognize the services and support provided by the Special Victim Counsel Program, which is under the cognizance of the Service Judge Advocate Generals, or, in the Marine Corps, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant.

DoD SAPRO or the DoD IG should assess the roles and responsibilities of SARC, SAPR victim advocates, VWL, and FAP personnel to ensure advocacy personnel are effectively utilized, that their roles are properly delineated to allow for excellence, overlap is minimized, that sufficient positions are designated and to determine whether their roles should be modified, and whether all current victim assistance related programs should be sustained in this resource constrained environment. [RSP Recommendation 79]

3. Civilian Jurisdiction Support of Sexual Assault Victims

In civilian communities, non-lawyer victim advocates primarily provide support for sexual assault victims. Unlike sexual assault victims in the military, only a small percentage of sexual assault victims in civilian jurisdictions across the United States are represented by legal counsel during criminal justice proceedings. In jurisdictions where victim counsel is available, victim advocates may work in conjunction with victim's counsel to provide support to sexual assault victims.[427]

Various entities, from nonprofit organizations to police departments and the prosecutors' offices, provide victim advocate services.[428] Services vary from state to state, and even from jurisdiction to jurisdiction within a state.[429] According to BJS, one in four sexual assault victims utilize services provided either by nonprofit or funded victim advocate organizations.[430] In the military, each victim is assigned a government paid victim advocate (military or civilian).

a. Community-Based Advocates

Advocates from community agencies (often known as rape crisis centers) may provide a variety of services, from hotlines to support, counseling, shelter, community outreach, and education.[431] Victim support personnel are available to meet with a victim prior to a victim making a report to law enforcement in many locations. For example, The Cottage, located in Athens, Georgia, meets the victim's immediate needs through crisis counseling and providing support when discussing whether to report the offense to law enforcement or having a SAFE without police involvement.[432] The Cottage also provides short-term counseling and referrals to more in-depth counseling and group therapy.[433]

The YWCA in Grand Rapids, Michigan provides another example of a community based advocacy service that, like DoD, offers services regardless of whether a victim files a report with law enforcement.[434] The YWCA provides support services, including a 24-hour crisis line, SANE exams, and "soft" rooms for victims to speak to law enforcement personnel in a comfortable environment.[435] Short term counseling and group therapy services are also available[436] A victim's spouse or family member may also receive some services[437] such as short term counseling.

b. Hospital Victim Advocates

Victim advocacy services may co-locate in hospitals or other locations where victims might make an initial report of sexual assault.[438] For example, in New York City, Mount Sinai Hospital's "hundreds of volunteer advocates" staff the victim advocate program.[439] Prosecutors, police, and doctors train volunteer advocates who are available to victims at the hospital anytime.[440] A prosecutor told the Panel that "[t]he ER advocates are trained and wonderful, and they hand off the case to a specially trained social worker once they get to the DA's office. [T]hat combination of help helps victims and guides them through what, as you can imagine, is a very confusing and intimidating process."[441] She credited Mount Sinai's services in helping victims through the process, calling it a "wonderful program."[442]

c. Law Enforcement Victim Advocates

Some law enforcement agencies, including the FBI, employ non-lawyer victim advocates to provide advocacy services beginning when a victim reports a sexual assault.[443] Others team with community advocacy agencies that provide these initial victim advocacy services through contract or other agreement with a law enforcement agency.[444]

d. Prosecution Victim Advocates

Prosecution based advocates can provide a number of services, varying by jurisdiction, but generally include advising the victim of his or her rights, advocating for the victim's rights to be enforced, advising victims about and during court proceedings, and ensuring the victim receives necessary services throughout the process.[445] They also assist prosecutors during discussions with victims when a case that has been referred by police will not be charged.[446]

F. SPECIALIZED MILITARY TRAINING FOR PERSONNEL PERFORMING SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE DUTIES

1. SARC and Victim Advocate Training

A sexual assault response program can only be as successful as the training and experience of the service providers. Congress and DoD have recognized the critical need for qualified victim advocates. In the FY12 NDAA, Congress emphasized the importance of SARC and victim advocate training by codifying a requirement for the Secretary of Defense to establish a professional and uniform training and certification program for SARCs and victim advocates.[447] To fulfill this requirement, SAPRO established the DoD Sexual Assault Advocate Certification Program (D-SAACP) to standardize and professionalize the roles of SARCs and victim advocates across the Services in 2012.[448] Currently, over 20,000 SARCs and victim advocates have completed the training. D-SAACP certification requires a minimum of 40 hours of approved training and continuing education every two years.[449] However, unlike many civilian training programs for victim service personnel, it does not require any hands-on, job shadowing, or other experiential training.[450]

DoD SAPRO conducted an initial evaluation of each of the Services' SARC and victim advocate training sessions in 2012.[451] These evaluations, while providing useful information about the Services' training programs, did not use consistent criteria for evaluation across the Services; DoD SAPRO did not assess the uniformity of the programs across the Services. To evaluate whether the Services are providing quality, standardized training to victim Service personnel, it is important that the evaluation be consistent across the Services. Therefore, DoD should conduct periodic evaluations of training provided for the Services' SARCs and victim advocates that include an assessment of whether the training and curriculum across the Services is uniform, effective, and reflects all existing initiatives, programs, and policies. [RSP Recommendation 75]

2. First Responder Training

To standardize services throughout DoD in 2014, all "first responders" in sexual assault cases are now required to receive the same baseline training, in addition to annual SAPR training.[452] DoD policy indicates that first responders include SARCs, SAPR victim advocates, healthcare personnel, law enforcement personnel, judge advocates, chaplains, and emergency personnel.[453] These individuals are required to receive training focused on sexual assault policies and current critical issues, the role of SAPR personnel, and an explanation of initiatives directed at special populations, including those likely to be re-victimized.[454] Additionally, training required for SARCs and SAPR victim advocates includes scenario based interactive sessions, an explanation of the roles and responsibilities of SAPR personnel and commanders in preventing sexual assault, the ability to conduct SAPR training for Service members when requested by a commander, and identification of reprisal or retaliation towards a victim.[455]

3. Experiential Training for Civilian Victim Support Personnel

Victim support personnel in many civilian agencies receive both formal and experiential training before being assigned to support a sexual assault victim on their own. The length of training varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, often depending on the type of agency.[456] For instance, advocates who work in prosecution and police agencies understand the criminal justice system and procedures in the jurisdiction in which they work. They can explain the jurisdiction's processes and procedures to the victim.[457] Some prosecutor's offices require that victim advocates have either a bachelor or master's degree with majors in criminal justice, social work, or a similar "helping profession."[458] In New York, where social workers provide clinical counseling support, they are required to have a master's degree in social work or an equivalent profession.[459]

4. Utilization and Experiential Training for Military Victim Advocates

Many military victim advocates never handle an actual sexual assault case because there are far more victim advocates than reports of sexual assault in the military.[460] Some part-time, uniformed SAPR victim advocates may not ever serve a victim because they are assigned to units in which there are few or no reports of sexual assault. Victim advocates who handle few to no sexual assault cases feel unprepared to actually handle a case and provide the proper support to a sexual assault victim.[461] It is difficult for victim advocates who do not regularly assist victims of sexual assault to develop or maintain proficiency in providing victim support.

To maximize the value and usefulness each certified victim advocate provides to the Services, DoD SAPRO should determine necessary victim advocate staffing for each Service and appropriate caseload for each victim advocate to ensure that victim advocates become, and remain, proficient in their duties. Victim advocate duties and training should include partnering with or observing other professionals who provide victim services (including community providers) or other experiential work to gain further practical skills and confidence while awaiting assignment to a case. [RSP Recommendation 74]

5. Special Victim Counsel Training

Pursuant to the FY14 NDAA, the Service Secretaries are now statutorily required to provide "in-depth and advanced training" for all special victim counsel.[462] Currently, the Air Force and the Army offer specialized special victim counsel courses at their legal centers and schools.[463] The Army also established a JAG University website for special victim counsel to access a document library and collaborate with other Army attorneys.[464] Program managers also routinely reach out to one another on an informal basis to discuss issues and best practices for dissemination to practicing special victim counsel[465] and on a more formal basis, in accordance with the Secretary of Defense's guidance,[466] the Special Victim Counsel Program managers meet monthly to discuss a variety of special victim counsel issues and share information. These discussions include lessons learned and best practices generated by the individual Services.[467] However, no standards or requirements have been established outlining how and when these best practices should be shared.[468]

While the Air Force and Army have created special victim counsel training courses, the Special Victim Counsel Program is still a relatively new program and even the most experienced special victim counsel has limited experience as an advocate for victim rights. Further, because the program is in its infancy, limited case law exists to guide special victim counsel in their practice. To ensure special victim counsel receive all relevant and necessary information to best assist their clients, the Panel recommends the Service Secretaries establish and disseminate collaborative methods for special victim counsel between, and among, the Services, including an inter-Service website where special victim counsel may access resources and training materials, and receive training on best practices including the provision of advice and resources to sexual assault victims for issues related to negative personnel actions encountered as a result of being a victim or seeking treatment. [RSP Recommendation 50]

In addition, the Panel recommends the Secretary of Defense establish an inter-Service working group to assess the practices of all Service Special Victim Counsel programs. The inter-Service working group should discuss, deliberate, and decide upon the best practices being utilized by all the Services. The working group should then ensure each Service implements the best practices of the Special Victim Counsel programs. The working group should consist of, at a minimum, the Special Victim Counsel program heads from each Service. The first meeting should occur within twelve months from the date of this report. Thereafter, the working group should meet at least annually. [RSP Recommendation 52]

G. THE MULTIDISCIPLINARY RESPONSE TO INVESTIGATE AND PROSECUTE SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTS

The best practice to respond to sexual assault reports in both the civilian sector and military community is a multidisciplinary approach, which requires cooperation and communication among law enforcement personnel, medical professionals, victim advocates and victims' counsel, prosecutors, paralegals, and others in the community who provide support to sexual assault victims.

1. The Special Victim Capability and Victim-Centric Approach in the Military

In the FY13 NDAA, Congress required DoD and the Services to implement a Special Victim Capability to enhance the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault cases in the military. "The [Special Victim Capability] represents a multidisciplinary, coordinated approach to victim support and offender accountability."[469] DoD policy states that "[a]t a minimum, the [Special Victim Capability] will provide for specially trained prosecutors, victim witness assistance personnel, paralegals, and administrative legal support personnel who will work collaboratively with specially trained MCIO investigators."[470] It also requires that the "[d]esignated Special Victim Capability personnel will collaborate with local Military Department SARCs, SAPR victim advocates, Family Advocacy Program managers and domestic abuse victim advocates during all stages of the investigative and military justice process to ensure an integrated capability, to the greatest extent possible."[471]

Figure 8 illustrates the victim-centric nature of the military response to sexual assault. Participants include: (1) the command and unit leadership; (2) the sexual assault response coordinator (SARC) and victim advocate; (3) the special victim counsel and legal assistance counsel provided by the military; (4) medical care and behavioral health services personnel, chaplains, and social services on and off post; and (5) those who are part of the Special Victim Capability—the special victim unit investigator, special victim prosecutor, and the victim witness liaison who works in concert with the staff judge advocate and prosecutor's office.

2. Comparison of Department of Defense and Civilian Sexual Assault Response Personnel and Resources

Figures 9 and 10 below depict the resources and personnel involved at the different stages of sexual assault response in the civilian sector and the military.

Support resources are generally similar in the civilian and military systems—with one major exception. As discussed, the military offers specialized counsel to victims who file sexual assault reports to help them navigate through the military justice process, a service available in very few civilian jurisdictions. In most civilian jurisdictions, victims can report sexual assaults through hospitals, police agencies, or non-profit organizations such as rape crisis centers. Some civilian communities create a sexual assault response team composed of various response personnel, including a coordinator for victim support services, non-profit victim advocates, law enforcement representatives, prosecutors (who may also have victim advocates in their offices), and medical personnel to improve communication and centralize the response effort. Victims in the military have several avenues to make a sexual assault report, including civilian resources in the local community. All reports received through military resources are channeled to the SARC.

Naming conventions vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction in the civilian community and each Service uses differing terms to describe its personnel. Terminology used to describe victim advocate and support personnel, prosecuting attorneys, attorneys who represent victims in the criminal process, police department sexual assault investigators, and in-house investigators should be standardized across DoD to prevent confusion, redundancy, and inefficiency. Therefore, the Secretary of Defense should require standardization of the duty titles for personnel involved in sexual assault prevention and response to reduce confusion and enable comparability of Service programs, while permitting the Service Secretaries to structure the capability itself in a manner that fits each Service's organizational structure. [RSP Recommendation 108]

Chapter Seven:

INVESTIGATING SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTS

A. INVESTIGATION MANDATES

All unrestricted reports of sexual assault must be immediately reported by the receiving party to an MCIO, regardless of the severity of the crime alleged.[474] A commanding officer who receives a report of a sex-related offense involving a Service member in his or her chain of command must immediately report it to the MCIO.[475] A commander of a victim or alleged offender may not ignore a complaint or judge its veracity.[476] Section 1743 of the FY14 NDAA requires the SARC provide written notification to the installation commander and first O-6 and general or flag officers in the chains of command of the victim and alleged offender within eight days of the filing of an unrestricted report of sexual assault.[477]

MCIOs are assigned to an independent chain of command from the accused and his or her special court-martial convening authority and must independently report all sexual assault accusations to their Service Secretary and Chief of Staff.[478] According to DoD policy, investigations of unrestricted reports of sexual assault must be conducted by specially trained MCIO investigators, not the victim's immediate commander or chain of command. MCIOs must initiate investigations for all offenses of adult sexual assault of which they become aware that occur within their jurisdiction, regardless of the severity of the allegation.[479] The lead MCIO investigator must be a trained special victim investigator for all investigations of unrestricted sexual assault reports.[480] Investigators must ensure a SARC is notified as soon as possible to ensure system accountability and the victim's access to services.[481]

Allegations of sexual assault by a Service member are often subject to investigation and prosecution by more than one jurisdiction, depending on the location of the alleged crime. Civilian law enforcement must be informed if the reported crime occurred in an area with concurrent Federal (military) and civilian criminal jurisdiction. The investigation may be worked jointly by the MCIO and the civilian agency, or the civilian agency may accept investigative responsibility if the MCIO declines.[482] If a reported crime occurs off a military installation in a location under civilian jurisdiction, civilian law enforcement has primary jurisdiction over the investigation and the MCIO will provide assistance as requested or deemed appropriate.[483]

In sexual assault investigations where the MCIO is the lead investigating agency, DoD policy requires implementation of Special Victim Capabilities, described in more detail in Chapter 9 of this report.[484] MCIOs investigating sexual assault allegations must collaborate with respective Special Victim Capability partners regularly for periodic investigative case reviews and to ensure all aspects of the victim's needs are met.[485] Commanders are provided updates on significant developments in criminal investigations, but may not impede an investigation or the use of investigative techniques.[486] Once an investigation is complete, the case is provided to the appropriate military commander (the initial disposition authority, described below, for the accused) for consideration of "some form of punitive, corrective, or discharge action against an offender."[487]

Historically, Army Criminal Investigation Command (Army CID) investigated all adult sexual assault cases for the Army,[488] while the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) and Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) often referred some non-penetrative (e.g., unwanted touching) sexual assault offenses to Marine Corps Criminal Investigation Division (Marine Corps CID) agents and Air Force Security Forces investigators, respectively. Since the January 2013 policy change requiring that all adult sexual assault cases be investigated by the MCIOs, cases previously investigated by Marine Corps CID and Air Force Security Forces investigators have shifted to NCIS and AFOSI, significantly increasing their case loads.[489]

Fully accredited Marine Corps CID agents are trained at the MCIO level and many attend the Special Victim Unit Investigators Course.[490] A representative from Marine Corps CID told the Comparative Systems Subcommittee that its investigators are fully qualified to handle sexual assault investigations, especially the "touching offenses."[491] AFOSI similarly indicated that Security Forces investigators could effectively continue to investigate these types of offenses, under the supervision of a trained AFOSI agent.[492] AFOSI and NCIS representatives indicated the additional caseload has been detrimental to other felony investigations.[493] As such, the Panel recommends Marine Corps CID agents, military police investigators, and/or Security Forces investigators should be authorized to assist in the investigation of some non-penetrative sexual assault cases, under the supervision of SVU investigators. [RSP Recommendation 89]

B. INVESTIGATIVE PROTOCOLS

The Services have worked to improve their investigative and law enforcement response to sexual assault. The military law enforcement community has developed specialized teams to handle sexual assault investigations and advanced training to prepare investigators. A civilian expert commented that "DoD ha[s] done an incredible amount of work in a short amount of time combating sexual assault and violence against women .... We have never seen that kind of change in a civilian community and I just wish more people would recognize that fact."[494]

1. Special Investigators and Sexual Assault Investigations

In many large civilian and military jurisdictions, SVUs are organized and detailed to investigate sexual assault, domestic violence, and child abuse cases.[495] Currently, NCIS, Army CID, and AFOSI have organized SVUs at installations with large military populations.[496] At smaller installations and in smaller civilian police agencies, there may be too few investigators available to specialize. Smaller locations without an SVU often have a specially trained detective to investigate sexual assaults and the ability to coordinate with larger offices for assistance and guidance,[497] but these investigators may not be as experienced as investigators serving in SVUs at larger, busier jurisdictions. The Secretary of Defense should direct commanders and directors of the MCIOs to require special victim investigators not assigned to a dedicated SVU to coordinate with a senior SVU agent on all sexual assault cases. [RSP Recommendation 90] Such oversight will likely increase the accuracy, reliability, and thoroughness of investigations.

Military and civilian systems use differing protocols for the initial police response to a sexual assault report. Historically, in many civilian jurisdictions, a police officer responding to a reported sexual assault would determine how to document the call.[498] If the officer did not believe the individual was a victim of a sexual assault, it was not documented as such and no follow-up occurred.[499] In several major cities, responding officers dismissed a high percentage of incidents reported as sexual assault in 911 calls. In the remaining cases, detectives also often dismissed a large number of incidents referred to them before presenting the cases to the prosecutor.[500]

More recently, several civilian agencies have changed their initial report protocols to reduce mishandling of sexual assault cases.[501] In some jurisdictions, patrol officers still retain some discretion, but a supervising officer generally must review their decisions and officers consult with detectives about how to classify complaints.[502] For example, in Baltimore, Maryland, a patrol officer can no longer dismiss a sexual assault complaint without an SVU detective's approval.[503] Other civilian agencies have similar, or even more restrictive, protocols.[504]

DoD policy requires military police patrol officers who receive or respond to a sexual assault report it to the MCIO.[505] Responding patrols must remain with the victim, ensure evidence is not destroyed, assess the victim's need for immediate medical attention, and obtain enough information to determine the identity and location of the alleged assailant, if the victim can identify him or her.[506]

2. Advising Victims of Their Rights when Collateral Misconduct is Suspected

Unlike MCIO agents, investigators in civilian jurisdictions have discretion in deciding whether to advise crime victims, including sexual assault victims, of their rights against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment. Rights advisements are only required in civilian jurisdictions during custodial interrogations. Article 31 of the UCMJ affords Service members greater protection from self-incrimination than the U.S. Constitution and civilian case law. Any time an investigator or any other party engaged in a law enforcement or disciplinary investigation reasonably suspects that any person subject to the UCMJ, including a victim being interviewed, committed an offense under the UCMJ, the investigator must stop the interview and advise the victim of his or her rights under Article 31(b), including the right to remain silent.

MCIOs indicated the requirement "to advise victims of their rights for collateral misconduct . . . chill[s] a relationship between the investigator and the victim."[507] As a result, concerns about collateral misconduct are seen as a complication in the investigative process, as well as a barrier to reporting.[508] Interrupting an interview to advise a victim of his or her rights may negatively impact the investigator's ability to build trust and rapport with the interviewee who may terminate the interview, although special victim counsel – who are often present at the interviews – did not report this occurred.

Although Article 31 warnings are not discretionary, MCIOs do not follow the same practices regarding the legal requirement to advise Service members of their Article 31 rights for minor collateral misconduct during an interview. For example, NCIS investigators told the Comparative Systems Subcommittee that NCIS has an unwritten policy that investigators will not read victims Article 31(b) rights for minor collateral misconduct, regardless of the law's requirements.[509] The NCIS investigators justify this policy by noting that minor offenses, such as drinking and fraternization, are outside the "felony-level" purview of NCIS.[510] Navy investigators noted anecdotally that the policy improves their ability to establish a rapport and more thoroughly investigate cases from victims who have already chosen to report. DoD procedures regarding the requirement for MCIO investigators to advise victim and witness Service members of their rights under Article 31(b) for minor misconduct uncovered during the investigation of a felony should be standardized to ensure there is a clear process that complies with law. [RSP Recommendation 88]

3. Pretext Phone Calls and Text Messages

Pretext phone calls and texts are an important investigative technique commonly used to corroborate victim complaints and obtain incriminating or exculpatory statements by suspects.[511] Depending on state law, unbeknownst to suspects, investigators can be present with victims during phone calls and typically record them.[512] Civilian detectives indicated they have no difficulty obtaining permission for pretext calls and texts, if permitted by state law.[513]

In contrast, the Services have different procedures to approve recorded pretext phone calls and text messages, based on differing interpretations of legal standards. NCIS has procedures to expedite processing of pretext phone call requests.[514] Army CID and AFOSI agents testified, however, that requirements to obtain approval for pretext phone calls and text messages hampered sexual assault investigations.[515] The Secretary of Defense should direct a review of the Services' procedures for approving MCIO agent requests to conduct timely pretext phone calls and text messages as well as a standardized procedure to facilitate and expedite MCIOs' use of this investigative technique, in accordance with law. [RSP Recommendation 91]

4. Forensic Evidence and Examinations

The Defense Forensic Science Center (DFSC) / United States Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory (USACIL) is a fully accredited facility that provides forensic laboratory services to the MCIOs, other DoD investigative agencies, and other Federal law enforcement agencies. In the summer of 2013 and the "government shutdown" in October 2013, MCIO investigators, SARCs, victim advocates, and other sexual assault support personnel were exempt from federal government furloughs. This exemption facilitated continued investigation of sexual assault cases. However, DFSC/USACIL personnel were not exempt from these furloughs, which created backlogs at the lab and increased DNA processing times.[516] DNA and other DFSC examiners should be exempted from future furloughs, to the extent allowed by law, consistent with the exemption of other critical civilian members of the criminal investigative process from prior furloughs. [RSP Recommendation 100]

The current Department of Justice protocol for the collection of hair samples from victims and subjects in sexual assault investigations notes that many jurisdictions do not routinely collect plucked head and pubic reference samples as part of SAFEs.[517] Military and civilian laboratory examiners and medical forensic examiners told the Comparative Systems Subcommittee that the taking of plucked hairs was of little probative value.[518] Therefore, the Panel recommends elimination of the requirement to collect plucked hairs as part of a SAFE. [RSP Recommendation 92]

5. Oversight and Review of Sexual Assault Investigations

Within civilian police departments, senior investigators or patrol officers typically review case files. This is also true in the military. Each MCIO has an internal inspector general and policies regarding the review of sexual assault cases.[519] Additionally, DoD IG reviews MCIO cases on a periodic basis.[520]

The DoD IG develops policy for the MCIOs to oversee sexual assault investigations and provides oversight of sexual assault training within the DoD investigative community.[521] In July 2013, DoD IG completed an evaluation of MCIO sexual assault investigations, reviewing their adequacy in accordance with DoD, Service, and MCIO policies and procedures.[522] The evaluation did not, however, apply external standards for case quality.

Following criticism of the handling of civilian sexual assault cases in certain cities, external agencies conducted audits of closed case files at several police departments to assess transparency and ensure confidence in the police response.[523] Civilian lawyers and victim advocates participated in audits in Baltimore and Philadelphia and provided results to the mayors and police departments. The Secretary of Defense should similarly direct an audit of sexual assault investigations by persons or entities outside DoD specifically qualified to conduct such audits. [RSP Recommendation 95]

C. DECISIONS TO UNFOUND SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTS

The Department of Defense does not use a standard definition for "founded" or "unfounded" in sexual assault investigations.[524] Department of Defense policy defines an unfounded case as, "a complaint that is determined through investigation to be false or baseless. In other words, no crime occurred. If the investigation shows that no offense occurred, procedures dictate that the reported offense must be coded unfounded."[525] Determining a report to be "unfounded" because it is false or baseless is the same standard used by the Department of Justice and FBI.[526] The Department of Defense's 2013 Annual SAPRO Report, however, used a different definition of unfounded: "When an MCIO makes a determination that available evidence indicates the individual accused of sexual assault did not commit the offense, or the offense was improperly reported or recorded as a sexual assault, the allegations against the subject are considered to be unfounded."[527]

While conceptually the various DoD definitions meet the same intent as the "false or baseless" definition of unfounded used by the UCR Program, the Services apply the term inconsistently or use additional or different definitions. The Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps use a "false or baseless" standard to unfound allegations, allowing accused Service members' commanders in the grade of O-6 or above, who are special court-martial convening authorities,[528] in consultation with judge advocates, to make final determinations.[529] The Navy and Marine Corps consider "false or baseless" to include cases where the allegations "do not meet all the legal elements of any of the SAPR sexual assault offenses."[530] The Army defines an unfounded offense as "a determination, made in consultation with the supported prosecutor that a criminal offense did not occur. A lack of evidence to support a complaint or questioning of certain elements of a complaint is not sufficient to categorize an incident as unfounded."[531] Conversely, the Army's definition of a "founded" offense relies on a probable cause determination made by the investigating agent and supporting trial counsel that an offense was committed and the accused committed the offense.[532]

Civilian police agencies follow the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI)'s UCR Program incident clearance guidance on unfounding a complaint: "Occasionally, an agency will receive a complaint that is determined through investigation to be false or baseless . . . . The recovery of stolen property, the low value of stolen property, the refusal of the victim to cooperate with prosecution, or the failure to make an arrest does not unfound a legitimate offense. Also, the findings of a coroner, court, jury, or prosecutor do not unfound offenses or attempts that law enforcement investigations establish to be legitimate."[534]

Processes for closing cases vary in civilian police departments.[535] In some jurisdictions, detectives may unfound cases that are not strong enough to support prosecution without review by the prosecutor,[536] with or without approval of a supervisor.[537] Departments may also consider cases closed and investigations complete when referred to the prosecutor, [538] or they may be closed or placed in a suspended status when victims decline to cooperate. Likewise, unsolved cases are usually inactive, but not closed.[539] A best practice among civilian agencies requires the supervisor of the SVU to review all unfounded cases, and if the percentage of cases that are unfounded rises above a certain baseline average, the supervisor reviews patterns and investigative practices to ensure only those cases that are false or baseless are unfounded.[540]

In the Army, commanders do not currently determine whether to unfound cases because Army CID makes the decisions after coordinating with the trial counsel.[541] However, in the Air Force, the Navy, and the Coast Guard, commanders make unfounding determinations, not the MCIOs.[542] AFOSI and NCIS indicated they do not make any case determination decisions once a case is initiated, but instead report their investigative findings to the commander.[543]

The Secretary of Defense should direct the Service Secretaries to standardize the process for determining if a case is unfounded. The decision to unfound reports should apply the UCR Program standard to determine if a case should be unfounded. Only those reports determined to be false or baseless should be unfounded.[544] [RSP Recommendation 93]

The table below illustrates the disparity in procedure and application among the Services, as well as the Panel's recommended process:

COMPARISON OF PROCEDURES TO REVIEW INVESTIGATIONS PRIOR TO DISPOSITION DECISION

	Air Force, Navy, Marines, Coast Guard	Army	Panel Recommendation
Unfounding Determinations	Unfounding determinations not made by investigators.	Unfounding determination made by investigators, in consultation with trial counsel.	DoD standardize the process for determining if a case is unfounded. Unfounded needs to be clearly defined as only those reports which are false or baseless.
MCIO Determination and JAG Coordination	Investigators do not determine if case is founded, substantiated, or that probable cause exists. No annotation made in case file.	Investigators consult with a trial counsel, who provides opinion whether probable cause exists to believe suspect committed offense, prior to presenting case to commander. Investigators annotate trial counsel's opinion in case file. If probable cause exists, case file is presented to commander for disposition decision.	Trial counsel and investigator should not opine whether probable cause exists. MCIO agents should coordinate with trial counsel to review all evidence, and annotate in case file that trial counsel agrees all investigation has taken place, before presenting case report to commander.
Cases Presented to the Commander for Disposition Decision	In FY12, 100% of cases were presented to commander for case determination and disposition decision.	In FY12, 75% of cases were presented to commander for disposition decision; 25% of cases were not presented to commanders because MCIO/ prosecutor determined report lacked probable cause.	Present all cases to commander.

Probable Cause Assessments in Sexual Assault Investigations

Prosecutors may provide opinions about the existence of probable cause as part of their advice to commanders or investigators. For example, a trial counsel may tell an investigator that further investigation is needed to establish probable cause. Moreover, commanders making disposition decisions may want the trial counsel's opinion on whether probable cause exists in the case. The Navy, Air Force, Marines and Coast Guard do not filter cases for lack of probable cause; instead, all cases are presented to commanders, who consult with the trial counsel to determine case disposition. However, unlike the Army, there is no requirement that agents formally coordinate with trial counsel, obtain an opinion on whether probable cause exists in order to found the offense, or annotate coordination in case files.[544]

Army CID is required to coordinate reports of investigation with the trial counsel to determine whether there is probable cause that an offense was committed, whether the subject committed the offense, and whether there is sufficient evidence to support action.[545] The trial counsel issues an opinion to the investigator or agent, which is reflected in the case file.[546] To prevent prosecutors from making premature probable cause determinations or MCIOs from closing cases prior to providing them to a commander to review, this opinion should only assess whether the investigation has been exhausted and if the case is ready to present to the commander.

Figure 11 illustrates the progression of proof standards, noting that probable cause determinations are made by investigating officers at Article 32 hearings. Staff judge advocates also advise convening authorities prior to referral whether "there are reasonable grounds to believe that an offense triable by a court-martial has been committed and that the accused committed it."[547]

Where an MCIO is the lead investigative agency, DoD policy states the MCIO may not close a sexual assault investigation without written disposition data from the subject's commander.[548] According to MCIO agents, investigators complete thorough investigations, following all logical leads prior to reaching any conclusions.[549] Military prosecutors, however, provided mixed reviews of the quality of MCIO investigations and often felt additional investigation was necessary.[550] Military prosecutors also conveyed that investigations are considered closed when they are passed to the commander for review and that it is difficult to "reopen" cases for further investigation.[551]

The Secretary of Defense should direct MCIOs to standardize their procedures to require that MCIO investigators coordinate with the trial counsel to review all of the evidence, and to annotate in the case file that the trial counsel agrees all appropriate investigation has taken place before providing a report to the appropriate commander for a disposition decision. Neither the trial counsel, nor the investigator, should be permitted to make a dispositive opinion whether probable cause exists. [RSP Recommendation 94-A] To ensure investigators continue to remain responsive to investigative requests after the commander receives the case file, the MCIO commanders and directors should continue to ensure investigators are trained that all sexual assault cases remain open for further investigation until final disposition of the case. [RSP Recommendation 94-B] Figure 12 illustrates recommended investigative processing for unrestricted sexual assault reorts.

Chapter Eight:

THE MILITARY JUSTICE PROCESS FOR SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTS AND VICTIM RIGHTS

Following the investigation, prosecution decisions are made within the chain of command of the accused Service member. Unlike civilian courts, courts-martial are designed to be deployable to any location where U.S. Forces operate.[552] For this reason, nearly all resources necessary to constitute courts-martial belong to certain commanders entrusted to convene courts-martial (i.e., convening authorities).[553] This flexibility affords deployed commanders the ability to ensure that investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of wrongdoing takes place in the deployed environment, which may be the geographic location of witnesses and evidence.[554]

A. HISTORICAL EVOLUTION OF THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

The authority to convene and manage courts-martial has been vested in U.S. military commanders since the colonial period.[555] Indeed, until after World War II, commanders enjoyed "virtually unfettered" discretion in determining whether to try soldiers and sailors by court-martial.[556] Reviews in the years following World War II challenged the commander's discretion in convening courts-martial. By the time it held hearings on drafts of the UCMJ in 1949, Congress heard from those opposing proposals to reduce commander authority over courts-martial,[557] and also from those "urg[ing] [it] to remove the authority to convene courts martial from 'command' and place that authority in judge advocates or legal officers, or at least in a superior command."[558] While commanders retained convening authority under the UCMJ, the Code that was adopted was a compromise between those opposing any erosion of absolute commander control and those advocating change.[559]

Today, the authority vested in senior commanders to convene courts-martial remains a central tenet of the UCMJ, but Congress has refined procedural requirements for their disposition decisions. For example, in Article 34(a) the UCMJ initially provided that the convening authority may not refer a charge for trial by general court-martial "unless he has found" that the charge alleges an offense under the UCMJ and is warranted by the evidence.[560] In 1983, Congress changed Article 34(a) to state that the convening authority may not refer such a charge "unless he has been advised in writing by the staff judge advocate that" the charge alleges an offense, that the charges are supported by the evidence, and that there is jurisdiction over the accused and the offense.[561]

There have been other significant changes and revisions to the UCMJ since its enactment. Most recently, the FY14 NDAA modified several provisions of the UCMJ related to commander authority and responsibility, as well as the prosecution of sexual assault crimes.[562] As a military historian told the Panel, "the system has changed over time; first courts-martial [were] made more like courts, and then because of this desire to have our system mirror what's going on in civilian courts, more and more courts-martial look like any trial in Federal District Court."[563]

B. INITIAL DISPOSITION AUTHORITY IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

Both military authorities and civilian prosecutors exercise "tremendous discretion over the decision" to send a case to trial.[564] Unless otherwise limited by a higher authority, military commanders generally have "discretion to dispose of offenses [committed] by members of [his or her] command."[565] On April 20, 2012, the Secretary of Defense issued a policy establishing the minimum level of command that may decide whether or not to proceed to courts-martial for an allegation of sexual assault.[566] The first special court-martial convening authority in the grade of O-6 or above in the chain of command of the accused serves as the "initial disposition authority" for all allegations of rape and sexual assault in violation of Article 120 of the UCMJ, forcible sodomy in violation of Article 125 of the UCMJ, and attempts to commit those offenses, in violation of Article 80 of the UCMJ.[567] This policy applies to all other alleged offenses arising from or relating to the same incident, whether committed by the alleged perpetrator or the alleged victim.[568] Senior commanders with initial disposition authority often have no personal knowledge of either the accused or the victim. When an investigation is complete, the initial disposition authority reviews the results of the investigation, in consultation with a trial counsel, and determines the appropriate disposition of the case.[569]

Initial disposition authorities consult with their trial counsel, special victim prosecutor, or if applicable, staff judge advocate before determining how to proceed. Commanders rely on the prosecutors' legal expertise to determine the proper charges, draft the charges for the commander to consider, and recommend an appropriate disposition.[570] In advising commanders, including initial disposition authorities and convening authorities, military attorneys acting on behalf of the Government are bound by their Service's rules of professional conduct, which require them to advise the convening authority when a charge is not warranted by the evidence or supported by probable cause.[571]

The decision to charge a person with a criminal offense, in particular a sexual assault offense, is a complex one requiring the initial disposition authority and trial counsel advisor to weigh many factors. The Discussion to Rule for Courts-Martial 306 provides a non-exclusive list of factors military commanders should consider when deciding how to dispose of an allegation, including whether to charge a Service member with an offense.[572] Civilian prosecutors also consider a variety of factors in determining whether or not to charge someone with a criminal offense, many of which are similar to military factors.[573] Ultimately, both military and civilian authorities determine how to dispose of an allegation based upon the specific facts of each case. However, the minimum threshold in the military to charge a Service member with an offense does not require the party preferring charges to consider the provability of the charges, which differs from civilian jurisdictions.

Previously, the discussion accompanying Rule for Courts-Martial 306 listed character and military service of the accused as factors commanders should consider when determining case disposition.[574] But, with the enactment of Section 1708 of the FY14 NDAA, Congress directed the Discussion be amended by striking "the character and military service of the accused from the matters a commander should consider in deciding how to dispose of an offense."[575] Since the amendment does not prohibit an initial disposition authority from considering this factor, however, it is unlikely to affect charging or disposition decisions in sexual assault or other cases.[576]

In sexual assault cases, the initial disposition authority, in consultation with the trial counsel or special victim prosecutor, considers the factors in the discussion to Rule for Courts-Martial 306 prior to preferral and referral of charges. The initial disposition authority may dispose of allegations by preferring charges and later referring any or all of them to a court-martial he or she is authorized to convene, forwarding any or all of the charges to the next higher convening authority, dismissing some or all of the charges, or choosing an alternate disposition of the case.[577]

These options align with alternatives in civilian prosecutions.[578] Civilian prosecutors face similar initial disposition decisions as trial counsel and convening authorities, ranging from taking no action to going forward with a view towards trial.[579] Civilian prosecutors may also pursue options other than trial, but those are usually uniquely tailored to the specific circumstances of the case.[580]

To address lower level offenses, commanders and convening authorities have many tools that may not be available in civilian jurisdictions. The UCMJ and military regulations provide several options for alternate dispositions, including no action or dismissal of charges, administrative action (counseling, admonition, reprimand, administrative withholding of privileges, etc.), nonjudicial punishment, forwarding to a superior or subordinate authority for disposition, or preferral and/or referral of charges to courts-martial.[581] Commanders rarely choose nonjudicial punishment or other administrative adverse actions to dispose of penetrative sexual assault offenses.[582] The misperception that commanders use options other than courts-martial to dispose of these offenses may be due to the wide breadth of conduct that is categorized as "sexual assault" under the UCMJ.

C. PRETRIAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF CONVENING AUTHORITIES: PREFERRAL TO REFERRAL

Unlike standing federal or state courts, courts-martial are ad hoc proceedings convened to resolve specific allegations against an accused. Convening authorities have the authority to convene courts-martial, but only after specific statutory requirements are met. This process begins when charges are "preferred"[584] against an accused, subsequent to the initial allegation and investigations of criminal wrongdoing.

The convening authority, in conjunction with the military judge, is responsible for ensuring a military member is brought to trial. "Referral" is the act of ordering a charge to be tried by court-martial. Referral, therefore, in conjunction with a court-martial order (explained below in Part D of this chapter), creates the court.

Pursuant to Article 32 of the UCMJ, no charge may be referred to a general court-martial until the completion of a pretrial investigation.[585] Unless limited by Service regulation, any convening authority may order the Article 32 investigation;[586] however, by DoD regulation, alleged sexual assaults must be directed to a convening authority that qualifies as an initial disposition authority.[587] The convening authority who orders the Article 32 investigation also appoints the Article 32 investigating or hearing officer.[588]

Under current law, an Article 32 investigation "shall include inquiry as to the truth of the matter set forth in the charges, consideration of the form of the charges, and a recommendation as to disposition which should be made of the case in the interest of justice and discipline."[589] However, Section 1702(a) of the FY14 NDAA, in conjunction with other amendments, changes the review standard under Article 32 from a "thorough and impartial investigation" of charges to a preliminary hearing for the narrow purposes of: (1) determining whether probable cause exists to believe an offense has been committed and that the accused committed the offense; (2) determining whether the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the offense and the accused; (3) consideration of the form of charges; and (4) recommending disposition.[590] These changes take effect on December 27, 2014.[591] Beyond changes to the scope and quality of the evidence that will be considered by the Article 32 hearing officer, it is unclear how Article 32 investigations, which will be called "preliminary hearings," will change after this law takes effect.

Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA also mandates that crime victims cannot be compelled to testify at the proceeding and will be deemed unavailable for the purposes of the hearing. This may result in requests by the defense counsel to depose victims and other witnesses because depositions may be ordered where witnesses are unavailable at the Article 32 proceeding.[592] Under current practice, "[a] convening authority who has the charges for disposition, or after referral, the convening authority or the military judge may order that a deposition be taken on request of a party."[593]

Civilian jurisdictions have differing approaches to victim testimony before trial. In Philadelphia, for example, victims must testify at preliminary hearings with limited exceptions; in Washington State, either party may request to interview material witnesses under oath before trial.[594] While cross examining or questioning the victim is permissible in some civilian jurisdictions, it is unclear whether substituting a deposition for Article 32 testimony, if requests are approved, will potentially expose the victim to the same line and type of questioning Congress was trying to prevent by enacting Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA. Therefore, the Judicial Proceedings Panel should assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers. [RSP Recommendation 115]

Once the Article 32 investigation is complete, the investigating officer provides findings and recommendations to the convening authority who ordered the Article 32 investigation take place.[595] If the convening authority who ordered the Article 32 investigation is a special court-martial convening authority and determines the evidence supports the charged offenses, then the charges and the Article 32 investigating officer's report, recommendations of subordinate commanders, and any documents accompanying the charges will be forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority. Alternatively, the charges may be referred to a subordinate commander for action if the convening authority does not believe the evidence supports referral to a general court-martial, or the convening authority may dismiss the charges if the evidence does not support them.[596]

As of June 24, 2014, Section 1705 of the FY14 NDAA amended Article 18 of the UCMJ to restrict jurisdiction for trial for charges of rape or sexual assault under Article 120(a) or (b), rape or sexual assault of a child under Article 120b, forcible sodomy under Article 125, or attempts to commit these offenses under Article 80 to general courts-martial.[597] Once a matter has been forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority following an Article 32 investigation, he or she must comply with certain statutory requirements prior to referring a case to trial. The general court-martial convening authority must ensure the Article 32 investigation was properly conducted,[598] and before he or she may refer charges to a general court-martial, the staff judge advocate[599] must provide, in writing, his or her own legal opinion expressing whether the charges state an offense, whether the charges are warranted[600] by the evidence in the Article 32 investigation report, and whether a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the individual and the offense.[601]

The staff judge advocate must also provide a recommendation as to the disposition of the offenses, but this recommendation is not binding on the convening authority.[602] So long as the staff judge advocate advises that the charge meets the requirements for referral, the convening authority may refer the charge to court-martial, even if the staff judge advocate recommends a different disposition. The convening authority may also elect, contrary to the staff judge advocate's recommendation, not to refer the charge for trial.[603]

Information presented to the Panel indicates that convening authorities and staff judge advocates agree on disposition in the overwhelming majority of cases.[604] When disagreements between the staff judge advocate and convening authority arise, however, the UCMJ includes checks to provide review by higher authorities. For example, the staff judge advocate may communicate directly with the staff judge advocate of the superior commander (the next higher commander in the chain of command, who may withdraw the matter from the subordinate commander) or with the Judge Advocate General of his or her Service if he or she disagrees with the convening authority's decision.[605]

Staff judge advocates who testified before the Panel stressed that convening authorities weigh factors differently than lawyers when assessing whether cases should be tried by court-martial. Brigadier General Richard Gross, Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, cited information provided by the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Senate Armed Services Committee that indicated commanders took recent action in roughly one hundred cases where civilian prosecutors had declined to prosecute.[606] "Commanders have consistently shown willingness to go forward in cases where attorneys have been more risk adverse. Commanders zealously seek accountability when they hear there's a possibility that misconduct has occurred within their units, both for the victim and in the interest of military discipline, and we need to maintain the ability to do so."[607] The Judge Advocate General of the Army described seventy-nine cases where Army commanders chose to prosecute off-post offenses after civilians declined to prosecute or could not prosecute. She said the cases demonstrated that "Army commanders are willing to pursue difficult cases to serve the interests of both the victims and our community."[608] Legal advisors said commanders consider factors, including responsibility for good order and discipline and accountability to the organization, which legal advisors may not.[609]

Given that there are checks in place and that military justice ensures appropriate discretion for convening authorities in the oversight of good order and discipline within their command, convening authorities should generally retain referral discretion and should not be bound by the recommendations of an Article 32 investigating officer in all circumstances. The Secretary of Defense should direct the Military Justice Review Group or Joint Service Committee to evaluate if there are circumstances when a general court-martial convening authority should not have authority to override a recommendation from an investigating officer against referral of an investigated charge for trial by court-martial. [RSP Recommendation 116] For example, if a military judge is appointed the Article 32 preliminary hearing officer, the convening authority should, perhaps, be bound by the determination that there is no probable cause, but further study is required.

To ensure more rigorous scrutiny of a convening authority's decision not to refer a case to court-martial, Section 1744 of the FY14 NDAA imposed a new review requirement for any such decision for charges of rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, or attempts of those offenses.[610] However, Section 1744 of the FY14 NDAA and pending language in the Victim's Protection Act of 2014 (VPA)[611] may place inappropriate or unlawful influence to aggressively prosecute sexual assault cases by requiring the higher general court-martial convening authority, or in some cases the Service Secretary, to review convening authority decisions not to refer such charges to trial.

The FY14 NDAA proposes two scenarios that would require higher review: (1) If both the staff judge advocate and convening authority agree the case should not be referred to court-martial, the next higher level convening authority must review the case file; or (2) If the staff judge advocate recommends referral to court-martial and the convening authority decides not to refer the case to court-martial the Service Secretary must review the case file.[612] Section 2 of the VPA would further require the next higher convening authority or Service Secretary to review a case if the senior trial counsel disagreed with the SJA's recommendation against referral or the convening authority's decision not to refer a sexual assault case.[613]

Establishing an elevated review of convening authority decisions not to refer certain sexual assault charges may deter convening authorities from exercising independent professional judgment when deciding whether to refer cases. The elevated review may impose undue pressure on staff judge advocates and convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases. Convening authorities are better positioned to make informed referral decisions than a higher-level general court-martial convening authority or Service Secretary. They receive advice from their staff judge advocate, are less removed from the alleged perpetrator and victim, and are more aware of the offense's impact on the unit and good order and discipline. The Service Secretaries do not currently have a criminal law support structure and generally lack experience and training that informs referral decisions.

Accordingly, Congress should repeal Section 1744 of the FY14 NDAA, which requires a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases to be reviewed by a higher general court-martial convening authority or the Service Secretary, depending on the circumstances, due to the real or perceived undue pressure it creates on staff judge advocates to recommend referral, and on convening authorities to refer, in situations where referral does not serve the interests of victims or justice. [RSP Recommendation 39]

If Congress does not repeal Section 1744 of the FY14 NDAA, and the requirement for elevated review of non-referred case files continues, the Secretary of Defense should direct a standard format be developed for declining prosecution in a case, modeled after the contents of civilian jurisdiction written declination statements or letters. [RSP Recommendation 40] Section 1744(e)(6) of the FY14 NDAA requires written declination statements,[614] not a current practice.[615] There are no formal requirements for military investigators, judge advocates, or commanders to provide written opinions or justifications when declining to pursue criminal cases, including allegations of sexual assault, at any stage in the trial process.[616] Staff judge advocates provide written advice to the convening authority prior to his or her decision whether to refer a case to general court-martial.[617] In the past, if a convening authority dismissed charges or declined to prosecute a case after referral, the convening authority generally did not write a justification or declination statement.[618] DoD has not published guidance to date as to what that declination memorandum must contain or who must write it.

Civilian offices vary in their practices for recording decisions to decline cases. If prior to indictment, the common procedure is for the prosecutor to send the case back to the investigator to be closed. If the prosecutor declines a case after indictment, some offices informally include a note in the file, others complete a standard form, but none provide lengthy written justifications.[619] When civilian government offices decline to prosecute a case, there usually is no other alternate disposition or adverse action taken against the suspect. Several civilian jurisdictions, including the DOJ, document the declination decision in writing. When the DOJ closes a case without prosecution, the case file reflects the action taken and rationale.[620]

DoD should coordinate with the DOJ or with state jurisdictions that are more familiar with the sensitive nature of sexual assault cases to develop a standard format for use by all Services. Any such form should require a sufficient explanation without providing too much detail so as to ensure the written reason for declination to prosecute does not jeopardize the possibility of a future prosecution or contain victim-blaming language. [RSP Recommendation 40]

D. ROLE OF CONVENING AUTHORITIES AND MILITARY JUDGES

Convening authorities have responsibilities related to courts-martial prior to referral and throughout trial. Before referring charges to court-martial, the convening authority must issue a court-martial convening order, which directs the court-martial,[621] by detailing personnel to serve as voting members of the court-martial, normally referred to as panel members (i.e., jurors).[622] The convening authority's discretion is not, however, absolute. The convening authority must detail members who are "best qualified for the duty by reason of age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament."[623] But as a senior commander, the convening authority also assesses different and sometimes competing operational priorities, including operational requirements, readiness considerations, and individual hardships in determining whether a member is available for service on a court-martial panel.[624]

The convening authority funds witness and travel costs; most defense requests for production of witnesses are approved or disapproved by the trial counsel.[625] Except where the Services have established central funding resources, the convening authority is also responsible for funding expert assistance or expert witnesses for the prosecution and defense, including the expert assistance of defense investigators. This means the convening authority is responsible for authorizing the production of witnesses, experts, documents, and other resources.

Article 46 of the UCMJ requires that the trial counsel, defense counsel, and the court-martial have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and evidence.[626] Military defense counsel are currently required to submit requests to the convening authority for witnesses, experts, and resources through the trial counsel and the staff judge advocate.[627] Depending on Service practice, the trial counsel, as the representative of the convening authority in a court-martial, may determine whether to grant or deny defense witness requests, other than expert witness requests that require the convening authority's personal decision. Military trial counsel request and obtain resources and witnesses without notifying the defense or disclosing a justification and, in most instances, without a specific request for the convening authority's personal decision.[628] This leads to a perception that trial counsel have unlimited access to obtain witnesses and resources and that the process for obtaining witnesses and other evidence is imbalanced in favor of the government.

In the civilian sector, some public defenders have subpoena power or request subpoenas through the judge.[629] Military defense counsel do not have subpoena power.[630] In contrast, military trial counsel have nationwide subpoena power with rare judicial oversight.

Prior to referral, there is no process for the defense to challenge a convening authority's denial of witnesses, expert assistance, or resources requested in preparation for trial.[631] If the convening authority denies the request, the defense counsel must wait until the case is referred to submit the request to the military judge.[632]

No similar practice is found in civilian jurisdictions.[633] This practice requires defense counsel to disclose more information to the trial counsel sooner than their civilian counterparts in public defender offices, requiring them to reveal information about defense witnesses and theory of the case to justify the requests, which may hinder the ability of defense counsel to provide constitutionally effective representation to their clients.

Section 1704 of the FY14 NDAA amends Article 46 of the UCMJ to include a provision limiting defense counsel access to interview victims of sex-related offenses.[634] If a trial counsel notifies a defense counsel of the name of an alleged victim of a sexual offense whom the trial counsel intends to call at an Article 32 hearing or court-martial, the defense counsel must submit any request to interview the alleged victim through the trial counsel. If requested by the alleged victim, "any interview of the victim by defense counsel shall take place only in the presence of trial counsel, a counsel for the victim, or a Sexual Assault Victim Advocate."[635]

Following referral of charges, several of the pretrial responsibilities vested in the convening authority shift to the military judge, who schedules and presides over any initial sessions and trial.[636] The military judge for a court-martial is detailed, in accordance with Service regulations, by a senior military judge directly responsible to the Service TJAG or TJAG's designee.[637] Accordingly, the military judge exists entirely outside the chain of command of the convening authority.[638]

After referral, the defense may file a motion requesting the military judge to compel production of a witness. If the military judge grants a motion to compel a defense witness, the trial counsel must produce the witness. A military judge may also order the Article 32 investigation be re-opened to cure a convening authority's denial of the witness or expert or for other reasons. If the convening authority persists in the refusal to produce the witness, the military judge may abate the proceedings or take other appropriate action.[639]

Civilian judges or magistrates control proceedings in preliminary matters from the time of indictment or arrest of the defendant, whichever is earlier. Military judges do not usually become involved until a convening authority refers charges to a court-martial which can cause or result in inefficiencies in the process and ineffective or inadequate remedies for the government, accused, and victims.

It is the sense of the Panel that military judges should be involved in the military justice process at an earlier stage in order to better protect the rights of victims and the accused. Accordingly, the Panel recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the Military Justice review Group or Joint Services Committee to evaluate the feasibility and consequences of doing so. [RSP Recommendation 118] Giving military judges an enhanced role in pretrial proceedings would be a systemic change that would affect the prosecution of all cases, not only sexual assault cases. Therefore, further study is appropriate to fully assess what positive and negative impacts would result from changing some pretrial and trial responsibilities of convening authorities.[640]

E. PRETRIAL AGREEMENTS IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

"As in the civilian community, the military justice system depends heavily on the ability of a convening authority and an accused to enter into a pretrial agreement. Those agreements typically require the accused to enter a plea of guilty in return for reduction of charges, dismissal of some of the charges, or a sentence limitation."[641]

The process for military plea agreements and plea hearings differs from most civilian jurisdictions.[642] In civilian jurisdictions, most plea agreements between a prosecutor and defendant[643] are for an agreed upon sentence, which the judge accepts or rejects entirely. Some jurisdictions use plea deals that consist of agreements to sentences within a range; the judge then determines the exact sentence within that range.

In the military justice system, an accused Service member may negotiate a pretrial agreement with the convening authority, through the staff judge advocate, that places a limit or "cap" on the maximum sentence the accused will serve in exchange for a guilty plea. The sentencing authority does not know the agreed limit prior to adjudging the sentence. The accused gets the benefit of whichever is lower, the adjudged sentence or the cap agreed to with the convening authority.[644]

Pretrial agreements developed out of the convening authority's clemency power. The most common commitment made by convening authorities is to take a specified action on the adjudged sentence; for example, a commitment to disapprove confinement in excess of a certain amount, or to disapprove a certain level of punitive discharge, which the convening authority may do pursuant to Article 60 of the UCMJ. However, Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA, which took effect on June 24, 2014, restricts a convening authority's Article 60 clemency authority.[645] Under the new framework, convening authorities cannot agree to disapprove a punitive discharge entirely under a pretrial agreement, but they may still agree to commute a mandatory minimum dishonorable discharge to a bad-conduct discharge, which is a lesser form of punitive discharge.[646]

Accused Service members plead not guilty in a large majority of military sexual assault cases, possibly due to evidentiary challenges, issues in proving sexual assault charges beyond a reasonable doubt, and the requirement to register as a sex offender if convicted.[647] Therefore, adjustments to the mechanics of military plea deals may not have a significant impact on the majority of sexual assault cases.

Other recent changes, including the creation of special victims' counsel and increased protection for victim rights, may raise additional issues that will impact the plea agreement process. The Panel concluded that a change to the military plea process in sexual assault cases is not necessary at this time, but the Judicial Proceedings Panel should further study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified. [RSP Recommendation 117]

F. VICTIM RIGHTS IN SEXUAL ASSAULT PROSECUTIONS UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

1. Overview of Military Crime Victims' Rights

The FY14 NDAA incorporated eight rights for all crime victims in the military justice process as Article 6b of the UCMJ. Article 6b codified and, in some cases, expanded existing DoD policy regarding victims' rights to notice, to be reasonably heard, to confer with counsel for the government, to be present at public hearings, to have proceedings free from unreasonable delay, to be treated with fairness and respect, to receive restitution, and to be reasonably protected from the accused.

Prior to the FY14 NDAA, the Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) policy primarily granted rights to crime victims in the military. The VWAP was developed in 1994 to protect the rights of all victims and witnesses located at DoD installations worldwide.[648] The crime victim rights set forth in DoDI 1030.01, originally modeled after the Victims' Rights and Restitution Act of 1990 and updated to roughly parallel the rights contained in the Federal Crime Victims' Rights Act (CVRA),[649] remain in effect even concurrent with the new Article 6b rights. DoD indicated that DoD policy and the UCMJ are being updated to more closely parallel the rights currently afforded to federal crime victims in the CVRA and provide enforcement mechanisms to receive and investigate complaints and provide a range of disciplinary sanctions for failure to comply with requirements relating to victims' rights.[650]

While assessing the adequacy of military systems and proceedings "to support and protect victims in all phases of the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes," the Panel also considered the feasibility and appropriateness of extending the rights and legal standing to enforce them provided to crime victims in civilian proceedings under the CVRA[651] to crime victims covered by the UCMJ.[652] The Panel generally concluded that to the extent possible, accounting for differences in the military system due to the role of the commander and convening authority, the military justice system can, and should, afford crime victims the same rights as crime victims protected in civilian legal proceedings by the CVRA.

2. Comparing Victim Rights in Department of Defense Policy, the Federal Crime Victims' Rights Act, and Statutory Military Victims' Rights[653]

Comparing crime victims' rights under the CVRA with those recently codified in Article 6b of the UCMJ and DoD policy reveals that while Article 6b incorporates many CVRA rights into the UCMJ, some differences remain. Department of Defense policy, while similar to both the CVRA and the new rights guaranteed by Article 6b, provides no right for victims to be reasonably heard at a public proceeding involving release, plea, sentencing, or parole. Neither DoD policy nor Article 6b rights provide the victim a right to be heard regarding a plea agreement prior to the time the convening authority and the accused reach an agreement and the accused enters a guilty plea.[654]

a. Victim's Right to Confer

DoD policy, the CVRA, and the newly enacted Article 6b provide a crime victim the right to confer with the attorney for the government in the case.[655] In the military justice system, a victim may confer with trial counsel on matters such as whether to pursue court-martial, nonjudicial punishment or administrative action in the case.[656] If the initial disposition authority decides to proceed with a court-martial, a victim may confer with the military prosecutor regarding what level of court-martial may be appropriate for the particular charges.[657] However, the right to confer with the attorney for the government under the CVRA is not equivalent to the right to confer with trial counsel (military prosecutor) under the military justice system.

Since the convening authority, not the prosecutor, makes decisions on how to dispose of cases under the UCMJ, a victim's right to confer with the trial counsel in the military justice system is not directly analogous to the CVRA right to confer with the prosecutor. In practice, the trial counsel typically relays the victim's concerns and preferences to the convening authority. However, to protect each victim's rights, DoD must establish formal mechanisms to ensure the convening authority hears the victim's concerns prior to making a decision about case disposition. [RSP Recommendation 55]

b. Victim's Right to be Heard on the Plea

Article 6b grants the right to be reasonably heard at a public hearing regarding continuing confinement prior to the accused's trial, a sentencing hearing relating to the offense, and a public proceeding of the Service clemency and parole board relating to the offense, but is silent on the right to be heard on the plea.[658] Neither Article 6b nor DoD policy include the victim's right to be reasonably heard on the plea before the accused and the convening authority come to an agreement.[659]

The military justice system handles pretrial agreements differently than the civilian system, so using the civilian process for a victim's right to be heard on the plea would not be analogous in the military. The analogous opportunity to be heard arises before the convening authority decides to accept, reject, or propose a counteroffer to a pretrial agreement submitted by an accused, and the right is to be heard by the convening authority.

Modifications should be made to the Manual for Courts-Martial and appropriate regulations to provide crime victims a right to be heard regarding a pretrial agreement. The modifications should provide victims the right to be heard by the convening authority regarding a plea, with appropriate consideration to account for military pretrial agreement practice. The recommended changes must ensure that the right to be heard occurs before the convening authority decides to accept, reject, or propose a counteroffer to a pretrial agreement offer submitted by an accused. The convening authority should retain discretion to determine the best means to comply with this right and consider the victim's opinion (e.g., submission in writing, in person). [RSP Recommendations 54-A through C]

c. Victim's Legal Standing to Enforce Rights

The FY14 NDAA neither addressed the victim's legal standing nor specified enforcement mechanisms for the rights set forth in Article 6b. Rather, the FY14 NDAA requires the Secretary of Defense to recommend changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and to prescribe appropriate regulations to implement mechanisms to ensure enforcement of such rights, including mechanisms for application of such rights and for consideration and disposition of applications for such rights.

The CVRA expressly provides legal standing for victims to assert their rights in the district court in which the alleged offender is being prosecuted and, if the offender has not yet been charged, the asserted claim should take place in the district where the crime occurred to seek enforcement of the rights listed in the CVRA. The district court will then immediately decide any motion asserting a victim's right. The CVRA also expressly provides for an expedited review of any trial court decision on a victim's right and allows a victim to petition the court of appeals for a writ of mandamus as well as appellate court review within seventy-two hours of the filing of the petition.

Rights guaranteed by Article 6b of the UCMJ should be similarly enforceable. The Secretary of Defense should clarify that victims have legal standing to enforce their rights listed in Article 6b of the UCMJ at any relevant time in the proceedings, including before, during and after trial. [RSP Recommendation 53]

d. Victim's Right to be Heard Through Counsel

The FY14 NDAA codified the right of a sexual assault victim to obtain legal services through a special victim counsel and defines the nature of the relationship between a special victim counsel and a victim as "an attorney and a client."[660] The scope of representation permitted under the statute is expansive and includes legal consultation related to the military justice system and any military justice proceedings in which the victim may appear as either a victim or a witness.[661]

The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has addressed the issue of whether a victim has the right to be heard through counsel on certain issues.[662] However, the scope of representation set forth by the FY14 NDAA is more expansive than the issues addressed by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces in case law.[663] Litigation about a victim's right to be heard through counsel will likely continue unless DoD issues formal clarification. Therefore, changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and appropriate regulations should clarify that a victim's right to be heard includes the right to be heard on legal issues through counsel. [RSP Recommendation 46]

Providing information and records to a special victim counsel representing a victim requires further study. A special victim counsel's right to access records is no greater than his or her client's access rights. Currently, the government trial counsel may, but is not expressly required to, disclose information and records to the special victim counsel. Further, when disclosing information, the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act limit the trial counsel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Service Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right. [RSP Recommendation 45]

e. Victim Rights Notification and Enforcement

The CVRA requires prosecutors and investigators to use their "best efforts" to see that crime victims are notified of, and accorded, the rights under the CVRA. The court is responsible for ensuring that crime victims are afforded the rights guaranteed under the CVRA. The FY14 NDAA did not place a similar requirement on military investigators, prosecutors, or courts. Instead, the legislation requires the Secretary of Defense to recommend changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and to prescribe regulations to see that victims are notified of and accorded their rights. The Secretary of Defense should prescribe appropriate regulations to ensure that military investigators, prosecutors and other DoD military and civilian employees engaged in the detection, investigation, or prosecution of crime are also required to use their best efforts to notify and accord victims the rights specified in Article 6b, UCMJ. [RSP Recommendation 58]

As previously discussed, Congress and the Military Services have established various points in the judicial process where military crime victims have the right to confer or consult with trial counsel. These requirements mirror the discussions civilian prosecutors routinely engage in with victims in sexual assault cases. In some civilian jurisdictions, the trial judge asks the prosecutor, on the record, if he or she has conferred with the victim and to present the victim's opinions to the court, even if the victim's opinions diverge from the government's position. To ensure trial counsel have complied with their obligations to afford military crime victims the rights set forth in Article 6b of the UCMJ and DoD policy, the Service Secretaries should require military judges to inquire, on the record, whether trial counsel complied with statutory and policy requirements during courts-martial proceedings. [RSP Recommendation 57]

3. Investigating Violations or Failures to Accord Victim Rights

To promote compliance, the CVRA directed the U.S. Attorney General to establish regulations that designate an administrative authority within the Department of Justice to receive and investigate complaints relating to the provision or violation of crime victims' rights. The Department of Justice established the Office of the Victims' Rights Ombudsman to receive and investigate complaints filed by crime victims against its employees.

Similarly, the FY14 NDAA requires the military to designate an authority within each Service to receive and investigate complaints relating to the provision or violation of such rights. Designating a separate authority within each Service to receive and investigate complaints could result in disparate procedures, rules, and standards for making and investigating complaints relating to a failure to comply with crime victims' rights. Therefore, the Panel recommends the Secretary of Defense assess the effectiveness of the processes to receive and investigate complaints relating to violations of or failures by military and civilian employees from all of the Services to provide the rights guaranteed by Article 6b of the UCMJ and to determine whether a more uniform process is needed. [RSP Recommendation 59]

G. SENTENCING

In courts-martial, sentencing proceedings usually begin immediately after the announcement of a guilty verdict, whether in a guilty plea or contested trial.[664] This promptness allows the military to deliver swift punishment, quickly remove an offender from the unit, and return court-martial panel members to operational or training duties.[665] In Federal civilian courts, sentencing usually occurs weeks or months after trial.[666] This illustrates a fundamental difference between the military and civilian philosophies that drive sentencing proceedings.

1. Improving Sentencing Data Quality and Availability

Improving the quality of information about sentencing in sexual assault convictions and improving access to that information is particularly important. Currently, the lack of uniform, offense-specific sentencing data from military courts-martial makes meaningful comparison and analysis of sentencing outcomes in military and civilian courts difficult, if not impossible. Compounding this lack of uniformity is the relative unavailability of data, which limits impartial examination and fosters misunderstanding and confusion. Making sentencing data available in an intelligible, predictable manner could serve to educate the public about the military justice process, strengthen confidence in the system, and dispel concerns about the outcomes in controversial cases.

The DoD's Annual SAPRO Report to Congress includes individual Service reports, which contain a large amount of case information—offenses alleged, location, grade of the subject and victim, military status of the victim, and some disposition information—about every unrestricted report filed in a given fiscal year.[667] This data, while useful in identifying trends and risk patterns, does not contain sufficient sentencing information to fully analyze sentencing in courts-martial. For instance, the reports detail the "most serious offense" of which the accused was convicted, but they do not indicate all convicted offenses. The reports only indicate whether the accused received certain punishments, such as confinement, forfeitures, or reduction in rank, but not the length of confinement or the amount of the forfeiture.[668] Without access to more detailed data, including all convicted offenses and the exact sentence adjudged, critically evaluating military sentencing data will remain challenging.

Sentencing data in the different Services is not easily accessible to the public. The Military Services use different systems to internally report data from installations around the world. If the Services' software programs and data fields (in DSAID, for example) were modified to include sentencing information, it would not be overly burdensome for the Services to provide this data to DoD. Accordingly, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Service Secretaries to provide sentencing data, categorized by offense type, particularly for all rape and sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ, forcible sodomy under Article 125 of the UCMJ, or attempts to commit those acts under Article 80 of the UCMJ, into a searchable DoD database, in order to: (1) conduct periodic assessments, (2) identify sentencing trends, or (3) address other relevant issues. This information should be posted to a website or made available in a format easily accessible to the public. [RSP Recommendation 11]

The public has an interest in military justice case outcomes, especially in adult sexual assault cases. In 2013, the Navy began publishing the results of all Special and General Courts-Martial in the Navy Times on a monthly basis.[669] The Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to release sentencing outcomes in all cases on a monthly basis to increase transparency and confidence in the military justice system. [RSP Recommendation 12]

2. Sentencing Procedures in Federal and Military Systems

Both civilian and military justice systems "pursue the goals of just punishment, deterrence, incapacitation, and rehabilitation. The military pursues the additional goal of maintaining good order and discipline."[670] In the Federal judicial system,[671] judges are the sole sentencing authority and consider the statutory purposes of sentencing when fashioning a sentence.[672]

The military-specific goal of preserving good order and discipline has impacted the structure and development of sentencing proceedings. The table below summarizes some of the differences in the structure and procedure of civilian and military justice systems that impact sentencing.

	Most Civilian Jurisdictions	Military
Number of members in non-capital cases	Usually 12 jurors	Does not require 12 members; Ranges from 3 to 12 depending on type of court-martial
Jury Verdict Requirement for Findings	Unanimous verdict in all cases	Unanimous verdict in capital cases; Usually 2/3 vote to convict by secret written ballot
Time between verdict and sentencing	Often delayed several weeks pending the completion of presentence report	Almost immediate
Who determines sentence in non-capital cases?	In most civilian jurisdictions, judge determines sentence in noncapital cases	Sentence is determined by military judge or by members (jury) based on choice of the accused: • Trial before members, sentencing by members • Trial by judge alone, sentencing by judge • Plead guilty, sentencing by members • Plead guilty, sentencing by judge The accused does not have option to select trial by members and then, if convicted, sentencing by military judge
Types of sentences	May include death, confinement, or fines, probation with completion of community service, treatment or education programs as condition of probation	May include death, confinement, reduction in rank, reduction in pay, forfeiture of pay and allowances, separation from military, fine, and reprimand
Sentencing per count or unitary	Receives sentence on each count for which he/she is convicted	Unitary sentencing, meaning one overall sentence
Sentencing by members/jury	Unanimous verdict in capital cases; Not applicable in most other cases because judge determines sentence in most jurisdictions	Unanimous verdict in capital cases; 3/4 vote for sentence of life imprisonment or confinement for more than ten years; 2/3 vote for any other sentence
Sentencing Guidelines	20 States, District of Columbia, and federal courts have sentencing guidelines to inform sentencing process	Each offense carries maximum penalty
Mandatory Minimums	Exist in many states and federal system for variety of offenses including some misdemeanors	• Dishonorable discharge for penetrative sexual assault offenses • Confinement for life for premeditated or felony murder • Death for spying

Clemency	Governor may grant pardon at end of process	Convening authority may set aside findings of guilt only in limited circumstances, and may not do so for "qualifying offenses."[673] Rights at Service clemency parole boards and right to petition President for clemency.
Appeals Process	Normally not granted automatic review; offender must file for review at next higher court	All sentences with punitive discharge or one year or greater confinement receive automatic appellate court review; all other cases automatically reviewed by judge advocate.

3. Comparing Sentencing Procedures in Civilian Courts and Courts-Martial

The Panel was asked to consider sentencing in courts-martial, but was unable to obtain empirical or quantifiable data indicating impacts on courts-martial sentences. This lack of data is partly due to procedures inherent in courts-martial, including:

- The unitary nature of courts-martial sentences makes it difficult to isolate sentences adjudged for particular offenses, including sexual assault offenses. When courts-martial convict Service members of more than one offense, it is unclear what portion of the aggregate punishment was based on any particular offense.

- Court-martial procedure provides no consolidated data source, such as a presentence report (PSR), to determine the circumstances of the offense(s) of conviction and the background of the accused. Information that is readily available in a PSR can be ascertained, if at all, in a court-martial only by a review of the entire record in each case. Also, matters in aggravation, extenuation, and mitigation are not maintained as part of the sentencing data as they would be in a PSR. Compounding this lack of uniformity is the data's relative unavailability. The lack of standardized, consolidated sentencing data in the courts-martial system makes comparing sentencing decisions cumbersome and challenging, both within the military justice system and between the military justice system and the civilian system.

DoD's Annual SAPRO Report to Congress includes individual Service case information about every unrestricted report filed in a given fiscal year.[674] This data, while useful in identifying trends and risk patterns, does not contain sufficient sentencing information to intelligibly inform discussion about sentencing trends in military courts-martial. Without access to more detailed data, including all convicted offenses and the exact sentence adjudged, critically evaluating sentencing data remains challenging across the Services.

4. Sentencing Authority – Military Judge or Jury

In the federal criminal justice system and 44 states, judges, not juries, impose sentences for convicted offenders in noncapital cases, including adult sexual assault cases.[675] There are six states that allow jury sentencing in felony cases.[676] The military retains an option for sentencing by panel members at the accused's request.[677] In non-capital courts-martial, the sentence is determined by the military judge or by the members[678]—based on the choice of the accused. If the accused is absent for trial, refuses to select a forum, or the military judge rejects the accused's request for trial by military judge alone,[679] the default forum is trial by officer members.[680] In any case, however, the accused does not have the option to select trial by members and then, if convicted, sentencing by the military judge.[681]

There are valid arguments for and against eliminating sentencing by court members and requiring sentencing by the military judge in all non-capital courts-martial. Discussion of such change predates the Military Justice Act of 1968.[682] Even today, the Services do not present a unified opinion on the subject, and recommend thorough study of the matter prior to any binding legislation.[683]

The Panel recognizes that it has long been "conventional wisdom" that members' sentences are more unpredictable.[684] However, without empirical data on sentencing differences or disparities, the panel cannot state definitively that sentencing by military judges would be qualitatively superior and perceived with greater confidence in sexual assault and other cases.[685] Ultimately, the decision to continue or eliminate the practice of panel sentencing will be a policy decision for lawmakers and justice practitioners. The Secretary of Defense should direct a study to analyze whether changes should be made to the MCM, the UCMJ, and Service regulations, respectively, to make military judges the sole sentencing authority in sexual assault and other cases in the military justice system. [RSP Recommendation 122] The table below summarizes prominent arguments supporting and in opposition to elimination of panel sentencing.[686]

Arguments to Eliminate Panel Sentencing (Sentence by Military Judge Alone)	Arguments to Retain Panel Sentencing (Sentence by Jury)
• Knowledge, experience, and training of military judges[687]	• Members best represent judgment of military community[692]
• Panel members are not required to have legal training or experience[688]	• Member sentencing seen as right of the accused, and has been historically consistent in military justice practice[693]
• Military court-martial sentences are complex because of range of potential punishments not available in civilian courts[689]	• Member participation provides future leaders experience and knowledge of court-martial process
• Court members are held from primary duties for duration of trial and sentencing	• Members have authority to convict, and should have authority to sentence
• Member selection by convening authority may appear biased to general public[690]	• Members are screened by convening authority for selection according to Article 25 criteria[694]
• Judges, not juries, adjudge sentences in 44 states and Federal system[691]

5. Unitary Sentencing

The military system uses unitary or aggregate sentencing for multiple specifications (counts) of conviction.[695] In other words, a sentence is adjudged as a total for all offenses, rather than by specific offense. Changes to Article 60 in the FY14 NDAA restrict the convening authority's ability to set aside or commute findings of guilt, and specifically exclude offenses under Article 120(a) or 120(b), Article 120b, or Article 125 of the UCMJ even though convictions for these offenses often occur with convictions for other non-sexual offenses.[696] Thus, the practice of imposing a sentence in total, rather than specifying a sentence for each individual charge a defendant is convicted of, makes the convening authority's ability to act on charges for non-sexual offenses unclear, obscures the punitive consequences of specified offenses, and makes accountability for sexual assault difficult to ascertain.

By contrast, in Federal civilian criminal proceedings and in most states, the defendant, or offender, receives a distinct sentence for each offense of which convicted.[697] Thus, someone convicted of multiple offenses receives a sentence for each offense.[698] The sentence for each offense is limited by a statutory maximum and, in some cases, minimum for the offense, plus any applicable guidelines. The judge has some discretion (often guided or cabined by guidelines or other rules) to direct that such separate sentences be served concurrently or consecutively, and sometimes may take other action to merge sentences for closely related offenses.

Unitary sentencing in courts-martial makes sentencing proceedings and deliberations less complicated; however, it may lead to less careful consideration of each and every offense of conviction and disparity in outcomes, as well as post-trial challenges. For instance, aggregate sentences may require sentencing rehearings when appellate courts remand cases. Although unusual, because appellate courts often reassess in light of identified errors, rehearings can be time consuming, costly, and logistically challenging. Additionally, they may burden victims and prevent case closure when victims have to re-appear at sentencing.

The Secretary of Defense should recommend amendments to the MCM and UCMJ to impose sentences which require the sentencing authority to enumerate the specific sentence awarded for each offense and to impose sentences for multiple offenses consecutively or concurrently to the President and Congress, respectively. [RSP Recommendation 123]

6. Sentencing Guidelines

Currently, there are no sentencing guidelines in the military justice system for sexual assault or any other offense. Instead, the President establishes by Executive Order a maximum punishment for each offense. In contrast, the Federal system, twenty states, and the District of Columbia use some form of a sentencing guideline system.[699] A proper analysis of sentencing guidelines would require the appropriate time and resources to: (a) gather data and rationale to support a recommendation, (b) determine the form guidelines should take, (c) and assess whether the military should adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases.[700]

Federal sentencing guidelines are derived from data analysis of sentences in thousands of cases[701] and are monitored and revised by the United States Sentencing Commission, which consists of seven voting members and one nonvoting member, supported by a staff of over 100.[702] Sentencing guidelines are often complex and may require substantial infrastructure to support them, including sentencing commissions which study, develop, implement and amend the guidelines over time. For instance, to formulate baseline recommendations for federal sentencing guidelines, the United States Sentencing Commission collected and examined data from 100,000 cases that had been sentenced in federal courts—10,000 of which it studied in "great detail."[703] Twenty-four states and the District of Columbia currently have sentencing commissions. A proper assessment of whether the military should adopt some form of sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases requires in-depth study.

However, the Panel does not suggest that such study is necessary. The Panel heard no empirical evidence of whether inappropriate sentencing disparities exist in sexual assault or other courts-martial. After gathering evidence and testimony from Federal and state experts in sentencing guidelines, the Panel recognized that a complete study would involve a comprehensive comparison to Federal and state sentencing guidelines to determine whether they would be appropriate in the military justice system, and if so, what guideline model to follow. There are numerous complicated policy and structural issues to factor into such a decision, including:[704]

- The overarching goals in current state and federal sentencing guidelines vary based on the method of development, articulated purposes, structure, and application. Some common objectives include reducing sentencing disparities, achieving proportionality in sentencing, and protecting public safety.

- There are two approaches used in creating sentencing guidelines: (1) a descriptive approach, which is data-driven and used to achieve uniformity, and (2) a prescriptive approach, which is used to promote certain sentences.

- Different entities oversee sentencing guidelines in the state and federal systems, with some choosing judicial agencies and others choosing legislative agencies.

- The flexibility of sentencing guidelines varies widely in the states, ranging from mandatory to presumptively applicable to completely discretionary.

- Additional details include: (1) whether a worksheet or structured form is required, (2) whether the commission regularly reports on guidelines compliance, (3) whether compelling and substantial reasons are required for departures, (4) whether written rationales are required for departures, and (5) whether there is appellate review of defendant or government based challenges related to sentencing guidelines.

- The actual prison sentences defendants serve in jurisdictions with sentencing guidelines also vary depending on laws affecting parole and other "truth in sentencing" issues.

Most jurisdictions that have employed sentencing guidelines have had clearly articulated policy reasons for implementing those guidelines, and each jurisdiction's policy followed deliberate collection of quantifiable, empirical evidence.[706] "The most frequent [reason] that's cited or articulated is to reduce sentencing disparity or increase consistency in sentencing outcomes."[708] As noted above, the Panel heard no empirical evidence of whether inappropriate sentencing disparities exist in sexual assault or other courts-martial. The Panel does not recommend the military adopt sentencing guidelines in sexual assault or other cases at this time. [RSP Recommendation 124]

7. Mandatory Minimum Sentences

On September 4, 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed the Acting General Counsel to request the Panel study mandatory minimum sentences for military sex-related offenses.[707] The Acting General Counsel subsequently asked the Panel Chair to include in its review an assessment on the efficacy of mandatory minimum sentences for military sexual assault cases.[708] The Panel Chair responded that it was an implied task, and agreed to study it.[709]

The UCMJ currently requires a mandatory minimum sentence for three offenses. Spying has a mandatory minimum death sentence,[710] and premeditated murder[711] and felony murder[712] have mandatory minimums of a life sentence with the possibility of parole. Section 1705(a) of the FY14 NDAA amends Article 56 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to impose the mandatory minimum punishment of dismissal or dishonorable discharge for anyone convicted of rape or sexual assault (under Article 120), rape or sexual assault of a child (under Article 120b), forcible sodomy (under Article 125), or attempts to commit those offenses (under Article 80). This provision became effective on June 24, 2014, 180 days after enactment of the Act.[713]

Mandatory minimum sentences remain controversial.[714] Testimony and other evidence gathered from civilian prosecutors, civilian defense counsel, and victim advocacy organizations demonstrates that mandatory minimum sentences do not prevent or deter adult sexual assault crimes, increase victim confidence, or increase victim reporting.[715] Some evidence indicates that mandatory minimum sentences, especially if too rigid or severe, may chill victim reporting in some cases because the victim may not want to be the cause of such consequences.[716]

The Panel also found that mandatory minimum sentences may decrease the likelihood of resolving cases through guilty pleas, especially if the mandatory minimum sentences are perceived as severe. In the FY14 NDAA, Congress tasked the JPP to examine mandatory minimums over a period of years. The JPP will be better positioned to further analyze the potential impact of mandatory minimum sentences on military sexual assault offenses. Based on the information received about mandatory minimum sentences, including their potential to deter victim reporting, the Panel recommends Congress not enact further mandatory minimum sentences in sexual assault cases at this time. [RSP Recommendation 125]

8. Victim Allocution in Sentencing

The victim's right to be heard at sentencing is currently governed by the Rules for Courts-Martial. Under military rules, a sexual assault victim may present evidence during the sentencing proceedings of financial, social, psychological, and medical impact of an offense the accused committed. Military procedure requires the victim and other witnesses -- except the accused -- to appear and testify under oath at the sentencing proceeding, subject to the rules of evidence and defense cross-examination.[717] This means that unless there is an agreement from the defense, the victim must testify under oath, and is subject to cross-examination.

The requirement that a victim testify in person and under oath to present victim impact evidence contrasts with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which generally permit a victim of a sexual abuse to make an unsworn statement or present information at sentencing.[718] Military practice is also inconsistent with statutes in a number of state jurisdictions, which permit a victim to present a victim impact statement without testifying under oath or being subject to cross-examination.[719] Additionally, the CVRA includes the opportunity for a victim to be reasonably heard at sentencing by allowing him or her to make a statement that is neither under oath nor subject to cross-examination. The newly enacted military victim rights in Article 6b of the UCMJ also include the right for the victim to be heard at sentencing.[720]

As a result, the Secretary of Defense should recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and prescribe appropriate regulations to provide victims the right to make an unsworn victim impact statement, not subject to cross examination during the presentencing proceeding, with the following safeguards:

- The members should be instructed similarly to the instruction they receive when the accused makes an unsworn statement;
- The substance of the unsworn statement, including all material facts, should be in writing, available to the defense counsel before sentencing, be subject to the same objections available to the government regarding the accused's unsworn statement; and
- If there is "new matter" that could affect the sentence brought up in the victim's unsworn statement, a military judge may take whatever action he or she believes is appropriate. [RSP Recommendation 56]

H. POST-TRIAL AND CLEMENCY

Once completed, convening authorities must "act" on courts-martial results—in other words, approve the sentence—before it becomes final.[721] A convening authority may not disapprove a finding of not guilty or any judicial ruling amounting to a finding of not guilty.[722] If an accused is convicted of a charge and sentenced to confinement, he or she begins serving confinement immediately and the immediate commander and convening authority are notified of the findings and sentence.[723] The accused may petition the convening authority to defer the effective date of any sentence to confinement, forfeitures of pay, or reduction in grade/rank which have not been ordered executed.[724] If granted, the deferment ends when the sentence is ordered executed by the convening authority, or the convening authority may rescind it at any time prior to action.[725]

After trial, a court reporter prepares the record of trial, which all counsel review before the military judge authenticates it.[726] The record is served on the accused with a copy of the staff judge advocate's required written recommendation to the convening authority, which summarizes the trial result, advises whether any corrective action should be taken on allegation of legal error, and provides a recommendation on clemency.[727] The accused, with the advice of counsel, may submit additional clemency matters to the convening authority.[728] Article 54(e) of the UCMJ provides a copy of the record of trial to any victim of any 120 offense who testified at trial,[729] and Section 1706 of the FY14 NDAA requires that the victim of any offense "in which findings and sentence have been adjudged for an offense that involved a victim . . . shall be provided an opportunity to submit matters for consideration by the convening authority."[730]

1. Article 60 Clemency Overview

Action on the findings of a court-martial by the convening authority is not required, but Article 60 of the UCMJ provides clemency discretion to a convening authority, deemed "a matter of command prerogative involving the sole discretion of the convening authority," to disapprove or commute findings of guilt.[731] Clemency authority differs in civilian and military systems. Military convening authorities normally exercise clemency authority under Article 60 of the UCMJ after the findings and sentence of a court-martial, before appellate review. The scope of appellate review varies by the length of sentence approved.[732] In civilian jurisdictions, each state has its own rules for handling clemency matters, but many vest the governor with the power to pardon criminals and commute sentences as the final act after a convicted person exhausts the judicial appellate process.

Section 1702(b) of the FY14 NDAA, which took effect on June 24, 2014, substantially reduces the convening authority's authority to commute or otherwise disapprove findings. Findings of guilt may only be set aside or commuted for "qualifying offense[s]"— qualifying offenses are those where the maximum sentence of confinement that may be adjudged does not exceed two years; the sentence adjudged does not include a punitive discharge or confinement for more than six months; and none of the offenses is a violation of Article 120(a) (rape) or 120(b) (sexual assault), Article 120b (rape and sexual assault of a child), or Article 125 (forcible sodomy) of the UCMJ.[733]

In contrast to the presumptive regularity of court-martial findings, the convening authority must take action on the adjudged sentence.[734] A convening authority may not increase the severity of the sentence. While Article 60 provided broad discretion to convening authorities as a matter of "command prerogative" to disapprove, commute, or suspend punishments, Section 1702 of the FY14 NDAA reduced this discretion.[735] Under Section 1702's revisions to Article 60, convening authorities may not disapprove, commute, or suspend adjudged sentences of confinement of more than six months or sentences that include a punitive discharge except for limited circumstances upon recommendation of the trial counsel in recognition of "substantial assistance by the accused in the investigation or prosecution of another person" or in accordance with a pretrial agreement, subject to certain limitations where the offense requires a mandatory minimum sentence.[736] If the convening authority disapproves, commutes, or reduces any portion of a court-martial sentence, the convening authority must explain the reason in writing, and the written explanation becomes part of the record of trial and convening authority action.[737]

The impact of recent modifications to Article 60 of the UCMJ is not fully known at this time, but they may bring some unintended consequences. For instance, the convening authority may no longer provide relief from forfeitures of pay to dependents of convicted Service members (who may themselves have been sexual assault victims). Also unclear is the convening authority's ability to grant clemency in cases in which there are convictions for both Article 120 and other offenses, because of the unitary nature of courts-martial sentences. The Panel recommends that Congress not adopt additional amendments to Article 60 of the UCMJ beyond the significant limits on discretion already adopted, and the President should not impose additional limits to the post-trial authority of convening authorities. [RSP Recommendation 42] The Panel also recommends that Congress should amend Section 1702(b) of the FY14 NDAA to allow convening authorities to grant clemency as formerly permitted under the UCMJ to protect dependents of convicted Service members by relieving them of the burden of automatic and adjudged forfeitures. [RSP Recommendation 43]

2. Appeals

Following convening authority action on the sentence,[738] the record of trial is either reviewed by a judge advocate under Article 64 of the UCMJ, or transmitted to the Judge Advocate General of the Service for appellate action in accordance with Articles 66 and 69 of the UCMJ, respectively, depending on the sentence.[739] A sentence to confinement of a year or more or a punitive discharge receives full appellate review[740] unless waived or withdrawn. After the record of trial and convening authority action are forwarded, the convening authority may not modify the action unless an appellate review authority directs.[741]

Chapter Nine:

ORGANIZING, TRAINING, AND RESOURCING INVESTIGATORS, PROSECUTORS, AND DEFENSE COUNSEL

A. ORGANIZING PROSECUTION RESOURCES

The organizational structure within civilian prosecution offices varies greatly. Some civilian prosecutors specialize in sexual assault for their entire careers[743] or rotate through sex crimes units specializing for a few years,[744] whereas others do not specialize and handle all felony level crimes.[744] Most of the prosecutors in medium size and smaller jurisdictions are assigned cases based on their experience level rather than a specific expertise in sexual assault cases.[745] The organizational structure in civilian prosecution offices depends upon the size of the jurisdiction, the resources available, the caseload, as well as the leadership's philosophy for assigning these complex cases.

Rather than imposing a specific organizational structure on the Services, as previously noted, Congress required the Services to provide a Special Victim Capability by January 2014 consisting of specially trained investigators, prosecutors, paralegals, and victim witness liaisons.[746] The Services have implemented the Special Victim Capability and the Panel is optimistic about each Service's approach.

The Service Secretaries need to continue to fully implement the special victim prosecutor programs within the Special Victim Capability and further develop and sustain the expertise of prosecutors, investigators, victim witness liaisons, and paralegals in large jurisdictions or by regions for complex sexual assault cases. [RSP Recommendation 105] One way to enhance Special Victim Capability may be to co-locate some of the personnel so they could work more effectively together.

1. Co-locating Prosecutors, Investigators, and Victim Support Personnel

Civilian jurisdictions and the Services use different organizational structures to maximize the efficiency and effectiveness of coordination among sexual assault response personnel and minimize trauma to the victim. The Panel studied four types of co-location models used in some civilian and military jurisdictions.

(1) The all-inclusive "one-stop shop" model combines all the personnel who respond to a sexual assault allegation, including victim advocates, mental health personnel, SANEs, investigators, and prosecutors in a single location.[747] The goal is to increase communication among the stakeholders, minimize victim travel, and enhance the multidisciplinary approach in sexual assault cases. One civilian facility, Dawson Place in Everett, Washington, includes SANEs, and/or victim advocate agencies and mental health personnel, investigators, prosecutors and victim witness liaisons to handle child and adult sexual assault cases. The Army recently established a similar facility, the Sexual Assault Response Center, at Joint Base Lewis-McChord (JBLM) in Washington for adult sexual assault cases.[748]

There are potential drawbacks to co-locating all of these services. Co-locating victim services personnel with law enforcement and prosecution officials could create the perception that victim services are aligned with, or a part of, the prosecution team – and do not operate independently – with several potentially deleterious effects: First, although the intent of this consolidation model is to support victims, these arrangements may actually deter reporting if victims perceive victim services are tied to, or working with, investigators or prosecutors. Second, victim services medical personnel who work too closely with prosecutors may not be perceived as independent medical providers, but rather as extensions of law enforcement.[749] And third, the victim advocate-victim privilege, which generally ensures that communications between victims and advocates remain confidential, may be degraded or lost if confidential statements are made in the presence of, or disclosed to prosecutors.[750] Accordingly, if larger military installations adopt this model, any multidisciplinary meetings between victim services personnel, the prosecutor, and investigator should be limited to topics related to victim support and ensuring the victim remains informed and engaged in the process, but should not include discussions about case details.

(2) The second model, seen in the Philadelphia Sexual Assault Response Center (PSARC) in Pennsylvania and the Austin Police Department (PD) Special Victim Unit (SVU) in Texas, integrates the victim advocate, SANE, investigators, and prosecutors. PSARC partnered with Women Organized Against Rape (WOAR) and other local victim advocate agencies to gain victim confidence and encourage victims to utilize their resources.

The PSARC facility's capacity to perform SANE exams is unique in that the exam room is co-located with the Philadelphia PD Special Victim Unit, yet maintains independence with Drexel University providing PSARC's SANE support and other medical assistance to victims, regardless of whether they wish to file a police report.[751] Austin PD provides an office for victim advocates from SafePlace – a local rape crisis center – to work at the SVU. Austin PD works with a SANE Coordinator to arrange for forensic exams from a group of experienced SANEs who respond to a local emergency room.[752]

(3) The third model co-locates prosecutors and investigators. In Arlington, Virginia and at Fort Hood, Texas, the investigators and prosecutors work in the same building.[753] This model is easier for small to medium jurisdictions or installations to adopt because it requires fewer resources, but still yields the positive results associated with investigators and prosecutors working closely together.

(4) The fourth model co-locates all victim services support personnel. At Marine Corps Base Quantico, Virginia, the Marine Corps has collected all of the different services available to victims under one roof, including the SARC, victim advocate, and special victim counsel.[754] This is a positive step, especially when there are so many resources and service providers available to sexual assault victims.

Overall, consolidated facilities can improve communication between prosecutors, investigators, and victims. These facilities may help minimize unnecessary trauma to victims following a sexual assault by locating all of the resources required to respond, support, investigate, and prosecute sexual assault cases in one building. However, these models require substantial resources and the right mix of personnel. Co-locating prosecutors and victim services personnel may also compromise privileges for military victim advocates or cause other perception problems.[755]

The Secretary of Defense needs to assess the various strengths and weaknesses of different co-location models at locations throughout the Armed Forces in order to continue to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of investigation and prosecution of sexual assault offenses. [RSP Recommendation 107-A] Likewise, the Service Secretaries should direct that each Service's Judge Advocate General Corps and MCIOs work together to co-locate prosecutors and investigators who handle sexual assault cases on installations where sufficient caseloads justify consolidation and resources are available. Additionally, locating a forensic exam room with special victims' prosecutors and investigators, where caseloads justify such an arrangement, can help minimize the travel and trauma to victims while maximizing the speed and effectiveness of investigations. Because of the importance of protecting privileged communication with victims, the SARC, victim advocate, special victim counsel or other victim support personnel should not be merged with the offices of prosecutors and investigators. [RSP Recommendation 107-B]

2. Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners (SANEs)

In civilian jurisdictions, specially trained nurses or other trained health care providers perform SAFEs. Most police departments coordinate with local hospitals; however, not all civilian hospitals have a trained provider on staff. In those locations, victims may be transported to a designated location where forensic exams are routinely performed or a provider will respond to the victim's hospital. Having a pool of designated trained professionals who frequently are called to conduct SAFEs increases the level of expertise of those examiners and improves the quality of the exam.

Many installations coordinate with civilian forensic examiners to provide SAFE services. Depending on the location, many civilian medical facilities serve as the community's center of excellence for SAFEs and have more experienced SANEs than are typically available on a military installation. SANEs in civilian medical facilities typically have more experience in conducting forensic exams because they see more sexual assault victims over the course of a year than SANEs on most military installations.[756] On most, if not all, military installations, a full time SANE is unnecessary because not enough sexual assaults are reported within the first 96 hours of an incident to require a nurse physically located at a consolidated sexual assault center. However, it may be useful to provide appropriate space, supplies and equipment for SANE forensic exams in facilities housing investigators and prosecutors in order to support currently existing arrangements between military installations and civilian forensic examiners. Further, such arrangements would increase communication between prosecutors, investigators, and forensic examiners while easing the burden on victims by limiting the need to travel to a military hospital or off base civilian facility.

The FY14 NDAA Section 1725 requirement that every military installation medical treatment facility (MTF) with an emergency department that operates 24 hours per day, seven days a week to have at least one assigned SANE is overly prescriptive.[757] DoD policy already required timely, accessible, and comprehensive healthcare for victims of sexual assault, including a SAFE Kit.[758] In light of the DoD policy, and actual need for forensic exams in the military, the Service Secretaries should direct their Surgeons General to: (1) review Section 1725 of the FY14 NDAA, which requires the assignment of at least one full-time SANE to each military medical facility with a 24 hour, seven days a week emergency room, and (2) provide recommendations to amend the legislation so as to permit the most effective way to provide SAFEs at their facilities, given that many civilian medical facilities have more experienced forensic examiners than are typically located on a military installation and those facilities serve as the community's center of excellence for SAFEs. [RSP Recommendation 99]

3. Special Victim Capability Policy and Assessment

The Special Victim Capability strives to provide a level of prosecution expertise through specialization in complex sex-related cases, while recognizing that not every judge advocate is a subject matter expert in sexual assault prosecution. DoD's policy document Directive-Type Memorandum (DTM) 14-003 advances Congress's requirements by including timelines for special prosecutors' involvement in reported sexual assaults, criteria to measure effectiveness, and other standards.[759]

a. Terminology

Pursuant to DoD policy, the Special Victim Capability team responds to "covered offenses" which includes "sexual assault, domestic violence involving sexual assault and/or aggravated assault with grievous bodily harm, and child abuse involving sexual assault and/or aggravated assault with grievous bodily harm, in accordance with the UCMJ."[760] Accordingly, the prosecutors and investigators of the Special Victim Capability team are required to handle cases beyond Article 120 offenses. The Secretary of Defense should direct the DTM 14-003 be revised so that definitions of "covered offenses" accurately reflect specific offenses currently listed in the relevant version(s) of Article 120 of the UCMJ. [RSP Recommendation 103]

In large jurisdictions, prosecutors specializing in sexual assault cases handle felony level offenses, whereas less experienced attorneys handle misdemeanors or contact offenses. Article 120 of the UCMJ covers conduct from contact offenses to penetrative offenses, so a blanket requirement for using Special Victim Capability in all Article 120 cases would not be comparable to such civilian systems. Therefore, the Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries should develop policy that does not require special victim prosecutors to handle every sexual assault under Article 120 of the UCMJ. Due to the resources required, the wide range of conduct that falls within current sexual assault offenses in the UCMJ, and the difficulty of providing the capability in remote locations, a blanket requirement for special prosecutors to handle every case undermines effective prevention, investigation, and prosecution. [RSP Recommendation 104]

b. Timelines

DoD established timelines to ensure military prosecutors' early involvement in sexual assault investigations. MCIOs inform the Staff Judge Advocate's legal office within 24 hours of learning of a report; the special victim prosecutor coordinates with the investigator within 48 hours.[761] The DoD policy is supported by studies that concluded when prosecutors become involved in sexual assault cases early, including meeting with the victim, there is a greater likelihood the victim will cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of the alleged offender.[762] The large urban prosecution offices have programs that include protocols for investigators to notify prosecutors as soon as serious sexual assaults are identified. The protocols also provide for prosecutors to accompany investigators in certain circumstances, and for the coordination between the investigator and prosecutor through much of the process.[763] Military special victim prosecutors are on call and follow similar procedures as their civilian counterparts in large offices with ride-along programs. While the coordination between the military investigator and prosecutor follows the civilian best practice, there is no current requirement for the military prosecutor to meet with the victim as soon as possible.

The Secretary of Defense should maintain the requirement for an investigator to notify the prosecution section of the staff judge advocate's legal office of an unrestricted sexual assault report within 24 hours, and for the special victim prosecutor to consult with the investigator within 48 hours, and monthly, thereafter. Milestones should be established to insert the prosecutor into the investigation process and to ensure that the special victim prosecutor contacts the victim or the victim's counsel as soon as possible after an unrestricted report. [RSP Recommendation 102]

c. Measuring the Effectiveness of the Special Victim Capability

Department of Defense policy complies with the FY13 NDAA requirement for the Secretary of Defense to prescribe common criteria for measuring the effectiveness and impact of the Special Victim Capability from investigative, prosecutorial, and victim perspectives.[764] DoD established five evaluation criteria "to ensure that special victim offense cases are expertly prosecuted, and that victims and witnesses are treated with dignity and respect at all times, have a voice in the process, and that their specific needs are addressed in a competent and sensitive manner by Special Victim Capability personnel."[765] The DoD and the Services will assess the Special Victim Capability by reviewing the following measures:[766]

- Percentage of Special Victim Capability cases preferred, compared to overall number of courts-martial preferred in each fiscal year;
- Percentage of special victim offense courts-martial tried by, or with the direct advice and assistance of, a specially trained prosecutor;
- Compliance with DoD Victim Witness Assistance Program reporting requirements to ensure Special Victim Capability legal personnel consult with and regularly update victims as required;
- Percentage of specially-trained prosecutors and other legal support personnel who receive additional and advanced training in Special Victim Capability topic areas; and
- Victim feedback on the effectiveness of Special Victim Capability prosecution and legal support services and recommendations for possible improvements.[767]

In addition to the DoD criteria, the Army uses the victim "drop out" rate to measure the effectiveness of the special victim counsel or special victim prosecutor. Evidence indicates that these programs, thus far, have been effective. Since the Army established the Special Victim Prosecutor Program in 2009, only six percent of sexual assault victims "dropped out" or were unable to continue to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of the case.[768] In contrast, in 2011, prior to implementing the specially trained prosecutors or victims' counsel programs, the Air Force suffered from a 29 percent victim dropout rate.[769]

Special prosecutors, and now special victim counsel, are trained to prevent victim fatigue and ensure victims remain informed. Considering the correlation between the Special Victim Prosecutor Program's implementation and a reduced victim dropout rate, it is reasonable to conclude that special victim prosecutors are making the process less intimidating for victims and are causing victims to have more faith in the process.[770] Nonetheless, to assess the long-term effectiveness of these programs, the Services should track the percentage of cases in which the victim declines to cooperate after filing an unrestricted report and the reasons for the declination. This additional data could reflect the effectiveness of both the special victim prosecutor and special victim counsel.

The Secretary of Defense should assess the Special Victim Capability annually to determine the effectiveness of the multidisciplinary approach and the resources required to sustain the capability, as well as continue to develop metrics such as the victim "drop-out" rate, rather than conviction rates, as a measure of success. [RSP Recommendation 109]

B. DEFENSE COUNSEL ORGANIZATION AND RESOURCE REQUIREMENTS

Defense counsel from across the Services informed the Panel that the mission of the military Defense Services is to provide independent, world-class representation in a zealous, ethical, and professional manner, thereby ensuring the military justice system is both fair and just.[771] While it is important to hold offenders appropriately accountable, it is also crucial that the military justice system remains balanced and respects the rights of the accused, particularly the presumption of innocence.

As required by law and policy, the Services provide military defense counsel, free of charge, to Service members facing potential court-martial, nonjudicial punishment, administrative separation, and similar adverse action.[772] Defense counsel perform a wide range of duties, including:

- representing Service members before tribunals and other administrative bodies – e.g., at courts-martial, Article 32 hearings, lineups and administrative separation boards;
- counseling Service members under investigation or prior to being subject to punitive or negative administrative action – e.g., those suspected of offenses, pending nonjudicial punishment under Article 15 of the UCMJ, subject to Summary Court-martial (where Service members are not entitled to attorney representation), recommended for administrative separation; and
- other legal services as determined by the Services.

All of the Services organize their trial defense services by geographic region.[773] Military defense counsel are assigned to separate and independent organizations, not under the supervision or control of their clients' commanders. This organizational structure ensures the independence of military defense counsel, both in fact and perception.

Unlike military or civilian special victim prosecutors, neither civilian public defenders offices nor military defense services have attorneys specializing in sexual assault cases;[774] instead both attempt to use the most experienced attorneys to try more complex cases, such as sexual assaults. The Services' regionally organized trial defense systems meet the demand for competent and independent legal representation of Service members accused of sexual assault. Therefore, rather than developing specialized defense counsel, DoD and the Services should continue to focus on improving defense counsel training and ensuring sufficient resources are provided so that military defense organizations and counsel can perform effectively.

Currently, military defense counsel cannot use the MCIO to conduct additional investigation for the defense, assuming the MCIO would agree to do so, because any information would not be protected by the attorney-client or work-product privileges,[775] and the alternative – military defense counsel conducting his or her own case investigations – is equally unsatisfactory. This places an additional burden on military defense counsel who may be untrained in investigative techniques and lacking investigative assets. Further, it may place defense counsel in ethically compromising circumstances if he or she becomes the only witness to exculpatory, inconsistent, or other statements.

Unlike public defenders who employ their own investigators, military defense counsel have none. Civilian defense investigators typically assist the defense in locating and interviewing witnesses, finding appropriate experts, and finding services to assist the defense in complying with court ordered treatment or services.[776] The investigators' involvement and contributions permit civilian defense counsel to prepare for trial and may assist in reaching alternate dispositions in cases.[777] Investigators can "give[] attorneys a fighting chance to develop facts and other evidence that is rarely provided to them by the government and is crucial for the proper representation of their clients" and "contribute to the efficient disposition of cases." [778] One public defender from the Washington, D.C. Public Defender's Office told the Panel, "[I]t's surprising to hear about the lack of investigators involved when we're trying to uphold the Constitution here and try to give our clients the utmost in representation and being zealous."[779]

Currently, military defense counsel instead must rely solely on the MCIO investigation and defense counsel and defense paralegals, if available, to conduct any additional investigation. Although defense counsel can request an investigator be detailed to the defense team for a particular case, defense counsel told the Panel that convening authorities and military judges routinely deny their requests.[780] The Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators in order to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the defense mission in cases and the fair administration of justice. 781 [RSP Recommendation 81] Many civilian public defender offices have investigators on their staffs and consider them critical.[782]

The are several potential ways DoD could fulfill the requirement to provide defense investigators. One would create MCIO positions within the defense counsel offices[783] and ensure the investigators' evaluation and supervisory chains remain within the military trial defense organizations.[784] Investigators could "unplug" from the parent MCIO for an assignment, "plug" into the defense system, then "unplug" to resume work for the MCIO.[785] This would mirror JAG Corps attorneys who serve as both prosecutors and defense counsel, although always in different assignment tours. Another option is to hire civilian investigators as full time government employees or hire contractors to work for the defense.[786] Some public defender offices hire former law enforcement personnel who get narrow-purpose credentials issued to them to perform the investigative functions for the defense.[787]

Regardless of the way DoD implements this requirement, military defense counsel need independent, deployable defense investigators to zealously represent their clients and correct an obvious imbalance of resources.

C. TRAINING INVESTIGATORS, PROSECUTORS, AND DEFENSE COUNSEL

Overall, military trial counsel, defense counsel, and investigators are competently and professionally performing their duties in adult sexual assault cases. Collaboration and standardization of assignments and training across the Services are areas ripe for further improvement.

1. Improving Special Victim Unit Investigator Personnel Assignments

Military and civilian agencies with SVUs recognize that detectives assigned to those units should have both the capability and commitment to investigate sexual assaults.[788] Best practices in civilian SVU investigative agencies involve reassigning personnel experiencing "burn out" and careful interviewing and selection of applicants to weed out those investigators with biases or a lack of interest in investigating sexual assault cases.[790] Based on military mission requirements and the resulting need for flexibility in personnel assignments, a military Service member agent may be assigned to support an SVU or act as the lead agent on a sexual assault investigation, even though he or she did not volunteer for the position. To mitigate this problem, the MCIOs created civilian SVU team chief and investigator positions, carefully staffing them with specifically selected investigators.[791] Thus, a military best practice is assigning civilian investigators to supervise the SVU, which enhances the continuity of investigations and coordination with other agencies involved in responding to sexual assault cases.

The Secretary of Defense should direct MCIO commanders and directors to carefully select and train military investigators assigned as investigators for SVUs, and whenever possible, utilize civilians for specialized investigative oversight to maximize continuity and expertise. MCIO commanders and directors should ensure that military personnel assigned to an SVU have the competence and commitment to investigate sexual assault cases. [RSP Recommendation 96]

2. Training to Improve Sexual Assault Investigations and Reports

Both military and civilian agencies recognize the possibility of potential biases or factually inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior (commonly referred to as "rape myths") among their officers and investigators.[793] Left unaddressed, such biases can result in failures to aggressively follow up on a complaint of sexual assault, inappropriate disposition of cases, or inaccurate reports.[792] One of the primary ways to address these issues is through targeted training.[793]

Civilian experts report that relatively few law enforcement professionals have sufficient training to write effective reports of sexual assaults.[794] In both civilian and military law enforcement communities, bias in the terms used in documenting sexual assaults sometimes inappropriately or inaccurately suggests consent of the victim.[795] One expert noted, "We talk about victims having sex with their perpetrators. We talk about victims performing oral sex on their perpetrators. And we don't think of the word picture that creates, which does not in any way show the reality of the crime."[796]

The MCIOs have identified this concern and are trying to address potential biases through training and policy.[797] Army CID has issued guidance about the use of language that may imply consent and has required investigators to complete the End Violence Against Women International (EVAWI) online course entitled "Effective Report Writing: The Language of Non-Consensual Sex" as part of its annual refresher training in FY 2013.[798] Though the other Services do not have specific policies on this subject, all stated they train investigators on eliminating bias in investigations, particularly regarding victim behaviors.[799]

A best practice in both military and civilian agencies is to provide training to address potential biases and inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior, preparing officers and investigators to more effectively respond to, investigate, and document reported sexual assaults. Therefore, the Secretary of Defense should direct commanders and directors of the MCIOs to continue training of all levels of law enforcement personnel on potential biases and inaccurate perceptions of victim behavior. Investigators should also be trained against the use of language that inaccurately or inappropriately implies consent of the victim in reports. [RSP Recommendation 97]

3. Collaboration and Consistency in Sexual Assault Forensic Examinations

FY14 NDAA requires that the curriculum and other components of the program for certification of SANE (Adult/Adolescent) use the most recent guidelines and standards, as outlined by the Department of Justice, Office on Violence Against Women.[800] While not all civilian agencies require their nurses performing forensic examinations to be certified as a SANE, all must have at least the required training as a forensic examiner (40 hours of training are required, but taking the national exam is not). Twelve hours of continuing education is required annually to maintain certification as a SANE.[801]

While the Department of Justice national guidelines form the basis for SAFE training in the military and civilian communities, each of the Military Services instituted different programs and developed guidelines independently. To improve and synchronize these programs and efforts, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to create a working group to coordinate the Services' efforts, leverage expertise, and consider whether a joint forensic exam course open to all military and DoD practitioners, perhaps at the Joint Medical Education and Training Center, or portable forensic training and jointly designed refresher courses would help to ensure a robust baseline of common training across all Services. [RSP Recommendation 101]

4. Training Prosecutors in Adult Sexual Assault Cases

The Panel gathered and examined comparative information and received witness testimony from twenty prosecution offices across the nation to assess and compare military prosecutor training.[802] There are no national or state minimum training standards or experience floors for civilian prosecutors handling adult sexual assault crimes. Though each civilian prosecution office has different training practices, most sex crime prosecutors are trained through supervised experience handling pretrial motions, trials, and appeals.[803] Civilian sex crimes prosecutors usually have at least three years of prosecution experience, and often more than five. Experience can also be measured by the number of trials completed, though there is no uniform minimum required number of trials to be assigned adult sexual assault cases. Some prosecutors in medium to large offices have caseloads of at least 50-60 cases, and spend at least two days per week in court.

Likewise, all the Services have specially-trained and selected lawyers who serve as lead trial counsel in sexual assault crimes cases. As discussed further below, specialized military prosecutors handling adult sexual assault cases receive advanced training and have access to a network of senior judge advocates, civilian experts, and prosecution specialists.

a. Specially Trained Prosecutor Programs

All of the Services have trained specially trained prosecutors to support the special victim capability. The Army selects trial lawyers with the most demonstrated court-martial experience, experience with special victim cases, general expertise in criminal law, and interpersonal skills in handling sensitive victim cases.[804] The table below details experience and training for specialized sexual assault prosecution programs:

EXPERIENCE AND TRAINING FOR PROSECUTORS TRYING SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES[805]

Organization and Authorizations	Selection and Experience	Specialized Education and Training
U.S. Army Special Victim Prosecutor (SVP) • 23 Special Victim Prosecutors covering worldwide area spanning 65 installations. • Army SVPs work with CID special investigators and Special Victim Unit (SVU) investigative teams.	• Individually selected from the Army's most experienced trial lawyers. • Demonstrated court-martial experience. • Experience with sexual assault and special victim cases. • General expertise in criminal law. • Interpersonal skill in handling sensitive victim cases. • Both prosecution and defense experience are not required for selection, but is preferred.[806]	• Specialized military and civilian courses. • Two weeks "on the job" with a civilian district attorney's office. • Special training on victim care and interviewing.
U.S. Air Force Special Victims Unit – Senior Trial Counsel (SVU-STC) • 16 Senior Trial Counsel, including 10 who are members of the SVU. • Work alongside 24 Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) special investigators. • Located at 16 Air Force installations with a high number of reported sexual offenses.	• Senior Trial Counsel (STC) litigate the Air Force's most difficult cases, including the vast majority of sexual-assault prosecutions. • STC typically have at least three years of experience and are selected to be STCs. • A subset of STC are members of the Special Victims Unit (SVU-STC) and specialize in the prosecution of sexual assault and family violence cases.[807]	• Air Force lawyers selected for litigation positions attend the Trial and Defense Advocacy Course (TDAC) and the Advanced Trial Advocacy Course (ATAC). • All SVU-STC attend the Advanced Sexual Assault Litigation Course (ASALC), focused on sexual assault, domestic violence, and child abuse course annually. • SVU JAGs also continuously attend various advanced training courses.[808]
U.S. Navy Military Justice Litigation Career Track (MJLCT) and Senior Trial Counsel (STC) • 9 regionally-based Senior Trial Counsel. • Collaborate with Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) special investigators to investigate, review, and prosecute special victim cases.	• With demonstrated aptitude and a desire to further specialize in litigation, may apply for inclusion in the MJLCT. • MJLCT officers spend most of their career in litigation-related billets as trial counsel, defense counsel, and military judges.[809]	• An MJLCT officer can advance from Specialist I to Specialist II to Expert. • Most MJLCT officers also receive an advanced law degree (a Master of Laws or LL.M.) in trial advocacy or litigation from a civilian institution. • Complete a follow-on tour in a courtroom intensive billet with leadership requirements.[810]

U.S. Marine Corps Special Victim Qualified Trial Counsel (SVTC) and Complex Trial Teams (CTT) • Specially qualified, geographically-assigned Complex Trial Teams led by experienced Regional Trial Counsel • Provide special victim prosecutorial expertise and support.	• Prosecute a contested special or general court-martial in a special victim case as an assistant trial counsel. • Be a General Court-Martial Qualified trial counsel (experience requirement). • Receive written recommendation from the Regional Trial Counsel regarding expertise to try a special victim case. • Satisfy requisite expertise, experience, education, innate ability, and disposition to competently try special victim cases (to the approval an O-6 level Officer-in-Charge).	• Complete the Marine Corps basic judge advocate training requirements, including courses at the Naval Justice School. • Attend an intermediate-level trial advocacy training course for the prosecution of special victim cases.

b. Trial Counsel Assistance Programs and Highly Qualified Experts (HQEs)

In addition to specialized prosecutors, the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps each have a Trial Counsel Assistance Program (TCAP) that oversees training. TCAPs across the Services provide training to increase the expertise of trial counsel and lay a foundation for them to later serve as experienced and capable defense counsel, chiefs of military justice (i.e., supervisory trial counsel), deputy SJAs, and SJAs.[811] The table below describes each Service's TCAP organization, support, and budget:

TRIAL COUNSEL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS[812]

Organization	Responsibilities	HQE Support	Budget
U.S. Army Trial Counsel Assistance Program (TCAP)	• Increase the expertise of trial counsel. • Lay a foundation for trial counsel to later serve as experienced and capable defense counsel, chiefs of military justice (i.e., supervisory trial counsel), deputy SJAs, and SJAs.[813]	• 3 Highly Qualified Experts (HQEs) provide supplemental support. • The HQEs are civilians with more than 30 years of combined prosecution experience.[814]	• $468,734.64 (annual "sexual assault training funds"). • $1,407 per trial counsel per year.
U.S. Air Force No Centralized Program	• N/A	• N/A	• $2,105 per STC.[815]
U.S. Navy Trial Counsel Assistance Program (TCAP)	• Oversees training for trial counsel. • Provides on scene and online training to prosecutors in specialized areas, including adult sexual assault. • Conducts annual mobile training. • Installation site-visits with training sections on special victim crimes and process inspection. • Live online training. • Interactive Web-based training (sponsored by TCAP and conducted by subject matter experts).	• In May of 2013 the Navy hired an HQE to work with its TCAP. • HQE has 17 years of experience as a prosecutor and as an instructor and course coordinator for the NDAA.	• Not provided.
U.S. Marine Corps Trial Counsel Assistance Program (TCAP)	• To train trial counsel to prosecute sexual assault cases.[816] • Answers questions from prosecutors in the field, • Maintains a Web site for trial counsel to share motions and best practices, • Conducts training—in conjunction with Navy TCAP.[817] • Marine Corps trial counsel must consult with their regional HQE within ten days of being detailed to any sexual assault case.[818]	• The Marine Corps recently hired three HQEs to assist in all sexual assault cases; • Two of the HQEs are assigned to the prosecution.[819]	• $250,000 (SAPR/ SVC annual training funds). • $2,778 per trial counsel per year.

The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should sustain or increase training of judge advocates to maintain the expertise necessary to litigate adult sexual assault cases in spite of the turnover created by personnel rotations within the Services' Judge Advocates General Corps. [RSP Recommendation 110]

Trial counsel in all the Military Services generally have more standardized and extensive training than some of their civilian counterparts, but fewer years of prosecution and trial experience. The Services all use a combination of experienced supervising attorneys, systematic sexual assault training, and smaller caseloads to address experience disparities.

As a promising option for increasing experience levels of military trial counsel, the Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should study the Navy's Military Justice Litigation Career Track (MJLCT), outlined in the chart above,[820] to determine whether this model, or a similar one, would be effective in enhancing expertise in litigating sexual assault cases in his or her Service.

5. Military Defense Counsel Training and Experience

The Panel compared civilian approaches and examined best and promising practices in assessing training and experience levels of military defense counsel. Defense counsel handling adult sexual assault cases in all the Services receive specialized training.[821] Many also have previous experience as trial counsel.[822] The table below illustrates training and experience of defense counsel across the Services:

EXPERIENCE AND TRAINING FOR DEFENSE COUNSEL TRYING SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES[823]

Organization	Experience	Training
U.S. Army Defense Counsel	• Majority of DCs have prior courtroom experience. No specific minimum experience required. • Experience sitting "second chair" until supervisor deems fit to try cases as first chair.	• Graduate of the Judge Advocate Officer Basic Course. • Defense Counsel "101," taught by DCAP. • Advanced Trial Advocacy Courses.
U.S. Air Force Defense Counsel	• The Air Force is unique in that defense counsel are selected in a competitive, best-qualified standard by the Air Force Judge Advocate General. • Most defense counsel arrive with two to five years of experience working in a base legal office, which includes time as a trial counsel in courts-martial. • New defense counsel normally have between eight and 10 courts-martial trials before starting as a defense counsel.[824]	• Specialized courses provided by the Air Force Judge Advocate General's School. • On-the-job training. • Group training remains a challenge because of geographic diversity of counsel and length of tours.[825] • Out of the 19 Senior Defense Counsel regions, only three (San Antonio, Colorado Springs and the National Capitol Region) have the majority of their bases in close enough proximity to drive to group training.[826]

U.S. Navy Defense Counsel	• Following their first 24-month tour handling administrative separations and other non-judicial issues, Navy Judge Advocates become eligible to be assigned to a Defense Service Office (DSO) as a defense counsel.[827] • MJLCT officers are stationed in all DSO headquarters offices and some detachments, which are smaller regional offices.[828]	• Once selected, counsel receive additional training, including a basic trial advocacy course focusing on courtroom advocacy. • Within the first year at a DSO, defense counsel also attend the defending sexual assault cases class, an intense one-week course involving experts from forensics and psychology and very experienced civilian defense counsel.[829]
U.S. Marine Corps Defense Counsel	• The vast majority of the Marine Corps' 72 defense counsel are first-tour judge advocates with less than three years of experience as an attorney.[830] • They typically serve 18 months as defense counsel before moving to another assignment. • The average litigation experience of both senior defense counsel and defense counsel is 14 months, which includes both prosecution and defense time.[831]	• Defense counsel training requirements are set forth in Marine Corps policy.[832]
U.S. Coast Guard Defense Counsel	• By memorandum of agreement between the Coast Guard and the Navy JAG Corps, the Navy is principally responsible for defending Coast Guard members accused of UCMJ crimes.[833] • In return, four Coast Guard judge advocates are detailed to work at various Navy Defense Service offices on two-year rotations, which provide another significant source of trial experience to Coast Guard judge advocates.[834]	• Coast Guard Defense Counsel attend Navy Defense Training.

Military defense counsel in all the Services tend to have more standardized and extensive course training than their civilian counterparts to compensate for a relative lack of experience.[835] Like their prosecution counterparts, defense counsel receive training, oversight, and mentoring from senior counsel.[836] The Services should continue to provide experienced defense counsel through the regional defense organizations and draw from personnel with extensive trial experience and expertise in the Reserve component. [RSP Recommendation 85]

It is difficult to develop defense experience given the relatively low number of courts-martial and personnel turnover. The Marine Corps faces particular problems with personnel turnover because their attorneys perform line duty mission requirements and may serve in defense counsel tour lengths as short as 12 months.[837] As previously discussed, not all military defense counsel possess trial experience prior to assuming the role of defense counsel. Some defense counsel said they were assigned adult sexual assault cases during their first tour of duty, when they had no prior litigation experience.[838]

The Service TJAGs and Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should permit only counsel with litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case as well as set the minimum tour length of defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service TJAG or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, or designee, because of exigent circumstances or to specifically enable training of defense counsel under supervision of experienced defense counsel. [RSP Recommendation 86]

6. Defense Counsel Assistance Programs (DCAPs) and HQEs

All of the Military Services except the Air Force have DCAPs and HQEs to assist with training and trial consultation in all cases, including sexual assaults. The table below describes these programs:

DEFENSE COUNSEL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS[839]

Organization	Responsibilities	HQE Support[840]	Budget
U.S. Army Trial Defense Service and Defense Counsel Assistance Program (DCAP)	• Provides training, resources and assistance for defense counsel worldwide, including "reach back" capability. • Coordinates with, but operates independently from The Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School. • "Available around the clock for case consultation. [In FY13], DCAP received over 2,000 inquiries from defense counsel in the form of emails, phone calls and in-person inquiries during training events."[841]	• Two civilian HQEs. • Both HQEs are former military judges and experienced trial practitioners with over 40 years of combined military justice experience.	• $377,178.96 (annual). • $1,033.36 per counsel.
U.S. Air Force No Centralized Program	• Training and support provided internally through supervisory counsel.	• No HQE Support.	• $350,000.00 annually for "other than litigation" travel. • $1,870.00 per counsel.

U.S. Navy Defense Counsel Assistance Program (DCAP)	• In conjunction with the Naval Justice School, provides ongoing training to current and prospective defense counsel worldwide, through on-site command visits and online training.[842] • Tracks trends and identifies areas for training; monitors evaluations for improvement in practice.[843] • Hosts an online forum where counsel post, download, and share resources involving sexual assault litigation as well as a "discussion board" where defense counsel anywhere in the world can receive nearly instantaneous assistance from DCAP and the Navy defense bar.[844]	• One HQE (former military judge with extensive criminal law experience).	• Not Provided.
U.S. Marine Corps Defense Services Organization (DSO)	• Provides training and support to 72 defense counsel, most of whom are first-tour judge advocates with less than three years of experience as an attorney.[845]	• One HQE, a retired civilian public defender from San Diego with over 30 years of experience.[846]	• DSO has access to $250,000 in SAPR/SVC Training Funds. • $1870.00 per counsel.

The Service Secretaries should direct that current training efforts and programs be sustained to ensure that military defense counsel are competent, prepared, and equipped. [RSP Recommendation 84]

7. Ensuring the Continued Effectiveness of Military Defense Counsel

In contrast to assessment of the performance of prosecutors there are currently no requirements or pending initiatives for the Services to measure military defense counsel performance in trying sexual assault cases. It is difficult for civilian or military defense counsel to measure success in defending those accused of sexual assault offenses. Just as conviction rates are not an accurate or desirable measure of prosecution success, acquittal rates are also not an accurate or desirable measure of defense success. Instead, a favorable plea agreement, sentence, or agreement to dispose of a case through alternate means for a client may be an accomplishment. Additionally, high acquittal rates in military sexual assault cases may indicate that staff judge advocates are recommending, and convening authorities are referring, cases that do not warrant trial by court-martial.

Therefore, the Secretary of Defense should direct the Services to assess military defense counsels' performance in sexual assault cases similar to performance assessment of prosecutors and identify areas that may need improvement. [RSP Recommendation 87]

8. Sexual Assault Working Group for Military Lawyers

Currently, all Services send attorneys to the training courses and JAG schools of the other Services. They also informally share resources, personnel, lessons for training, and collaborate on some training, enabling counsel to share successful tactics, strategies, and approaches.[847] However, these processes are not formal or standardized. There does not appear to be any synchronized effort in creating, funding, and growing training programs—as evidenced by the varying names and acronyms used to describe similar programs. For example, military judges in the Navy prepare quarterly evaluations of counsel's advocacy that are forwarded to the Chief Judge of the Navy for review and shared with DCAP for use in training plans.[848] It does not appear that the other Services similarly measure and assess performance. The absence of standardization and coordination can create confusion, duplication of effort, and a lack of clarity and credibility to those outside of the system. Conversely, if formalized and shared across the Services, these processes and terms could enhance comparability and efficiency.

The Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should sustain and broaden the emphasis on developing and maintaining shared resources, expertise, and experience in prosecuting and defending adult sexual assault crimes. [RSP Recommendation 111] To that end, a working group is an effective means of showing progress and development and ensuring that initiatives and promising practices are disseminated throughout the Services to avoid duplication and continue improving training practices. Therefore, the Secretary of Defense should direct the establishment of a DoD judge advocate criminal law joint training working group to optimize sharing of best practices, resources, and expertise for prosecuting and defending adult sexual assault cases. The working group should produce a concise written report, delivered to the Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps at least annually, for the next five calendar years. The working group should identify best practices, strive to eliminate redundancy, consider consolidated training, consider ways to enhance expertise in litigating sexual assault cases, and monitor training and experience throughout the Services. The working group should review training programs such as: the Army's Special Victim Prosecutor program; the Navy's Military Justice Litigation Career Track (MJLCT); the Highly Qualified Expert (HQE) programs used for training in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; the Trial Counsel Assistance and Defense Counsel Assistance Programs (TCAP and DCAP); the Navy's use of quarterly judicial evaluations of counsel; and any other potential best practices, civilian or military. [RSP Recommendation 112]

D. RESOURCING AND FUNDING

1. Defense Services Funding

Maintaining adequate resources for the defense of military personnel accused of crimes, including sexual assault, is essential to the legitimacy and fairness of the military justice system. Unlike many civilian public defender offices,[849] military defense counsel organizations generally do not maintain their own budget; instead, they receive funding from the convening authority, their Service legal commands, or other sources.

Some civilian public defender offices maintain their own budgets or request experts through a trial judge who manages the budget.[850] In the federal system, there is specific funding to pay for defense witness travel and experts for Federal Defender organizations. Federal discovery rules generally require the defense to disclose experts and other witnesses to the government before trial, but not as early as military defense counsel. Military defense counsel must also request their witnesses through the trial counsel.[851]

The Panel concludes that separate budgets for military defense organizations are not necessary at this time. However, the Service Secretaries should ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced in funding resources and personnel, including defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts, and direct the Services to assess if that is the case. [RSP Recommendation 82]

2. Reviewing Defense Counsel Training Budgets

During site visits and meetings, defense counsel and HQEs voiced concerns about training budget funding inequities between prosecutors and defense counsel, particularly in the Marine Corps.[852] Defense counsel from the Air Force, Army, and Navy also mentioned inequities in funding generally between the prosecution and defense, but did not specifically emphasize training. Some defense counsel told the Panel that because they do not have independent budgets, their training opportunities were insufficient and unequal to those of their trial counsel counterparts.[853]

The Services provided details about their training budgets, which reflected that defense counsel training budgets are generally equivalent to those for military prosecutors. The Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should review military defense counsel training for adult sexual assault cases to ensure funding of defense training opportunities is on par with that of trial counsel. [RSP Recommendation 83]

3. Maintaining Experienced Civilian Advocates

As discussed in the TCAP, DCAP, and HQE sections above, experienced civilian advocates play an important role training both prosecution and defense counsel in the Army, Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps. Given the attrition and transience of military counsel, civilian involvement in training adds an important perspective and ensures a base level of experience and continuity. Most HQEs have 20-30 years of criminal law experience, often in both civilian and military practice—rare among lawyers in the Services.[854] Working in tandem with TCAP and DCAP, the HQEs add substantial specialized expertise in adult sexual assault litigation. Such civilian expert advocate participation also adds transparency and validity to military counsel training programs.

The Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should continue to fund and expand programs that provide a permanent civilian presence in the training structure for both trial and defense counsel. The Services should continue to leverage experienced military Reservists and civilian attorneys for training, expertise, and experience. [RSP Recommendation 119]

4. Supporting Military Judicial Training

Military judges, both trial and appellate, are selected based on their legal experience, military service record, and exemplary personal character, including sound ethics and good judgment.[855] Military judges participate in joint training at the Army's Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School before their respective Service TJAGs will certify them to be judges.[856] This three-week course at the Army JAG School in Charlottesville, Virginia, covers judicial philosophy, case management, and specific scenarios.[857] The course, which is designed around a sexual assault case, includes substantive criminal law and procedure, practical exercises designed to simulate trial practice, and scenarios focusing on factors for consideration in reaching appropriate sentences.[858] The chief trial judges of all Services collaborate to create the Military Judge Course curriculum, and all Services provide instructors.[859] Experienced senior military judges grade the capstone exercise, which is a mock trial over which student military judges must preside.[860]

The Service TJAGs and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps should continue to fund sufficient training opportunities for military judges and consider more joint and consolidated programs. [RSP Recommendation 120]

5. Ensuring Funding for Investigator Training

The MCIOs face an ongoing challenge of ensuring adequate funding is available to send investigators to advanced sexual assault investigation training courses. The increased workload and agent turnover requires training more investigators.[861] Congress has not specifically set aside money for sexual assault investigator training, leading to concerns that as resources wane within the military, the Services may be forced to cut training funds.[862] It is critical to sustain funding for training investigators, often the first responders to a report of sexual assault. Therefore, Congress should appropriate funds for training of sexual assault investigation personnel. The Secretary of Defense should direct the Service Secretaries to program and budget funding, as allowed by law, for the MCIOs to provide advanced training on sexual assault investigations to SVU investigators. [RSP Recommendation 98]

6. Ensuring Resourcing of Special Victim Capability

The DoD has dedicated an immense amount of resources to combat sexual assault. However, DoD did not authorize any additional personnel to the individual Services specifically to meet the requirement for special prosecutors within the Special Victim Capability, although the Services may have obtained additional personnel prior to the Congressional mandate. Currently, the Military Services fully fund special prosecutors' case preparation requirements.

Prior to the Congressional requirement for a Special Victim Capability in FY13 NDAA, the Services established programs that centralized specially trained prosecutors for complex cases.[863] The requirement to establish a Special Victim Capability within each Service did not significantly impact overall JAG personnel requirements because the Services were already developing these capabilities and, depending on the Service, may have already received additional authorizations for personnel. However, in a time of scarce resources and drawdown, it may be difficult to maintain this kind of capability in each of the different Services. Therefore, DoD and the Services need to ensure continued resources and permanent personnel are dedicated to this capability. Accordingly, the Service Secretaries should continue to assess and meet the need for well-trained prosecutors to support the Services' Special Victim Capabilities, especially if there is increased reporting. [RSP Recommendation 106]

Chapter Ten:

ASSESSING MILITARY AND CIVILIAN JUSTICE SYSTEM STRUCTURE AND PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

A. MILITARY JUSTICE SYSTEM STRUCTURE: EFFECTS ON SEXUAL ASSAULT REPORTING AND ADJUDICATION

Critics of the military justice system have argued that removing prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command will increase victim confidence and sexual assault reporting, as well as make the system fairer.[864] In considering this position, the Panel heard extensive testimony from sexual assault survivors, victim advocacy organizations, legislators, academics, and retired Service members.

The Panel also considered the testimony of active and retired military officers, judge advocates, legislators, academics, and victims who testified that it was vital for commanders to retain prosecutorial discretion. Proponents of the military justice system argued that the maintenance of good order and discipline, which is vital to mission-readiness, is the duty of commanders.[865] And, therefore, commanders must retain convening authority to remain credible leaders with the ability to administer justice and enforce values.[866] They also testified that commanders need prosecutorial discretion in order to create a command environment in which victims feel comfortable reporting crimes.[867]

Most of this testimony, whether from opponents or proponents of the current military justice system, was anecdotal. To develop empirical data points, the Panel reviewed Allied military justice systems and United States civilian justice systems to determine whether these systems faced problems with reporting sexual violence crimes similar to those seen in the military justice system.[868]

1. Alternative Allied and Civilian Justice Systems

The Panel reviewed Allied military justice systems that have removed prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command and placed it with independent military or civilian prosecutors. None of the military justice systems employed by our Allies was changed or set up to deal with the problem of sexual assault. Further, despite already making this fundamental change to their military justice systems, the evidence does not indicate that these Allies have seen any increase in sexual assault reporting or convictions due to this change.[869] In fact, despite removing prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command, Allied militaries face many of the same challenges as the U.S. military in preventing and responding to sexual assaults.[870]

Similarly, as previously noted, the Panel found that civilian jurisdictions face under-reporting challenges similar to those of the military.[871] Further, it is not clear that the criminal justice response in civilian jurisdictions—where prosecutorial decisions are supervised by elected or appointed lawyers—are any more effective at encouraging reporting of sexual assaults, or investigating and prosecuting these assaults when they are reported.[872] A recent White House report, describing the civilian sector, notes that "[a]cross all demographics, rapists and sex offenders are too often not made to pay for their crimes, and remain free to assault again. Arrest rates are low and meritorious cases are still being dropped—many times because law enforcement officers and prosecutors are not fully trained on the nature of these crimes or how best to investigate and prosecute them."[873] The White House report also highlighted low prosecution rates in the civilian sector and prosecution decisions that ignored the wishes of sexual assault survivors.[874] Often, prosecutors based charging decisions on whether "physical evidence connecting the suspect to the crime was present, if the suspect had a prior criminal record, and if there were no questions about the survivor's character or behavior."[875]

In short, arguments suggesting that there is an advantage to vesting prosecutorial discretion with independent civilian or military prosecutors, rather than convening authorities, have no empirical support.

2. Convening Authority Fairness and Objectivity

Criticism of the military justice system often confuses the term "commander" with the person authorized to convene courts-martial for serious violations of the UCMJ. These are not the same thing. Convening authorities consist of a very small group of the larger category of commanders. Only senior officers who occupy specific command positions are afforded special court-martial and general court-martial convening authority, and it is unlikely convening authorities will have personal knowledge or familiarity with either the victim or the accused.[876] Further, only a GCMCA is authorized to order trial by court-martial for any offense of rape, sexual assault, rape or sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, or attempts to commit these offenses. Subordinate officers, even when in positions of command, may not do so.

There are systemic checks in place to ensure unbiased disposition decisions; i.e., the convening authority is required to recuse himself or herself if the convening authority has an other than official interest in a case.[877] Also, as discussed previously, staff judge advocates have the legal authority under Article 6 of the UCMJ to raise concerns with judge advocates further up the chain of command.

Moreover, senior commanders vested with convening authority do not face an inherent conflict of interest when they convene courts-martial for sexual assault offenses allegedly committed by members of their command. As with leaders of all organizations, commanders often must make decisions that may negatively impact individual members of the organization when those decisions are in the best interest of the organization.[878]

3. Convening Authority Legal Training and Advice

Senior officers entrusted with convening authority receive military justice training in pre-command courses, as well as specific legal training conducted by judge advocate instructors.[879] In addition to military justice training, those relatively few senior commanders who also serve as convening authorities for sexual assault allegations do not make prosecutorial decisions in isolation. Convening authorities are required by law to receive advice from judge advocates before making these decisions. Nonetheless, the Secretary of Defense should ensure all officers preparing to assume senior command positions at the grade of O-6 and above receive dedicated legal training that fully prepares them to perform the duties and functions assigned to them under the UCMJ. [RSP Recommendation 38]

4. Anticipated Consequences of Removing Convening Authority

It is not clear what impact removing prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command would have on the organization, discipline, operational capability or effectiveness of the Armed Forces.[880] And as previously noted, the Panel received only anecdotal evidence that removing prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command would increase reporting or prosecution of sexual assaults.[881] But the notion that independent prosecutors are a panacea for sexual assault in the Armed Forces is misplaced. The evidence does not support a conclusion that removing the authority to convene courts-martial from senior commanders will reduce the incidence of sexual assault, increase reporting of sexual assaults, or improve the quality of investigations and prosecutions of sexual assaults, or increase the conviction rate in sexual assault cases in the Armed Forces.[882] Moreover, Allied military justice systems and civilian justice systems, which do not have a comparable entity to the convening authority, face similar reporting and prosecution problems as the U.S. military.

Accordingly, the Panel recommends that Congress not further limit the authority under the UCMJ to refer charges for sexual assault crimes to trial by court-martial beyond the recent amendments to the UCMJ and Department of Defense policy. [RSP Recommendation 37]

B. ASSESSMENT OF PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Congress has enacted significant amendments to the UCMJ to enhance the response to sexual assault in the military, and the DoD implemented numerous changes to policies and programs for the same purpose. Preliminary indicators demonstrated in recent reporting and prosecution trends appear encouraging. However, the FY14 NDAA reforms are not yet fully implemented and it will take time to assess their impact on sexual assault reporting and prosecution.

Four additional bills are currently pending in Congress that propose additional substantial systemic changes to the military justice system. Three of the pending bills are discussed below.[883]

1. Victims Protection Act (VPA) of 2014

On January 14, 2014, Senator Claire McCaskill (D-MO) filed the Victims Protection Act of 2014 (VPA), which provides additional enhancements to the Armed Forces' sexual assault prevention and response activities.[884] On March 10, 2014, the Senate unanimously passed the VPA.

Section 2 of the VPA would mandate Secretarial or higher convening authority review of referral decisions in addition to similar provisions Congress enacted in the FY14 NDAA.[885] If the staff judge advocate or the senior trial counsel recommends the convening authority refer a sex-related offense to trial by court-martial, and the convening authority does not do so, the case is forwarded to the Service Secretary for further review. In addition, if the staff judge advocate or senior trial counsel recommends the convening authority not refer a sex-related offense to trial by court-martial, and the convening authority agrees, the case is forwarded to the next higher general court-martial convening authority for review.[886]

The Panel recommends that Congress not enact Section 2 of the VPA. [RSP Recommendation 41] In addition to the Panel's concern, discussed earlier[887] about undue pressure on staff judge advocates and convening authorities when deciding whether to refer cases, the Panel believes the decision whether to refer a case to court-martial should continue to be a decision formed by the convening authority in consultation with his or her staff judge advocate. Most "senior trial counsel" assigned to cases are more junior and less experienced than the staff judge advocate advising the convening authority. Section 2 would inappropriately elevate the assessments of generally more junior judge advocates and would likely prove to be unproductive, unnecessary, and disruptive to ensuring the fair disposition of cases.

Section 3(b) of the VPA would require a consultation process for a sexual assault victim in the United States regarding his or her preference on prosecution by court-martial or the appropriate civilian jurisdiction. While not binding, the victim's preference would be entitled to "great weight" in determining prosecution forum. Should the victim prefer a civilian forum for prosecution and the civilian jurisdiction declines to prosecute, the victim must be "promptly" informed.[888]

The Panel recommends that Congress not enact Section 3(b) of the VPA. [RSP Recommendation 114] Jurisdiction is based on legal authority, not necessarily the victim's preferences. The decision whether civilian or military authorities will prosecute a case is routinely negotiated between the military and civilian authorities in cases with shared jurisdiction. In addition, the Panel did not receive evidence of problems with coordination between civilian prosecutors and military legal offices. In fact, the opposite appears to be true. There appears to be significant coordination and cooperation between military and civilian authorities with concurrent jurisdiction.

Forum selection should remain within the discretion of the civilian prosecutor's office and the Convening Authority.

Section 3(g) of the VPA would modify Military Rule of Evidence 404(a) regarding the character of the accused.[889] The provision prohibits the admission at trial of evidence of general military character to raise reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt. The proposal permits the admission of evidence of military character at trial when it is relevant to an element of an offense for which the accused has been charged. Therefore, the accused retains the ability to offer military character evidence so long as defense counsel establish a proper basis to demonstrate its relevance to an element of a charged offense.[890]

The Panel recommends that Congress should enact Section 3(g) of the VPA. The Panel believes that implementing this section may increase victim confidence, but does not recommend further changes to the military rules of evidence regarding character. [RSP Recommendation 121] The Panel cautions, however, that this change is unlikely to result in significant modification of current trial practice. Military and other character evidence properly remains relevant and admissible at trial as part of the accused's defense under appropriate circumstances, and can, on its own, raise reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt.

2. Sexual Assault Training Oversight and Prevention Act and the Military Justice Improvement Act of 2013

Representative Jackie Speier (D-CA) and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) have each filed bills in their respective chambers to remove commanders from serving as convening authorities. The primary feature of Representative Speier's proposal is removing commanders as convening authority for sex-related offenses.[891] Senator Gillibrand's proposal is broader and would remove commanders' authority to decide disposition of most "felony" offenses under the UCMJ.[892] Thus, the Military Justice Improvement Act (MJIA) would make a fundamental change to the structure and operation of the military justice system.

Representative Speier initially introduced the Sexual Assault Training Oversight and Prevention Act (STOP) in 2011 during the 112th Congress,[893] and re-introduced it as H.R. 1593 in 2013.[894] The STOP Act seeks to remove reporting, oversight, investigation and victim care of sexual assaults from the military chain of command and place jurisdiction in a newly created, autonomous Sexual Assault Oversight and Response Office.[895] In addition, the STOP Act would create a Sexual Assault Oversight and Response Council, composed primarily of civilians "independent from the chain of command within the Department of Defense," which would oversee the Sexual Assault Oversight and Response Office and appoint a Director of Military Prosecutions.[896] The Director of Military Prosecutions would have independent and final authority to oversee the prosecution of all sex-related offenses committed by a member of the Armed Forces, and to refer such cases to trial by courts-martial.[897] All other offenses under the UCMJ would remain under the current system. Congress has not enacted the STOP Act.[898]

On May 16, 2013, Senator Gillibrand introduced S. 967, the MJIA.[899] The Senate Armed Services Committee did not include the MJIA in the FY14 NDAA, so, on November 18, 2013, Senator Gillibrand filed an amended version of the MJIA.[900] The amendment addressed technical criticisms levied against S. 967 but retained the bill's primary feature of transferring convening authority for most serious crimes to independent, senior judge advocates.[901] The amendment was not enacted as part of the FY14 NDAA. On November 20, 2013, Senator Gillibrand filed the MJIA as a stand-alone bill, S. 1752, which remains pending in the Senate.

Under the MJIA, disposition authority for "covered offenses,"[902] including sexual assault and many other offenses that are not "excluded offenses,"[903] would no longer be vested in senior commanders in the chain of command who have authority to convene courts-martial. Instead, a new cadre of O-6 judge advocates with significant prosecutorial experience, assigned by the Chiefs of the Services who are independent of the chains of command of victims and those accused, would decide whether to refer charges to courts-martial.[904]

To that end, the MJIA requires each Service Chief or Commandant (for the Marine Corps and Coast Guard) to establish an office (Section 3(c) Office) to convene general and special courts-martial for covered offenses, and to detail members to those courts-martial, responsibilities assigned currently to those senior commanders serving as convening authorities.[905] The MJIA would also amend authority to convene general courts-martial to add two additional convening authorities: (1) officers in the Section 3(c) Office and (2) officers in the grade of O-6 or higher who are assigned such responsibility by the Service Chief or Commandant. This new convening authority would have authority with respect to the list of covered offenses.[906]

While the MJIA would create an entirely new office to convene general and special courts-martial for covered offenses, the MJIA includes a statutory restriction on the expenditure of additional resources and authorization of additional personnel to staff and operate that office. The Panel has serious concerns about the MJIA's restriction on additional expenditure and personnel, as resources are a primary issue for any legislation that creates additional structure.[907]

The evidence supports a conclusion that implementing the MJIA will require reassignment of O-6 judge advocates who meet the statutory prosecutor qualifications. The existing pool of O-6 judge advocates who meet these requirements is finite; and many of these officers routinely serve in assignments related to other important aspects of military legal practice. Therefore, implementing MJIA's mandate, absent an increase in personnel resources, may result in under-staffing of other important senior legal advisor positions.

For the same reasons the Panel concluded that Congress should not remove the authority to convene courts-martial from senior commanders,[908] the Panel does not recommend Congress adopt the reforms in either the STOP Act or the MJIA. [RSP Recommendation 36] In addition, proposals for systemic changes to the military justice system should be considered carefully in the context of the many changes that have recently been made to the form and function of the military justice system. The numerous and substantive changes recently enacted require time to be implemented and then assessed prior to enacting additional reforms.

Chapter Eleven:

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF PANEL MEMBERS

Response Systems Panel on Military Sexual Assault

Separate Statement of Dean Elizabeth L. Hillman & Mr. Harvey Bryant

June 22, 2014

Congress created the Response Systems Panel to make an independent assessment of the military's response to sexual assault. Perhaps no other aspect of military operations has generated worse outcomes in recent decades than military leaders' efforts to reduce and punish sexual assaults. The Panel's assessment revealed many improvements already in place and other areas in which changes should be made. Removing prosecutorial discretion from the chain of command, however, is not among the changes recommended by the Panel. We write separately because it should be.

Court-martial convening authorities, a small and high-ranking part of the military's command structure,[1] should no longer control the decision to prosecute sexual assault cases in the military justice system. The Panel's recommendation that the authority to prosecute remain within the command structure of the military is based on the testimony of high-ranking commanders and attorneys within the U.S. military. It neglects the words of survivors of sexual assault, rank-and-file Service members, outside experts, and officers in our allies' militaries. They tell us that the commander as prosecutor creates doubt about the fairness of military justice, has little connection to exercising legitimate authority over subordinates, and undermines the confidence of victims.[2] Preserving command authority over case disposition, pre-trial processes, and post-trial matters prevents commanding officers from acting assertively to deter and punish military sexual assault.[3] It also undermines the rights of both victims and accused Service members, all of whom deserve an independent and impartial tribunal.

Command authority in military justice has already been reduced significantly over time.[4] It will be further limited through recently enacted changes.[5] The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and many other countries have already ended command control of courts-martial.[6] When these nations proposed replacing convening authorities with experienced and trained prosecutors, opponents of reform voiced concerns about the deterioration of command similar to those articulated by some U.S. military leaders and accepted by our colleagues on the Panel.[7] Yet no country with independent prosecutors has reported any of the dire consequences forecast by those opposed to prosecutorial independence.[8]

Maintaining the status quo on this issue was often justified on the basis that there was no evidence changing it would increase victim reporting.[9] But increasing victim reporting rates, while an important goal, is not the only or even primary goal and benefit of having prosecutors and judges make, respectively, prosecutorial and judicial decisions rather than convening authorities. Even the suggestion of a pilot program to test the premises advanced on both sides of the issue, which would presumably result in evidence as to the efficacy of a change, was met with resistance.[10]

Requiring commanders to exercise prosecutorial discretion and perform judicial functions hinders their ability to respond vigorously and fairly to sexual assault.[11] It also exacerbates the negative impact of inevitable failures of commanders to fairly and objectively act as prosecutors and judges.[12] It rejects the independent prosecutors on whom every other criminal justice system—U.S. state and federal criminal courts, our allies' military courts, and international criminal courts—relies. As a result, the U.S. military justice system will continue to operate outside the constraints of 21st-century norms for fairness and transparency in criminal justice.[13] We dissent.

1 See RSP Report, Page 74 (providing the number of convening authorities across the branches of Service). Given that women make up fewer than 7% of flag officers in the U.S. military, despite being 15% of Service members overall today, means that not only are very few, high-ranking officers making decisions, almost all of those decisions are being made by men. See Defense Manpower Data Center, "Active Duty Military Personnel by Service Rank/Grade: April 2014," at, https://www.dmdc.osd.mil/appj/dwp/reports.do?category=reports&tsubCat=milActDutReg (reflecting the latest number of women in each Service, by rank, and the percentage of those who are female within the total force.). This is particularly problematic given the fact that service women are victims of sexual assault at higher rates than their male counterparts. See U.S. Dep't of Def., SAPRO, Department of Defense Annual Report on Sexual Assault in the Military, Fiscal Year 2013, Exhibit 17 at 90 (Apr. 15, 2014) available at http://sapr.mil/public/docs/reports/FY13_DoD_SAPRO_Annual_Report_on_Sexual_Assault.pdf. abuses. There is tremendous pressure on senior leaders to articulate zero tolerance policies and pass judgment on those merely accused of sexual assault. Even if command actions do not rise to the level of unlawful command influence, it contributes to an environment that unfairly prejudices an accused's right to a fair trial."); id. at 336-38 (testimony of Mr. Jack Zimmermann of Lavine, Zimmermann and Sampson, P.C., explaining how claims of unlawful command influence have arisen from recent training on sexual assault prevention and response).

12 The Panel's Report describes the uniqueness of command and the care with which commanders are "groomed" to make disposition decisions. No matter how rigorous the selection and vetting process for command, it cannot guarantee unbiased, impartial commanders, and it cannot make convening authorities into experienced prosecutors. Two recent examples demonstrate that some of these high ranking commanders engage in sexual misconduct themselves. See Alan Blinder, General in Sex Case to Retire With a 2-Rank Demotion, Jeffrey Sinclair to Receive Benefits, but at a Lower Level, New York Times (June 20, 2014)(explaining the sentence for an Army brigadier general convicted at court-martial for maltreatment and adultery will include retirement benefits, but at a different rank due to his "pattern of inappropriate and at time illegal behavior both while serving as a brigadier general and a colonel) available at http://www.nytimes.com/2014/06/21/us/general-in-sex-case-jeffrey-sinclair-to-retire-with-a-2-rank-demotion.html?_r=0; Craig Whitlock, Navy Reassigns ex-Blue Angels Commander after Complaint He Allowed Sexual Harassment, Wash. Additional Statement by

The Honorable Elizabeth Holtzman, Dean Elizabeth L. Hillman, & Ms. Mai Fernandez

The recommendations of this Panel cannot be understood in isolation. Fighting sexual assault in the military depends in the end on instilling among all Service members respect for others as equals. This goal, however, cannot be realized as long as women are still not treated equally in the military. Yes, much progress has taken place, but until women share fully in the responsibilities of military service in terms of the roles they are allowed to fill and the positions they hold, the message will be sent by the Armed Forces themselves that women are not equally capable and deserving of respect. This must change, and change quickly.

> One of the problems I had was, early on my command tried to get [the offender] moved to get us separated and no other command on base would take him. They didn't want to deal with it. [71] Transcript of RSP Public Meeting 96-97 (June 27, 2013) (testimony of Major General Gary S. Patton). The then Director, DoD SAPRO told the Panel that DoD's definition includes the following offenses under the current version of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ): rape, sexual assault, aggravated sexual contact, and abusive sexual contact under Article 120; forcible sodomy under article 125; and attempts to commit these offenses under Article 80. Id. at 97; see also DoD SAPRO June 2013 PowerPoint Presentation, supra note 19, at 5. The current version of Article 120 of the UCMJ became effective on June 28, 2012. The previous version of Article 120, which was in effect from 2007 to 2012, did not include a specific offense of "sexual assault." See Manual for Courts-Martial, United States pt. IV, ¶ 45 (2008 ed.) [hereinafter 2008 MCM].

For purposes of this report, CGIS is treated as an MCIO.

[76] DoD SAPRO FY13 Report supra note 66, at 45; Transcript of RSP Public Meeting 34-35 (Nov. 7, 2013) (testimony of Major General Patton). DoD SAPRO began reporting sexual assault statistics in calendar year 2005, but switched to a fiscal year reporting in 2007. As such, data from calendar and fiscal year reports are not equivalent. Additionally, reporting results for October 2006 to December 2006 are included in totals for both Calendar Year 2006 and Fiscal Year 2007. Department of Defense FY07 Report on Sexual Assault in the Military 4, 15 (Mar. 2008) [hereinafter DoD SAPRO FY07 Report], available at http://sapr.mil/public/docs/reports/2007-annual-report.pdf.

[77] DoD SAPRO sexual assault reporting data do not necessarily reflect the total number of reported sexual assaults that involve a military subject or military victim. See, DoD SAPRO FY13 Report, supra note 66, at 62. DoD maintains a separate system for tracking victims and perpetrators of domestic violence including spouse or intimate partner sexual violence which is tracked through the Family Advocacy Program (FAP) rather than DoD SAPRO. DoD initiated the Family Advocacy Program (FAP) over twenty years ago to support military families and to provide services for victims of domestic violence and child abuse. Domestic violence victims who are also victims of sexual assault are treated and supported by the FAP. In these cases, FAP does not record or track the sexual assaults in the same database maintained by the SAPR program and used to collect data for SAPRO's annual report to Congress about reported adult sexual assaults. Specifically, FAP tracks reports of spouses and adult children of Service members who are sexually assaulted by a spouse or intimate partner and children of Service members under the age of 17 who are sexually assaulted by any offender. These cases must be accounted for when assessing the full scope of sexual assault in DoD. The Secretary of Defense should direct that the annual DoD SAPRO report of adult sexual assault cases include the reports handled by FAP and recorded in its database. [RSP Recommendation 41]

[78] DoD SAPRO FY13 Report, supra note 66, at 62.

[79] In the FY05 NDAA, supra note 65, Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to review the UCMJ and the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM) to determine what changes were required to improve the military justice system's handling of sexual assault and to conform the UCMJ and MCM more closely to other Federal laws and regulations that address such issues. At the time of that review, Article 120 of the UCMJ simply covered rape (sexual intercourse between a man and woman by force and without consent) and carnal knowledge (sexual intercourse with a child under 16). 2012 Manual for Courts-Martial, United States, app. 27 (2012 ed.) [hereinafter 2012 MCM]. In 2006, Congress comprehensively reformed Article 120 into a far more expansive punitive article through the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2006 (FY06 NDAA). See National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2006, Pub. L. No. 109-163, § 552, 119 Stat. 3134 (2006) (expanding Article 120 to cover: (a) rape, (b) rape of a child, (c) aggravated sexual assault, (d) aggravated sexual assault of a child, (e) aggravated sexual contact, (f) aggravated sexual abuse of a child, (g) aggravated sexual contact with a child, (h) abusive sexual contact, (i) abusive sexual contact with a child, (j) indecent liberty with a child, (k) indecent act, (l) forcible pandering, (m) wrongful sexual contact, and (n) indecent exposure.). The revised Article 120 received a great deal of criticism and some provisions were ultimately successfully challenged on constitutional grounds. See United States v. Prather, 69 M.J. 338, 343-45 (C.A.A.F. 2011); see also United States v. Medina, 69 M.J. 462, 464 (C.A.A.F. 2011) ("In this court's recent opinion in Prather, we analyzed the shifting burdens found in Article 120(t)(16), UCMJ, and held that the statutory interplay among Article 120(c)(2), UCMJ, Article 120(t)(14), UCMJ, and Article 120(t)(16), UCMJ, resulted in an unconstitutional burden shift to an accused.") (citing Prather, 69 M.J. at 343). This led Congress to again revise the framework for prosecuting sexual assaults. FY12 NDAA streamlined Article 120 to cover only adult offenses; it separated out sexual offenses against children and other non-contact sexual misconduct like voyeurism and indecent exposure. In addition to restructuring Article 120, Congress also adopted seven additional provisions targeted at improving sexual assault prevention and response in the Armed Forces in the FY12 NDAA. FY12 NDAA, supra note 7, §§ 542, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 125. The following year, in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (FY13 NDAA, supra note 1), Congress included twelve sexual assault related provisions.

[179] In response to RSP Request for Information 39, the Navy stated that "[t]he reasons unrestricted reports do not result in a commander's ability to take action include the offender is unknown, offender is a civilian not subject to military jurisdiction, civilian authorities prosecute the military offender, the victim declines to participate, the evidence is insufficient or the allegation is unfounded." Navy's Response to RSP Request for Information 39 (Nov. 21, 2013). [181] The Services provided data summaries of sexual assault crime prosecutions for the Panel's consideration. However, comparing data among the Services or with other jurisdictions is difficult, since Service calculation methodologies do not align with each other or with DoD SAPRO reports. Service representatives suggested a number of reasons for these differences. Transcript of RSP Public Meeting 208 (Dec. 12, 2013) (testimony of Lieutenant Colonel Erik Coyne, Special Counsel to The Judge Advocate General, U.S. Air Force) ("One of the other unique differences, I think most of us, the investigating–so the MCIO, Air Force OSI does not unsubstantiate any of our cases. So, before – so, our commanders get all of our cases to adjudicate, which I think it gets factored in when you look at – and I use this very subjectively ... but the type of case that is presented. If you have an investigative agency that said no, we unsubstantiate this [like the Army's procedure], so you're only being presented with substantiated cases, I think you get a different type of case."). Cf. id. at 221-22 (testimony of Colonel Michael Mulligan, Chief, Criminal Law Division, Office of The Judge Advocate General, U.S. Army) ("Founding is a probable cause determination. The commander [in the Army] does not have a role in founding or unfounding of a case. Lawyers in coordination with investigating agencies, CID for the Army, make that determination. And it is a permanent law enforcement record.") The Comparative Systems Subcommittee assessed that the Army reports a higher prosecution rate than the other Services because the convening authority is only considering cases that an attorney and MCIO investigator previously determined had probable cause, so there is a greater probability the convening authority will take some adverse action on those cases. For instance, in FY12, 118 out of 476 cases were closed by the Army CID for lack of probable cause, and the convening authority only considered 358 cases. Since an attorney already determined there was reason to believe an offense had been committed, those cases were more likely to be prosecuted, resulting in a higher prosecution rate (number of courts-martial divided by 358). If the Army's prosecution rate was based on all 476 possible cases, the prosecution rate would likely have been lower (number of courts-martial divided by 476). The Air Force and Navy MCIOs, on the other hand, presented all cases to the commander, and divided the number of cases preferred by all sexual assault cases, resulting in a lower percentage. See CSS Report to RSP, Annex, infra, at 90-91.

[291] As a retired senior Air Force commander explained to the RSP, "[t]here is no process in our society that is easier to execute than removing a commander. That person's superior only has to say: 'I have lost confidence in your ability to command this organization.' That's it." Transcript of RSP Public Meeting 105 (Jan. 30, 2013) (testimony of General (Retired) Roger A. Brady, U.S. Air Force); see also Transcript of RSP Role of the Commander Subcommittee Meeting 211 (Nov. 20, 2013) (testimony of Lieutenant General Howard B. Bromberg, Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, U.S. Army, noting Army's standard for relief for cause of commander is loss of trust and confidence in subordinate's ability to perform his or her job). A Marine commander explained to the Subcommittee that commander reliability and accountability go hand-in hand: "We can be relied on by our seniors . . . so we can be relieved by our seniors, and we can relieve our subordinates, too." Id. at 235 (testimony of Colonel Robin A. Gallant, Commanding Officer, Headquarters and Service Battalion Quantico, U.S. Marine Corps).

[294] Article 92 of the UCMJ criminalizes failure to obey a lawful order, as well as willful or negligent dereliction of duty, which includes failure to obey the statutory obligations related to the reporting and resolution of sexual assault reports. Article 98 of the UCMJ criminalizes noncompliance with procedural rules in the UCMJ. Articles 133 and 134 are more general in nature; they proscribe other conduct that is "unbecoming an officer" or that is "prejudicial to good order and discipline" or "of a nature to bring discredit upon the Armed Forces," such as obstruction of justice or interference with administrative proceedings. 10 U.S.C. §§ 892, 898, 933, 934 (UCMJ arts. 92, 98, 133, 134).

[295] Commanders may receive administrative correction from their superiors, such as a letter of reprimand or admonishment. As described above, poor performance may be documented on the commander's evaluation and fitness report. An officer who has been selected for promotion to the next higher grade may be recommended for a promotion delay or removal from the promotion list, which elevates review of the officer's capacity to serve in the higher grade to the Service Secretary. Officer promotions and selection for higher command are extremely competitive, and any indicators in an officer's record that reflect negatively on his or her performance in command will undoubtedly impact the officer's prospect for future promotion or command selection.

[296] The Services have different interpretations of the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. § 552a and the implications of administrative actions that hold commanders accountable. The Service policies for releasing or publicizing instances where commanders are relieved differ substantially. For example, the Navy publicizes when and why a commander is relieved for cause, while the Air Force and Army generally release information only if the commander is a general officer or the incident receives substantial public interest. See RoC Subcommittee Report to RSP, Annex, infra, at 130.

[344] If a report is made in the course of otherwise privileged communications, chaplains are not required to disclose they have received a report of a sexual assault. Id., encl. 4, ¶ 1.b(3).

[345] Chaplains and legal assistance attorneys have protected communications with victims, but they do not take reports. See id. They confer with victims and may help direct them to a SARC to assess their reporting options.

[346] No commander or convening authority may refuse to forward an allegation or impede an investigation. Any attempt to do so would constitute a dereliction of duty or obstruction of justice, in violation of the UCMJ. DoD policy indicates that MCIOs should honor a victim's choice to decline to participate in an investigation. DoDI 6495.02, encl. 4, ¶ 1.c(1).

[347] See id.

[348] See also id., encl. 4, ¶ 1.e(1) ("A victim's communication with another person (e.g., roommate, friend, family member) does not, in and of itself, prevent the victim from later electing to make a Restricted Report. Restricted Reporting is confidential, not anonymous, reporting. However, if the person to whom the victim confided the information (e.g., roommate, friend, family member) is in the victim's officer and non-commissioned officer chain of command or DoD law enforcement, there can be no Restricted Report.").

[349] Chaplains, Legal Personnel, members of the chain of command or supervisory chain, and law enforcement do not intake reports for purposes of SAPR reporting. Supervisors and leaders are trained to immediately contact their servicing SARC or VA, who will advise the victim of available services and options and document victim preferences on the DD Form 2910.

[350] Outcry in the course of otherwise privileged communications does not eliminate the restricted reporting option. "In the course of otherwise privileged communications with a chaplain or legal assistance attorney, a victim may indicate that he or she wishes to file a Restricted Report. If this occurs, a chaplain and legal assistance attorney shall facilitate contact with a SARC or SAPR VA to ensure that a victim is offered SAPR services and so that a DD Form 2910 can be completed. A chaplain or legal assistance attorney cannot accept a Restricted Report." See DoDI 6495.02, encl. 4, ¶ 1.b(3).

[351] Legal assistance attorneys, like chaplains, have privileged communications with clients. They are expected to facilitate contact with a SARC or VA if a victim expresses interest in filing a restricted report, but do not intake reports themselves.

Their work is also observed by a more seasoned volunteer. The YWCA also holds monthly in-house training meetings for advocates. Transcript of RSP Victim Services Subcommittee Meeting 354, 360 (Feb. 26, 2014) (testimony of Ms. Patricia Haist, Director, Clinical Services, YWCA West Central, Grand Rapids, Michigan). For example, the Philadelphia SVU uses nine percent as a benchmark, and does an in-depth review if the unfounded rate goes into the double digits. Id. The Baltimore Police Department adopted a similar practice after discovering that "more than 30 percent of the cases investigated each year were determined by officers to be false or baseless . . . five times the national average." Both Philadelphia and Baltimore detectives said this required culture change regarding measuring success – they had to accept a lower number of closed, unfounded cases, and adjust to having a higher number of open cases.

[557] In 1946, while serving as the Army Chief of Staff, General Dwight D. Eisenhower wrote to the Acting Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee that the grave responsibility of commanders "can be fully discharged only by the exercise of commensurate authority without which the effectiveness of the commander will be seriously impaired." General Eisenhower asserted his confidence that other experienced combat commanders would agree that "any other system would produce ruinous results." Letter from General Dwight D. Eisenhower, U.S. Army, to Acting Chairman Dewey Short (June 30, 1947), reprinted in Hearings Before Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives on Sundry Legislation Affecting the Naval and Military Establishments 1947, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 4157-58 (1947).

[558] The Committee addressed such testimony in its report as follows:

> We fully agreed that such a provision might be desirable if it were practicable, but we are of the opinion that it is not practicable. We cannot escape the fact that the law which we are now writing will be as applicable and must be as workable in time of war as in time of peace, and, regardless of any desires which may stem from an idealistic conception of justice, we must avoid the enactment of provisions which will unduly restrict those who are responsible for the conduct of our military operations. Our conclusions in this respect are contrary to the recommendations of numerous capable and respected witnesses who testified before our committee, but the responsibility for the choice was a matter which had to be resolved according to the dictates of our own conscience and judgment.

[599] A staff judge advocate is a senior military attorney who serves as the principal legal advisor of a command. 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 103(17), R.C.M. 105(a). Staff judge advocates to GCMCAs are typically in the grade of O-5 or O-6. See Transcript of RSP Public Meeting 244 (June 27, 2013) (testimony of Captain Robert Crow, U.S. Navy, Joint Service Committee Representative).

[600] The discussion to R.C.M. 406 provides that a staff judge advocate will use a probable cause standard of proof in assessing whether the allegation of each offense is warranted by the evidence in the report of investigation. The case file must include: the preferral of charges, reports of MCIO investigations and Article 32 reports, the written advice of the staff judge advocate to the convening authority, a written statement explaining the reasons for the convening authority's decision not to refer any charges for trial by court-martial, and certification of compliance with victim rights and the victim's statements to the MCIO, chain of command, and convening authority.

[615] See Services' Responses to RSP Requests for Information 69 (Nov. 21, 2013) (stating consistently that there is no formal written requirement but that they each follow general policies requiring communication between staff judge advocates and convening authorities). If the charges are forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority, the staff judge advocate must provide written advice on the legal sufficiency of the charges and a recommended disposition as to the charges pursuant to Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Courts-Martial 406. See 10 U.S.C. § 834; 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 406. The general court-martial convening authority can then refer the charges to a court-martial or dismiss the charges and no further written documentation is required. Additionally, Rule 604 contemplates a written declination for cases that have been withdrawn and are re-referred. See 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 604. Withdrawal does not automatically require written justification; however, in the event that the charges are later referred to another court-martial, the discussion to Rule for Court-Martial 604 suggests that the reasons for the withdrawal and later referral should be included in the record of the later court-martial. Id. disc.

[624] A retired Air Force judge advocate and former senior representative from the Department of Defense Office of the General Counsel described the challenge in assessing member availability based on competing military interests, particularly in times or locations of active military operations. Since once assembled, the duty as a member of the court takes priority over all other duties, he observed that panel service "[impacts] the fighting force available at the tip of the [spear]. [632] A defense counsel from the Navy told the RSP that this can impact trial preparation for the defense and the speedy trial rights of an accused: "The Government is able to use consultant and expert witness, essentially from preferral. But if the defense asks for an expert consultant . . . we have to wait until it's referred to trial . . . . We can't use a consultant prior to that unless we can convince the convening authority to give us one." Id. at 402 (testimony of Commander Don King, Director, DCAP, U.S. Navy).

[634] Section 1704 applies to any allegation of a violation of Articles 120, 120a, 120b, 120c, 125, or attempts to commit any of these offenses under Article 80 of the UCMJ.

[637] 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 503(b)(1).

[638] The only possible exception to this would be instances in which a court-martial is convened by the Service Secretary, the Secretary of Defense, or the President.

[639] 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(D).

[640] For an earlier study, see U.S. DEP'T OF THE ARMY, MILITARY JUSTICE REVIEW (2004), currently available at http://responsesystemspanel.whs.mil/index.php/meetings/meetings-panel-sessions-2/20131107-5/roc-20140312?highlight=WyJtaWxpdGFyeSBqdXN0aWNlIHJldmlld3Jd. The Army's 2004 study included a detailed analysis and recommendation to insert the military judge earlier in the military justice process. The Army study provided this summary of their proposed change:

> Although the court-martial itself does not come into existence prior to referral, every case has a life of its own that begins at the time of the alleged offense, and significant legal issues arise prior to referral. This proposal recognizes that a military judge could play an important supervisory role in the military justice process prior to referral of charges. While commanders and convening authorities will continue to make all critical decisions in the case: preferral, level of referral,[be responsible for] funding witnesses and experts, and clemency, this proposal will relieve the Special Court-Martial Convening Authorities (SPCMCA) and General Court-Martial Convening Authorities (GCMCA) from the burden of making essentially judicial decisions on other matters.

[643] Some civilian defense attorneys use sex offender risk assessments at various stages of proceedings, including during plea bargain negotiations. These assessments can help promote rehabilitation and prevent recidivism by identifying appropriate therapy.

[644] Colin A. Kisor, The Need for Sentencing Reform in Military Courts-martial, 58 Naval L. Rev. 39 (2009), explains the plea process in the military as follows:

> During a judge-alone guilty plea with a pretrial agreement, a military judge conducts a "providence inquiry" to ensure the defendant is really guilty, and announces a sentence without knowing the punishment limitations of the pretrial agreement between the defendant and the officer convening the court-martial. If the military judge (or the members in a members' sentencing case with a pretrial agreement) adjudges less time than the confinement cap in the pretrial agreement, the defendant "beats the deal" and receives only what the sentencing authority has adjudged. On the other hand, if the judge sentences the defendant to more confinement time than contained in the agreement, the excess is typically either suspended or disapproved. A military judge is not permitted to remedy a pretrial agreement he perceives as too lenient but may make a clemency recommendation to the Convening Authority to reduce an adjudged sentence.

Id. at 46 (referring to R.C.M. 910(f)(3) and 1106(d)(3)).

[645] The convening authority's ability to enter into certain terms of a pretrial agreement will be limited based on statutory changes to Articles 18 and 60 of the UCMJ. See FY14 NDAA, supra note 4, at § 1702.

[649] 18 U.S.C. § 3771. The Crime Victims' Rights Act was enacted in October 2004 as part of the Justice for All Act. It provides victims eight rights in federal criminal cases: (1) The right to be reasonably protected from the accused; (2) The right to reasonable, accurate, and timely notice of any public court proceeding or any parole proceeding involving the crime, or of any release or escape of the accused; (3) The right not to be excluded from any such public court proceeding, unless the court, after receiving clear and convincing evidence, determines that testimony by the victim would be materially altered if the victim heard other testimony at that proceeding; (4) The right to be reasonably heard at any public proceeding in the district court involving release, plea, sentencing, or any parole proceeding; (5) The reasonable right to confer with the attorney for the Government in the case; (6) The right to full and timely restitution as provided in law; (7) The right to proceedings free from unreasonable delay; (8) The right to be treated with fairness and with respect for the victim's dignity and privacy.

[684] Major General (Retired) Kenneth J. Hodson, former Judge Advocate General of the Army, testified before the 1983 Commission, in part, as follows:

> I dealt with many convening authorities, and none have ever complained of the findings of a court, but many have been upset by the sentence . . . Incidentally, I have never had a convening authority complain about a sentence imposed by a judge . . . Sentences adjudged by court members are adjudged pretty much in ignorance, and they tend to vary widely for the same or similar offenses. They amount almost to sentencing by lottery.

[689] Sentencing complexity may be one reason: In the military, all known offenses committed by an accused may be tried at the same time, even if the offenses are not related to each other in any way. 2012 MCM, supra note 79, R.C.M. 307(c)(4) ("Charges and specifications alleging all known offenses by an accused may be preferred at the same time."). Further, punishments not available in civilian courts include: reprimand; reduction in pay grade; restriction to specified limits; hard labor without confinement; and punitive separation. See id., R.C.M. 1006, R.C.M. 1007. Punishments typically available in the civilian setting include: the death penalty; incarceration; probation (remain at liberty but subject to certain conditions and restrictions such as drug testing or drug treatment); fines; and restitution. See Bureau of Justice Statistics, "The Justice System: What Is the Sequence of Events in the Criminal Justice System: Sentencing and Sanctions," available at http://www.bjs.gov/content/justsys.cfm#sentencing.

[729] 10 U.S.C. § 854(e) (UCMJ art. 54(e)). It merits noting that records of trial are only provided by statute to victims of offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ who testified at trial. Other victims of crime normally must request a copy of the proceedings under the Freedom of Information Act, as the UCMJ does not provide for mandatory copies of the authenticated record of trial to assist in preparation of matters for submission to the clemency authority.

[736] Unlike civilian jurisdictions, the accused in a court-martial benefits from the lower of the adjudged punishment or the agreed-upon punishment in a pretrial agreement. The authority vested in convening authorities under Article 60 of the UCMJ permits them to reduce sentencing terms in an adjudged sentence to comply with provisions of pretrial agreements limiting sentencing terms. Under Section 1702(b), a convening authority may not commute a mandatory minimum sentence except to reduce a mandatory dishonorable discharge to a bad-conduct discharge. FY14 NDAA, supra note 4, § 1702(b).

[738] Section 572(a)(2) of the FY13 NDAA also requires initiation of administrative discharge proceedings against any Service member who is convicted of a covered offense (rape or sexual assault under Article 120, forcible sodomy under Article 125, or an attempt to commit one of these offenses under Article 80) and not punitively discharged. Ms. Mosley testified as follows:

> [O]ne of the things that I was asked was the relative level of experience of prosecutors handling these [sexual assault] cases. . . . [It] is just so varied. I mean, you would think that, obviously, promising practices would dictate that it would be a more seasoned prosecutor who has had some experience, has a certain number of trials and felonies, had maybe chiefed or supervised somebody in the misdemeanor division before going to a felony. But many offices across the country many people think are large urban offices and they are not. Many of the prosecutors that we have seen that come to training are in two- and three- person offices. There are, obviously, some that are very structured like New York and Houston, and Dallas, and large urban areas. But the majority of prosecutors' offices out there for state and local prosecutors are these smaller offices in rural areas. So, we get technical assistance requests constantly from a person who doesn't have trial experience and they have got the felony.

It really does, it depends on the individual, their passions."); id. at 186 (commentary of Ms. Rhonnie Jaus, RSP Comparative Systems Subcommittee Member). Ms. Jaus stated as follows:

> I also think it was unrealistic for them to conclude the other prosecutors that there was very little burn [out]. I think that is crazy. I have been doing this as a prosecutor for 30 years. I ran the sex crimes division for like 25. There is burnout. People get burned out. I mean, it is crazy to think they don't. People leave the job. Not everyone stays or else there would never be any movement. But I think that some people are, as Candace [Mosley] is saying, [there are prosecutors who] are incredibly committed and passionate, but there are people who do burn out and I think that it is the same as the military.

[748] At JBLM, the Army created a consolidated facility with representatives from Army CID, as well as a Special Victim Prosecutor, SARC, Victim Advocate, and the Special Victim Counsel, and Sexual Assault Care Coordinator. The sexual assault forensic exam takes place at Madigan Army Medical Center located on JBLM. Victims are not required to go to the consolidated facility for services. The facility is arranged so that a victim who makes a restricted report to the SARC or VA will not come into contact with those on the criminal justice side (investigators and prosecutors) unless the victim decides to convert his or her report to an unrestricted one. See Minutes of RSP Comparative Systems Subcommittee Preparatory Session, JBLM (Feb. 5, 2014) (on file at RSP).

[749] For example, while visiting Dawson Place, Subcommittee members observed a multidisciplinary meeting where both the SANE and victim advocate offered solutions to the prosecutor to deal with a witness cooperation problem in a pending case unrelated to the services they provided to the victim. See Minutes of RSP Comparative Systems Subcommittee Preparatory Session, Everett, WA (Feb. 6, 2014) (on file at RSP).

[750] In accordance with the victim advocate-victim privilege found in Military Rule of Evidence 514(a),"[a] victim has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing a confidential communication made between the alleged victim and a victim advocate, in a case arising under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, if such communication was made for the purpose of facilitating advice or supportive assistance to the alleged victim." 2012 MCM, supra note 79, M.R.E. 514. However, the rule provides an exception that there is no privilege under the rule "when admission or disclosure of a communication is constitutionally required." Id., M.R.E. 514(d)(6). If the victim advocate and prosecutor are co-located and have such a close working relationship, the victim advocate may be associated as part of the prosecutor team, in which case the prosecutor has a duty to turn over any exculpatory evidence as a constitutional right of the accused. *Cf. A dedicated group of SANEs are on call and conduct examinations of survivors. Id. In 2010, Travis County went beyond the State's 96 hour period for obtaining a forensic exam and expanded it to 120 hours, or 5 days. Id. Jenny Black, the County's SANE Coordinator explained, "It lets us expand our services to care for more people. It helps them into the system where there's a lot of follow up and a lot of care as well as the medical services that we provide and collecting of evidence for criminal prosecution, so it's helpful in a lot of ways." Id.

[755] In accordance with the victim advocate-victim privilege found in Military Rule of Evidence 514(a) ,"[a] victim has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing a confidential communication made between the alleged victim and a victim advocate, in a case arising under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, if such communication was made for the purpose of facilitating advice or supportive assistance to the alleged victim." 2012 MCM, supra note 79, M.R.E. 514. However, the rule provides an exception that there is no privilege under the rule "when admission or disclosure of a communication is constitutionally required." Id., M.R.E. 514(d)(6). If the victim advocate and prosecutor are co-located and have such a close working relationship, the victim advocate may be associated as part of the prosecutor team, in which case the prosecutor has a duty to turn over any exculpatory evidence as a constitutional right of the accused. Therefore, to avoid possible litigation of this issue, it is necessary to build a Chinese wall between the victim advocate and prosecutor. Cf. The Joint Service Committee's analysis indicates "constitutionally required" exception would be satisfied only in extraordinary circumstances, where the accused could show harm of constitutional magnitude if such communication was not disclosed." The JSC states,

> In drafting the "constitutionally required" exception, the Committee intended that the communication covered by the privilege would be released only in the narrow circumstances where the accused could show harm of constitutional magnitude if such communication was not disclosed. In practice, this relatively high standard of release is not intended to invite a fishing expedition for possible statements made by the victim, nor is it intended to be an exception that effectively renders the privilege meaningless.

Really, there is no such thing.").

[777] A public defender from the Washington, D.C. Public Defender's Office told the RSP:

> But as far as investigators are concerned, some lawyers share an investigator with just one other lawyer or some have their own specific investigator. And I was lucky enough to have my own specific investigator for awhile. I share one now. But it makes it much easier in terms of being able to defend our clients finding out that you could throw away all your kind of subjective beliefs about your client's guilt or innocence and then you do investigation and you investigate no matter how much bad evidence there seemingly is. You find out that there are some things – sometimes complainants do not tell the truth. So, you know, one word I kind of bristle at when I hear it all the time from I guess panels that are supposedly objective is the word "victim." When we talk about pre- trial matters that have not resulted in conviction or that have not resulted in the guilty plea, we deal with complainants, because a lot of times we understand that alleged victims aren't victims at all when we investigate and even the government finds out before we do that things have been made up. So I think that just reemphasizes the importance of having investigators and having all the different aspects of the case, whether or not it's legal or on the field, done in order to have a decent – not only a decent, but a zealous defense.

[889] There may be a misperception surrounding the manner by which character evidence can be introduced in courts-martial. Civilian and military rules about introducing character evidence in criminal trials are nearly identical, and both permit admission of relevant character evidence at trial. Consistently, military courts have broadly interpreted the evidentiary rule to permit a Service member to seek to admit good military character evidence as part of his or her defense.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2014

SECTION 1722. ADVANCEMENT OF SUBMITTAL DEADLINE FOR REPORT OF INDEPENDENT PANEL ON ASSESSMENT OF MILITARY RESPONSE SYSTEMS TO SEXUAL ASSAULT.

SECTION 576(C)(1)(B) OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2013 (PUBLIC LAW 112-239; 126 STAT. 1759) IS AMENDED BY STRIKING "EIGHTEEN MONTHS" AND INSERTING "TWELVE MONTHS".

SEC. 1731. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(a) ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR RESPONSE SYSTEMS PANEL.—

(1) ADDITIONAL ASSESSMENTS SPECIFIED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under subsection (a)(1) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112-239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "response systems panel", shall conduct the following:

(A) An assessment of the impact, if any, that removing from the chain of command any disposition authority regarding charges preferred under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), would have on overall reporting and prosecution of sexual assault cases.

(B) An assessment regarding whether the roles, responsibilities, and authorities of Special Victims' Counsel to provide legal assistance under section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, to victims of alleged sex-related offenses should be expanded to include legal standing to represent the victim during investigative and military justice proceedings in connection with the prosecution of the offense.

(C) An assessment of the feasibility and appropriateness of extending to victims of crimes covered by chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), the right afforded a crime victim in civilian criminal legal proceedings under subsection (a)(4) of section 3771 of title 18, United States Code, and the legal standing to seek enforcement of crime victim rights provided by subsection (d) of such section.

(D) An assessment of the means by which the name, if known, and other necessary identifying information of an alleged offender that is collected as part of a restricted report of a sexual assault could be compiled into a protected, searchable database accessible only to military criminal investigators, Sexual Assault Response Coordinators, or other appropriate personnel only for the purposes of identifying individuals who are subjects of multiple accusations of sexual assault and encouraging victims to make an unrestricted report of sexual assault in those cases in order to facilitate increased prosecutions, particularly of serial offenders. The assessment should include an evaluation of the appropriate content to be included in the database, as well as the best means to maintain the privacy of those making a restricted report.

(E) As part of the comparison of military and civilian systems for the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes, as required by subsection (d)(1)(B) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, an assessment of the opportunities for clemency provided in the military and civilian systems, the appropriateness of clemency proceedings in the military system, the manner in which clemency is used in the military system, and whether clemency in the military justice system could be reserved until the end of the military appeals process.

(F) An assessment of whether the Department of Defense should promulgate, and ensure the understanding of and compliance with, a formal statement of what accountability, rights, and responsibilities a member of the Armed Forces has with regard to matters of sexual assault prevention and response, as a means of addressing those issues within the Armed Forces. If the response systems panel recommends such a formal statement, the response systems panel shall provide key elements or principles that should be included in the formal statement.

(2) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The response systems panel shall include the results of the assessments required by paragraph (1) in the report required by subsection (c)(1) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, as amended by section 1722.

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE
1600 DEFENSE PENTAGON
WASHINGTON, DC 20301-1600

GENERAL COUNSEL

SEP - 4 2013

The Honorable Barbara S. Jones
Chair, Response Systems Panel
Response Systems Panel

Dear Judge Jones:

Once again, I would like to thank you and the other members of the Response Systems Panel for assisting the Department in addressing the problem of sexual assault in the military. I understand from my staff that the Panel's work is well underway and that resources are being provided to assist the Panel with this very important endeavor.

On behalf of the Secretary of Defense, I am writing to request that the Response Systems Panel, in addition to its statutory requirement to evaluate sentencing guidelines, study the advisability of adopting mandatory minimum sentences for the most serious sexual assault offenses, including rape and sodomy. Additionally, the Department requests that the Panel assess the possible collateral consequences of such mandatory minimum sentences (including likely effects on sexual assault reporting, the ratio of guilty pleas to contested cases, and conviction rates). Finally, if the Panel proposes mandatory minimum sentences, I request that the Panel also address whether Congress should establish such mandatory minimums itself or should authorize the President to do so.

Please let me know if there are any additional resources the Panel needs to ensure it can accomplish its taskings.

Sincerely,

Robert S. Taylor
Acting

Charter

Authority: The Secretary of Defense, as required by Section 576(a)(1) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 ("the FY 2013 NDAA") (Public Law 112-239) and in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA) (5 U.S.C., Appendix, as amended) and 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.50(a), established the Response Systems Panel.

3. Objectives and Scope of Activities: The Response Systems Panel will conduct an independent review and assessment of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate crimes involving adult sexual assault and related offenses, under 10 U.S.C. § 920 (Article 120, Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ)), for the purpose of developing recommendations regarding how to improve the effectiveness of such systems.

4. Description of Duties: Section 576(d)(1) of the FY 2013 NDAA provides that in conducting a systems review and assessment, the Response Systems Panel shall provide recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of crimes involving adult sexual assault and related offenses, under 10 U.S.C. § 920 (Article 120 of the UCMJ). Additionally, Section 1731(a) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 ("the FY 2014 NDAA") (Public Law 113-66) established additional tasks. The Response Systems Panel's review shall include the following:

   a. Using criteria the Response Systems Panel considers appropriate, an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the systems, including the administration of the UCMJ, and the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes during the period 2007 through 2011.

   b. A comparison of military and civilian systems for the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes. This comparison shall include an assessment of differences in providing support and protection to victims, and the identification of civilian best practices that may be incorporated into any phase of the military system. It shall also include an assessment of the opportunities for clemency provided in the military and civilian systems, the appropriateness of clemency proceedings in the military system, the manner in which clemency is used in the military system, and whether clemency in the military justice system could be reserved until the end of the military appeals process.

   c. An assessment of advisory sentencing guidelines used in civilian courts in adult sexual assault cases and whether it would be advisable to promulgate sentencing guidelines for use in courts-martial. Such assessment should include a study of the advisability of adopting mandatory minimum sentences for the most serious sexual assault offenses, including rape and sodomy, and the possible collateral consequences of such mandatory minimum sentences (including likely effects on sexual assault reporting, the ratio of guilty pleas to contested cases, and conviction rates). If the Response Systems Panel proposes mandatory minimum sentences, it should address whether Congress should establish such mandatory minimums itself or authorize the President to do so.

j. An assessment regarding whether the roles, responsibilities, and authorities of Special Victims' Counsel to provide legal assistance under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e, as added by Section 1716 of the FY 2014 NDAA, to victims of alleged sex-related offenses should be expanded to include legal standing to represent the victim during investigative and military justice proceedings in connection with the prosecution of the offense.

k. An assessment of the feasibility and appropriateness of extending to victims of crimes covered by the UCMJ, the rights afforded a crime victim in civilian criminal legal proceedings under 18 U.S.C. § 3771(a)(4), and the legal standing to seek enforcement of crime victim rights provided by 18 U.S.C. § 3771(d).

l. An assessment of the means by which the name, if known, and other necessary identifying information of an alleged offender that is collected as part of a restricted report of a sexual assault could be compiled into a protected, searchable database accessible only to military criminal investigators, Sexual Assault Response Coordinators, or other appropriate personnel only for the purposes of identifying individuals who are subjects of multiple accusations of sexual assault and encouraging victims to make an unrestricted report of sexual assault in those cases in order to facilitate increased prosecutions, particularly of serial offenders. The assessment should include an evaluation of the appropriate content to be included in the database, as well as the best means to maintain the privacy of those making a restricted report.

Appendix D:
PANEL METHODOLOGY

To conduct its required assessments and reviews, the Response Systems Panel and its subcommittees used a variety of methods to gather information for Panel consideration. The Panel and its subcommittees held meetings to hear witnesses; conducted site visits at military installations and civilian agencies; requested information from the Department of Defense (DoD), the Services, and victim advocacy organizations; and reviewed publicly available information, data, and articles, in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972.[1]

A designated federal officer, appointed by the Acting General Counsel of the DoD, attended all Panel and subcommittee meetings and ensured Panel activities complied with statutory mandates, governing regulations, and Department of Defense policies and procedures.

SUBCOMMITTEE FORMATION

To assist the Panel in completing its task in the twelve months allotted by Congress, the Secretary of Defense, at the Panel Chair's request, established three subcommittees: Role of the Commander; Comparative Systems; and Victim Services. Each subcommittee was comprised of at least four members of the Panel and five additional members. The Secretary of Defense charged the subcommittees with investigating and assessing certain objectives and preparing a report with findings and recommendations for the full Panel.

MEETINGS

Since June 2013, the Panel has held 14 days of public meetings to hear from 154 witnesses with different perspectives, experiences, and expertise on topics tasked to the Panel for consideration.[2] Information provided by crime victim rights advocates and organizations, sexual assault victim advocacy groups, military and civilian victim advocates, military sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs), and survivors of sexual assault[3] informed the Panel's understanding of victims' perspectives. Seasoned criminal justice experts such as military and civilian criminal investigators, civilian prosecutors, defense counsel, and victims' counsel as well as medical professionals such as sexual assault nurse examiners (SANE) and other first responders provided technical information and their professional perspectives to the Panel. A variety of social science professors, law professors, statisticians, criminologists, and behavioral health professionals provided independent academic assessments. Current and former commanders (both active duty and retired); current, former, or retired military justice practitioners; Judge Advocates General from each of the Services; and current United States Senators shared their perspectives on sexual assault prevention and response in the military, command, the maintenance of good order and discipline, operational requirements and perspectives, and the military justice system.

Panel members heard testimony from witnesses and asked questions. Many witnesses provided additional documents, studies, and other materials for the Panel's consideration. In accordance with Federal Advisory Committee Act requirements, the Panel also considered written submissions from members of the public and heard public comments at each meeting.

In addition to public meetings, Panel members attended 65 subcommittee meetings and preparatory sessions. During these meetings and sessions, the members heard from more than 456 witnesses on issues related to the individual objectives of the subcommittees.

SITE VISITS

Panel and subcommittee members visited military installations and civilian agencies to speak with local personnel involved in sexual assault prevention and response efforts and programs. Several site visits used a non-attribution environment to foster candor on the part of participants. This non-attribution environment allowed participants to provide honest, candid, and unguarded opinions about their experiences, their impressions of victim services, military prosecutions, sexual assault response measures, and other relevant topics.

The Role of the Commander, Victims Services, and Comparative Systems Subcommittees visited Fort Hood and Joint Base San Antonio in Texas. Each of the subcommittees used these site visits to gather information related to their assigned objectives. The Comparative Systems Subcommittee also visited the Defense Forensic Science Center/United States Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory and Georgia Bureau of Investigation Lab in Atlanta, Georgia; Naval Base Kitsap, Bremerton and Joint Base Lewis-McChord in Washington; Dawson Place in Everett, Washington; Naval Station Norfolk, Virginia; the Philadelphia Sexual Assault Response Center in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and Marine Corps Base Quantico, Virginia. Additional information about the subcommittees' site visits is available in their respective subcommittee reports to the Panel, provided in the annex to this report.

REQUESTS FOR INFORMATION

In addition to meetings, the Panel Chair sent letters with more than 150 requests for information relevant to the duties of the Panel and objectives of the subcommittees to the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the Military Services. In response, the Department of Defense and the Services submitted almost 15,000 pages of narrative responses and attached documents including policies, procedures, statistics, correspondence, and surveys.

The Panel also sent letters to eighteen victim advocacy organizations around the country, including organizations working specifically with military sexual assault, soliciting their input to assist the Panel and subcommittees in their review. Protect Our Defenders, Service Women's Action Network, Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network, the National Organization for Victim Assistance, and the National Alliance to End Sexual Violence provided information to the Panel.

PUBLIC DOCUMENT REVIEW AND RESEARCH

The Panel also completed a comprehensive review of publicly available information. Panel members and staff reviewed government reports, transcripts of hearing testimony, policy memoranda, official correspondence, statistical data, training aids and videos, and planning documents. One particular source, the data collected by the Joint Service Committee Sexual Assault Subcommittee, provided the Comparative Systems Subcommittee with recent information about investigation, prosecution, defense, and adjudication in civilian jurisdictions.[4]

Additionally, the Panel and subcommittee members conducted legal research including reviewing federal and state court opinions related to the Crime Victims' Rights Act, case law and articles on victim's rights in the military justice system, military case law, and law review articles. General research focused on historical texts on the role of the commander in the military justice system and the legislative history of the UCMJ and other federal statutes.

SUBCOMMITTEE REPORTS TO THE PANEL

When finished with gathering evidence, each subcommittee held a series of meetings to discuss the content of their individual reports and to deliberate on its findings and recommendations. The subcommittee members developed their reports, including their findings and recommendations, based on the evidence collected during Subcommittee meetings and site visits as well as the extensive documentary evidence received from the Services, guided by the terms of reference set forth by the Secretary of Defense.

Once the subcommittees completed their reports, each subcommittee chair presented their findings and recommendations to the full Panel. During these presentations, the subcommittee chairs explained the evidentiary and factual basis for the subcommittee's findings and recommendations. Members of the Panel thoroughly questioned the subcommittee chairs and members on issues and conclusions in their reports. In total, the subcommittees presented 154 recommendations to the Panel for consideration.

PANEL DELIBERATION AND FINAL REPORT OF THE PANEL

Panel members deliberated on each subcommittee recommendation, holding six days of public deliberative hearings to discuss and finalize the Panel's recommendations based on the subcommittees' reports and evidence presented. Ultimately, the Panel approved 132 recommendations consistent with the Panel's statutory responsibilities and issues referred to it for consideration and assessment.

The Panel developed its final report based on the wealth of information gathered over the course of its assessment. The Panel's report responds to its statutory responsibilities and summarizes the information gathered throughout the Panel's study leading to its recommendations.

The reports from the Panel's subcommittees are included as an annex to the Panel's report.

Agendas, transcripts, and materials for all Panel and subcommittee meetings are available at the Response Systems Panel website, http://responsesystemspanel.whs.mil/.

3 Survivors were afforded the opportunity to keep their identities and Service affiliation confidential. Those who chose to do so are referred to throughout the report by only their initials.

4 The JSC-SAS traveled to eighteen civilian jurisdictions in 2013, gathering information and conducting interviews of law enforcement, prosecutors, public defenders, victims' attorneys, and victim advocates for comparative analysis. See generally JSC-SAS Report, Appendices (Sept. 2013) (on file at RSP).

Chain of command: The succession of commanding officers from a superior to a subordinate through which command is exercised.

Collateral misconduct: Victim misconduct that might be in time, place, or circumstance associated with the victim's sexual assault incident. Collateral misconduct by the victim of a sexual assault is one of the most significant barriers to reporting assault because of the victim's fear of punishment. Some reported sexual assaults involve circumstances where the victim may have engaged in some form of misconduct (e.g., underage drinking or other related alcohol offenses, adultery, fraternization, or other violations of certain regulations or orders). See DoDI 6495.02.

Commander: A commissioned officer or warrant officer who, by virtue of rank and assignment, exercises primary command authority over a DoD organization or prescribed territorial area.

Confidential reporting: For the purposes of the policies and procedures of the SAPR Program, confidential reporting is restricted reporting that allows a Service member to report or disclose to specified officials that he or she has been the victim of a sexual assault. This reporting option gives the member access to medical care, counseling, and victim advocacy, without requiring those specific officials to automatically report the matter to law enforcement or initiate an official investigation.

Convening authority: Unless otherwise limited, general or special courts-martial may be convened by persons occupying positions designated in Article 22(a) or Article 23(a) of the UCMJ, respectively, and by any commander designated by the Secretary concerned or empowered by the President. The power to convene courts-martial may not be delegated. The authority to convene courts-martial is independent of rank and is retained as long as the convening authority remains a commander in one of the designated positions. See Rule for Courts-Martial 504(b) and discussion.

Criminal intelligence: Information compiled and analyzed in an effort to anticipate, prevent, or monitor possible or potential criminal activity. See DoDI 5525.18, AR 195-2, p. 41.

Restricted reporting applies to Service members and their military dependents 18 years of age or older.

Re-victimization: Process by which a victim experiences acts of violence, power, or control imposed by systems, professionals, peers, or others, causing the victim to be traumatized after the original incident. Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Program: A DoD program for the Military Departments and the DoD Components that establishes SAPR policies to be implemented worldwide. The program objective is an environment and military community intolerant of sexual assault. See DoDD 6495.01.

Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (DoD SAPRO): Serves as the DoD's single point of authority, accountability, and oversight for the SAPR program, except for legal processes and criminal investigative matters that are the responsibility of the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments and the Inspectors General, respectively.

Sexual assault response coordinator (SARC): The single point of contact at an installation or within a geographic area who oversees sexual assault awareness, prevention, and response training; coordinates medical treatment, including emergency care, for victims of sexual assault; tracks the services provided to a victim of sexual assault from the initial report through final disposition and resolution. See DoDD 6495.01.

Sexual assault response team (SART): A multidisciplinary team that provides specialized immediate response to victims of recent sexual assault. The team typically includes health care personnel, law enforcement representatives, victim advocates, prosecutors (usually available on-call to consult with first responders, although some may be more actively involved at this stage), and forensic lab personnel (typically available to consult with examiners, law enforcement, or prosecutors, but not actively involved at this stage). See A National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations (2d Ed; April 2013).

Sexual harassment: A form of discrimination that involves unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature that create an intimidating, hostile, or offensive environment.

Sexual violence: A term without a specific federal legal meaning, but widely used to denote sexual acts of force against the will of victims.

Special court-martial: A court-martial that consists of at least three officers, a military judge, a trial counsel, and a defense counsel and that has authority to impose a limited sentence and hear only noncapital cases.

Special Victim Capability: A distinct, recognizable group of appropriately skilled professionals, including MCIO investigators, judge advocates, victim witness assistance personnel, and administrative paralegal support personnel, who work collaboratively to (1) investigate and prosecute allegations of child abuse (involving sexual assault and/or aggravated assault with grievous bodily harm), domestic violence (involving sexual assault and/or aggravated assault with grievous bodily harm), and adult sexual assault (not involving domestic offenses) and to (2) provide support for the victims of such offenses. See DoDI 6495.02.

Special Victim Counsel Program and special victim counsel: The Special Victim Counsel (SVC) Program was created by the Services and mandated by Congress to support victims of sexual assault and enhance their rights within the military justice system while neither causing unreasonable delay nor infringing upon the rights of an accused.

An SVC's primary duty is to represent the clients' rights and interests during the investigation and court-martial process. In general, SVC services include, but are not limited to, accompanying and advising the victim during interviews, examinations and hearings, advocating to government counsel and commanders on behalf of the victim, and advising the victim on collateral civil matters which stem from the alleged sexual assault. SVC are also able to advise a victim on the difference between a restricted and unrestricted report and on what to expect if they decide to make an unrestricted report and their case is referred to court-martial. SVC may coordinate with the Sexual Assault Response and Victim Witness Assistance personnel on available resources. See United States Army Special Victim Counsel Handbook & U.S. Air Force Special Victim Counsel Rules of Practice and Procedure.

Specification: A specification is a plain, concise, and definite statement of the essential facts of the offense charged. A specification is sufficient if it alleges every element of the charged offense expressly or by necessary implication. See Rule for Courts-Martial 307(c)(3).

Staff judge advocate (SJA): A judge advocate so designated in the Army, Air Force, or Marine Corps, and the principal legal advisor of a Navy, Coast Guard, or joint force command who is a judge advocate.

Status-of-forces agreement: A bilateral or multilateral agreement that defines the legal position of a visiting military force deployed in the territory of a friendly state.

Subordinate command: A command consisting of the commander and all those individuals, units, detachments, organizations, or installations that have been placed under the command by the authority establishing the subordinate command.

Summary court-martial: Lowest level court-martial in terms of punishment authority. The court-martial is composed of one commissioned officer who need not be an attorney. A Service member can be represented by a civilian attorney but has no right to representation by a military counsel.

Titling: Placing the name, and other identifying data, of an individual or entity on the subject block of an investigative report and central index, for the potential retrieval and analysis for law enforcement and security purposes.

Trial defense counsel: A judge advocate who represents a Service member in any adverse action, such as a court-martial, administrative separation, or nonjudicial punishment proceedings.

Unfounded: False or baseless.

Unit: Any military element whose structure is prescribed by competent authority or an organization title of a subdivision of a group in a task force.

Unitary sentencing: In a court-martial, the sentencing authority (military judge or court-martial members) adjudges a single sentence for all the offenses of which the accused was found guilty. A court-martial may not impose separate sentences for each finding of guilt, but may impose only a single, unitary sentence covering all of the guilty findings in their entirety, no matter how many such findings there may be.

Unrestricted reporting: A process a Service member uses to disclose, without requesting confidentiality or restricted reporting, that he or she is the victim of a sexual assault. Under these circumstances, the victim's report and any details provided to healthcare personnel, the SARC, a victim advocate, command authorities, or persons are reportable to law enforcement and may be used to initiate the official investigative process.

US Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory (USACIL): Located within the Defense Forensic Science Center at Fort Gillem, Georgia, provides forensic laboratory services to DoD investigative agencies and other federal law enforcement agencies.

Victim: A person who asserts direct physical, emotional, or pecuniary harm as a result of the commission of a sexual assault. See DoDD 6495.01.

Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP): A program designed to coordinate efforts and ensure that systems are in place at the installation level to provide information to victims and witnesses on available benefits and services and to provide assistance in obtaining those benefits and services. The program ensures that victims and witnesses are informed on the military justice process and available medical and social services. See DoDD 1030.2.

Victim witness liaison (VWL): Coordinates efforts to ensure systems are in place at the installation level to provide information on available benefits and services; assists victims and witnesses in obtaining those benefits and services; and may delegate duties as appropriate but retains responsibility to coordinate the delivery of required services.

Executive Summary

Background

At the request of Senator Martha McSally during the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on March 14, 2019, Acting Secretary of Defense Patrick Shanahan pledged to form a team of experts to take a fresh look at specific issues involving sexual assault, with a focus on the investigative and accountability processes. To this end, the Department of Defense (DoD) established the Sexual Assault Accountability and Investigation Task Force (SAAITF) to identify, evaluate, and recommend immediate and significant actions to improve the accountability process, specific to the investigation and disposition of cases in which members of the Armed Forces are either victims or alleged offenders of sexual assault, while ensuring due process for both.

The SAAITF recognizes the significant military justice reform the Department has gone through since 2006 and, most recently, with the Military Justice Act of 2016 (MJA 16), fully implemented earlier this year. These reforms mark some of the most significant changes to the military justice system since the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) was enacted in 1950, including new punitive articles, changes to pre-referral authorities and plea agreements, an additional court-martial forum, changes to court-martial panel sizes, sentencing reform, enhanced changes to post-trial procedures and appellate rights, and mandatory training on the UCMJ. These changes enhanced the system's fairness – for victims and accused alike – while maintaining the system's usefulness as a tool to maintain military discipline.

In light of recent reforms, the charge of the SAAITF was to develop bold recommendations for improvements to the military justice system in the areas of accountability, in particular commander and military justice practitioner responsibilities and authorities, comprehensive support to victims, and protection of rights for both the victim and the accused. The end result is specific and significant recommendations to help Commanders set command/organizational climate, enhance victim support, and ensure fair and just support for the accused, to include:

- Improving the ability of the commander to set appropriate command climate by identifying sexual harassment as a "stand alone" military crime vice being addressed under broader charges that do not highlight the severity of these behaviors
- Improving support to the victim by providing additional information and assistance throughout the process, including more consistent and regular updates and notifications
- Providing a dedicated investigation capability for defense counsel to help them defend accused Service members

Overview

The military justice system must provide a fair criminal justice forum recognized by Service members and the American public as such. It must also help military Commanders maintain the good order and discipline necessary for our armed forces to fight and win wars. The Commander stands at the center of the military justice system, and, regardless of Service, is responsible for the health, welfare, and discipline of every Service member in his or her Command. This responsibility and authority are vital to units' accomplishment of their assigned missions. There is no equivalent role in the civilian world that comes close to having this impact on the general population. The military justice system is therefore quite unique in that it treats behaviors counter to good order and discipline as crimes, while providing comprehensive support to victims throughout the process.

Because of this ultimate and unique responsibility of the Commander, authority for determining the proper disposition of allegations of misconduct under the UCMJ, including serious crimes like sexual assault and other forms of sexual misconduct, rests with the Commander. Commanders, however, do not make military justice decisions in isolation. Every Commander is informed and advised by qualified, professional judge advocates throughout the life of a case and at each key stage of the process, from report and investigation to disposition and adjudication. Therefore, the military justice system requires a process by which there is both accountability for the Commander and support for the victim.

Reforms to the military justice system towards this end have been unparalleled in any other jurisdiction. Reforms have consistently focused on improving the accountability of the process, such as the role and responsibility of the Commander, and the support the military provides to victims of sexual assault, such as the establishment of confidential reporting options and the special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel program. Both the accountability of the system and the support provided by the system are unique to the military. Unlike a lawyer-focused civilian system, the military needs a Commander-driven, lawyer-supported, victim-supportive system to drive cultural change and enforce discipline required on the battlefield. While the military system is unique in this regard, and necessarily so, the system deserves rigorous attention and evaluation to ensure the process continues to provide support, upholds fairness, and maintains accountability throughout the lifecycle of a sexual assault case.

Based on this, the SAAITF reviewed each step along the military justice process – from initial reporting experiences, to investigations and forensic capabilities, to the prosecutorial system, to sentencing, and to assessment of the victims' experiences throughout the process – to ensure accountability and support, and to identify ongoing improvements of the system. The report details significant recommendations for improvement: adding a specific criminal offense of sexual harassment to make a strong military-wide statement about the seriousness of these behaviors and the military's zero tolerance for them; thoroughly-updated training and education of all military justice practitioners; enhanced capabilities to ensure the Department has state-of-the-art 21st century forensic capabilities, which will enhance both the accuracy and timeliness of the investigative process and military justice system; providing defense counsel with their own investigators to promote due process for the accused; sentencing guidelines to promote consistency in punishments; and Commander-assigned responsibilities to ensure the victim has consistent up-to-date information throughout the investigation and military justice process, and to enhance the Commander's role, responsibility, and accountability throughout the process.

Not only will these recommendations improve the governing military law and the Department's policies, but they will send a strong, clear message to all Service members and their unit commanders: The Department will ensure the Commander has all available tools, authorities, information, and guidance to hold offenders appropriately accountable and support the victim, while protecting the rights of the victim and the accused throughout the military justice process. The Department will use whatever resources are required and bring the full weight of the Department of Defense to eliminate the scourge of sexual assault in our ranks and encourage more Service members to come forward and report sexual assault and sexual harassment so Commanders can hold offenders appropriately accountable and ensure good order and discipline.

Task Force Structure and Process

The SAAITF was co-led by the Executive Director of the DoD Office of Force Resiliency, the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments (TJAGs), and the Staff Judge Advocate (SJA) to the Commandant of the Marine Corps (CMC). Task Force members also included leaders from the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs), the Director of the DoD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO), a senior representative from the Office of DoD General Counsel (DoD OGC), and the Military Deputy for the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (OUSD(P&R)). Additional members were senior staff from the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs, the Office of DoD Inspector General (observation role only), each Service's respective sexual assault prevention and response (SAPR) office, senior leaders from the Joint Staff and National Guard Bureau, the Judge Advocate General of the Coast Guard, and a Senior Enlisted Advisor.

Before the establishment of the SAAITF, each Military Service was working to identify potential gaps or areas of improvement in the military justice system as it relates to sexual crimes. During its initial deliberations, the SAAITF reviewed all pending efforts to improve and enhance the military justice system's processing of sexual assault cases, as well as those that remained under consideration by the Military Services. The SAAITF determined where efforts should be standardized across the Department. Additional information was identified and reviewed by members of the Task Force, including: recommendations from prior internal and external Task Forces and Federal Advisory Committees, with specific focus on the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD); data from the Workplace and Gender Relations Surveys (WGRs); and data from the Military Investigation and Justice Experience Survey (MIJES).

To ensure a comprehensive review, members of the Task Force received briefings from sexual assault survivors; a retired Service member accused while on active duty of a sexual assault (an allegation later determined by a civil jury to be false); special victims' counsel and support staff; a defense counsel; and Commanders at the two-star level.

Specific Recommendations

Accountability Recommendations

The following recommendations provide significant actions and reforms to increase and enhance the authority, integrity, and transparency of Commanders and the military justice system through the entire lifecycle of a sexual assault case.

Recommendation 1.1. Establish a Specific Criminal Offense of Sexual Harassment

1.1. DoD OGC will direct the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice (JSC) to draft a proposal for a specific offense of "sexual harassment" to be added to the Manual for Courts-Martial. The Services may maintain their respective sexual harassment resolution processes as an option to address minor misconduct.

Recommendation 1.2. Advance Sentencing Reform and Guidelines

1.2. DoD OGC will direct the JSC to draft a proposal for adoption of non-binding sentencing guidelines based on the sentencing data collected by the Military Justice Review Panel (MJRP) to provide the sentencing authority with the range of confinement that will generally be appropriate for a violation of each of the offenses criminalized under the UCMJ.

Recommendation 1.3. Enhance 21st Century Forensic and Investigative Capabilities

1.3.1. The Department will develop a long-term storage solution for evidence taken in sexual assault cases.

1.3.2. The Department will establish a first-ever dedicated analytical capability to support the on-going research needs of the MCIOs and share findings with the prevention community and law enforcement community.

1.3.3. The Department will increase the number of MCIO digital evidence examiners to meet the increasing demand for forensic digital evidence processing and timely return of victim electronics, when legally possible, in sexual assault cases.

1.3.4. The Department will seek transfers and reprogrammings of current funding for Special Victims Programs to allow for procurement to support advanced forensic capabilities.

Recommendation 1.4. Expand Judicial Authorities

1.4. DoD OGC will direct the JSC to draft a proposal to expand authorities for Military Judges and Magistrates, particularly before a case has been referred to a court-martial.

Recommendation 1.5. Establish and Enhance Roles and Responsibilities for Commanders

1.5.1. The Department will direct the Military Services to require Sexual Assault Initial Disposition Authorities (SAIDAs) to ensure that victim preference on choice of venue is documented prior to making any decisions on allegations. The Department will direct the Commander of a victim to ensure documentation of periodic notification of the key and significant events during the military justice process has occurred. In addition, the Military Services will ensure Commander's compliance with these documentation requirements using established Inspector General inspection processes.

1.5.2. The Department will establish training objectives for all aspects of a Commander's role in processing sexual assault cases through a comprehensive review of best practices in military justice, victim assistance, promotion of healthy command climates, and ensuring the accused is afforded due process rights. These training and education requirements will be standardized and institutionalized across the Military Services' respective training commands. Training will enhance Commander and command team knowledge and skill through improved leadership preparation that emphasizes various critical elements provided in the full report.

1.5.3. The Department will direct formalized training requirements for Commanders exercising SAIDA, and determine minimum training objectives, including a focus on not only the handling of alleged penetrative sexual assault offenses, but also related collateral misconduct alleged against the accused or victim. Training requirements will be standardized and institutionalized across the Military Services' respective training commands.

Recommendation 1.6. Enhance the Military Justice System's Transparency with the Public

1.6. The Department will continue to support the enactment of legislation promoting public access to military justice documents by excepting from the purview of the Privacy Act the public release of court-martial dockets, filings, and records, while adopting measures to protect against the inappropriate release of personal information.

Recommendation 1.7. Extend the DAC-IPAD

1.7. The Secretary will extend the DAC-IPAD beyond its current termination date to continue to assess the effectiveness of the military justice system for sexual crimes.

Support Recommendations

The SAAITF also focused military justice reform recommendations to enhance the protections and support of the victim while protecting the due process rights of both the victim and the accused. Specific recommendations were formulated as follows:

Recommendation 2.1. Enhance the Integrated Multi-Disciplinary Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution (SVIP) Capability

2.1. Multiple initiatives include:

- The Department will, in collaboration with the Military Services, conduct a compliance review of the SVIP capability across all military justice practitioners, including investigators, trial counsel, support staff, and victim assistance personnel. This review will include identification of areas of improvement to support this capability within the military justice system.
- Based on the above compliance review, the Department will revise applicable instructions, as required, to enhance SVIP collaboration, integration, and synchronization involving victim assistance personnel, criminal investigators, and military prosecutors any time a sexual assault event is reported throughout the entire military justice process.
- The Department will direct the Military Services to identify the appropriate delegated official within the SVIP to provide and document notifications per Recommendation 1.5.1 in order to ensure regular and consistent updates to the victim as to the progress of the case.
- The Department will modify applicable instructions to incorporate SVIP capability within the investigative process. SVIP-qualified prosecutors will work closely with the MCIOs when developing the investigative plan. Ultimately, all federal law enforcement investigative processes and final investigative decisions must remain with the lead MCIO.
- The Judge Advocates General and the SJA to CMC will enhance training requirements for military justice practitioners, including Special Victims' Counsel/Victims' Legal Counsel (SVCs/VLCs), defense counsel, and trial counsel. They will also coordinate to determine minimum training objectives, and the Military Services will standardize and institutionalize the training requirements across their respective training commands. Training will focus on not only the handling of alleged penetrative sexual assault offenses, but also related collateral misconduct alleged against the victim.

- The MCIOs will establish training requirements for investigators supporting SVIP. They will also coordinate to determine minimum training objectives.

- The Department will field the MIJES in years opposite the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of the Active Duty (WGRA), and adjust if need be to minimize burden on victims. In addition, the MIJES will require additional publicity and support from response system professionals to encourage greater participation rates.

Recommendation 2.2. Develop Policy to Enhance Protection for Victim Preference in Restricted Reporting

2.2. The Department will develop a policy that would more fully protect the victim's ability to file a Restricted Report, as well as provide victims a confidentiality option should the victim's sexual assault allegation be inadvertently disclosed or a third-party report arise, in appropriate circumstances.

Recommendation 2.3. Protect Information Used in the CATCH Program

2.3. The Department will make clear that information used in the CATCH a Serial Offender (CATCH) Program will be protected under the Restricted Report protections and will not be subject to disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).

Recommendation 2.4. Develop Defense Investigator Capability

2.4. The Department will direct the Services to develop an appropriate defense investigator capability on a trial basis for a three-year term. Following the conclusion of the pilot program, the program will be reassessed to determine whether the defense investigator capability enhanced the administration of justice.

Introduction

Sexual assault is beyond mere criminal conduct within the military; it is a reprehensible act that harms those who have volunteered to serve in our Armed Forces. Not only does sexual assault contravene our moral commitment to the basic dignity and respect of every individual, it also damages the trust and cohesion that are critical foundations of military unit effectiveness and lethality. That, fundamentally, makes sexual assault a readiness issue for the Department of Defense (Department). Addressing this scourge is an operational imperative necessary to ensure our ability to defeat any enemy, anywhere in the world.

Recent reforms to the military justice system, particularly in the area of victim support, have been unparalleled in any other jurisdiction. These reforms have consistently focused on improving the accountability of the process, such as the role and responsibility of the Commander, and the support the military provides to victims of sexual assault, such as the establishment of confidential reporting options and the special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel program. Both the accountability of the military justice process and practitioners, and the support of the victim, are unique to the military. Unlike a lawyer-focused civilian system, the military needs a Commander-driven, lawyer-supported, victim-supportive system to drive cultural change and enforce discipline required on the battlefield. While the military system is unique in this regard, and necessarily so, the system deserves rigorous attention and evaluation to ensure the process continues to provide support, ensures fairness, and maintains accountability throughout the entire lifecycle of a sexual assault case. At the same time, reforms must uphold – and ideally enhance – Commanders' ability to establish an appropriate command climate that fosters unit cohesion, esprit de corps, and mission readiness.

In regard to sexual assault, the Department tracks trends within the response system and sexual assault programs using two primary metrics: past-year prevalence of the crime and the percent of Service members who report the crime to military officials. Outcomes of the military justice system are most directly connected to the latter. That is, the good order and discipline achieved through the military justice system is largely reliant upon the percent of individuals who opt into the system by making a report. Over the last 15 years, as the Department expanded its military justice system support to Service members, prevalence of sexual assault decreased by half and reporting increased four-fold. In 2006, the Department estimated only 7 percent of those who experienced a sexual assault came forward to report the incident to the military. In 2018, this rate was approximately 30 percent. While the Department encourages greater reporting by Service members, the majority of victims, an estimated 70 percent, do not come forward to report. Thus, we must redouble our efforts, sustain important progress, and produce new and innovative solutions to solve the problem. The Department must maintain a clear-eyed, impartial, and consistent approach to evaluation of all elements of the investigative and military justice system. Our military members must likewise have faith and confidence in this system so the world's most disciplined, ready, and lethal fighting force can protect the Nation and always be ready to fight and win wars.

At the request of Senator Martha McSally during the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on March 14, 2019, Acting Secretary of Defense Patrick Shanahan pledged to form a team of experts to take a fresh look at specific issues involving sexual assault, with a focus on the investigative and accountability processes. To this end, the Department established the SAAITF to identify, evaluate, and recommend immediate and significant actions to improve the accountability process, specific to the investigation and disposition of cases in which members of the Armed Forces are either victims or alleged perpetrators of sexual assault, while ensuring due process for both (Appendix A). With a focus on accountability and investigation, the SAAITF complements the ongoing work in separate, co-aligned efforts focused on prevention and includes senior representation from the Office of Force Resiliency, the Judge Advocates General (TJAGs) and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps (SJA to CMC), and the leads of the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs) (Appendix B for full membership).

Background of the Military Justice System and Historical Reforms

The military justice system is designed to enhance good order and discipline while protecting the rights of the accused and the victim. These concepts are enshrined in the Preamble of the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM): "The purpose of military law is to promote justice, to assist in maintaining good order and discipline in the armed forces, to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the military establishment, and thereby to strengthen the national security of the United States." Like any complex system, it requires constant refinement. Since the UCMJ's enactment, Congress has amended it numerous times and the President has promulgated periodic revisions to the MCM to refine the procedures related to courts-martial.

Starting in 2006, Congress enacted a series of modifications to the UCMJ focused on improving the handling of sexual assault cases. These revisions to the military justice system continued at a steady pace with significant legislative changes incorporated in the National Defense Authorization Acts (NDAA) for Fiscal Years (FY) 2014, 2015, and 2016. These changes were created in response to the deep concern of Congress and the Department with the problem of sexual assault in the military. A summary of the changes to the military justice system during this time, many of which provided additional rights and services for victims, is provided in Appendix C.

Section 576 of FY13 NDAA established the Response Systems Panel (RSP) to conduct a 12-month review of the effectiveness of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate sexual assault offenses, including the role of the Commander in the military justice system. After holding 14 public meetings, hearing from 154 witnesses, and reviewing thousands of pages of documents, the RSP issued its report in June 2014 making 132 recommendations. The RSP included a recommendation to retain the Commander's role in exercising disposition discretion. The RSP concluded that the Department, the Services, and senior leaders must ensure Commanders understand their responsibility and that they be held accountable, and fairly evaluated, on their execution of these critical responsibilities. Overall, the Department approved the vast majority of the RSP recommendations.

Section 576 of FY13 NDAA created the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) for a three-year term to review the operation of the court-martial process with respect to sexual assault offenses. The JPP held 32 public meetings between August 2014 and July 2017, and heard testimony from many witnesses, including military leaders, sexual assault victims, sexual assault advocacy groups, DoD and civilian victim services personnel, military and civilian prosecutors, defense counsel, victims' counsel, academic and subject matter experts, members of the public, and members of Congress. The JPP received and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. The JPP issued 11 reports and made 63 recommendations, many of which have been enacted by Congress, or implemented by the Department and the Services, on the topics of Article 120, UCMJ; restitution and compensation of victims of sexual assault; retaliation against those who report sexual assault; military defense counsel resources and experience; victims' appellate rights; sexual assault investigators; and concerns regarding the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases.

On October 18, 2013, Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel directed a comprehensive review of the UCMJ and the MCM. In response to this direction, the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG), led by the Honorable Andrew Effron, former Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, conducted a comprehensive review of the military justice system and submitted its findings to the Department. The Department, with the Office of Management and Budget's approval, submitted the MJRG's report to Congress in December 2015, which in large measure formed the basis for the Military Justice Act of 2016 (MJA 16), most of which became effective on January 1, 2019. The late Senator John McCain, then-Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, characterized these changes in the MJA 16 as "the most significant reforms to the Uniform Code of Military Justice since it was enacted six decades ago." A side-by-side comparison of the former military justice system and the system as systematically reformed by the MJA 16 is provided in Appendix D, along with a list of changes enacted after the MJA 16 at Appendix E.

The Department established the DAC-IPAD in February 2016 pursuant to section 546 of the FY15 NDAA, as amended. The mission of the DAC-IPAD, the successor to the JPP, is to advise the Department on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of allegations of rape, forcible sodomy, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces. The DAC-IPAD is required to submit an annual report to the Department and Congress no later than March 30 of each year. It is now scheduled to terminate in February 2021.

Role of the Commander in the Military Justice System

The Commander stands at the center of the military justice system. The Commander, regardless of Service, is responsible for the health, welfare, and discipline of every Service member in his or her Command. This responsibility and authority promote the unit's accomplishment of its assigned missions. Because of this ultimate responsibility, authority for determining the proper disposition of allegations of misconduct under the UCMJ, including serious crimes like sexual assault, rests with the Commander. Commanders, however, do not make military justice decisions in isolation. Every Commander is informed and advised by qualified, professional judge advocates throughout the life of a case and at each key stage of the process, from report and investigation to disposition and adjudication.

As the Department has worked with Congress to combat sexual assault, the role of the Commander has undergone tremendous scrutiny and study. Some theorize that a Commander's role at the center of the military justice system hampers the Department's ability to hold alleged offenders appropriately accountable or to care for victims. External oversight entities tasked with reviewing this issue arrived at a different conclusion that does not support the aforementioned theory. As an example, the role of the Commander was studied by the RSP in 2014. The RSP determined that removing the Commander's authority within the military justice system would not improve the quality of investigations and prosecutions, or the Department's response to sexual assault. Further, in its March 2019 report, the DAC-IPAD "found that military Commanders' decisions whether to prefer charges or not to prefer charges in penetrative sexual assault cases were reasonable in the overwhelming majority (95%) of cases reviewed," and "that there is no systemic problem with command decision-making regarding preferral of charges for penetrative sexual assaults."

While there remains much work to be done, objective measures demonstrate that the Commander's role in the military justice system does not hinder the Department's response to sexual assault. Moreover, because of the vital role Commanders play in establishing the climate of their units, and achieving culture change where necessary, sexual assault is a Commanders' issue. Therefore, if Commanders were to be removed from their central role in the military justice system, they would lose their most powerful tool available to drive home the message that sexual assault has no place in the United States Armed Forces.

Task Force Membership

The SAAITF was co-led by the Executive Director of the DoD Office of Force Resiliency, the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments, and the SJA to CMC. Task Force members included leaders from the MCIOs, the Director of DoD SAPRO, a senior representative from the DoD OGC, and the Military Deputy for the OUSD(P&R). Additional members were senior staff from the OUSD(P&R), Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs, DoD OGC, DoD Office of the Inspector General (observation role only), each Service's respective SAPR offices, senior leaders from the Joint Staff and National Guard Bureau, and a Senior Enlisted Advisor.

While the SAAITF is a DoD-led initiative, many of the recommendations directly affect the Coast Guard. This is especially true for recommendations to revise the UCMJ, and other proposals to reform the military justice system. Pursuant to 10 U.S.C. § 101 and 14 U.S.C. § 101, the Coast Guard is a military service and a branch of the Armed Forces of the United States at all times. Coast Guard officers and enlisted members are subject to the UCMJ pursuant to 10 U.S.C. § 802 (Article 2), and the Coast Guard is part of the military justice system as implemented in the MCM (2019 ed.). Therefore, the SAAITF also included representation from the Coast Guard and this report will be shared with the Department of Homeland Security. A comprehensive list of SAAITF members is provided at Appendix B.

Task Force Process

Initial Deliberations Before the establishment of the SAAITF, each of the Military Services was working to identify potential gaps or areas of improvement in the military justice system as it relates to sexual crimes. During its initial deliberations, the SAAITF reviewed all pending efforts to improve and enhance the military justice's processing of sexual assault cases, as well as those that remained under consideration by the Military Services. The SAAITF determined where efforts should be standardized across the Department.

Data Review and Analysis Additional information was identified and reviewed by members of the Task Force including:

- Recommendations from prior internal and external Task Forces and Federal Advisory Committees, with specific focus on the DAC-IPAD. More details on considered reports are included in Appendix F.
- Data from the WGRs as well as the MIJES.

Additional Data and Information To ensure a comprehensive review, members of the Task Force received briefings from sexual assault survivors; a retired Service member accused while on active duty of a sexual assault (an allegation later determined by a civil jury to be false); special victims' counsel and support staff; a defense counsel; and Commanders at the two-star level.

Recommendation Formulation The SAAITF developed recommendations through an informed process with a focus on increasing the authority, integrity, transparency, and support of the military justice system through the entire lifecycle of a sexual assault case and ensuring the system is appropriately supportive of all who interact with it.

Overview

Assumptions

1. The SAAITF formulated recommendations agnostic of current policies, regulations, laws, or legislative limitations.
2. The SAAITF did not limit its review to one aspect of the military justice system; rather the SAAITF evaluated the entire lifecycle of the military justice process.
3. The SAAITF focused recommendations on the military justice system as it pertains to the investigation and judicial processes for sexual assault crimes specifically, though many recommendations will improve the military justice process writ large.
4. While the SAAITF focused primarily on response aspects, namely investigation and adjudication, the SAAITF recognizes the profound and holistic impacts that these response efforts have on overall prevention efforts.
5. The SAAITF Report references "victim" and "accused" throughout. Reference to "victim" includes any Service member who reports a sexual assault to a military official, either through restricted or unrestricted channels, as well as Service members whom others report as being the victim of a sexual assault. Reference to the "accused" includes any Service member who is named as the alleged perpetrator of the reported sexual assault. These references in no way presuppose guilt or innocence of the accused, nor do they presuppose a founded or unfounded allegation on behalf of the victim.

Task Force Lines of Effort and Overview of Recommendations

The Task Force leveraged the critical reforms from the MJA 16 and identified additional areas of improvement and reform with a focus on two primary lines of effort outlined below.

Accountability: The ability of the military to maintain a ready and lethal force fundamentally depends on the role and authority of Commanders, including their role within the military justice system. Recommendations in this line of effort focused on increasing the authority, integrity, and transparency of Commanders and the military justice system through the entire lifecycle of a sexual assault case. Specific recommendations were formulated as follows:

- The Commander is integral to military justice and good order and discipline.
    - Recommendations include: Clarified roles and responsibilities of the Commander, requirements for Commanders to ensure victims are informed throughout the military justice process, established training objectives for all Commanders involved in processing sexual assault cases, and the creation of Department-wide training requirements for Commanders exercising SAIDA.
- The Commander must make decisions based on the most accurate and timely information from appropriately-trained investigators, robust forensic capabilities, and unbiased legal guidance.
    - Recommendations include: Increased forensic and analytic capability to provide the most accurate and valid evidence.
- The Commander must make informed, swift, and appropriate decisions using all authorities granted to him/her.
    - Recommendations include: Introduction of a specific criminal offense of sexual harassment, sentencing guidelines to help guide the sentencing authority and to promote sentencing consistency, and expansion of judicial authorities.
- Commanders' decisions should be transparent and the Commander should be held accountable for ensuring procedures that are within his or her responsibility are applied appropriately.
    - Recommendations include: Requirements for the Services to ensure Commander compliance with roles and responsibilities for ensuring victims are updated throughout the investigation and military justice process.

All recommendations within this line of effort improve the following areas of focus:

- Commander Responsibility and Authority
- Process Timelines and Accuracy
- Fairness and Due Process
- System Credibility and Transparency

Support: The SAAITF focused military justice reform recommendations to enhance the protections and support of the victim while protecting due process for both the accused and the victim. Specific recommendations in this line of effort were formulated as follows:

- The military justice system must reflect a comprehensive, standardized, experienced, and collaborative approach to investigating and prosecuting sexual assault crimes.
    - Recommendations include: Revitalization of SVIP Capability with enhanced training and education for all practitioners within the SVIP.
- The rights of the victim and the accused must be protected throughout all aspects of the military justice process.

- Recommendations include: Ability of victims to maintain restricted reports; protection of data for victims who use the CATCH program; documentation and tracking of victim jurisdictional preference; notification of case progress and outcome; standardized survey of victim experiences, attitudes, and satisfaction after going through the system; defense investigator capability.

All recommendations within this line of effort improve the following areas of focus:

- Victim/Accused Support and Experience
- Integration and Synchronization of Services
- Training and Education

Section 1. Accountability Recommendations

The following recommendations provide significant actions and reforms to increase and enhance the authority, integrity, and transparency of Commanders and the military justice system through the entire lifecycle of a sexual assault case.

Recommendation 1.1. Establish a Specific Criminal Offense of Sexual Harassment

Background:

Sexual harassment is not merely immoral, but also damages the teamwork that is necessary to the successful accomplishment of military missions. Additionally, from our Department-wide surveys and research, the Department recognizes that personnel within commands with heightened sexual harassment prevalence are also at increased risk for sexual assault. Deterring and effectively responding to sexual harassment is one of many initiatives that may, in combination, drive down sexual assault prevalence.

While civilian laws prohibit sexual harassment, they do not make sexual harassment itself a crime. Rather, U.S. civilian law characterizes sexual harassment as a civil wrong. In some other countries, on the other hand, sexual harassment is a crime.[1]

The Services have programs in place to resolve complaints of sexual harassment and allegations of a hostile work environment administratively. An informal resolution process can be used to address conduct that creates a hostile work environment such as inappropriate jokes, innuendo, or discussions in the workplace. The informal resolution process resolves the minor misconduct outside of the military justice process while maintaining good order and discipline in the unit.

The military has both the ability and the imperative to criminalize some behavior that is not criminal in civilian society. As discussed previously, good order and discipline is a critical necessity to a ready and lethal force. Good order and discipline is inherently the responsibility of the Commander, and the military justice system is responsible for providing him or her with the authorities and tools to succeed in this regard. Currently, a military member can be held criminally accountable for sexual harassment and similar conduct under the UCMJ by charging the alleged offender with committing a general disorder (Article 134) or failing to obey an order or regulation (Article 92). However, the military justice system does not have a specific punitive article or enumerated Article 134 offense addressing sexual harassment.

The civilian system chiefly penalizes sexual harassment within the workplace. However, Service members live and work in very close quarters where such behavior can become even more disruptive. Consequently, a specific "sexual harassment" offense for the military should encompass misconduct that occurs not only in the workplace, but also anywhere Service members live, work, train, and socialize together.

Creating a specific "sexual harassment" offense under military law would be beneficial for multiple reasons. Among them is it would more firmly reinforce the Department's view that such conduct is immoral and unacceptable. It would give Commanders another tool to help them influence the behavior of their subordinates. Additionally, creating a specific sexual harassment offense would facilitate data collection and analysis of incidence and reporting of this crime as the Department could gauge specific alleged violations of this criminal charge.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- System Credibility and Transparency
- Commander Responsibility and Authority

Data Sources:

- WGRAs
- 2014 RAND Military Workplace Survey
- Manual for Courts-Martial, United States (2019 ed.)
- Briefings to the SAAITF
- National Discussion on Sexual Assault and Sexual Harassment at America's Colleges, Universities, and Service Academies

Findings:

Based on surveys conducted by the Department, there is a strong positive correlation between the occurrence of sexual harassment within military units and the occurrence of sexual assault. Commands and installations with greater occurrence of sexual harassment often have higher rates of sexual assault. This connection, and the importance of the Department's focus on eliminating sexual harassment from the ranks, was reiterated by briefings to the SAAITF and by panel briefers at the 2019 National Discussion on Sexual Assault and Sexual Harassment at America's Colleges, Universities, and Service Academies.

While sexual harassment can currently be prosecuted in the military justice system, there is no stand-alone offense of "sexual harassment." Feedback from Commanders reflected the importance of the tools available to them to send strong messages about expected conduct, with the UCMJ as the primary tool of authority.

Recommendation:

DoD OGC will direct the JSC to draft a proposal for a specific offense of "sexual harassment" to be added to the Manual for Courts-Martial. The Services may maintain their respective sexual harassment resolution processes as an option to address minor misconduct.

Estimated Resource Implications: None.

Recommendation 1.2. Advance Sentencing Reform and Guidelines

Background:

The UCMJ provides mandatory minimum sentences for a very limited class of offenses.[2] For most offenses, the sentencing authority is free to adjudge any sentence from no punishment to the maximum authorized punishments for all of the offenses resulting in a conviction combined. In a rape case, for example, while the sentence must include a punitive discharge, the sentencing authority may sentence a convicted Service member to any period of confinement ranging from none to life without eligibility for parole. The sentencing authority is given very little guidance concerning how to exercise discretion within that broad range.

The MJRG carefully analyzed the historical background, contemporary practice, and the purpose and operation of Federal civilian sentencing guidelines. The MJRG concluded that several reforms to military sentencing were necessary:

- Eliminate the possibility of sentencing by members in non-capital cases, reserving the sentencing function to military judges.
- Provide that military judges will impose a separate term of confinement for each offense that resulted in a conviction and make a determination as to whether the sentences will run consecutively or concurrently.
- Establish non-binding sentencing parameters and criteria to provide guidance to Military Judges in determining an appropriate sentence in a manner similar to the Federal Sentencing Guidelines in federal districts.

These proposed reforms were included in the draft Military Justice Act the Department transmitted to Congress. Congress, however, chose to retain the possibility of member sentencing in some non-capital cases and removed the provisions concerning sentencing parameters and criteria.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- System Credibility and Transparency
- Process Timeliness and Accuracy
- Fairness and Due Process

---

[2] Article 56 prescribes minimum punishments for rape, sexual assault, rape of a child, sexual assault of a child, and attempt or conspiracy to commit any of these sex offenses. Additionally, a mandatory minimum sentence of confinement for life applies to premeditated murder and felony murder.

Data Sources:

- Report of the Military Justice Review Group, Part I (UCMJ Recommendations), 22 Dec 2015, pp. 501–15
- Section 5521 of the FY17 NDAA modified Article 146, UCMJ to create the MJRP

Findings:

The lack of sentencing guidelines leaves the sentencing authority with tremendous discretion regarding how much confinement to adjudge, while providing little guidance concerning the exercise of that discretion. As a result, court-martial sentences for similar offenses often vary widely.

Recommendation:

DoD OGC will direct the JSC to draft a proposal for adoption of non-binding sentencing guidelines based on the sentencing data to be collected by the MJRP to provide the sentencing authority with the range of confinement that will generally be appropriate for a violation of each of the offenses criminalized under the UCMJ.

Estimated Resource Implications: Minimal.

Recommendation 1.3. Enhance 21st Century Forensic and Investigative Capabilities

The SAAITF identified four areas of reform and enhancement on the Department's forensic and investigative capabilities.

Recommendation 1.3.1. Long-Term Storage Solution for Evidence Taken in Sexual Assault Cases

Background:

The Sexual Assault Forensic Evidence Reporting (SAFER) Act (2013) led to national best-practice recommendations for retention of sexual assault evidence. Recommendations call for 50-year retention in uncharged or unsolved cases and 20-year retention for sexual assault kits taken in restricted reporting cases. DoDI 5505.18, Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense, change 2, effective January 31, 2019, requires "all [sexual assault] physical and forensic evidence must be retained for a period of at least 20 years from the date of seizure of the evidence."

"Physical and forensic evidence" collected in sexual assault cases frequently accumulates to several cubic feet of material, such as clothing items, bed coverings, and carpeting, per case. MCIOs investigate more than 5,000 sexual assault cases per year and most cases involve the collection of some type of physical or forensic (including digital) evidence.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Process Timelines and Accuracy

Data Sources:

- DoDI 5505.18, Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense, change 2, effective January 31, 2019
- SAFER Act of 2013
- Survivors' Bill of Rights Act of 2016 (Public Law 114-236) 18 U.S.C. § 3772a

Findings:

MCIO field units are located in typical office facilities on military installations. MCIO offices do not have sufficient space to store evidence for 20 years, per policy requirements. It is not feasible to arrange for local storage solutions at more than 200 MCIO field units.

Recommendation:

The Department will develop a long-term storage solution for evidence taken in sexual assault cases.

Estimated Resource Implication: Extensive

- Manning: Central storage facility = approximately five full time personnel ($300,056)
- Space: 85,000 square feet
- Facility cost: TBD

Recommendation 1.3.2. Establish a First-Ever Dedicated Analytical Capability

Background:

The MCIOs have made significant progress in incorporating research-informed best-practices, such as looking into the background of offenders for past similar conduct, utilizing cognitive interviewing techniques, and providing investigators with training on the impact cognitive biases can have in investigations. Currently, little research data exist about repeat offenders in sexual assaults involving acquaintances or co-workers. Most sexual assaults in the military involve acquaintances; less than 15 percent of Service members indicate experiencing sexual assault at the hands of a complete stranger.

The MCIOs collectively conduct over 5,000 sexual assault investigations per year. As a result of improved investigator training and agency oversight, MCIO investigations completed in the last few years contain substantially more qualitative and quantitative information. This rich source of data needs to be analyzed to assess if the improvements the MCIOs have made are leading to quality investigative outcomes. The data also offer better insights into repeat offenders and their methods of operation in reported cases, as well as insights to help better identify possible past victims of repeat offenders.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Process Timelines and Accuracy

Data Sources:

- MCIO case management and timeliness data

- WGRs

Findings:

MCIOs do not possess sufficient dedicated analytical support to research data from investigative case files to assess the efficacy of adjustments they have recently made to training and investigative techniques or patterns of offending critical to future investigations. MCIOs, and the sexual assault prevention community, would benefit from a deeper understanding of repeat offenders in reported military sexual assault cases, an understanding not currently available in existing research.

Recommendation:

The Department will establish a first-ever dedicated analytical capability to support the on-going research needs of the MCIOs and share findings with the prevention community and law enforcement community.

Estimated Resource Implication: Extensive

- Manning: Six full-time employee (FTE) analysts
- Funding: Approximately $2M annually
- Space and Equipment: Working space and computer support for six analysts

Recommendation 1.3.3. Enhance the Number of MCIO Digital Evidence Investigators

Background:

Most sexual assault incidents in the military involve individuals who know each other. In reported cases, the parties often agree sexual activity took place but contest matters of consent. In cases with these fact patterns, digital evidence can be the most probative, as records of electronic communications provide important insight into issues surrounding consent.

Most criminal investigations conducted today involve the need to analyze computers, laptops, cell phones, internet-connected home assistants, digital data stored in vehicles, etc. Digital devices almost always contain relevant evidence (e.g., emails, texts, photographs, internet search logs, geo-location data, social media uploads/downloads), evidence particularly helpful in sexual assault cases and associated crimes (e.g., stalking). Rapidly increasing data storage capacity, as well as "cloud" storage, is adding to the challenge. More time is needed to analyze each device and address procedures required for legally accessing remotely stored digital data.

MCIOs collectively saw a 14 percent increase (up by 695 cases) in unrestricted sexual assault reports in 2018 over 2017. This increase resulted in more digital evidence needing to be collected and analyzed. In fact, in 2018, the MCIOs processed 20 percent more terabytes of data than in 2017. The increased time it takes MCIOs to process digital evidence is now the main contributor to case timeliness challenges. In 2018, the average time it took to publish a sexual assault investigative report rose to 123 days, up from 119 days in 2017. This upward trend is expected to continue due in large part to increased need for digital evidence analysis. In addition, as digital devices become increasingly integrated into daily life, victims of sexual assault become quite concerned about the loss of their primary means of communication. Recent changes in analysis procedures attempt to minimize the amount of time a victim goes without his or her cell phone.

However, further reducing processing time and timely return of victims' cell phones whenever legally possible diminishes the potential for negative experiences associated with participation in the military justice process.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Process Timelines and Accuracy
- Victim/Accused Support and Experience

Data Sources:

- Various studies, including: Digital Evidence and the U.S. Criminal Justice System: Identifying Technology and Other Needs to More Effectively Acquire and Utilize Digital Evidence, a RAND Corporation study (2015) for the National Institute of Justice
- Workplace and Gender Relations Surveys
- MIJES

Findings:

The combination of increasing caseloads, the increasing number of digital devices requiring forensic processing, and the ever-increasing data storage capacity of digital devices is significantly impacting overall investigative timeliness. The MCIOs need to meet the growing demand for digital forensic evidence processing in sexual assault investigations.

Recommendation:

The Department will increase the number of MCIO digital evidence examiners to meet the increasing demand for forensic digital evidence processing and timely return of victim electronics, when legally possible, in sexual assault cases.

Estimated Resource Implication: Extensive

- Manning: Each MCIO requires 10 (30 total) additional digital forensic examiners to meet the demand for digital evidence processing in the field
- Funding: Salary: GS 12/13 at $165K each (salary and benefits) = ~$5M
- Initial training and equipment costs: $25K each = $750K

Recommendation 1.3.4. Expand Forensic Science Technology

Background:

Additional Operations and Maintenance (O&M) funding authority has been provided within Consolidated Appropriations Bills historically from FY14 through FY19 for Special Victims Programs.

The additional funds are made available for transfer to the Army, Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps, and Army and Air National Guard to continue support and expansion of the Special Victims programs. The Special Victim program includes SVCs/VLCs, which provide covered sexual assault victims their own attorney, as well as the SVIP Capability, which is comprised of specially trained military investigators, judge advocates, paralegals, and victim witness assistance personnel who investigate, prosecute, and support victims of covered offenses of child abuse, serious domestic violence, or sexual offenses.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Process Timelines and Accuracy

Data Source:

- Past DoD SAPRO efforts to try to approve procurement of equipment that would provide enhanced forensics capability

Findings:

Existing additional funding is provided as O&M dollars, with plus-ups in funding ($35M in FY19) from the House Appropriations Committee – Defense (HAC-D) and Senate Appropriations Committee – Defense (SAC-D) for Special Victims Programming is O&M funding (current year only). However, funds are not able to be transferred to the Department of the Army for U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory (USACIL) investment accounts to procure equipment to support advanced forensic technologies.

Recommendation:

The Department will seek transfers and reprogrammings of current funding for Special Victims Programs to allow for procurement to support advanced forensic capabilities.

Estimated Resource Implications: None.

Recommendation 1.4. Expand Judicial Authorities

Background:

Under the current system, Military Judges are not involved in the judicial process until after referral of charges, with a limited exception for certain matters such as the issuance of investigative subpoenas and requests for orders or warrants for stored communications. Otherwise, the Convening Authority retains responsibility for making many quasi-judicial decisions which may later be reviewed by the detailed Military Judge once the case has been referred to a court-martial. This results in unnecessary delays and duplication of effort.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- System Credibility and Transparency
- Process Timeliness and Accuracy
- Fairness and Due Process

Data Sources:

- Report of the Military Justice Review Group, Part I, pp. 301-06
- Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel, pp. 49-50

Findings:

Military Judges have the authority to conduct certain hearings before referral of charges and the Services have processes in place to facilitate the judiciary's involvement early on in the process. Congress assigned Military Judges this authority based upon a recommendation by the MJRG with the purpose of aligning practice in courts-martial more closely to civilian Federal courts. Judges in civilian Federal courts hold hearings on a number of pre-trial issues in addition to the issuance of compulsory process.

Legal proceedings would benefit from a pre-referral review by a Military Judge or Magistrate, thereby streamlining the military justice process and reducing duplication of effort. Early judicial involvement would be beneficial for matters including, but not limited to: pretrial confinement hearings, inquiries into an accused's mental capacity or responsibility, and requests for Individual Military Counsel, or issuance of protection orders. Post-trial proceedings could also benefit from expanded judicial authority.

Recommendation:

DoD OGC will direct the JSC to formulate a proposal to expand authorities for Military Judges and Magistrates.

Estimated Resource Implications: Minimal.

Manning: Additional Military Judges and/or Magistrates might be necessary to handle these additional hearings.

Recommendation 1.5. Establish and Enhance Roles and Responsibilities for Commanders

The SAAITF strongly believes the ability of the military to maintain a ready and lethal force fundamentally depends on the role and authority of the Commander. However, the SAAITF found two areas where it recommends reform and enhancement of the roles and responsibilities of the Commander.

Recommendation 1.5.1. Role of the Commander to Keep Victims Informed

Background:

Congress, the President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretaries of the Military Departments, and senior leaders in the Military Services have adopted numerous protections for victims in the military justice system. Some of these are innovative programs that provide protections far beyond those available in civilian criminal justice systems, such as the special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel programs.

Crime victims, as defined in Article 6b(b), UCMJ, are afforded certain statutory rights in accordance with Article 6b. Among those rights, a crime victim has the right to timely notice of specified military justice proceedings involving the accused, (as well as the ability to be reasonably heard at some proceedings) – to include: pretrial confinement proceedings under RCM 305(i); preliminary hearings pursuant to Article 32, UCMJ; court-martial proceedings; public sentencing hearings relating to the offense; and public hearings before any clemency and parole board.

Article 6b affords the victim the right to confer with the attorney for the U.S. Government in the case, including the right to confer at any proceeding identified in Article 6b. R.C.M. 306 requires the Secretaries of the Military Departments and, in the case of the Coast Guard, the Secretary of Homeland Security, to prescribe regulations that provide a victim of a sexual assault crime the ability to express their views as to the disposition of the case to the responsible convening authority. Moreover, the convening authority must consider the victim's jurisdictional preference – whether that preference is to have the case adjudicated at a court-martial or a civilian court.

In addition to rights of a victim, there are responsibilities for Commanders, and there are a variety of Commanders who play a role in the process. Rule for Courts-Martial 306 provides that "[t]he Commander, and if charges are preferred, the convening authority, shall consider such views as to the victim's preference for jurisdiction, if available." In this context, the "Commander" refers to the SAIDA or the convening authority. There is no statutory requirement for any Commander to document this preference.

Likewise, there is no statutory requirement for any Commander to notify the victim of the disposition decision personally, and it is appropriate for the Commander to direct a victim-witness assistance specialist or another appropriate individual to make the notification rather than doing so personally. However, Department policy requires the victim's Commander provide sexual assault victims filing an Unrestricted Report with monthly updates regarding the current status of any ongoing investigative, medical, or legal issues impacting the case, as well as command proceedings regarding the sexual assault case until the final disposition. The Chair of the Monthly Case Management Group meeting, typically an installation Commander, is required to ensure that case dispositions are communicated to the sexual assault victim, to the extent authorized by law, within 2 business days of the final decision. There is currently no standardized approach documenting such victim notification has been accomplished

Requiring documentation of compliance with victims' rights, and clarifying the responsibilities of the various Commanders in the process, would serve at least two laudable goals. First, it would promote compliance with the requirements, while providing a means to identify and remedy any failures. Second, the resulting documentation would provide those entities that assess the military justice system with helpful data to inform their analysis.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Commander Responsibility and Authority
- Victim/Accused Support and Experience

Data Sources:

- Article 6b, UCMJ (10 U.S.C. § 806b)
- R.C.M. 306 (M.C.M. 2019 ed.)
- DoDI 6400.07, "Standards for Victim Assistance Services in the Military Community," July 6, 2018
- DoDI 6495.02, "Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Program Procedures," incorporating Change 3, May 24, 2017
- 2016-2017 Military Investigation and Justice Experience Survey

- Briefings to the SAAITF

Findings:

Article 6b and R.C.M. 306 afford a victim of an alleged sexual assault the right to express a preference as to military or civilian prosecution to the responsible convening authority. Currently, there is no statutory requirement that the victim receive notification of a convening authority's disposition decision. There is also no uniform practice across the Services as to how victims of alleged sexual assaults are notified of the disposition decision of the convening authority, nor is there a requirement that this notification be in writing.

While DoDI 6400.07, enclosure 2, para. 3b, broadly discusses victim interaction with the military justice system, there is no specific provision that mandates notification of the victim of disposition decisions by a convening authority. DoDI 6495.02, enclosure 5, para. g2, requires a victim's commanding officer to notify victims who made an Unrestricted Report of updates relating to case progress following monthly Case Management Group meetings. DoDI 6495.02, enclosure 5, para. b3, requires the Chair of the Case Management Group meeting to ensure that case dispositions are communicated to the sexual assault victim, to the extent authorized by law, within 2 business days of the final disposition decision.

Statutes, executive orders, DoD issuances, and Military Department/Service regulations accord extensive rights and procedural protections to victims in the military justice system. However, documentation of compliance with those protections has been inconsistent. Requiring documentation of compliance with victims' rights, procedural protections, and fulfilment of Commander notification responsibilities would promote compliance with those requirements.

In addition, surveys conducted by the Department found that victims' rated survey items regarding updates on the case as lowest in terms of satisfaction with services provided to them (2016-2017 MIJES). The surveys found – and briefings to the SAAITF also raised concern about – victims' perceptions that their Commander was not knowledgeable about the case.

Recommendation:

The Department will direct the Military Services to require SAIDAs to ensure that victim preference on choice of venue is documented prior to making any decisions on disposition of sexual assault allegations. The Department will direct the Commander of a victim to ensure documentation of periodic notification to victims of sexual assault of the key and significant events during the military justice process has occurred. In addition, the Military Services will ensure Commander's compliance with these documentation requirements using established Inspector General inspection processes.

Estimated Resource Implications: None

Recommendation 1.5.2. Training and Education of the Commander at All Levels

Background:

The considerable progress against sexual assault in the military over the past decade highlights important lessons:

- Leadership emphasis across the enterprise is a necessary, but not sufficient, factor to advance sexual assault prevention and response.
- Problematic command climate factors highly correlate with sexual assault.
- Command leadership team preparation and a Commander's responsibility and accountability for the climate of the command play essential roles in promoting healthy climates.
- Service members respond when they perceive sincere leadership support, respect for confidentiality, and sufficient value in the response process.

At the end of the March 6, 2019, Senate Armed Services Subcommittee on Personnel hearing with representatives from the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments, Chairman Tillis stated he desired greater standardization of best practices by Commanders related to their involvement in sexual assault cases.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Commander Responsibility and Authority
- Victim/Accused Support and Experience

Data Sources:

- DoD SAPRO, Military Services, and Congressional input
- 2016-2017 Military Investigation and Justice Experience Survey
- Senate Armed Services Sub-Committee on Personnel Hearing on Military Services' Prevention of and Response to Sexual Assault (March 7, 2019)

Findings:

The Department has oversight responsibility and each Military Service's training command has the capability to carry out and institutionalize this task in Commanders' professional military education (PME) courses and other educational opportunities. Further, precedent establishes the Department's ability to establish minimum standards to be implemented by the respective Service training commands in training objectives across a variety of PME courses.

Recommendation:

The Department will establish training objectives for all aspects of a Commander's role in processing sexual assault cases through a comprehensive review of best practices in military justice, victim assistance, promotion of healthy command climates, and ensuring the accused is afforded due process rights. These training requirements will be standardized and institutionalized across the Military Services' respective training commands. Training will enhance Commander and command team knowledge and skill through improved leadership preparation that emphasizes:

- Expectations of professional conduct for Commanders and their command leadership team and how to promote healthy unit climates and prevent incidents of retaliation against victims, victims' family members, bystanders, witnesses, and first responders.
- Improved competency in skillfully addressing applied leadership challenges such as sexual assault, domestic violence, and child abuse.

- Guidance for commanders on how to explain to their subordinates in their unit the appropriate, professional response by peers to a victim and an alleged offender when a sexual assault is reported in a unit; and to explain that incidents of retaliation, reprisal, ostracism, or maltreatment violate good order and discipline, erode unit cohesion, and may deter reporting of sexual assault incidents.

Estimated Resource Implications: Minimal

Funding: Costs associated with curriculum development, assessment, and oversight of these efforts.

Recommendation 1.5.3. Develop and Enhance Training and Education of Sexual Assault Initial Disposition Authorities

Background:

The training and education of military justice practitioners, Commanders, and convening authorities directly impact the experiences of the victims and the accused.

A Secretary of Defense memorandum of April 20, 2012, withheld initial disposition authority (IDA) for all penetrative sexual assault offenses and attempts thereof from all Commanders who are not at least special court-martial convening authorities (SPCMCA) in the grade of O-6 or above. This restriction applies to all other alleged offenses arising from or relating to the same incident, whether committed by the subject or the victim ("collateral misconduct"). The March 2019 report of the DAC-IPAD determined that "there is no systemic problem with command decision-making regarding preferral of charges for penetrative sexual assaults." DAC-IPAD also found that Commanders' disposition decisions were reasonable in 95% of reviewed cases from FY17. However, the Secretary's memorandum does not specify what training or other formal qualifications these SAIDAs must possess. The Secretary's memorandum requires the SAIDA to consult with a judge advocate in making the initial disposition decision. Formal SAIDA training will further enhance Commander capability in this area.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Training and Education
- Victim/Accused Support and Experience
- Integration and Synchronization of Services

Data Sources:

- 2016-2017 MIJES
- Secretary of Defense Memo ("Withholding Initial Disposition Authority Under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in Certain Sexual Assault Cases") of April 20, 2012
- DAC-IPAD Third Annual Report, March 2019

Findings:

There is no Department-wide consistent specific training requirement for Commanders exercising SAIDA. While Commanders continue to successfully execute decision-making authority as SAIDAs, more formalized training requirements will enhance Commander capability in this area, while promoting trust and confidence in the military justice system.

Recommendation:

The Department will direct formalized training requirements for Commanders exercising SAIDA, and determine minimum training objectives, including a focus on not only the handling of alleged penetrative sexual assault offenses, but also related collateral misconduct alleged against the accused or victim. Training will also focus on reducing retaliatory behavior relating to sexual assault cases and sexual harassment complaints. Training requirements will be standardized and institutionalized across the Military Services' respective training commands.

Estimated Resourcing Implications: Minimal

Recommendation 1.6. Enhance the Military Justice System's Transparency with the Public

Background:

The public, including the media, has far less accessibility to court-martial filings than it does to court records from the federal and state criminal justice systems. In the federal system, the Public Access to Court Electronic Records (PACER) internet site generally makes court filings available as soon as they are filed. For those state systems that do not have comparable internet-accessible systems, most documents can be obtained as soon as they are filed through the clerk of court's office. In the military justice system, however, court filings are generally not made available to the public without a FOIA request, and then only once the case has concluded. That can lead to delays of weeks or months before, for example, a military judge's ruling on a motion is made available to the public. The resulting lack of transparency impedes public knowledge about the court-martial system. The military operates a sophisticated, professional criminal justice system. The Department welcomes public scrutiny of the military justice system.

Because of Privacy Act concerns associated with the release of records maintained by the Military Departments (which, unlike Article III courts, are subject to the Privacy Act), the Military Departments must carefully review court filings for information potentially protected by the Privacy Act before making them publicly available. In the federal civilian criminal justice system, the courts rely on the attorney making a filing to redact any personally identifiable information or other information that would be inappropriate to release.

Task Force Priority Areas:

System Credibility and Transparency

Data Sources:

- MJRG report
- Article 140a, UCMJ, (10 U.S.C. Section 940a)
- The Secretary of Defense memorandum: Uniform Standards and Criteria Required by Article 140a, UCMJ
- Legislative Proposal to except from the purview of the Privacy Act the public release of certain records

Findings:

In the federal civilian court system, the vast majority of court filings are made available to the public immediately upon filing through the PACER internet site. In the military justice system, court-martial filings are generally made available only after a FOIA request has been submitted and only once the court-martial case is complete. The Department has proposed, with OMB's approval, the enactment of legislation to remove from the purview of the Privacy Act the public release of most military court dockets, records, and filings so that such information may be made available to the public more promptly while protecting sensitive information from release in the same manner as in the federal civilian court system.

Recommendation:

The Department will continue to support the enactment of legislation promoting public access to military justice documents by excepting from the purview of the Privacy Act the public release of court-martial dockets, filings, and records. The Department will adopt measures to protect against the inappropriate release of personal information.

Estimated Resource Implications: None

Recommendation 1.7. Extend the DAC-IPAD

Background:

The DAC-IPAD evaluates, among other things, the preferral or non-preferral decisions of convening authorities in adult sexual assault investigative files involving penetrative offenses. Under the existing statutory framework, the DAC-IPAD is scheduled to terminate in February 2021. However, the Secretary of Defense may continue the DAC-IPAD after its current termination date if the Secretary determines its continuation after that date is advisable and appropriate. If the Secretary decides to continue the DAC-IPAD after that date, the Secretary must submit to the President and the House and Senate Armed Services Committees a report describing the reasons for that decision and specifying the new termination date for the DAC-IPAD.

Task Force Priority Areas:

System Credibility and Transparency

Data Sources:

- Section 546 of FY15 NDAA (Public Law 113-291)

Findings:

The DAC-IPAD is a Congressionally-mandated Federal Advisory Committee that assesses the effectiveness of the military justice system as related to adult sexual assault cases and makes recommendations for improvements to the system. Under the existing statutory framework, the DAC-IPAD is scheduled to terminate in February 2021, but the Secretary of Defense has the authority to extend the DAC-IPAD. To extend the DAC-IPAD, the Secretary must submit a report to the President and the House and Senate Armed Services Committees describing the reasons that the extension is advisable and appropriate and specifying the new termination date.

Recommendation:

The Secretary will extend the DAC-IPAD beyond its current termination date to continue to assess the effectiveness of the military justice system for sexual crimes.

Estimated Resource Implications: Minimal

Section 2. Support Recommendations

The SAAITF focused military justice reform recommendations to enhance the protections and support of the victim while protecting the due process rights of the accused. Specific recommendations were formulated as followed:

Recommendation 2.1. Enhance the Integrated Multi-Disciplinary Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution (SVIP) Capability

Background:

In 2009, based on widespread use of multi-disciplinary teams (MDT) in the civilian community, the Congressionally mandated Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in the Military Services (DTF-SAMS) recommended that "[t]he Secretary of Defense establish two installation-level sexual assault management groups: a Sexual Assault Response Team, responsible for overseeing unrestricted reported cases, and a Sexual Assault Review Board, responsible for installation-level systemic issues." While DoDI 6495.02 subsequently established monthly Case Management Groups to address the DTF-SAMS recommendations, the policy did not fully address what could be done to more fully coordinate and optimize investigative and prosecutorial resources.

In 2015, the Secretary established requirements for the SVIP capability in DoDI 5505.19, and the Services have seen the benefits of the increased capability of key participants in the military justice process, such as the MCIOs and judge advocates.

Over the past 10 years, each of the Services has benefited from integrating specially trained and designated personnel during case processing from report to investigation and adjudication. Integration and synchronization of services and personnel have been demonstrated to increase support for the victim throughout the process; improve the timeliness, efficacy, and quality of investigation; and facilitate offender accountability when appropriate. While the efforts to integrate assets may not be uniform across the Services to account for Service-specific missions, maximizing integration efforts to harness SVIP capabilities is a proven concept.

Part of an effective SVIP capability is timely investigations. DoDI 5505.18, Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense, requires MCIOs to initiate a criminal investigation in response to all allegations of adult sexual assault of which they become aware that occur within their jurisdiction, and to investigate them thoroughly. This has led to situations where unnecessary investigative activities are undertaken for the sole purpose of compliance with policy and not towards an investigative purpose, leading to inefficiencies and delays in investigations and processing.

Recently, DAC-IPAD Committee members observed that nearly all the case files they reviewed included the same series of investigative actions. The members believed that in some cases, these investigative tasks appeared to have no probative value and were extraneous and unnecessary given the specific facts of the case.

The Committee's observations were reinforced by testimony received from MCIO investigators, many of whom commented that they have little discretion in determining what steps to take when conducting sexual assault investigations. One investigator noted that investigators have "less control" when conducting investigations than they previously had, adding, "There's almost a checklist and people feel very required to do absolutely everything that is on the checklist." Another noted that investigators have to do the same amount of work for cases that are unlikely to be prosecuted as for cases in which a felony trial is likely. However, the investigators explained that some of the seemingly extraneous investigative steps did serve specific purposes. For example, they told the Committee members that the reason they conduct interviews of a subject's co-workers in a sexual assault case is to detect predatory behavior and identify other potential victims of sexual assault or harassment.

The March 2019 DAC-IPAD Annual Report cites Committee members' concerns "...about the investigators' lack of discretion in how they conduct investigations in sexual assault cases. The Committee noted that the military is treating the investigators as if they were untrained and not fully capable, without giving any credence to their experience and professionalism.... [However] at the same time, the Committee is reluctant to recommend that investigators adopt civilian standards or omit certain investigative tasks, recognizing that what seems extraneous may end up being useful in certain investigations."

Finally, it is critical the members of the SVIP capability are evaluated to ensure effectiveness. In support of the Report to the President of the United States on Sexual Assault Prevention and Response in the Military, the Department initiated a number of approaches to assess victims' experiences with response services and the military justice process. The Department conducted separate surveys that assessed victims' initial experiences with services provided and then victims' overall experience with the military justice process. This survey proved invaluable to gauging victim experience throughout the military justice process.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Integration and Synchronization of Services
- Victim/Accused Support and Experience
- System Credibility and Transparency
- Process Timeliness and Accuracy

Data Sources:

- DoDI 5505.03, Initiation of Investigations by Defense Criminal Investigative Organizations, February 13, 2017
- DoDI 5505.16, Investigations by DoD Components, June 23, 2017
- 2016-2017 MIJES

Findings:

Many valuable resources are being expended in our efforts to effectively respond to incidents of sexual assault. These efforts are focused primarily across three lines of effort – victim care (advocacy, medical, SVC), criminal investigations, and offender accountability (UCMJ prosecution, when appropriate). While DoDI 5505.19 lays out a requirement for collaboration among special victim responders, the focus of the DoDI is on collaboration of separate entities, and may not result in full integration of capabilities.

The training and education of all military justice practitioners within the SVIP directly impacts the experiences of the victims. This was further supported by the 2016-2017 MIJES and briefings to the SAAITF. It is imperative that SVIP personnel, including investigators, trial counsel, and all those involved, have appropriate training on the military justice process, expectations, and trauma-informed communications to ensure the victim is treated fairly, and with empathy.

In addition, there is also a need for increased training of investigators. Sexual assault cases comprise well over a third of the MCIOs' 14,000 + cases initiated per year. Since 2012, MCIOs have focused on providing additional, enhanced sexual assault training to field investigators. While this training has significantly improved the MCIOs' handling of sexual assault cases, as evidenced by recent DoD IG investigation sufficiency review results, the training has essentially been "catch up" training; training for investigators already working in field units.

Further, while MCIOs are required to fully investigate all allegations of adult sexual assault without any professional discretion, there are inefficiencies in the investigative phase leading to long case processing timelines. A collaborative forum between DoD IG and the MCIOs on potential clarifications to policy will most certainly increase the accuracy and credibility of the investigative process.

Finally, data from the 2016-2017 MIJES proved invaluable in the DoD's ability to assess compliance with policies and regulations, determine areas of improvement, and gauge the experiences of victims in the military justice system. The DoD is committed to continuing its assessment of the military justice system to ensure an unparalleled supportive and accountable system is in place.

Recommendations:

1. The Department will, in collaboration with the Military Services, conduct a compliance review of the SVIP capability across all military justice practitioners including investigators, trial counsel, and victim services personnel. This review will include identification of areas of improvement to support this capability within the military justice system.
2. Based on the above compliance review, the Department will revise applicable instructions, as required, to enhance SVIP collaboration, integration, and synchronization involving victim services personnel, criminal investigators, and military prosecutors any time a sexual assault event is reported throughout the entire military justice process.
3. The Department will direct the Military Services to identify the appropriate delegated official within the SVIP to provide and document notifications per Recommendation 1.5.1 in order to ensure regular and consistent updates to the victim as to the progress of the case.
4. The Department will modify applicable instructions to incorporate SVIP capability within the investigative process. SVIP-qualified prosecutors will work closely with the MCIOs when developing the investigative plan. Ultimately, all federal law enforcement investigative processes and final investigative decisions must remain with the lead MCIO.
5. The Judge Advocates General and the SJA to CMC will enhance training requirements for military justice practitioners, including SVC/VLC, defense counsel, and trial counsel. They will also coordinate to determine minimum training objectives, and the Military Services will standardize and institutionalize the training requirements across their respective training commands. Training will focus on not only the handling of alleged penetrative sexual assault offenses, but also related collateral misconduct alleged against the victim.
6. The MCIOs will establish training requirements for investigators. They will also coordinate to determine minimum training objectives.
7. The Department will field the Military Investigation and Justice Experience Surveys in years opposite the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of the Active Duty, and less if need be to minimize burden on victims. In addition, the MIJES will require additional publicity and support from response system professionals to encourage greater participation rates.

Estimated Resource Implications: Minimal

Manning: None – MIJES is conducted by Office of People Analytics

Funding: Approximately $250,000 per administration of the MIJES; additional training costs

Recommendation 2.2. Develop Policy to Enhance Protection for Victim Preference in Restricted Reporting

Background:

DoD policy limits the ability to make restricted reports, and also requires restricted reports be made prior to the Sexual Assault Response Coordinator's notification of the initiation of a criminal investigation. Victims making a disclosure to someone without a privilege of confidentiality to receive such reports oftentimes forfeit their option to make such restricted reports when, in turn, an MCIO is notified of the event. DoD has several years of experience with the restricted reporting process. This experience, together with the evolution of survivor services, specifically the availability of legal counsel services, presents the opportunity to reassess and revise DoD restricted reporting policy to give victims more control over how their disclosures are handled, while still balancing victims' interests with those of society and those accused.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Victim/Accused Support and Experience

Data Sources:

- DAC-IPAD, Third Annual Report, March 2019
- Briefings to the SAAITF

Findings:

DAC-IPAD findings appearing in its March 2019 annual report, as follows:

- Under current DoD sexual assault policy, a victim's communication with another person (e.g., roommate, friend, family member) does not, in and of itself, prevent the victim from later electing to make a restricted report. However, if the person to whom the victim confided is in the victim's chain of command - whether an officer or a noncommissioned officer—or is DoD law enforcement, the allegation must be reported to the MCIO and is therefore treated as an unrestricted report, regardless of the victim's wishes or intent. (Finding 30)
- DoD policy further states that if information about a sexual assault comes to a Commander's attention, even if from a source other than the victim, that Commander must immediately report the matter to an MCIO and an official investigation based on that independently acquired information may be initiated. (Finding 31)
- Several Commanders indicated in their testimony to the DAC-IPAD that the one change they would make to the system is to allow victims who have lost the ability to make a restricted report - whether because of third-party reports or because they were unaware of this consequence of reporting to a member of their chain of command - to restrict any further disclosure or investigation of the incident, if they so desire. Some representatives from the MCIOs testified in support of such a policy; others testified in opposition. (Finding 33)

In addition, at least one briefing to the panel reflected concerns when a victim inadvertently discloses to a mandatory reporter resulting in an automatic conversion to an unrestricted report despite the victim's expressed wishes to remain restricted.

Recommendation:

The Department will develop a policy that would more fully protect the victim's ability to file a Restricted Report, as well as provide victims a confidentiality option should the victim's sexual assault allegation be inadvertently disclosed or a third-party report arise, in appropriate circumstances.

Estimated Resource Implication: None

Recommendation 2.3. Protect Information Used in the CATCH Program

Background:

Section 543 of the Carl Levin and Howard P. "Buck" McKeon FY15 NDAA required DoD to develop a plan that would allow an adult victim who elected to make a restricted report to disclose suspect or incident information to investigators to enable them to determine if separate sexual assaults may have been committed by the same perpetrator. Under 10 U.S.C. § 1565b, persons authorized to receive restricted reports are sexual assault coordinators, victim advocates, or healthcare professionals. To ensure the restricted reporting status is not compromised by reporting details of the alleged incident as part of the CATCH program, persons authorized to accept a restricted report should include those receiving information as part of the CATCH program. Thus, a victim can be assured that he or she can confidentially disclose the details of the alleged incident without initiating an investigation of the allegation except when disclosure is necessary to prevent or mitigate a serious and imminent threat to the health or safety of an individual.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- Victim/Accused Support and Experience

Data Sources:

- Section 543 of the Carl Levin and Howard P. "Buck" McKeon NDAA for FY15
- DoD and Service Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Offices

Findings:

Protecting information provided as part of the CATCH program increases confidence in the system, and will further the Department's efforts to hold offenders appropriately accountable.

Recommendation:

The Department will make clear that information used in the CATCH program will be protected under the restricted report protections and will not be subject to disclosure under FOIA.

Estimated Resource Implications: None

Recommendation 2.4. Develop Defense Investigator Capability

Background:

Defense investigators are a common capability in civilian practice. Federal public defender offices have, on average, one defense investigator for every three defense attorneys. Defense investigators are also often found in state public defender offices. Defense investigators assist defense counsel by locating and interviewing potential witnesses and evidence, identifying experts, and helping defense counsel prepare for trial. The Supreme Court has recognized that the right to counsel is, at its heart, the right to counsel's assistance in both investigating the case and preparing and presenting a legal defense. Because of ethical limitations, counsel are generally prohibited from testifying at trial when they are serving as advocates; those ethical limitations create obstacles to the defense's right to investigate, as often the investigator must testify to what he or she was told or what he or she saw. More importantly, defense counsel are not investigators; they are legal experts. Like the government counsel, who benefit from law enforcement's investigation, the defense counsel should be focused on preparing the case for trial, not investigating the underpinnings of a case.

For these reasons, defense investigators are common in the civilian bar. Almost every federal public defender's office has defense investigators. The creation of civilian defense investigators in the Military Services was strongly supported by two congressionally mandated commissions, one stating that investigators "enable defense counsel to properly prepare their cases."

Finally, defense investigators make it more likely that the system as a whole will function more effectively and efficiently. Our adversarial system depends on both sides being fully prepared to present their cases so that the fact finder has all the relevant information, which is less likely to happen when the defense lacks this asset. In addition, a defense counsel who is armed with the relevant facts can, if he or she chooses, ensure the Government is aware of those facts, and if they change the case's disposition, the Government can evaluate the best course of action in light of the victim's, the accused's, the unit's, and society's interests.

Military defense investigators, or defense litigation support specialists, would operate under the same restrictions on contacting the victim and witnesses that apply to defense counsel. In addition, defense litigation support specialists could identify and interview new witnesses at the direction of defense counsel. However, witnesses already identified and interviewed by the government would be interviewed only by the defense counsel.

Task Force Priority Areas:

- System Credibility and Transparency
- Process Timeliness and Accuracy
- Fairness and Due Process

Data Sources:

- The report of the JPP
- The report of the RSP

- Briefings to the SAAITF

Findings:

Providing defense counsel with defense investigators is an additional tool they can use to effectively represent their clients. By ensuring that both sides are fully prepared for trial, defense investigators will help make the military justice system more effective in determining the truth. In addition, by allowing the defense to identify and bring new evidence to the Government's attention, investigators will help to ensure that the system is more fair and efficient. Defense investigators operate under the same legal constraints on seeking to speak with the victim that apply to defense counsel.

Defense Investigators were strongly supported by the RSP and JPP, and were supported by briefings to the panel.

Article 6b protections currently state "counsel for the accused will make a request to interview the victim through the Special Victim's Counsel, or other counsel for the victim, if applicable." Consequently, there is a gap in protections where the victim does not have an SVC/VLC. Article 6b(f)(1) should be amended to read: "counsel for the accused will make a request to interview the victim through the Special Victim's Counsel, or other counsel for the victim, if applicable. If the victim does not have a special victim's counsel, or other counsel, then the request to interview the victim should be made through trial counsel." Also recommend expanding Article 6b(f)(1) protections to include prosecution witnesses, as well.

Recommendation:

The Department will direct the Services to develop an appropriate defense investigator capability on a trial basis for a three-year term. Following the conclusion of the pilot program, the program will be reassessed to ensure that the defense investigators enhanced the administration of justice and did not have the unintended consequence of deterring reporting or participation of witnesses in justice actions. The Department will assess expanding Article 6b(f)(1) protections to witnesses and explicitly require notification to trial counsel when the victim does not have an SVC/VLC.

Estimated Resource Implications: Extensive

Manning: End-strength; the Navy currently tracks the total cost of its eight DLSS at $1.3M/year, which reflects salary, benefits, PCS travel, and housing/COLA

Funding: Money (both start-up and operating), training, and travel and expense budgets for Trial Defense Service; the Navy budgeted for FY19 $187,000 for travel expenses, $9,000 for access to the TransUnion Investigator Database, and $45,900 for supplies and materials

Task Force Way Forward

The delivery of this report does not mark the termination of the Task Force. In fact, the SAAITF and the Secretary of Defense recognize the critical importance of the group to ensure ongoing collaborations among military justice practitioners, policy, and prevention experts towards enhancement of the accountability and support of the military justice system.

The SAAITF will, upon delivery of this report and official approval and tasking by the Secretary of Defense, develop and deliver a second report on the implementation and integration of the SAAITF Recommendations. This report will detail the specific steps required for the Department to comply with the approved recommendations.

Once this second report is delivered, while the official duties of the SAAITF will terminate, members of the Task Force will continue to meet as an executive council and continue to share data, best-practices, lessons-learned, and additional collaborative information to ensure ongoing evaluations and assessments of the military justice system writ-large continue. To this end, the Task Force has already identified areas of continued concern that require additional data and information prior to determining a way forward. This includes:

1. Data Tracking and Management System. While each Military Service has its own data tracking system, and will comply with the standardized data elements detailed pursuant to Article 140a, all Services are interested in determining whether efficiencies might come from a DoD-wide data management system and the potential expansion of data elements to assist with transparency. The Task Force would like to explore the feasibility and limitations of such a system.
2. Support for the Accused. During briefings to the SAAITF, concerns were raised about the impact of the military justice process on accused and/or their families. The Task Force would like to explore further the need for this support and the feasibility of utilizing existing resources, or establishing new resources, to mitigate this potential concern.
3. Additional Sentencing Reform. The SAAITF considered recommending that court-martial be permitted to impose administrative discharges. However, the Task Force would like to explore this issue further.

In addition to the continued efforts of the Task Force, the Department looks forward to continuing to partner with the Senate and House Armed Services Committees to promote an effective response to the scourge of sexual assault in our ranks. While the SAAITF's recommended initiatives focus on solutions that can be implemented within the Executive Branch, Congress may choose to enshrine some of those solutions in law. Congress has played a leading role in protecting the rights of victims in the military justice system, a role the Department applauds and anticipates will continue. The Constitution entrusts Congress with making rules and regulations for our military. The Department stands ready to assist Congress as it exercises that authority. Lastly, the SAAITF will continue to review new and proposed legislation, as well as feedback from internal and external oversight committees, to determine effectiveness of proposed initiatives and potential benefit towards improving the military justice system.

CHIEF OF THE NATIONAL GUARD BUREAU
GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE
DIRECTOR OF COST ASSESSMENT AND PROGRAM EVALUATION
INSPECTOR GENERAL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

SUBJECT: Establishment of the Sexual Assault Accountability and Investigation Task Force

The results of the 2018 Report on Sexual Assault and Harassment in the Military Academies are unacceptable, and I am resolved that we will do all we can as a Department to address sexual assault in our military. In my testimony during the FY 2020 Posture Hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee on March 19, 2019 and in my direct engagement with Senator Martha McSally, I pledged to do more, and I intend to carry out this commitment. To that end, I am directing a full review of the investigative and accountability processes involved in sexual assault cases. Further, effective immediately, I am establishing the Sexual Assault Accountability and Investigation Task Force (SAAITF). The SAAITF will undertake this review and make recommendations that will improve existing processes to address sexual assault, while ensuring our formations, our communities, the rights of the victim and the accused, and the integrity of the legal process are protected. Our approach to eliminate sexual assault is holistic and includes efforts to prevent this crime, support and care for our victims, and ensure a robust and comprehensive military justice process. While the immediate focus of the SAAITF will be on reforms and improvements to the military justice process, the Department will continue its steadfast efforts to prevent this crime and support our victims.

I am also very mindful of the many prior DoD/Congressional Panels that have contributed to our current efforts – and the ongoing five-year effort of the Defense Advisory

OSD002676-19/CMD003572-19

Committee on the Investigation, Prosecution and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DACIPAD). We will ensure the efforts and work of the SAAITF complements the important work of the DACIPAD.

Sexual assault impacts the entire force across all Military Services. None of us are immune to this crime and all of us are responsible. As such, the SAAITF will be co-led by Dr. Elizabeth P. Van Winkle, Executive Director of the Office of Force Resiliency, the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. They will report directly to me on task force progress and recommendations.

The SAAITF shall be further comprised of senior level or equivalents of the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations, a representative from the Office of the DoD General Counsel, and the Director of the DoD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office. Additional members of this task force shall be considered as required. All task force members shall be full-time or permanent part-time civilian personnel of the U.S. Government or military members.

I expect the SAAITF to identify, evaluate, and recommend immediate and significant actions to improve the accountability process, specific to the investigation and disposition of cases in which members of the Armed Forces are either victims or alleged offenders of sexual assault, while ensuring due process for both. Recommendations shall consider findings of similar previous reviews by experts internal and external to the Department, but must explore new opportunities to enhance the military justice system.

The SAAITF will provide me an interim progress report and, not later than April 30, 2019, will provide a final report that captures key recommendations addressing the investigation and disposition of sexual assault, including potential changes to policy and/or law. The Department will submit a report to Senator McSally and other members of the Armed Services Committees, identifying the initiatives the Department will undertake based on the recommendations provided by the SAAITF.

The importance of this work cannot be overstated. We have an opportunity to underscore the integrity of our military justice system and advance our capability to address sexual misconduct against the men and women of our Armed Forces, while improving the readiness and lethality of the DoD. Only through diligence and innovation will we eliminate this reprehensible crime from our ranks.

Thank you for your support.

Appendix C

Military Justice Reform – Legislative Changes in FY14-FY16

Beginning with the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) FY14, Congress implemented significant reform to the military justice system. These changes were primarily focused on the issues surrounding sexual assault. The changes continued with FY15 and FY16 NDAAs.

FY 14 NDAA

Article 6b, UCMJ, Enacted to Give Victim Rights under UCMJ

Article 6b is created to codify victims' rights such as: (1) right to be protected from the accused; (2) right to timely notice of a pre-trial confinement hearing, an Article 32 preliminary hearing, a court-martial, clemency or parole hearing, or the accused's release from confinement; (3) the right not to be excluded from a public hearing; (4) the right to be reasonably heard at a pre-trial confinement hearing, sentencing hearing, and public clemency/parole hearing; (5) the right to confer with government counsel; (6) the right to receive restitution as provided in the law; (7) the right to proceedings free from unreasonable delay; and (8) the right to be treated with fairness, respect, and dignity.

New Article 32, UCMJ Hearing Procedures

Article 32 hearings changed significantly from "investigations" to "preliminary hearings." The purpose of the Article 32 preliminary hearing is limited to (1) determining if there is probable cause to believe an offense was committed and the accused committed it; (2) assessing whether the convening authority has jurisdiction over the accused and the offense; (3) considering the form of the charges and (4) recommending the appropriate disposition of the charges.

Victims Are Given the Right Not to Testify at Article 32, UCMJ Preliminary Hearings

Victims are not required to provide testimony at preliminary hearings, even if the victim is on active duty in the military. A victim is permitted to decline an invitation to testify and to then be deemed unavailable. (Before this change, civilians – including victims – could not be required to appear at an Article 32 proceeding, but Service members – including victims – could.)

Sexual Assault/Child Sexual Assault Statute of Limitations Removed

Article 43(a), UCMJ, is amended to add sexual assault and sexual assault of a child to the list of crimes that can be "tried and punished at any time without limitation."

Defense Counsel Required to Make Requests for Interviews of Sexual Assault Victims Via Trial Counsel

Article 46, UCMJ, now requires defense counsel to make requests to interview victims of sexual assault offenses through trial counsel; and, at the request of the victim, requires trial counsel, victim's legal counsel, or a victim advocate to be present during the defense interview. This was further amended in FY15 NDAA to remove "Trial Counsel" and insert "Special Victims' Counsel."

Consensual Sodomy Decriminalized

Article 125, UCMJ, is revised to remove the offense of consensual sodomy. Forcible sodomy and bestiality remain offenses under Article 125 and issues such as orders violations (sexual relations onboard a ship) and fraternization under Articles 92 and 134, respectively, remain viable charges independent of the nature of the sexual conduct.

Sexual Assault Offense Notification to Military Criminal Investigative Organization

While already required by DoDI 6495.02, the FY14 NDAA mandates that unit Commanders who receive unrestricted reports of sexual assault must refer the matter to the servicing Military Criminal Investigative Organization (e.g., NCIS).

Mandatory Review of Decisions Not to Refer Charges in Sexual Assault Cases

Establishes two systems for reviewing a decision not to refer charges in cases involving Articles 120(a), 120(b), 125 and attempts to commit those offenses under Article 80. Where the SJA recommends referral and the convening authority declines to refer any charges, the Secretary of the Military Department must review the case. Where the SJA recommends NOT referring charges and the convening authority agrees, the case must be reviewed by the next superior Commander authorized to exercise general court-martial convening authority.

Service Record Notation of Sex-Related Offenses

Requires a notation be placed in a member's service record if they are convicted of a "sex-related offense" by court-martial, or if they receive NJP or administrative action for a sex-related offense.

Clemency Authority for Convening Authorities Limited for Other than Qualifying Offenses

The convening authority's clemency powers significantly limited. Specifically, the convening authority is no longer permitted to set aside a finding of guilty for any offense other than a "qualifying offense." A qualifying offense is defined as: (1) an offense where the maximum sentence of confinement that may be adjudged does not exceed two years; and (2) the sentence adjudged does not include confinement greater than six months or a punitive discharge. In addition, a qualifying offense does not include any violation of Article 120(a), 120(b), 120b, and 125. Additionally, the convening authority is no longer permitted to disapprove, commute, or suspend portions of a sentence that provide for a punitive discharge or confinement in excess of six month.

Victim Participation in Clemency Process

A victim must be afforded the right to submit matters to the convening authority for consideration during the clemency process.

Mandatory Minimum Punishments Established for Sex-Related Offenses

The mandatory minimum for a violation of rape (Article 120(a)), sexual assault (Article 120(b)), rape of a child (Article 120b(a)), sexual assault of a child (Article 120b(b)), forcible sodomy (Article 125), or any attempt thereof is a dishonorable discharge or dismissal.

SECDEF Required to Prescribe Regulations to Prohibit Retaliation Against Victim When Reporting a Criminal Offense

SECDEF is required to implement regulations to ensure the Military Services do not take adverse action against a person who reports a criminal offense. In addition, SECDEF is directed to submit a proposal for a separate punitive article to address this issue.

Victims' Legal Counsel Established

Secretaries of the Military Departments are directed to designate legal counsel for the purposes of providing legal assistance to a victim of an alleged sex-related offense, regardless of whether the report is restricted or unrestricted.

FY 15 NDAA

Access to Victims' Legal Counsel Expanded to Reservists

A member of a reserve component who reports a sex offense that occurred while on active duty, inactive training, or full-time National Guard is eligible for representation by a Victims' Legal Counsel.

Consultation with Victim Regarding Preference in Prosecution Venue

SECDEF is required to establish a process to ensure consultation with every victim of an alleged sexual assault in the United States to determine that victim's preference regarding whether the offense should be tried by civilians or at a court-martial. That preference must be communicated to the convening authority prior to making a disposition decision.

Military Character No Longer a Defense for Certain Crimes

Congress required the modification of M.R.E. 404(a) to prevent the admission of evidence of general military character for the purpose of showing the probability of innocence of the accused of specific offenses, including rape, sexual assault, abusive sexual contact, stalking, child sex offenses, forcible sodomy, and any attempt or conspiracy to commit any of these offenses.

Modification to the Patient-Psychotherapist Rule (M.R.E. 513)

Congress required the modification of M.R.E. 513 to: (1) remove the enumerated constitutional exception, and (2) establish a clearer standard the party seeking the records must meet before the records can be released or for an in camera review to be conducted.

Victims May Petition CCA for Violation of Rights under Military Rules of Evidence (M.R.E.).

Article 6b, UCMJ is amended to allow victims to petition the Court of Criminal Appeals (CCA) for a writ of mandamus if the victim believes a ruling violates the victim's rights afforded by the Military Rules of Evidence, specifically M.R.E. 412 or 513.

Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) is established.

FY16 NDAA

Victims' Rights to Petition CCA Are Expanded

Article 6b, UCMJ is amended to allow victims to petition the Court of Criminal Appeals (CCA) for a writ of mandamus regarding an Article 32 preliminary hearing order, court-martial ruling, or deposition order. This writ petition right specifically applies with respect to the protections afforded in Article 6b, Article 32, and M.R.E. 412, 513, 514, and 615. Such writs will be forwarded directly to the CCA and given priority over all other proceedings before the court.

Victims' Legal Counsel Powers Expanded

10 U.S.C. § 1044e is amended to expressly authorize SVC/VLC to assist victims in (1) any complaint against the Government, including allegations under review by an inspector general and a complaint regarding equal employment opportunities; (2) any request to the Government for information (e.g., FOIA); and (3) any communications with Congress. The following additional changes were made specific to SVC/VLC rights:

- 10 U.S.C. § 1044e(a)(2) is amended to allow civilian employees within the DoD to have access to an SVC/VLC.
- 10 U.S.C. §§ 1044e and 1565b are amended to require notice of eligibility to have an SVC/VLC to eligible victims prior to being interviewed by military investigators or trial counsel, subject to such exceptions for exigent circumstances as SECDEF may prescribe.
- 10 U.S.C. § 1044e is amended to require SECDEF to standardize the time period within which SVC/VLC receive training and to establish the baseline training requirements for SVC/VLC. The amendment also requires SECDEF to establish guiding principles and performance measures for the SVC/VLC program to ensure that (1) SVC/VLC are assigned locations that maximize the opportunity for face-to-face communication with their clients; (2) effective means of communication are available when face-to-face communication is not feasible; and (3) performance measures and standards are put in place to measure the effectiveness of the program.

SECDEF to Establish a Strategy to Prevent Retaliation Against Members Who Report or Intervene on Behalf of the Victim of an Alleged Sex-Related Offense

SECDEF must establish a strategy that promotes bystander intervention, protects bystanders who intervene, and provides for training for Commanders on methods to combat attitudes and beliefs that result in retaliation.

FY18 NDAA

Victim's Writ of Mandamus. Article 6b, UCMJ is amended to expand the enforcement mechanism of victims' rights by providing jurisdiction to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) to hear writ appeals for Court of Criminal Appeals (CCA) rulings arising from victims' petitions for writs of mandamus. Jurisdiction to review victims' petitions for writs of mandamus was previously limited to the CCAs. Article 6b also provides for expedited review of victims' petitions for writs of mandamus at both the CCAs and CAAF. Articles 6b and 30a are amended to authorize a military judge to review pre-referral claims that the victims' rights were violated, and to designate individuals to assume the rights for underage, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased victims. (MJA16).

New Punitive Article. Article 117a (Wrongful broadcast or distribution of intimate images) is new. The NDAA provision prohibits distribution or broadcast of an intimate visual image if: (1) the accused knowingly and wrongfully broadcasted or distributed a visual image; (2) the visual image is an intimate visual image of another person or an image of sexually explicit conduct involving another person; (3) the person depicted in the visual image is an adult who is identifiable from the visual image itself or from information displayed in connection with the visual image, and the depicted person does not explicitly consent to the broadcast or distribution of the visual image by the accused; (4) the accused knew or reasonably should have known that the visual image was made under circumstances in which the person depicted retained a reasonable expectation of privacy regarding any broadcast or distribution of the visual image by the accused; (5) the accused knew or reasonably should have known that the broadcast or distribution is (a) likely to cause harm, harassment, intimidation, emotional distress, or financial loss to the person depicted in the image, or (b) harms substantially the depicted person's health, safety, business, calling, career, financial condition, reputation, or personal relationships; and (6) the conduct of the accused, under the circumstances, had a reasonably direct and palpable connection to a military mission or military environment. Military Justice Review Group

In August 2013, the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommended that the Secretary of Defense direct a comprehensive and holistic review of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) to ensure that the military justice system most effectively and efficiently does justice consistent with due process and good order and discipline. In October 2013, the Secretary of Defense approved the recommendation and directed DoD OGC to conduct a comprehensive review of the UCMJ and the military justice system with support from experts provided by the military Services.

Is it time to sunset the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces?

The Defense Department's establishment of the Military Justice Review Group affords an opportunity to re-evaluate basic aspects of the architecture of American military justice. One is whether the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces ought to be preserved or its jurisdiction transferred to another court. (This is not a new issue; it was briefly raised by the DoD General Counsel during the Carter administration, in a discourse that was informed by a study of Reform of the Court of Military Appeals (also known as "the Rainbow Book" due to its pastel-colored chapters) prepared in 1979 by then-DoD attorney Andrew S. Effron. Decades later, and after distinguished service with the Senate Armed Services Committee and on the Court of Appeals, he now heads the Review Group.)

What, if any, changes ought to be made in the military appellate process involves several component issues, and what, if anything, ought to be done with respect to the Court of Appeals cannot intelligently be examined in a vacuum. With that important caveat, can a case be made that, as part of a larger overhaul of the military justice system, the court's jurisdiction should be transferred (presumably with some changes) to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit? Here are some thoughts to kick off the discussion:

1. The court decides about 40 cases per term on full opinion. That is less than one per judge per month. (It may well be that the current rate of grants is about right or even a bit high in terms of whether the UCMJ-required "good cause" has been shown. But whether more petitions for review should be granted -- on which access to the Supreme Court turns -- is not the issue for present purposes; the numbers are what they are.)

2. The court denies review in several hundred cases each year. These are decided without plenary briefing and oral argument. (Many petitioners for review cite no errors (the so-called "merits cases")). If court-martial appellate jurisdiction were transferred to an Article III court of appeals, these cases would almost certainly be summarily affirmed if not dismissed.

3. The court's FY15 budget is $13,723,000.

4. A review of the court's opinions reveals that few cases turn on issues truly peculiar to the military, and that even those that do could readily be adjudicated, given competent appellate advocacy, by judges without specialized knowledge. The uniformed military legal experience of the judges has varied widely, ranging from zero to very considerable but in any event rarely of recent vintage. Moreover, Congress has provided for generalist Article III judges to sit on the court by designation. Judges of the geographical circuits unquestionably deal with matters at least as arcane as military justice.

5. Having a specialized court with a small plenary docket caseload encourages attention to minutiae.

6. A number of common law countries that -- like the United States -- retain courts-martial, such as the UK, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and Ireland, rely in whole or in major part on non-specialist judges of the regular appellate courts for the adjudication of court-martial appeals.

7. Sunsetting the court would imply no adverse judgment on its work. In 1950, there was a task to be performed in breathing life into what was, in important respects, a new system of criminal justice (even if critical elements such as the role of the commander were anything but new). That function has been performed, so despite ups and downs, Mission Accomplished (not intended ironically) may be a fair way of characterizing the court's six-decade-long trajectory. Additionally, the process of integration into the normal landscape of civilian federal criminal justice has proven inexorable, including the assimilation of the Federal Rules of Evidence through the Military Rules of Evidence and the availability of direct Supreme Court review (albeit for only about one court-martial in 10).

8. Development of a military trial bench since 1968, including in two branches a nod in the direction of fixed terms of office, makes appellate paternalism both less appropriate in principle and less necessary in fact. If paternalism ever was a proper institutional stance, it no longer plays a significant role in the court's jurisprudence and hence nothing of significance would be lost from this perspective if military appellate jurisdiction were transferred to the D.C. Circuit. Even if it were possible to compare the overall defense-friendliness of the two courts, that is not a principled basis for assigning appellate jurisdiction. If the D.C. Circuit can be trusted to dispense justice to civilian federal criminal defendants and military commission accuseds, it can be trusted to do so for court-martial accuseds.

9. If military commission accuseds are entitled (as they are) to appellate review by judges enjoying Article III protection, court-martial accuseds should be as well, but Congress has shown no recent interest in conferring Article III status on the judges of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and there is no reason to expect that to change.

10. To the extent that Congress was particularly concerned about rooting out unlawful command influence when it enacted the UCMJ and created the Court of Military Appeals, doctrine on that subject is now highly developed and can be administered and further elaborated as effectively by an Article III court as by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

11. Is the D.C. Circuit the right court to which to transfer military appellate jurisdiction? Opinions on this may differ, but that court, in contrast with, for example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, regularly hears criminal appeals from district court.

12. Federal courts are not immortal. Consider the Court of Claims (1855-1982), U.S. Court for China (1906-43); Commerce Court (1910-13), U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals (1910-82), U.S. District Court for the Canal Zone (1912-82), Emergency Court of Appeals (1942-62), U.S. Court for Berlin (1955-90); Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals (1971-93), Special Court under the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (1973-96), and Special Division of the D.C. Circuit (1978-88).

Over.

William Generous wrote in his history of the CMA that nothing would make the court more upset than to uproot them from their stately digs and replant them in the Pentagon. His point is that they've always been a military court trying to not be a military court. I can't disagree with any of your points, or find any military advantage of keeping this in Art I.

Military Justice Review Group

Suggestions to the Pentagon's Military Justice Review Group for improvements in the military justice system can now be emailed to OSD.UCMJ@mail.mil. The Office of General Counsel has recommended that comments be submitted by July 1, 2014.

Here are some personal suggestions to kick off the conversation:

Basket 1, Jurisdiction

1.1 Impose a statutory service-connection requirement (less petty offense and overseas exceptions) and overturn the Court of Military Appeals' decision regarding dependent-victim cases in United States v. Solorio, 21 M.J. 251 (C.M.A. 1986), aff'd, 483 U.S. 435 (1987)

1.2 Repeal the Graham Amendment to Art. 2(a), UCMJ, on personal jurisdiction over civilians serving with or accompany an armed force in the field in time of declared war or a contingency operation or, if it is retained, provide for civilian representation on courts-martial of civilians

1.3 Amend the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act to remove the exemption for host-state nationals

Basket 2, Courts-Martial

2.1 Abolish summary courts-martial

2.2 Create standing special and general courts-martial

Basket 3, Convening Authority and the Prosecution Function

3.1 Abolish convening authorities

3.2 Create an independent Chief Trial Counsel in each branch with disposition power for all offenses other than minor disciplinary offenses

3.3 Require disposition decisions to be made in accordance with Justice Department standards for the prosecution of criminal cases in the district courts

3.4 Create an independent court-martial administrator in each branch to select court members

5.3 Appeal as of right as to findings and sentence (including sentence appropriateness) for all courts-martial

5.4 Abolish TJAGs' power to certify cases

5.5 Subject all CAAF decisions to potential U.S. Supreme Court review by writ of certiorari, making it clear in the process that all issues are reviewable, not simply those on which CAAF has granted review

5.6 Organic act for collateral review of courts-martial

Basket 6, Nonjudicial Punishment

Hello Everyone,

Please share in this comment section of the blog whatever suggestions you send out to OSD.UCMJ@mail.mil. - so that other viewers can track on it as well. Your feedback and comments help students like myself (social workers & therapists) to better understand the legal aspect of the military justice system.

Thanks!

I agree with many of the suggestions made and will make the extent of my agreement known. However before I do I would like to say that many of the problems encountered would be avoided if ordinary criminal law offences committed by members of the Forces were tried by ordinary civilian criminal courts. The military justice system should be confined to disciplinary proceedings for disciplinary offences like conduct prejudicial to discipline, insubordination, away without leave, etc. Criminal offences like assault, theft, arson, criminal negligence, murder, fraud manslaughter, etc. should be prosecuted before criminal courts. It does not matter if the victim is a member of the military or the goods belong to the military. The civilian prosecutions before civilian criminal courts would not preempt disciplinary proceedings before military tribunals.

I suspect this is asking too much at this time although countries respectful of human rights and an accused's fundamental, substantive and procedural rights have either abolished military tribunals in peacetime or deprived them of their jurisdiction over ordinary criminal law offences and civilians.

I entirely support:

1. The requirement of a military nexus

2. The elimination of the military courts' jurisdiction over civilians

3. The restructuration of summary trials and the limitation of their jurisdiction to purely disciplinary offences

4. The creation of a standing court martial as opposed to "ad hoc courts". Canada still has not done that. As the Court Martial Appeal Court of Canada said in one of its decision, the only thing that is standing about the Standing Court Martial is the fact that the Court is not standing.

5. The creation of an independent court-martial administrator. In Canada, panel members of a General Court Martial are selected at random and the presiding judge is assigned to the case by the Chief Military Judge.

6. If military judges are appointed on terms, these terms should not be renewable for the reasons given by the CMAC in Leblanc v. Her Majesty The Queen 2011 CMAC 2. Security of tenure is essential to both actual and apparent justice.

7. Broaden the spectrum of sentences so as to eliminate as far as possible the disparities between the range of sentences available to civilian judges and those available to military judges,

8. Provide a right of appeal equivalent to the right of appeal available to an accused prosecuted before an ordinary criminal court. Equality of rights, justice and fairness require no less than that.

9. Finally I agree that, in relation to ordinary criminal law offences, the burden of proof on the prosecution must be one beyond reasonable doubt.

Scrap the Code Committee in its current form, but you need something to replace it since military justice statutes tend to remain stuck.

Principle No. 20 of Draft Principles Governing the Administration of Justice Through Military Tribunals (UN Human Rights Commission): "Codes of military justice should be subject to periodic systematic review, conducted in an independent and transparent manner, so as to ensure that the authroity of military tribunals corresponds to strict functional necessity, without encroaching on the jurisdiction that can and should belong to ordinary civil courts."

I am requesting review/changes of Article 69 (a) of the UCMJ to allow for anyone convicted at a general court martial the right to an automatic appeal to where they do not have to get approval from the TJAG. Article 69 (a) states the following and is applicable for individuals who are confined for 12 months or less -

(a) The record of trial in each general court-martial that is not otherwise reviewed under section 866 of this title (article 66 <http://usmilitary.about.com/library/milinfo/ucmj/blart-66.htm>) shall be examined in the office of the Judge Advocate General if there is a finding of guilty and the accused does not waive or withdraw his right to appellate review under section 861 of this title (article 61 <http://usmilitary.about.com/library/milinfo/ucmj/blart-61.htm>). If any part of the findings or sentence is found to be unsupported in law or if reassessment of the sentence is appropriate, the Judge Advocate General may modify or set aside the findings of sentence or both.

Rationale is as follows - One may receive punishment less than the maximum sentence for ie. fraternization and/or adultery (military only crimes under Article 134 of the UCMJ) yet you have a federal conviction. A federal conviction effects the rest of your life yet you are not afforded the opportunity of an automatic appeal?

Subject: Comments on Military Justice System

The taking away of authority from the convening authorities was a very bad step. No doubt the result of blatant political correctness by the politicians and those pandering to them.

Having been a staff judge advocate to two general courts-martial convening authorities and former military judge, my experience has shown that the convening authorities are important in the military justice system, and that included their power to reverse jury verdicts that contained errors or were not justified by the evidence. For example, in one case, the military judge made an error by failing to give the jury a cautionary instruction. The Convening Authority on advice and consultation with his sja, determined that the case surely would have been reversed on appeal by higher authority. So he decided to reverse the military judge and sent the case back for a new trial. A guilty plea followed. To take away the convening authority's power is a huge mistake in my opinion. This is the military, not a civilian system of justice. Military considerations are involved and should be recognized by the politicians and civilian bureaucrats looking over the system.
Stop the political correctness.

My experience also was that convening authorities did everything to protect the rights of alleged victims of sexual misconduct. The politicians were not justified in eroding the authority of convening authorities. The politicians are making the military justice system more and more convoluted and complex without due and appropriate justification!

Additionally, giving a free lawyer to victims of alleged sexual assault is another example of political correctness run amok. Sometimes the alleged victim is an out and out liar. I saw this happen in a recent case in Minnesota. Giving the victim a free lawyer paid for by the taxpayers is going to interfere with the prosecutor's, trial counsel's ability to talk freely with the alleged victim. Likewise as to the defense counsel. The government is really making a mess of what was a fine system of military justice --just so the politicians can crow and crow about how responsive they are. Now alleged victims will be coached by their free attorney at taxpayer expense--severely interfering with the trial counsel's ability to evaluate the case and the alleged victim's story and credibility.

I understand that the free attorney for victims only applies in cases of alleged sexual misconduct. What about the Equal Protection of the Law? Why shouldn't all alleged victims get a free attorney if you are giving it to one class of alleged victims?

The military justice system was fine the way it was. The politicians should not be allowed to insert politics and lack of rationality into the system.

Another point --- the Rules of Engagement for our troops are way too complex and burdensome. No doubt costing lives of our brave troops. The politicians are making waging war unnecessarily difficult for our troops in harm's way!

RE: Submission to the Military Justice Review Group Related to Sexual Assault Investigation, Adjudication, and Response

To the Members of the Military Justice Review Group:

This submission from Columbia Law School's Sexuality and Gender Law Clinic, by its Director, Professor Suzanne B. Goldberg, responds to the May 16, 2014 invitation of Paul S. Koffsky, Deputy General Counsel of the Department of Defense, for submit comments related to the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG)'s review of the military justice system. It focuses particularly on aspects of military structure, policy and practice that interfere with effective response to sexual assault within the ranks. It also proposes strategies for addressing these structural and procedural challenges.[1]

The discussion begins by examining how commander discretion impedes the military justice system from developing an effective response to sexual assault by service members. The essential point here is that the primary aims served by commander discretion – to promote order and cohesion – are often at odds with the provision of meaningful protection. Appropriate investigation and punishment of sexual assault can be disruptive within a unit; as a result, the discretion structure gives rise to a flawed set of incentives for commanders, who are required to balance serious response to sexual assault with their overarching goal of maintaining unit order and cohesion. Some move toward moderate limitations on commander discretion, such as those adopted in the United Kingdom and Canada, may be helpful, at least as an interim step on this issue.

[1] The Clinic is grateful to the work of Columbia law students Kimber Hargrove '14, Sara Nies '14, A.J. Garcia '14, and Jacqueline Rios '14 for their earlier work on this analysis.

Point 2 addresses the lack of thorough prosecutorial and sentencing guidelines for sexual assault and the harmful consequences that flow from that gap in the military justice system. The main focus of this discussion is on how this absence results in injustice in particular cases, because even a rape conviction does not come with a minimum sentence, and, more generally, undermines the legitimacy of the system. This point also offers brief suggestions about how DOD might go about creating and implementing guidelines.

Point 3 turns to issues associated with the evidentiary rules that currently govern the military justice system's handling of sexual assault. The discussion here identifies problems with the existing rules' implementation by military judges; treatment of service member-therapist confidentiality; and appeal rights and defenses under the rules.

Point 4 addresses the serious procedural flaws associated with the Board of Corrections of Military Records, to which survivors can apply for correction of mistakes or injustices that resulted from their sexual assault, such as retaliation affecting promotions. The Board process suffers from serious procedural failures that are likely caused by the lack of professional members and the exclusive reliance on volunteers whose full-time responsibilities lie elsewhere. To correct these systemic problems, we recommend that the Department of Defense professionalize the Board to the extent possible. Yet while this change is important, its effect is likely to be limited because of broader problems related to sexual assault investigations and prosecutions.

Point 5 addresses the related problem of the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) imposing a more difficult benefits-qualification standard for survivors of military sexual assault who suffer from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) than for other veterans who have suffered trauma as a result of combat, being held as a prisoner of war, or being subjected to fear and terror. Although the MJRG's focus is on the military justice system, justice cannot be had for survivors of military sexual assault unless this issue with VA policy is also corrected. Further, the VA's formal policies, which maintain this higher standard of proof, are also inconsistent with the agency's informal policies, which espouse a different, more lenient standard. This submission recommends that the DOD encourage the VA to update its formal policies and thereby enabling more survivors of sexual assault to access benefits.

Point 6 provides brief discussion of the limits on survivors' remedies in the civil justice system. Because service members are effectively barred from bringing a civil suit either against the military or against other service members by longstanding and entrenched judicial doctrine, the need for meaningful redress of sexual assault within the military is all the more important.

It goes without saying that continued efforts to improve training are essential to addressing the points raised here and any others. We would welcome the opportunity to address broader issues related to the scope of training and related issues in the future.

Submission to the Military Justice Review Group
From Suzanne B. Goldberg,
Director, Columbia Law School Sexuality and Gender Law Clinic

Introduction

The military criminal justice system has the potential to have an important impact on the problem of sexual assault within the military. While adjustments to the system will not eliminate or perhaps even substantially reduce perpetration of sexual assault by service members, a combination of consistent attention and changed policy and practice will help serve both victims and those who are accused of violations. Over time, an improved criminal justice system may also help with some of the much-needed environmental change so that the serious treatment given to sexual assault by high-ranking officials carries over to lower-ranking officers, JAGs, and enlisted service members.[2]

This submission highlights specific issues and suggests potential solutions regarding:

- Commander discretion
- Prosecutorial and sentencing guidelines
- Evidentiary rules
- Board of Corrections of Military Records
- Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA) benefits/remedies
- Civil justice remedies

The Columbia Sexuality and Gender Law Clinic and its director, Professor Suzanne B. Goldberg, will be happy to elaborate any of these points, should that be useful to the Military Justice Review Group.

1. Modifications to Commander Discretion, for the Protection of Both Victims and those Accused as Perpetrators.

While the design of the military justice system serves many of the military's unique needs related to unit cohesion and mission focus, the current command-and-control structure functions as a barrier to effective sexual assault response. In particular, while commander responsibility is centrally important to achieving cohesion and focus,[3] some modifications are essential, at a minimum, if sexual assault within the military is to be addressed meaningfully.[4]

[4] Others have demonstrated why fully "removing cases from the chain of command is a necessary step" and "critical to reduce sexual violence and hold predators in the armed forces accountable." Lindsay Rosenthal and Lawrence Korb, Twice Betrayed: Bringing Justice to the Military's Sexual Assault Problem 6 (Nov. 2013), available at http://cdn.americanprogress.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/11/MilitarySexualAssaults.pdf. This submission strongly commends Twice Betrayed for the Review Group's consideration. This submission also recommends that the Review Group give serious consideration to the recommendations of Protect Our Defenders, including particularly the organization's 2014-15 Policy Priorities, which can be found at http://fip.protectourdefenders.com/downloads/POD_2014-2015_Policy_Priorities.pdf.

As is well known, the multiple sources of authority governing military justice, including the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), the Manual for Courts-Martial, and case law, together grant commanders discretion at nearly every step when a service member in their unit is accused of a crime, including sexual assault.

Also well known is the data from the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) reports. This set of comments will not duplicate what is readily available there;[5] the essential points, for purposes here, are: 1) thousands of accusations of sexual assault are made each year against service members who are subject to military law and commander discretion; 2) many thousands more go unreported, including nearly all assaults perpetrated against men; 3) a high percentage of service member-perpetrators are in the victims' chain of command; 4) no disciplinary action is taken in response to nearly a quarter of sexual assault accusations against service members (24% in FY 2013);[6] 5) a substantial percentage of service members who warrant discipline for sexual assault do not face court-martial (charges were preferred for 71% of this group in FY 2013).[7]

The changes brought about by the 2014 National Defense Authorization Act will go some way toward limiting commander discretion, although much of their effectiveness will depend on effective implementation and oversight (discussed further below).

What might explain why this system is not working as effectively as it ought to? One possibility is that commanders find it less disruptive to handle an accusation informally if the survivor of military sexual assault is not deemed integral to the unit's mission, relative to the accused. Relatedly, because the majority of reported sexual assault victims are low-ranking young women,[8] a commander may prioritize his unit over a single low-ranking member. A third is that non-judicial sanctions remain a substantial part of the response framework, as discussed below, even for service members who are found to have committed sexual assault or other sexual misconduct. In addition, there are numerous specific rules and practices related to the adjudication process, also discussed below, that are deeply flawed and likely discourage victims from seeking redress.

While the newest procedural changes that impose oversight on commander discretion are important, they continue to allow for significant commander control over the process. And, of course, the new measures will be only as good as their implementation. The Inspector General's extended evaluation last year concluded that implementation of earlier training programs and other efforts was uneven across and within the Army, Navy and Air Force.[9] Most fundamentally, in an environment that continues to leave discretion with commanders, any new mandates to be open to reporting and to pursue reports vigorously pursue may be at odds with a commanding officer's sense of what is best to maintain unit order and cohesion.

As the Review Group is surely aware, cases in the United Kingdom and Canada prompted substantial changes in commander discretion in those countries' respective military justice systems.[10] In both countries, courts found that presiding military judges were insufficiently impartial and service members were not receiving fair trials. The legislatures responded with reforms that decreased the amount of commander discretion over the entirety of the prosecution.[11] More specifically, after the Canadian Supreme Court decided R v. Generoux,[12] the Canadian legislature: (1) granted the military police authority to investigate cases independent of commander discretion; (2) created a Director of Military Prosecutions, responsible for preferring all of the charges against a service member; and (3) changed the discretion of the commander so that he or she might choose not to prosecute but could no longer dismiss a case.[13]

The United Kingdom's Parliament reacted similarly after the European Court of Human Rights found that the military judge was neither impartial nor independent, so that service members did not receive a fair trial.[14] Legislators created three tiers of command responsible for cases. First, the commander refers a case to a "higher authority." The higher authority then decides if the case should be dismissed or referred to prosecuting authorities who then make the ultimate decision on whether to prosecute. If prosecution does move forward, court administration establishes all elements of the trial. There is also a reviewing authority, rather than confirmation of the sentence by the commanding officer.[15]

To be sure, the United States military justice system is not identical to the pre-reform systems in the United Kingdom and Canada because of the relatively greater independence of American military judges.[16] Still, both examples, while also imperfect in implementation, demonstrate that removal of commander discretion can be consistent with the unique needs of the military justice system.

2. Prosecutorial and sentencing guidelines as essential guidance for commanding officers and others.

Prosecutorial guidelines issued by the Department of Defense (DOD) would also provide substantial assistance in creating more consistent punishment for reported sexual assaults. The [16] The Supreme Court observed in Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 179 (1994) two decades ago that American military judges are sufficiently independent from the chain of command because they report to the Judge Advocate General and not the officer who convened a particular court martial that the decisions of military judges do not implicate due process concerns.

Department of Justice already does something similar, distributing prosecutorial guidelines to U.S. Attorneys,[17] and has done so for many years.

The current absence of thorough guidelines results in disparate sentences among cases and across installations, further undermining confidence in the justice system. In addition, the absence of minimum sentences means that even panel members considering the most serious crimes will be instructed that they can opt for no punishment or for minor punishments such as a fine or reprimand. Further, because judges tell panel members first to consider the least punitive of potential punishments, the sentencing process is subjected to further skewing.

At a minimum, for more egregious forms of sexual assault, including—but not limited to—rape, the guidelines should strongly recommend stricter punishments. For all sexual violence, guidelines can also reinforce that administrative actions are discouraged or impermissible, and harsher punishments are appropriate absent unusual circumstances. With thorough guidelines, DOD and the Commander in Chief would send a clear message to the chain of command regarding the need for meaningful punishment in cases of sexual assault, even if the commanding officers retain some discretion. Guidelines would also be important for any review of a commander's decisions concerning the sentence of the accused.

To prepare thorough guidelines, we encourage DOD to work with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, officers, and enlisted service members as well as advocates for victims and for the accused. At a minimum, even if DOD remains committed to substantial commander discretion, a "directive-type memorandum" similar to those issued regarding collateral claims in sexual assault cases, could be a basis for issuing thorough guidelines.

3. Shifts in the Enforcement, Coverage, and Appeal Rights Related to Evidentiary Rules as Necessary Protection for a Fair and Accurate Process.

Serious problems remain with evidentiary rules that can and should be corrected promptly. The first relates to implementation: Our understanding is that judges throughout the military are not complying with existing rules to protect victim privacy. Most specifically, Military Rule of Evidence (MRE) 513, which protects against disclosure of confidential communications between a patient and therapist, is often breached by judges. DOD can issue a memorandum reinforcing the need to comply with this and related rules.

A second problem relates to appeal rights: To provide further correction to the misapplication of evidentiary rules in sexual violence cases, DOD can support a right to interlocutory appeal where violations of MRE 513 and MRE 412 (the rape shield) rules may have occurred. Interlocutory appeals are critically important in these circumstances because substantial harm occurs and the contested issue may become moot when a court reviews or turns over the records improperly to the accused.

A third problem relates to the rules' coverage. MRE 513 does not currently give communications between patients and mental health professional the same protection as rules governing attorney-client, penitent-clergy, and spousal relationships. It is difficult to understand why this would be the case. Inadequate protection for these records provides another means for an accused perpetrator to harass his victim and further undermines the ability of those victimized to have confidence in the system that is designed to protect them. Further, these records are developed in the course of a patient trying to understand and assimilate their experience of a traumatic event. The focus, in other words, is on the patient's processing of the experience for mental health purposes, not on setting out facts for purposes of establishing the perpetrator's actions. The clash of purposes, while obvious to psychiatric experts,[18] seems to have eluded many military judges up to this point and warrants immediate redress.

A fourth relates to the defenses available under the evidentiary rules. It is still the case that defendants can rely on MRE 404 to claim "Good Military Character" as a defense to charges related to sexual assault. While the Victims Protection Act of 2014 remains pending, it would be important for DOD to do all that it can to make clear its view that good military character is not acceptable as a defense to any charge of violent conduct against another person.

4. Improvements to the Staffing and Practices of The Boards of Corrections of Military Records.

As the Review Group knows, the Board of Correction of Military Records (the Board) in each military branch may, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. § 1552, correct any military record in that department and can upgrade a discharge and provide back pay. The Army Board, for example, states that its mission is "to correct errors in or remove injustices from Army military records."[19] If a service member receives an adverse decision from the Board, he or she must pursue the claim in civil court; the military offers no further relief. As this Group also knows, and as is noted briefly below, pursuit of a claim in civilian court is generally fruitless.

These Boards are relevant for service members who have experienced certain forms of retaliation following sexual assault in the past, such as punitive discharge, that affected their status. If these service members can amass sufficient evidence, they may be able to access the records correction, discharge upgrade, and back pay the Board is able to authorize. Service members might also have an interest in upgrading their discharge for their own personal satisfaction, even if they do not seek or receive back pay.

There are numerous structural problems associated with the Boards, however, which are likely to impede records correction for service members who have been sexually assaulted.[20] One is that Board members are volunteers and, other than in the Coast Guard, which seeks legally trained members, lack backgrounds that prepare them for their "quasi-judicial service."[21] In addition, the Boards typically review cases quickly, with no advance preparation, other than in the Coast Guard.[22] Also, Boards handle each case individually, meaning they do not typically rely on previous decisions for precedent or guidance. Needless to say, this structure impedes consistency, enables arbitrariness, and risks illegitimacy since two applicants with similar facts who seek the same relief from the Board can receive opposite rulings.

Another paradigmatic example of retaliatory action against a sexual assault survivor that might be the subject of a records-correction effort would be non-promotion as a result of a commander viewing a service member who filed a report as a "troublemaker." Also possibility is that service members who experienced Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) or other health consequences as a result of being assaulted received a lower grade of discharge that might warrant correction.

But the Board's structure makes presentation of these types of claims more difficult than it needs to be. Boards do not publish the criteria they use to make decisions, nor offer any guidance about what evidence is accepted or credible. The only available instruction regarding submission of evidence is the requirement of service records. Both of these issues, as well as the issue of non-expert volunteers, warrant adjustment. In addition, training regarding the circumstances of sexual assault survivors that relate to records correction, particularly while the military is transitioning from a period of concededly inadequate oversight, would be appropriate and helpful.

5. VA Policy Related to PTSD Coverage as an Important Aspect of Military Justice for Sexual Assault Survivors.

Although the Review Group's task is to focus on the criminal justice system, it is necessary to raise the related issue of Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) policy regarding PTSD experienced by survivors of sexual assault. Here, the issue is that different and more burdensome rules remain in place for sexual assault survivors than for other service members who suffer from combat-related PTSD. These problems are well reviewed elsewhere, including in a pending petition before the US Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, Service Women's Action Network and Vietnam Veterans of America v. Shinseki.[23] The reason for flagging them here is that actions to address the criminal justice process will be limited in their success if veterans who have suffered sexual assault are treated worse than others. Indeed, the difference is even more striking after the 2010 rule change that enabled a presumption of PTSD for veterans stationed in combat areas[24] yet no similar presumption related to military sexual assault, which many, including the VA, consider a primary cause of PTSD in female veterans.[25]

Under the applicable rule, veterans who seek sexual assault-related compensation for PTSD have a particularly difficult task in proving that there is a "nexus" between their PTSD and the sexual assault.[26] The reason is straightforward: survivors of sexual assault often lack a paper trail similar to what others with PTSD can produce. Sexual assault can happen anywhere, and survivors often will not report an assault or will choose to file a restricted report. When filing a restricted report, the survivor has the right to have an official record of the incident created through SAPRO, a crucial step for receiving VA benefits should she experience PTSD. However, the Veterans' Benefits Administration manuals do not reference a policy for obtaining the official reports from SAPRO, leading to denial of PTSD benefits due to lack of corroboration.[27]

Although the VA does not absolutely require a paper trail to establish that PTSD was connected to sexual assault,[28] a lack of time and resources mean that, in practice, veteran benefits administrators often deny those claims that are not supported by documentation other than service records, and have even denied claims supported by a psychotherapist's statement.[29] This remains the case even when the VA's own training material states that "a qualified examiner's opinion can be considered credible supporting evidence for occurrence of the MST stressor."[30]

But internal inconsistencies in documentation requirements further complicate the regulations for sexual assault-related PTSD benefits. Until the official policy is changed to reflect the more flexible standards the Veterans' Benefits Administration's letters espouse, veterans and VA officers alike will likely remain confused as to who should receive compensation. Inconsistencies are likely exacerbated by administrators' workload, although the VA, as of 2010, had "not fully assessed to what extent [military sexual trauma]-related cases affect its current workload or if there are differences in rate of awards or denials for [military sexual trauma]-related claims."[31]

Still, given the staggering statistics regarding underreporting of military sexual assault, the VA might more accurately distribute benefits if they accept as true the testimony of service members who claim sexual assault unless it is refuted by "clear and convincing evidence to the contrary"[32] as it already does for fear and terror-based PTSD. Reinforcement by DOD of the need for clarity and repeated guidance to VA administrators could help here.

6. The Absence of Civil Remedies for Survivors of Military Sexual Assault as an Underlying Factor Reinforcing the Need for DOD Leadership.

Given long-standing Supreme Court doctrine barring active-duty service members from suing the military or officers in the military in civil courts,[33] it is all the more important that DOD exercise leadership in every possible domain on this issue. Indeed, a number of significant cases that reinforced the broad prohibition against civil remedies, including Stubbs v. United States, have arisen as a result of sexual assault victims' efforts to seek civil relief following their inability to obtain an adequate response from with the military.[34]

In Stubbs, a female service member's superior officer told her that he would make her life miserable unless she had sex with him. This incident occurred immediately before the service member left the base for a short period of Christmas leave. Stubbs, who had been raped in the past, killed herself at the end of her leave rather than return to the base to face the threat of rape. The Eighth Circuit ruled that, because Stubbs' superior officer harassed her on the military base and because Stubbs was an active-duty service member, the harassment and resultant suicide were incident to her military service.

In short, this doctrine, which turns centrally on an assumption that the military will handle its discipline adequately and in light of its needs, further amplifies the harms that result from inadequate legal protection within the military for sexual assault survivors.

Recommendations to the Military Justice Review Group on Ways to Improve the Military Justice System

RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE MILITARY JUSTICE REVIEW GROUP ON WAYS TO IMPROVE THE MILITARY JUSTICE SYSTEM

The military justice system must modernize in a way that prevents the problems that have spurred the current review--especially those related to the handling of sexual assault cases. To accomplish this, the role of the Convening Authority ("CA"), while integral in many respects, must be appropriately cabined to prevent the exercising of that power in ways that hinder, rather than promote, justice. If the recent deterioration of public confidence in the military justice system is any indication, the military's standards of justice--while unique and separate for good reason in many respects--must become more aligned with civilian definitions of justice. Ultimately, the military is run by civilians and subject to legislation and administrative regulations created and enforced by civilians.

When civilians' discontent with the military justice system coincides with many military members' own discontent--as it has in the area of sexual assaults--then strong pressure to prevent further injustices is not only warranted, but appropriate as a fundamental check upon the insular nature of the military and its justice system. Undoubtedly, the need for a CA to exercise his/her full complement of powers may be at its zenith during forward-deployed combat operations, but outside of that sphere, when that need is much less acute, it is the demands of justice that approach their zenith. Certainly, if the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of all the armed forces, has additional latitude to exercise his military power during wartime (and thus less power during peacetime),[1] it should not be any different for the President's subordinate officers.

We note that the mission of military lawyers is the creation and maintenance of "a military justice process that is, and is perceived to be, just."[2] That perception of justice is critical to the proper functioning of any justice system. For the military, there is a twofold scrutiny, with two different lenses through which its actions are judged: first, the system needs to be perceived as just by servicemen and servicewomen subject to that system; second, it must be perceived as just through the lens of the civilian justice system. Thus, the metric by which military justice is judged is not simply whether the adjudication of justice is or is not proper. The metric is also whether or not such adjudication appears improper, both in its results and in its procedures. This standard should come as no surprise to members of the military, whose core principles always have included the tenet that all servicemen's and servicewomen's behavior be "above reproach" and "beyond the appearance of impropriety." The military has fallen short of meeting this standard with respect to its military justice system. It is time to make changes to address those shortcomings.

Although media and other public commentary on sexual assault cases have focused almost entirely on the rights of the alleged victim, the rights of the accused also deserve attention. Given the high profile of sexual assault claims and the official emphasis on responding to them, some CA's might convene courts martial in response to such claims, even when the evidence does not support such charges (and would likely not result in a prosecution if the charges were unrelated to sexual assault).[3] An independent and more professionalized process for responding to allegations of sexual assault might well protect the accused from inappropriate decisions to prosecute in response to public and higher level pressure.

The 2014 National Defense Authorization Act ("NDAA") made great strides towards righting the ship of military justice. Those efforts are to be commended. Recently, we expressed our support for the proposed Military Justice Improvement Act because it removed commanders' CA power for "serious crimes that are not uniquely military in nature."[4] Instead, we support placing that power in the hands of Staff Judge Advocate ("SJA") prosecutors that are independent of the chains of command of both the alleged perpetrator and the victim. This revision would place legal decisions in the hands of experienced legal practitioners--a practice that already has been successfully implemented in the militaries of our staunchest historical allies, with no evidence of any decline in unit readiness or cohesion.[5] Such a change would also bring increased legitimacy to--and confidence in--a system criticized internally and externally on both issues. As the Commandant of the Marine Corps recently stated, sexual assault victims "don't trust the chain of command," meaning they do not trust CAs to properly investigate and adjudicate their claims.[6] This change would not only bring the United States in line with other modern military justice systems in dealing with serious crimes,[7] but would still allow CAs to retain their power over non-serious crimes, as well as serious exclusively-military offenses.

Further to that endorsement, we make additional recommendations below. Some of these recommendations include specific limits on the power of CAs--these are recommended only in the event that CA power is not categorically removed for all serious crimes that are not uniquely military in nature. Other recommendations do not involve CA power and are recommended regardless of how the issue of CA power is ultimately resolved.

Recommendation 1: All unrestricted[8] reports of sexual assault should automatically be forwarded to, and investigated by, each military branch's independent investigation service.

The investigation is arguably the most critical and important phase of the entire military justice process. The investigation is where the facts are developed, and the existence or non-existence of these facts will ultimately determine an accused's guilt or innocence. Nowhere is this principle more important than in the investigation of sexual assault crimes. From the proper collection and analysis of physical evidence, to the taking of victim statements, investigations into sexual assault require years of highly specialized training and experience. It is imperative that these investigations be conducted with true independence to the greatest extent possible, free from direct and indirect, conscious and unconscious, command influence

Currently, unit commanders have a significant amount of influence and/or discretion on how sexual assaults are investigated within the military. Commanders decide who investigates the alleged offense, decide how much time will be spent investigating, and even control many aspects of how the investigation is conducted--to include what "leads" are followed and what resources are (or are not) allocated to the investigation. Commanders appoint Investigating Officers ("IOs") to conduct the investigation, and the IO can investigate only matters that the commander decides are within the scope of the investigation. The IO reports directly--and only--to the commander, the same commander who will later write that IO's Fitness Report, rank that IO among his/her peers, and ultimately influence whether the IO is promoted or passed over.

Additionally, the vast majority of IOs do not have any specialized training or consistent experience investigating serious crimes--especially crimes as complex and sensitive as sexual assault. Many are assigned to be an IO as a secondary duty, to be completed in addition to their regular tasks. While the IO's main focus is supposed to be the investigation, practically speaking, many IOs are still required to complete their normal duties, which hampers their ability to conduct a detailed and thorough investigation. Further, the investigatory report itself is prepared for a commander--not for a prosecutor--and this critical distinction can have real effects at a later trial. In short, an IO is typically armed with the training to effectuate the completion of a report, but not to prepare the foundation for a criminal trial.

Each service branch, however, has its own specialized, highly trained, amply equipped, and vastly more experienced criminal investigation service. The Navy has the Naval Criminal Investigative Service ("NCIS"); the Air Force has the Office of Special Investigations ("AFOSI"); and the Army has its Criminal Investigation Command ("Army CID"). These agents, analogous to an FBI for each branch, were created for the purpose of investigating serious crimes, with the specific intent of preparing cases for criminal prosecution (if warranted). These agencies have a deep knowledge of the military and how it works, and are accustomed to working with commanders. They also have special training in interviewing sexual assault victims. But, while [8] Victims of sexual assault can report the crime along one of two different tracks: "restricted" and "unrestricted." Unrestricted reports are forwarded to the victim's chain of command for investigation, along with the details of the crime, including the victim's identity. Restricted reports, however, are confidential, and the chain of command will be notified only that "an assault has occurred and provide[d] details that will not identify the victim." Victims receive medical care, counseling and other support services under both tracks. The restricted reporting track is designed to increase reporting of sexual assaults in cases where the victim "desire[s] only medical, legal, advocate, and support services [but] no command or law enforcement involvement." See http://www.preventsexualassault.army.mil/policy_restricted_unrestricted_reporting.cfm (last accessed June 26, 2014).

commanders have voiced that they use these investigatory agencies for some sexual assault cases, they are not used in all sexual assault cases.

The Department of Defense should mandate that these agencies investigate every unrestricted report of sexual assault, not only because the agencies are better equipped to handle these cases, but also because the agencies are not part of anyone's chain of command. While the agents still work with the commanders, they can, if need be, elevate concerns to their true boss--the Service Secretary--while remaining insulated from retaliation by the command. Thus, using the investigatory agencies instead of IOs will increase the actual quality and independence of investigations, while also increasing public confidence in the military's handling of sexual assault cases.

But, increased funding needs to be given to these agencies. There were an estimated 26,000 sexual assault victims last year alone, although only about 14% reported the crime.[9] However, those reporting statistics appear to be climbing, as more and more sexual assault victims feel comfortable reporting these crimes (FY 2012 saw a 37% increase in reported sexual assaults from FY 2010). NCIS, for example, is already experiencing budgetary and staffing problems, as a result of the increased number of sexual assault investigations it conducts.[10] The Department of Defense should be petitioning Congress for increased funding based upon this increased mission--the military's sexual assault victims deserve nothing less than a completely competent, independent investigation. And an increase in these agencies' budget is a necessary step to giving them the justice they deserve.

Recommendation 2: All sexual assault investigations should automatically include investigation of potential retaliation against the accuser.

The perceived threat of retaliation was cited by 47% of military sexual assault victims as a reason why they never reported a sexual assault against them.[11] When combined with the fact that approximately 86% of the estimated 26,000 sexual assault victims never reported the assault at all,[12] that means approximately 10,500 more sexual assault victims might have reported their assault if the fear of retaliation was sufficiently removed.

The 2014 NDAA made it a crime to retaliate against sexual assault accusers,[13] which was a positive step. However, while the threat of prosecution may prevent some retaliation from occurring, there are no policies in place to discover whether this retaliation is still occurring. In order to truly combat retaliation, potentially retaliatory acts need to be rooted out early. The investigator therefore should be required, as a mandatory part of the investigation, to inquire into potential retaliation against the victim. Further, even after the investigation is complete, the victim's Special Victims Counsel ("SVC")[14] should follow up with the victim twice per year, for at least one year, to give the victim another opportunity to safely report retaliation to a trusted advisor outside the victim's chain of command, who is already familiar with the victim's case. It is critical that the victim be made to feel that the service actually wants to pursue retaliation claims, and following up with the victim to ensure that he/she has reported all potentially retaliatory actions is a key part of that process. This is also an additional reason why NCIS, AFOSI, or Army CID should be investigating each and every sexual assault claim--because they are best suited to provide the command independence that is necessary for these victims to report retaliation.

Recommendation 3: The decision whether to proceed to a General Court Martial after an Article 32 hearing is a decision to prosecute at a federal criminal trial, based upon whether or not there is probable cause to prosecute.[15] The post-Article 32 determination of whether or not there is probable cause to prosecute a defendant should lie with a neutral and detached magistrate, not the CA or the SJA prosecutor.

Currently, at the completion of the Article 32 hearing, the Article 32 IO prepares a report for the CA, which details the evidence for and against the accused and determines whether or not there is probable cause to proceed to a General Court Martial ("GCM").[16] The 2014 NDAA requirement that the Article 32 IO be an SJA (wherever practicable), reflects the necessity of a trained lawyer to be involved with the process of determining whether or not probable cause exists. This requirement injects a great deal of credibility and specialized legal training into the process; however, it does not create procedural safeguards to ensure that probable cause determinations are made by neutral and detached persons. The United States Supreme Court already has determined that civilian prosecutors, like police officers, cannot make probable cause determinations.[17] Prosecutors' duties are those of law enforcement, and allowing them to decide for themselves when they have met their burden of establishing probable cause is anathema to core principles of justice. As noted above, this concern relates both to the rights of the victim to have charges taken seriously, and the rights of the accused not to be subjected to unwarranted prosecution.

In the context of Article 32 hearings, the CA sits in the role of chief prosecutor--it is the CA's responsibility and duty to prosecute those cases that merit prosecution and to decline to prosecute those that do not. Because of his/her prosecutorial role, the CA should not be the one making probable cause decisions, for the same reason that prosecutors do not make them--the risk of bias

[14] While every service branch has incorporated the SVC program, there may be differences between the branches' programs. See http://www.msnbc.com/msnbc/military-sex-assault-svc-program (last accessed June 18, 2014). To the extent that any branch does not automatically assign a trained SVC to every alleged sexual assault victim, the branches should immediately incorporate this minimum standard.

that can factor into the decision. This problem is magnified by the fact that the CA can also play the role of police chief during the initial investigation phase--coordinating and directing the investigation, with broad power to decide the who, what, when and where of the investigation.[18] Thus, when the CA steps into the role of prosecutor, the CA embodies both arms of law enforcement, and cannot be considered--in any realistic terms--to be neutral or detached. It is precisely because of this involvement that a neutral and detached magistrate, a military judge, should make the ultimate determination of whether probable cause exists after an Article 32 hearing.

The same report that is prepared by the IO, should now be forwarded to a military judge, for a neutral and detached legal determination of probable cause. If the judge determines that there is probable cause, then the case should proceed to a GCM. If the judge determines that there is not sufficient probable cause to proceed to a GCM, the CA can decide whether to adjudicate the matter using a lower level of court martial, a Non-Judicial Punishment ("NJP"), an Administrative Separation ("AdSep"), or a dismissal of the charges. The CA can also decide to conduct further investigation to develop facts that can support probable cause. If, however, the CA disagrees with the military judge's legal determination that there is no probable cause, the CA should be able to appoint a prosecutor and appeal the decision to the CAAF.[19] This still allows the CA to exercise tremendous power and autonomy in adjudicating offenses, while limiting only the CA's ability to prosecute felony cases without probable cause.

This approach will prevent the very real problem of CAs prosecuting cases that they know lack probable cause, simply to prevent the CA, his/her command, branch, or the military in general, from looking like they are "soft" on crime.[20] It makes sense that the accused in these situations will take the court martial to a verdict, rather than enter a plea--and the military is experiencing a dramatic rise in the number of contested courts martial.[21] Further, as one retired JAG officer notes, the acquittals that almost inevitably result from these prosecutions can embolden potential offenders.[22] This change seeks to prevent the negative effects of improper prosecutions, while still affording the CA a tremendous amount of flexibility and autonomy to craft both judicial and non-judicial punishments for accused service members.

[18] This is another reason why the services' special investigation agencies should be investigating these crimes.

[19] This is in line with MCM Rule 908(b), where interlocutory appeals halt any further judicial action until the CAAF renders its decision on the subject motion or order.

Recommendation 3 (Alternate): If Recommendation 3 is not accepted, then the following recommendation is provided in the alternative: CAs who do not follow the Article 32 IO's determination of probable cause should have all such decisions subject to a standard system of review.

Currently,[23] when a CA does not follow the advice of the Article 32 IO, and either proceeds or does not proceed to a GCM (against the recommendation of the IO), he/she will have that decision reviewed by a higher authority only if the case was a sexual assault case. If the case did not involve sexual assault, the CA's decision is not reviewed, and the CA does not even have to provide a justification for that decision (much less a justification based solely on the specific facts presented at the Article 32 hearing).

The 2014 NDAA recognized the need for CAs to have accountability for these decisions. While the NDAA specifically addressed sexual assault cases, the principles that require such accountability are not limited to sexual assault cases. Besides sexual assault crimes, many other high-level crimes are equally susceptible to improper CA action. These crimes should be treated the same as sexual assault cases, with a review by the appropriate higher authority--the Secretary of the Service for felonies that were determined to have probable cause, but did not proceed to a GCM, and the next higher echelon for felonies that were found to lack probable cause, but still proceeded to a GCM.

Recommendation 4: Article 32 IOs should be required to be an SJA "unless a SJA is unavailable."

The 2014 NDAA included the following change to which types of officers could serve as Article 32 IOs: "where practicable, you will have a judge advocate conduct the Article 32 investigation."[24] The policy chief of the Army's Criminal Law Division, Col. John Kiel, Jr., has interpreted the "where practicable" language to allow the Army to substitute infantry line officers for SJAs if the Army wanted the Article 32 IO to be able to "put [him/herself] in the shoes of the accused."[25] Or, if the case involved a "complex [temporary duty] fraud," the Army "might want to have a finance officer as the IO."[26]

As discussed supra, the ultimate function of the Article 32 IO is to provide a determination of whether or not there is probable cause to proceed to a GCM. That determination is a legal question, and CAs should not be appointing an Article 32 IO because that IO can "put [him/herself] in the shoes of the accused." This standard injects an entirely subjective element into the determination of whether probable cause exists. Putting oneself in the shoes of the accused is more appropriate for sentencing recommendations, not probable cause determinations.

Furthermore, if the concern is giving sufficient protection to the accused at the Article 32 hearing, defendants already have heightened protections, which flow from the nature of the Article 32 hearing itself (as compared to a grand jury hearing, for example). Principally, these protections include the ability to be represented by defense counsel and cross-examine the witnesses at the hearing. In fact, the Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force already routinely used SJAs as Article 32 IOs; it was only the Army that did not, and it was the Army that lobbied for this language change, "largely because" it did not have enough SJAs.

While the 2014 NDAA's language recognizes the need for flexibility in cases where a SJA is not available, the Army's interpretation of "where practicable" frustrates the underlying purpose of the 2014 NDAA's change--that SJAs are best-suited to make determinations of probable cause, and SJAs should be used if they are available.

Thus, we urge that the "where practicable" language be interpreted so that an SJA should be used if available. We also recommend that the 2014 NDAA language be amended to read as follows: "You will have a judge advocate conduct the Article 32 investigation, unless a judge advocate is unavailable." To be clear, this proposal is not an indictment of the Army; it is simply a recognition that the language creates a loophole which makes it susceptible to being interpreted by all the service branches in a more expanded way than the rationale for the 2014 amendment justifies.

Recommendation 5: The authority to enter into a pre-trial agreement ("PTA") for sex crimes or felony offenses should be vested solely with the SJA, not with the CA.

The 2014 NDAA removed all CAs' ability to set aside the verdict from a court martial and/or change the punishment awarded in sex crime cases. Prior to the 2014 NDAA, a CA could, after a court martial found a defendant guilty of rape, completely override that finding and declare the person innocent, or merely guilty of a lesser-included offense. The CA could adjust the sentence awarded by the court as well. After cases like that of Lt. Col. James Wilkerson--who was convicted by a jury[27] of aggravated sexual assault, but was then unilaterally acquitted by a three star general because the general did not believe the victim's story--Congress amended Article 60 of the UCMJ to ensure that these types of situations do not happen again. Specifically, CAs are no longer allowed to change a court martial's finding of guilt or innocence for any sex crime, and CAs cannot adjust a finding of guilt for a felony offense if the sentence is more than six months, or results in a discharge.

Unfortunately, Article 60 still allows CAs the ability to accomplish the same result by exercising their pre-trial powers, which were left unchanged. CA's have unfettered power to enter into PTAs with defendants, setting not only what crime the defendant will be found guilty of, but also the maximum punishment the defendant can receive.[28] In other words, the CA can effectively [27] A jury is called a "panel" in the military.

[28] When a PTA is involved, the trial proceeds in two phases. In the first phase, guilt is adjudicated for the offense to which the defendant pleaded. In the second phase, the court imposes a sentence on the defendant, then compares it to the maximum sentence allowed under the PTA; if the PTA's maximum sentence is lower than that awarded by the court, the defendant receives the lower sentence.

bypass the 2014 NDAA changes to achieve the same result. In a post-2014 NDAA iteration of the Lt. Col. Wilkerson case, the CA would now be incentivized to enter into a PTA with the defendant, allowing him to plead guilty to a much lower offense with a much lighter sentence. While a complete acquittal is taken off the table, the ability of a CA to usurp justice with virtual impunity is not.

To rectify this problem, PTAs for sex crimes and felony crimes should be made by the SJA, not the CA. The CA can--and should--give his/her recommendation on whether or not a PTA should be offered, and what the PTA should include, but the ultimate decision of whether or not to accept a plea to a felony or sex crime should rest with the prosecutor. The CA will still retain the unilateral power to enter into PTAs for non-felony offenses and other non-sex crimes (which includes all "good order and discipline" offenses). However, the CA would lose the ability to change before trial what he/she is no longer allowed to change after trial.

Recommendation 6: The Department of Defense should mirror the federal judiciary's public filing and tracking system for court documents.

While GCMs and Special Courts Martial ("SpCMs") are federal criminal trials, the court filings generated before, during and after these federal trials are not publicly available. The non-military federal courts across the country use a single system which allows attorneys and clerks (and judges through their clerks) to electronically file, store, and remotely access all court documents. This system, called the Public Access to Court Electronic Records ("PACER") system, is also publicly accessible, giving the federal judiciary the public oversight it needs to remain accountable for its actions.

Although military courts lack this capability, they desperately need it. Civilian federal courts are "standing" courts, meaning that the courts themselves are essentially permanently-created institutions. Military courts, however, are largely[29] "convened" courts, meaning that the court is created (convened) when it is needed (the reason the military still uses a "convening authority"). It is precisely for this reason that a centralized filing system would be advantageous for the military; the lack of standing courts only exacerbates the need for a standing filing system, common across all branches and the rest of the federal government, that follows the case from cradle to grave. The flexibility that would be afforded by remote filing and remote access cannot be understated for an ever-moving military. Of course, confidential and classified information would be redacted before being entered into the system.

There are additional benefits to implementing the PACER system, namely, adding transparency into the system and reducing the added workload the military currently faces by requiring court documents to be released only upon a filing of a Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") request. Opening the system to enhanced public review will give the public a deeper understanding of the military justice system.[30] This is a much-needed--and timely--reform, because "[t]he first [29] The CAAF, however, is a standing court.

[30] Summary Report, Global Seminar on Military Justice Reform, Yale Law School, Oct. 18-19, 2013, p. 9, located at http://responsesystemspanel.whs.mil/public/docs/Public_Comment_Unrelated/06-Dec-13/04_GlobSeminar_MJReform_2013_Report.pdf (last accessed June 18, 2014).

casualty of [the military justice system's] lack of transparency is public confidence in the military justice system."[31] It should not take a FOIA request to make available documents from a court martial absent compelling reasons specific to each case.

Practically speaking, the military is run by civilians (e.g., the Commander-in-Chief, the Secretary of Defense, each Service's Secretary) for the very reason that public oversight of the military is a necessary component of our American system of government. This public/civilian oversight is also integrally linked to the First Amendment and the oversight of the free press. It is the ability of the press to report on issues, both good and bad, that inform the public and provide the level of oversight contemplated in the Constitution. The "sunlight" of the press and public is necessary to help the military justice system shed its image as insular and subject to cronyism, and to increase confidence both inside and outside the military that the problems that led to the review of the military justice system are being addressed effectively and that true reforms are being made.

Moreover, this system will make it easier for the Department of Defense, Congress, the Service Secretaries, and the military community--active, reserve and retired--to better monitor, track, and study the military justice system. This will allow them to identify and correct weak links more efficiently--hopefully reducing the current improprieties that are giving the military justice system its bad reputation. Part of that solution depends on there being documents to review, in addition to having easier access to those documents. Too often, there is no accessible record of documents for anyone to review, military or civilian. And when records are delayed or denied after a FOIA request, this causes the ironic result that it is currently harder to access certain court martial records than it is to access the records from a Guantanamo Bay commission.[32]

Recommendation 7: Remove the CA's power to select the members of the panel in a court martial, unless the CA can prove that such authority is necessary for operational concerns.

Currently, CA's have essentially unilateral ability to select which service members will sit on a panel for a particular case. The members the CA selects are subject to voir dire, but the prosecutor and defense have only one peremptory challenge each.[33] Thus, the CA is able to select which people will sit in judgment of the defendant. We recognize that this power has deep historical roots and still retains an element of necessity in the forward-deployed, wartime theatre, where the number of potential panel members is severely limited. Thus, we propose that CAs should have the ability to select only the pool of potential panel members, with the prosecutors and defense attorneys selecting the actual panel members through voir dire and peremptory challenges. This will allow the CA to retain significant power in peacetime, and his/her full complement of powers in wartime.

Outside of the wartime context, the needs of the military justice system to ensure actual and perceived fairness outweigh the CA's need to select the personnel on the panel itself. Our recommendation would still allow the CA to ensure the members of the panel meet the UCMJ's minimum requirements, while mitigating any perceived undue influence. Justification for this recommendation starts with the UCMJ itself, which only requires that panel members have sufficient "age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament."[34] These criteria are not rigorous--and would seem to include most officers, Staff NCOs, and potentially senior NCOs in the command.[35] Further, the requirements themselves appear to follow a balancing test, since a lower-ranked person could be qualified by virtue of his/her training, experience, and/or even temperament, rather than a particularly high rank.

Allowing the CA to actively select the individual panel members, rather than disqualifying personnel who do not meet the UCMJ's requirements, increases the risk of creating a biased panel. That risk is magnified by the fact that the typical panel only requires five members, and does not have to be unanimous to render a verdict. Thus, every panel member the CA appoints has an inordinately large effect on the outcome of the trial.[36] This presents a serious risk of potential bias, and where operational concerns are not involved, the need to avoid the possibility of biased or influenced panel members should take priority.

That risk of potential bias is both real and significant. Retired JAG officers note that it is not uncommon to hear CAs seeking to find "hammers" to serve on the panel--service members who are more likely to find defendants guilty and/or recommend harsher punishments if the defendant is found guilty.[37] When this happens, the CA is seeking these personnel specifically because they do not have the proper "judicial temperament" required by the UCMJ. And even though the CA is not directly influencing the verdict, the CA can nonetheless indirectly influence the verdict. By choosing panel members, CAs can influence how the panel interprets the words "reasonable doubt," how likely the panel is to ignore evidentiary limiting instructions, or how likely panel members are to use their rank to influence other panel members. This creates the potential for both wrongful convictions and unnecessary acquittals.

Bias is a pervasive concern because it can be both conscious and unconscious. Unconscious bias played a major role in most of the wrongful convictions later overturned through DNA evidence.[38] But it is not just the unconscious bias of the CAs that must be mitigated: several convictions (including convictions for rape) have recently been overturned by the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces ("CAAF") because of Unlawful Command Influence

[34] UCMJ art. 25(d)(2).

[35] Assuming the defendant is enlisted and requested enlisted members on the panel.

[36] Because the verdict is not unanimous, a single "holdout" juror cannot prevent a conviction. This means that the CA only needs to appoint/influence two-thirds of the panel, rather than every member, to gain a conviction.

[37] See supra, n. 22.

[38] See http://www.innocenceproject.org/understand/# (last accessed June 18, 2014); in-depth examinations of the case profiles and exoneration trends clearly indicate that unconscious bias affects victims, police, crime labs technicians, expert witnesses, lawyers and judges alike.

("UCI") stemming from comments made by the President of the United States and the Commandant of the Marine Corps.[39] Military service members at all levels, while hoped to be completely unbiased, are arguably more susceptible to unconscious bias because of the ingrained aspects of "good order and discipline" and increased allegiance to authority.

Even military judges are susceptible to conscious and unconscious bias. Recently, a military judge stated that if a defendant has made it past the Article 32 hearing, and is now at a GCM, that defendant is guilty--and it is up to the prosecutor to confirm that guilt.[40] This is not an uncommon perspective for CAs to possess, either.[41] Thus, restricting the CA's ability to select the panel members reduces the CA's potential influence on the trial before that trial even begins. We recommend that CAs be limited to selecting members of a larger pool of potential panel members, unless that power is necessary due to operational restrictions. Practically speaking, the CA would ensure that the entire pool meets UCMJ Article 25(d)(2)'s requirements by disqualifying those personnel the CA feels do not meet its standards. The prosecutors and defense attorneys then select the panel from that pool through voir dire and peremptory challenges. However, because the attorneys will now be selecting the panel from a larger pool, both the prosecutor and defense counsel need to receive an increased number of peremptory challenges, as well.

Recommendation 7 (Alternative): If Recommendation 7 is not accepted, then the following recommendation is provided in the alternative: defense counsel should receive three times the number of peremptory challenges, in order to serve as a counterbalance against the selection power of the CA. If the CA selects a truly independent panel, then the challenges will not be necessary; however, if they are necessary, they should be available to discharge potentially biased panel members. This will prevent later appeals for UCI--and later re-trials if that appeal is successful.[42]

Recommendation 8: The Department of Defense should mandate the creation of a dedicated litigation career track in each branch, as well as mandate the creation of a Special Victims Prosecutor program in each branch.

It is an unfortunate fact that the level of complex trial expertise in the military is often insufficient to properly litigate complex or sensitive trials involving expert witnesses, cutting-edge scientific evidence, or financial fraud crimes.[43] Across the services, military prosecutors with only a few months' experience are being assigned complex rape prosecutions that, in the civilian sector, would be tried only by senior prosecutors with years of experience litigating similar cases.[44] The military owes its service members, and especially its sexual assault victims, more than a prosecutor--it owes them an experienced and trial-hardened prosecutor (especially since defendants can hire outside counsel with decades of experience handling complex trials). It is with that fact in mind that the Navy instituted the Military Justice Litigation Career Track, which was designed to "identify and cultivate judge advocates with the requisite education, training, experience, and aptitude to litigate and [later] preside over complex cases."[45] This need is even more acute, since the number of complex, contested courts martial, especially sexual assault courts martial, is exploding.[46] The Army possesses a somewhat similar program to the Navy, while the Air Force and Coast Guard have no such programs.[47]

An additional program that all the Services should implement is the Army's Special Victim Prosecutor ("SVP") program. SVPs are "dispersed across the Army. . . [and] focus exclusively on litigation and training, with an emphasis on sexual assault and family violence," including child abuse cases.[48] SVPs are "individually selected from the Army's most experienced trial lawyers . . . to serve not only the installation at which they are located, but also their geographic area of responsibility. Special Victim Prosecutors assignments are three-year assignments . . . not subject to deployment without approval from The Assistant Judge Advocate General for Military Law and Operations."[49] Further, "SVPs undergo specialized training at military and civilian courses, and spend two weeks with a civilian District Attorney's Office observing how civilian Special Victim Prosecutor/Sexual Assault units function."[50] This program, or a Service-specific version of it, should be required in every branch.

Recommendation 9: The Department of Defense should--when especially experienced trial counsel is needed, but unavailable--encourage the use of Administrative Separations in order to allow prosecution by the local United States Attorney's Office.

Unfortunately, even if Recommendation 8 is accepted, it will take years, if not decades, for the JAG programs to distribute experienced litigators sufficiently across the world. Practically speaking, however, not every duty station can be staffed with an experienced litigator. There will be instances where a complex trial will occur, but the base will lack a JAG attorney with sufficient experience. In such cases, commanders should be encouraged to work with civilian federal prosecutors to have the military member administratively separated[51] and then prosecuted by the local US Attorney's Office--especially where the crime occurred off-base, or the victim is a civilian. This option has been used successfully in the past at recruiting commands,[52] and smaller bases, despite the fact that the crime happened on-base and between two military members.[53] To be clear, however, this method should be used only in cases where the commander would administratively separate the alleged offender even if he/she was found not guilty at the trial/court martial.

An additional benefit of administratively separating such serious offenders is that their pay and benefits will terminate upon discharge. This procedure can prevent situations like that of Major Nidal Hasan, the Fort Hood shooter, who received nearly $300,000 in pay while awaiting a military trial.[54] Commands also routinely resort to sending sexual assault suspects to other installations in an effort to separate them from their alleged victims, despite the fact that the accused will be administratively separated, even if a court martial does not result in a discharge. The costs of such orders can be inordinate upon the command, and may create another situation where it is better to discharge the offender for civilian prosecution, rather than keep him/her in the service awaiting trial and/or appeal.

Recommendation 10: When the death penalty is sought, those cases should be litigated by the Department of Justice, unless operational concerns necessitate otherwise.

Capital crimes are rare in the military, and thus the military lacks both prosecutors and defense attorneys with the requisite experience.[55] This presents persons convicted of a capital crime with a potentially successful appeal on the grounds of malpractice or ineffective assistance of counsel. Further, the costs of prosecuting and defending a capital case can easily accrue to hundreds of thousands of dollars, where learned counsel is involved.[56] This money comes out of the command's budget, and may provide an incentive to not seek top-level charges or punishments because that money cannot then be spent on training or equipment. Because of this combination of problems, these cases should be given to experienced Department of Justice prosecutors. Once the case is given to the Department of Justice, the defendant will gain access to free federal capital defense attorneys who specialize in defending federal capital cases.

[51] If there is probable cause to refer a case to a GCM after an Article 32 hearing, there is sufficient basis to administratively separate the service member. Further, the crime will often be accompanied by inappropriate conduct that independently warrants an administrative separation.

Recommendation 11: Defense counsel should be able to submit all defense witnesses (including expert witnesses) directly to the military judge (ex parte).

Currently, defense counsel has to request to subpoena his/her witnesses through the prosecutor (who forwards the request to the CA). This results in the defense telegraphing major aspects of its defense strategy in advance, and gives the prosecutor the opportunity not only to influence the witness, but also to convince the CA not to produce the witness.[57] Prosecutors, however, do not have to submit their witnesses through the defense. This problem is unique to courts martial--because even the defense counsel for the alleged terrorists undergoing military commissions at Guantanamo Bay do not have to submit their witness lists through the prosecution. Thus, the requirement that defense counsel for military members request their witnesses through the prosecution places a unique, undue and unjust burden upon the defense.

If the military judge orders the production of a witness, and the CA refuses to produce that witness, the issue should be appealed to the CAAF, and the proceeding should be stayed automatically until the decision is finalized.

Recommendation 12: The Department of Defense should allow all court martial convictions to have one appeal, with the ability to waive that appeal in a PTA.

Under present law, only certain convictions by court martial have the right to an appeal/review (i.e., if a defendant is awarded a sentence that includes death, dismissal, dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, or confinement for one year or more).[58] Thus, every conviction at a SpCM (a misdemeanor federal conviction), and any non-qualifying conviction at a GCM (a felony federal conviction) are ineligible for an appeal.

As a result, there are a multitude of unreviewable cases with potentially egregious legal or factual errors. Further, these convictions are far from minor, and can result in serious collateral consequences, such as deportation, sex offender registration, or the inability to own/use a firearm (which will cause the person to become ineligible for continued military service). Thus, Article 66 of the UCMJ should be modified to allow an appeal of any court martial conviction. However, in the interests of efficiency, defendants should be allowed to waive this right as part of a PTA.

Subject: Inquiry to Seattle University School of Law regarding improvements in the military justice system

To OSD Counsel: I am responding to your correspondence dated 23 May 2014 addressed to the Seattle University School of Law regarding proposed improvements to the military justice system.

By way of background, I am a retired Brigadier General in the Judge Advocate General's Corps. In my last duty position I served as the Chief Judge (IMA) of the US Army Court of Criminal Appeals, and also as the Commanding General of the US Army Reserve Legal Command (Provisional). I currently serve on the Board of Advisors of the National Institute of Military Justice, where I advise on proposed legislation and serve as a trial observer at military commissions in Guantanamo Cuba. In my civilian capacity I am a general jurisdiction trial court judge in the state of Washington, and I also serve as an adjunct professor of both military law and trial advocacy at Seattle University School of Law.

Dean Annette Clark and Assistant Dean Paul Holland have asked me to respond to your inquiry. The following shall serve as my response.

The first area that calls for re-evaluation is the role of the Convening Authority. I understand that the Uniformed Judge Advocates General have apparently agreed that the post trial clemency role of the Convening Authority should be at least modified. That notwithstanding I will offer the following comments. While I have great respect for my fellow General Officers, I believe as currently configured the post trial clemency authority has the potential to undercut our court martial process in the military. As a practical matter, court martial panels, just like civilian juries typically render decisions based upon the facts and evidence, devoid of personal feelings. One might argue that court martial panels composed of sophisticated senior leaders, are even more reliable than civilian juries, and, after 18 years as a trial judge, I believe that civilian juries for the most part are very reliable. For any system of justice to maintain its credibility it must be perceived as predictable, reliable and certain. The post trial clemency procedure as it's currently crafted, I believe undercuts those propositions.

The next area of convening authority concerns the authority to authorize expenditures for defense expert witnesses. Currently a convening authority has the authority to decline or approve defense requests for expert witnesses, or consultants. These are decisions best left to the Military Judge. Certainly, in the civilian sector, the assigned trial judge, either state or federal would have that role. Moreover, that the convening authority who also approves plea agreements, conducts post trial review, and is advised by the Staff Judge Advocate, can decide defense expenditures, and require the defense to justify their request at the very least creates an appearance of unfairness. Last, requiring the defense to justify their requests, causes them the Hobson's choice of revealing their case theory in order to justify a defense expert. Military judges of all services are more than capable of deciding these issues.

04 Art 32 Investigations

The next area that cries out for change are the rules concerning the Article 32 investigation. As you are no doubt aware the military rules of evidence do not apply in a preliminary hearing such as an Article 32. Certainly this is consistent with the Federal Rules of Evidence, which do not apply in preliminary matters. It is also consistent for the most part with the interpretations of states with evidence rules based on the federal rules. However, in sexual assault cases we see counsel allowed an unlimited breadth in seeking to impeach the complaining witness. This has a chilling effect on the witness and their willingness to testify. Certainly, counsel are allowed a wide breadth in Article 32 hearings, but it was never the intent of the drafters that this should be used a means to chill the testimony of a witness, making them unwilling to participate in a hearing. I acknowledge that what I'm describing is very challenging, and must in the final analysis, pass constitutional muster, easier said than done. However, the bottom line is that the process must have some limits to the inquiry. Civil and criminal discovery must necessarily seek that which would lead to the discovery of relevant evidence. Anecdotes from courts martial in the last few years suggests that the current process allows for questions that go far beyond a search for evidence that would lead to the discovery of relevant evidence. I am aware of suggestions that there be an amendment allowing for the absence of the complaining witness at the Article 32 hearing. Given the current breadth allowed counsel in cross examination, I can appreciate why victim's advocates would advocate such a change. However, I believe that doing so would create Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause issues which might not pass appellate review.

05 Legislative Changes

I also appreciate why there are proposals to change military law specifically in the area of Sexual Assault, including Article 120. However, I strongly encourage that these proposed changes be approached with great caution. There are numerous anecdotes about well intended legislation not meeting appellate criteria and resulting in reversals of convictions. One such example is the evolution of Article 120. Approximately six years ago Article 120 was changed to place a burden upon the accused to show consent of the victim, in those cases where consent was the defense. This "burden shifting" was contrary to most states, and federal law. It ultimately was found unconstitutional by the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals, and I believe by CAAF. In 2010 I wrote an article on the problems associated with this change. It is titled "Neither a Model of Clarity nor a Model Statute": An Analysis of the History, Challenges and Suggested Changes to the "New" Article 120" . This is found in Vol 67 of the Air Force Law Review 2011. I point this out only as an example of how legislation and changes in military law can unintentionally creat consitutional issues which lead to results diametrically opposed to the intent of the legislation itself.

I most certainly appreciate why Senators Gillabrand and McKaskell have offered their proposals. But I would urge you to tred carefully. Military appellate law continues to be for lack of a better phrase "paternalistic". As such the changes adopted will be subject to an appellate standard known to be much harsher than that of the civilian apellate courts.

06 Unlawful Command Influence

Next I strongly suggest efforts to clarify the paremeters of the offense of Unlawful Command Influence. There is no question but that we need the requirements of Article 37. However, to suggest that the drafters intended that the doctrine of command influence was probably never intended to extend to comments by the President of the United States at a commencment address. That the CINC believes that sexual assault in the military is a problem, and that if proven it should be treated harshly, is hardly a surprise to any citizen in the United States, let alone the commanders and senior commanders who sit on court martial panels. Yet, the current elements allow for a conclusion causing military judges to conclude that it consitutes Unlawful Command Influence. Obviously, other acts in the news are consistent with the doctrine and the conduct it was intended to prevent. This cries out for clarification.

Special Victim's Counsel

Likewise, the role of the Special Victim's Counsel (realizing that the services describe this function with different titles) should be clarified if possible. The recent CAAF case of LRH v Kastenberg is helpful but only begins to touch on the potential issues of the standing of the SVC. Certainly, a SVC should be allowed to correspond with the Convening Authority on behalf of the victim without running the risk of creating an issue of Unlawful Command Influence. I use this as an example, as the issue presented itself in the recent court martial of BG Sinclair at Fort Bragg.

Thank you very much for allowing Seattle Univeristy the opportyunity to provide input on these important issues. Please feel free to contact me at any of the addresses listed below.

Re: Military Justice Review Group.

Dear Judge Effron:

This email responds to a letter from Mr. Paul S. Koffsky, Deputy General Counsel, regarding suggestions for improving the military justice systems.

Despite the recent attention to the handing of sexual assault cases in the military and calls for fundamental changes, the American military justice system is structurally sound. Thus, in addition to considering changes to the system, it is also important to use this process to reaffirm certain aspects of the system.

1. Address the Purpose of the Military Justice System.

The Uniform Code of Military Justice should indicate clearly that the primary purpose of the military justice system is to maintain good order and discipline in the armed forces. The following statement, which is a revised version of what currently appears in the Manual for Courts-Martial, could be added to Article 1, U.C.M.J.:

The purpose of military law is to assist in maintaining good order and discipline in the armed forces, to provide due process of law, to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the military establishment, and thereby to strengthen the national security of the United States.

In addition, the foregoing language should be substituted for the language currently in the Preamble for the Manual for Courts-Martial. The reasons for addressing this important issue, which informs consideration of any changes to the military justice system, are set out in Schlueter, The Military Justice Conundrum: Justice or Discipline?, 215 Mil. L. Rev. 1 (2013), available at https://www.jagcnet.army.mil/DOCLIBS/MILITARYLAWREVIEW. <https://www.jagcnet.army.mil/DOCLIBS/MILITARYLAWREVIEW.>

2. Maintain and Strengthen The Critical Role of The Commander in the Military Justice System.

During recent congressional consideration of proposed amendment to the U.C.M.J., in the context of sexual assault offenses, a common theme in the discussions was the move to limit or completely eliminate powers vested in commanders and convening authorities. Those discussions were grounded on a distrust of commanders. In the end, those proposals, affected a commander's initial decision to prosecute certain offenses and restricted the ability of the commander to grant post-trial clemency to a convicted service member. A common proposal was to shift most of the prosecutorial decisions to a centralized command or office.

Any similar proposals during this review process should be rejected. Reasons supporting rejection of those proposals are set out in the attached White Paper, which was originally prepared for Congress in 2013.

3. Reject Any Attempts to Adopt a "Service Connection" Requirement for Subject Matter Jurisdiction.

The reference to the concept of "service connection" should be deleted from the Discussion following R.C.M. 201(a)(2). That language seems to suggest that the service connection requirement is still applicable, and is thus inconsistent with the Discussion for R.C.M. 203. At least one commentator has recently suggested a revival of the long-rejected "service connection" requirement for subject matter jurisdiction. http://globalmjreform.blogspot.com/2014/05/what-is-to-be-done-herewith-proposed.html <http://globalmjreform.blogspot.com/2014/05/what-is-to-be-done-herewith-proposed.html> . The proposal is apparently grounded on first, a belief that it is wise to mirror similar requirements that have been adopted by other countries, second, on a lack of confidence in the military justice system, and third, a distrust of commanders. For those of us who practiced military justice during the O'Callahan-Relford era, 1969-1987, it is clear that that template for determining whether a court-martial had subject matter jurisdiction was unworkable. See Schlueter, Military Criminal Justice: Practice and Procedure, § 4-11 (8th ed. 2012). Law review articles discussing the service connection requirement are annotated at § 4-17 in that text. The Supreme Court settled that issue in United States v. Solorio, 483 U.S. 487 (1987), and there is no need to reinstitute that requirement.

Although the attached White Paper does not directly address the issue of service connection, it does address the problem of attempting to differentiate the prosecution of military and common law offenses.

4. Revise the List of Special Defenses to Conform to Contemporary Practice.

Currently the Manual lists a number of defenses as "special defenses." The Discussion accompanying R.C.M. 916 notes that special defenses are also referred to as affirmative defenses — a term used in federal and state practice. To avoid any confusion, R.C.M. should be amended to use the term affirmative defenses. In addition, the Manual does not include defenses that have been recognized by the military courts, e.g., duress, involuntary intoxication, Nuremburg Defense, parental discipline, prevention of crime, and resisting restraint. See generally Schlueter, Rose, Hansen & Behan, Military Crimes and Defenses § 3-4 (2d ed. 2012) (discussing defenses). In the alternative, the Manual should clearly state that the list of defenses in the Manual is nonexhaustive and that military case law may recognize other defenses.

5. Address the Issue of Post-Trial and Appellate Delay.

A continuing and intractable problem in the military justice system is the issue of post-trial and appellate delay. The Manual should be amended to adopt some form of a speedy post-trial and appellate rule, similar to the speedy trial rule in R.C.M. 707.

6. Make Provision for Student Attorneys to Represent Service Members.

I recommend that Article 27, UCMJ be amended to authorize the Service Secretaries to promulgate regulations, which would provide for student attorneys representing military accused. Some states currently make provision for such representation in both criminal and civil trials and administrative hearings. And for some time, as you know, the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Services has permitted students to write and argue as amicus before that court. On two occasions students from St. Mary's University School of Law prepared written amicus briefs and present oral arguments when that court visited the law school. Making provision for student attorneys in the UCMJ would provide a wonderful opportunity for both students and military attorneys, who could use assistance, for example, in conducting legal research, preparing legal briefs and memos, and assisting in trying courts-martial — as assistant trial counsel or assistant defense counsel.

A similar amendment should be made to Article 70, UCMJ, which deals with appellate counsel.

If I can provide any other assistance please feel free to call on me.
