Dear Chairmen, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces ("DAC-IPAD" or "Committee") report on military sexual assault case adjudication for fiscal years 2015 through 2018. This report continues to build upon the military sexual assault case disposition data collection and reporting project begun by the DAC-IPAD's predecessor, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) and continued by the DAC-IPAD as requested by the Department of Defense General Counsel in a June 2018 letter to the Committee Chair.

In this stand-alone data report, the DAC-IPAD provides the most comprehensive military sexual assault case adjudication data ever compiled, as well as a detailed statistical analysis conducted by a professional criminologist retained by the DAC-IPAD. The Committee makes no findings or recommendations at this time; our intent with this report is to provide policymakers with the most up-to-date, accurate, and reliable information available on the outcomes of adult sexual assault allegations in which charges were preferred against a military subject under the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The Committee is continuing to examine the conviction and acquittal rates for sexual assault prosecutions that are presented in this report as well as the process for preferring and referring charges for sexual assault offenses to court-martial.

The members of the DAC-IPAD would like to express our sincere gratitude and appreciation to the many members of the Military Services, including the Coast Guard, who have diligently assisted the Committee in its collection of case documents for this project and to the JPP for its initiation of this important endeavor.

Respectfully submitted,

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In section 546 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2015, enacted on December 23, 2014, Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to establish the sixth congressionally mandated task force on sexual assault in the military since 2003: the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD).[1] Its authorizing legislation charges the Committee to execute three tasks over its five-year term:[2]

1. To advise the Secretary of Defense on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of allegations of rape, forcible sodomy, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces;

2. To review, on an ongoing basis, cases involving allegations of sexual misconduct for purposes of providing advice to the Secretary of Defense; and

3. To submit an annual report to the Secretary of Defense and to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives no later than March 30 of each year.

This report describes the Committee's annual collection and analysis of military case adjudication statistical data for adult-victim sexual assault cases in which charges were preferred for penetrative or contact sexual assault offenses and in which final action on the case is complete.[3] The Committee has collected and recorded case documents including charge sheets, Article 32 reports, and Results of Trial forms for a total of 574 cases completed in fiscal year 2018, 691 cases completed in fiscal year 2017, 769 cases completed in fiscal year 2016, and 780 cases completed in fiscal year 2015. This report and a detailed appendix provide case characteristics, disposition outcomes, and adjudication outcomes for these cases, including sex, Service branch, and pay grade of the subject; relationship of the victim to the subject; nature of the charges; forum; and case outcome. This report also includes a multivariate statistical analysis prepared by a professional criminologist that identifies patterns in the data.

3 For purposes of the DAC-IPAD's case review and data collection, the term "sexual assault" includes the following offenses under the Uniform Code of Military Justice: rape (Article 120(a)), sexual assault (Article 120(b)), aggravated sexual contact (Article 120(c)), abusive sexual contact (Article 120(d)), forcible sodomy (Article 125), and attempts to commit these offenses (Article 80).

SEXUAL ASSAULT COURT-MARTIAL CASE ADJUDICATION TRENDS AND ANALYSIS

I. INTRODUCTION

The Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) was established by the Secretary of Defense in February 2016 pursuant to section 546 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year (FY) 2015, as amended.[4] The mission of the DAC-IPAD is to advise the Secretary of Defense on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of allegations of rape, forcible sodomy, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces.[5] In order to provide that advice, the Committee is directed to review, on an ongoing basis, cases involving allegations of sexual misconduct.[6]

Before the DAC-IPAD was established, Congress tasked the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (Judicial Proceedings Panel, or JPP) with reviewing and evaluating the judicial response to sexual assault cases in the military. To conduct its analysis, the JPP sought information from court records, case documents, and other publicly available resources for courts-martial resolved in fiscal years 2012 through 2015. Information from the cases was entered into a JPP-developed database, and the JPP coordinated with a criminologist to analyze the data and provide descriptive statistics concerning court-martial case characteristics, case dispositions, and case outcomes.

To continue the collection and analysis of data on sexual assault courts-martial, the DAC-IPAD formed the Data Working Group (DWG). The DWG is composed of three Committee members: Dr. Cassia Spohn, who serves as the working group's chair; Chief Master Sergeant of the Air Force (retired) Rod McKinley; and Mr. James Markey. The DWG has continued to develop, refine, and expand the DAC-IPAD database and, in the past calendar year, added cases completed in fiscal year 2018.

II. METHODOLOGY OF THE DATA WORKING GROUP

In September 2018, the DAC-IPAD staff, at the direction of Chair Martha S. Bashford, requested that the Military Services provide documents, utilizing their individual case tracking databases, for cases involving a preferred charge of sexual assault completed in fiscal year 2018.[7] The staff screened the case records provided by the Services to identify duplicate cases, cases with incomplete documentation, cases of sexual assault that did not involve an adult victim, cases that did not involve a sex offense, and cases whose reported year of case completion was not correct. The resulting 574 cases from fiscal year 2018 were then added to the electronic database.

The DAC-IPAD database includes cases encompassing fiscal years 2012 through 2018, all of which involve at least one charge of a penetrative sexual offense (i.e., rape, aggravated sexual assault, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these offenses) or a contact sexual offense (i.e., aggravated sexual contact, abusive sexual contact, wrongful sexual contact, and attempts to commit these offenses). The Department of Defense (DoD) does not collect information on the legal outcome of cases in which the victim is the spouse or an intimate partner; therefore the statistical data for fiscal years 2012 through 2014, collected by the JPP, do not include the legal outcomes of those classes of cases and will not be included in the historical discussion to follow.

III. MILITARY JUSTICE INFORMATION FOR SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES COLLECTED BY THE DAC-IPAD

The DAC-IPAD relies on the Military Services to report cases meeting the criteria specified. The Committee therefore does not assert that it has the complete universe of cases throughout the Armed Forces in which a sexual assault charge was filed. The data were also limited to cases in which a complete set of disposition records could be identified and retrieved for analysis. In the following tables and charts, percentages may not total 100, owing to rounding errors or missing data. Also, cadets/midshipmen and warrant officers are included with "officers." Data tables for fiscal years 2015 through 2018, provided in Appendix A, inform the presentation of data that follows.

Court-Martial Case Characteristics

The DAC-IPAD received 574 court-martial records from the Services that involved the preferral of an adult-victim sexual assault offense and were completed in fiscal year 2018. Among the Services, the Army generated the most cases. Courts-martial records indicated that the accused was usually male and the victims were most often female. In addition, the vast majority of courts-martial involved one military victim; however, there were several that involved multiple victims. In 75% of cases, the most serious charge that was preferred was a penetrative offense.

As in the past, the DAC-IPAD notes that a number of characteristics are similar across the cases from fiscal year 2015 through fiscal year 2018:

- The characteristics of the accused and the victim
- The proportion of cases involving a penetrative offense
- The proportion of cases tried by court-martial
- The proportion of penetrative offenses referred to general courts-martial

Overview of Total Cases Received

Table 1. Military Service Response to Request for Information (FY 2018)

	Cases Reported	Cases Entered	% Valid
Army	386	232	60.1%
Marine Corps	94	82	87.2%
Navy	109	94	86.2%
Air Force	170	151	88.8%
Coast Guard	15	15	100.0%
Total	774	574	74.2%

The Military Services provided 774 cases in response to the request for information. After the DAC-IPAD staff reviewed the cases to verify their alignment with established criteria for inclusion, 574 cases (74% of submitted cases) for FY18 were added to the database. Reasons for a case being classified as "non-responsive" and therefore not added to the database include being a non-qualifying non-sex offense, being a child-victim sex offense, being an instance of duplicate reporting, and falling into another fiscal year.

The DAC-IPAD case adjudication database includes cases encompassing fiscal years 2012 through 2018, as illustrated above. However, it should be noted that the total for fiscal year 2016 has increased by 1 case and fiscal year 2017 by 33 cases since the last report of the DAC-IPAD,[8] because the Committee staff is continuously identifying and recording cases that were not previously reported to the Committee by the Military Services. Such cases are typically identified by the DAC-IPAD staff by tracking appellate decisions and by reclassifying cases that were provided to the Committee for the incorrect fiscal year.

The 574 cases recorded in FY18 represents an almost 17% decline in cases from FY17, a sharper drop than the nearly 11% decline between FY17 and FY16. When compared to the 780 cases recorded in FY15, the FY18 figure represents a 26% decrease in the cases documented. The reason for the continuing decline cannot be determined from the data; the question will continue to be examined in future fiscal years.

Of the 574 cases received by the DAC-IPAD for FY18, the Army generated the most cases (40%), followed by the Air Force (26%), Navy (16%), Marine Corps (14%), and Coast Guard (3%). To provide additional context for the number of cases included in the DAC-IPAD database from each Military Service, the tables below show the active duty population in each Military Service in fiscal years 2015 through 2018 and the proportion that each Military Service constitutes of the overall active duty population.[9]

9 Fiscal year 2018 data obtained from https://www.dmdc.osd.mil/appj/dwp/dwp_reports.jsp. Fiscal years 2015 through 2017 obtained from the DoD demographic reports, available at https://www.militaryonesource.mil/reports-and-surveys/demographic-profiles. The figures do not include the number of Guard and Reserve Component members who were on active duty and subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

Total	1,353,910	100.0%	780	100.0%

As noted earlier, the total number of cases reported declined in 2018, as each Military Service recorded fewer cases than in the previous fiscal year. The rate at which cases were recorded as responsive to the case criteria was similar for the Air Force (89%), Navy (86%), and Marine Corps (87%). For the Coast Guard, 100% of the cases reported were responsive to the criteria and thus were added to the case adjudication database. The Army had the lowest percentage (60%) of cases reported as responsive (232 of 386). However, as a percentage, the Navy had the largest decline at 28%, followed by the Coast Guard (25%) and the Army (19%).

Accused Characteristics

For fiscal years 2015 through 2018, the accused in nearly all cases is male (99%).

In FY18, enlisted personnel were roughly 80% of the total active duty population but were a higher percentage of the cases (92%) in the database. While officers were nearly 20% of the active duty population, they were a smaller percentage of the cases (8%). In FY18, personnel in the pay grades E3 to E5 were approximately 61% of the active duty population and accounted for most (69%) of the enlisted accused.[10] Fiscal year 2018 saw a change in the distribution of accused among pay grades when compared to that in fiscal years 2015 through 2017. For both enlisted and officers, in FY18 the accused shifted to a more junior pay grade (E-2 and O-2) as than was recorded in previous years (E-3 and O-3). In addition, the number of accused cadets/midshipmen declined nearly 50% in FY18, returning to the level observed in FY16. The basis for these changes is unclear from the data, and it is unknown whether the same observations will be recorded in the future.

Victim Characteristics

In FY18 nearly 91% of the victims were female and 9% were male. Of the 574 cases in FY18, there were 539 cases with exclusively female victims (93.9%), 32 cases with exclusively male victims (5.6%) and 3 cases with both male and female victims (0.5%)

In FY18 when the accused was male, the victim was exclusively female in 94% of the cases, and exclusively male in 5% of the cases; in less than 1% of the cases, victims were of both sexes.

In FY18 there were two cases when the accused was female and the victim was female in one case and male in the other.

Of the 574 cases in FY18, there were 347 cases with exclusively military victims (60.5%), 207 cases with exclusively civilian victims (36.1%) and 20 cases with both military and civilian victims (3.5%)

In FY18 the accused's spouse or intimate partner was the victim in 14% of the cases, a decrease from FY17 (18%), FY16 (23%) and FY15 (15%).

Most cases in FY18, as well as historically, involved one (86%) or two (10%) victims. The percentage of cases involving a single victim is the highest recorded; conversely, the percentage of cases with three or more victims is the lowest recorded (4.0%).

Characteristics of the Nature of the Charges

A penetrative offense, as opposed to a contact offense, was the type of offense preferred most often, appearing in 431 (75.1%) of 574 cases in FY18. This preferral rate is similar to those observed in fiscal years 2017 (74.7%) and 2106 (75.4%), and slightly higher than in 2015 (71.5%).

Article 32 Hearings

In 2014 the Article 32 hearing, required prior to charges being referred to a general court-martial, was changed from a pretrial investigation into a less robust preliminary hearing. Under the old process, victims were frequently required to appear, testify, and undergo cross-examination from defense counsel; this requirement has been removed from the process.

In FY18, Article 32 hearings were held in 373 cases and waived in an additional 104 cases. The number of hearings waived more than doubled from FY15 to FY16; but while there were fewer hearings waived in FY17 and FY18, the proportion of hearings waived in FY17 (22%) and FY18 (22%) was unchanged from FY16 (21%).

In FY18, Article 32 hearings were waived in 63 cases without a pretrial agreement, a decrease from 66 cases in FY17. Of the 104 cases in FY18 for which the Article 32 hearing was waived, 85 (82%) involved a penetrative offense and 19 (18%) involved a contact offense. The conviction rate, for any offense, when the Article 32 hearing was waived increased in FY18 (67%) from a low in FY16 (53%). The conviction rate for a sex offense (penetrative or contact), when the Article 32 hearing was waived, was 34% in FY18, an increase from 27% in FY17.

Disposition Decisions

In FY18, convening authorities referred a total of 378 cases to trial by general, special, and summary court-martial; thus, 66% of all preferred cases were referred to trial, a slight increase from 64% in FY17. Conversely, in FY18 convening authorities dismissed or resolved through alternate administrative means 196, or 34%, of preferred cases. Overall, 82% of referred cases in FY18 were referred to trial by general court-martial, representing an increase from FY17 (when the figure was 77%) and a return to the level observed in FY16 (81%).

The following tables set out case dispositions by Military Service of the accused for fiscal years 2015 through 2018.

The severity of the offense charged influences the type of court-martial to which a charge is referred. Among cases completed in FY18, 95% of penetrative offenses were referred to trial by general court-martial, while contact offenses were referred at about equal frequency to general (43%) and special court-martial (42%) and less often to summary court-martial (15%). In contrast, in FY17 contact offenses were referred to general (35%) and summary court-martial (10%) less often than to special court-martial (55%).

In FY18 there were 13 cases (4.5%) with a penetrative offense preferred and ultimately resolved at special court-martial and 2 cases (0.7%) at summary court-martial. While it is accurate to state that in some instances a special or summary court-martial was convened after a penetrative sexual assault offense was initially charged, those courts-martial were the result of plea agreements that dismissed the penetrative sexual assault charge in exchange for guilty pleas to other offenses, which were then referred to special or summary courts-martial. The DAC-IPAD did not document any instances in FY18 of the penetrative offense being contested at special or summary court-martial.

To provide additional information on the charges and specifications for each of the cases in question, the tables in Appendix B detail the charges preferred; the advice of the staff judge advocate, if available; the terms of any pretrial agreements; the charges referred to special or summary court-martial; the accused's pleas; and the findings at trial.

Adjudication Outcomes

Conviction, acquittal, and dismissal rates summarize how sexual assault prosecutions are ultimately resolved in the military justice system. Figures 23–28 illustrate outcomes for cases according to the type of offense charged (penetrative or contact) and how the case was adjudicated (by a military judge or by a panel of military members).

In FY18, among cases charged with a penetrative offense, non–intimate partner victim cases were more likely to end in acquittal (27%) than intimate partner victim cases (17%), and intimate partner victim cases were more likely to end in a conviction for a non–sexual assault offense (31% compared to 18%).

The small numbers of intimate partner victim cases with a contact offense charge make it difficult to draw any statistical conclusions. In FY18 there were 4 cases involving a charged contact offense and an intimate partner, an increase from 3 cases in FY17 and a decline from 6 cases in FY16 and 7 cases in FY15. When cases are combined across the charged offense (penetrative and contact), conviction rates are similar for intimate partner cases (46%) and non–intimate partner cases (43%), but dismissal rates were higher for intimate partner victim cases (24%) than for non–intimate partner cases (15%).

IV. MULTIVARIATE ANALYSIS

Summary of the Multivariate Analyses – Fiscal Year 2018

Consistent patterns emerge from the multivariate analyses. The following variables have relatively consistent effects on the conviction and sentencing outcomes: Military Service branch, number of charges, and charged/conviction offense.

Service Branch

- The likelihood of being convicted of any charge was greater in the Army, Marine Corps, and Navy than in the Air Force or the Coast Guard.
- The likelihood of being convicted of a penetrative offense was greater in the Army and the Marine Corps than in the Air Force.
- There were no statistically significant differences between the Military Services in the chances of acquittal.
- The likelihood of case dismissal was greater in the Coast Guard than in all other Service branches.
- The chances of a punitive separation outcome were greater in the Army and in the Air Force than in the Navy.

Number of Charges

- There was a positive association between the number of charges and the chances of both a conviction and a conviction for a penetrative offense: the likelihood of both outcomes increased when the number of charges increased.
- The chances of acquittal and case dismissal declined as the number of charges increased.
- The chances of punitive separation and of confinement increased as the number of charges increased. The sentence severity scale score increased as the number of charges increased.

Charged Offense / Conviction Offense

- Convictions for penetrative offenses were linked to the highest chance of a confinement sentence; there was no difference in the chances of a confinement sentence between contact offense convictions and non-sexual assault convictions.
- The chances of punitive separation were greater for penetrative and contact offense convictions than for non-sexual assault convictions.
- Sentence severity is greater for penetrative offense convictions than for contact offense convictions and non-sexual assault convictions; sentences are more severe for contact offense convictions than non-sexual assault convictions.

Victim Variables

- The likelihood of case dismissal was higher when the involved parties were current or former intimate partners than when the victim and the accused had other types of relationships.
- The chances of punitive separation were lower in cases that involved only victims who were Military Service members, than in cases that involved only civilians or a combination of civilians and Military Service members.

Summary of the Multivariate Analyses – Fiscal Year 2017

Consistent patterns emerge from the multivariate analyses. The following variables have relatively consistent effects on the conviction and sentencing outcomes: service rank of the accused, number of charges, and charged/conviction offense.

Service Branch

- The chances of a conviction for a penetrative offense were greater in the Army than in the Air Force.
- The chances of a conviction for any offense were lower in the Air Force than in all other Service branches.
- The chances of an acquittal were greater in the Air Force than in the Army; the chances of a dismissal were greater in the Air Force than in the Army and Navy.
- Convicted members of the Marine Corps face a greater chance of punitive separation than their counterparts in the Coast Guard.
- Convicted members of the Air Force and Marine Corps faced more severe sentences, on average, than convicted members of the Army and Coast Guard. Convicted members of the Marine Corps faced more severe sentences, on average, than members of the Navy.

Number of Charges

- The chances of a conviction for any offense, of punitive separation, and of a more severe sentence increased when the number of charges was higher.
- The chances of acquittal and the chances of dismissal both decreased when the number of charges was higher.

Charged Offense / Conviction Offense

- The chance of a confinement sentence was greatest when the conviction was for a penetrative offense, but the difference between penetrative offense convictions and contact offense convictions was not statistically significant. Convictions for a contact offense or for a penetrative offense were more likely than convictions for non–sexual assault offenses to result in a confinement sentence.

- The likelihood that charges would be dismissed was greater when the accused was charged with a penetrative offense than when the accused was charged with a contact offense.
- The likelihood of a punitive separation sentence was greater when the conviction was for a sexual assault offense rather than a non-sexual assault offense.
- Sentence severity was greatest, on average, for penetrative offense convictions and the difference when compared to other offense convictions is statistically significant. Sentence severity, on average, was greater for contact-offense convictions than for non-sexual assault convictions.

Victim Variables

- A greater number of victims in a case was associated with an increased chance of a conviction for a penetrative offense.
- Military-only victim cases were linked to reduced chances that the case would result in a confinement sentence, as compared to civilian-only victim cases and those with military and civilian victims.
- Female-only victim cases were linked to increased chances that the case would result in a punitive separation sentence, as compared to male-only victim cases and those with female and male victims.

Summary of the Multivariate Analyses – Fiscal Year 2016

Consistent patterns emerge from the multivariate analyses. The following variables have relatively consistent effects on the conviction and sentencing outcomes: Military Service branch, number of charges, and charged/conviction offense.

Service Branch

- The chances of a conviction were lower in Air Force cases than in the other Service branches.
- Cases were more likely to end in acquittal in the Air Force than in the Marine Corps.
- Cases were more likely to be dismissed in the Air Force, Marine Corps, and Navy than in the Army.
- Members of the Marine Corps who are convicted face more severe sanctions than convicted members of the Air Force and Navy; members of the Army who are convicted face more severe sanctions than convicted members of the Navy.

Number of Charges

- The chances of a conviction increase as the number of charges increases.
- The chances of acquittal and dismissal decline as the number of charges increases.
- The chances of a punitive separation sanction become greater as the number of charges increases.
- The severity of sentences increases as the number of charges increases.

Charged Offense / Conviction Offense

- Those charged with a penetrative offense are less likely to be convicted of any offense.
- Those charged with a penetrative offense are more likely to be acquitted.
- Those convicted of a penetrative offense face more severe sanctions (confinement, punitive separation, and sentence severity) than those convicted of a non-sexual assault offense; those convicted of a penetrative offense face more severe sanctions (confinement and sentence severity) than those convicted of a contact offense.
- Those convicted of a contact offense face more severe sanctions than those convicted of a non-sexual assault offense.

Victim – Accused Relationship

- The chances of case dismissal are greater for intimate-partner cases than for cases with other relationships between the victim and the accused.

Summary of the Multivariate Analyses – Fiscal Year 2015[11]

In most analyses, the strongest predictor of outcome was whether the accused was charged with or convicted of at least one count of a penetrative offense. Those who were charged with penetrative offenses were less likely than those charged with contact offenses to be convicted of at least one charge, were more likely to be acquitted of all charges, and were more likely to have the case dismissed without further judicial action. On the other hand, if the accused was convicted of a penetrative offense, he or she was more likely to be sentenced to confinement, was more likely to receive a punitive separation, and faced a substantially longer sentence than those convicted of non-sex offenses. By contrast, neither the rank of the accused nor the gender of the victim affected any of the outcomes examined.

Service Branch

- The chances of a conviction for a penetrative offense were more likely if the accused was in the Army than if the accused was in the Air Force or the Marine Corps.
- The chances of conviction for at least one charge were more likely if the accused was in the Coast Guard than if the accused was in any of the other Services.
- Cases were less likely to result in an acquittal at trial if the accused was serving in the Army or Coast Guard than if the accused was serving in the Air Force or Navy.
- Cases were less likely to be dismissed without further judicial action if the accused was in the Air Force rather than in the Marine Corps or the Navy.
- Members of the Army were more likely than those in the Coast Guard to receive a punitive separation.

11 The fiscal year 2015 multivariate analysis was completed by Dr. Cassia Spohn under the authority of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and published in the Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses (April 2016).

Number of Charges

- The chances of a conviction increased as the number of charges increased.
- The chances of acquittal and dismissal declined as the number of charges increased.
- The severity of sentences increased as the number of charges increased.

Number of Victims

- The chances of conviction increased as the number of victims increased.
- The chances of a confinement sentence increased as the number of victims increased.

Status of Victims

- The chances of conviction were lower for cases in which the victim was a member of the military rather than a civilian.
- The chances of acquittal were higher for cases in which the victim was a member of the military rather than a civilian.
- The chances that the accused would receive either a sentence of confinement or a punitive separation were lower if the victim was a member of the military rather than a civilian.

Victim – Accused Relationship

- The chances of conviction were lower if the victim was a spouse or intimate partner of the accused.
- The chances of case dismissal were greater for intimate partner cases than for cases with other relationships between the victim and the accused.
- The confinement sentence was almost three years longer if the victim was the spouse or intimate partner.

V. DATA PROJECT WAY FORWARD

The DWG will continue the data collection and analysis project in the coming months. Future analyses will include descriptive statistics concerning court-martial case characteristics, case dispositions, and case outcomes.

APPENDIX A. DAC-IPAD CASE ADJUDICATION DATABASE: SEXUAL OFFENSE(S) DEMOGRAPHIC AND ADJUDICATION DATA

The Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) was established by the Secretary of Defense in February 2016 pursuant to section 546 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2015, as amended. The Committee is tasked by its authorizing statute to advise the Secretary of Defense on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of allegations of rape, forcible sodomy, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces, drawing on its review of such cases on an ongoing basis.

The following tables provide a general overview of data contained in the DAC-IPAD database for fiscal years 2015–18, as of June 13, 2019, and are the source material for the data charts and discussion in this report. The organization follows that in the previous DAC-IPAD reports (March, 2018 and March, 2019) and Appendix A in the 2017 Judicial Proceedings Panel Report (September, 2017). Utilizing similar organizational schemes aids an understanding of changes over time. In addition, the analyses in the two previous reports provide a logical roadmap for understanding the dispositional outcomes of sexual assault cases in the military. The purpose of estimating bivariate relationships and multivariate relationships is to gain an understanding about why certain patterns of results are observed.

It should be noted that the DAC-IPAD relies on the Services to report all cases meeting the specified criteria. The DAC-IPAD therefore cannot assert that it has the complete universe of cases throughout the Armed Forces in which a sexual assault charge was filed. The data were also limited to cases in which a complete set of disposition records could be identified and retrieved for analysis. In interpreting the data, readers should keep in mind that

- Percentages may not total 100, owing to rounding errors or missing data;
- Cadets/Midshipmen and warrant officers are included with "officers" in tables.

DESCRIPTIVE STATISTICS

Tables 1 and 2 provide general description and demographic overview of the data contained in the database.

BIVARIATE ANALYSES

Tables 3 through 14 present the results of analyses that estimate relationships between case characteristics and case-processing outcomes. These analyses provide the opportunity to better understand why patterns of case outcomes are observed. The tables present patterns of relationships between two variables. These are known as bivariate relationships because the focus is on two variables; one is an outcome variable and the other is a predictor variable that can help explain the outcome.

Analyses of bivariate relationships provide an initial examination of relationships between key variables, such as, for example, type of offense charge and conviction result. These examinations are limited because our outcomes of interested are complex and are affected by many variables.

MULTIVARIATE ANALYSES

Tables 15 to 21 present patterns of relationships between multiple variables. These are known as multivariate relationships because the focus is on multiple variables; one is the outcome variable and several predictor variables help explain the outcome. Outcome variables are also known as dependent variables and predictor variables are also called independent variables.

Multivariate models represent a second step, after bivariate relationships are estimated. Multivariate models allow for the inclusion of multiple variables in the model so that we can examine relationships between one outcome, such as conviction, and several predictor variables, such as Military Service branch, the relationship between the accused and the victim, and the offense charged. Predictor variables may be related to our outcome of interest (i.e., conviction or not) and to the other predictor variable of interest; thus multivariate models are useful because they employ mathematical formulas to isolate the part of each predicator that is truly related to the outcome variable and not to the other predictor variables. When a predictor variable is uniquely and strongly related to an outcome variable, after being separated from its relationship with the other predictor variables in the model, we conclude the relationship is "statistically significant." This means that the relationship observed between a predictor and an outcome would likely be observed over different samples of cases; the relationship is not due to random chance. In other words, we conclude that the relationship truly exists and is not an artifact of the sample of data we examined.

Two types of multivariate regression models are used because the key outcome (dependent) variables of interest are either dichotomous, with only two categories, or continuous, with numerical values rather than categories. When dependent variables are dichotomous, logistic regression models are appropriate. Ordinary least squares (OLS) models are used when dependent variables are continuous.

Several predictor variables of interest are categorical; that is, their attributes are categories rather than numbers. An example is Service of the accused. This variable has five categories: Army, Marine Corps, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard. Entering categorical variables into regression models requires that one category serves as the reference category against which all other categories are compared. It is necessary to change the reference category to make all relevant comparisons. In the model results presented below, the Army serves as the reference category for the accused's Service branch. This is changed and models are reestimated so that the other branches have the opportunity to serve as the reference category and are compared to the others.

ADJUDGED SENTENCING SEVERITY SCALE (FY 2018)

Sentence	n	%
Confinement up to and including 2 months	22	10.6
Confinement greater than 2 months and up to 5 months	14	6.8
Confinement greater than 5 months and up to 8 months	1	.5
Confinement 9 months to 12 months	1	.5
Confinement 13 months to 18 months OR punitive separation	4	1.9
Punitive separation and confinement up to and including 2 months	17	8.2
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 2 months and up to 5 months	13	6.3
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 5 months and up to 8 months	16	7.7
Punitive separation and confinement 9 months to 12 months	14	6.8
Punitive separation and confinement 13 months to 18 months	12	5.8
Punitive separation and confinement 19 months to 24 months	14	6.8
Punitive separation and confinement 25 months to 36 months	29	14.0
Punitive separation and confinement 37 months to 60 months	17	8.2
Punitive separation and confinement 60 months to 120 months	22	10.6
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 120 months	11	5.3

The adjudged sentencing severity scale was developed by Patricia D. Breen and Brian D. Johnson ("Military Justice: Case Processing and Sentencing Decisions in America's 'Other' Criminal Courts," Justice Quarterly 35.4 [2018]: 639–69) and combines the confinement sentence with punitive separations. The scale was developed through consultation with judge advocates. For the purposes of the current analysis, only cases that ended in a conviction were analyzed and cases that did not result in a sanction of confinement or punitive separation are not included. The scale is used in place of a variable that simply measures the number of confinement months because the distribution of confinement months is not normal. The distribution of values is concentrated at the lower end of the scale. In other words, a large number of cases ended in shorter confinement sentences than longer sentences. Non-normal distributions may present problems when OLS regression models are estimated.

a This model includes only cases that resulted in a conviction for a contact offense, penetrative offense, or a non–sexual assault offense.

b The reference category is accused convicted of penetrative offense or a contact offense. These two conviction offense categories (penetrative and contact) were combined because all penetrative conviction cases ended in punitive separation (see Table 38 – Variables Associated with Adjudged Sentence of Punitive Separation (FY 2017)).

The adjudged sentencing severity scale was developed by Breen and Johnson, "Military Justice" (see Table 22), and combines the confinement sentence with punitive separations. The scale was developed through consultation with judge advocates. For the purposes of the current analysis, only cases that ended in a conviction were analyzed and cases that did not result in a sanction of confinement or punitive separation are not included. The scale is used in place of a variable that simply measures the number of confinement months because the distribution of confinement months is not normal. The distribution of values is concentrated at the lower end of the scale. In other words, a large number of cases ended in shorter confinement sentences than longer sentences. Non-normal distributions may present problems when OLS regression models are estimated.

ADJUDGED SENTENCING SEVERITY SCALE (FY 2016)

Sentence	n	%
Confinement up to and including 2 months	33	11.8
Confinement greater than 2 months and up to 5 months	18	6.5
Confinement greater than 5 months and up to 8 months	7	2.5
Confinement 9 months to 12 months	5	1.8
Confinement 13 months to 18 months OR punitive separation	12	4.3
Punitive separation and confinement up to and including 2 months	11	3.9
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 2 months and up to 5 months	17	6.1
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 5 months and up to 8 months	37	13.3
Punitive separation and confinement 9 months to 12 months	28	10
Punitive separation and confinement 13 months to 18 months	15	5.4
Punitive separation and confinement 19 months to 24 months	12	4.3
Punitive separation and confinement 25 months to 36 months	22	7.9
Punitive separation and confinement 37 months to 60 months	23	8.2
Punitive separation and confinement 60 months to 120 months	20	7.2
Punitive separation and confinement greater than 120 months	19	6.8

The adjudged sentencing severity scale was developed by Breen and Johnson, "Military Justice" (see Table 22), and combines the confinement sentence with punitive separations. The scale was developed through consultation with judge advocates. For the purposes of the current analysis, only cases that ended in a conviction were analyzed and cases that did not result in a sanction of confinement or punitive separation are not included. The scale is used in place of a variable that simply measures the number of confinement months because the distribution of confinement months is not normal. The distribution of values is concentrated at the lower end of the scale. In other words, a large number of cases ended in shorter confinement sentences than longer sentences. Non-normal distributions may present problems when OLS regression models are estimated.

APPENDIX B. DAC-IPAD CASE ADJUDICATION DATABASE: FISCAL YEAR 2018 PENETRATIVE OFFENSE(S) PREFERRED AND RESOLVED AT SPECIAL OR SUMMARY COURTS-MARTIAL

In Figure 19, in the body of this report, the DAC-IPAD documented 15 instances in which charges were preferred for a penetrative sexual assault offense and the case was resolved at a special (13 cases) or summary court-martial (2 cases). While it is correct that there are instances in which a special or summary court-martial was convened after a penetrative sexual assault offense was initially charged, the courts-martial were the result of plea agreements that dismissed the penetrative sexual assault charge in exchange for guilty pleas to other offenses which were then referred to special or summary courts-martial.

To provide additional information on the charges and specifications for each of the cases in question, the following tables detail the charges preferred; the advice of the staff judge advocate, if available; the terms of any pretrial agreements; the charges referred to special or summary court-martial; the accused's pleas; and the findings at trial.

Dear Chairs, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit this report of the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (JPP) on military defense counsel resources and experience. This report includes four recommendations on the topics of defense investigators, defense office resources and staffing, defense requests for and funding of expert witnesses and consultants, and defense counsel experience.

To assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on sexual assault offenses in the military, the JPP tasked the JPP Subcommittee with conducting site visits to military installations throughout the United States and Asia. From July through September 2016, JPP Subcommittee members spoke to more than 280 individuals from all of the military Services involved in the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses. The JPP Subcommittee heard from defense counsel and prosecutors from all of the Services about the perceived disparity in resources and experience between defense counsel and prosecutors. The JPP Subcommittee reviewed the information gathered from these site visits, as well as information on this topic received by the JPP in public meetings, and submitted their findings and recommendations on this issue to the JPP. After deliberating on the Subcommittee's report and recommendations, the JPP adopted all of the Subcommittee's recommendations, with modifications. The JPP expresses sincere appreciation to the members of the JPP Subcommittee and everyone who contributed to this report.

The JPP looks forward to continuing its review of military judicial proceedings for sexual assault crimes and addressing other topics in future reports.

Respectfully submitted,

Executive Summary

In order to assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses in the military, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) tasked the JPP Subcommittee with conducting site visits to military installations to talk to the men and women who work in the military justice system. The JPP had previously heard information on many of these law and policy changes and wanted to determine how these changes were being carried out at the installation level by investigators, prosecutors, defense counsel, and others involved in sexual assault investigation, litigation, or victim support.

From July through September 2016, members of the JPP Subcommittee visited military installations throughout the United States and Asia. They spoke to more than 280 individuals representing 25 military installations and all of the Services, including prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, commanders, investigators, and sexual assault response coordinators and other victim support personnel. These individuals spoke without attribution so that the Subcommittee could gain an unfiltered, candid assessment of how changes in sexual assault laws and policies have affected the military justice system. On the basis of information from these site visits, the Subcommittee elected to issue reports on several topics. The Subcommittee issued its first report to the JPP—the Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases—on December 9, 2016.

In its report on defense resources and experience, the JPP Subcommittee detailed information gathered from military installation site visits and other sources in four areas: (1) defense investigators, (2) defense office resources and staffing, (3) defense requests for and funding of experts, and (4) defense counsel experience. The Subcommittee made recommendations in each of these areas.

The JPP deliberated on the Subcommittee's report and had the opportunity to question the JPP Subcommittee members who attended the installation site visits. As a result of this deliberation, the JPP's report summarizes and adopts the information presented by the Subcommittee, provides additional information from Service responses to a JPP request for information, and adopts the Subcommittee's recommendations, with modifications.

The JPP makes four recommendations in the area of defense counsel resources and experience, several of which had—in some form—been recommended by its predecessor panel, the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP) in its June 2014 report to Congress. The JPP recommends that the Services provide independent defense investigators, ensure sufficient staffing and resourcing of Service defense offices, place expert witness approval and funding authority in the Service defense organizations, and ensure that lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases have sufficient litigation experience, setting a minimum tour length for defense counsel of two years.

Summary of JPP Recommendations on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases*

Recommendation 39: In order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as reasonably needed.

- In its June 2014 report, the RSP recommended that the Secretary of Defense direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators. The RSP noted that civilian public defender offices routinely employ investigators and consider them indispensable.
    - To date, only the Navy has complied with this recommendation, hiring eight civilian defense investigators. Site visit feedback from Navy defense counsel regarding the employment of defense investigators was overwhelmingly positive.
    - The Army and Air Force are monitoring the feasibility of the Navy's defense investigator program, but the Marine Corps feels that current procedures for requesting defense investigative assistance are sufficient.
- Since the RSP made this recommendation, statutory changes have been made to the Article 32 process. Under the new Article 32 pretrial hearing process, witnesses, including the victim, testify at the Article 32 hearing far less frequently and less evidence is presented, making it more difficult for defense counsel to gain access to important information regarding the government's case.

Recommendation 40: The military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an independent audit of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimal level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term and authorize temporary details from one Service to another to ensure expeditious disposition of allegations. Organizations that have conducted similar kinds of assessments of public defender resources in various civilian jurisdictions may be of assistance in conducting this audit.

- In its June 2014 report, the RSP recommended that the Service Secretaries ensure that defense organizations are adequately funded and resourced.

- The Secretary of Defense approved this recommendation and referred it to the Service Secretaries for implementation. In their responses to the JPP's recent request for information, all of the Services stated that their senior-level defense counsel have training and experience comparable to or exceeding that of the prosecutors. They also stated that resourcing of defense offices is comparable to that of the prosecution.

- According to site visit feedback provided to the JPP Subcommittee, not all defense offices are adequately staffed or resourced; one defense counsel noted that his office had only one paralegal assigned to assist ten defense counsel. Testimony to the JPP from Army and Marine Corps defense leadership supports site visit feedback that these organizations are understaffed and under-resourced.

Recommendation 41: The Secretary of Defense direct the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to draft appropriate rules and measures, as necessary, to vest defense expert approval authority and expenditure funding in the Service defense organizations.

- According to site visit feedback provided to the JPP Subcommittee by defense counsel and prosecutors, defense requests for expert witnesses and consultants in sexual assault cases are often denied or, if the requests are granted, defense counsel are provided a less qualified expert than that provided to the prosecution.

- Current procedures in the Manual for Courts-Martial require defense counsel to request experts from the convening authority and require them to submit a statement of reasons why the expert is necessary. Given that these requests are typically processed through the trial counsel, such statements often force defense counsel to prematurely reveal trial strategy.

- Even when defense requests for experts are granted, the expert often arrives so late in the trial process that his or her ability to assist with defense strategy is curtailed.

- Civilian public defender offices routinely maintain their own funding for experts.

Recommendation 42: The military Services permit only defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set assignment policies that provide defense counsel two or more consecutive years of experience in the role, to the maximum extent feasible at the same location. Exceptions to this policy should be personally approved, on a case-by-case basis, by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

- There is a disparity among the Services regarding defense counsel experience requirements; the Air Force and Navy require defense counsel to have prior litigation experience, while the Army and Marine Corps have no such requirement.

- Several defense counsel on site visits told JPP Subcommittee members of their experiences defending sexual assault cases when they had very little litigation experience. All defense counsel recommended against assigning brand-new attorneys to defense counsel positions.

- In its June 2014 report, the RSP recommended that the Services permit only defense counsel with litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases, and that defense counsel be assigned to that role for at least two years. The Secretary of Defense amended this recommendation to state that only counsel with prior litigation experience could serve as trial counsel and defense counsel in penetrative-type sexual offenses, and the minimum tour length was set at two years, to the extent practicable.

    - In response to the JPP's request for information, the Army stated that it considers litigation experience and the complexity of the case when assigning counsel, with inexperienced defense counsel typically being assigned to handle less complex cases and to assist more experienced counsel. According to the Army, its regional and senior defense counsel have the experience necessary to litigate complex cases and to help train more junior counsel. The Marine Corps also reported that it takes many factors into account when assigning defense counsel, such as the complexity of the case and the counsel's experience level. For complex cases, the senior defense counsel must consult with the regional defense counsel to ensure that the right counsel is detailed to the case. The Navy and Air Force stated that typically only experienced counsel are assigned to defense counsel billets, with more senior counsel serving as lead defense counsel in penetrative sexual assault cases.

    - With the exception of the Marine Corps, the other Services reported that defense counsel assignments are usually two years or more. The Marine Corps stated that defense counsel tour lengths are at least 18 months, which it considers adequate.

- A provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 requires the Services to ensure that counsel assigned to a case have sufficient experience to successfully prosecute or defend the case. This provision also requires the Services to use a system of skill identifiers to identify experienced judge advocates so that they can provide oversight to less experienced counsel. This provision calls for a five-year pilot program to assess the feasibility of establishing a professional development program for judge advocates to ensure sufficient experience among counsel to prosecute and defend complex cases.

I. Introduction

During the first two years of its tenure, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) has had the opportunity to hear from numerous officials and experts in the military Services about legislation, policies, and practices relating to sexual assault litigation.[1] This information has been extremely valuable and has informed the JPP's findings and recommendations on a number of topics. However, in order to assess how these laws and policies are working in practice, the JPP determined that there would be value in conducting site visits to military installations to hear the opinions of those responsible for carrying them out.

The JPP tasked the JPP Subcommittee[2] with conducting these installation site visits. From July through September 2016, members of the Subcommittee visited military installations throughout the United States and Asia. They spoke to more than 280 individuals representing 25 military installations from all of the Services who are involved in investigating, litigating, and supporting sexual assault cases in the military.[3] These individuals spoke without attribution so that the Subcommittee could gain an unfiltered, candid assessment of how changes in sexual assault laws and policies have affected the military justice system. On the basis of information from these site visits, the Subcommittee elected to issue several reports on different topics. The Subcommittee issued its first report to the JPP—the Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases—on December 9, 2016.[4]

In its report on defense resources and experience, the JPP Subcommittee detailed information gathered from site visits and other sources in four areas: (1) defense investigators, (2) defense office resources and staffing, (3) defense requests for and funding of experts, and (4) defense counsel experience. The Subcommittee made recommendations in each of these areas. In this report, the JPP adopts the information presented by the Subcommittee, which is summarized here; provides additional information gathered from Service responses to a JPP request for information; and adopts the Subcommittee's recommendations, with modifications. In deliberating on and adopting the Subcommittee's report, the JPP notes the vast experience of the Subcommittee members in litigation of sexual assault cases, both in the military and civilian communities.

II. Defense Investigators

A. Site Visit Information. As noted in the JPP Subcommittee's report on this subject, defense counsel and trial counsel interviewed by the JPP Subcommittee on military installation site visits universally stated that defense requests for investigative support are routinely denied by convening authorities and military judges. Defense counsel also told the Subcommittee that junior paralegals, who are not trained investigators, do perform some investigative functions, but those activities reduce their availability to help prepare for trial.[5] Defense counsel noted further that their ability to conduct these investigations is limited by their demanding trial schedules and the need to avoid a conflict of interest caused by becoming a potential witness in the case.[6]

While military defense counsel are able to obtain the investigative report produced by military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs), current practices and policies regarding sexual assault investigations limit a defense counsel's ability to develop the facts of the case. MCIO investigators told Subcommittee members during site visits that internal policies that discourage thorough questioning and follow-up interviews of victims, as well as the presence of special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVC/VLC) at every interview, have hampered their ability to interview the victim as thoroughly as they feel necessary. They noted that MCIO requests to the SVC/VLC for a follow-up interview with the victim are frequently denied, making it difficult for them to clarify potential inconsistencies in the victim's initial statement.[7]

The Subcommittee report notes that counsel informed them on site visits that the MCIOs will not investigate leads at the defense counsel's request. Defense and trial counsel told Subcommittee members of a factor compounding the problem: recent statutory changes have altered the Article 32 process from a pretrial investigation into a less robust preliminary hearing.[8] Under the old process, victims were frequently required to appear and testify at the Article 32 hearing and undergo cross-examination from defense counsel. Under the new process, victims are no longer required to—and frequently do not—appear and testify at the Article 32 hearing.[9] Trial and defense counsel interviewed by the Subcommittee during installation site visits referred to the new Article 32 process as a "paper drill," because victims and other witnesses often do not testify, and the prosecution frequently submits only written statements or other documentary evidence for review.[10] Under the new process, discovery for the defense is no longer one of the stated purposes for the Article 32 hearing.

B. Additional Information. At the JPP's public hearing in May 2016, the Services' chiefs of defense services stated that defense requests for investigative support are rarely granted by the convening authority or military judge in sexual assault cases.[11] In fact, the Marine Corps defense representative informed the JPP that she had never seen an investigator request granted in a sexual assault case, adding that it must be "very infrequent if it happens."[12] Similarly, the Army's Chief of Trial Defense Services stated that only one in twelve requests for appointment of a defense investigator in sexual assault cases was granted.[13] The Marine Corps presenter also noted that having defense counsel conduct all of their own investigative work means that counsel are taken away from working on their case.[14] She pointed out—highlighting the disparity of resources between the prosecution and defense—that in the Marine Corps, the prosecution's complex trial team has dedicated investigators.[15] In addition, in the January 2017 JPP public meeting, a Marine Corps defense counsel told the JPP that not having defense investigators has led to trial delays.[16]

The Navy's defense presenter at the JPP's May 2016 public meeting reported that the Navy had hired eight defense investigators. As noted in the JPP Subcommittee's report, the addition of these investigators has enabled defense counsel to focus on preparing their cases for trial and obtaining needed training.[17] At the JPP's January 2017 public meeting (which had a different subject), a Navy senior defense counsel provided an update on the Navy's addition of defense investigators, stating that a defense investigator working with her had a "monumental" impact "in making up some of the differences that have been lost in the investigative process from the Article 32."[18] She told the JPP that the addition of defense investigators has resulted in cases going to trial more quickly and that the Navy could use more defense investigators than it currently employs. She also noted that the defense investigator's work had resulted in acquittals at trial.[19]

In its June 2014 report, the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP)—the predecessor panel to the JPP—issued a recommendation that the Secretary of Defense direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators. In a December 15, 2014, memorandum regarding implementation of the RSP recommendations,[20] the Secretary of Defense referred this recommendation to the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice (JSC).[21]

The JPP sent a request for information (RFI) to the Services in December 2016 to determine the status of this RSP recommendation. To date only the Navy has implemented it, though the Army and Air Force indicate that they are monitoring the Navy's program to assess its feasibility and success. The Marine Corps believes that its current mechanisms for the defense to obtain investigative support are adequate. The following table summarizes the Services' responses.[22]

Navy	• The Navy implemented the RSP's recommendation by hiring eight defense investigators. • The program is in its second year and has resulted in uncovering exculpatory evidence, contributing to acquittals and better dispositions for defense clients. • The Navy JAG Corps is assessing the program to ensure that it has the appropriate number of investigators and they are assigned appropriately.
Army	• Paralegals are trained to perform some defense investigative functions. • Counsel can request defense investigation support from the convening authority and the military judge. • The Army is tracking the Navy's defense investigator program to assess its feasibility.
Air Force	• The Air Force is tracking implementation of the Navy's defense investigator program to assess the best course of action.
Marine Corps	• Current mechanisms for the defense to obtain investigative support are adequate. • The Manual for Courts-Martial provides procedures for the defense to request investigative support from the convening authority and the military judge. • Defense offices are provided legal clerks who can coordinate and interview witnesses, take notes during meetings, and perform other similar functions. • The accused may personally hire a defense investigator.
Coast Guard	• The Coast Guard uses defense services provided by the Navy.

The Army and Marine Corps responses correctly note that the Manual for Courts-Martial provides procedures for the defense to request investigative assistance from the convening authority and military judge.[23] But in practice, according to presentations made to the JPP by the heads of the Services' defense organizations, as well as information received from numerous trial and defense counsel interviewed during installation site visits, such requests are rarely granted.

Also, while the Army and Marine Corps RFI responses state that defense paralegals and legal clerks can perform some of these investigative functions, defense counsel assert that doing so takes these individuals away from performing their primary duty of preparing to defend Service members accused of serious offenses at courts-martial. Moreover, low staffing levels at defense offices often make it impossible for paralegals and legal clerks to provide such assistance. A defense counsel at one installation informed the Subcommittee that an office at a large military installation with ten defense counsel had only one paralegal.[24]

C. JPP Assessment and Recommendation. It has been two and a half years since the RSP recommended that Service defense organizations be provided with independent, deployable defense investigators. This recommendation was based on information presented to the RSP from civilian defense counsel, who observed that many civilian public defender offices have defense investigators and consider them critical. The RSP also found that defense investigators are necessary to "correct an obvious imbalance of resources."[25]

Since the RSP issued that report, statutory changes have been made to the Article 32 process. Under the new Article 32 pre-trial hearing process, witnesses, including the victim, testify at the Article 32 hearing far less frequently and less evidence is presented, making it more difficult for defense counsel to gain access to important information regarding the government's case.

These changes to the Article 32 process, as well as the limitations of MCIO victim interviews, suggest that the need for defense investigators is even greater now than it was when the RSP made its recommendation. Members of the JPP Subcommittee reported in the December 9, 2016, JPP public meeting that their sense from the site visits was that a lack of defense investigators and other resources, especially in light of changes to the Article 32 process, has negatively affected the quality of military justice in sexual assault cases.[26]

Recommendation 39*: In order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as reasonably needed.

III. Defense Office Staffing and Resources

A. Site Visit Information. The JPP Subcommittee reported that it repeatedly heard from prosecutors and defense counsel at installation site visits that defense offices are understaffed and under-resourced. Many defense counsel stated that these deficiencies have made it difficult to manage their caseload, more than half of which is composed of sexual assault cases. As noted above, a defense counsel at a large installation reported having only one paralegal to assist ten defense counsel with case preparation.[27]

B. Additional Information. The Services' defense leadership provided information on this and other topics to the JPP at its May 2016 public meeting. The Army's chief of trial defense services told the Panel that in 2014, he had 154 authorized defense counsel billets and that number had since gone down to 144. Yet he was unable to fill even those billets, with only 135 counsel on hand at that time.[28] Similarly, the Marine Corps defense representative at the May 2016 JPP public meeting stated that there was a disparity in resources between the defense and prosecution.[29]

In its June 2014 report, the RSP recommended that the Service Secretaries "ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced in funding resources and personnel, including defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts, and direct the Services assess whether that is the case."[30] In the Secretary of Defense's December 15, 2014, memorandum regarding implementation of the RSP recommendations, this recommendation's status was listed as "Approve" and it was referred to the Service Secretaries for implementation.[31] The JPP's December 2016 RFI to the Services inquired about the status of this recommendation.

All of the Services stated that their senior-level defense counsel have training and experience comparable to or exceeding that of prosecutors. They also stated that resourcing of defense offices is comparable to that of the prosecution.[32]

C. JPP Assessment and Recommendation. The Secretary of Defense approved the RSP's recommendation that defense offices be adequately resourced and staffed and forwarded it to the Service Secretaries for action. According to the recent Service responses to the RFI, all defense offices are adequately staffed and resourced. However, reports of defense counsel from the installation site visits and information presented to the JPP at its May 2016 public meeting suggest that understaffing and under-resourcing of defense offices continue to be a problem—especially for the Army and Marine Corps.

The military has a great deal of experience in "doing more with less." However, as defense counsel informed Subcommittee members, sexual assault cases have grown increasingly complex, require a lot of resources to defend, and make up a much larger percentage of their caseload than in previous years. As noted by one Subcommittee member—a retired Marine Corps general officer—for many years military defense counsel have complained about a lack of resources and staffing; but as resources have diminished over the years, the defense organizations have gotten used to doing without them. On the basis both of his own experience and of information gathered from prosecutors and defense counsel during site visits, he strongly recommended additional resources and staffing for defense organizations in order to continue providing military members with world-class defense services.[33]

Recommendation 40*: The military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an independent audit of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimal level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term and authorize temporary details from one Service to another to ensure expeditious disposition of allegations. Organizations that have conducted similar kinds of assessments of public defender resources in various civilian jurisdictions may be of assistance in conducting this audit.

The JPP's recommendation on this topic was informed by the Subcommittee's presentation to the JPP discussing the reliance in the civilian sector on organizations that conduct audits of public defender offices to determine appropriate levels of staffing and resources.[34]

IV. Defense Expert Requests and Funding

A. Site Visit Information. During the installation site visits, JPP Subcommittee members heard numerous complaints from defense counsel from all Services about their inability to get approval and funding for defense expert witnesses and consultants in sexual assault cases. In the military, defense counsel must request approval and funding for expert witnesses and consultants, prior to referral of charges, from the convening authority.[35] These requests must be accompanied by a statement providing reasons why the expert is necessary and estimating the cost of the expert.[36] If the convening authority denies the request, the defense counsel can make it again to the military judge following referral of charges. The military judge will determine whether the expert's testimony is "relevant and necessary," and whether the government has or will provide a "suitable substitute."[37]

Defense counsel told Subcommittee members that their requests for experts are frequently denied or, after approval, they are provided with a substitute that is inadequate to the task.[38] This assertion was corroborated by a number of prosecutors interviewed on site visits. Counsel pointed out that when experts are granted, they are often made available shortly before the trial date, too late to help develop a defense theory of the case or prepare the case.[39] In addition, the process of asking the convening authority to approve and fund a defense expert often forces the defense to reveal their trial strategy to the government.[40] In contrast, trial counsel are not similarly disadvantaged: they can consult with and hire experts early in the trial process, without being forced to reveal their theory of the case to the defense.

B. Additional Information. In its June 2014 report, the RSP found that public defender offices often maintain their own budgets to cover expert witnesses and consultants or can request experts through a trial judge who manages the budget.[41] They also pointed out that federal public defenders have their own funding to pay for experts.[42] In addition, the JPP Subcommittee noted that defense counsel in civilian judicial systems are able to hire confidential consulting experts and can keep this information

The court stated: "The absence of such parity opens the military justice system to abuse, because the Government in general, and—as this case demonstrates—the trial counsel in particular, may play key roles in securing defense experts." from the prosecution unless they elect to use the expert at trial, enabling the defense to get a candid assessment from the expert without it being used against their client.[43]

C. JPP Assessment and Recommendation. Both trial and defense counsel informed the Subcommittee of the difficulties and disparities involved with defense requests for experts. These requests are reportedly often denied by the convening authority, and when they are granted the defense is often given an expert not of their choosing who may not be qualified to speak to the issues at hand. Because military judges can't rule on such requests until after referral of charges—at the point when trial dates are being agreed on—the defense will not have the benefit of a needed expert consultant prior to and during the Article 32 preliminary hearing, when the consultant's expertise may be of critical value to developing a defense and to helping the defense counsel understand the complexities of the issues that tend to arise in sexual assault cases. Furthermore, military defense counsel, like their civilian counterparts, should not be required to reveal their theory of defense or defense strategies to the government so early in the process before trial, unless otherwise required by law. Providing the Service defense organizations their own source of expert funding would alleviate this problem and put the burden on defense leadership to determine how and where this budget will be spent.

Recommendation 41*: The Secretary of Defense direct the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to draft appropriate rules and measures, as necessary, to vest defense expert approval authority and expenditure funding in the Service defense organizations.

V. Defense Counsel Staffing and Experience Levels

A. Site Visit Information. Defense counsel told the Subcommittee on site visits that they generally receive adequate training. However, their comments did suggest problems in the experience level of defense counsel and the lack of uniformity among the Services. The Navy and Air Force require attorneys to have some litigation and military justice experience prior to being placed in a defense counsel billet, but the Army and Marine Corps do not have this prerequisite and allow first-tour judge advocates to serve as defense counsel in sexual assault cases.[44] Several defense counsel told Subcommittee members that in the first or second contested trial of their career, they served as second chair on a rape case; one defense counsel reported having served as lead counsel in a sexual assault case in his third trial.[45] Though these experiences were not common, they were overwhelming and uncomfortable for those counsel who had them. All defense counsel recommended against assigning brand-new attorneys to defense counsel positions.[46]

B. Additional Information. In its June 2014 report, the RSP reviewed this issue and recommended that only defense counsel with prior litigation experience serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. It also recommended a minimum tour length for defense counsel of two years.[47] In the Secretary of Defense's December 15, 2014 memorandum regarding implementation of the RSP recommendations, this recommendation was approved in part, and referred to the Services for further study.[48] The recommendation was amended by the Department of Defense so that only counsel with prior litigation experience could serve as trial counsel and defense counsel in cases involving penetrative sexual offenses, and the minimum tour length was set at two years, to the extent practicable.[49]

In response to the JPP's RFIs, the Army stated that it considers litigation experience and the complexity of the case when assigning counsel, with inexperienced defense counsel typically being assigned to handle less complex cases and to assist more experienced counsel. According to the Army, its regional and senior defense counsel have the experience necessary to litigate complex cases and to help train more junior counsel.[50] The Marine Corps also reported that it takes many factors into account when assigning defense counsel, such as the complexity of the case and the counsel's experience level. For complex cases, the senior defense counsel must consult with the regional defense counsel to ensure that the right counsel is detailed to the case.[51] The Navy and Air Force stated that typically only experienced counsel are assigned to defense counsel billets, with more senior counsel serving as lead defense counsel in penetrative sexual assault cases.[52]

With the exception of the Marine Corps, the other Services reported that defense counsel assignments are usually two years or more.[53] The Marine Corps stated that defense counsel tour lengths are at least 18 months, which it considers adequate.[54]

In the May 2016 JPP public meeting, the Army's chief of trial defense services told the Panel that 20% of attorneys assigned to a defense counsel position have no prior experience.[55] He stated that while they try to avoid assigning a new defense counsel to a sexual assault case, the realities of their staffing sometimes force these assignments, though the counsel is able to consult with more senior defense counsel.[56] He also noted that the accused's counsel in a sexual assault case may have less experience than the victim's counsel.[57] Similarly, a leader in the Marine Corps' defense organization told the JPP that the vast majority of defense counsel are serving in their first tour and are right out of law school.[58] She explained that they try to make up for this lack of experience through training and through supervision by more experienced counsel.[59] She added that defense counsel typically serve in the position for only 12 to 14 months before being reassigned.[60]

A provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 (FY17 NDAA) requires the Services to ensure that trial and defense counsel detailed to a court-martial have sufficient experience and knowledge to try the case and requires the Services to have a professional development process to ensure successful prosecution and defense of courts-martial.[61] As part of that process, the Services must use skill identifiers or experience designators for identifying judge advocates with military justice experience and skill so that they can oversee less experienced counsel.[62] The provision also requires the Services to carry out a five-year pilot program to assess the feasibility of establishing a professional development program that will lead to judge advocates with military justice expertise prosecuting and defending complex courts-martial cases.[63]

C. JPP Assessment and Recommendation. While it appears that the Services generally assign more experienced defense counsel to complex cases, such as penetrative sexual assault cases, site visit feedback indicates that in at least some instances, inexperienced, first-tour judge advocates serve as defense counsel in these types of cases. First-tour judge advocates with just two prior litigated courts-martial as their only litigation or military justice experience should not serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. Counsel should have the opportunity to develop their litigation skills in less complex cases and under the supervision of more experienced counsel. The provision in the FY17 NDAA pertaining to trial and defense counsel experience, though lacking in details, apparently seeks to achieve the goal of having the most experienced military trial and defense counsel litigating the most serious sexual assault cases. It should not be left to chance and circumstance whether an accused in a sexual assault case—facing the possibility of a punitive discharge and years in confinement—gets the benefit of experienced counsel.

In order for defense counsel to build core skills and necessary experience, it is important that they have the opportunity to serve in the position for at least two years. The Panel notes that while the Marine Corps' RFI response states that 18 months in the position is sufficient, a leader in the Marine Corps defense community told the JPP in its May 2016 public meeting that defense counsel typically serve in the position for only 12 to 14 months. This is simply not sufficient time to enable defense counsel to gain the necessary experience, as defense counsel on site visits attested.

Recommendation 42: The military Services permit only defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set assignment policies that provide defense counsel two or more consecutive years of experience in the role, to the maximum extent feasible at the same location. Exceptions to this policy should be personally approved, on a case-by-case basis, by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

APPENDIX A: Judicial Proceedings Panel Authorizing Statutes and Charter

NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2013

SECTION 576. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(a) INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS REQUIRED.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS SINCE FISCAL YEAR 2012 AMENDMENTS.— The Secretary of Defense shall establish a panel to conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the Uniform Code of Military Justice by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112–81; 125 Stat. 1404) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANELS.

(1) COMPOSITION.

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have also served on the panel established under subsection (a)(1).

(2) QUALIFICATIONS.—The members of each panel shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Forces, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes.

(3) CHAIR.—The chair of each panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the panel.

(4) PERIOD OF APPOINTMENT; VACANCIES.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the panel. Any vacancy in a panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(5) DEADLINE FOR APPOINTMENTS.—

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—All original appointments to the panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be made before the termination date of the panel established under subsection (a)(1), but no later than 30 days before the termination date.

(6) MEETINGS.—A panel shall meet at the call of the chair.

(7) FIRST MEETING.—The chair shall call the first meeting of a panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the panel.

(c) REPORTS AND DURATION.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(A) FIRST REPORT.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit a first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes the panel considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives not later than 180 days after the first meeting of the panel.

(B) SUBSEQUENT REPORTS.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

(C) TERMINATION.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

(d) DUTIES OF PANELS.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall perform the following duties:

(A) Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice that were enacted by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112– 81; 125 Stat. 1404).

(B) Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.

(C) Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.

(D) Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required by subsection (c)(2) and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.

(E) Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

(F) Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.

(G) Building on the data compiled as a result of paragraph (1)(D), assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.

(H) Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act.

(I) Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases.

(J) Consider such other matters and materials as the panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

(3) UTILIZATION OF OTHER STUDIES.—In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, a panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies.

(e) AUTHORITY OF PANELS.—

(1) HEARINGS.—A panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the panel considers appropriate to carry out its duties under this section.

(2) INFORMATION FROM FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Upon request by the chair of a panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the panel considers necessary to carry out its duties under this section.

(f) PERSONNEL MATTERS.—

(1) PAY OF MEMBERS.—Members of a panel shall serve without pay by reason of their work on the panel.

(2) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The members of a panel shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance or services for the panel.

(3) STAFFING AND RESOURCES.—The Secretary of Defense shall provide staffing and resources to support the panels, except that the Secretary may not assign primary responsibility for such staffing and resources to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

SEC. 1731. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(b) ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(1) ADDITIONAL ASSESSMENTS SPECIFIED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under subsection (a)(2) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall conduct the following:

(A) An assessment of the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.

(B) An assessment of the implementation and effect of section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, and make such recommendations for modification of such section 1044e as the judicial proceedings panel considers appropriate.

(C) An assessment of the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1705, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(D) An assessment of the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:

(i) Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.

(ii) Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(iii) Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

(2) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the assessments required by paragraph (1) in one of the reports required by subsection (c)(2)(B) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013.

SEC. 545. ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.

(a) ADDITIONAL DUTIES IMPOSED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall perform the following additional duties:

(1) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the impact of the use of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), by the accused during the preliminary hearing conducted under section 832 of such title (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings.

(2) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the establishment of a privilege under the Military Rules of Evidence against the disclosure of communications between—

(A) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe Helpline; and

(B) users of and personnel staffing of the 26 Department of Defense Safe Help Room.

(b) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the reviews and assessments conducted under subsection (a) in one of the reports required by section 576(c)(2)(B) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1760).

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

1. Committee's Official Designation: The committee shall be known as the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel ("the Judicial Proceedings Panel").

2. Authority: The Secretary of Defense, as required by section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 ("the FY 2013 NDAA") (Public Law 112-239), as modified by section 1731(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 ("the FY 2014 NDAA") (Public Law 113-66), and in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA) (5 U.S.C., Appendix, as amended) and 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.50(a), established the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

3. Objectives and Scope of Activities: The Judicial Proceedings Panel will conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the UCMJ by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 ("the FY 2012 NDAA") (Public Law 112-81) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

4. Description of Duties: Section 576(d)(2) directs the Judicial Proceedings Panel to perform the following duties, with additional duties as added by section 1731(b)(1) of the FY 2014 NDAA:
   a. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the UCMJ that were enacted by section 541 of the FY 2012 NDAA.
   b. Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.
   c. Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.
   d. Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.
   e. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the UCMJ), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

f. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.
g. Building on the data compiled as a result of the assessment conducted by the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("the Response Systems Panel"), a Federal advisory committee established pursuant to section 576(a)(1) of the FY 2013 NDAA and in accordance with FACA, of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.
h. Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by Section 573 of the FY 2013 NDAA.
i. Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the UCMJ in certain sexual assault cases.
j. Assess the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the UCMJ), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.
k. Assess the implementation and effect of the Special Victim's Counsel for victims of sex-related offenses established by the Secretary of Defense on August 14, 2013 and codified in Section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, by the enactment of Section 1716 of the FY 2014 NDAA on December 26, 2013. The panel shall make such recommendations for modifications of section 1044e as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate.
l. Assess the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the UCMJ), as added by section 1705 of the FY 2014 NDAA, which requires at a minimum, that upon a finding of guilt for the offenses of rape, sexual assault, rape and sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit such acts, the punishment include dismissal or dishonorable discharge, except as provided for by Article 60 of the UCMJ, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ).
m. Assess the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:
    i. Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.
    ii. Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the UCMJ).

iii. Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

n. Consider such other matters and materials as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, the Judicial Proceedings Panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies. The Judicial Proceedings Panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as it considers appropriate to carry out its duties. Upon request by the Chair of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers necessary to carry out its duties.

5. Agency or Official to Whom the Committee Reports: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall provide its first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes it considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense through the Department of Defense (DoD) General Counsel (GC), and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives, not later than 180 days after its first meeting. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

6. Support: The DoD, through the DoD Office of General Counsel (DoD OGC), the Washington Headquarters Services, and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, shall provide staffing and resources as deemed necessary for the performance of the Judicial Proceedings Panel's functions, and shall ensure compliance with the requirements of the FACA, the Government in the Sunshine Act of 1976 ("the Sunshine Act") (5 U.S.C. § 552b, as amended), governing federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures. Primary responsibility for such staffing and resourcing may not be assigned to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

7. Estimated Annual Operating Costs and Staff Years: The estimated annual operating cost, to include travel, meetings, and contract support, is approximately $4,000,000 and 15 full-time equivalents.

8. Designated Federal Officer: The Designated Federal Officer (DFO), pursuant to DoD policy, shall be a full-time or permanent part-time DoD employee, and shall be appointed in accordance with governing DoD policies and procedures.

In addition, the Judicial Proceedings Panel's DFO is required to be in attendance at all meetings of the Panel and its subcommittees for the entire duration of each and every meeting. However, in the absence of the DFO, the Alternate DFO, duly appointed to the Judicial Proceedings Panel according to DoD policies and procedures, shall attend the entire duration of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittee meetings.

CHARTER

The DFO, or the Alternate DFO, shall approve all of the meetings of the Judicial Proceedings Panel as called by the Chair; shall call all meetings of its subcommittees, in coordination with the Chair; prepare and approve all meeting agendas for the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittees; and adjourn any meeting when the DFO or the Alternate DFO determines adjournment to be in the public's interest or required by governing regulations or DoD policies and procedures.

9. Estimated Number and Frequency of Meetings: Consistent with sections 576(b)(6) and (7) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at the call of the Chair, and the Chair shall call the first meeting of the Judicial Proceedings Panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at a minimum once per year.

10. Duration: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall remain in effect until terminated, as provided for and as required by section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA; however, the charter is subject to renewal every two years.

11. Termination: According to section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

12. Membership and Designation: Pursuant to sections 576(b)(1)(B) and (b)(2), the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have served on the Response Systems Panel.

    The members shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Force, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes. The Chair shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

    Members shall be appointed for the life of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, subject to annual renewals. Any vacancy on the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Panel members shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as special government employee (SGE) members. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, Judicial Proceedings Panel members shall serve without compensation.

    The DoD GC, according to DoD policies and procedures, may select experts and consultants as subject matter experts under the authority of 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to advise the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees; these individuals do not count toward the Judicial Proceedings Panel's total membership nor do they have voting privileges. In addition, these subject matter experts shall not participate in any deliberations dealing with the substantive matters before the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees nor shall they participate in any voting.

13. Subcommittees: The Department, when necessary and consistent with the Judicial Proceedings Panel's mission and DoD policies and procedures, may establish subcommittees, task groups, or working groups to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel. Establishment of subcommittees will be based upon a written determination, to include terms of reference, by the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, or the DoD GC.

    These subcommittees shall not work independently of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and shall report all of their recommendations and advice to the Judicial Proceedings Panel for full deliberation and discussion. Subcommittees have no authority to make decisions and recommendations, verbally or in writing, on behalf of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. No subcommittee or any of its members may update or report directly to the DoD or any Federal officers or employees.

    The Secretary of Defense shall appoint subcommittee members even if the member in question is already a member of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. All subcommittee appointments shall be subject to annual renewal. Such individuals, if not full-time or part-time government personnel, shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as SGE members. Those individuals who are full-time or permanent part-time Federal employees shall be appointed pursuant to 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.130(a) as RGE members. Subcommittee members shall serve for the life of the subcommittee. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, subcommittee members shall serve without compensation.

    All subcommittees operate pursuant to the provisions of FACA, the Sunshine Act, governing Federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures.

14. Recordkeeping: The records of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and its subcommittees shall be handled according to section 2, General Records Schedule 26, and appropriate Department of Defense policies and procedures. These records shall be available for public inspection and copying, subject to the Freedom of Information Act of 1966 (5 U.S.C. § 552, as amended).

APPENDIX B: Judicial Proceedings Panel Committee and Subcommittee Member Biographies

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN – CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman is counsel with the law firm Herrick, Feinstein LLP. Ms. Holtzman served for eight years as a U.S. representative (D-NY, 1973–81). While in office, she authored the Rape Privacy Act. She then served for eight years as District Attorney of Kings County, New York (Brooklyn), the fourth-largest DA's office in the country, where she helped change rape laws, improve standards and methods for prosecution, and develop programs to train police and medical personnel. In 1989 Ms. Holtzman became the only woman ever elected Comptroller of New York City. Ms. Holtzman graduated from Radcliffe College, magna cum laude, and received her law degree from Harvard Law School.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

MR. VICTOR STONE

Victor Stone represents crime victims at the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center, Inc. Previously, Mr. Stone served as Special Counsel at the United States Department of Justice. He spent 40 years with the Department of Justice in numerous positions, including as Chief Counsel, FBI Foreign Terrorist Task Force, and as Assistant U.S. Attorney in Oregon and the District of Columbia. He has experience working on victims' and prisoners' rights, serving on committees that resulted in the enactment of the Crime Victims' Rights Act and updates to the ABA Standards for Prisoner Rights. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he clerked on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

PROFESSOR THOMAS W. TAYLOR

Tom Taylor teaches graduate courses at Duke University's Sanford School of Public Policy. Previously, he served as a decorated and distinguished Army officer, civil servant, and member of the Senior Executive Service. During a 27-year career in the Pentagon, he advised seven secretaries and seven Chiefs of Staff of the Army, and as the senior leader of the Army legal community he worked on a wide variety of operational, personnel, and intelligence issues. He graduated with high honors from Guilford College, Greensboro, N.C., and with honors from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill law school, where he was a Morehead Fellow, a member of the law review, and a member of the Order of the Coif.

VICE ADMIRAL PATRICIA A. TRACEY, U.S. NAVY (RETIRED)

Pat Tracey was most recently the Vice President of Homeland Security and Defense for Hewlett Packard Enterprise Services, U.S. Public Sector, developing dynamic strategies and providing support to various agencies including the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, and U.S. Department of Defense. She completed a distinguished 34-year naval career in 2004, retiring as a vice admiral and the most senior woman officer in the history of the U.S. Navy. As chief of the Navy's $5 billion global education and training enterprise, Admiral Tracey led a successful revolution in training technology to improve the quality, access, effectiveness, and cost of Navy training. She graduated from the College of New Rochelle and the Naval Postgraduate School, with distinction, and completed a Fellowship with the Chief of Naval Operations' Strategic Studies Group.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL SUBCOMMITTEE MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES – CHAIR OF THE JPP SUBCOMMITTEE

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years, where she handled a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Prior to her nomination to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. She was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan), where she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney in the Southern District of New York, where she tried numerous organized crime cases and was Chief of the Organized Crime Strike Force in Manhattan.

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN – CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman, who took office as the youngest woman ever elected to Congress, served in the House of Representatives from 1973 to 1981, representing New York's 16th Congressional District. While in Congress, she served on the House Judiciary and Budget Committees and chaired the Immigration and Refugees Subcommittee. She co-founded the Congressional Women's Caucus and was elected its first Democratic chair. She subsequently was elected Brooklyn District Attorney (where she pioneered new strategies for the prosecution of rape cases)—the only woman ever elected DA in New York City. She was then elected New York City Comptroller, the only woman ever to hold that position. Ms. Holtzman was appointed by President Bill Clinton to the Interagency Working Group (on declassifying secret Nazi war crimes files), and by Secretary Hagel to the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel. She has also been appointed to the Department of Homeland Security Advisory Committee. Ms. Holtzman is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard University's Radcliffe College, magna cum laude. She practices law in New York City with the firm Herrick, Feinstein, LLP.

MS. LISA FRIEL

Lisa Friel is an internationally recognized expert on sexual assault. Ms. Friel has investigated and supervised complex cases involving sexual assault and harassment, human trafficking, workplace violence, child pornography, Internet predators, unlawful surveillance, theft, and fraud. Ms. Friel began her professional career at the New York County District Attorney's Office, specializing in sexual assault cases. She was the Chief of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit for nearly a decade and the Deputy Chief for 11 years. Supervising more than 40 assistant district attorneys, support staff, and investigators, she typically managed 300 cases and investigations at any one time.

Ms. Friel has directed thousands of investigations into allegations of sexual assault and other misconduct and has trained hundreds of law enforcement personnel throughout the world. In October 2011, following a distinguished 28-year career as a Manhattan prosecutor, Ms. Friel joined T&M Protection Resources as Vice President of the Sexual Misconduct Consulting & Investigations division. Ms. Friel and her staff developed policies and procedures, provided training workshops, and conducted sensitive investigations into a myriad of issues, including sexual misconduct (both sexual assault and sexual harassment) and domestic violence. In September 2014, Ms. Friel was appointed as T&M's Special Advisor to the NFL Commissioner, consulting on domestic violence, child abuse, and sexual assault within the National Football League. In April 2015, Ms. Friel accepted a permanent position with the NFL: an appointment by Commissioner Goodell as the NFL's Special Counsel for Investigations, where she is responsible for all investigations related to possible violations of the NFL's Personal Conduct Policy.

MS. LAURIE ROSE KEPROS

Laurie Rose Kepros is the Director of Sexual Litigation for the Colorado Office of the State Public Defender, where she trains and advises more than 700 lawyers and other staff statewide in their representation of adults and juveniles accused or convicted of sexual crimes. Ms. Kepros has personally represented thousands of criminal defendants, including many victims of sexual assault. She has tried and consulted on thousands of sexual offense cases across the state of Colorado. She has served on dozens of subcommittees of the Colorado Sex Offender Management Board and as a member of both the Sex Offense Task Force and the Sex Offense Working Group of the Sentencing Task Force of the Colorado Commission on Criminal and Juvenile Justice. Ms. Kepros was on the Board of Directors of the Colorado Criminal Defense Bar (CCDB) for 10 years and currently serves on the board of the CCDB's sister policy organization, the Colorado Criminal Defense Institute. She is a member of the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers and an adjunct professor at the University of Denver School of Law. She has repeatedly testified before the Colorado legislature as a subject matter expert in sexual crime law and as an expert witness in Colorado sex offense law in federal district court. In 2012, the CCDB awarded her the Gideon Award for upholding and preserving the principles captured by Gideon v. Wainwright.

DEAN LISA SCHENCK (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Dean Lisa Schenck became Associate Dean for Academic Affairs at the George Washington University Law School in 2009 after serving in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps for more than 25 years. She also has served as a judge, lawyer, and educator. While in the military, she was an appellate military judge on the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals in 2002 and received the 2003 Judge Advocates Association Outstanding Career Armed Services Attorney Award (Army). In 2005, Dean Schenck was the first woman appointed as a Senior Judge on that court, where she served until she retired. In 2007, the Secretary of Defense also appointed her to serve concurrently as Associate Judge on the U.S. Court of Military Commission Review. After retiring from the military as a colonel in 2008, Dean Schenck served as Senior Advisor to the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in Military Services.

PROFESSOR LEE SCHINASI (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Professor Lee Schinasi began his legal career as a trial attorney for the Office of Economic Opportunity before starting a 23-year career in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps. His final assignment was as Dean of Academics and Vice Dean of the Army's JAGC School. Professor Schinasi attended the resident Command and General Staff College and the resident Army War College. He has served as military legal advisor to the Army's Chief of Staff for Intelligence and as Staff Judge Advocate of the 3rd Infantry Division (in Germany) and United States Army South (in Panama). Professor Schinasi is co-author of several books on evidence and litigation, including The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, Military Evidentiary Foundations, The Florida Evidence Code Trial Book, Florida Evidentiary Foundations, Evidence in Florida, Emerging Problems under the Federal Rules of Evidence, and Lawyers Cooperative Practice Guide: Florida Evidence. He received a bachelor's degree in economics and a J.D. degree from the University of Toledo. Before joining the Barry Law faculty, Professor Schinasi taught at the University of Miami School of Law. He currently teaches evidence, torts, civil procedure, and national security law.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JAMES SCHWENK, U.S. MARINE CORPS (RETIRED)

Brigadier General James Schwenk retired from the Marine Corps in 2000 and from civil service in 2014, after 49 years of federal service. As a Marine Corps judge advocate, he served as a trial counsel, defense counsel, Deputy Staff Judge Advocate, Staff Judge Advocate, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Navy, Head of Operational Law Branch at Headquarters Marine Corps, Deputy Director of Legal and Legislative Policy for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Force Management and Policy, Assistant Judge Advocate General of the Navy for Military Law, and Military Assistant to the DoD General Counsel. Upon retiring from active duty, BGen Schwenk served for 14 years in the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense as Senior Associate Deputy General Counsel, specializing in personnel policy, military justice, and civil support. He was the principal legal advisor for the repeal of "don't ask, don't tell" and the provision of benefits to same-sex spouses of military personnel. In addition, he was the principal legal advisor to numerous DoD working groups in the area of military personnel policy, working extensively with the White House and Congress. BGen Schwenk attended the Washington College of Law, American University, earning his J.D. in 1977.

MS. JILL WINE-BANKS

Jill Wine-Banks has a background as a corporate executive in manufacturing and telecommunications and as an attorney and not-for-profit and government leader. Ms. Wine-Banks started her career at the Department of Justice prosecuting organized crime and labor racketeering cases and then played a crucial role as an assistant special prosecutor investigating and trying the Watergate obstruction of justice case. Ms. Wine-Banks also served as the General Counsel of the United States Army. In that position, Ms. Wine-Banks dealt with environmental, procurement, Panama Canal, intelligence, military justice, and political issues, including the integration of women into basic training and West Point. After leaving the Pentagon, she was a litigation partner at Jenner and Block, the Solicitor General and Deputy Attorney General of Illinois, and later the Executive Vice President and Chief Operating Officer of the American Bar Association, the world's largest legal publisher and professional association with almost 400,000 members. That experience led to her becoming a senior corporate executive at Motorola and then Maytag, handling international business development, global operations, alliance creation and management, and government relations in Pakistan, China, Ukraine, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, and Singapore. Recently, Ms. Wine-Banks was head of career and technical education for the Chicago Public Schools and a business consultant. Ms. Wine-Banks is currently writing a book about her life and career, with a special focus on her experiences during Watergate.

MEMORANDUM FOR MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. Following the Secretary's objectives and at the request of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, the Subcommittee conducted military installation site visits throughout the United States and Asia. Based upon information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee undertook additional research of several topics. The Subcommittee has completed its review on the topic of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Barbara S. Jones
Subcommittee Chair

Executive Summary

SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT TO THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—representing 25 military installations throughout the United States and Asia, all involved in the military justice process—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

This report summarizes site visit information and the Subcommittee's subsequent research, and makes findings regarding defense investigators, the experience levels of defense counsel, and the resources available to them in the military.

On the basis of the information gathered, the Subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The Subcommittee recommends that in order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as needed.

Recommendation 2: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an audit conducted by an independent, outside entity of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimum level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term.

Recommendation 3: The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the military Services to vest defense expert funding and approval authority in the Service defense organizations.

Recommendation 4: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services permit only a defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set the minimum tour length for defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—representing 25 military installations throughout the United States and Asia, all involved in the military justice process—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses. Discussions were held without attribution so that Subcommittee members could hear candid perceptions of the military's handling of sexual assault litigation from the men and women who are investigating, litigating, and supporting those cases. The Subcommittee spoke to groups of military prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVC/VLC), paralegals, and investigators, as well as commanders, sexual assault response coordinators, victim advocates, and victim-witness liaisons from all military Services.

On the basis of the information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee determined that on several issues, it would have to undertake further research before reporting to the JPP. This report summarizes site visit information and subsequent research regarding defense investigators, the experience levels of defense counsel, and the resources available to them in the military. In producing this report, the JPP Subcommittee used information gathered from site visits, information previously presented to the JPP at a public hearing, information derived from the Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel of June 2014, and existing statutory resources.

I. INADEQUATE STAFFING AND RESOURCES FOR MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL

A. Site Visit Information. Most of the defense counsel who participated in the Subcommittee's site visits reported that they are seriously understaffed and under resourced. These accounts were corroborated by comments from prosecutors interviewed during these site visits. At many installations, counsel stressed that a lack of attorneys, paralegals, investigators, experts, and basic resources hinders their ability to handle their caseload, more than half of which, they stated, is composed of sexual assault cases. At one installation, for example, an office at a large military installation with ten defense counsel had only one paralegal.

The most urgent and frequently raised issue regarding defense resources was a persistent lack of defense investigators. Defense counsel explained that in the current system, the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs) will not investigate leads at their request. Even if they were to do so, the information obtained would not be protected by attorney-client or work product privileges (as it would be for independent investigators assigned to work on a traditional criminal defense team). Some defense and trial counsel also expressed concern that MCIO investigators are often unwilling to follow up on investigative leads, thereby affecting the thoroughness of the investigation. And because, as MCIO investigators told the Subcommittee, they are required to be "non-confrontational" in their interactions with victims, potential problems in a victim's statement (e.g., inconsistencies with other evidence) may not be thoroughly explored.

REPORT ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

Defense counsel also noted that as a result of recent statutory changes to the Article 32 pretrial hearing process, fewer witnesses, including the victim, testify at the Article 32 hearing and less evidence is presented, making it more difficult for defense counsel to ascertain pertinent information about the government's case. The combination of this recent change in Article 32 practice and the lack of defense investigators has left defense counsel unable to investigate their cases in what they see as an appropriately effective manner.

The Navy is currently the only Service that employs defense investigators—eight of them worldwide. The other Services lack any independent budget to fund defense investigators, and defense counsel stated that they have to request funding for an investigator from the convening authority or military judge in each case in which they deem an investigator necessary.[1] Defense counsel and prosecutors agreed that these requests are routinely denied. Defense counsel consistently told Subcommittee members during the site visits that they rely on junior paralegals, who are not trained investigators, to help investigate these cases by finding and interviewing potential witnesses. As a result, these paralegals are also less available to carry out those job functions for which they have in fact been trained. Defense counsel mentioned that they do, on occasion, ask their clients to personally hire investigators and experts if the government denies their requests.

Defense counsel noted that their ability to investigate their clients' cases is limited by their demanding trial schedules and by the ethical need to avoid a conflict of interest caused by becoming a potential witness in the case—a problem that may arise if the lawyer is the only person present to conduct a witness interview. If, for example, a witness makes a statement during an interview but then testifies inconsistently at trial, the lawyer would be the only possible witness available to impeach the discrepant testimony. The practical consequence of this situation is that the lawyer becomes a witness in his or her own case, and therefore a substitute, conflict-free counsel would have to be appointed, leading to greater expense, added complication, and likely delay in the trial process, in addition to the possible negative effect on the case of replacing the original defense counsel with a new lawyer unfamiliar with the case. At the same time, if such exculpatory, impeaching testimony is unavailable to the accused, he or she may be denied the constitutional protections of confrontation, the right to present a defense, the right to receive a fair trial, and the right to due process of law. In civilian practice, this problem is largely avoided through the use of professional defense investigators who can conduct the interviews and then testify about them in court as necessary. Feedback from Navy defense counsel about the recent addition of defense investigators was very positive, and they felt it alleviated the problems noted above.

B. Other Sources of Information Regarding Defense Investigators. The Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP) reviewed the issue of defense investigators in its June 2014 report. The RSP found that defense requests for independent investigators made to the convening authority or military judge are routinely denied, noting that "military defense counsel need independent, deployable defense investigators to zealously represent their clients and correct an obvious imbalance of resources."[2] The RSP received information from a number of civilian public defenders and found that "many public defender offices have investigators on their staffs and consider them critical."[3] In fact, the former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers told a subcommittee of the RSP, "I don't know a lawyer in the country that does sex offenses without an investigator, except in the military. Really, there is no such thing."[4] The RSP noted that these investigators aid defense counsel in locating and interviewing potential witnesses, finding experts, and identifying services to assist the defense in complying with court-ordered treatment. Their work enables defense counsel to prepare for trial and gives attorneys "a fighting chance to develop facts and other evidence that is rarely provided to them by the government and is crucial for the proper representation of their clients."[5] The RSP concluded their review of this topic by making the following recommendation:

> RSP Recommendation 81: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators in order to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the defense mission and the fair administration of justice.[6]

As reported during the site visits, only the Navy has implemented this RSP recommendation: it has hired eight "defense litigation support specialists," more commonly known as defense investigators.[7] These defense investigators are civilians with prior law enforcement or defense experience. The Navy's Director of the Defense Counsel Assistance Program (DCAP) told the JPP that they have made it possible for defense counsel to focus on preparing for trial and getting needed training.[8] He added, however, that the Navy could use more than eight defense investigators.[9]

Also of significance regarding this issue are recent congressional changes that have dramatically altered the Article 32 process, changing it in practice from a pretrial investigation into a preliminary hearing and removing the requirement that a victim appear and testify at the hearing.[10] Prior to this statutory change, the Article 32 allowed for a "thorough and impartial investigation" of the case in which an investigating officer investigated the "truth and form of the charges."[11] Sexual assault victims were frequently required to appear and testify at the Article 32 investigation and were subject to cross-examination by the defense counsel.[12] One of the stated purposes of this Article 32 investigation was to "serve as a means of discovery."[13] Under the new process, the Article 32 preliminary hearing is limited to determining primarily whether there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the accused committed the offense.[14] Victims are no longer required to testify at the Article 32 hearing,[15] and frequently do not, and it is no longer one of the stated purposes of the hearing that it serve as a means of discovery. Both trial and defense counsel interviewed during installation site visits referred to the new Article 32 process as a "paper drill," often with no witnesses being called to testify and only documentary evidence submitted. Counsel expressed the view that because of these changes to the Article 32 process, it is more vital than ever to provide additional investigative resources for defense counsel.

And I was lucky enough to have my own specific investigator for a while. I share one now. But it makes it much easier in terms of being able to defend our clients finding out that you could throw away all your kind of subjective beliefs about your client's guilt or innocence and then you do investigation and you investigate no matter how much bad evidence there seemingly is. You find out that there are some things—sometimes complainants do not tell the truth. So, you know, one word I kind of bristle at when I hear it all the time from I guess panels that are supposedly objective is the word 'victim.' When we talk about pre-trial matters that have not resulted in conviction or that have not resulted in the guilty plea, we deal with complainants, because a lot of times we understand that alleged victims aren't victims at all when we investigate and even the government finds out before we do that things have been made up. So I think that just reemphasizes the importance of having investigators and having all the different aspects of the case, whether or not it's legal or on the field, done in order to have a decent—not only a decent, but a zealous defense.").

All of the military Services' chief defense counsel discussed the necessity of having defense investigators to relieve defense counsel and paralegals from the burden of having to conduct their own investigations. The Army Chief of Trial Defense Services noted that an informal survey of defense counsel making requests for defense investigators found that only one in twelve requests was approved in sexual assault cases.[16] One witness told the JPP that the law requires defense counsel to adequately investigate the facts of the case; otherwise, he or she could be found to be ineffective.[17] Several witnesses expressed their view that the refusal to provide defense investigators amounts to depriving the defendants of due process.[18] The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has not yet ruled on this specific issue[19] but has discussed an analogous resource, a mitigation specialist for a defendant in a capital case, stating that "[c]ompulsory process, equal access to evidence and witnesses, and the right to necessary expert assistance in presenting a defense are guaranteed to military accuseds through the Sixth Amendment, Article 46, UCMJ, 10 U.S.C. § 846 (2000), and Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 703(d)."[20]

Some counsel noted during site visits that there is a high acquittal rate in military courts-martial for sexual assault cases—a statistic that may, on its surface, seem to undercut the need for additional resources for defense counsel. However, the ultimate result of a trial, whether conviction or acquittal, is not the sole measure of whether a process was fair and indeed complied with the due process protections of the Constitution.

C. Other Sources of Information Regarding Additional Office Staffing and Resources. In its June 2014 report to Congress, the RSP recommended that military defense organizations be provided adequate funding resources and personnel.[21] In doing so, the RSP found that "maintaining adequate resources for the defense of military personnel accused of crimes, including sexual assault, is essential to the legitimacy and fairness of the military justice system."[22]

At the May 13, 2016, public meeting of the JPP, the Army Chief of Trial Defense Services identified his biggest challenge as not having enough defense counsel, explaining that the number of defense counsel billets has gone down since the RSP met and he can't fill the ones he has.[23] A Marine Corps witness told the JPP that "there's a perception of a disparity in resources. And, with all due respect, I'd like to say it's more than a perception, it's a reality." She explained that in the Marine Corps, the prosecution has four highly qualified experts (HQEs), while the defense has only two.[24]

D. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendations. Civilian public defense organizations and private defense counsel routinely rely on defense investigators to locate and interview witnesses, as well as to take other investigative steps. Their assistance enables defense counsel to properly prepare their cases and represent their clients to the best of their ability. According to information from Navy defense counsel, the addition of the eight defense investigators has been tremendously beneficial.

Given the introduction of the SVC/VLC into the MCIO victim interview process, as well as the unwillingness of MCIOs to follow up on leads from defense or trial counsel, the addition of independent defense investigators is more crucial now than it has ever been. The Subcommittee notes that the approval and funding authority for defense investigator requests is the convening authority who referred the charges to court-martial and who may have a vested interest in the outcome of the case. These requests, it should be noted, are denied more than 90% of the time.

Furthermore, as they are no longer able to cross-examine the victim at the current Article 32 hearing and have lost access to the witness testimony and other evidence formerly received at the Article 32 hearing, defense counsel are at significantly greater disadvantage than they were prior to the changes to the Article 32 process. This alteration in procedure makes adding independent defense investigators essential to the fair administration of justice.

The Subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The Subcommittee recommends that in order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense

21 Supra note 2 at 38 (RSP Recommendation 82 reads: "The Service Secretaries ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced in funding resources and personnel, including defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts, and direct the Services assess whether that is the case.").

investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as needed.

Recommendation 2: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an audit conducted by an independent, outside entity of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimum level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term.

II. DEFENSE REQUESTS FOR EXPERTS

A. Site Visit Information. Defense counsel and others also complained about lack of access to and funding for expert consultants, which puts the defense at an extreme disadvantage. Defense counsel noted that they have trouble getting qualified experts. In the military, defense counsel do not have their own source of funding for witnesses and experts, but must instead request funding from the convening authority. The response to these requests is frequently outright denial or provision of an inadequate substitute for the expert requested. Defense counsel described situations in which they requested a particular expert and were instead provided someone who was deemed to be an "adequate substitute." The "adequate substitute" often lacked the specific knowledge required (for example, an expert in suggestibility in children might be replaced by a child psychologist who was a generalist). Moreover, if approval for an expert is given, it is often granted not at the outset of the case but rather on the eve of trial, when the expert is much less helpful to developing a theory of defense or assisting with preparation of the defense case. Even if defense counsel are successful in getting a qualified expert, the process of requesting the expert forces them to reveal their case or trial strategy to the government. Defense counsel do not see trial counsel receiving comparable treatment from the convening authority; instead, trial counsel can identify and recruit experts to join the prosecution at will, and readily consult with their experts before the defense receives expert assistance. Several prosecutors on the Subcommittee's site visits concurred that this is a systemic problem.

B. Other Sources of Information. Article 46 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) states that "trial counsel, the defense counsel, and the court-martial shall have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence[.]"[25] Under the Rules for Courts-Martial, in every branch of Service and in every case, defense counsel must request funding from the convening authority, prior to referral of charges, for each specific expert witness or consultant needed. This request must include a complete statement of reasons why the expert is necessary and the estimated cost of employing the expert.[26] If the request is denied by the convening authority, after referral of charges, the request may be renewed before a military judge, who determines whether the expert's testimony is "relevant and necessary" and whether the government has provided or will provide an "adequate substitute."[27] This request before the military judge happens much later in the process, often close to trial, leaving inadequate time for the expert to fully assist the defense counsel in the preparation of the case.

27 Id.

In applying Article 46 of the UCMJ to the issue of designation of expert consultants, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has held that an "adequate substitute" must have qualifications "reasonably similar" to those of the government's expert.[28]

In comparing military defense organizations and civilian public defenders, the RSP found that some public defender offices maintain their own budgets or request experts through a trial judge who manages the budget.[29] The RSP also found that federal public defenders have specific funding to pay for defense experts.[30] The RSP noted that federal discovery rules generally require civilian defense counsel to disclose experts and other witnesses to the government before trial, but not as early as military defense counsel, who must request their witnesses from the convening authority, through trial counsel.[31] Civilian defense counsel also employ confidential consulting experts whose identities usually remain wholly unknown to the prosecution unless the defense elects to endorse the expert as a trial witness or otherwise injects their expertise into the litigation. This type of consulting expert is essential for defense counsel to receive a candid assessment of the evidence without fear that their investigation will develop inculpatory evidence that will be shared with and used by the government in prosecuting their client.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized a constitutional right to expert assistance for defendants with regard to both trial defense and sentencing defense, using the example of a mental health expert: "Without a psychiatrist's assistance, the defendant cannot offer a well-informed expert's opposing view, and thereby loses a significant opportunity to raise in the jurors' minds questions about the State's proof of an aggravating factor."[32]

C. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendation. Defense counsel in military organizations, like their civilian counterparts, should have separate sources of funding to employ defense experts, without having to request approval and thereby prematurely divulge their defense strategy to the government.

There is also a tension between what the defense attorney must be able to articulate to the convening authority about the expert's likely assistance and the lawyer's need to actually learn from the expert. In this regard, the relative inexperience of military defense counsel can be a particular problem: if they do not already have deep knowledge of the field, they cannot fully explain or clearly articulate why they need the expert or persuasively explain the potential prejudice to their client. Moreover, they should not have to disclose their thinking.

Recommendation 3: The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the military Services to vest defense expert funding and approval authority in the Service defense organizations.

28 United States v. Warner, 62 M.J. 114 (C.A.A.F. 2005). The court went on to state, "The absence of such parity opens the military justice system to abuse, because the Government in general, and—as this case demonstrates—the trial counsel in particular, may play key roles in securing defense experts." The appellant's brief in this case analogizes this arrangement to "permitting a Major League baseball manager to choose the opposing pitcher in the final game of the World Series."

III. DEFENSE COUNSEL STAFFING AND EXPERIENCE LEVELS

A. Site Visit Information. The Subcommittee received information from defense counsel that the training they receive is generally adequate. However, there is disparity not only in the experience levels required among the Services but also between Service-level requirements and the actual experience of defense counsel in the field. While the Navy and Air Force require prior litigation experience of attorneys being assigned to defense counsel positions, in the Army and Marine Corps first-tour judge advocates with no experience in military justice or in the civilian criminal justice system are allowed to serve as defense counsel. Though participants acknowledged that such placements are not common, the few who had them found the experience overwhelming and discomforting. Several junior counsel recounted that in the first or second contested trial of their careers, they served as second chair in a rape case; one counsel then served as lead counsel in his third trial, also involving sexual assault charges. All of these counsel recommended against assigning brand-new attorneys to defense counsel positions. The likelihood that junior counsel will represent clients in serious and complex cases early in their careers is high, because—as participants uniformly reported—sexual assault cases make up most of their caseload. Defense counsel at multiple installations related that the recent addition of HQEs to trial defense services organizations has been very helpful in mitigating the experience gap, but noted that it is unclear whether the funding for these civilian career litigators will continue. In addition, HQEs hold term positions, not permanent ones.

B. Other Sources of Information. The RSP reviewed experience levels of defense counsel as part of its June 2014 report to Congress. The following table from that report[33] summarizes experience and training requirements for defense counsel in each of the Services.

RSP Report Chart on Service Standards for Defense Counsel Experience and Training

Organization	Experience	Training
U.S. Army Defense Counsel	• Majority of defense counsel have prior courtroom experience. No specific minimum experience required. • Experience sitting "second chair" until supervisor deems fit to try cases as first chair.	• Graduate of the Judge Advocate Officer Basic Course. • Defense Counsel "101." • Advanced Trial Advocacy Courses.
U.S. Air Force Defense Counsel	• The Air Force is unique in that defense counsel are selected in a very competitive, best-qualified standard by the Air Force Judge Advocate General. • Most defense counsel arrive with 2 to 5 years of experience working in a base legal office, which includes time as a trial counsel in courts-martial. • New defense counsel normally have between 8 and 10 courts-martial trials before starting as a defense counsel.	• Specialized courses provided by the Air Force Judge Advocate General's School. • On-the-job training. • Group training remains a challenge because of geographic diversity of counsel and length of tours. • Out of the 19 Senior Defense Counsel regions, only 3 (San Antonio, Colorado Springs and the National Capitol Region) have the majority of their bases in close enough proximity to drive to group training.

Organization	Experience	Training
U.S. Navy Defense Counsel	• Following their first 24-month tour handling administrative separations and other non-judicial issues, Navy Judge Advocates become eligible to be assigned to a Defense Service Office (DSO) as a defense counsel.[34] • Military Justice Litigation Career Track officers are stationed in all DSO headquarters offices and some detachments, which are smaller regional offices.	• Once selected, counsel receive additional training, including a basic trial advocacy course focusing on courtroom advocacy. • Within the first year at a DSO, defense counsel also attend the defending sexual assault cases class, an intense one-week course involving experts on forensics and psychology and very experienced civilian defense counsel.
U.S. Marine Corps Defense Counsel	• The vast majority of the Marine Corps' 72 defense counsel are first-tour judge advocates with less than 3 years of experience as an attorney. • They typically serve 18 months as defense counsel before moving to another assignment. • The average litigation experience of both senior defense counsel and defense counsel is 14 months, which includes both prosecution and defense time.	• Defense counsel training requirements are set forth in Marine Corps policy. Defense counsel have a basic certification under Article 27(b), the basic lawyer course at the Naval Justice School. And then, at some point, maybe not before they start their official job, but at some point early in their tour, we try to send them to our new defense counsel orientation class which is sponsored by the Naval Justice School.[35]
U.S. Coast Guard Defense Counsel	• By memorandum of agreement between the Coast Guard and the Navy JAG Corps, the Navy is principally responsible for defending Coast Guard members accused of Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) crimes. • In return, four Coast Guard judge advocates are detailed to work at various Navy DSOs on 2-year rotations, which provides another significant source of trial experience to Coast Guard judge advocates.	• Coast Guard Defense Counsel attend Navy defense training.

Noting the disparities between the Services regarding defense counsel experience and tour lengths, the RSP made the following recommendation:

> RSP Recommendation 86: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps permit only counsel with litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case as well as set the minimum tour length of defense counsel at two years or more, except when a > lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, or designee, because of exigent circumstances or to specifically enable training of defense counsel under supervision of experienced defense counsel.[36]

According to presentations by the Service trial defense chiefs during the JPP's May 2016 public meeting, little has changed in defense counsel experience levels since the RSP Report was issued in June 2014.[37]

In the Army, about 20% of attorneys assigned to a defense counsel position have no prior experience.[38] While every attempt is made to avoid assigning a brand-new defense counsel to a sexual assault case, the realities of Trial Defense Services (TDS) staffing sometimes force the assignment of inexperienced attorneys to these cases, though they are able to consult with more senior defense counsel.[39] Underscoring the point, a witness testifying before the JPP in May noted that the accused's counsel in a given sexual assault case may have less trial experience than the victim's counsel.[40]

In the Marine Corps, the "vast majority" of defense counsel are serving in their first tour and are often brand-new attorneys right out of law school.[41] Compounding the problem, Marine Corps attorneys serve as defense counsel for only 12 to 14 months before moving to another position.[42] Marine Corps Defense Services attempts to make up for this lack of experience through training (having new defense counsel sit as second chair in several courts-martial before serving as lead defense counsel) and through supervision by more experienced defense counsel.[43]

C. National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017. There is currently a provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 (FY 17 NDAA), pending presidential signature, which would require the Services to ensure that trial and defense counsel detailed to a court-martial "have sufficient experience and knowledge to effectively prosecute or defend the case" and

However, the realities of TDS manning and caseload often weigh against such a deliberative developmental process. require the Services to have a professional development process to ensure effective prosecution and defense in all courts-martial.[44] Under this provision, the Services must use a system of skill identifiers or experience designators for "identifying judge advocates with skill and experience in military justice proceedings" to provide oversight of less experienced counsel.[45] The Services would also be required to carry out a five-year pilot program to "assess the feasibility and advisability of establishing a deliberate professional developmental process for judge advocates . . . that leads to judge advocates with military justice expertise serving as military justice practitioners capable of prosecuting and defending complex cases in military courts-martial."[46]

D. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendation. Most sexual assault cases that go to trial are fully litigated, complicated, difficult cases, and they often involve Military Rule of Evidence (MRE) 412 or MRE 513 motions.[47] Since these cases are less likely than others to be plea-bargained, lawyers have a critical need to draw on trial court advocacy skills; and junior lawyers often have not yet had an opportunity to develop these skills in less serious cases. As reported by several defense counsel during Subcommittee site visits, sometimes defense counsel with little trial experience are called on to defend a Service member accused of serious sexual assault crimes.

If convicted of a sexual assault offense, the accused faces a sentence that could include a punitive discharge and months or years of confinement as well as lifetime collateral sanctions related to the sex offense registry and evolving state, local, and international policies.[48] The consequences for the accused of having inexperienced defense counsel could be catastrophic and life changing.

The maximum punishments for sexual assault offenses specified in UCMJ, Appendix 12, are as follows:

Abusive Sexual Contact	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for 7 years, forfeiture of all pay and allowances

REPORT ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

Recommendation 4: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services permit only a defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set the minimum tour length for defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

IV. CONCLUSION

There have been numerous changes to law and policy in the arena of military sexual assault litigation in recent years that have serious implications for the quality of defense afforded to those accused of sexual assault. These include the introduction of special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel for sexual assault victims, development of a Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution capability, and introduction of a less robust Article 32, UCMJ, process that no longer serves as a discovery vehicle for defense counsel. Many of these changes were instituted with the worthy goal of benefiting victims of sexual assault, but it is important that the military justice system continue to respect the rights of the accused. In order to maintain balance in the military justice system, (1) Service defense organizations must be adequately funded and staffed, as is reportedly not the case in all of the Services; (2) defense counsel must have access to an independent funding source for expert witnesses and consultants; and (3) those serving as defense counsel in sexual assault cases must be experienced attorneys.

Dear Chairs, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit this report of the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (JPP) on sexual assault investigations in the military. This report includes five recommendations on the topics of investigative resources, initial interviews of sexual assault victims, the thoroughness of investigative interviews of sexual assault victims, the collection of cell phone and other digital evidence, and forensic laboratory resources and procedures.

To assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on sexual assault offenses in the military, the JPP tasked the JPP Subcommittee with conducting site visits to military installations in the United States and Asia. From June through September 2016, members of the JPP Subcommittee heard from panels of more than 280 individuals from all of the military Services involved in the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses. The JPP Subcommittee reviewed the information gathered from these site visits, as well as information on this topic received by the JPP in public meetings, and submitted its findings and recommendations to the JPP. After hearing testimony from the JPP Subcommittee members who attended the installation site visits, and deliberating on the Subcommittee's report and recommendations, the JPP makes five recommendations concerning the issues identified by the JPP Subcommittee. The JPP expresses its sincere appreciation to the members of the JPP Subcommittee and everyone who contributed to this report.

Respectfully submitted,

Executive Summary

In order to assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses in the military, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) tasked the Subcommittee of the JPP with conducting site visits to military installations to talk to the men and women who work in the military justice system. The JPP had previously received information on many of the changes to law and policy, and wanted to determine how these changes were being carried out and perceived at military installations by investigators, prosecutors, defense counsel, and others involved in sexual assault investigation, litigation, or victim support.

From July through September 2016, members of the JPP Subcommittee visited military installations in the United States and Asia. They met with panels of more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations and all of the military Services, including prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, commanders, investigators, sexual assault response coordinators and other victim support personnel. These individuals spoke without attribution so that the Subcommittee could gain an unfiltered, candid assessment of how changes in sexual assault laws and policies have, in their view, affected the military justice system.

On the basis of information from these site visits, the Subcommittee elected to issue reports on several topics. The Subcommittee issued its first report to the JPP—the Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases—on December 9, 2016. The JPP subsequently made recommendations based on the issues identified by the JPP Subcommittee and issued its Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases in April 2017. The JPP received the Subcommittee's second report to the JPP—the Report on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military—on February 17, 2017. The JPP deliberated on the information presented by the Subcommittee and had the opportunity to question the JPP Subcommittee members who attended the installation site visits. As a result of this deliberation and review of the Subcommittee report, included as Appendix A, the JPP issues five recommendations.[1]

In its report, the JPP Subcommittee identified a number of issues in military sexual assault investigations that it discovered during its site visits: (1) the strain on resources experienced by military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs) that are responsible for investigating all allegations of sexual assault, (2) delays in the initial interview of sexual assault victims by MCIO investigators, (3) impediments to thorough interviews of sexual assault victims by MCIO investigators, (4) difficulties experienced by MCIO investigators in obtaining evidence from sexual assault victims, and (5) delays in the receipt of forensic laboratory test results in sexual assault cases. The Subcommittee made recommendations in each of these areas. The JPP recognizes that its report and recommendations are based on specific anecdotes from individuals who participated in the site visits, and that these individuals' views are not necessarily universally shared. Individual experiences may depend in some measure on the military Service, location, and level of experience of the participants; however, the views addressed in this report were brought to the Subcommittee's attention during every installation site visit, were supported by specific examples, and were also informed by the Subcommittee's subsequent research into related policies and statutes, as well as by testimony before the JPP and the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel. Taken together, these considerations suggest that the issues could be systemic and should be addressed.

1 Both this JPP report and the JPP's Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases address the adequacy of investigative resources. However, given that the Services' criminal investigative branches are stovepiped organizations with responsibilities that differ in many respects from those of the Service defense organizations that represent Service members in the military justice system, the JPP chose to address issues related to investigations in two separate reports.

The JPP makes five recommendations to deal with the issues affecting the proper investigation of sexual assault cases. One of these issues is the inadequacy of investigative resources available for the most serious sexual assault cases. This concern is addressed in a new Department of Defense (DoD) policy that allows the MCIOs to use non-MCIO resources to investigate some sexual assault cases.[2] The JPP concurs with DoD's implementation of this policy as a way to alleviate the immense strain on investigative resources for sexual assault cases, with one important caveat: the JPP recommends that the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, monitor the effects of this DoD policy to see if it improves the MCIOs' ability to focus on the most serious sexual assault cases, and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate. The JPP also recommends that the Secretary of Defense identify and remove barriers to prompt initial victim interviews in sexual assault cases, identify and remove barriers to thorough questioning of sexual assault victims by MCIO investigators or other law enforcement agencies, examine and remove impediments to MCIO access to tangible evidence in the possession of sexual assault victims, and review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories.

2 Dep't. of Def. Instruction 5505.18, Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense, ¶ 1.2 (March 22, 2017) ("Other DoD law enforcement activity (LEA) resources, as defined in the Glossary, may assist MCIOs while MCIOs investigate offenses of adult sexual assault provided they meet the training requirements established in Paragraph 3.3."). Previous versions of this regulation did not expressly permit other military law enforcement agencies to assist MCIOs in sexual assault investigations.

JPP Recommendations on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military*

Recommendation 47: In order to ensure that MCIOs can focus investigative resources on the most serious sexual assault cases, the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, monitor the effects of the DoD policy that allows Service law enforcement agencies to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate.

- MCIOs have substantial and sophisticated expertise in the investigation of sexual assault cases.
- According to site visit feedback provided to the JPP Subcommittee, the MCIOs are spread too thin, and their ability to investigate the penetrative and other cases requiring more investigative expertise is seriously hampered—largely because of policies that required them to investigate every case of sexual contact, as well as sexual assault.
- Because of the MCIOs' lack of time and resources, MCIO investigators are not always able to conduct the additional investigative steps needed to prepare a case for prosecution.
- Under new policy guidance for the MCIOs issued by the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General on March 22, 2017, Service law enforcement agencies are allowed to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, under the supervision of the MCIOs.
- One year after its implementation, the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General should assess whether this new policy has been effective in ensuring that the MCIOs focus on the most serious sexual assault cases. As part of its assessment, the DoD Office of Inspector General should conduct site visits at several installations and seek information, preferably on a non-attribution basis, directly from special agents in the field.

Recommendation 48: The Secretary of Defense take the necessary steps to ensure that special victims' counsel and victims' legal counsel (1) have the resources to schedule and attend the initial victim interview promptly after a report of sexual assault, and (2) receive the training necessary to recognize the importance of a prompt initial victim interview by the MCIO to an effective and just prosecution.

- It is helpful to MCIO investigators to have the initial interview of the victim be conducted promptly after MCIOs receive a report of sexual assault.
- According to site visit feedback provided to the JPP Subcommittee, the MCIOs' initial victim interviews are substantially delayed, often because special victims' counsel (SVCs) or victims' legal counsel (VLCs) are unavailable to attend the interview.
- A delay in the initial victim interview could cause MCIO investigators to lose valuable physical or digital evidence, as well as impair a victim's ability to clearly remember important details. Moreover, other avenues of investigation cannot, for practical reasons, be identified and pursued until this initial interview is conducted.

Recommendation 49: The Secretary of Defense identify and remove barriers to thorough questioning of a sexual assault victim by the MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies.

- Current MCIO policies and practices discourage or prohibit investigators from asking any question that could be perceived as "confrontational" during either the initial or the follow-up interview of a sexual assault victim, even when, in their professional judgment, such questions are vital to address conflicting statements given by the victim or other evidence contradicting the victim's account.
- MCIO policies and/or practices require a supervisor's approval before an investigator can conduct a subsequent interview of a sexual assault victim, which is perceived by investigators as a barrier to questioning a victim after the initial interview.
- Some SVCs/VLCs who attend investigative interviews limit the scope of questioning, and sometimes object to investigators' requests for any follow-up interviews with the victim.
- As a result of the barriers to thorough questioning by MCIOs, investigators lose rapport-building opportunities, as well as important details about the reported offense, since details about an incident are commonly gathered over time after a traumatic event such as sexual assault.

Recommendation 50: The Secretary of Defense remove impediments to MCIOs' obtaining tangible evidence from a sexual assault victim, particularly information contained on a cell phone or other digital devices, and develop appropriate remedies that address victims' legitimate concerns about turning over this evidence to ensure that sexual assault investigations are complete and thorough.

- MCIO investigators have reported difficulties voluntarily obtaining a cell phone or other digital device from sexual assault victims. While the opportunity exists to obtain a military search authorization, there are practical and timing difficulties that impede both the ability to obtain a search authorization and the investigation as a whole. Furthermore, obtaining access to cell phones or other digital devices involuntarily may create an adversarial relationship between the victim and the investigator, and between the victim and the prosecutor, which would ultimately inhibit the effective prosecution of a case.

- Victims' cell phones may contain a wealth of evidence in sexual assault cases. When a victim refuses to turn over relevant evidence—such as photographs, text messages, or social media information contained on his or her cell phone—investigators and prosecutors make decisions about investigating and charging without possessing all available evidence.

- Many victims' concerns about providing their cell phone to investigators center on the financial loss to the victim when investigators retain the phone for forensic analysis, as well as the loss of the use of the phone. In addition, victims have concerns related to the disclosure of the vast amount of personal, confidential, privileged, or potentially self-incriminating information that may be contained on a smartphone.

- Some SVCs/VLCs reported that they advise victims that they should not voluntarily turn over their cell phone to investigators. This advice is intended to preserve victims' legitimate and well-established privacy rights and privileges in the information on their cell phone, regardless of whether the cell phone or other device is likely to contain potential evidence that could be used against the accused or help prepare victim testimony at trial.

- Modern forensic techniques for imaging and searching cell phones, coupled with the use of well-crafted consent forms, may minimize, if not eliminate, victims' legitimate concerns about cell phone searches, and they therefore should be fully explored.

Recommendation 51: The Secretary of Defense review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories.

- Forensic evidence such as that obtained from DNA testing and digital device examination can yield critical information, particularly in sexual assault cases, and can further guide MCIOs' or other law enforcement agencies' investigations as well as a prosecutor's charging decisions.

- The length of time it takes to obtain results from forensic laboratories' testing of evidence impedes the timely completion of sexual assault investigations.

- DoD laboratories generally prioritize cases that are pending court-martial, but notifying the laboratory that a court-martial is pending does not, in the view of some interviewees, necessarily result in expeditious testing.

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. Following the Secretary's objectives and at the request of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, the Subcommittee conducted military installation site visits throughout the United States and Asia. Based upon information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee undertook additional research of several topics. The Subcommittee has completed its review on the topic of sexual assault investigations and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Subcommittee Chair

Executive Summary

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—all involved in the military justice process, from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

On the basis of information received at the site visits, the Subcommittee identified several topics to present to the JPP and a need to conduct additional research on some of those topics. Therefore, the Subcommittee decided to issue separate reports on each of the identified subjects. The Subcommittee issued its first report in December 2016 on the subject of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases.

This second report focuses on military sexual assault investigations and on Department of Defense (DoD) policies that place responsibility for all sexual assault investigations with the military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs).[1] It reflects both comments made to Subcommittee members during site visits and the Subcommittee's independent research. The Subcommittee reviewed relevant statutes, DoD policies, the Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (the RSP), and witness testimony provided to the JPP. The Subcommittee also collected information from DoD and the military Services through formal requests for information and received testimony from a Supervisory Criminal Investigator within the DoD Office of Inspector General in order to fully inform its recommendations to the JPP. The Subcommittee met in September, October, and December of 2016 and in January 2017 to review and deliberate on the information that it had received on the topic of investigations. The Subcommittee will continue to meet in 2017 and will publish additional reports based on information received at the site visits.

While the Subcommittee was formulating this report and its recommendations, the DoD Office of Inspector General provided the Subcommittee with an excerpt of a proposed policy change to DoD investigative policies that directly affects one of the recommendations we were reviewing. If implemented as expected in early 2017, the change would allow the MCIOs to obtain the assistance of other military law enforcement agencies in conducting sexual assault investigations, something not currently permitted but identified as an issue during the Subcommittee's site visits. The Subcommittee therefore considered the DoD proposal in making its recommendation below, with the understanding that the revised policy provided to the Subcommittee in draft will be adopted and published in the very near future.

The Subcommittee makes five recommendations about military sexual assault investigations.

1 MCIOs are the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command, Naval Criminal Investigative Service, and Air Force Office of Special Investigations. These organizations, which are typically responsible for investigating more serious crimes, also perform other force protection or intelligence-gathering missions.

Recommendation 1: Allow MCIOs to use non-MCIO resources for some sexual contact and sexual assault cases. MCIOs have substantial and sophisticated expertise in the investigation of sexual assault cases. The Subcommittee heard, however, that the MCIOs are spread too thin and their ability to investigate the penetrative and other cases requiring more investigative expertise is seriously hampered—largely because of policies that require them to investigate every case of sexual contact as well as sexual assault.

The Subcommittee believes this policy should be changed in order to ensure that MCIOs can focus on the most serious sexual assault cases. Under new policy guidance for the MCIOs developed by the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General, Service law enforcement agencies would be allowed to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, under the supervision of the MCIOs.

Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the policy guidance be implemented as soon as possible and that one year after its implementation, the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General assess whether this policy has been effective in ensuring that the MCIOs focus on the most serious sexual assault cases. As part of its assessment, the DoD Office of Inspector General should conduct site visits at several installations and seek information, preferably on a non-attribution basis, directly from special agents in the field.

The Subcommittee also recommends that the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, monitor the effects of this DoD policy and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate.

Recommendation 2: Ensure prompt initial victim interviews. It is critical that the initial interview of the victim by MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies be conducted promptly after MCIOs receive a report of sexual assault. Yet the Subcommittee heard frequent complaints that the MCIOs' initial interviews were being substantially delayed, often because special victims' counsel or victims' legal counsel were unavailable to attend the interview.

The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense take the necessary steps to ensure that special victims' counsel and victims' legal counsel (1) have the resources to schedule and attend the initial victim interview promptly after a report of sexual assault and (2) receive the training necessary to recognize the importance of a prompt victim interview by the MCIO to an effective and just prosecution.

Recommendation 3: Remove impediments to thorough victim interviews. The Subcommittee heard complaints from all MCIO special agents interviewed that various impediments prevented or discouraged them from conducting victim interviews that were as thorough as they consider necessary. Specifically, they felt procedures and policies discouraged or prohibited investigators from asking any question that could be perceived as "confrontational" during either the initial or the follow-up interview even when, in their professional judgment, such questions were vital to address conflicting statements given by the victim or other evidence contradicting the victim's account. They also felt investigations were impeded by policies and procedures that discouraged them from conducting follow-up interviews. The Subcommittee accordingly recommends that the Secretary of Defense identify and remove these and any other identified barriers to thorough questioning of the victim by MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies.

Recommendation 4: Examine and remove impediments to MCIO access to tangible evidence. The Subcommittee heard numerous complaints that investigators have difficulties obtaining evidence from the victim, particularly information on cellular phones or other digital devices. Investigators said the reasons that victims and/or their attorneys gave for not turning over cellular and digital devices included the financial loss to the victim when investigators retain the phone for forensic analysis and privacy concerns over the vast amount of personal information typically contained on a smartphone. These concerns, while legitimate, can be minimized or eliminated by modern forensic techniques for imaging and searching digital devices. Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense examine these problems and develop appropriate remedies that address victims' legitimate concerns and ensure that sexual assault investigations are complete and thorough.

Recommendation 5: Reduce delays at forensic laboratories. The Subcommittee heard complaints from MCIOs and prosecutors that the length of time it takes to obtain results from forensic laboratories' testing of evidence impedes the timely completion of sexual assault investigations. Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure more expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories.

Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia involved in the military justice process; these conversations focused on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.[2] Discussions were held without attribution so that Subcommittee members could hear candid perceptions of the military's handling of sexual assault cases from the men and women who are investigating and litigating those cases. The Subcommittee spoke to groups of military prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, and investigators, as well as commanders, sexual assault response coordinators, victim advocates, and victim-witness liaisons from all military Services.

On the basis of the information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee determined that it would have to conduct further research into several topic areas so that its recommendations to the JPP would be fully informed. The Subcommittee held meetings in September, October, and December of 2016, and in January 2017 in order to develop the information and research needed to report on issues identified at the site visits. In December 2016, the Subcommittee completed its research on the subject of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases and issued its first report. The Subcommittee will continue to meet in 2017 to examine other issues and publish additional reports. This report summarizes site visit comments and the Subcommittee's research into military sexual assault investigations and Department of Defense (DoD) policies affecting sexual assault allegations, including policies that place responsibility for all sexual assault investigations with the military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs).[3]

I. MCIO INVESTIGATORS LACK NECESSARY DISCRETION AND RESOURCES IN HANDLING SEXUAL ASSAULT ALLEGATIONS

A. Site Visit Information

Investigators in every military Service explained that a number of factors have stretched their resources and eliminated their discretion in investigating alleged cases of sexual assault. Perhaps the most often cited problem is that MCIOs are no longer able to refer the less serious cases to other military law enforcement agencies, even when the MCIO investigators say those other agencies have adequate training for doing so. Prior to January 2013, sexual contact offense cases, as opposed to penetrative offense cases, were generally handled by military police investigators, with some variation among the Services. With the DoD policy change in 2013, MCIOs have been required to investigate every sexual assault allegation, regardless of the severity of the alleged offense.[4] The pre-2013 approach allowed

2 A list of the installations visited and Subcommittee members participating in each site visit is enclosed with this report.

3 MCIOs include the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command, Naval Criminal Investigative Service, and Air Force Office of Special Investigations. These organizations, which are typically responsible for investigating more serious crimes, also perform other force protection or intelligence-gathering missions.

4 See Glossary, Dep't. of Def. Instruction 5505.18, Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense [hereinafter DoDI 5505.18], January 25, 2013 (incorporating Change 2, June 18, 2015) ("It is DoD policy that . . .

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

MCIO special agents discretion to determine which offenses were more appropriately handled by military police investigators or by the accused's unit, depending on the severity of the allegation and on the victim's desire to participate in an investigation. MCIO investigators almost universally felt that the 2013 policy change has severely strained MCIO resources and undermined their ability to investigate more serious sex offenses effectively and thoroughly. At several installations, special agents reported that these difficulties have lowered morale within their organizations.

A majority of agents emphasized that investigations involving sexual contact offenses, though often less complex than a rape case, must be given the same emphasis, time, and resources as the most serious sexual assault offenses. Sexual contact cases include such cases as a touching of the shoulder or the buttocks, or an attempted kiss on the mouth.[5] Investigators within the MCIOs also noted that even when the reported facts of what allegedly took place make prosecution of these sexual contact offenses unlikely, they are still required to devote significant time and resources to investigate them. Further, as sexual offenses make up an increasing share of MCIOs' caseloads—investigators at one installation stated that 60%–80% of their cases involve sexual assault allegations—the bulk of their work involves intensive, lengthy investigations.

The investigators from each Service also identified other situations in which they felt that their specialized training and experience in sexual assault investigations were diverted from the most serious sex offenses. As one example, they pointed to some cases referred to MCIOs by a sexual assault response coordinator (SARC).[6] They said that if a SARC reports an allegation to an MCIO, the MCIO must treat the allegation as a sexual assault even if the alleged facts do not meet all of the elements of the crime (e.g., what occurred was actually a simple assault or no crime at all). Once reported by a SARC, investigators stated, it is very difficult for investigators to reclassify these incidents as non-sex offenses or noncriminal behavior, and these incidents must be fully investigated.

Another example of their lack of discretion involved sexual assaults reported by a third-party witness rather than the putative victim. In some instances, the MCIO investigators told the Subcommittee members, a third party reports an incident as a possible sexual assault and the apparent victim disagrees with this assessment, disputing either the facts alleged or the need for a criminal investigation. Special agents from the MCIOs told the Subcommittee that they are required to vigorously pursue all of these third-party reports, even if the victim does not want to cooperate or disagrees with the alleged facts. One agent highlighted a case in which he had to interview the victim's friends and family despite her express desire that the complaint not be investigated at all and that neither her friends nor family be contacted.

Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs) will initiate investigations of all offenses of adult sexual assault of which they become aware, as listed in the Glossary, that occur within their jurisdiction regardless of the severity of the allegation." "Sexual assault" is defined in the Glossary as "An intentional sexual contact characterized by the use of force, threats, intimidation, abuse of authority, or when the victim does not or cannot consent." The term "sexual assault" includes aggravated sexual contact and abusive sexual contact in violation of Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice [UCMJ].).

5 10 U.S.C. § 920 (UCMJ, art. 120). See infra note 10. Sexual contact cases represent a wide range of criminal behavior and may be disposed of in a variety of ways, from a general court-martial—typically reserved for more serious offenses—to non-judicial punishment or a written admonition.

6 See U.S. Dep't of Def. Directive 6495.01, Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) program, ¶ 4e(1) (Jan. 23, 2012) (Incorporating Change 2, Effective January 20, 2015) ("The SARC shall serve as the single point of contact for coordinating appropriate and responsive care for sexual assault victims. SARCs shall coordinate sexual assault victim care and sexual assault response when a sexual assault is reported.").

In addition, investigators noted an ever-growing number of administrative requirements for sexual assault investigations, which contribute to the strain of having to investigate every reported sexual contact offense. The burdensome administrative tasks described by investigators included additional requirements for documenting investigative activity, retaining evidence, and generating duplicative internal reports within the MCIO.

B. Other Sources of Information

1. Revisions to the definition of sexual contact in Article 120, Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

As noted by participants on the site visits, changes made to the definition of sexual contact under Article 120 of the UCMJ in 2012 expanded the number and type of potential offenses that now fall under the purview of the MCIOs.[7] The 2012 version of Article 120 made the touching of any body part for sexual gratification a sexual offense. All offenses under this statute are punishable with up to seven years' confinement and a dishonorable discharge.[8] Previous versions of the statute limited sexual contact crimes to the touching of certain areas of the body—the genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person; an unwanted touching of other areas of the body was treated as a simple assault, which is a less serious, non-sex offense.[9] In 2016, just four years after expanding the definition of sexual contact offenses, Congress passed legislation that will once again narrow the range of conduct considered a sexual offense.[10] While this law may reduce the number of sexual contact cases that the MCIOs investigate, the reduction will take place very gradually, and all offenses occurring prior to the new legislation's effective date (June 2017, at the earliest) would be governed by the broad definition now in effect. In addition, the new legislation will not solve the primary problem identified by the MCIOs: the diversion of their specialized expertise and experience from more serious sexual assault cases.

2. Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel.

The Response Systems Panel (RSP), an advisory panel succeeded by the JPP, also commented in its June 2014 report on the impact of the January 2013 DOD policy change, explaining how it significantly increased MCIOs' caseloads:

> Historically, Army Criminal Investigation Command (Army CID) investigated all adult sexual assault cases for the Army, while the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) and Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) often referred some non-penetrative (e.g., unwanted touching) sexual assault offenses to Marine Corps Criminal

9 10 U.S.C. § 920(t) (Act of Jan. 6, 2007, effective Oct. 1, 2007–June 27, 2012).

10 Section 5430 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 defines sexual contact as "touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, the vulva, penis, scrotum, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person. Touching may be accomplished by any part of the body or an object." This legislative provision incorporates proposed statutory language authored by the JPP Subcommittee and adopted by the JPP in its REPORT ON ARTICLE 120 OF THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE (February 2016). The effective date for this change will be designated by the President, and shall occur no later than two years after enactment of the legislation. REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

> Investigation Division (Marine Corps CID) agents and Air Force Security Forces investigators, respectively. Since the January 2013 policy change requiring that all adult sexual assault cases be investigated by the MCIOs, cases previously investigated by Marine Corps CID and Air Force Security Forces investigators have shifted to NCIS and AFOSI, significantly increasing their case loads.[11]

After finding that the various military law enforcement agencies other than the MCIOs are also qualified to investigate sexual assault offenses, and particularly "touching offenses," the RSP recommended (in RSP Recommendation 89) that

> The Secretary of Defense direct the commanders and directors of the military criminal investigative organizations to authorize the utilization of Marine Corps Investigation Division, military police investigators, and/or security forces investigators to assist in the investigation of some non-penetrative sexual assault cases under the direct supervision of a special victim unit investigator to retain oversight.[12]

On December 15, 2014, DoD approved this recommendation in part, referring the matter for further examination to the DoD Office of Inspector General (DoD IG), which is responsible for establishing law enforcement policies. Meanwhile, as reported above, MCIOs currently have to investigate both penetrative and contact cases, and they continue to feel that the addition of these non-penetrative (contact) cases to their already large caseloads overburdens them and reduces their ability to investigate the most serious sexual assault cases.

3. Information presented to the JPP in April 2016.

At its public meeting on April 8, 2016, the JPP heard testimony on the implementation of a Special Victim Capability within each of the military Services.[13] The chiefs in charge of the MCIOs testified before the JPP that they continue to investigate all reports of sexual assault, referring none of their cases to the military police or security forces.[14] The witnesses also described how the MCIOs have ensured that an increasing number of special agents have the training and expertise to investigate sexual assault cases.[15] According to a senior official in the Air Force Office of Special Investigations

13 In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, Pub. L. No. 112-239, § 573, 126 Stat. 1632 (2013), Congress required DoD and the Services to implement a "Special Victim Capability"; it called for the Services to provide specially trained prosecutors, MCIO investigators, victim witness assistance personnel, paralegals, and administrative legal support personnel to collaborate in the handling of sexual assault reports. In response, DoD mandated that all sexual assault crimes (i.e., both penetrative and contact offenses) be investigated by the MCIOs, not by any other law enforcement agencies.

(AFOSI), the quality of sexual assault investigations has improved in recent years, and AFOSI is completing investigations faster than in previous years.[16] This assessment may be inconsistent with the reports of strained investigative resources repeated at every site visit; however, because the testimony relies in part on the DoD Inspector General's review of MCIO investigations conducted from 2012 to 2013, it may not reflect current trends.[17]

4. Forthcoming changes in DoD investigative policies.

On December 28, 2016, the Subcommittee received a letter from the DoD Acting Inspector General explaining that the Office of Inspector General has proposed revisions to DoD's policies concerning sexual assault investigations, and that DoD is in the final stages of reviewing and updating existing policies.[18] The Acting Inspector General did not list all of the policy changes under consideration by DoD. However, he provided a relevant excerpt from the proposed modifications: the new policy would allow law enforcement agencies to "assist MCIOs while MCIOs investigate offenses of adult sexual assault." This policy, in draft form, states:

a. Only the MCIOs will conduct the formal victim interview.

b. The investigation will be considered an MCIO investigation and the responsible MCIO will provide direct supervision of all investigative work conducted by the DoD LEA [law enforcement agency] resources.

c. Under no circumstances may an MCIO refer an adult sexual assault investigation to an installation LEA regardless of the severity of the offense.

d. When LEA resources assist MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, the MCIO investigator will maintain full responsibility for the investigation and assign tasks. Before assisting the MCIOs, the LEA resources will receive training on the topics required in Paragraph 3.3 [of this instruction] by a certified MCIO sexual assault investigator. Ideally the LEA resources will receive the same training and certification as outlined in DoDI 5505.19 [Establishment of Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution (SVIP) Capability within the Military

Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs)], which is required for MCIO sexual assault investigators.[19]

This policy proposal implements RSP Recommendation 89 (quoted above), and includes two requirements that were not specified in the RSP recommendation: that only the MCIOs will conduct the formal victim interview and that the assisting law enforcement agencies must receive the requisite training on sexual assault investigations before they can assist the MCIOs.

C. SUBCOMMITTEE ASSESSMENT AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The changes in 2012 to Article 120 of the UCMJ and the changes in 2013 to DoD's policies concerning sexual assault investigations have significantly increased the volume of investigations for which the MCIOs are solely responsible. Collectively, these changes and other administrative policies have generated a flood of investigative activity for strong and weak, serious and less serious cases alike. Special agents at the site visits stressed that the increase in their caseload has severely strained their investigative resources and harmed their ability to pursue the most serious sex crimes in the manner they feel is appropriate. These individuals all concurred that the increase in their workload is primarily due to DoD's mandate that MCIOs investigate all reports of sexual contact—cases that may involve a relatively simple, onetime touching of the leg or buttocks rather than more serious and violent conduct.

The Subcommittee recommends implementing the December 2016 draft changes to DoD's sexual assault investigations policy. The proposal, if implemented, will provide the MCIOs with access to needed additional resources. Although MCIOs will remain responsible for all sexual assault investigations, permitting other law enforcement agencies to assist with those investigations should ease the current strain on MCIO resources and allow the MCIOs to focus on the most serious cases.

The Subcommittee further recommends that the new policy be closely monitored and thoroughly reviewed one year after it takes effect, and that the DoD Inspector General assess the effects of the new policy on the MCIOs' ability to focus their time and effort on the most serious cases of sexual assault. Because the Subcommittee found that its field interviews of investigators were essential to understanding the effects of statutory and policy changes, it also recommends that DoD's review should similarly incorporate site visits at several installations and interviews with special agents as well as military justice practitioners. During its field interviews, DoD should allow interview participants to speak without attribution in order to fully inform DoD's evaluation of the policy's effects.

Should the DoD review find that MCIOs continue to experience strains on their resources and the diversion of their expertise from the most serious sexual assault cases, then the DoD IG might consider allowing MCIOs to transfer full responsibility for some less serious sexual assault offenses, with the approval of a supervisor, to alternative military law enforcement agencies to address the problem. The Subcommittee does not make this recommendation now, in recognition that there are inherent difficulties in such transfers, including but not limited to accurately determining the seriousness of some offenses in the early stages of an investigation. The Subcommittee believes that it is prudent to give the IG's proposed policy changes a chance to be implemented before suggesting that more extensive policy changes are needed.

The JPP, together with its Subcommittee, will reach the end of its statutory term in September 2017. Therefore, it will not be able to monitor the effects of this policy or make additional recommendations about it to the Secretary of Defense. Congress has created a successor panel—the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces[20]—which, the Subcommittee respectfully recommends, should continue to monitor this issue.

Recommendation 1: Allow MCIOs to use non-MCIO resources for some sexual contact and sexual assault cases. MCIOs have substantial and sophisticated expertise in the investigation of sexual assault cases. The Subcommittee heard, however, that the MCIOs are spread too thin and their ability to investigate the penetrative and other cases requiring more investigative expertise is seriously hampered—largely because of policies that require them to investigate every case of sexual contact as well as sexual assault.

The Subcommittee believes this policy should be changed in order to ensure that MCIOs can focus on the most serious sexual assault cases. Under new policy guidance for the MCIOs developed by the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General, Service law enforcement agencies would be allowed to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, under the supervision of the MCIOs.

Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the policy guidance be implemented as soon as possible and that one year after its implementation, the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General assess whether this policy has been effective in ensuring that the MCIOs focus on the most serious sexual assault cases. As part of its assessment, the DoD Office of Inspector General should conduct site visits at several installations and seek information, preferably on a non-attribution basis, directly from special agents in the field.

The Subcommittee also recommends that the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, monitor the effects of this DoD policy and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate.

II. CURRENT POLICIES AND PRACTICE RENDER INVESTIGATIONS LESS THOROUGH AND LESS EXPEDITIOUS THAN THEY SHOULD BE

A. Site Visit Information

Participants in the Subcommittee's site visits raised a number of other issues that they felt collectively hamper an investigator's ability to conduct thorough investigations. The Subcommittee recognizes that the comments it heard depend in some measure on the military Service, location, and level of experience of the participants, and that a single anecdote does not necessarily indicate a broader trend or a widespread problem. However, the general themes identified below were raised at every site visited by the Subcommittee and were often supported by specific examples, suggesting that some systemic problems may exist that can and should be addressed.

20 The Secretary of Defense, pursuant to Section 546 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2015, as modified by section 537 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2016, established this nondiscretionary advisory committee. Section 546 of the FY15 NDAA provides that it shall review, on an ongoing basis, cases involving allegations of rape, forcible sodomy, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces.

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

1. The initial investigatory interview of a sexual assault victim is often delayed, to the detriment of the case.

It is important to note that since the establishment of SARCs, military investigators and military police are no longer the first people to receive sexual assault reports. MCIO investigators in all Services told the Subcommittee that today the vast majority of sexual assault reports from Service members are made to the SARC office, which then informs the MCIO of the allegation. They said that this is a relatively recent development. Most site visit participants noted that in the past, victims contacted their command, the military police (or other Service equivalent), or the MCIO to report an alleged sexual assault. While the option of reporting to MCIOs remains, the agents said that they typically do not hear from victims directly.

Investigators uniformly reported that the first interview of a victim must be scheduled through the special victims' counsel or victims' legal counsel (SVC/VLC), if the victim has already obtained counsel. If the complaining witness has not yet retained counsel and reports a sexual assault directly to the MCIO, MCIOs must notify victims of their right to SVC/VLC representation before beginning the interview.[21] MCIO investigators at site visits reported that victims almost always elect to meet with counsel before agreeing to be interviewed; as a result, the initial investigatory interview is delayed until an SVC/VLC can be assigned and the initial interview can be scheduled.[22] Several special agents indicated that finding a time when the SVC/VLC can attend the initial interview can delay the interview by weeks, or in some cases months, depending on the attorney's availability.[23] A majority of the agents expressed concern that this passage of time could cause them to lose valuable physical or digital evidence, as well as impair a victim's ability to clearly remember details. Moreover, other avenues of investigation cannot, for practical reasons, be identified and pursued until this initial interview is conducted.[24]

2. Investigators feel discouraged from asking sexual assault victims questions that might be seen as "confrontational."

Many senior investigators expressed a concern that they are no longer interviewing the victim in a manner that is best suited to eliciting all the facts and circumstances necessary to discover what occurred. The Subcommittee was told that investigators are now taught not to probe too deeply into

Instruction 6495.02, Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Program Procedures, encl. 2, para. 6(m) (Feb. 12, 2014) (requiring Service Secretaries to "[e]stablish procedures that require, upon seeking assistance from a SARC, SAPR VA, MCIO, the Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP), or trial counsel, that each Service member who reports that he or she has been a victim of a sexual assault be informed of and given the opportunity to . . . [c]onsult with legal assistance counsel . . .").

22 See also Transcript of JPP Public Meeting 215 (April 8, 2016) (testimony of Mr. Guy Surian, U.S. Army, Deputy Chief of Investigative Operations, Investigative Policy and Criminal Intelligence, U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID)) ("The requirement to notify the SVC prior to interviewing the victim along with the SVC's primary duty to best represent their client's interests have on occasion been problematic. We have an example recently in which two soldiers both arrived at a CID office and both claimed to have been sexually assaulted. So we had to notify two SVCs. After the victims had talked to their SVCs they declined to make any statements to the CID which was problematic.").

23 Prosecutors who spoke to the Subcommittee expressed the same frustration with their attempts to schedule interviews with victims. This topic will be addressed in subsequent reports issued by the JPP Subcommittee.

24 A few investigators at the site visits noted that the vast majority of sexual assault cases they deal with involve "delayed" reports (witnesses did not specify the length of the delay), and that in such cases the loss of access to potential evidence could be attributed to delayed reporting rather than to the schedule of the SVC/VLC.

the details of a sexual assault victim's account. In addition, they are discouraged from "confronting" a complaining witness with aspects of his or her account that do not make logical sense or that conflict with other evidence, including the victim's own inconsistent statements. The investigators stated that, when done appropriately, such questioning is not insensitive and indeed is a crucial investigative practice. As one senior agent explained, in investigative circles "confrontation" is a term of art and does not entail the hostility connoted by the common use of the word. A confrontational, or clarifying, interview involves questions that invite a witness to explain new or inconsistent evidence and statements. While it is clear from the site visits that the Services differ in their approach to this technique, MCIO training, internal practices, or both give many agents the impression that they have to accept the complainant's account at face value, without thoroughly exploring discrepancies or seeking more detail in the complainant's account. One MCIO investigator described being trained to investigate the sexual assault "that did happen" and not the possibility that it did not happen. This approach was problematic, the special agent implied, because it could lead them to overlook important facts and evidence, obscuring the reality of what had occurred.

Internal MCIO policies may likewise discourage thorough questioning of sexual assault victims. Many agents explained that they are required to obtain a supervisor's approval before conducting any interview subsequent to the initial victim interview. The imposition of bureaucratic obstacles to interviewing a victim was widely viewed as a deterrent, and field agents felt dismayed that their MCIO leadership would question their determination that a subsequent interview was a critical investigative step.

3. SVCs/VLCs limit contact with the victim and the scope of victim interviews.

In addition, a number of agents told Subcommittee members that SVCs/VLCs who attend the investigative interviews sometimes object to certain necessary and relevant questions or advise the victim not to answer them. Other investigators reported that the mere presence of the SVC/VLC dissuades them from asking probing questions out of fear that they will be accused of being inappropriate or being too hard on the victim. The Subcommittee heard at one site visit that an SVC/VLC objected every time an agent asked a victim what sort of resolution of the case he or she wanted, even though his training courses had taught the agent that this was an important and routine question to ask. The SVC/VLC's position was that the client's answer could later be exploited by a defense attorney on cross-examination.[25]

The Subcommittee was told that some SVCs/VLCs request that investigators who want to do follow-up interviews with a victim provide the questions in writing in advance of the interview, while others object to any follow-up interviews at all. Some investigators indicated that if inconsistencies in the victim's statement arise during the course of the investigation, they must ask the SVC/VLC to speak with the client to clarify the points because the SVC/VLC do not permit investigators to speak directly with the victim. The SVCs/VLCs then relay back the responses. The Subcommittee heard from SVCs/VLCs that they wanted their clients to be interviewed only one time so that defense counsel cannot claim at trial that the victim made inconsistent statements.[26] Investigators almost universally lamented the resulting loss of rapport-building opportunities, as well as the potential loss of information, since details about an incident are commonly gathered over time after a traumatic event such as sexual 25 The Subcommittee notes that while a defense attorney might portray a victim's statement to investigators in a light most favorable to the defense for various reasons, this is not a reason to curtail appropriate questioning of a victim.

26 This is a summary of the most common explanation provided at site visits by SVCs/VLCs for advising clients to agree to only one interview. The Subcommittee recognizes that other concerns, such as a victim's potential liability for collateral misconduct, may also influence the SVC's/VLC's advice to clients, if applicable to the case.

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

assault. Indeed, they also pointed out that follow-up interviews are the norm in the private sector during sexual assault investigations.[27]

4. Investigators experience difficulties in obtaining needed and relevant evidence from victims who file unrestricted reports of sexual assault.

At several site visit locations, trial counsel and investigators recounted cases in which victims, on the advice of their SVC/VLC, declined to turn over potential evidence to investigators. Some SVCs/VLCs openly acknowledged that they advise clients not to turn over their cell phones to investigators even when it is likely to contain potential evidence.[28] Among the reasons offered for this advice were the financial loss to the victim when investigators retain the phone for forensic analysis and privacy concerns over the vast amount of personal information typically contained on a smartphone. Both of these problems can be minimized if not eliminated by modern forensic techniques for imaging and searching cell phones. None of the SVCs/VLCs interviewed expressed a concern that their advice or advocacy could hamper the investigation or prosecution of the case. Some SVCs/VLCs explained that their paramount concern is the victims' privacy, and they view the possibility that their advice might lower the chances for a successful prosecution as of little consequence.

Investigators stressed that the issue of searching a victim's cell phone or other digital devices for evidence frequently arises, because the victim and accused are often acquaintances who may have communicated by phone or social media around the time of the alleged offense. A victim may also have contacted a friend shortly after the incident, and those communications with an outcry witness—the person who first hears an allegation of abuse—can be critical to corroborating a complaint. In the instance of a delayed report, a witness's digital footprint often assumes greater importance because other physical evidence, such as DNA, may degrade or disappear over time. Photographs and online activity can assist agents in establishing a timeline of relevant events and provide the only corroboration of a victim's allegation. Still, investigators acknowledged that the amount and value of the evidence contained on a cell phone will vary greatly from one case to the next, depending on the facts.

Investigators explained that they continue the investigation without access to evidence on cell phones, at times with negative consequences. One agent described a case in which an SVC informed a victim that she did not have to disclose text messages she exchanged with the accused. The victim took this advice and refused to give the investigator or the prosecutor the text messages. The accused predictably gave these texts to his attorney, who confronted the victim with them while she was on the witness stand at trial. The prosecutor, having never seen these texts, had not prepared the victim for this line of cross-examination and, as a result, the victim's testimony was seriously undermined.

27 A number of MCIO special agents were familiar with civilian criminal investigative practice through their prior experience working for civilian law enforcement agencies, and through the training they routinely receive at federal law enforcement training centers.

28 Investigators generally need to have credible information establishing probable cause to believe that an item such as a cell phone contains evidence that corroborates a victim's statement or bears on the guilt or innocence of the accused. Investigators may obtain the item with the victim's consent or by obtaining a warrant, known in the military as a "search authorization," to seize and search the item. Military Rule of Evidence (M.R.E.) 315, Probable Cause Searches, provides that a commander, military magistrate, or military judge may issue a search authorization of persons or property under military control. M.R.E. 315(c) specifically states "a search authorization may be valid under this rule for a search of (1) the physical person of anyone subject to military law or the law of war wherever found; (2) military property of the United States or of nonappropriated fund activities of an Armed Force of the United States wherever located; (3) persons or property situated on or in a military installation, encampment, vessel, aircraft, vehicle, or any other location under military control, wherever located; or (4) nonmilitary property within a foreign country." MANUAL FOR COURT-MARTIAL, UNITED STATES (2016 ed.), MIL. R. EVID. 315.

5. Despite recent improvements in prosecutor-MCIO relationships, tensions persist and impair the thoroughness of investigations.

Prosecutors and investigators repeatedly described tensions in their working relationships with one another. Trial counsel generally agreed that coordination on sexual assault investigations has improved, but many complained that investigators all too often decline to follow up on important leads. For their part, investigators expressed the view that many requests for additional investigative activity from trial counsel are unnecessary or are difficult for an investigative unit that is already overburdened and understaffed to execute. Some prosecutors ventured that these difficulties may be the result of internal MCIO protocols that stress timely completion of investigative tasks and pressure agents to close a case quickly. In the same vein, prosecutors noted, investigators are reluctant to reopen a closed case except to document newly received lab results or a similarly significant event.

Internal MCIO policies were not clearly defined in site visit discussions, but some agents mentioned internal deadlines of six months to close a case in one Service, and 90 days in another Service. Anecdotally, the investigators clarified that despite these guidelines, they have seen instances in which sexual contact offense investigations take one year to complete. Both investigators and trial counsel stated that before agents close a case, they have to consult with a prosecutor and a commander to make a probable cause determination and document the final decision on case disposition; thus prosecutors do have input before a case is closed. However, should subsequent developments in a case reveal the need for additional investigative steps, prosecutors described real difficulties in getting this additional investigative work completed.

6. Cases are delayed by the length of time taken by forensic labs to test potential evidence.

Several prosecutors and investigators raised the issue of delays caused by the time it takes for forensic lab analysis of evidence. At one installation, prosecutors reported that they typically wait six months for DNA test results. The Subcommittee members were told that DoD labs generally prioritize cases that are pending court-martial, but notifying the lab that a court-martial is pending does not necessarily result in expeditious testing. Trial counsel at one installation said that they will sometimes charge an accused just to hasten the receipt of digital or DNA evidence from the lab, even when the sum total of existing evidence may not support a successful prosecution.

Experiences at other installations varied: one location reported that a Service-specific lab could test evidence in less than 60 days, while at another, agents stated that they wait more than 90 days for lab results, and for that reason they are unable to close their cases expeditiously. By comparison, a civilian detective who participated in one site visit said that he has to wait 12–16 months for forensic testing in his civilian jurisdiction, and afterward collects a DNA swab from the defendant to confirm the results; in his observation, civilian sexual assault investigations take longer than comparable military criminal investigations.

B. Other Sources of Information

1. MCIO structure.

The MCIOs are generally responsible for investigating the most serious offenses committed by members of the military Services. Each Service maintains a stovepiped organization that does not answer to a military commander or to a commander's staff judge advocate (SJA). These independent law enforcement organizations receive investigative policy and guidance from the Department of

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

Defense Office of the Inspector General, and the MCIO in each Service establishes its own policies and protocols consistent with DoD IG directives.

2. Information presented to the JPP in April 2016.

The JPP examined how MCIOs and other stakeholders in the military justice process interact with SVCs/VLCs and addressed some of the issues identified above. The JPP heard testimony in its April 2016 public meeting from senior officials within each MCIO regarding the impact of SVC/VLC representation and corresponding policies on sexual assault investigations. The witnesses echoed the concerns heard by the Subcommittee members at the site visits regarding investigative delays caused by SVCs/VLCs and noted that policies continue to evolve to accommodate SVC/VLC representation.[29] As one senior MCIO official testified:

> In regards to special victim counsel, we consider the introduction of the special victim counsel to still be a work in progress in some respects. The agents have been provided extensive guidance on how to work with the SVC. The agent has the responsibility of notifying the victim of their right to an SVC representation. The victim's SVC is allowed to be present during the interviews. The requirement to notify the SVC prior to interviewing the victim along with the SVC's primary duty to best represent their client's interests have on occasion been problematic.[30]

Another senior MCIO official suggested that trends in his organization are similar, explaining:

> The special victim counsel program has come a long way since its inception. . . . The advent of this service has had an impact on our investigations. The coordination required to ensure all victim service personnel can attend interviews oftentimes delays the interview process. Collateral misconduct in service can impact victim disclosure and evidence collection. In some instances the victim has elected not to meet with NCIS at all which negates our ability to explain the investigative process and ensure the victim is making a fully informed decision as to their level of participation. We have maintained positive relationships, engaged early and often, and in most instances can quickly address the issues.[31]

JPP presenters also acknowledged that it is difficult to assess the impact of these delays on the overall quality of the investigation, and that these issues have become less pronounced over time.[32]

3. RSP Findings and Recommendations in 2014.

In its June 2014 report the RSP made the following recommendation, which Congress enacted in part in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2016 (FY16 NDAA):[33]

> RSP Recommendation 62: The Secretary of Defense develop and implement policy that, when information comes to military police about an instance of sexual assault by whatever means, the first step in an investigation is to advise the victim that she or he has the right to speak with a special victim counsel before determining whether to file a restricted or unrestricted report, or no report at all.[34]

The FY16 NDAA specifically requires that MCIO agents advise victims of their right to an SVC or VLC before the initial interview. Congress did not adopt the portion of RSP Recommendation 62 regarding victims' being advised of the right to a SVC/VLC prior to their electing to file an unrestricted or restricted report. MCIOs ensure that investigators speak to a victim only with his or her attorney present, subject to exceptions for exigent circumstances.[35]

In addition to reviewing how MCIOs safeguard victims' rights and interests in the investigative process, the RSP examined the thoroughness of sexual assault investigations. On this subject, the RSP heard testimony in 2013 and 2014 from prosecutors who voiced concerns similar to those raised during the JPP Subcommittee's site visits in 2016 about the premature closing of sexual assault investigations. The RSP noted the disagreements between trial counsel and MCIOs, stating:

> According to MCIO agents, investigators complete thorough investigations, following all logical leads prior to reaching any conclusions. Military prosecutors, however, provided mixed reviews of the quality of MCIO investigations and often felt additional investigation was necessary. Military prosecutors also conveyed that investigations are considered closed when they are passed to the commander for review and that it is difficult to "reopen" cases for further investigation.[36]

On the basis of this information, the RSP recommended the following:

> Recommendation 94-A. The Secretary of Defense should direct MCIOs to standardize their procedures to require that MCIO investigators coordinate with the trial counsel to review all of the evidence, and to annotate in the case file that the trial counsel agrees all appropriate investigation has taken place before providing a report to the appropriate commander for a disposition decision. Neither the trial counsel, nor the investigator, should be permitted to make a dispositive opinion whether probable cause exists.[37]

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

> Recommendation 94-B. To ensure investigators continue to remain responsive to investigative requests after the commander receives the case file, the MCIO commanders and directors should continue to ensure investigators are trained that all sexual assault cases remain open for further investigation until final disposition of the case.[38]

DoD did not adopt these recommendations, but they have been referred to various working groups within the military Services. At present, MCIOs have to include in each investigative report the commander's decision whether probable cause exists to believe an offense was committed, as well as the appropriate disposition for the case—and to include this information, they must either leave open or reopen cases.

Finally, the RSP's Comparative Systems Subcommittee (CSS) examined processing times at military and civilian crime lab facilities. The military's primary laboratory, the Defense Forensic Science Center (formerly the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory), located in Forest Park, Georgia, informed the CSS that in 2014, the turnaround time for a laboratory request—the time from when the lab receives the evidence until the lab completes its analysis and sends a report to the requesting agent—was 77 days.[39] Witnesses noted that this time frame is dependent on several factors, such as lab resources, current caseload, and the amount of evidence to be examined in response to a request.[40] The JPP Subcommittee did not seek specific, updated information from military lab facilities to supplement the RSP and site visit information.

C. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendations

In the wake of Congress's emphasis on sexual assault cases, DoD and the MCIOs have written numerous policies designed to enhance the quality of sexual assault investigations. Unfortunately, most MCIO-specific policies are not publicly available, owing to the sensitive nature of investigative methods. However, the Subcommittee repeatedly received comments during site visits to the effect that investigators today have reduced access to evidence and to victims but are responsible for investigating a broader spectrum of misconduct than ever before. Their investigations also carry more administrative burdens, such as duplicative reports and forms, but contain less evidence, owing in part to their own internal policies and practices regarding victim interviews. Because of the strain on investigative resources, and for all of the reasons stated above, some investigators resist undertaking or are simply unable to do the additional investigative work needed to fully prepare a case for prosecution.

Further complicating the completion of a thorough investigation is a method of SVC/VLC advocacy that restricts the information that investigators and prosecutors can gather from victims. Investigators are likely to be the second or third person victims speak with about the offense, and they can talk only in the presence of the victim's attorney, who may limit the breadth of the inquiry or advise victims not to speak with investigators more than once. A victim's decision to act on the advice of his or her counsel is not inherently problematic. Rather, the problems occur when, on the advice of counsel or on their own, victims limit their participation and fail to provide investigators with evidence relevant to the investigation. Even when the SVC/VLC provides the investigator's question to the victim and communicates the response back to the investigator, the investigator loses valuable information because he or she is unable to personally observe a victim's demeanor or reaction to an investigator's question. Moreover, investigators may not fully comprehend, or may have additional questions based on the written or verbal responses of an SVC/VLC who does not allow the victim to be questioned directly after the initial interview. Denying follow-up interviews therefore prevents investigators from fully exploring and understanding what could potentially become very important issues in a case.

When a victim either declines subsequent investigative interviews, or refuses to turn over relevant evidence—such as photographs, text messages, or social media information contained on the victim's cell phone—investigators and prosecutors make decisions about investigating and charging without possessing all available evidence. There is a general sense among the investigators and prosecutors interviewed at the site visits that they must press forward without a victim's full cooperation, an approach that raises concerns about not just the fairness of an investigation, but also the overall fairness of a prosecution.

The Subcommittee heard a number of reasons why victims might not cooperate with requests for evidence from the victim's cell phone, from concerns they would not have access to their phones for extended periods of time to concerns about the privacy of information in their phones not related to their case. However, the Subcommittee heard from the investigators and others that these kinds of concerns are somewhat misguided as the technology for imaging and searching cell phones has advanced to the point that both the time it takes to image a phone and the intrusion into irrelevant information have been minimized or altogether eliminated.[41]

Case delays take many forms, and waiting on forensic laboratory analysis was one raised by investigators and prosecutors alike during the site visits. Forensic evidence such as DNA testing and digital device examination can yield critical information, particularly in sexual assault cases, and can further guide MCIOs' investigation as well as a prosecutor's charging decisions. The Subcommittee cautions that while labs may prioritize cases pending court-martial, prosecutors should not prefer charges in order to prioritize a case for laboratory testing if the evidence already available does not support such a decision.

Recommendation 2: Ensure prompt initial victim interviews. It is critical that the initial interview of the victim by MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies be conducted promptly after MCIOs receive a report of sexual assault. Yet the Subcommittee heard frequent complaints that the MCIOs' initial interviews were being substantially delayed, often because special victims' counsel or victims' legal counsel were unavailable to attend the interview.

The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense take the necessary steps to ensure that special victims' counsel and victims' legal counsel (1) have the resources to schedule and attend the initial victim interview promptly after a report of sexual assault and (2) receive the training necessary to recognize the importance of a prompt victim interview by the MCIO to an effective and just prosecution.

41 See Service Responses to JPP Request for Information Set 9, Question 162 (Dec. 30, 2016). Options include requesting that the victim provide only limited consent for specific items of evidence such as photos, text messages, call logs, or app data. MCIOs can photograph text messages or make a forensic copy of select information before returning the phone to the victim. RFI responses also indicated that the MCIOs possess the expertise and technology to perform data extraction on-site using Cellebrite technology. Only if further data extraction is needed will the MCIO send the cell phone to the Defense Computer Forensic Laboratory for examination.

REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY

Recommendation 3: Remove impediments to thorough victim interviews. The Subcommittee heard complaints from all MCIO special agents interviewed that various impediments prevented or discouraged them from conducting victim interviews that were as thorough as they consider necessary. Specifically, they felt procedures and policies discouraged or prohibited investigators from asking any question that could be perceived as "confrontational" during either the initial or the follow-up interview even when, in their professional judgment, such questions were vital to address conflicting statements given by the victim or other evidence contradicting the victim's account. They also felt investigations were impeded by policies and procedures that discouraged them from conducting follow-up interviews. The Subcommittee accordingly recommends that the Secretary of Defense identify and remove these and any other identified barriers to thorough questioning of the victim by MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies.

Recommendation 4: Examine and remove impediments to MCIO access to tangible evidence. The Subcommittee heard numerous complaints that investigators have difficulties obtaining evidence from the victim, particularly information on cellular phones or other digital devices. Investigators said the reasons that victims and/or their attorneys gave for not turning over cellular and digital devices included the financial loss to the victim when investigators retain the phone for forensic analysis and privacy concerns over the vast amount of personal information typically contained on a smartphone. These concerns, while legitimate, can be minimized or eliminated by modern forensic techniques for imaging and searching digital devices. Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense examine these problems and develop appropriate remedies that address victims' legitimate concerns and ensure that sexual assault investigations are complete and thorough.

Recommendation 5: Reduce delays at forensic laboratories. The Subcommittee heard complaints from MCIOs and prosecutors that the length of time it takes to obtain results from forensic laboratories' testing of evidence impedes the timely completion of sexual assault investigations. Therefore, the Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure more expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories.

(a) INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS REQUIRED.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS SINCE FISCAL YEAR 2012 AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of Defense shall establish a panel to conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the Uniform Code of Military Justice by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112–81; 125 Stat. 1404) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANELS.

(1) COMPOSITION.

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have also served on the panel established under subsection (a)(1).

(2) QUALIFICATIONS.—The members of each panel shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Forces, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes.

(3) CHAIR.—The chair of each panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the panel.

(4) PERIOD OF APPOINTMENT; VACANCIES.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the panel. Any vacancy in a panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(5) DEADLINE FOR APPOINTMENTS.—

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—All original appointments to the panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be made before the termination date of the panel established under subsection (a)(1), but no later than 30 days before the termination date.

(6) MEETINGS.—A panel shall meet at the call of the chair.

(7) FIRST MEETING.—The chair shall call the first meeting of a panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the panel.

(c) REPORTS AND DURATION.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(A) FIRST REPORT.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit a first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes the panel considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives not later than 180 days after the first meeting of the panel.

(B) SUBSEQUENT REPORTS.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

(C) TERMINATION.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

(d) DUTIES OF PANELS.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall perform the following duties:

(A) Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice that were enacted by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112– 81; 125 Stat. 1404).

(B) Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.

(C) Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.

(D) Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required by subsection (c)(2) and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.

(E) Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

(F) Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.

(G) Building on the data compiled as a result of paragraph (1)(D), assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.

(H) Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act.

(I) Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases.

(J) Consider such other matters and materials as the panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

(3) UTILIZATION OF OTHER STUDIES.—In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, a panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies.

(e) AUTHORITY OF PANELS.—

(1) HEARINGS.—A panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the panel considers appropriate to carry out its duties under this section.

(2) INFORMATION FROM FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Upon request by the chair of a panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the panel considers necessary to carry out its duties under this section.

(f) PERSONNEL MATTERS.—

(1) PAY OF MEMBERS.—Members of a panel shall serve without pay by reason of their work on the panel.

(2) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The members of a panel shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance or services for the panel.

(3) STAFFING AND RESOURCES.—The Secretary of Defense shall provide staffing and resources to support the panels, except that the Secretary may not assign primary responsibility for such staffing and resources to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

SEC. 1731. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(b) ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(1) ADDITIONAL ASSESSMENTS SPECIFIED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under subsection (a)(2) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall conduct the following:

(A) An assessment of the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.

(B) An assessment of the implementation and effect of section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, and make such recommendations for modification of such section 1044e as the judicial proceedings panel considers appropriate.

(C) An assessment of the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1705, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(D) An assessment of the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:

(i) Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.

(ii) Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(iii) Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

(2) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the assessments required by paragraph (1) in one of the reports required by subsection (c)(2)(B) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013.

SEC. 545. ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.

(a) ADDITIONAL DUTIES IMPOSED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall perform the following additional duties:

(1) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the impact of the use of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), by the accused during the preliminary hearing conducted under section 832 of such title (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings.

(2) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the establishment of a privilege under the Military Rules of Evidence against the disclosure of communications between—

(A) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe Helpline; and

(B) users of and personnel staffing of the 26 Department of Defense Safe Help Room.

(b) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the reviews and assessments conducted under subsection (a) in one of the reports required by section 576(c)(2)(B) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1760).

(f) DUE DATE FOR ANNUAL REPORT OF JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL – Section 576(c)(2)(B) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112-239; 126 Stat. 1760) is amended by inserting "annually thereafter" after "reports".

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

1. Committee's Official Designation: The committee shall be known as the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel ("the Judicial Proceedings Panel").

2. Authority: The Secretary of Defense, as required by section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 ("the FY 2013 NDAA") (Public Law 112-239), as modified by section 1731(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 ("the FY 2014 NDAA") (Public Law 113-66), and in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA) (5 U.S.C., Appendix, as amended) and 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.50(a), established the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

3. Objectives and Scope of Activities: The Judicial Proceedings Panel will conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the UCMJ by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 ("the FY 2012 NDAA") (Public Law 112-81) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

4. Description of Duties: Section 576(d)(2) directs the Judicial Proceedings Panel to perform the following duties, with additional duties as added by section 1731(b)(1) of the FY 2014 NDAA:
   a. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the UCMJ that were enacted by section 541 of the FY 2012 NDAA.
   b. Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.
   c. Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.
   d. Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.
   e. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the UCMJ), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

f. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.
g. Building on the data compiled as a result of the assessment conducted by the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("the Response Systems Panel"), a Federal advisory committee established pursuant to section 576(a)(1) of the FY 2013 NDAA and in accordance with FACA, of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.
h. Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by Section 573 of the FY 2013 NDAA.
i. Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the UCMJ in certain sexual assault cases.
j. Assess the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the UCMJ), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.
k. Assess the implementation and effect of the Special Victim's Counsel for victims of sex-related offenses established by the Secretary of Defense on August 14, 2013 and codified in Section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, by the enactment of Section 1716 of the FY 2014 NDAA on December 26, 2013. The panel shall make such recommendations for modifications of section 1044e as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate.
l. Assess the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the UCMJ), as added by section 1705 of the FY 2014 NDAA, which requires at a minimum, that upon a finding of guilt for the offenses of rape, sexual assault, rape and sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit such acts, the punishment include dismissal or dishonorable discharge, except as provided for by Article 60 of the UCMJ, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ).
m. Assess the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:
    i. Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.
    ii. Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the UCMJ).

iii. Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

n. Consider such other matters and materials as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, the Judicial Proceedings Panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies. The Judicial Proceedings Panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as it considers appropriate to carry out its duties. Upon request by the Chair of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers necessary to carry out its duties.

5. Agency or Official to Whom the Committee Reports: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall provide its first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes it considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense through the Department of Defense (DoD) General Counsel (GC), and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives, not later than 180 days after its first meeting. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

6. Support: The DoD, through the DoD Office of General Counsel (DoD OGC), the Washington Headquarters Services, and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, shall provide staffing and resources as deemed necessary for the performance of the Judicial Proceedings Panel's functions, and shall ensure compliance with the requirements of the FACA, the Government in the Sunshine Act of 1976 ("the Sunshine Act") (5 U.S.C. § 552b, as amended), governing federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures. Primary responsibility for such staffing and resourcing may not be assigned to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

7. Estimated Annual Operating Costs and Staff Years: The estimated annual operating cost, to include travel, meetings, and contract support, is approximately $4,000,000 and 15 full-time equivalents.

8. Designated Federal Officer: The Designated Federal Officer (DFO), pursuant to DoD policy, shall be a full-time or permanent part-time DoD employee, and shall be appointed in accordance with governing DoD policies and procedures.

   In addition, the Judicial Proceedings Panel's DFO is required to be in attendance at all meetings of the Panel and its subcommittees for the entire duration of each and every meeting. However, in the absence of the DFO, the Alternate DFO, duly appointed to the Judicial Proceedings Panel according to DoD policies and procedures, shall attend the entire duration of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittee meetings.

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

The DFO, or the Alternate DFO, shall approve all of the meetings of the Judicial Proceedings Panel as called by the Chair; shall call all meetings of its subcommittees, in coordination with the Chair; prepare and approve all meeting agendas for the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittees; and adjourn any meeting when the DFO or the Alternate DFO determines adjournment to be in the public's interest or required by governing regulations or DoD policies and procedures.

9. Estimated Number and Frequency of Meetings: Consistent with sections 576(b)(6) and (7) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at the call of the Chair, and the Chair shall call the first meeting of the Judicial Proceedings Panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at a minimum once per year.

10. Duration: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall remain in effect until terminated, as provided for and as required by section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA; however, the charter is subject to renewal every two years.

11. Termination: According to section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

12. Membership and Designation: Pursuant to sections 576(b)(1)(B) and (b)(2), the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have served on the Response Systems Panel.

    The members shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Force, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes. The Chair shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

    Members shall be appointed for the life of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, subject to annual renewals. Any vacancy on the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Panel members shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as special government employee (SGE) members. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, Judicial Proceedings Panel members shall serve without compensation.

    The DoD GC, according to DoD policies and procedures, may select experts and consultants as subject matter experts under the authority of 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to advise the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees; these individuals do not count toward the Judicial Proceedings Panel's total membership nor do they have voting privileges. In addition, these subject matter experts shall not participate in any deliberations dealing with the substantive matters before the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees nor shall they participate in any voting.

13. Subcommittees: The Department, when necessary and consistent with the Judicial Proceedings Panel's mission and DoD policies and procedures, may establish subcommittees, task groups, or working groups to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel. Establishment of subcommittees will be based upon a written determination, to include terms of reference, by the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, or the DoD GC.

    These subcommittees shall not work independently of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and shall report all of their recommendations and advice to the Judicial Proceedings Panel for full deliberation and discussion. Subcommittees have no authority to make decisions and recommendations, verbally or in writing, on behalf of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. No subcommittee or any of its members may update or report directly to the DoD or any Federal officers or employees.

    The Secretary of Defense shall appoint subcommittee members even if the member in question is already a member of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. All subcommittee appointments shall be subject to annual renewal. Such individuals, if not full-time or part-time government personnel, shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as SGE members. Those individuals who are full-time or permanent part-time Federal employees shall be appointed pursuant to 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.130(a) as RGE members. Subcommittee members shall serve for the life of the subcommittee. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, subcommittee members shall serve without compensation.

    All subcommittees operate pursuant to the provisions of FACA, the Sunshine Act, governing Federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures.

14. Recordkeeping: The records of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and its subcommittees shall be handled according to section 2, General Records Schedule 26, and appropriate Department of Defense policies and procedures. These records shall be available for public inspection and copying, subject to the Freedom of Information Act of 1966 (5 U.S.C. § 552, as amended).

15. Filing Date: June 24, 2014

APPENDIX C: Judicial Proceedings Panel Committee and Subcommittee Member Biographies

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman is counsel with the law firm Herrick, Feinstein LLP. Ms. Holtzman served for eight years as a U.S. representative (D-NY, 1973–81). While in office, she authored the Rape Privacy Act. She then served for eight years as District Attorney of Kings County, New York (Brooklyn), the fourth-largest DA's office in the country, where she helped change rape laws, improve standards and methods for prosecution, and develop programs to train police and medical personnel. In 1989 Ms. Holtzman became the only woman ever elected Comptroller of New York City. Ms. Holtzman graduated from Radcliffe College, magna cum laude, and received her law degree from Harvard Law School.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

MR. VICTOR STONE

Victor Stone represents crime victims at the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center, Inc. Previously, Mr. Stone served as Special Counsel at the United States Department of Justice. He spent 40 years with the Department of Justice in numerous positions, including as Chief Counsel, FBI Foreign Terrorist Task Force, and as Assistant U.S. Attorney in Oregon and the District of Columbia. He has experience working on victims' and prisoners' rights, serving on committees that resulted in the enactment of the Crime Victims' Rights Act and updates to the ABA Standards for Prisoner Rights. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he clerked on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

PROFESSOR THOMAS W. TAYLOR

Tom Taylor teaches graduate courses at Duke University's Sanford School of Public Policy. Previously, he served as a decorated and distinguished Army officer, civil servant, and member of the Senior Executive Service. During a 27-year career in the Pentagon, he advised seven secretaries and seven Chiefs of Staff of the Army, and as the senior leader of the Army legal community he worked on a wide variety of operational, personnel, and intelligence issues. He graduated with high honors from Guilford College, Greensboro, N.C., and with honors from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill law school, where he was a Morehead Fellow, a member of the law review, and a member of the Order of the Coif.

VICE ADMIRAL PATRICIA A. TRACEY, U.S. NAVY (RETIRED)

Pat Tracey was most recently the Vice President of Homeland Security and Defense for Hewlett Packard Enterprise Services, U.S. Public Sector, developing dynamic strategies and providing support to various agencies including the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, and U.S. Department of Defense. She completed a distinguished 34-year naval career in 2004, retiring as a vice admiral and the most senior woman officer in the history of the U.S. Navy. As chief of the Navy's $5 billion global education and training enterprise, Admiral Tracey led a successful revolution in training technology to improve the quality, access, effectiveness, and cost of Navy training. She graduated from the College of New Rochelle and the Naval Postgraduate School, with distinction, and completed a Fellowship with the Chief of Naval Operations' Strategic Studies Group.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES — CHAIR OF THE JPP SUBCOMMITTEE

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman, who took office as the youngest woman ever elected to Congress, served in the House of Representatives from 1973 to 1981, representing New York's 16th Congressional District. While in Congress, she served on the House Judiciary and Budget Committees and chaired the Immigration and Refugees Subcommittee. She co-founded the Congressional Women's Caucus and was elected its first Democratic chair. She subsequently was elected Brooklyn District Attorney (where she pioneered new strategies for the prosecution of rape cases)—the only woman ever elected DA in New York City. She was then elected New York City Comptroller, the only woman ever to hold that position. Ms. Holtzman was appointed by President Bill Clinton to the Interagency Working Group (on declassifying secret Nazi war crimes files), and by Secretary Hagel to the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel. She has also been appointed to the Department of Homeland Security Advisory Committee. Ms. Holtzman is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard University's Radcliffe College, magna cum laude. She practices law in New York City with the firm Herrick, Feinstein, LLP.

MS. LISA FRIEL

Lisa Friel is an internationally recognized expert on sexual assault. Ms. Friel has investigated and supervised complex cases involving sexual assault and harassment, human trafficking, workplace violence, child pornography, Internet predators, unlawful surveillance, theft, and fraud. Ms. Friel began her professional career at the New York County District Attorney's Office, specializing in sexual assault cases. She was the Chief of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit for nearly a decade and the Deputy Chief for 11 years. Supervising more than 40 assistant district attorneys, support staff, and investigators, she typically managed 300 cases and investigations at any one time.

Ms. Friel has directed thousands of investigations into allegations of sexual assault and other misconduct and has trained hundreds of law enforcement personnel throughout the world. In October 2011, following a distinguished 28-year career as a Manhattan prosecutor, Ms. Friel joined T&M Protection Resources as Vice President of the Sexual Misconduct Consulting & Investigations division. Ms. Friel and her staff developed policies and procedures, provided training workshops, and conducted sensitive investigations into a myriad of issues, including sexual misconduct (both sexual assault and sexual harassment) and domestic violence. In September 2014, Ms. Friel was appointed as T&M's Special Advisor to the NFL Commissioner, consulting on domestic violence, child abuse, and sexual assault within the National Football League. In April 2015, Ms. Friel accepted a permanent position with the NFL: an appointment by Commissioner Goodell as the NFL's Special Counsel for Investigations, where she is responsible for all investigations related to possible violations of the NFL's Personal Conduct Policy.

MS. LAURIE ROSE KEPROS

Laurie Rose Kepros is the Director of Sexual Litigation for the Colorado Office of the State Public Defender, where she trains and advises more than 700 lawyers and other staff statewide in their representation of adults and juveniles accused or convicted of sexual crimes. Ms. Kepros has personally represented thousands of criminal defendants, including many victims of sexual assault. She has tried and consulted on thousands of sexual offense cases across the state of Colorado. She has served on dozens of subcommittees of the Colorado Sex Offender Management Board and as a member of both the Sex Offense Task Force and the Sex Offense Working Group of the Sentencing Task Force of the Colorado Commission on Criminal and Juvenile Justice. Ms. Kepros was on the Board of Directors of the Colorado Criminal Defense Bar for 10 years and currently serves on the board of the CCDB's sister policy organization, the Colorado Criminal Defense Institute. She is a member of the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers and an adjunct professor at the University of Denver School of Law. She has repeatedly testified before the Colorado legislature as a subject matter expert in sexual crime law and as an expert witness in Colorado sex offense law in federal district court. In 2012, the CCDB awarded her the Gideon Award for upholding and preserving the principles captured by Gideon v. Wainwright.

DEAN LISA SCHENCK (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lisa Schenck became Associate Dean for Academic Affairs at the George Washington University Law School in 2009 after serving in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps for more than 25 years. She also has served as a judge, lawyer, and educator. While in the military, she was an appellate military judge on the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals in 2002 and received the 2003 Judge Advocates Association Outstanding Career Armed Services Attorney Award (Army). In 2005, Dean Schenck was the first woman appointed as a Senior Judge on that court, where she served until she retired. In 2007, the Secretary of Defense also appointed her to serve concurrently as Associate Judge on the U.S. Court of Military Commission Review. After retiring from the military as a colonel in 2008, Dean Schenck served as Senior Advisor to the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in Military Services.

PROFESSOR LEE SCHINASI (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lee Schinasi began his legal career as a trial attorney for the Office of Economic Opportunity before starting a 23-year career in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps. His final assignment was as Dean of Academics and Vice Dean of the Army's JAGC School. Professor Schinasi attended the resident Command and General Staff College and the resident Army War College. He has served as military legal advisor to the Army's Chief of Staff for Intelligence and as Staff Judge Advocate of the 3rd Infantry Division (in Germany) and United States Army South (in Panama). Professor Schinasi is co-author of several books on evidence and litigation, including The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, Military Evidentiary Foundations, The Florida Evidence Code Trial Book, Florida Evidentiary Foundations, Evidence in Florida, Emerging Problems under the Federal Rules of Evidence, and Lawyers Cooperative Practice Guide: Florida Evidence. He received a bachelor's degree in economics and a J.D. degree from the University of Toledo. Before joining the Barry Law faculty, Professor Schinasi taught at the University of Miami School of Law. He currently teaches evidence, torts, civil procedure, and national security law.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JAMES SCHWENK, U.S. MARINE CORPS (RETIRED)

James Schwenk retired from the Marine Corps in 2000 and from civil service in 2014, after 49 years of federal service. As a Marine Corps judge advocate, he served as a trial counsel, defense counsel, Deputy Staff Judge Advocate, Staff Judge Advocate, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Navy, Head of Operational Law Branch at Headquarters Marine Corps, Deputy Director of Legal and Legislative Policy for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Force Management and Policy, Assistant Judge Advocate General of the Navy for Military Law, and Military Assistant to the DoD General Counsel. Upon retiring from active duty, BGen Schwenk served for 14 years in the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense as Senior Associate Deputy General Counsel, specializing in personnel policy, military justice, and civil support. He was the principal legal advisor for the repeal of "don't ask, don't tell" and the provision of benefits to same-sex spouses of military personnel. In addition, he was the principal legal advisor to numerous DoD working groups in the area of military personnel policy, working extensively with the White House and Congress. BGen Schwenk attended the Washington College of Law, American University, earning his J.D. in 1977.

MS. JILL WINE-BANKS

Jill Wine-Banks has a background as a corporate executive in manufacturing and telecommunications and as an attorney and not-for-profit and government leader. Ms. Wine-Banks started her career at the Department of Justice prosecuting organized crime and labor racketeering cases and then played a crucial role as an assistant special prosecutor investigating and trying the Watergate obstruction of justice case. Ms. Wine-Banks also served as the General Counsel of the United States Army. In that position, Ms. Wine-Banks dealt with environmental, procurement, Panama Canal, intelligence, military justice, and political issues, including the integration of women into basic training and West Point. After leaving the Pentagon, she was a litigation partner at Jenner and Block, the Solicitor General and Deputy Attorney General of Illinois, and later the Executive Vice President and Chief Operating Officer of the American Bar Association, the world's largest legal publisher and professional association with almost 400,000 members. That experience led to her becoming a senior corporate executive at Motorola and then Maytag, handling international business development, global operations, alliance creation and management, and government relations in Pakistan, China, Ukraine, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, and Singapore. Recently, Ms. Wine-Banks was head of career and technical education for the Chicago Public Schools and a business consultant. Ms. Wine-Banks is currently writing a book about her life and career, with a special focus on her experiences during Watergate.

Dear Chairs, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit this report of the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (JPP) on panel concerns regarding the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases. This report includes nine recommendations on the topics of the Article 32 process, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority, access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to trial, sexual assault prevention and response training, and expedited transfers of sexual assault victims.

To assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on sexual assault offenses in the military, the JPP tasked the JPP Subcommittee with conducting site visits to military installations in the United States and Asia. From June through September 2016, members of the JPP Subcommittee heard from panels of more than 280 individuals from all of the military Services involved in the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses. The JPP Subcommittee reviewed the information gathered from these site visits, as well as information on this topic received by it in Subcommittee meetings and received by the JPP in public meetings, and submitted its findings and recommendations to the JPP. After hearing testimony from JPP Subcommittee members who attended installation site visits, and deliberating on the Subcommittee's report and recommendations, the JPP makes nine recommendations concerning the issues identified by the JPP Subcommittee.

The JPP expresses its sincere appreciation to the members of the JPP Subcommittee and everyone who contributed to this report.

Respectfully submitted,

Executive Summary

INTRODUCTION

This report of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) focuses on some large-scale issues in the military's handling of sexual assault cases that have come to light during the Panel's ongoing assessment of sexual assault in the military.

In the past several years, media reports and the work of a number of members of Congress have fostered a public perception that the military has failed in sexual assault cases to effectively prosecute the accused and treat sexual assault victims with dignity and compassion. To address these concerns, Congress, the Department of Defense, and the White House have all worked to change the military system so that victims of sexual assault will be treated with respect and not further victimized by the criminal justice process. Other changes have been put in place to counter the perception that sexual assault predators were being protected from prosecution by military commanders.

Many of these changes have been valuable. One possible sign that they are having an effect is the increase in the past few years of the number of sexual assault cases being reported and the decrease in the number of reports of unwanted sexual contact in biannual surveys.[1] While the causes for those trends cannot be identified with certainty, many believe they indicate greater confidence that the criminal justice system will help the victim and will vigorously prosecute the accused.

As constructive and important as these changes have been, they appear to have also produced an unintended negative consequence: as the JPP Subcommittee was repeatedly told on its site visits, they appear to have raised questions about the fundamental fairness of the military justice process when it comes to the treatment of the accused.

It is vital for the military justice system to strike the right balance between the needs of the victim and the needs of the defendant. Both must be properly addressed if the system is to be fair and just, and perceived as such. The failure to maintain both the reality and perception among the military and the public of a just system can undermine morale, affect recruiting, and create a corrosive cynicism among military personnel. For that reason, the JPP believes it is important to share the criticisms it received with Congress, the Department of Defense, and the public.

METHODOLOGY

In order to assess the effects of numerous changes in law and policy on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses in the military, the Judicial Proceedings Panel tasked the Subcommittee of the JPP with conducting site visits to military installations to talk to the men and women who work in the military justice system. The JPP had previously received information on many of the changes to law and policy, and wanted to determine how these changes were being carried out and perceived at military installations by investigators, prosecutors, defense counsel, and others involved in sexual assault investigation, litigation, or victim support.

1 According to sexual assault prevalence surveys conducted of active duty military members, about 14,900 Service members experienced some kind of sexual assault in 2016, compared with 20,300 in 2014. See U.S. Dep't of Def., SAPRO, Department of Defense Annual Report on Sexual Assault in the Military: Fiscal Year 2016 at 14 (May 1, 2017), available at http://sapr.mil/public/docs/reports/FY16_Annual/FY16_SAPRO_Annual_Report.pdf.

From July through September 2016, members of the JPP Subcommittee visited military installations in the United States and Asia. They met with panels of more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations and all of the military Services, including prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, commanders, investigators, and sexual assault response coordinators and other victim support personnel. These individuals spoke without attribution so that the Subcommittee could gain an unfiltered, candid assessment of how changes in sexual assault laws and policies have, in their view, affected the military justice system.

On the basis of information from these site visits, the Subcommittee elected to issue reports on several topics. The Subcommittee issued its first report to the JPP in December 2016 on the subject of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases and its second report in February 2017 on sexual assault investigations in the military. After receiving testimony from the Subcommittee members and deliberating on the information presented, the JPP issued two reports with recommendations on the topics identified by the Subcommittee. The JPP Subcommittee also issued three short reports—without recommendations—in March 2017 on the topics of the Department of Defense (DoD) initial disposition withholding policy, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and the training and experience of trial counsel and special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel.

The JPP Subcommittee issued its final report to the JPP in May 2017, relating concerns regarding the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases. The JPP deliberated on the information presented by the Subcommittee and had the opportunity to question the JPP Subcommittee members who attended the installation site visits. As a result of this deliberation and review of the Subcommittee report, included as Appendix A, the JPP issues nine recommendations.

REPORT OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL SUBCOMMITTEE

In its report, the JPP Subcommittee identified a number of issues with how the military justice system treats sexual assault offenses:

(1) The revised Article 32 process provides less information to convening authorities and no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense.

(2) Convening authorities currently lack meaningful written guidelines to help them decide whether a case warrants referral to court-martial.

(3) Because the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority must be provided to the defense if the charges are referred to court, the staff judge advocate may be unwilling to provide a complete and candid written assessment of the evidence in the case.

(4) Counsel perceive that convening authorities feel pressured to refer sexual assault cases, even when based on weak evidence, to trial.

(5) Trial counsel sometimes lack the access that they believe sufficient to best prepare the victims for trial.

(6) Military members who potentially may sit on court-martial panels receive sexual assault prevention and response training that may confuse them regarding the legal standard for consent when alcohol is involved in sexual assault cases. The frequency of this training is also causing "training fatigue" among some military members.

(7) The current policy on the expedited transfer of sexual assault victims can make it difficult for investigators and prosecutors when victims have been transferred to faraway locations.

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

The JPP recognizes that the views of the individuals who participated in the site visits may depend in some measure on the military Service, location, and level of experience of the participants, and that the information provided was anecdotal. However, the views addressed in this report were brought to the Subcommittee's attention during every installation site visit, were supported by specific examples, and were also contextualized by the Subcommittee's subsequent research into related policies and statutes, as well as testimony before the JPP and the Subcommittee. Taken together, these considerations suggest that the issues could be systemic and should be addressed.

After receiving the presentation of the Subcommittee report, engaging in robust discussion with Subcommittee members at a public meeting on these issues, and deliberating as a panel, the JPP makes nine recommendations regarding the issues affecting the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases, addressing the Article 32 process, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority, access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to trial, sexual assault prevention and response training, and expedited transfers of sexual assault victims.

JPP Recommendations on Panel Concerns Regarding the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases*

Recommendation 55: The Secretary of Defense and the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which, in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP, no longer serves a useful discovery purpose. This review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of such a preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be given more weight by the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further analysis of, or changes to, the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP reiterates its recommendation—presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases—that the military Services provide the defense with independent investigators.

- The Fiscal Year 2014 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) made substantial changes to Article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), narrowing the scope of the pretrial hearing to a determination of whether probable cause exists to believe an offense was committed and the accused committed the offense. These changes also removed the ability of the Article 32 hearing officer to compel a victim to appear and testify at the hearing. The Article 32 hearing is no longer a discovery mechanism for the defense.
- According to site visit information from trial and defense counsel provided to the JPP Subcommittee, the new Article 32 preliminary hearing is not a meaningful process for evaluating the strength of the case.

- According to information presented to the JPP by former military judges, trial counsel, and defense counsel, Article 32 hearings are now "paper drills," often with no witnesses testifying and only documentary evidence submitted.

- Counsel who spoke to the Subcommittee during site visits, as well as counsel who provided information to the JPP, stated that convening authorities sometimes refer charges in sexual assault cases even when the Article 32 preliminary hearing officers recommend charges not be referred.

- The JPP believes that Article 32 data should be examined to determine whether the seniority or experience level of the Article 32 preliminary hearing officer is a factor in the frequency with which convening authorities follow his or her advice.

- Because the statutory changes to Article 32, UCMJ, have only recently been included in the court-martial case data reviewed by the JPP, the Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD should continue monitoring court-martial data to evaluate the effect of the statutory changes.

Recommendation 56: Article 33, UCMJ, nonbinding case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates should require that the following standard be considered for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The nonbinding disposition guidance should require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor.

- The Fiscal Year 2017 NDAA created a new Article 33 of the UCMJ that directed the Secretary of Defense to issue nonbinding guidance regarding factors that convening authorities and staff judge advocates should consider when exercising their duties with respect to the disposition of charges. The new Article 33 states that this guidance should take into account the "principles contained in official guidance of the Attorney General to attorneys for the Government with respect to disposition of Federal criminal cases."[2]

- On July 11, 2017, the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice published for public comment proposed disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ. The JPP reviewed Sections 2.1 and 2.3 of the proposed guidance and notes that Section 2.1(h) is generally consistent with the JPP proposed standard.

- The "official guidance of the Attorney General" mentioned in Article 33 refers to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual. This manual specifies that probable cause is a threshold consideration that, if met, does not automatically warrant prosecution. The manual provides that an attorney should commence prosecution if "the admissible evidence will probably be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction."

- The American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Standards for the Prosecution Function state that a prosecutor should file and maintain criminal charges only when the charges are supported by probable cause, when "admissible evidence will be sufficient to support conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, and [when] the decision to charge is in the interests of justice."

2 National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017, Pub. L. 114-328, § 5204.

- Counsel interviewed by the JPP Subcommittee on site visits believe that the standard in the military for referral of charges, which is probable cause, is too low and that convening authorities should take into account other factors in making disposition decisions, such as the likelihood of obtaining a conviction at trial.

Recommendation 57: After case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the Secretary of Defense and DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

- Counsel who spoke to the Subcommittee during site visits, as well as counsel who provided information to the JPP, perceived considerable pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault allegations to court-martial, even when based on weak evidence. The result, they believe, is a high acquittal rate in sexual assault cases.

- Case documents provided by the Services for sexual assault cases tried by court-martial in fiscal year 2015 show that for cases in which the most serious offense tried was a penetrative offense, 39% resulted in convictions for a sexual assault offense, 31% resulted in convictions for a non-sex offense only, and 30% resulted in acquittal of all charges. For cases in which the most serious sex offense tried was a sexual contact offense, 25% resulted in convictions for a sexual contact offense, 57% resulted in convictions for a non-sex offense only, and 18% resulted in acquittal of all charges.[3]

Recommendation 58: The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. This review should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should also consider whether such a change would encourage the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed and candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

- Rule for Court-Martial 404 states that the staff judge advocate must provide written pretrial advice to the convening authority prior to referral of charges to a general court-martial, including a conclusion as to whether each specification states an offense under the UCMJ, whether the allegations are warranted by the evidence in the Article 32 preliminary hearing report, and whether a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the accused and offense, as well as a recommendation for action by the convening authority. A copy of the pretrial advice must be provided to the defense if the convening authority refers the case to court-martial.

- Counsel in some Services provide a prosecution merits memo with the trial counsel's opinion on the evidence and the likelihood of conviction at trial. Counsel from other Services say they have similar processes. Under Rule for Court-Martial 404, if appended to the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice, this memo would also have to be provided to the defense if charges are referred to court-martial.

Recommendation 59: Congress review and consider revising provisions in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded for review and decision to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary, because these provisions appear to have created a perception of undue pressure on convening authorities to refer such cases. The Secretary of Defense should develop procedures to mitigate this perception.

- The Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015 NDAAs contain provisions requiring that a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be forwarded for review and decision either to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary. While well-intentioned, these NDAA provisions appear to have created the perception of undue pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial, which negatively affects the military justice system.

- Data provided by the Services on review of disposition decisions since these NDAA provisions were enacted reflect no instances in which secretarial review of a convening authority's decision has been required. In some instances in each Service, a convening authority's decision not to refer a sexual assault case has been reviewed by a higher-level convening authority. In all but one of those instances, the higher-level convening authority also declined to refer the case to court-martial.

- Trial and defense counsel on site visits perceived there to be pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to trial, even when based on weak evidence. They perceive that commanders would rather refer cases to trial than deal with the potential adverse effects of not referring the cases, such as career setbacks, media scrutiny, and elevated review of non-referral decisions.

- The JPP notes media coverage of two sexual assault court-martial appellate cases, both of which came to light following the Subcommittee's issuance of its report, that underscores the JPP's concerns related to perceived pressure on convening authorities.

    - In the first case, United States v. Barry,[4] a declaration of the convening authority was submitted to the court that states: "I perceived that if I were to disapprove the findings in the [sexual assault] case, it would adversely affect the Navy." The convening authority further stated: "Even though I was convinced then, and am convinced now, that I should have disapproved the findings, my consideration of the Navy's interest in avoiding the perception that military leaders were sweeping sexual assaults under the rug outweighed that conviction at the time."[5]

4 United States v. Barry, 76 M.J. 269 (Apr. 27, 2017); remanded, United States v. Barry, No. 2017 CAAF LEXIS 703 (C.A.A.F., June 19, 2017).

5 Declaration of RADM Patrick J. Lorge, USN (Ret.), May 5, 2017.

- In the second case, United States v. Boyce,[6] the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces overturned a sexual assault case on the basis of an appearance of unlawful command influence.[7] This was primarily due to senior civilian and military leaders reportedly giving the convening authority an ultimatum to retire or be removed from his position for his failure to refer a prior sexual assault case to court-martial.

Recommendation 60: The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

- Counsel on site visits reported high acquittal rates in sexual assault cases due to a less robust Article 32 process, the standard of probable cause for referral of charges, and pressure on convening authorities to refer cases to trial even when based on weak evidence.

- Case documents provided by the Services for sexual assault cases tried by court-martial in fiscal year 2015 show that for cases in which the most serious offense tried was a penetrative offense, 39% resulted in convictions of a sexual assault offense, 31% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 30% resulted in acquittal of all charges. For cases in which the most serious sex offense tried was a sexual contact offense, 25% resulted in convictions of a sexual contact offense, 57% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 18% resulted in acquittal of all charges.[8]

Recommendation 61: The Secretary of Defense ensure that special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVCs/VLCs) receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing reasonable access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of an effective relationship between the prosecutor and the victim in the advice they provide their victim-clients, with the goal of assisting the prosecutor in fully preparing for trial.

- A number of trial counsel on site visits told the Subcommittee that while SVCs/VLCs are a valuable asset, they sometimes restrict the ability of trial counsel to conduct subsequent interviews with victims.

Recommendation 62: The Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and regarding the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent affect court-martial panel members.

8 Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses for Fiscal Year 2015 (Sep. 2017), Appendix A, supra note 3.

- Commanders who spoke to the Subcommittee expressed concerns about the frequency of mandatory sexual assault prevention and response (SAPR) training, describing it as time-consuming and potentially counterproductive because of perceived "training fatigue."

- Counsel on site visits indicated that they still hear misperceptions about alcohol use and impairment from court-martial panel members, even though sexual assault response coordinators and others who conduct SAPR training told Subcommittee members they do not train military members that "one beer means no consent," or use variations of that slogan.

- A September 2016 Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals decision—United States v. Newlan[9]—involved an erroneous jury instruction on the definition of "impairment" in a sexual assault case. The court noted that many members of the jury pool received training from SAPR personnel that led them to believe that "if someone ingested any alcohol, that individual was no longer able to legally consent. [footnote omitted]"[10]

Recommendation 63: The Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be modified to require commanders to determine, in each case, whether a sexual assault victim could be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation without sacrificing the vital interests of the victim. The intent of this change would be to strike a balance between ensuring that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial and satisfying the need to separate the victim from the accused, while maintaining the victim's access to support systems. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can be used by defense counsel to suggest victims' abuse of this system and to cast doubt on their credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial. The Secretary of Defense should develop procedures to minimize this problem.

The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD collect data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

- Some counsel on site visits reported that once victims receive expedited transfers to faraway locations, they are less likely to cooperate with the prosecution. Some counsel and commanders felt that expedited transfers are abused by victims and perceive that commanders are afraid to say no to victims for fear that doing so will be seen as retaliation.

- Counsel perceive that transfers are rarely requested by victims in desirable locations, but they are frequently requested by victims in less desirable locations. Defense counsel may use this perception to challenge the victim's motives during a court-martial, causing panel members to question the victim's credibility.

- According to statistics from the Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, the number of expedited transfer requests has risen steadily from 218 requests in fiscal

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. Following the Secretary's objectives and at the request of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, the Subcommittee conducted military installation site visits throughout the United States and Asia. Based upon information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee undertook additional research of several topics. The Subcommittee has completed its review on the topic of barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Executive Summary

SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT TO THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL ON BARRIERS TO THE FAIR ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—all involved in the military justice process, from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

On the basis of information received at the site visits, the Subcommittee identified several topics to present to the JPP, some of which required additional research. Therefore, the Subcommittee decided to issue separate reports on each of the identified subjects. The Subcommittee issued its first report in December 2016 on the subject of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, its second report in February 2017 on sexual assault investigations in the military, and three short reports in March 2017 on the topics of the Department of Defense (DoD) initial disposition withholding policy, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and the training and experience of trial counsel and special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel.

This final Subcommittee report focuses on some large-scale issues in the military's handling of sexual assault cases that came to light during the site visits and subsequent research. In the past several years, there has been a huge public outcry about the problem of sexual assault in the military. Media reports, the documentary film Invisible War, and the work of a number of women members of the U.S. House and Senate have fostered a public perception that sexual assault is rampant in the military and that the military has swept the problem under the rug both by failing to effectively prosecute the accused and by failing to treat the victims with dignity and compassion. To address these concerns, Congress, the Department of Defense, and the White House have all worked to change the military system so that victims of sexual assault are treated with respect and are not further victimized by the criminal justice process. Other changes have been put in place to counter the perception that sexual assault predators were being protected from prosecution by military commanders.

Many of these changes have been valuable. One possible sign that they are having an effect is the increase in the past few years of the number of sexual assault cases being reported. While its cause cannot be identified with certainty, many believe that it indicates greater confidence that the criminal justice system will help the victim and vigorously prosecute the accused.

As constructive and important as these changes have been, they have also produced an unintended negative consequence: they have, as the Subcommittee was repeatedly told on its site visits, raised serious questions about the fundamental fairness of the military justice process when it comes to the treatment of the accused.

It is vital for the military justice system to strike the right balance between the needs of the victim and the needs of the defendant. Both must be properly addressed if the system is to be seen as fair and just. The failure to create the perception and the reality of a just system can undermine morale, affect recruiting, and create a corrosive cynicism among military personnel. For that reason, the Subcommittee believed it was important to share the information it received with the JPP.

The Subcommittee identified a number of problems with how the military justice system treats sexual assault offenses:

1. The revised Article 32 process provides less information to convening authorities and no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense;

2. Because convening authorities currently lack meaningful written guidelines to help them decide whether a case warrants referral to court-martial, such as the likelihood of securing a conviction at trial, they may be referring sexual assault charges to trial on the basis of weak evidence;

3. Because the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority must be provided to the defense, the staff judge advocate may be unwilling to provide a complete and candid written assessment of the evidence in the case;

4. Counsel perceive that convening authorities feel public pressure to refer sexual assault cases to trial;

5. Some trial counsel complained they no longer have the access to sexual assault victims that they need in order to properly prepare those victims for trial;

6. Military members who potentially may sit on court-martial panels receive sexual assault prevention and response training that may confuse them regarding the legal standard for consent in sexual assault cases. The frequency of this training is also causing "training fatigue" among military members; and

7. The current policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims can make it difficult for investigators and prosecutors to adequately consult with victims prior to trial when victims have been transferred to faraway locations.

In this report, the Subcommittee makes nine recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP no longer serves a useful purpose. Such a review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of the preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be binding on the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further changes to the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP Subcommittee reiterates its recommendation— presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, and adopted by the JPP—that the defense be provided with independent investigators.

Recommendation 2: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Article 33, UCMJ, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates require the following standard for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the disposition guidance require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor. These factors should be considered in their totality, with no single factor determining the outcome.

Recommendation 3: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that after case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

Recommendation 4: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. The DAC-IPAD should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should consider whether such a change would allow the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed, candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

Recommendation 5: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Congress repeal provisions from the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary. The perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial created by these provisions and the consequent negative effects on the military justice system are more harmful than the problems that such provisions were originally intended to address.

Recommendation 6: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

Recommendation 7: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense ensure that SVCs/VLCs receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing full access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of a meaningful victim-prosecutor relationship in the advice they provide their victim-clients and assist prosecutors in sufficiently developing the rapport with the victim needed to fully prepare for trial.

Recommendation 8: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent continue to affect court-martial panel members.

Recommendation 9: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be changed to state that when possible, sexual assault victims should be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation. This change will help ensure that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial, will satisfy the need to separate the victim from the accused, and will maintain the victim's access to support systems while combating the perception that the ability to ask for these transfers has encouraged fraudulent claims of sexual assault. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should all receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can foster the perception among military members that the expedited transfer system is being abused and in how such transfers can be used by defense counsel to cast doubt on the victim's credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD review data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

Barriers to the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia involved in the military justice process; these conversations focused on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.[1] Discussions were held without attribution so that Subcommittee members could hear candid perceptions of the military's handling of sexual assault cases from the men and women who are investigating and litigating those cases. The Subcommittee spoke to groups of military prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, and investigators, as well as commanders, sexual assault response coordinators, victim advocates, and victim-witness liaisons from all military Services.

During the site visits, the Subcommittee identified a number of possible barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases. The Subcommittee determined that it would have to analyze, discuss, and develop the information gathered and conduct further research into some of the issues identified. Therefore, the Subcommittee held 13 meetings or teleconferences from September 2016 through May 2017. Drawing on the site visit data and the Subcommittee's additional discussion and research—including information regarding ethics rules and prosecutorial discretion, provided by representatives of the Services at a Subcommittee meeting held in January 2017—the Subcommittee made recommendations on several of these points in two previous reports to the JPP: one on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, issued in December 2016, and one on sexual assault investigations in the military, issued in February 2017.[2] In addition, the Subcommittee provided brief reports to the JPP in March 2017 on the topics of the Department of Defense (DoD) initial disposition withholding policy, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and training and experience of trial counsel and special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel.[3] This final report summarizes site visit comments and the Subcommittee's research into additional barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases.

I. BACKGROUND

Historically, sexual assault in the military has at times garnered the public's attention. In recent years, however, public demands for accountability and justice have grown louder and more persistent, following complaints by sexual assault victims about the military's handling of their allegations and how they are treated. As a result, the procedures for dealing with such cases have been changed.

Many victims complained that commanders dismissed their sexual assault allegations without further investigation or action. In response, several DoD or congressionally appointed panels reviewed the state of sexual assault prevention, victim care, investigation, and prosecution in the military and issued reports and recommendations on those topics.[4] Congress and DoD responded to these recommendations and to military sexual assault victims' complaints by adopting more than 100 statutory reforms and numerous policy changes in the area of military sexual assault. The majority of these statutory reforms and policy changes have been instituted since 2012, and many have sought to address the treatment of sexual assault victims.

Statutes creating the Special Victims' Counsel Program and expanding victims' rights have profoundly changed the treatment of sexual assault victims. The statute creating the Special Victims' Counsel Program provides that every military member who reports being sexually assaulted is entitled to have a military attorney appointed to advise him or her of legal issues surrounding the case and other matters. This attorney is authorized to represent the victim, including at the Article 32 hearing and court-martial, at all pretrial stages of the case, and at trial. Since its inception as an Air Force pilot program in 2013, the Special Victims' Counsel/Victims' Legal Counsel[5] (SVC/VLC) Program has evolved to the point that an SVC/VLC right to argue victim privacy issues in court is now recognized.[6] The ability to have an SVC/VLC present during investigative interviews has also helped increase victims' comfort level with the investigative and military justice processes.

The recent passage of legislation allowing victims to decline to testify at Article 32 preliminary hearings has also been perceived positively by sexual assault victims.

These military justice reforms were prompted by past failures to properly address sexual assault allegations. They have empowered sexual assault victims and provided them a voice in how their sexual assault allegations are handled. Yet these reforms have also had unintended and, at times, negative consequences. In the view of trial counsel, defense counsel, investigators, and other military personnel involved in the military criminal justice system who were interviewed by the Subcommittee members during installation site visits, the military justice system is placing the rights and preferences of sexual assault victims over the due process rights of those accused of these offenses. Many of those interviewed sense that in an effort to respond to public criticism and right past wrongs, commanders now feel pressure to resolve greater numbers of sexual assault allegations at courts-martial, regardless of the relative merits of the case or the likelihood of conviction. The result, counsel asserted, has been a dramatic increase in acquittals in these cases. Several counsel went so far as to state that these changes in the military justice system have placed justice and the perception of a fair system at risk.

This report discusses some of the changes made to the military justice process in recent years, as well as the perceived pressure on convening authorities and judge advocates to refer sexual assault cases to trial, regardless of the likelihood of conviction. Further, this report highlights some of the long-term negative consequences identified as resulting from the recent reforms. It builds on the observations and conclusions found in two earlier and related Subcommittee reports written following the installation site visits: the Subcommittee Report to the Judicial Proceedings Panel on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, the Subcommittee Report to the Judicial Proceedings Panel on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military, and the Subcommittee papers on Initial Disposition Withholding Authority, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and Training and Experience of Trial Counsel and Special Victims' Counsel/Victims' Legal Counsel.[7]

II. REFERRING SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES TO COURT-MARTIAL

A. Early Stages of Case Processing

Before the convening authority can refer charges to a court-martial, several events must take place. While there are some important differences in the treatment of sexual assault offenses, many of the steps in the military justice process are the same regardless of the offense.

If a victim reports a sexual assault to certain identified personnel, he or she has the ability to file either a restricted or unrestricted report.[8] If the victim chooses to file an unrestricted report of a sexual assault offense, the Services' military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs) investigate the offense.[9] When the investigation is completed or near completion, military prosecutors discuss the case with the appropriate commander, who determines whether to prefer charges or take some other disciplinary action against the alleged perpetrator.[10]

Rule for Court-Martial (R.C.M.) 306(b) provides guidance for judge advocates and convening authorities on this decision, stating that "[a]llegations of offenses should be disposed of in a timely manner at the lowest appropriate level."[11] Further guidance is contained in nonbinding discussion accompanying R.C.M. 306(b):

> The disposition decision is one of the most important and difficult decisions facing a commander. Many factors must be taken into consideration and balanced, including,

The Subcommittee's report on sexual assault investigations is still pending before the JPP. The three Subcommittee papers were presented to the JPP for informational purposes.

8 Restricted reports of adult sexual assault may be only made to sexual assault response coordinators, SAPR victim advocates, and healthcare personnel. U.S. Dep't of Def. Instr. [hereinafter DoDI] 6495.02, Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Program Procedures, Encl. 4 (Mar. 28, 2013, incorporating Change 2, effective Jul. 7, 2015).

10 Only commanders who hold at least special court-martial convening authority and who are in the grade of O-6 (i.e., colonel or Navy captain) or higher can hold initial disposition authority in sexual assault cases. See U.S. Dep't of Defense, Memorandum from the Secretary of Defense on Withholding Initial Disposition Authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in Certain Sexual Assault Cases (Apr. 20, 2012).

11 Manual for Courts-Martial, United States (2016 ed.) [hereinafter 2016 MCM], Rule for Court-Martial [hereinafter R.C.M.] 306(b). R.C.M. 306(c) discusses potential dispositions of allegations: no punishment, administrative action, nonjudicial punishment, or disposition through courts-martial.

> to the extent practicable, the nature of the offenses, any mitigating or extenuating circumstances, the views of the victim as to disposition, any recommendations made by subordinate commanders, the interest of justice, military exigencies, and the effect of the decision on the accused and the command. The goal should be a disposition that is warranted, appropriate, and fair.
> In deciding how an offense should be disposed of, factors the commander should consider, to the extent they are known, include:
> (A) the nature of and circumstances surrounding the offense and the extent of the harm caused by the offense, including the offense's effect on morale, health, safety, welfare, and discipline;
> (B) when applicable, the views of the victim as to disposition;
> (C) existence of jurisdiction over the accused and the offense;
> (D) availability and admissibility of evidence;
> (E) the willingness of the victim or others to testify;
> (F) cooperation of the accused in the apprehension or prosecution of another accused;
> (G) possible improper motives or biases of the person(s) making the allegation(s);
> (H) availability and likelihood of prosecution of the same or similar and related charges against the accused by another jurisdiction; and
> (I) appropriateness of the authorized punishment to the particular accused or offense.[12]

For sex-related offenses committed in the United States, R.C.M. 306 provides for the victim to express his or her views as to whether the offense should be prosecuted by court-martial or in a civilian court with jurisdiction over the offense. The convening authority must consider the victim's views as to disposition, if available, before making a decision to prefer charges or take some other disciplinary action.[13]

If charges are preferred and the special court-martial convening authority (SPCMCA) deems a general court-martial appropriate, he or she must direct the case to a preliminary hearing under Article 32 of the UCMJ.[14]

13 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 306(e)(2). R.C.M. 306(e)(1) defines "sex-related" offense as any alleged violation of Article 120—Rape and sexual assault generally, 120a—Stalking, 120b—Rape and sexual assault of a child, 120c—Other sexual misconduct, 125—Forcible sodomy; bestiality, or any attempt thereof under Article 80, Uniform Code of Military Justice.

B. The Evolution of the Article 32 Process

1. Statutory Changes. Before charges may be referred to a general court-martial, Article 32 of the UCMJ requires a preliminary hearing, unless the accused waives the hearing.[15] In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA), Congress made substantial changes to Article 32. The impetus for these changes was a widely reported Article 32 investigation at the U.S. Naval Academy in which counsel questioned a Naval Academy midshipman who had reported being sexually assaulted for "more than 30 hours" and subjected her to "humiliating and abusive questions."[16] The legislative changes to Article 32 were also intended to align the procedures with civilian preliminary hearing proceedings, which are used to determine if there is probable cause and if a case should go to trial; during them, victims are often not called to testify.[17]

Prior to these statutory changes, the Article 32 hearing was intended to be a "thorough and impartial investigation" by an investigating officer into the truth and form of the charges.[18] The Article 32 hearing also served as a mechanism for pretrial discovery for the defense.[19] Military witnesses, including sexual assault victims, could be compelled to appear and testify at the Article 32 hearing.[20]

The FY14 NDAA changes to Article 32 applied to Article 32 hearings conducted on or after December 26, 2014.[21] These changes, which restyled the Article 32 from a pretrial investigation into a preliminary hearing, limited the purpose of the hearing to determining whether probable cause exists to believe an offense was committed and whether the accused in the case committed the offense.[22] Under the December 2014 Article 32 format, preliminary hearing officers (PHOs) are still required to determine whether the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the accused and the offense, to consider the form of the charges, and to make recommendations to the convening authority as to disposition.[23] In an effort to limit the scope of Article 32, these statutory changes also removed the ability of a PHO to compel a military victim to appear and testify at the hearing if the victim was found "reasonably available," but allowed the PHO to consider alternatives to testimony for the victim and any other witnesses, regardless of their availability.[24]

22 Another change to the Article 32 process requires that judge advocates be used as preliminary hearing officers "whenever practicable." 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 405(d)(1). While this had previously been the practice in the Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force, the Army traditionally used line officers in this role, with a judge advocate appointed to advise the Article 32 investigating officer on legal matters. In addition, the updated R.C.M. 405 requires the preliminary hearing officer to be equal to or senior in grade to the military prosecutor and military defense counsel representing the accused, "when practicable." 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 405(d)(1). Navy and Air Force counsel stated that they often use active duty and reserve military judges as Article 32 preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases.

As observed above, while the Article 32 hearing had previously served as a means of discovery for the defense, the new R.C.M. 405, reflecting the statutory changes to Article 32, specifically states that the Article 32 hearing is "not intended to serve as a means of discovery."[25] This change is significant, as the U.S. Court of Military Appeals (now the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, or CAAF) previously emphasized the value of the Article 32 investigation as a discovery tool. In the case of Hutson v. United States, CAAF even relied on the Article 32 hearing to uphold a judge's refusal to grant the defense's request for appointment of an investigator.[26] While acknowledging that investigative assistance is provided for indigent defendants in federal courts, CAAF held that the federal statute used to grant such assistance in federal court was not available to military defendants, stating: "[I]t should be noted that the pretrial investigation to which these charges have been referred is the accused's only practicable means of discovering the case against him."[27] In light of the changes to the Article 32 process, this CAAF decision provides further support for the Subcommittee's recent recommendation, which the JPP adopted, that independent investigators be provided to the defense.[28]

A provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 (FY17 NDAA) removes the provision in Article 32 permitting the accused to present additional evidence at the Article 32 hearing "in defense and mitigation, relevant to the limited purposes of the hearing," and replaces it with language stating that the accused may present additional evidence "that is relevant to the issues [of whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense and the PHO's recommendation as to disposition of the case]."[29] It is too early to determine how PHOs will interpret this change and what effect, if any, it will have on the defense's ability to present additional evidence in defense and mitigation at the Article 32 hearing.

2. Site Visit Information. During installation site visits the Subcommittee spoke with trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs, most of whom were familiar with both the pre-December 2014 and the new Article 32 proceedings. The consensus among them was that unlike the pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation, the new Article 32 preliminary hearing is not a meaningful process for evaluating the strength of the case or for any other purpose. Sexual assault victims are no longer required to testify at Article 32 hearings, and frequently do not. Trial counsel stated that often the first time a victim provides testimony and is subject to cross-examination by defense counsel is at the court-martial. Beyond Article 32 issues, several trial counsel told Subcommittee members that some SVCs/VLCs limit trial counsel access to the victim, thereby preventing trial counsel from building sufficient rapport with the victim and having the repeated interviews that they feel are necessary to prepare for trial. Several counsel stated that this combination of factors has led to victims being unprepared for trial and testifying poorly on the stand.

Frequently, no witnesses appear at the Article 32 preliminary hearing, which simply involves trial counsel submitting documentary evidence for consideration. Many trial and defense counsel with whom the Subcommittee spoke referred to the Article 32 preliminary hearing as a "paper drill" or "rubber stamp." While many defense counsel noted that they have begun waiving the hearing, some stated that they have continued to assert the accused's right to an Article 32 hearing even if they no longer get a chance to question the victim or receive additional information about the government's case.

Counsel universally observed that pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigations were used to identify weak cases and prevent them from going to court-martial, but the new Article 32 hearing no longer serves this function. The pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation and investigating officer's recommendation as to whether the evidence supported the charges and whether the charges should be sent forward to court-martial (and to what type of court-martial) helped test the strength of the prosecution's case. According to many trial and defense counsel who spoke with the Subcommittee, the limited scope of the present preliminary hearing and the removal of the requirement for victim testimony are the primary reasons why counsel do not believe the current Article 32 format is a useful tool for vetting cases. Several trial counsel acknowledged that prosecutors should be confident that probable cause exists and that they have sufficient evidence to prevail at trial before charges are even preferred.

Article 32 PHOs' recommendations on whether the case should proceed to trial remain nonbinding, and some trial and defense counsel noted that often staff judge advocates and convening authorities do not abide by the recommendations.[30] Such disregard occurs even when the PHO finds no probable cause to support a charge or an extremely low likelihood of conviction, recommending that the case should be dismissed outright or resolved through disciplinary action at some lower level. Counsel complained that because of the changes to the Article 32 process and because the PHO's recommendations are nonbinding, too many cases are referred to court-martial in which there is little chance of securing a conviction.

3. JPP Public Meeting Commentary on the Effects of the Changes to the Article 32 Hearing. Senior trial and defense counsel and former military judges, speaking to the JPP at a public meeting in January 2017, reinforced the comments of counsel on site visits that Article 32 hearings in sexual assault cases have become "paper drills" at which neither the victim nor other witnesses testify.[31] A senior trial counsel told the JPP that since Article 32 and R.C.M. 405 were modified, the trial counsel has "a lot more control over the presentation of evidence" at the Article 32 preliminary hearing, and can often establish probable cause with only a copy of the victim's statement and portions of the investigation report.[32]

Some counsel and former judges noted that they are seeing more Article 32 waivers from defense counsel since the new Article 32 preliminary hearing took effect, though some defense counsel said that they continue to go forward with these hearings to obtain what information they can.[33] A former judge told the JPP that in pre-December 2014 Article 32 proceedings, it was rare for the defense to submit an Article 32 waiver in a sexual assault case.[34] According to a senior trial counsel, the pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation was used as a "litmus test" to determine the strength of the case and to see how the victim comes across while testifying. He further stated that given the limited scope of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing, he believes more cases are now being referred to court-martial than would have been under the more robust pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation.[35] Another senior trial counsel elaborated that some convening authorities who still want to use the Article 32

preliminary hearing to "test the evidence" in a sexual assault case are frustrated that they can no longer do that effectively under the new Article 32 process.[36] A senior defense counsel also questioned whether the new Article 32 preliminary hearing serves any meaningful purpose.[37]

A number of counsel expressed the concern that the more superficial process mandated by the current Article 32 is leading convening authorities to make court-martial referral decisions with less information than was available to them in the past. These counsel corroborated the perception of counsel interviewed by the Subcommittee during site visits that the reforms to Article 32 have made the hearings less meaningful, and as a result more sexual assault cases are referred despite weak evidence and little chance of conviction at trial.[38] One senior trial counsel expressed the opinion that an experienced trial counsel should be able to distill the evidence, research case law, and provide a well-supported recommendation to the convening authority. In his view, the Article 32 should become more like the civilian grand jury system.[39] A Marine Corps VLC concurred, stating that the Marine Corps has implemented a prosecution merits memo in which the trial counsel "writes a complete and informed opinion" of the evidence in the case and the likelihood of achieving a conviction at trial.[40] Prosecutors from the other Services indicated that they draft similar memos or have similar procedures for informing staff judge advocates and convening authorities about the evidence in such cases. Conversely, the Marine Corps VLC stated his view that it is not necessary for victims to testify in the Article 32 hearing. He added that it is traumatic for them and slows the process down.[41]

Several counsel pointed out that the recommendation of the Article 32 PHO is nonbinding on the convening authority, and the Article 32 hearing is now less effective at identifying cases that are likely to result in a conviction at court-martial. Practitioners who testified before the JPP in January 2017 stated they were aware of cases in which Article 32 PHOs either found no probable cause for a charge or recommended against sending the charge to trial, but their advice was not followed by the staff judge advocate and convening authority.[42] In addition, a senior defense counsel told the JPP that as a prosecutor, he has seen situations in which there was almost no probability of winning at trial, and when this information was presented to the convening authority, the convening authority still elected to refer the charges to court-martial.[43] He added that sending fatally weak cases on to court-martial was very demoralizing to the trial counsel.[44]

4. Data on Article 32 Recommendations and Convening Authority Referral Decisions. The Services provided case information and documents showing that out of 416 sexual assault cases that went to general court-martial in fiscal year 2015, 54 cases involved an Article 32 investigating officer or PHO recommending against referring one or more sexual offense charges to court-martial and the convening authority electing to refer the charge(s) to a general court-martial despite that recommendation.[45] In all these cases, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority was to refer these charges to general court-martial.[46]

In 45 of the 54 cases in which the Article 32 investigating officer or PHO recommended against referring one or more sexual offenses to trial, the accused was ultimately acquitted of those offenses, though the accused may have been convicted of other offenses.[47]

C. Referral and Prosecutorial Discretion

Following the Article 32 preliminary hearing, the PHO's report, along with the case file and SPCMCA disposition recommendation, is forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority (GCMCA) for disposition.[48] The staff judge advocate then provides written pretrial advice to the convening authority, including a conclusion as to whether each specification states an offense under the UCMJ, whether the allegations are warranted by the evidence in the Article 32 preliminary hearing report, and whether a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the accused and offense, as well as a recommendation of what action should be taken by the convening authority.[49] A copy of the pretrial advice must be provided to the defense if the convening authority refers the case to court-martial; this is not a document covered by attorney-client privilege.[50] The GCMCA must then decide whether to refer some or all of the charges to a general court-martial.[51]

1. Rules Governing Referral of Charges. R.C.M. 601 sets forth the basis for the referral of charges to court-martial:

> If the convening authority finds or is advised by a judge advocate that there are reasonable grounds to believe that an offense triable by a court-martial has been committed and that the accused committed it, and that the specification alleges an offense, the convening authority may refer it. The finding may be based on hearsay in whole or in part. The convening authority or judge advocate may consider information from any source[.][52]

45 While all of the cases went to trial in fiscal year 2015, some went to Article 32 hearings prior to the Dec. 26, 2014, change to the Article 32 preliminary hearing and some took place after. These numbers do not reflect the total number of sexual assault cases from all of the Services that went to general court-martial in fiscal year 2015: those cases for which the JPP staff did not receive all case file documents were not included in the total.

46 The pretrial advice in 5 of the 54 case files was not available.

47 The reasons the Article 32 investigating officer or PHO stated they recommended against referral of a sexual offense specification to trial were because he or she determined there were no reasonable grounds to believe the accused committed the offenses/there was no probable cause, or because the prosecution was unlikely to prevail at trial. Under the pre-December 2014 Article 32, the investigating officer's conclusion regarding whether reasonable grounds exist to believe that the accused committed the offenses alleged must be included in his or her report. 2012 MCM, supra note 19, R.C.M 405(j)(2)(H). The new Article 32 process requires the PHO to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offenses alleged. 10 U.S.C. § 832 (UCMJ, Art. 32).

"Information from any source" may include hearsay and information not previously presented at the Article 32 hearing or to the SPCMCA. This rule states that the convening authority or judge advocate is not required to resolve legal issues, "including objections to evidence," prior to referral.[53] The written discussion for R.C.M. 601(d)(1) refers back to disposition factors from R.C.M. 306, previously discussed in the "Early Stages of Case Processing" section of this report, that the convening authority should consider in deciding whether to refer the case to court-martial.[54]

2. Legislation and U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The FY17 NDAA created a new Article 33 under the UCMJ, which directs the Secretary of Defense to issue nonbinding guidance to be considered by convening authorities and judge advocates when exercising their duties with respect to the disposition of charges.[55] The new Article 33 states that this guidance should take into account the "principles contained in official guidance of the Attorney General to attorneys for the Government with respect to disposition of Federal criminal cases."[56]

The official guidance of the Attorney General mentioned in the new Article 33 refers to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual, which specifies a probable cause standard for prosecutors in determining whether to commence or recommend prosecution or some other disposition.[57] Within this section, however, probable cause is only a threshold consideration that, if met, does not automatically warrant prosecution.[58] The manual further provides that the attorney should commence prosecution if he or she believes that the conduct constitutes a federal offense and "that the admissible evidence will probably be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction"; nevertheless, prosecution should be declined when there is no substantial federal interest in prosecution, the person is subject to prosecution in another state, or there is an adequate non-criminal alternative.[59] The discussion to this section states that "both as a matter of fundamental fairness and in the interest of efficient administration of justice, no prosecution should be initiated against any person unless the government believes that the person probably will be found guilty by an unbiased trier of fact."[60]

3. The American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Standards. Similarly, according to the American Bar Association's (ABA) Criminal Justice Standards for the Prosecution Function, a prosecutor should file and maintain criminal charges only when the charges are supported by probable cause, when "admissible evidence will be sufficient to support conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, and [when] the decision to charge is in the interests of justice."[61] These standards also state that a prosecutor may file and maintain charges "even if juries in the jurisdiction have tended to acquit persons accused of the particular kind of criminal act in question."[62]

The Air Force has implemented, in modified form, the ABA Criminal Justice Standards. In its standard for charging decisions, the Air Force rule states that charges must be supported by probable cause and that a "trial counsel should not institute or permit the continued pendency of criminal charges in the absence of admissible evidence to support a conviction."[63] The other Services have not implemented the ABA standard, though representatives from the Coast Guard and Navy noted they informally use a version of it.[64]

4. Review of Disposition Decisions. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA) contained a provision requiring that a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed, either by a higher general court-martial convening authority or by the Service Secretary, depending on the circumstances.[65] This provision, which applies only to cases in which charges have been preferred and for which the staff judge advocate has provided the convening authority with pretrial advice under Article 34 of the UCMJ, was further modified in the FY15 NDAA to require that a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed by the Service Secretary when the chief prosecutor of the Service requests such review.[66]

Responding to the JPP Subcommittee's request for information on the number of times that these elevated review provisions have been invoked, the Services provided the following:[67]

- All of the Services reported that since December 26, 2013,[68] there have been zero instances in which a Service Secretary reviewed a convening authority's decision not to refer a qualifying sex-related offense to court-martial.
- All of the Services reported that since December 19, 2014,[69] there have been zero instances in which their chief prosecutor requested that the Service Secretary review a convening authority's decision not to refer a qualifying sex-related offense to court-martial.
- Since December 26, 2013, the Services reported the following instances in which a case involving a qualifying sex-related offense was forwarded for review to the next superior commander after the general court-martial convening authority decided not to refer the case to court-martial.
  - Army: 8 cases. Of these 8 cases, there was one instance in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - Air Force: 21 cases.[70] Of these 21 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - Navy: 11 cases. Of these 11 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - Marine Corps: 11 cases. Of these 11 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - Coast Guard: 8 cases. Of these 8 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.

5. Possible Pressure on Convening Authorities to Refer Sexual Assault Cases to Courts-Martial. As noted, many trial and defense counsel interviewed by the Subcommittee during site visits mentioned their perception that convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial, in part owing to public and congressional interest in this issue. Several examples illustrate this pressure.

In late 2013, in a well-publicized case involving sexual assault allegations, a U.S. Air Force convening authority, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, following a pretrial hearing, agreed with legal advisors that the evidence was not sufficient to proceed to court-martial and dismissed the charges.[71] The acting Secretary of the Air Force then transferred the case for action to a different convening authority, 70 The Secretary of the Air Force served as the superior GCMCA in one of the 21 cases. The Secretary reviewed the case not because it met criteria for secretarial review under the provisions of FY14 NDAA § 1744 or FY15 NDAA § 541, but because she was the next superior GCMCA.

The convening authority, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, had earlier that year overturned an officer's sexual assault conviction, an act that angered many and led to legislation severely limiting a convening authority's ability to grant post-trial clemency relief in sexual assault cases.

who referred the case to a general court-martial.[72] Senator Claire McCaskill (D-MO) then called for Lieutenant General Franklin's removal from command, declaring: "Lieutenant General Franklin should not be allowed to fulfill the responsibilities of military command because he has repeatedly shown he lacks sound judgment."[73] The case eventually went to trial, and the accused was acquitted of all charges.[74] During the trial, the defense raised an unlawful command influence motion and introduced evidence that following Lieutenant General Franklin's dismissal of charges, the Air Force Judge Advocate General told Lieutenant General Franklin's staff judge advocate that failure to refer the case to trial would "place the Air Force in a difficult position with Congress" and that "absent a 'smoking gun,' victims are to be believed and their cases referred to trial."[75] Shortly thereafter, Lieutenant General Franklin announced that he would retire from the Air Force.

Also in 2013, Senator McCaskill blocked the confirmation of an Air Force convening authority, Lieutenant General Susan Helms, to the position of Air Force Space Command vice commander because she had overturned the sexual assault conviction of a member of her command.[76] Senator McCaskill expressed concerns about Lieutenant General Helms' decision, noting that it was against the advice of the staff judge advocate, who recommended that Lieutenant General Helms affirm the conviction. Senator McCaskill stated, "At a time when the military is facing a crisis of sexual assault, making a decision that sends a message which dissuades reporting of sexual assaults, supplants the finding of a jury, contradicts the advice of counsel, and further victimizes a survivor of sexual assault is unacceptable."[77]

Another source of perceived pressure came from the military's commander in chief, President Barack Obama. In May 2013, during a press conference, President Obama told reporters that those who commit sexual assault in the military should be "prosecuted, stripped of their positions, court-martialed, fired, dishonorably discharged."[78] These remarks led to defense counsel filing unlawful command influence motions in numerous courts-martial, on the grounds that the President's remarks could be interpreted by panel members as an attempt to influence the outcomes of courts-martial in sexual assault cases.[79] Lawyers argued that the President's comments could be considered unlawful command influence because they directed specific outcomes in sexual assault cases and were in conflict with the expectation that commanders exercise discretion in making disposition decisions. In an effort to blunt the negative effects of the President's remarks, the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum reiterating his and the President's expectations that those involved in the military justice process base their decisions on their independent judgment of the facts of each case, and not consider "personal

6. Site Visit Information. Counsel discussed the standard to refer a case to court-martial, which is probable cause—lower than the standard typically applied in state and federal prosecutions. Trial and defense counsel alike believe that the probable cause standard is too low and that convening authorities should be allowed to take into account other factors, such as the credibility of the victim and the likelihood of obtaining a conviction at trial. Judge advocates must hold a license with a state bar to practice law. Because the codes of ethics required by many state bars include standards for prosecution comparable to the United States Attorney's Manual and ABA Standards discussed above, several counsel expressed concern that they may be violating their state bar ethical rules by prosecuting cases in which they feel the charges are not supported by probable cause or in which there is no reasonable likelihood of proving the charges at trial.

Judge advocates overwhelmingly reported a perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, regardless of merit. According to many of the judge advocates interviewed on site visits, this pressure extends to weak cases that civilian jurisdictions would not prosecute and, in some cases, have already declined to prosecute. The vast majority of prosecutors and defense counsel who spoke with the Subcommittee have the impression that this pressure causes convening authorities to favor referral to court-martial rather than deal with the potential adverse ramifications of not referring a sexual assault case, such as career setbacks, media scrutiny, the possibility of their non-referral decisions being subjected to elevated review, or questions about why the case was not referred. These lawyers suspect that commanders may feel that the act of sending a case to trial, regardless of merit, is perceived as "safe" and harmless with respect to the parties involved and the justice system as a whole.

A commander (O-6) interviewed on a site visit told the Subcommittee that he forwards every sexual assault case to the next general officer in the chain of command for disposition decision, "because I would not want to get it wrong and have someone get away, so I send it forward to let the system sort it out." When asked what, if any, pressure is on commanders to handle sexual assault cases a certain way, one commander replied that he felt the need to "do something immediately" or face harm to his career. Another commander felt that there was pressure to be transparent throughout the process, rather than pressure to send every case to court-martial.

The discussion to R.C.M. 306(b) states that one of the factors a commander should consider when disposing of a case is the views of the victim regarding disposition.[81] Many counsel conveyed their perception that the merits of the case have become less important than the victim's preference regarding disposition. The rationale for referring some cases to court-martial provided by some prosecutors and commanders is that the court-martial process allows the victim to have his or her "day in court," which was described as a laudable end in itself, regardless of outcome. One commander acknowledged that there is pressure to go to trial if the victim wants to go to trial, regardless of the case's merits.

In addition, trial and defense counsel explained that in their experience guilty plea agreements, in which the defendant agrees to plead guilty to some or all charges in exchange for a lesser sentence, will not be approved by commanders if the victim does not support it. Likewise, the common perception among judge advocates is that a victim has veto power over whether the commander prefers to dispose of a case in an alternate forum, such as through administrative separation proceedings or nonjudicial punishment.

7. Information Presented to the JPP and Subcommittee. Reflecting the same view that the Subcommittee members heard during site visits, counsel speaking at a JPP public hearing also expressed concern about the low threshold of probable cause required to refer a case to court-martial. In the view of a senior defense counsel, the changes to the Article 32, combined with this low threshold to refer cases, result in sexual assault cases being referred when there is no chance for conviction, an outcome that causes both the accused and victim to suffer needlessly.[82] He further compared the military justice system to the civilian justice system, in which experienced prosecutors have the discretion to bring a case to trial, or not, based on the state of the evidence.[83] Another senior defense counsel similarly suggested that prosecutors and convening authorities in the military should exercise more discretion in referring cases to trial, much as state and federal prosecutors do, and refer cases to trial only when the evidence is sufficient to secure a conviction.[84]

A senior defense counsel told the JPP that the pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial is very high. No convening authority wants to fail to refer a sexual assault case to court only to have it determined later that there was additional evidence and the case should have been tried by court-martial.[85]

In January 2017, the JPP Subcommittee held a hearing on the standards currently applied by military prosecutors and heard from ethics officials and senior prosecutors from the Services. Participants highlighted the differences between the military and civilian justice systems, noting that the goal of the military system is not only to promote justice but also to maintain good order and discipline. In the military justice system, prosecutorial discretion is vested in convening authorities, rather than prosecutors.[86] However, all the Services have adopted some version of ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 3.8, which states that prosecutors have an ethical obligation to ensure that all charges are supported by probable cause.[87] If the situation arises in which a prosecutor believes a charge is not supported by probable cause, but his or her supervising attorney disagrees, ethical rules allow the junior attorney to rely on the supervising attorney's "reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty."[88] One presenter noted that in the previous seven years, his Service's ethics office had yet to have a trial counsel call with concerns about prosecuting a case without probable cause—an indication, he believes, that the counsel are working this out with their supervisors.[89]

One counsel described a dilemma in which prosecutors can find themselves when dealing with some sexual assault cases, giving the example of a sexual assault that occurs when the victim is too intoxicated to consent to sexual activity. If the offense is charged under the theory that the victim is incapable of consenting due to intoxication, guilt may be difficult to prove when there is evidence that the victim was walking, talking, texting, and performing other activities close in time to when the alleged assault occurred. On the other hand, if the offense is charged under the "bodily harm" theory of sexual assault, prosecutors will have problems when the victim does not recall what happened because of his or her intoxication, making it difficult to prove that the touching was offensive. In this situation, it can be difficult to establish probable cause.[90] In such cases, he explained, sometimes the prosecutor cannot establish probable cause, but the victim believes she was sexually assaulted and tells the convening authority that she wants the case to go to trial.[91] In these situations, they rely on the prosecution merit review of the case, using the R.C.M. 306 factors listed above, to persuade the convening authority that the evidence is not supported by probable cause.[92] In addition, Article 34, UCMJ, states that the convening authority cannot refer a charge to a general court-martial if advised in writing by the staff judge advocate that the specification is not warranted by the evidence.[93] According to the counsel, Navy prosecutors look not only at whether there is probable cause but at whether there is a reasonable probability of success at trial.[94] He told the Subcommittee that they have been successful in convincing convening authorities to use this higher standard in deciding whether to refer cases.[95]

Another counsel told the Subcommittee that once probable cause is established, counsel are compelled to go forward with a case even when they do not believe there is reasonable likelihood of success at trial.[96] Several counsel emphasized that there are cases in which conviction at trial seems unlikely, but they go forward to trial because "it is the right thing to do."[97]

8. Data on Referral Decisions. The JPP staff collected sexual assault courts-martial information and case documents from fiscal year 2015 from the Services and entered this information into an electronic database. The data from fiscal year 2015 encompassed 738 cases, all of which involved at least one preferred charge of a sexual offense. Dr. Cassia Spohn, Foundation Professor and Director, School of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Arizona State University, then analyzed these data, producing the following statistical information.[98]

According to the FY 2015 data, for sexual assault cases that went to courts-martial, 79% were referred to a general court-martial, 13% were referred to a special court-martial, and 7% were referred to a summary court-martial. In 52% of the cases referred to courts-martial, a military judge was the factfinder; 40% went to a panel of members; and 7% went to a summary court-martial officer.[99]

98 Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses Reported to the Military Services in 2015, Cassia Spohn, PhD, School of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Arizona State University (Apr. 2017), available at http://jpp.whs.mil/Public/docs/03_Topic-Areas/07-CM_Trends_Analysis/20170407/20170407_Spohn_NarrativeReport_FY15Cases.pdf.

99 This data was rounded to the nearest whole number and does not add up to 100 percent.

For cases in which the accused was charged with at least one penetrative offense (rape, aggravated sexual assault, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these offenses), 28% were convicted of a sexual assault offense,[100] 22% were convicted of a non-sex offense only, and 21% were acquitted of all charges. Another 14% of cases received an alternate disposition,[101] and 15% had all charges dismissed prior to trial.[102]

For cases in which the accused was charged with at least one sexual contact offense (aggravated sexual contact, abusive sexual contact, wrongful sexual contact, and attempts to commit these offenses), 18% were convicted of a sexual contact offense, 41% were convicted of a non-sex offense only, and 13% were acquitted of all charges. Another 22% of cases received an alternate disposition, and 6% had all charges dismissed prior to trial.

FY15 – Case Outcomes by Most Serious Sexual Assault Offense Preferred

Penetrative offense (530 cases)	Number	Percent (%)
Convicted of a sexual offense	150	28%
Convicted of a non-sex offense	114	22%
Acquitted of all charges	113	21%
Alternate disposition/dismissal	153	29%
Contact offense (208 cases)
Convicted of a contact offense	37	18%
Convicted of a non-sex offense	85	41%
Acquitted of all charges	27	13%
Alternate disposition/dismissal	59	28%

Dr. Spohn also calculated conviction and acquittal rates for sexual assault cases that were tried at court-martial (excluding cases that went to alternate disposition or had charges dismissed prior to trial). For cases in which the most serious offense tried was a penetrative offense, 40% resulted in convictions of a sexual assault offense, 30% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 30% resulted in acquittal of all charges.

For cases in which the most serious sex offense tried at court-martial was a sexual contact offense, 25% resulted in convictions of a sexual contact offense, 57% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 18% resulted in acquittal of all charges.

100 The vast majority of these cases were convicted of a penetrative offense.

101 Alternate dispositions primarily consist of resignation or administrative discharge in lieu of trial by court-martial. These resignations or discharges usually include an adverse service characterization.

102 For this "all charges dismissed prior to trial" category, the JPP staff does not have information on whether these cases resulted in the accused receiving nonjudicial punishment, administrative action, or no punishment.

Acquitted of all charges	27	18%

Annual reports from the Service Judge Advocates General to the Code Committee provide some courts-martial data, though they do not provide specific information on sexual assault courts-martial. In the Fiscal Year 2015 Annual Report, the Army and Navy indicated that while their courts-martial caseload had declined from previous years, the percentage of contested cases remained constant or increased.[103] In that report, the Marine Corps stated that between 2012 and 2014, the number of contested sexual assault cases more than tripled. Their number of contested sexual assault cases in fiscal year 2015 was below that of fiscal year 2013 and 2014, but it was more than twice that of fiscal year 2012.[104]

III. ADDITIONAL ISSUES

A. Prosecutors' Lack of Access to the Victim. Victims with appointed SVCs/VLCs are likely to permit fewer interviews with prosecutors (and investigators) than victims without counsel.[105] Furthermore, when victims do agree to meet with prosecutors, the interviews are often in the presence of a SVC/VLC, who sometimes object to various questions and prevent those interviews from being as probing as they might otherwise be. Investigators also pointed out that few victims grant investigators access to their personal cell phones, which typically contain a wealth of evidence. SVCs/VLCs consistently reported that they do advise victims against sharing information from their phones or social media accounts with investigators. No prosecutors who acknowledged being denied access to the victim's cell phone during interviews indicated that they had considered not prosecuting the case. Prosecutors frequently lamented the loss of rapport-building opportunities because victims now are represented by SVCs/VLCs, even though they appreciated that victims' counsel provide valuable advice and guidance and relieve trial counsel of some of the time burden of helping victims navigate the legal system.

Defense counsel access to victims is discussed in the Subcommittee of the Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, supra note 2.

B. Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Training. Most sexual assault response coordinators and victim advocates who spoke with Subcommittee members acknowledged that misperceptions persist throughout the military regarding the consumption of alcohol and lack of consent, specifically that the consumption of any amount of alcohol makes a person incapable of consenting to sexual activity. Sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs) and victim advocates (VAs) stated they do not currently instruct Service members that "one beer means a person cannot consent." Instead, they emphasize to their audiences that having sex with an intoxicated person has risks and that determining intoxication can be difficult. At some installations, judge advocates stated they review the training materials or assist with the SAPR training to ensure information on this topic is relayed correctly. The Subcommittee viewed this as a positive development.

Commanders who spoke to the Subcommittee consistently expressed concerns about the frequency of mandatory SAPR training, describing it as time-consuming and potentially counterproductive because of perceived "training fatigue." One worried that the Sexual Harassment and Assault Response and Prevention (SHARP) classes and safety briefings are so repetitive that Service members may "tune out" the message.

In the view of some practitioners, SAPR training has become so pervasive that it affects the judgment and selection of potential panel members.[106] Counsel in the Army pointed out that every battalion-sized unit designates a noncommissioned officer (NCO) as the unit's VA, a collateral responsibility that requires specialized training on the topic of sexual assault from a victim-centric perspective. These senior NCOs, along with the other officer or enlisted members on a court-martial panel, have been instructed about the behavior that constitutes sexual assault so many times in SHARP briefings that they have strong opinions about the law. Consequently, counsel find it difficult to correct misperceptions and educate members on the nuances of the law and the burden of proof required at courts-martial.

A defense counsel providing information to the JPP at the January 2017 public meeting stated that in her experience, court-martial panel members, after years of SAPRO training, are "predisposed to believe the victims and misinterpret the legal definition of consent and mistake of fact as to consent."[107] The perception persists, in her view, that if a person is drinking, he or she cannot consent to sexual contact. She further noted that the voir dire process at trial does not completely expose the biases of potential panel members.[108]

Bolstering this point, in a September 2016 Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals decision involving an erroneous jury instruction on the definition of "impairment" in a sexual assault case,[109]

106 See Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel 37, supra note 4 ("Response System Panel Recommendation 80: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries ensure prevention programs address concerns about unlawful command influence. In particular, commanders and leaders must ensure sexual assault prevention and response training programs and other initiatives do not create perceptions among those who may serve as panel members at courts-martial that commanders expect particular findings and/or sentences at trials or compromise an accused Service member's presumption of innocence, right to fair investigation and disposition, and access to witnesses or evidence. Judge advocates with knowledge and expertise in criminal law should review sexual assault prevention training materials to ensure the materials neither taint potential panel members (military jurors) nor present inaccurate legal information.").

109 United States v. Newlan, No. 201400409 at 23 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. Sep. 13, 2016). The Court set forth a definition for "impairment" in such cases: "'Impairment' is the state of being damaged, weakened or diminished. Impairment rendering someone 'incapable of consenting' is that level of impairment which is sufficient to deprive him or her of the cognitive ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct in question or the physical or mental ability to make or to communicate a the court found that many members of the panel received training from SAPR personnel that "if someone ingested any alcohol, that individual was no longer able to legally consent."[110] The court stated:

> We first note that the erroneous definition of "impairment" may have compounded the legally-inaccurate proposition—that "one drink means you can't consent"—that some members received while attending mandatory SAPR training. While likely well-intentioned, these statements made during training generated a significant risk of skewing the panel's understanding of legal consent. Though these members were generally instructed to "not use [or discuss] anything you learned during SAPR training . . . in evaluating the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses in this case," a more tightly tailored and prompt statement of the law would have ameliorated any prejudicial impact generated by the legally-erroneous SAPR training. Since such a statement was not provided, we are not convinced that any confusion created by the SAPR training was wholly eradicated and that it did not contribute to the subsequent prejudice resulting from the incorrect definition of "impairment."[111]

C. Expedited Transfers. A Department of Defense policy familiar to all site visit participants provides sexual assault victims who file an unrestricted report of sexual assault the opportunity to receive an expedited transfer to another installation or to another unit within the same installation, on request.[112] One goal of this policy is to move the victim to a new location where no one knows of the sexual assault and where the victim need not confront the perpetrator on a regular basis and will have adequate support of family, friends, or counseling.[113] SVCs/VLCs draft the requests on behalf of victims, and send them to commanders. The victims often are able to select the location to which they will transfer. DoD policy also allows a commander to transfer the alleged offender, rather than the victim.[114] No participants discussed whether this option amounted to unlawful pretrial punishment in the context of a pending court-martial, but a Subcommittee member raised the issue. Commanders and a few victims' counsel indicated that commanders approve even questionable transfer requests to avoid accusations of reprisal against or mistreatment of a victim.

Some commanders, victims' counsel, and defense counsel believe that the expedited transfer policy is being abused by some individuals who make sexual assault allegations to obtain favorable transfers. Some participants have observed victims on very large installations of more than 50,000 Service members refuse to transfer to other units on the installation, preferring instead to request transfer to what are considered more favorable locations, such as Hawaii or San Diego. At another installation decision regarding that conduct to another person."

You may—the person would not be in the proper frame of mind to provide that consent."; "When a person is impaired, they are unable to give consent, regardless of what they say at the time."; I viewed that as part of the training . . . that for someone to consent] they just should not be impaired."; "A person impaired by alcohol use is incapable of giving sexual consent."; "You need sober consent, per the brief."; "If there is alcohol involved, then there is no consent."; "if a person was under the influence of alcohol, even one drink, that person is not able to give consent to any sexual act."; "If a person has one drink of alcohol, they may be considered impaired, therefore, they may not be able to give consent."; "once the victim has had one drink, there is no longer a legal consent."

considered to be a "good" location, with an appealing climate and with metropolitan areas nearby, counsel noted that they see relatively few requests for expedited transfers. Expedited transfers by victims to more favorable locations may lead to defense counsel challenging the victim's motives during a court-martial, arguing to the panel that the victim made a false allegation of sexual assault to receive a transfer to a more desirable location. Such cross-examination, in turn, may cause panel members to question the victim's credibility and possibly acquit the accused.

IV. CONSEQUENCES

A. Site Visit Information. At all the site visits, most trial and defense counsel questioned whether justice is being served by the panoply of reforms in place. Many of them believe that fundamental rights of due process have been undermined. In their view, convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, regardless of the likelihood of securing a conviction. Many also feel that the military's emphasis on prosecuting sexual assault has led to criminalizing behavior that may be offensive and inappropriate, but would not be considered criminal in a civilian context. They also expressed concern that minor offenses are now being referred to court-martial that could be more appropriately resolved through nonjudicial punishment or administrative action. There is widespread consensus among prosecutors and defense counsel that the victim's wish regarding disposition of a case is the primary factor determining whether the case will go to court, and that evidentiary concerns, including the credibility of the victim, are given less consideration. Defense counsel perceive that false accusations are now more likely to make it through the system and, as a result, innocent people face allegations that could ruin their lives. To illustrate this point, one defense counsel described how several of his clients, under the immense psychological pressure of facing court-martial for sexual assault, submitted a request for discharge in lieu of trial, even though they claimed they were innocent—and even though a request for discharge in lieu of trial requires an acknowledgment of guilt and stigmatizing notations in their discharge paperwork.

Site visit participants identified a number of negative consequences of what they perceive as too many sexual assault allegations being referred to trial:

1. Practitioners universally described the acquittal rate in their jurisdiction as "high," in part due to the referral to court-martial of cases that lack merit. The acquittal percentages offered at one installation ranged from about 50% to 100%, significantly higher than the sexual offense acquittal rates seen in civilian jurisdictions.

2. Prosecutors and investigators must devote significant time to prosecuting less meritorious cases, which divert resources away from more serious and well-supported allegations.

3. Some prosecutors feel that they face a potential ethical quandary in trying cases in which they see no reasonable likelihood of conviction.

4. The low conviction rate tends to discredit the entire military justice system in the eyes of Service members and the general public.

5. As more cases flood the system, the time needed to take each case to trial increases.

6. When weak cases linger in the system pending trial, the accused's and the victim's careers and lives remain on hold until the case is resolved.

B. Information Presented to the JPP. One senior defense counsel told the JPP, "The lack of a thorough pre-trial investigation and prosecutorial discretion combined with the nature of acquaintance sexual assaults and the new incentives to fabricate [allegations] are a recipe for wrongful convictions."[115] She stated that despite changes to the system that favor victims and the prosecution, defense counsel are achieving more acquittals than ever before in sexual assault cases. She further observed, however, that the high acquittal rate demonstrates that many of the cases being "pushed through the system" should not be at court-martial and that, although the accused in these cases is often found not guilty, the trial process incurs "a real cost to the accused's life, reputation, family and career."[116] In her view, "the sands have shifted in favor of the victim at the expense of the accused."[117] Another defense counsel expressed his opinion that because of the changes in the military justice system, the rights of the accused to due process and a speedy trial are being eroded.[118] He noted that cases are lingering for as long as two years from report until the case goes to trial, putting the accused's and victim's life on hold for a significant period of time.[119]

V. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

It appears that recent sexual assault legislation and policy changes that have benefited sexual assault victims and made the military justice system less intimidating to them have also had some negative consequences that must be addressed. These changes have affected the perceived legitimacy of the justice system. While legislative changes have substantially reduced the number of victims who testify at Article 32 hearings and have clarified that this hearing is not intended to be a discovery mechanism for the defense, there has been no corresponding new legislation or policy to provide defense counsel access to important case information.[120] In addition, changes in the military justice system, such as the addition of SVCs/VLCs, have greatly benefitted sexual assault victims and given them a much-needed voice in the system. Some defense counsel, however, feel this unfairly tips the scales of justice against the defendant. Also, when SVC/VLC limit a prosecutor's access to the victim, it may adversely affect case outcomes. SVC/VLC must understand that in spite of their laudable intentions, they may inadvertently harm a victim's goals or interests by weakening the criminal case, thereby increasing the chances of an acquittal at trial.

The consensus among counsel interviewed during the installation site visits was that the combination of a less robust Article 32 process, pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial, and the low standard of probable cause for referring cases to courts-martial has led to cases being referred to courts-martial in which there is little chance for a conviction. Many counsel felt that the result has been a high acquittal rate in sexual assault cases, which, in turn, has caused military members to question the fairness of the military justice system. In addition, some counsel worried that when the word gets around that sexual assault cases are going to courts-martial supported only by weak evidence, military juries may be much more skeptical of the charges and the prosecution and thus may be more likely to acquit. Perhaps inevitably, as Service members become aware of weak cases and high acquittal rates, victims may become more reluctant to make unrestricted reports.

120 The Subcommittee of the Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, supra note 2, highlights significant due process issues regarding defense counsel and makes four recommendations, including that defense counsel be provided with independent investigators, that defense offices be appropriately staffed and resourced, and that expert witness approval and funding be vested in Service defense organizations. The Subcommittee's report and recommendations were approved, with modifications, by the JPP. The Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases is available at http://jpp.whs.mil/Public/docs/08-Panel_Reports/06_JPP_Defense_Resources_Experience_Report_Final_20170424.pdf.

Even when Article 32 officers have recommended against the referral of charges, those recommendations are not always followed by convening authorities. A substantial sampling of sexual assault cases tried in fiscal year 2015 reveal 54 cases in which the convening authority referred charges despite Article 32 investigating officers or PHOs finding that there was no probable cause or advising against the referral of sexual assault charges. In 45 of those cases, the accused was acquitted of the charges at trial, a number suggesting that perhaps the staff judge advocates and convening authorities should have paid more attention to the Article 32 officers' recommendations.

While most counsel now view the Article 32 process as having little value for scrutinizing the evidence in a sexual assault case, there has yet to emerge a formal written process for ensuring that the convening authority is made fully aware of the strengths and weaknesses of a case and has guidance for deciding an appropriate disposition. There are often good reasons, such as maintaining good order and discipline and respecting a belief that the assault took place, to refer a case to court-martial even when the likelihood of acquittal is high. But a convening authority should not be forced to make the critical decision about referral, with its life-changing impact on both the victim and the defendant, without clear guidelines and a better sense of the evidence's strength. Convening authorities must be corrected if they erroneously believe that a decision to refer a case to court-martial will have few consequences for the accused, the victim, or the public's perception of the military justice system. An accused facing court-martial is exposed to numerous adverse career and personal consequences, such as loss of promotion and career advancement opportunities, ostracism by peers, and the ongoing stress of knowing that a federal conviction, confinement, and sex offender registration are possible. Even if ultimately acquitted, the accused often suffers the enduring social and professional stigma of simply having been accused of these reprehensible offenses.

Recent legislation directing the Secretary of Defense to issue nonbinding guidance to be considered by convening authorities and staff judge advocates in determining an appropriate case disposition may help meet this need. Such formal case disposition guidance, in written form, should provide convening authorities with additional considerations, beyond whether the charges are supported by probable cause, as they decide whether to refer a case to court-martial or to resolve it through disposition at some lower level.

Several prosecutors discussed their practice in sexual assault cases of producing a prosecution merits memo to lay out the strengths and weaknesses of the evidence and the likelihood of a conviction at trial, thereby aiding the staff judge advocate and convening authority in making an appropriate decision on disposition. While this seems like a useful tool to fill the void left when a more robust Article 32 process was replaced, it is worth noting that under Article 34 of the UCMJ and under R.C.M. 406, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority and accompanying documents must be provided to the defense if charges are referred to trial. A prosecution merits memo detailing evidentiary problems can go to the staff judge advocate without also being given to the defense, but any information provided in writing to the convening authority with the pretrial advice presumably must then be provided to the defense if charges are referred. This legal requirement may make staff judge advocates and prosecutors reluctant to write such candid memos to the convening authority for fear of disclosing a case's evidentiary problems to the defense. There is no such parallel in civilian jurisdictions, where information provided by a prosecutor to his or her superiors would not have to be provided to the defense counsel unless it revealed potentially exculpatory evidence (as also must be done by military prosecutors). More research and thought should be devoted to enabling the convening authority in the military justice system to be given enough information to make a proper decision, since the convening authority, like prosecutors in civilian jurisdictions, are responsible for determining which cases are prosecuted and which are not.

On site visits, counsel also discussed their perception that convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial regardless of their merits. Counsel are concerned that cases are being sent to courts-martial even when the evidence is weak or the allegations involve less serious conduct, such as an attempted kiss or slap on the buttocks, that could be resolved through nonjudicial punishment or administrative action. The Subcommittee notes, however, that in the fiscal year 2015 case data collected from the Services, convening authorities either dismissed charges prior to trial or disposed of cases by alternative means in almost 30% of all cases in which charges were preferred. Without knowing the facts of these cases, we cannot draw conclusions about why they were not referred to trial. But these data do reveal that while convening authorities may be experiencing pressure to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, they are declining to do so almost 30% of the time. In addition, it may be that convening authorities are referring more sexual assault cases to courts-martial not because of outside pressure but because they now take sexual assault cases more seriously than they had done in the past and feel that disposition by courts-martial is the most appropriate way to resolve these grave allegations. So long as statutory language requires elevated review of a convening authority's decision not to refer a sexual assault case to court-martial, however, convening authorities will always feel some pressure to refer cases to trial against their better judgment.

Counsels' perceptions of a high acquittal rate for sexual assault offenses are borne out by the data. Among cases referred to courts-martial in fiscal year 2015, only 40% of the cases involving a penetrative sexual assault offense resulted in a conviction of any type of sexual assault offense. Just 25% of sexual contact cases resulted in conviction for any sexual offense. While the conviction rate is higher when convictions for non-sex offenses are included, the acquittal rate for sexual assault offenses is significant.

Although the JPP Subcommittee does not have the time to continue investigating the potential causes of this high acquittal rate, this issue must be explored further. The Subcommittee notes that the authorizing legislation for the JPP's successor panel, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, requires the panel to conduct an ongoing review of cases involving sexual misconduct allegations.[121]

The inherent difficulties in evaluating sexual assault case evidence, combined with the widespread perception that convening authorities are referring weak cases, have led to the belief by many of the Subcommittee's interviewees that the military justice system is weighted against the accused in sexual assault cases. Such one-sidedness is particularly serious in light of the potentially catastrophic effects of being accused of a sexual crime. The high rate of acquittal in military sexual assault cases can feed into this perception and lead to a general mistrust of the military justice system, which may lead Service members to acquit when they serve on panels in sexual assault courts-martial.

The public may view the high acquittal rate as a result not of the more aggressive approach to sexual offense prosecution described in the site visits but of the military's indifference to sexual assault. Public loss of confidence in the military and the military justice system has the potential to harm military enlistment and officer accession rates, as well as retention rates. In short, there must be a balance—a system that treats sexual assault victims fairly and compassionately and that also provides defendants with procedures that are perceived to be, and are, fair. It is not the accused alone who suffers when a sexual assault case for which there is little chance of winning a conviction is referred to court-martial—the victim is also forced to endure a lengthy, difficult process at whose end the accused is very likely to be found not guilty.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Recommendation 1: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP no longer serves a useful purpose. Such a review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of the preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be binding on the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further changes to the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP Subcommittee reiterates its recommendation— presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, and adopted by the JPP—that the defense be provided with independent investigators.

Recommendation 2: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Article 33, UCMJ, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates require the following standard for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the disposition guidance require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor. These factors should be considered in their totality, with no single factor determining the outcome.

Recommendation 3: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that after case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

Recommendation 4: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. The DAC-IPAD should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should consider whether such a change would allow the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed, candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

Recommendation 5: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Congress repeal provisions from the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary. The perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial created by these provisions and the consequent negative effects on the military justice system are more harmful than the problems that such provisions were originally intended to address.

Recommendation 6: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

Recommendation 7: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense ensure that SVCs/VLCs receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing full access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of a meaningful victim-prosecutor relationship in the advice they provide their victim-clients and assist prosecutors in sufficiently developing the rapport with the victim needed to fully prepare for trial.

Recommendation 8: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent continue to affect court-martial panel members.

Recommendation 9: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be changed to state that when possible, sexual assault victims should be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation. This change will help ensure that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial, will satisfy the need to separate the victim from the accused, and will maintain the victim's access to support systems while combating the perception that the ability to ask for these transfers has encouraged fraudulent claims of sexual assault. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should all receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can foster the perception among military members that the expedited transfer system is being abused and in how such transfers can be used by defense counsel to cast doubt on the victim's credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD review data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

SECTION 576. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(a) INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS REQUIRED.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS SINCE FISCAL YEAR 2012 AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of Defense shall establish a panel to conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the Uniform Code of Military Justice by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112–81; 125 Stat. 1404) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANELS.

(1) COMPOSITION.

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have also served on the panel established under subsection (a)(1).

(2) QUALIFICATIONS.—The members of each panel shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Forces, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes.

(3) CHAIR.—The chair of each panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the panel.

(4) PERIOD OF APPOINTMENT; VACANCIES.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the panel. Any vacancy in a panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(5) DEADLINE FOR APPOINTMENTS.—

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—All original appointments to the panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be made before the termination date of the panel established under subsection (a)(1), but no later than 30 days before the termination date.

(6) MEETINGS.—A panel shall meet at the call of the chair.

(7) FIRST MEETING.—The chair shall call the first meeting of a panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the panel.

(c) REPORTS AND DURATION.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(A) FIRST REPORT.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit a first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes the panel considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives not later than 180 days after the first meeting of the panel.

(B) SUBSEQUENT REPORTS.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

(C) TERMINATION.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

(d) DUTIES OF PANELS.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall perform the following duties:

(A) Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice that were enacted by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112– 81; 125 Stat. 1404).

(B) Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.

(C) Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.

(D) Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required by subsection (c)(2) and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.

(E) Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

(F) Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.

(G) Building on the data compiled as a result of paragraph (1)(D), assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.

(H) Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act.

(I) Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases.

(J) Consider such other matters and materials as the panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

(3) UTILIZATION OF OTHER STUDIES.—In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, a panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies.

(e) AUTHORITY OF PANELS.—

(1) HEARINGS.—A panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the panel considers appropriate to carry out its duties under this section.

(2) INFORMATION FROM FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Upon request by the chair of a panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the panel considers necessary to carry out its duties under this section.

(f) PERSONNEL MATTERS.—

(1) PAY OF MEMBERS.—Members of a panel shall serve without pay by reason of their work on the panel.

(2) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The members of a panel shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance or services for the panel.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2014

SEC. 1731. INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS OF UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES.

(b) ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(1) ADDITIONAL ASSESSMENTS SPECIFIED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under subsection (a)(2) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall conduct the following:

(A) An assessment of the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.

(B) An assessment of the implementation and effect of section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, and make such recommendations for modification of such section 1044e as the judicial proceedings panel considers appropriate.

(C) An assessment of the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1705, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(D) An assessment of the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:

(i) Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.

(ii) Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

(iii) Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

(2) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the assessments required by paragraph (1) in one of the reports required by subsection (c)(2)(B) of section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013.

SEC. 545. ADDITIONAL DUTIES FOR JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.

(a) ADDITIONAL DUTIES IMPOSED.—The independent panel established by the Secretary of Defense under section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1758), known as the "judicial proceedings panel", shall perform the following additional duties:

(1) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the impact of the use of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), by the accused during the preliminary hearing conducted under section 832 of such title (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings.

(2) Conduct a review and assessment regarding the establishment of a privilege under the Military Rules of Evidence against the disclosure of communications between—

(A) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe Helpline; and

(B) users of and personnel staffing of the 26 Department of Defense Safe Help Room.

(b) SUBMISSION OF RESULTS.—The judicial proceedings panel shall include the results of the reviews and assessments conducted under subsection (a) in one of the reports required by section 576(c)(2)(B) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 (Public Law 112–239; 126 Stat. 1760).

SEC. 546. DEFENSE ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION, PROSECUTION, AND DEFENSE OF SEXUAL ASSAULT IN THE ARMED FORCES

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

1. Committee's Official Designation: The committee shall be known as the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel ("the Judicial Proceedings Panel").

2. Authority: The Secretary of Defense, as required by section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 ("the FY 2013 NDAA") (Public Law 112-239), as modified by section 1731(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 ("the FY 2014 NDAA") (Public Law 113-66), and in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA) (5 U.S.C., Appendix, as amended) and 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.50(a), established the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

3. Objectives and Scope of Activities: The Judicial Proceedings Panel will conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the UCMJ by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 ("the FY 2012 NDAA") (Public Law 112-81) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

4. Description of Duties: Section 576(d)(2) directs the Judicial Proceedings Panel to perform the following duties, with additional duties as added by section 1731(b)(1) of the FY 2014 NDAA:
   a. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the UCMJ that were enacted by section 541 of the FY 2012 NDAA.
   b. Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.
   c. Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.
   d. Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.
   e. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the UCMJ), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

f. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.
g. Building on the data compiled as a result of the assessment conducted by the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("the Response Systems Panel"), a Federal advisory committee established pursuant to section 576(a)(1) of the FY 2013 NDAA and in accordance with FACA, of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.
h. Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by Section 573 of the FY 2013 NDAA.
i. Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the UCMJ in certain sexual assault cases.
j. Assess the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the UCMJ), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.
k. Assess the implementation and effect of the Special Victim's Counsel for victims of sex-related offenses established by the Secretary of Defense on August 14, 2013 and codified in Section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, by the enactment of Section 1716 of the FY 2014 NDAA on December 26, 2013. The panel shall make such recommendations for modifications of section 1044e as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate.
l. Assess the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the UCMJ), as added by section 1705 of the FY 2014 NDAA, which requires at a minimum, that upon a finding of guilt for the offenses of rape, sexual assault, rape and sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit such acts, the punishment include dismissal or dishonorable discharge, except as provided for by Article 60 of the UCMJ, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ).
m. Assess the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:
    i. Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.
    ii. Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the UCMJ).

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

iii. Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

n. Consider such other matters and materials as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, the Judicial Proceedings Panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies. The Judicial Proceedings Panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as it considers appropriate to carry out its duties. Upon request by the Chair of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers necessary to carry out its duties.

5. Agency or Official to Whom the Committee Reports: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall provide its first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes it considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense through the Department of Defense (DoD) General Counsel (GC), and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives, not later than 180 days after its first meeting. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

6. Support: The DoD, through the DoD Office of General Counsel (DoD OGC), the Washington Headquarters Services, and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, shall provide staffing and resources as deemed necessary for the performance of the Judicial Proceedings Panel's functions, and shall ensure compliance with the requirements of the FACA, the Government in the Sunshine Act of 1976 ("the Sunshine Act") (5 U.S.C. § 552b, as amended), governing federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures. Primary responsibility for such staffing and resourcing may not be assigned to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

7. Estimated Annual Operating Costs and Staff Years: The estimated annual operating cost, to include travel, meetings, and contract support, is approximately $4,000,000 and 15 full-time equivalents.

8. Designated Federal Officer: The Designated Federal Officer (DFO), pursuant to DoD policy, shall be a full-time or permanent part-time DoD employee, and shall be appointed in accordance with governing DoD policies and procedures.

In addition, the Judicial Proceedings Panel's DFO is required to be in attendance at all meetings of the Panel and its subcommittees for the entire duration of each and every meeting. However, in the absence of the DFO, the Alternate DFO, duly appointed to the Judicial Proceedings Panel according to DoD policies and procedures, shall attend the entire duration of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittee meetings.

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

The DFO, or the Alternate DFO, shall approve all of the meetings of the Judicial Proceedings Panel as called by the Chair; shall call all meetings of its subcommittees, in coordination with the Chair; prepare and approve all meeting agendas for the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittees; and adjourn any meeting when the DFO or the Alternate DFO determines adjournment to be in the public's interest or required by governing regulations or DoD policies and procedures.

9. Estimated Number and Frequency of Meetings: Consistent with sections 576(b)(6) and (7) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at the call of the Chair, and the Chair shall call the first meeting of the Judicial Proceedings Panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at a minimum once per year.

10. Duration: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall remain in effect until terminated, as provided for and as required by section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA; however, the charter is subject to renewal every two years.

11. Termination: According to section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

12. Membership and Designation: Pursuant to sections 576(b)(1)(B) and (b)(2), the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have served on the Response Systems Panel.

    The members shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Force, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes. The Chair shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

    Members shall be appointed for the life of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, subject to annual renewals. Any vacancy on the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Panel members shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as special government employee (SGE) members. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, Judicial Proceedings Panel members shall serve without compensation.

    The DoD GC, according to DoD policies and procedures, may select experts and consultants as subject matter experts under the authority of 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to advise the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees; these individuals do not count toward the Judicial Proceedings Panel's total membership nor do they have voting privileges. In addition, these subject matter experts shall not participate in any deliberations dealing with the substantive matters before the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees nor shall they participate in any voting.

13. Subcommittees: The Department, when necessary and consistent with the Judicial Proceedings Panel's mission and DoD policies and procedures, may establish subcommittees, task groups, or working groups to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel. Establishment of subcommittees will be based upon a written determination, to include terms of reference, by the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, or the DoD GC.

    These subcommittees shall not work independently of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and shall report all of their recommendations and advice to the Judicial Proceedings Panel for full deliberation and discussion. Subcommittees have no authority to make decisions and recommendations, verbally or in writing, on behalf of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. No subcommittee or any of its members may update or report directly to the DoD or any Federal officers or employees.

    The Secretary of Defense shall appoint subcommittee members even if the member in question is already a member of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. All subcommittee appointments shall be subject to annual renewal. Such individuals, if not full-time or part-time government personnel, shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as SGE members. Those individuals who are full-time or permanent part-time Federal employees shall be appointed pursuant to 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.130(a) as RGE members. Subcommittee members shall serve for the life of the subcommittee. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, subcommittee members shall serve without compensation.

    All subcommittees operate pursuant to the provisions of FACA, the Sunshine Act, governing Federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures.

14. Recordkeeping: The records of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and its subcommittees shall be handled according to section 2, General Records Schedule 26, and appropriate Department of Defense policies and procedures. These records shall be available for public inspection and copying, subject to the Freedom of Information Act of 1966 (5 U.S.C. § 552, as amended).

15. Filing Date: June 24, 2014

APPENDIX C: Judicial Proceedings Panel Committee and Subcommittee Member Biographies

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman is counsel with the law firm Herrick, Feinstein LLP. Ms. Holtzman served for eight years as a U.S. representative (D-NY, 1973–81). While in office, she authored the Rape Privacy Act. She then served for eight years as District Attorney of Kings County, New York (Brooklyn), the fourth-largest DA's office in the country, where she helped change rape laws, improve standards and methods for prosecution, and develop programs to train police and medical personnel. In 1989 Ms. Holtzman became the only woman ever elected Comptroller of New York City. Ms. Holtzman graduated from Radcliffe College, magna cum laude, and received her law degree from Harvard Law School.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

MR. VICTOR STONE

Victor Stone represents crime victims at the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center, Inc. Previously, Mr. Stone served as Special Counsel at the United States Department of Justice. He spent 40 years with the Department of Justice in numerous positions, including as Chief Counsel, FBI Foreign Terrorist Task Force, and as Assistant U.S. Attorney in Oregon and the District of Columbia. He has experience working on victims' and prisoners' rights, serving on committees that resulted in the enactment of the Crime Victims' Rights Act and updates to the ABA Standards for Prisoner Rights. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he clerked on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

PROFESSOR THOMAS W. TAYLOR

Tom Taylor teaches graduate courses at Duke University's Sanford School of Public Policy. Previously, he served as a decorated and distinguished Army officer, civil servant, and member of the Senior Executive Service. During a 27-year career in the Pentagon, he advised seven secretaries and seven Chiefs of Staff of the Army, and as the senior leader of the Army legal community he worked on a wide variety of operational, personnel, and intelligence issues. He graduated with high honors from Guilford College, Greensboro, N.C., and with honors from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill law school, where he was a Morehead Fellow, a member of the law review, and a member of the Order of the Coif.

VICE ADMIRAL PATRICIA A. TRACEY, U.S. NAVY (RETIRED)

Pat Tracey was most recently the Vice President of Homeland Security and Defense for Hewlett Packard Enterprise Services, U.S. Public Sector, developing dynamic strategies and providing support to various agencies including the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, and U.S. Department of Defense. She completed a distinguished 34-year naval career in 2004, retiring as a vice admiral and the most senior woman officer in the history of the U.S. Navy. As chief of the Navy's $5 billion global education and training enterprise, Admiral Tracey led a successful revolution in training technology to improve the quality, access, effectiveness, and cost of Navy training. She graduated from the College of New Rochelle and the Naval Postgraduate School, with distinction, and completed a Fellowship with the Chief of Naval Operations' Strategic Studies Group.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL SUBCOMMITTEE MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES — CHAIR OF THE JPP SUBCOMMITTEE

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman, who took office as the youngest woman ever elected to Congress, served in the House of Representatives from 1973 to 1981, representing New York's 16th Congressional District. While in Congress, she served on the House Judiciary and Budget Committees and chaired the Immigration and Refugees Subcommittee. She co-founded the Congressional Women's Caucus and was elected its first Democratic chair. She subsequently was elected Brooklyn District Attorney (where she pioneered new strategies for the prosecution of rape cases)—the only woman ever elected DA in New York City. She was then elected New York City Comptroller, the only woman ever to hold that position. Ms. Holtzman was appointed by President Bill Clinton to the Interagency Working Group (on declassifying secret Nazi war crimes files), and by Secretary Hagel to the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel. She has also been appointed to the Department of Homeland Security Advisory Committee. Ms. Holtzman is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard University's Radcliffe College, magna cum laude. She practices law in New York City with the firm Herrick, Feinstein, LLP.

MS. LISA FRIEL

Lisa Friel is an internationally recognized expert on sexual assault. Ms. Friel has investigated and supervised complex cases involving sexual assault and harassment, human trafficking, workplace violence, child pornography, Internet predators, unlawful surveillance, theft, and fraud. Ms. Friel began her professional career at the New York County District Attorney's Office, specializing in sexual assault cases. She was the Chief of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit for nearly a decade and the Deputy Chief for 11 years. Supervising more than 40 assistant district attorneys, support staff, and investigators, she typically managed 300 cases and investigations at any one time.

Ms. Friel has directed thousands of investigations into allegations of sexual assault and other misconduct and has trained hundreds of law enforcement personnel throughout the world. In October 2011, following a distinguished 28-year career as a Manhattan prosecutor, Ms. Friel joined T&M Protection Resources as Vice President of the Sexual Misconduct Consulting & Investigations division. Ms. Friel and her staff developed policies and procedures, provided training workshops, and conducted sensitive investigations into a myriad of issues, including sexual misconduct (both sexual assault and sexual harassment) and domestic violence. In September 2014, Ms. Friel was appointed as T&M's Special Advisor to the NFL Commissioner, consulting on domestic violence, child abuse, and sexual assault within the National Football League. In April 2015, Ms. Friel accepted a permanent position with the NFL: an appointment by Commissioner Goodell as the NFL's Special Counsel for Investigations, where she is responsible for all investigations related to possible violations of the NFL's Personal Conduct Policy.

MS. LAURIE ROSE KEPROS

Laurie Rose Kepros is the Director of Sexual Litigation for the Colorado Office of the State Public Defender, where she trains and advises more than 700 lawyers and other staff statewide in their representation of adults and juveniles accused or convicted of sexual crimes. Ms. Kepros has personally represented thousands of criminal defendants, including many victims of sexual assault. She has tried and consulted on thousands of sexual offense cases across the state of Colorado. She has served on dozens of subcommittees of the Colorado Sex Offender Management Board and as a member of both the Sex Offense Task Force and the Sex Offense Working Group of the Sentencing Task Force of the Colorado Commission on Criminal and Juvenile Justice. Ms. Kepros was on the Board of Directors of the Colorado Criminal Defense Bar for 10 years and currently serves on the board of the CCDB's sister policy organization, the Colorado Criminal Defense Institute. She is a member of the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers and an adjunct professor at the University of Denver School of Law. She has repeatedly testified before the Colorado legislature as a subject matter expert in sexual crime law and as an expert witness in Colorado sex offense law in federal district court. In 2012, the CCDB awarded her the Gideon Award for upholding and preserving the principles captured by Gideon v. Wainwright.

DEAN LISA SCHENCK (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lisa Schenck became Associate Dean for Academic Affairs at the George Washington University Law School in 2009 after serving in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps for more than 25 years. She also has served as a judge, lawyer, and educator. While in the military, she was an appellate military judge on the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals in 2002 and received the 2003 Judge Advocates Association Outstanding Career Armed Services Attorney Award (Army). In 2005, Dean Schenck was the first woman appointed as a Senior Judge on that court, where she served until she retired. In 2007, the Secretary of Defense also appointed her to serve concurrently as Associate Judge on the U.S. Court of Military Commission Review. After retiring from the military as a colonel in 2008, Dean Schenck served as Senior Advisor to the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in Military Services.

PROFESSOR LEE SCHINASI (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lee Schinasi began his legal career as a trial attorney for the Office of Economic Opportunity before starting a 23-year career in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps. His final assignment was as Dean of Academics and Vice Dean of the Army's JAGC School. Professor Schinasi attended the resident Command and General Staff College and the resident Army War College. He has served as military legal advisor to the Army's Chief of Staff for Intelligence and as Staff Judge Advocate of the 3rd Infantry Division (in Germany) and United States Army South (in Panama). Professor Schinasi is co-author of several books on evidence and litigation, including The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, Military Evidentiary Foundations, The Florida Evidence Code Trial Book, Florida Evidentiary Foundations, Evidence in Florida, Emerging Problems under the Federal Rules of Evidence, and Lawyers Cooperative Practice Guide: Florida Evidence. He received a bachelor's degree in economics and a J.D. degree from the University of Toledo. Before joining the Barry Law faculty, Professor Schinasi taught at the University of Miami School of Law. He currently teaches evidence, torts, civil procedure, and national security law.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JAMES SCHWENK, U.S. MARINE CORPS (RETIRED)

James Schwenk retired from the Marine Corps in 2000 and from civil service in 2014, after 49 years of federal service. As a Marine Corps judge advocate, he served as a trial counsel, defense counsel, Deputy Staff Judge Advocate, Staff Judge Advocate, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Navy, Head of Operational Law Branch at Headquarters Marine Corps, Deputy Director of Legal and Legislative Policy for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Force Management and Policy, Assistant Judge Advocate General of the Navy for Military Law, and Military Assistant to the DoD General Counsel. Upon retiring from active duty, BGen Schwenk served for 14 years in the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense as Senior Associate Deputy General Counsel, specializing in personnel policy, military justice, and civil support. He was the principal legal advisor for the repeal of "don't ask, don't tell" and the provision of benefits to same-sex spouses of military personnel. In addition, he was the principal legal advisor to numerous DoD working groups in the area of military personnel policy, working extensively with the White House and Congress. BGen Schwenk attended the Washington College of Law, American University, earning his J.D. in 1977.

MS. JILL WINE-BANKS

Jill Wine-Banks has a background as a corporate executive in manufacturing and telecommunications and as an attorney and not-for-profit and government leader. Ms. Wine-Banks started her career at the Department of Justice prosecuting organized crime and labor racketeering cases and then played a crucial role as an assistant special prosecutor investigating and trying the Watergate obstruction of justice case. Ms. Wine-Banks also served as the General Counsel of the United States Army. In that position, Ms. Wine-Banks dealt with environmental, procurement, Panama Canal, intelligence, military justice, and political issues, including the integration of women into basic training and West Point. After leaving the Pentagon, she was a litigation partner at Jenner and Block, the Solicitor General and Deputy Attorney General of Illinois, and later the Executive Vice President and Chief Operating Officer of the American Bar Association, the world's largest legal publisher and professional association with almost 400,000 members. That experience led to her becoming a senior corporate executive at Motorola and then Maytag, handling international business development, global operations, alliance creation and management, and government relations in Pakistan, China, Ukraine, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, and Singapore. Recently, Ms. Wine-Banks was head of career and technical education for the Chicago Public Schools and a business consultant. Ms. Wine-Banks is currently writing a book about her life and career, with a special focus on her experiences during Watergate.

Dear Chairs, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit the final report of the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (JPP). This report is the culmination of three years of the Panel's review and assessment of issues involving judicial proceedings related to sexual assault in the Armed Forces. To conduct its assessments, the JPP held 32 public meetings between August 2014 and July 2017 during which the members heard testimony from hundreds of witnesses, including sexual assault survivors and victim advocacy organizations, military leaders, military and civilian prosecutors, defense counsel and victims' counsel, former judges, victim services personnel, and numerous others. The Panel also received thousands of pages of documents from the Department of Defense, the military Services, and other interested parties.

Since February 2015, the JPP has issued 11 reports containing a total of 63 recommendations to Congress, the Secretary of Defense, the military Services, and the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigations, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, presenting its research and findings on the topics assigned to it by Congress, those recommended by its predecessor sexual assault advisory committee—the Response Systems Panel—as well as on two related issues.

The JPP has observed and assessed many constructive and important changes addressing sexual assault in the military and support for victims over the past three years. The Panel applauds the efforts of Congress, the Department of Defense, the military Services, and advocacy organizations as they continue to focus attention on this important matter.

The JPP conveys its gratitude to Congress for the opportunity to examine the issue of sexual assault in the military. The Panel would have not been able to complete its work without the support and assistance of the JPP Subcommittee, the military Services, the Department of Defense, and the hundreds of experts and witnesses who shared their experiences and perspectives with the Panel. The JPP expresses its appreciation to everyone who helped it fulfill its mission.

Respectfully submitted,

Elizabeth Holtzman, Chair

APPENDICES:

I. Introduction and Tasks Accomplished

In section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year (FY) 2013, enacted on January 2, 2013, Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to establish the fifth congressionally mandated task force on sexual assault in the military created since 2003: the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (Judicial Proceedings Panel, or JPP).[1] Its immediate predecessor was the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel, or RSP), which completed its work in June 2014.[2]

Congress instructed the JPP "to conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) involving adult sexual assault and related offenses . . . for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings."[3] In June 2014 the Secretary of Defense appointed five members to the JPP, including two members who had previously served on the RSP.[4]

A. RESPONSIBILITIES AND METHODOLOGY OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

In the National Defense Authorization Acts for Fiscal Years 2013, 2014, and 2015, Congress assigned to the JPP a total of 16 specific duties covering a wide array of topics related to sexual assault in the military.[5] The Response Systems Panel recommended four issues for review by the JPP.[6] In accordance with its charter, the JPP examined two additional topics that came to the attention of the Panel as

1 National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, Pub. L. No. 112-239 [hereinafter FY13 NDAA], § 576, 126 Stat. 1632 (2013).

2 The three task forces preceding the RSP were (1) the Panel to Review Sexual Misconduct Allegations at the United States Air Force Academy, (2) the Defense Task Force on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies, and (3) the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in the Military Services (DTF-SAMS).

3 FY13 NDAA, supra note 1, § 576. The Judicial Proceedings Panel authorizing statutes and charter are included as Appendix A.

4 The biographies of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and Subcommittee members are included as Appendix B. The Honorable Barbara S. Jones served as the Chair of the RSP, and the Honorable Elizabeth Holtzman served as a member.

5 FY13 NDAA, supra note 1, § 576; National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, Pub. L. No. 113-66 [hereinafter FY14 NDAA], § 1731, 127 Stat. 672 (2014); National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2015, Pub. L. No. 113-291 [hereinafter FY15 NDAA], § 545, 128 Stat. 3292 (2014). A list of the JPP's statutory tasks is included as Appendix C.

6 Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (June 2014) [hereinafter RSP Report], available at http://responsesystemspanel.whs.mil/public/docs/Reports/00_Final/RSP_Report_Final_20140627.pdf. The RSP recommended the following tasks to the JPP:
   1. RSP Recommendation 45—The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Services Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right.
   2. RSP Recommendation 113—The Judicial Proceedings Panel and Joint Service Committee consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120.
   3. RSP Recommendation 115—The Judicial Proceedings Panel assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers.
   4. RSP Recommendation 117—The Judicial Proceedings Panel study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified.

it conducted its statutory assessments: retaliation against victims of sexual assault and the appellate rights of victims in the military justice process.

To explore and assess these topics, the JPP held 32 public meetings between August 2014 and July 2017.[7] Over the course of those meetings, the Panel heard from hundreds of witnesses, including military leaders, sexual assault victims, sexual assault advocacy groups, Department of Defense (DoD) and civilian victim services personnel, military and civilian prosecutors, defense counsel and victims' counsel, academics and subject matter experts, members of the public, and members of Congress. The JPP also received and reviewed thousands of pages of documents provided by DoD, the military Services, victim advocacy organizations, and other interested parties.

The JPP also tasked a subcommittee appointed by DoD to conduct its own review of certain issues.[8] The JPP Subcommittee held multiple meetings between April 2015 and May 2017. In addition, between July and September 2016 members of the JPP Subcommittee conducted site visits to military installations in the United States and Asia, during which members spoke with panels of more than 280 individuals from all of the Services involved in the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

Congress required the JPP to submit its initial report to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives within 180 days of its first meeting and to issue subsequent reports annually thereafter through fiscal year 2017. The JPP issued its first report in 2015, followed by four reports in 2016 and six reports in 2017. These reports contain a total of 63 recommendations, many of which have been implemented by Congress, DoD, and the Services.[9] The JPP's reports and recommendations, along with ensuing legislative and regulatory changes made by Congress, DoD, and the Services, are discussed below.

B. REPORTS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

1. Initial Report[10]

The JPP issued its initial report in February 2015. It summarized the JPP's assessments from the first six months of its review, with a focus on the effects and implementation of the 2012 amendments to Article 120 of the UCMJ, the effects and implementation of special victims' counsel programs instituted by DoD and the military Services, victim privacy issues in military sexual assault cases, and the rights and needs of sexual assault victims to receive case information and participate in the military judicial process. The JPP made 11 recommendations relating to these topics.

The JPP referred 17 issues for additional consideration to the JPP Subcommittee. The first 11 of these issues related to definitions of terms and elements of offenses, defenses, and enumerated offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ, the military's sexual assault statute. The remaining six issues related to how the military prosecutes crimes that involve coercive sexual relationships and abuse of authority, including relationships between trainers and trainees, recruiters and recruits, and senior and subordinate military members in the same chain of command.

A number of JPP recommendations contained in its initial report have been implemented by Congress and DoD.[11] Following the JPP's recommendation relating to the DoD and interagency review process, Congress enacted section 543 of the FY16 NDAA. This provision required the Secretary of Defense to examine the DoD process for implementing statutory changes to the UCMJ for the purpose of developing options to streamline that process and adopting procedures to ensure that legal guidance is published as soon as practicable whenever statutory changes to the UCMJ are implemented.[12] The Deputy Secretary of Defense also approved this JPP recommendation in a September 2, 2016, memorandum to the Service Secretaries.[13]

Following the JPP's recommendations relating to the special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVC/VLC) program, Congress enacted section 535 of the FY16 NDAA. This provision required the Secretary of Defense to establish guiding principles and standardize training for the SVC/VLC program, as well as ensure that SVCs/VLCs are assigned to locations that maximize their face-to-face contact with clients.[14] DoD also approved, in whole or in part, the JPP's recommendations to establish uniform policies concerning SVC/VLC participation in military justice proceedings, to impose more stringent criteria for selecting SVCs/VLCs, and to extend the eligibility for SVC/VLC representation to last as long as a victim's rights are at issue.[15]

Following the release of the JPP's initial report, Congress addressed the rights of victims through the judicial process in two pieces of legislation. First, Congress enacted section 531 of the FY16 NDAA, expanding a victim's ability to petition an appellate court for a writ of mandamus if the victim believes that his or her rights have been violated.[16] Second, consistent with the JPP's recommendation on victims' access to information, Congress enacted section 5504 of the FY17 NDAA, creating a new Article 140a, UCMJ (Case management; data collection and accessibility).[17] This article requires the Secretary of Defense to prescribe uniform standards and criteria for improved access to docket information, filings, and records in the military justice system, using, so far as practicable, the best practices of federal and state courts. DoD also acted on the JPP recommendation, directing the Service Secretaries to develop guidance for their respective Departments to ensure that victims and their counsel have appropriate access to docketing information and case filings.[18]

In addition, consistent with the JPP's recommendation on Military Rule of Evidence (M.R.E.) 412, the military's rape shield law, the President signed Executive Order 13696 on June 17, 2015, eliminating the "constitutionally required" exception within M.R.E. 412 at Article 32 hearings.[19]

Finally, DoD approved in part the JPP's recommendation on M.R.E. 513, directing the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to recommend uniform guidance regarding release of mental health records to ensure an appropriate balance between the interests of law enforcement and the privacy interests of victims of an alleged sex-related offense.[20]

2. Report on Restitution and Compensation for Military Adult Sexual Assault Crimes[21]

After issuing its initial report, the Panel turned its attention to the specific task of examining restitution and compensation for victims of sexual assault in the military. In the FY14 NDAA, Congress instructed the Panel to analyze and assess the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of sexual assault crimes committed by military Service personnel, and specifically to evaluate three proposals for expanding such relief. In February 2016, the JPP released a report containing six recommendations to Congress and the Secretary of Defense to simplify and accelerate how restitution and compensation are provided to victims.

The JPP concluded that to best meet the financial needs of sexual assault victims, a new uniform DoD compensation program should be established that would provide benefits to victims without regard to the physical location of the offense or the victim's state of residence. At present, state victim compensation programs vary as to who and what is covered, in the length of coverage, and in the amounts provided.

The JPP also encouraged the President to issue an executive order that would modify the Rules for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) to provide victims with the right to be heard before a convening authority enters into a pretrial agreement, noting that the inclusion of restitution in a pretrial agreement is within the discretion of convening authorities. The Panel further recommended that the Services provide regular training to attorneys and victim assistance personnel on the availability and use of restitution in pretrial agreements.

The JPP evaluated three proposals to amend the UCMJ that would allow victims to be compensated from the forfeited wages of incarcerated Service members, would include bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation in a claim filed against the alleged offender under Article 139 of the UCMJ, and would add restitution as an authorized punishment that could be adjudged at courts-martial. Ultimately, the Panel determined that the negative effects of these proposals would outweigh the benefits each sought to achieve and instead recommended that a new, uniform DoD compensation program be established for victims.

Consistent with one of the JPP's recommendations, the President signed Executive Order 13730 on May 20, 2016, amending R.C.M. 705(d)(3) to require consultation with the victim, whenever practicable, before the convening authority accepts a pretrial agreement.[22]

3. Report on Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice[23]

In February 2016 the JPP released its report on Article 120 of the UCMJ, the military's statute for prosecuting sexual assault cases. The JPP's report followed an in-depth review and analysis of Article 120 by the JPP Subcommittee. Over the course of nine meetings, the JPP Subcommittee heard perspectives and recommendations from more than 40 military justice practitioners and debated the issues directed to it by the JPP, including definitions of terms and elements of offenses, defenses, and enumerated offenses under Article 120. The Subcommittee also compared Article 120 to similar federal criminal law provisions under Title 18 of the United States Code and reviewed how the military currently prosecutes abuse of authority and coercive relationships.

On the basis of the Subcommittee's findings and recommendations and of the JPP's own deliberations, the JPP determined that the most recent version of Article 120, enacted by Congress in 2012, provides a reasonably effective statutory framework for the prosecution of sexual assault offenses in the military. However, the JPP found that some definitions and terms used in the statute are confusing or vague and could possibly obscure standards of conduct among Service members or hinder court-martial prosecution of sexual assault offenses. To address these concerns, the JPP recommended that Congress amend five definitions in Article 120 and adopt a new theory of liability for coercive sexual acts or contacts in which a perpetrator used position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person.

The JPP also recommended that the President amend the Manual for Courts-Martial to specifically state that consent and mistake of fact as to consent may be raised in any case in which they are relevant.

Following these JPP recommendations, in the FY17 NDAA Congress amended the definition of "consent," removed the definition and element of "bodily harm," and amended the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in Article 120.[24] Congress also added a definition for "incapable of consenting," as recommended by the JPP; however, Congress chose to use the definition contained in federal law rather than the one proposed by the JPP, which the JPP Subcommittee developed after determining that the federal definition was itself problematic.[25]

Congress did not enact the JPP's recommendation to adopt a new theory of liability for coercive sex acts based on a perpetrator's position, rank, or authority. Though it appeared in the Senate version of the FY17 NDAA, it was not included in the final conference report. The conferees noted that this conduct is prohibited under Article 93a, UCMJ (Maltreatment), as added by another provision in the FY17 NDAA.[26]

4. Report on Retaliation Related to Sexual Assault Offenses[27]

The JPP next examined the issue of retaliation related to sexual assault offenses, in a report released in February 2016. The issue of retaliation was brought to the JPP's attention by a 2014 survey published by the RAND Corporation, which indicated that 62% of active duty women who reported unwanted sexual contact to a military authority in 2014 perceived some form of retaliation. This percentage was unchanged from a 2012 survey.[28]

The JPP made 13 recommendations to improve DoD's response to retaliation against Service members who report sexual misconduct. At the heart of the JPP's report was a concern over the fundamental lack of data about the prevalence and nature of reported incidents of retaliation and the steps taken to deal with it. The Panel stressed the critical importance of such data to understand and mitigate the effects of retaliation on individual Service members, unit cohesion, and military readiness.

The JPP found little information on the prevalence of retaliation in the military, because workplace surveys are the only source of existing data about it. The JPP concluded that effective collection and tracking of actual incident data are necessary to understand the extent and nature of the problem of retaliation; such understanding, in turn, is necessary for Congress and DoD to craft more effective solutions and ensure the security and well-being of affected Service members.

To meet this need, the Panel's report recommended that DoD and the Services use a standardized reporting form for incidents of retaliation, similar to the form employed when a sexual assault is reported. The form should be linked to the underlying report of sexual assault. The JPP recommended that incident information should be collected and tracked uniformly for every victim and across each of the Services.

The JPP further noted that there was no single person charged with monitoring what happens to a victim of retaliation. The JPP report recommended that the installation sexual assault response coordinators be tasked to consolidate retaliation reports, track and record retaliation data, and provide information to installation case management groups to monitor progress in resolving complaints.

Congress enacted a number of the JPP's recommendations on retaliation. For example, section 543 of the FY17 NDAA requires DoD to include in the annual Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) report to Congress detailed information on each claim of retaliation in connection with a report of sexual assault made by or against a Service member.[29]

Following another JPP recommendation in part, Congress enacted section 545 of the FY17 NDAA, which requires DoD SAPRO to establish metrics for evaluating the efforts of the Armed Forces to prevent and respond to retaliation in connection with sexual assault and to identify best practices to be used by the Military Departments as they seek to prevent and respond to retaliation.[30]

Adopting another JPP recommendation, Congress also enacted section 546 of the FY17 NDAA, which requires DoD personnel who investigate claims of retaliation to "receive training on the nature and consequences of retaliation, and, in cases involving reports of sexual assault, the nature and consequences of sexual assault trauma."[31]

In addition, following a JPP recommendation, Congress enacted section 547 of the FY17 NDAA, which directs the Secretary of Defense to develop regulations requiring a Service member who reports retaliation to "be informed in writing of the results of the investigation, including whether the complaint was substantiated, unsubstantiated, or dismissed."[32]

Finally, citing the recommendations of the JPP, on July 28, 2016, the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) announced that a newly created team of seven DoD IG investigators and a supervisor would directly handle all sexual assault reprisal cases across the Services rather than serving in an oversight capacity for investigations conducted at the branch level.[33]

5. Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses[34]

In April 2016, the JPP released a report reviewing trends in the adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes in the military from fiscal years 2012 through 2014.

In conducting its analysis, the JPP extracted data from court records, case documents, and other publicly available resources, reviewing court-martial documents from 1,761 sexual assault cases resolved in fiscal years 2012 through 2014. The JPP retained an expert consultant, the distinguished criminologist Dr. Cassia Spohn, to analyze the data and provide statistics on case characteristics and outcomes. These were used in developing the report and recommendations.

The JPP's report made two specific recommendations. First, the JPP recommended that Congress and the Secretary of Defense collect and analyze case adjudication data using a standardized, document-based collection model similar to systems used by the U.S. Sentencing Commission and developed by the JPP.[35]

Second, the JPP recommended that DoD change its policy that excludes from the annual SAPRO reports to Congress those adult-victim sexual assault cases handled by the DoD Family Advocacy Program (FAP). The JPP recommended that DoD include legal disposition information related to all reported adult sexual assault incidents in one annual DoD report.

35 Document-based case adjudication data collection is a best practice used and recommended by the U.S. Sentencing Commission. The JPP's document-based approach to data collection involves obtaining relevant case documents from the military Services (e.g., charge sheet, report of results of trial) and recording the relevant case history data into a centralized database for analysis.

Consistent with the first recommendation, Congress enacted section 5504 of the Military Justice Act of 2016, which created a new Article 140a, UCMJ, on case management, data collection, and accessibility.[36]

Congress also enacted section 574 of the FY17 NDAA, requiring the FAP to produce an annual report that includes the number of intimate partner, spousal, and child physical and sexual abuse incidents reported and substantiated each year, along with analyses of types of abuse reported and characteristics of the victims and perpetrators.[37] Another provision, section 544 of the FY17 NDAA, requires that the FAP and SAPRO annual reports be submitted together to Congress.[38] However, the statute does not require intimate partner and spousal sexual assault case judicial and disciplinary data to be included in either the FAP or SAPRO annual reports, as the JPP recommended.

6. Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases[39]

In April 2017, the JPP released a report identifying serious issues that affect the ability of defense counsel in military sexual assault cases to provide a robust defense and offering four recommendations to correct the problems. The report grew out of the site visits conducted from July to September 2016 by members of the JPP Subcommittee, who visited military installations in the United States and Asia. The JPP Subcommittee met with panels of more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations and all of the military Services, including prosecutors, defense counsel, SVCs/VLCs, paralegals, commanders, investigators, and sexual assault response coordinators and other victim support personnel. These individuals spoke without attribution so that the JPP Subcommittee could gain an unfiltered, candid assessment of how changes in sexual assault laws and policies have, in their view, affected the military justice system.

On the basis of information received from the Subcommittee and its own deliberations, the JPP made four recommendations relating to defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases. Several of the recommendations were—in some form—previously recommended by the RSP.

First, the JPP found that recent changes to the military justice system, such as substantial changes to the Article 32 pretrial hearing process, have reduced or eliminated the already limited ability of defense counsel to gain important information regarding the prosecution's case. To help address this loss of information, the JPP recommended that military defense counsel, like their civilian counterparts, have access to independent defense investigators—access that now exists only in the Navy.

Second, the JPP found that military defense offices, when compared to prosecution offices, are often understaffed and underfunded. The JPP therefore recommended that the military Services ensure that defense organizations are sufficiently staffed and have appropriate funding.

Third, the JPP found that military defense counsel, unlike civilian public defenders, are required to request approval and funding of defense experts from convening authorities, who often deny these requests. Moreover, because defense counsel must send their requests through the prosecutor, they are forced to prematurely reveal their defense strategies. To correct this problem, the JPP recommended that defense offices be given approval and funding authority for their own expert witnesses.

Fourth, the JPP found that defense counsel in sexual assault cases do not always have the experience required to defend clients in complex cases. Therefore, the JPP recommended that the military Services ensure that lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases have sufficient litigation experience and set a minimum tour length for defense counsel of two years.

7. Report on Victims' Appellate Rights[40]

In June 2017, the JPP released a report that called for enhancing the rights of victims of sexual assault in the military justice system's appellate process. The Panel made four recommendations to Congress, the Department of Defense, and the Services: (1) to provide victims, through legislation, with the ability to protect their rights in post-conviction appellate proceedings; (2) to grant, by legislation, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) specific jurisdiction to review victims' appeals under Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the military victims' rights statute; (3) to provide victims with an opportunity to be heard prior to appellate counsel review of certain sealed materials; and (4) to require that victims be provided with notice of significant appellate matters.

The Panel began its assessment of the protection of victims' rights in the appellate process after hearing concerns expressed by the military Services' SVC/VLC program managers at its public meeting in April 2016. In response, the JPP Chair solicited from the program managers a legislative proposal addressing their concerns. The Panel held two public meetings to hear the perspectives of judges, practitioners, and experts—including a former chief judge of CAAF, former military appellate judges, military appellate defense and government counsel, civilian appellate defense counsel, an official from the Department of Justice Office of Victims of Crime, and attorneys from victims' rights organizations—about the proposed changes to the appellate process. The JPP also received written submissions from the DoD, current and former Service judge advocates, and victims' rights organizations.

In May 2017, Congressman Mike Turner and Congresswoman Niki Tsongas introduced the BE HEARD (Building an Environment for Helpful, Effective, and Accessible Representation and Decision-making) Act. This bill, if enacted, would codify the JPP's recommendation to grant CAAF jurisdiction to hear victims' interlocutory appeals under Article 6b, UCMJ.[41]

C. REPORTS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL SUBCOMMITTEE

In its February 2015 assessment of the 2012 version of Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the JPP recommended that 17 issues related to Article 120 be referred to a subcommittee for further evaluation. Following the JPP recommendation, the Secretary of Defense empaneled the JPP Subcommittee in April 2015.[42] The JPP Subcommittee presented the following 4 reports and 3 short reports to the JPP.

1. Subcommittee Report on Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice

In December 2015, the JPP Subcommittee presented the Subcommittee Report to the Judicial Proceedings Panel on Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The report is available at http://jpp.whs.mil/Public/docs/08-Panel_Reports/JPP_SubcommReport_Final_20151210.pdf.

II. Additional Issues Reviewed and Assessed by the Judicial Proceedings Panel

The JPP was directed by Congress to review and assess five issues that have not been fully addressed in previous JPP reports:

(1) Department of Defense initial disposition withholding policy;

(2) Trial counsel training and experience;

(3) Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution (SVIP) Capability Program;

The findings and assessments of the JPP regarding these issues are detailed below.

A. DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE INITIAL DISPOSITION WITHHOLDING POLICY

1. Statutory Task

In the FY13 NDAA, Congress directed the JPP to "[m]onitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases."[46]

In that memorandum, setting forth a policy effective June 28, 2012, the Secretary of Defense directed that "commanders within the Department of Defense who do not possess at least special court-martial convening authority and who are not in the grade of O-6 (i.e., colonel or Navy captain) or higher" may not determine the initial disposition of alleged offenses involving the following:

(i) rape, in violation of Article 120 of the UCMJ;

(ii) sexual assault, in violation of Article 120 of the UCMJ;

(iii) forcible sodomy, in violation of Article 125 of the UCMJ; and

(iv) all attempts to commit such offenses, in violation of Article 80 of the UCMJ.[47]

2. Assessment

The JPP monitored the implementation of the withholding policy in two ways. First, on February 3, 2016, the JPP issued a request for information (RFI) to the Services and the DoD, asking whether they had problems with or concerns about the withholding policy. Second, the JPP Subcommittee asked 46 FY13 NDAA, supra note 1, § 576(d)(2)(I).

47 U.S. Dep't of Def., Memorandum from the Secretary of Defense on Withholding Initial Disposition Authority Under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in Certain Sexual Assault Cases (Apr. 20, 2012) [hereinafter SecDef Withholding Memo], available at http://jpp.whs.mil/Public/docs/03_Topic-Areas/09-Withholding_Authority/20160408/01_SecDef_Memo_WithholdingAuthority_20120420.pdf.

Service members questions about the implementation of the withholding policy during the site visits conducted between July and September 2016.

In response to the RFI, no entity other than the Marine Corps noted any reservations about the withholding policy.[48] The Marine Corps expressed concern that in certain cases, minor misconduct, such as underage drinking or a barracks order violation, must be disposed of by a higher-level commander than would have previously handled the misconduct; this elevation occurs because the withholding policy applies to "all other alleged offenses arising from or relating to the same incident(s)."[49]

During the JPP Subcommittee's site visits, counsel stated that the withholding policy had little, if any, negative impact on sexual assault case processing other than minor administrative delays attributed to scheduling difficulties inherent in meeting with a senior officer.[50]

On the other hand, site visit participants observed positive effects of the policy: an officer of an O-6 rank typically has more military justice experience than a lower-level commander and the policy has improved the public perception of the military's handling of sexual assault cases. In addition, lower-level commanders themselves "generally supported elevating the decision to a higher-level commander."[51]

On the basis of the foregoing, the JPP does not recommend any changes to the current DoD withholding policy.

B. TRIAL COUNSEL TRAINING AND EXPERIENCE

1. Statutory Task

The FY13 NDAA directed the JPP to assess trends in the training and experience levels of military trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends on the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.[52]

2. Assessment

In order to assess the training and experience of adult sexual assault prosecutors, the JPP issued RFIs to the Services in February and December 2016. The JPP also heard testimony on the training and experience of prosecutors at a public meeting on May 13, 2016, during which the Panel heard from leaders of the Service Judge Advocate General's (JAG) schools and members of the JAG Corps who litigate adult sexual assault crimes.[53] In addition, the JPP Subcommittee spoke with prosecutors about their training and experience during site visits conducted during the summer of 2016 and reported this information to the JPP at a public meeting on March 10, 2017.[54]

The Services collaborate extensively on training.[55] In recent years, the number of specialized courses on sexual assault prosecutions has increased;[56] moreover, information about trying sexual assault cases has been incorporated in the Services' general advocacy courses.[57] Each Service also provides attorneys with liberal access to the specialized training on sexual assault prosecutions available to federal and state prosecutors.[58]

During the site visits, the Subcommittee observed that training programs for trial counsel seemed to be operating well.[59] However, the Subcommittee noted that while trial counsel are generally satisfied that they are receiving adequate and appropriate training, many remarked that the extensive training does not make up for their lack of in-court experience.[60]

Ms. Julia Hejazi, a highly qualified expert (HQE) and experienced civilian prosecutor for the Marine Corps, presented a different perspective regarding counsel training and experience at the May 2016 JPP public meeting. She testified that on the basis of her 16 years of prosecution experience and her 17 months as an HQE for the Marines, she believes that the military is successfully using training—including the experience gained from practical training exercises—to bridge the experience gap between military and civilian sexual assault prosecutors.[61]

In addition to training, each Service has developed units dedicated to the prosecution of sexual assault, led by prosecutors with specialized training and experience.[62] The organizational structures have, in part, been designed and revised to help experienced prosecutors provide oversight and guidance to more junior prosecutors undertaking sexual assault cases, starting at the investigation stage.[63] However, according to some site visit participants speaking to the Subcommittee, in practice senior counsel sometimes get involved in a case just a few days before trial, leaving much of the trial preparation to be performed by junior counsel.[64]

The Army, Navy, and Marine Corps also have HQEs who assist in sexual assault prosecutions, as well as Trial Counsel Assistance Programs (TCAPs) that provide specialized training, case consultation, and prosecutor augmentation.[65] Lieutenant Colonel Bret Batdorff, former Chief of the Army's TCAP, testified about the type of assistance provided by HQEs, noting that the Army's civilian special victim litigation experts "are on the road, sitting behind the bar . . . helping [the military prosecutors] prep witnesses, interview witnesses, practice opening statements, and things like that."[66]

A recently enacted NDAA provision specifically addresses counsel training and experience. Section 542 of the FY17 NDAA requires the Service Secretaries to establish a system of military justice skill and experience identifiers to ensure that judge advocates with sufficient skills and experience in military justice are assigned to prosecute and defend cases and are assigned to develop less-experienced judge advocates.[67] The provision also requires the Service Secretaries to carry out a five-year pilot program to assess the feasibility and advisability of establishing a deliberate process of professional development in military justice for judge advocates.[68] The Army, Navy, and Marine Corps have implemented military justice skill and experience identifier systems,[69] and in all Services the selection of prosecutors to lead sexual assault prosecutions is based on demonstrated military justice skill and experience.[70]

In light of Congress's actions, the JPP makes no further recommendations at this time.

C. SPECIAL VICTIM INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION (SVIP) CAPABILITY PROGRAM

1. Statutory Task

In the FY13 NDAA, Congress tasked the JPP to "[m]onitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victim capability."[71] The term "special victim capability" is defined by Congress as a "distinct, recognizable group of appropriately skilled professionals who work collaboratively" to achieve the stated purposes of "(1) investigating and prosecuting allegations of child abuse, serious domestic violence, or sexual offenses; and (2) providing support for the victims of such offenses."[72] Congress required that this capability include specially trained and selected military investigators, judge advocates, victim witness assistance personnel, and administrative paralegal support personnel.[73]

In compliance with section 573, DoD published special victim investigation and prosecution (SVIP) capability guidance in 2014.[74]

2. Assessment

In order to monitor trends in the development, utilization, and effectiveness of the SVIP capability, the JPP sent an RFI to the military Services in February 2016.[75] The JPP also received testimony on the Services' SVIP capability at a public meeting on April 8, 2016, during which the Panel heard from MCIO representatives, military prosecutors, and victim witness liaison (VWL) personnel from each Service.[76] At another public meeting, on May 13, 2016, the JPP received additional testimony on the Services' SVIP capability, specifically relating to the prosecution of sexual assault offenses.[77]

In addition, the JPP Subcommittee, at the direction of the JPP, spoke with investigators, prosecutors, and VWL personnel about SVIP capability during the site visits.[78] Drawing on information received at the site visits, the JPP Subcommittee reported its findings to the JPP on trial counsel training and experience on March 10, 2017,[79] and on sexual assault investigations in the military on February 24, 2017.[80]

All Services have developed a capability that uses investigators specially trained in sexual assault offense investigations to investigate allegations of sexual assault and to collaborate with assigned SVIP personnel from other disciplines.[81] As discussed above, all Services also have prosecutors who are trained and experienced in sexual assault prosecutions to assess and, if appropriate, prosecute allegations of sexual assault.[82] In addition, the Services have specially selected and trained paralegals who provide support both to special victim prosecutors and to victims.[83] To varying degrees, the Services also have specially trained victim witness liaisons to assist sexual assault victims.[84]

Lieutenant Colonel Batdorff spoke positively about the development of the SVIP capability, commending in particular the quality of the investigations. He noted that "[h]aving investigators dedicated solely to sexual assault cases has allowed the agents to hone their skills and do more complete quality work."[85]

Several presenters at the JPP's April 2016 meeting observed that the SVIP capability has improved communication and coordination between the investigators and the prosecution teams.[86] During site visits, prosecutors and investigators similarly described improved working relationships and agreed that the prosecutors are involved in investigations earlier now than they had been in the past.[87] However, both prosecutors and investigators expressed concern about issues that arise once a case has been closed by investigators but before the prosecutor has completed preparation for trial.[88] Prosecutors asserted that the investigators often decline to follow up on important leads, while investigators asserted that the requested additional investigation is unnecessary or is difficult for an already overburdened and understaffed investigative unit to execute.[89] The Marine Corps is the only Service that has added investigators to its Complex Trial Team to complete any additional investigation needed for the prosecution effort.[90]

Finally, the Services have developed specialized, collaborative training as part of the SVIP capability.[91] The joint training of investigators, prosecutors, victim witness liaisons, and paralegals has played a critical role in building relationships among the SVIP capability team members.

D. MILITARY RULE OF EVIDENCE 412—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE OF A VICTIM'S SEXUAL BEHAVIOR OR PREDISPOSITION

1. Statutory Tasks

The FY13 NDAA directed the JPP to carry out two tasks relating to M.R.E. 412. First, the Panel was asked to review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in an Article 32 hearing, and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.[92] Second, it was to review those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in courts-martial and assess what impact that evidence had on the case.[93]

M.R.E. 412, which was promulgated in March 1980 with an effective date of September 1, 1980,[94] establishes a rape shield provision that generally bars a victim's sexual behavior or predisposition from being admitted as evidence. The rule contains three exceptions, including one that would allow evidence to be admitted if the exclusion of such evidence would violate the constitutional rights of the accused.[95]

In Executive Order 13696, effective June 17, 2015, the President amended R.C.M. 405, which governs Article 32 preliminary hearings, to prohibit application of the M.R.E. 412 "constitutionally required" evidence exception at preliminary hearings.[96] However, the executive order did not amend the text of M.R.E. 412 itself, and the "constitutionally required" evidence exception continues to apply at courts-martial.

In its Initial Report, released in February 2015, the JPP reviewed and assessed M.R.E. 412, but noted that the pending change to Article 32 practice, along with the application of M.R.E. 412 by military judges at courts-martial, should be monitored.[97]

2. Assessment

In order to assess the application of M.R.E. 412 by preliminary hearing officers (PHOs) at Article 32 preliminary hearings and by military judges at courts-martial, the JPP received testimony from former trial judges, trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs from each Service at a public meeting on January 6, 2017.[98] In addition, the JPP Subcommittee assessed litigation practice under M.R.E. 412 during site visits and reported its findings to the JPP on March 10, 2017.[99]

These presenters provided insight into the status of preliminary hearing practice approximately 18 months after the "constitutionally required" evidence exception to M.R.E. 412 at such hearings had been eliminated. They testified that the PHOs are well-trained and do not consider evidence that does not fit within the remaining two exceptions.[100] While SVCs/VLCs praised the elimination of the "constitutionally required" exception as benefiting sexual assault victims, defense counsel expressed fear that the convening authority is no longer informed of valuable evidence regarding credibility that may be admitted at courts-martial and cannot be factored into a referral decision.[101]

The presenters were generally in agreement that military judges are well-trained in applying M.R.E. 412 to the facts and narrowly tailor admissible evidence to the relevant purpose at courts-martial.[102] The Subcommittee similarly observed that most counsel are satisfied with both the rule and the procedures used by the military judges.[103]

E. DISCLOSURE AND ADMISSION OF MENTAL HEALTH RECORDS UNDER MILITARY RULE OF EVIDENCE 513

1. Statutory Task

The FY15 NDAA directed the JPP to review and assess the use by the accused of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under the UCMJ, both during the Article 32 preliminary hearing and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings.[104]

The FY15 NDAA also significantly revised M.R.E. 513—the psychotherapist-patient privilege—in two major ways. First, the NDAA increased the burden on the party seeking the production or admission of records protected by M.R.E. 513. Under the new test, a military judge may conduct an in camera review of records or communications only if he or she finds by a preponderance of the evidence that the moving party has shown that (1) there exists "a specific factual basis demonstrating a reasonable likelihood that the records or communications would yield evidence admissible under an exception to the privilege," (2) "the requested information meets one of the enumerated exceptions to the privilege," (3) "the information sought is not merely cumulative of other information available," and (4) "the party made reasonable efforts to obtain the same or substantially similar information through non-privileged sources."[105] This change went into effect on June 17, 2015.[106]

Second, the FY15 NDAA eliminated the enumerated "constitutionally required" exception to M.R.E. 513 at both the Article 32 hearing and at courts-martial.[107]

The JPP's Initial Report, dated February 2015, reviewed the origins of the military psychotherapist-patient privilege and reviewed application of the rule then in effect. The JPP noted the extensive changes to M.R.E. 513 made in the FY15 NDAA and determined to monitor practice in light of those changes.[108]

2. Assessment

In order to assess the effect of the revised rules on mental health evidence, the JPP received testimony from former trial judges, trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs from each Service at a public meeting in January 2017.[109] These presenters provided insight into preliminary hearing and court-martial practice approximately 18 months after the June 2015 changes to M.R.E. 513 were implemented. In addition, during its site visits the JPP Subcommittee asked trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs about Article 32 and courts-martial practice in light of the changes to M.R.E. 513. The JPP Subcommittee reported its findings to the JPP on March 10, 2017.[110]

a. Admissibility of M.R.E. 513 Evidence

The presenters at the January 2017 JPP meeting generally agreed that under current practice, M.R.E. 513 evidence is rarely admitted at either Article 32 hearings or courts-martial. First, the presenters observed that M.R.E. 513 evidence is infrequently sought at Article 32 hearings, because the PHO does not have the authority to order that mental health records be produced.[111] Second, they agreed that while M.R.E. 513 evidence is frequently sought at courts-martial, mental health records are rarely produced for even an in camera review, because the requisite factual basis—a demonstration that the records are likely to contain admissible evidence—is difficult to meet.[112] The Subcommittee heard similar comments from defense counsel about the difficulty of obtaining an in camera review of mental health records at courts-martial.[113]

However, the Subcommittee heard from many trial counsel and SVCs/VLCs who view the changes to M.R.E. 513 positively.[114] They stated that "the rule now works as was intended—to keep mental health records out of the courtroom."[115] Previously, trial counsel would typically obtain mental health records prior to the military judge's production order to facilitate the military judge's anticipated, and almost routine, in camera review of the records.[116]

b. Elimination of the "Constitutionally Required" Exception

Several presenters at the January 2017 meeting also noted the lack of uniformity in how military judges are interpreting the elimination of the "constitutionally required" exception to M.R.E. 513. Since this change, judges have ruled inconsistently on whether the Constitution requires the admission of evidence bearing on credibility, perception, ability to recall, or motive.[117] Counsel had previously used this enumerated exception to admit such evidence. Several former military judges asserted that some judges are ordering that evidence be produced but not identifying the particular enumerated exception on which such an order is based; some judges are citing constitutional due process or confrontation as a basis for production; and some are excluding any evidence that does not fit within an enumerated exception, without addressing constitutional implications.[118]

Trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs on the site visits confirmed this observation, noting that following the removal of the "constitutionally required" exception, "trial judges have taken different positions on whether M.R.E. 513 must be read in light of the Constitution." Faced with inconsistent judicial interpretations, counsel are waiting for appellate guidance on this issue.[119] Though two Service

Courts of Criminal Appeals have recently reviewed the effect of the removal of the "constitutionally required" exception from M.R.E. 513,[120] CAAF has yet to rule on this issue.

c. Scope of M.R.E. 513 Privilege

Another issue raised by several presenters at the January public meeting concerned the scope of the M.R.E. 513 privilege. M.R.E. 513 protects "confidential communication made between the patient and a psychotherapist or an assistant to the psychotherapist . . . if such communication was made for the purpose of facilitating diagnosis or treatment of the patient's mental or emotional condition." However, the text of the rule does not address whether "confidential communication" includes the psychiatric diagnosis, the medications prescribed and the duration of those prescriptions, the type of therapies used, and the resolution of the diagnosed psychiatric condition.[121] Several presenters noted inconsistencies in the interpretation of what falls under the umbrella of "confidential communication;" they recommended that the rule be clarified by Congress or the President.[122]

A recent Coast Guard case illustrates the uncertainty surrounding the scope of the M.R.E. 513 privilege. In H.V. v. Kitchen, the Coast Guard Court of Criminal Appeals (CGCCA) reversed a military judge's order to disclose mental health information that the military judge determined was not privileged under M.R.E. 513, including dates treated, the identity of the provider, the psychiatric diagnosis, medications prescribed and the duration of those prescriptions, the types of therapies used, and the resolution of the diagnosed psychiatric condition. In a 2–1 decision, the CGCCA held that all the above mental health information was privileged under M.R.E. 513, except for the dates of treatment, the duration of the appointments, and the identity of the provider.[123] Although the CGCCA opinion provides guidance to the other military Services, it is not binding precedent on them.

120 J.M. v. Payton-O'Brien, 2017 CCA LEXIS 424 (N-M. Ct. Crim. App. June 28, 2017) (holding military judges cannot order production or release of M.R.E. 513 privileged communications unless an enumerated exception applies; however, military judges can protect the constitutional rights of an accused by ordering remedial measures necessary to "guarantee a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense."); L.K. v. Acosta, 76 M.J. 611 (A. Ct. Crim. App. May 24, 2017) (noting in dicta that regardless of the language of M.R.E. 513, "the reach of the constitutional exception is the same today as it was prior to the deletion of the constitutional exception pursuant to NDAA 2015. Under our constitutional hierarchy, a federal statute cannot bar the 'admission or disclosure' of a communication that is 'constitutionally required.'").

123 H.V. v. Kitchen, 75 M.J. 717 (C.G. Ct. Crim. App. July 8, 2016) (Bruce, J., dissenting). The CAAF granted review, inter alia, of the issue concerning the scope of M.R.E. 513 but determined it lacked jurisdiction over the case; therefore, it did not rule on the scope of confidential communications. Randolph v. HV, 76 M.J. 27 (C.A.A.F. 2017). The JPP recommended that specific jurisdiction be granted to CAAF to hear a victim's appeal if a Service Court of Criminal Appeals denies the victim's petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b. Recommendation 46, JPP Report on Appellate Rights, supra note 40.

III. Issues Not Assessed by the Judicial Proceedings Panel Owing to Subsequent Regulatory and Legislative Changes

The JPP was assigned four issues—two by Congress, and two by its predecessor panel, the RSP—that it did not assess because of changes in regulations and legislation. Those four issues are discussed in this section.

A. MANDATORY MINIMUM SENTENCES

In Section 1731(b)(1)(C) of the FY14 NDAA, Congress directed the JPP to assess the implementation and effects of the mandatory minimum sentences established by Article 56(b) of the UCMJ, which requires that persons found guilty of certain sex offenses receive, at a minimum, dismissal or dishonorable discharge.[124] Congress also tasked the JPP to assess the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under the UCMJ.[125]

In its 2015 report, the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG)—a working group established by the Secretary of Defense to conduct a comprehensive review of the UCMJ—recommended a revision to Article 56, UCMJ (Sentencing). The proposal would have replaced the current sentencing process with a system based on published standards developed by a new Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board. That board would collect and analyze sentencing data, use those data to determine appropriate sentencing parameters and criteria for specific offenses, propose them for approval by the President, and issue other sentencing policy guidance.[126]

Under the MJRG proposal, once sentencing parameters and criteria took effect, they would replace the mandatory punitive discharge provisions in Article 56(b), eliminating "a current incongruity in the system" whereby designated sex offenses result in mandatory discharge, but other serious crimes such as murder do not.[127]

Congress amended Article 56, UCMJ (Sentencing). However, it did not adopt the MJRG's proposal for determining sentencing parameters and criteria for all offenses, nor did it alter the current mandatory punitive discharge provisions for certain sexual assault offenses.[128]

In light of the MJRG's recommendations and the subsequent action taken by Congress in the Military Justice Act of 2016, the JPP did not conduct an assessment of mandatory minimum sentences.

B. DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE SAFE HELPLINE PRIVILEGE

Section 545(a)(2) of the FY15 NDAA tasked the JPP with reviewing and assessing the establishment of a privilege under the M.R.E.s against the disclosure of communications between (1) users of the DoD Safe Helpline and personnel staffing it and (2) users of the DoD Safe HelpRoom and personnel staffing it.[129]

On June 17, 2015, the President issued Executive Order 13696, which established a privilege for confidential communications with DoD Safe Helpline staff. The executive order amended M.R.E. 514(a) to state: "A victim has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing a confidential communication made between . . . the alleged victim and Department of Defense Safe Helpline staff, in a case arising under the UCMJ, if such communication was made for the purpose of facilitating advice or assistance to the alleged victim."[130]

In light of the executive order, the JPP did not conduct a review and assessment or make recommendations on the Safe Helpline privilege.

C. DEPOSITIONS

In its report issued in June 2014, the RSP recommended that the JPP assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine what, if any, changes to the deposition process should be recommended, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers.[131]

Congress subsequently enacted section 532 of the FY15 NDAA, requiring that a party requesting a deposition demonstrate that "due to exceptional circumstances, it is in the interest of justice" to take a deposition. Section 532 also provided that the convening authority may designate commissioned officers as counsel.[132]

In 2016, as part of the Military Justice Act of 2016, Congress amended Article 49, UCMJ (Depositions), to codify and expand the FY15 NDAA provision. The amendments included a requirement that deposition officers be judge advocates "whenever practicable."[133]

In light of the provisions in the FY15 NDAA and the Military Justice Act of 2016, the JPP did not conduct further assessment nor make recommendations on the issue of depositions.

D. PLEA BARGAINING

The RSP also recommended that the JPP study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified.[134]

In the Military Justice Act of 2016, Congress enacted section 5237, creating a new Article 53a, UCMJ (Plea agreements). This article provided basic rules for (1) the construction and negotiation of plea agreements concerning the charges, the sentence, or both; (2) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement; and (3) the entrance of the convening authority and the accused into binding agreements regarding the sentence that may be adjudged.[135]

In light of the provisions in the Military Justice Act of 2016, the JPP did not conduct a further assessment or make recommendations on the issue of plea bargaining.

IV. Recommendations to the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD)

The JPP made the following eight recommendations to the DAC-IPAD:

- Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military (September 2017)

  Recommendation 47: "In order to ensure that MCIOs can focus investigative resources on the most serious sexual assault cases, the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the DAC-IPAD, monitor the effects of the DoD policy that allows Service law enforcement agencies to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate."[136]

- Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses for Fiscal Year 2015 (September 2017)

  Recommendation 54: "The successor federal advisory committee to the JPP, the DAC-IPAD, should consider continuing to analyze adult-victim sexual assault court-martial data on an annual basis as the JPP has done, and should consider analyzing the following patterns that the JPP discovered in its analysis of fiscal year 2015 court-martial data:

  a. Cases involving military victims tend to have fewer punitive outcomes than cases involving civilian victims; and

  b. The conviction and acquittal rates for sexual assault offenses vary significantly among the military Services.

  c. If a Service member is charged with a sexual assault offense, and pleads not guilty, the probability that he or she will be convicted of a sexual assault offense is 36%, and the probability that he or she will be convicted of any offense (i.e., either a sex or a non-sex offense) is 59%."[137]

- Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Panel Concerns Regarding the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases (September 2017)

continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which, in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP, no longer serves a useful discovery purpose. This review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of such a preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be given more weight by the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further analysis of, or changes to, the process are required."[138]

Recommendation 57: "After case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the Secretary of Defense and DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases."[139]

Recommendation 58: "The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. This review should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should also consider whether such a change would encourage the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed and candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision."[140]

Recommendation 60: "The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system."[141]

Recommendation 62: "The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent affect court-martial panel members."[142]

Recommendation 63: "The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD collect data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons."[143]

V. Conclusion

The JPP is grateful to Congress for the opportunity to provide an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the UCMJ involving adult sexual assault and related offenses for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings. We hope our work has made positive contributions to the military justice system. The JPP would have not been able to complete its work without the support and assistance of the JPP Subcommittee, the military Services, the Department of Defense, and the hundreds of experts and witnesses who shared their experiences and perspectives with the Panel. The JPP expresses its deep appreciation to its hardworking and dedicated staff and to all others who helped fulfill this important mission.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 2013

(a) INDEPENDENT REVIEWS AND ASSESSMENTS REQUIRED.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS SINCE FISCAL YEAR 2012 AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of Defense shall establish a panel to conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the Uniform Code of Military Justice by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112–81; 125 Stat. 1404) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANELS.

(1) COMPOSITION.

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have also served on the panel established under subsection (a)(1).

(2) QUALIFICATIONS.—The members of each panel shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Forces, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes.

(3) CHAIR.—The chair of each panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the panel.

(4) PERIOD OF APPOINTMENT; VACANCIES.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the panel. Any vacancy in a panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(5) DEADLINE FOR APPOINTMENTS.—

(B) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—All original appointments to the panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall be made before the termination date of the panel established under subsection (a)(1), but no later than 30 days before the termination date.

(6) MEETINGS.—A panel shall meet at the call of the chair.

(7) FIRST MEETING.—The chair shall call the first meeting of a panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the panel.

(c) REPORTS AND DURATION.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—

(A) FIRST REPORT.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit a first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes the panel considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives not later than 180 days after the first meeting of the panel.

(B) SUBSEQUENT REPORTS.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

(C) TERMINATION.—The panel established under subsection (a)(2) shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

(d) DUTIES OF PANELS.—

(2) JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL.—The panel required by subsection (a)(2) shall perform the following duties:

(A) Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice that were enacted by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112– 81; 125 Stat. 1404).

(B) Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.

(C) Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.

(D) Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required by subsection (c)(2) and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.

(E) Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice),and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

(F) Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.

(G) Building on the data compiled as a result of paragraph (1)(D), assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.

(H) Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act.

(I) Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases.

(J) Consider such other matters and materials as the panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

(3) UTILIZATION OF OTHER STUDIES.—In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, a panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies.

(e) AUTHORITY OF PANELS.—

(1) HEARINGS.—A panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the panel considers appropriate to carry out its duties under this section.

(2) INFORMATION FROM FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Upon request by the chair of a panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the panel considers necessary to carry out its duties under this section.

(f) PERSONNEL MATTERS.—

(1) PAY OF MEMBERS.—Members of a panel shall serve without pay by reason of their work on the panel.

(2) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—The members of a panel shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance or services for the panel.

(3) STAFFING AND RESOURCES.—The Secretary of Defense shall provide staffing and resources to support the panels, except that the Secretary may not assign primary responsibility for such staffing and resources to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

1. Committee's Official Designation: The committee shall be known as the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel ("the Judicial Proceedings Panel").

2. Authority: The Secretary of Defense, as required by section 576(a)(2) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 ("the FY 2013 NDAA") (Public Law 112-239), as modified by section 1731(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 ("the FY 2014 NDAA") (Public Law 113-66), and in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA) (5 U.S.C., Appendix, as amended) and 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.50(a), established the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

3. Objectives and Scope of Activities: The Judicial Proceedings Panel will conduct an independent review and assessment of judicial proceedings conducted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) involving adult sexual assault and related offenses since the amendments made to the UCMJ by section 541 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 ("the FY 2012 NDAA") (Public Law 112-81) for the purpose of developing recommendations for improvements to such proceedings.

4. Description of Duties: Section 576(d)(2) directs the Judicial Proceedings Panel to perform the following duties, with additional duties as added by section 1731(b)(1) of the FY 2014 NDAA:
   a. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the UCMJ that were enacted by section 541 of the FY 2012 NDAA.
   b. Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases.
   c. Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts.
   d. Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available.
   e. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the UCMJ), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible.

f. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case.
g. Building on the data compiled as a result of the assessment conducted by the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel ("the Response Systems Panel"), a Federal advisory committee established pursuant to section 576(a)(1) of the FY 2013 NDAA and in accordance with FACA, of the training level of military defense and trial counsel, assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases.
h. Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by Section 573 of the FY 2013 NDAA.
i. Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the UCMJ in certain sexual assault cases.
j. Assess the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the UCMJ), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person.
k. Assess the implementation and effect of the Special Victim's Counsel for victims of sex-related offenses established by the Secretary of Defense on August 14, 2013 and codified in Section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, by the enactment of Section 1716 of the FY 2014 NDAA on December 26, 2013. The panel shall make such recommendations for modifications of section 1044e as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate.
l. Assess the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the UCMJ), as added by section 1705 of the FY 2014 NDAA, which requires at a minimum, that upon a finding of guilt for the offenses of rape, sexual assault, rape and sexual assault of a child, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit such acts, the punishment include dismissal or dishonorable discharge, except as provided for by Article 60 of the UCMJ, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ).
m. Assess the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the UCMJ), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:
    i. Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.
    ii. Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the UCMJ).

Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

iii. Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial.

n. Consider such other matters and materials as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports.

In conducting reviews and assessments and preparing reports, the Judicial Proceedings Panel may review, and incorporate as appropriate, the data and findings of applicable ongoing and completed studies. The Judicial Proceedings Panel may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as it considers appropriate to carry out its duties. Upon request by the Chair of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, a department or agency of the Federal Government shall provide information that the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers necessary to carry out its duties.

5. Agency or Official to Whom the Committee Reports: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall provide its first report, including any proposals for legislative or administrative changes it considers appropriate, to the Secretary of Defense through the Department of Defense (DoD) General Counsel (GC), and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives, not later than 180 days after its first meeting. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall submit subsequent reports during fiscal years 2014 through 2017.

6. Support: The DoD, through the DoD Office of General Counsel (DoD OGC), the Washington Headquarters Services, and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, shall provide staffing and resources as deemed necessary for the performance of the Judicial Proceedings Panel's functions, and shall ensure compliance with the requirements of the FACA, the Government in the Sunshine Act of 1976 ("the Sunshine Act") (5 U.S.C. § 552b, as amended), governing federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures. Primary responsibility for such staffing and resourcing may not be assigned to the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office.

7. Estimated Annual Operating Costs and Staff Years: The estimated annual operating cost, to include travel, meetings, and contract support, is approximately $4,000,000 and 15 full-time equivalents.

8. Designated Federal Officer: The Designated Federal Officer (DFO), pursuant to DoD policy, shall be a full-time or permanent part-time DoD employee, and shall be appointed in accordance with governing DoD policies and procedures.

   In addition, the Judicial Proceedings Panel's DFO is required to be in attendance at all meetings of the Panel and its subcommittees for the entire duration of each and every meeting. However, in the absence of the DFO, the Alternate DFO, duly appointed to the Judicial Proceedings Panel according to DoD policies and procedures, shall attend the entire duration of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittee meetings.

CHARTER
Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel

The DFO, or the Alternate DFO, shall approve all of the meetings of the Judicial Proceedings Panel as called by the Chair; shall call all meetings of its subcommittees, in coordination with the Chair; prepare and approve all meeting agendas for the Judicial Proceedings Panel and any subcommittees; and adjourn any meeting when the DFO or the Alternate DFO determines adjournment to be in the public's interest or required by governing regulations or DoD policies and procedures.

9. Estimated Number and Frequency of Meetings: Consistent with sections 576(b)(6) and (7) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at the call of the Chair, and the Chair shall call the first meeting of the Judicial Proceedings Panel not later than 60 days after the date of the appointment of all the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall meet at a minimum once per year.

10. Duration: The Judicial Proceedings Panel shall remain in effect until terminated, as provided for and as required by section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA; however, the charter is subject to renewal every two years.

11. Termination: According to section 576(c)(2)(C) of the FY 2013 NDAA, the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall terminate on September 30, 2017.

12. Membership and Designation: Pursuant to sections 576(b)(1)(B) and (b)(2), the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist of five members, two of whom must have served on the Response Systems Panel.

    The members shall be selected from among private United States citizens who collectively possess expertise in military law, civilian law, the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of sexual assaults in State and Federal criminal courts, victim advocacy, treatment for victims, military justice, the organization and missions of the Armed Force, and offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other adult sexual assault crimes. The Chair shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense from among the members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel.

    Members shall be appointed for the life of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, subject to annual renewals. Any vacancy on the Judicial Proceedings Panel shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Panel members shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as special government employee (SGE) members. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, Judicial Proceedings Panel members shall serve without compensation.

    The DoD GC, according to DoD policies and procedures, may select experts and consultants as subject matter experts under the authority of 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to advise the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees; these individuals do not count toward the Judicial Proceedings Panel's total membership nor do they have voting privileges. In addition, these subject matter experts shall not participate in any deliberations dealing with the substantive matters before the Judicial Proceedings Panel or its subcommittees nor shall they participate in any voting.

13. Subcommittees: The Department, when necessary and consistent with the Judicial Proceedings Panel's mission and DoD policies and procedures, may establish subcommittees, task groups, or working groups to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel. Establishment of subcommittees will be based upon a written determination, to include terms of reference, by the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, or the DoD GC.

    These subcommittees shall not work independently of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and shall report all of their recommendations and advice to the Judicial Proceedings Panel for full deliberation and discussion. Subcommittees have no authority to make decisions and recommendations, verbally or in writing, on behalf of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. No subcommittee or any of its members may update or report directly to the DoD or any Federal officers or employees.

    The Secretary of Defense shall appoint subcommittee members even if the member in question is already a member of the Judicial Proceedings Panel. All subcommittee appointments shall be subject to annual renewal. Such individuals, if not full-time or part-time government personnel, shall be appointed as experts or consultants pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as SGE members. Those individuals who are full-time or permanent part-time Federal employees shall be appointed pursuant to 41 C.F.R. § 102-3.130(a) as RGE members. Subcommittee members shall serve for the life of the subcommittee. With the exception of reimbursement of official travel and per diem, subcommittee members shall serve without compensation.

    All subcommittees operate pursuant to the provisions of FACA, the Sunshine Act, governing Federal statutes and regulations, and established DoD policies and procedures.

14. Recordkeeping: The records of the Judicial Proceedings Panel and its subcommittees shall be handled according to section 2, General Records Schedule 26, and appropriate Department of Defense policies and procedures. These records shall be available for public inspection and copying, subject to the Freedom of Information Act of 1966 (5 U.S.C. § 552, as amended).

15. Filing Date: June 24, 2014

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman is counsel with the law firm Herrick, Feinstein LLP. Ms. Holtzman served for eight years as a U.S. representative (D-NY, 1973–81). While in office, she authored the Rape Privacy Act. She then served for eight years as District Attorney of Kings County, New York (Brooklyn), the fourth-largest DA's office in the country, where she helped change rape laws, improve standards and methods for prosecution, and develop programs to train police and medical personnel. In 1989 Ms. Holtzman became the only woman ever elected Comptroller of New York City. Ms. Holtzman graduated from Radcliffe College, magna cum laude, and received her law degree from Harvard Law School.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In that role she supervised community affairs, handled public information, and oversaw the work of the Homicide Investigation Unit. In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

MR. VICTOR STONE

Victor Stone represents crime victims at the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center, Inc. Previously, he served as Special Counsel at the United States Department of Justice, including in the Appellate and General Litigation and Legal Advice Sections of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice; as Chief Counsel, FBI Foreign Terrorist Task Force; as an Assistant United States Attorney in Oregon and in the District of Columbia; as General Counsel to the D.C. Corrections Trustee; as a U.S. Immigration Judge; as a Special U.S. Parole Commissioner; as an expert at Council of Europe, United Nations, and Prison Rape Elimination Commission subcommittees, and as a DOJ member on the ABA Task Force updating Standards for Prisoner Rights. He also served as the Criminal Division's legal advisor to the Federal Witness Security Program, and regarding federal victims' rights compliance.

PROFESSOR THOMAS W. TAYLOR

Tom Taylor teaches graduate courses at Duke University's Sanford School of Public Policy. Previously, he served as a decorated and distinguished Army officer, civil servant, and member of the Senior Executive Service. During a 27-year career in the Pentagon, he advised seven secretaries and seven Chiefs of Staff of the Army, and as the senior leader of the Army legal community he worked on a wide variety of operational, personnel, and intelligence issues. He graduated with high honors from Guilford College, Greensboro, N.C., and with honors from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill law school, where he was a Morehead Fellow, a member of the law review, and a member of the Order of the Coif.

VICE ADMIRAL PATRICIA A. TRACEY, U.S. NAVY (RETIRED)

Pat Tracey was most recently the Vice President of Homeland Security and Defense for Hewlett Packard Enterprise Services, U.S. Public Sector, developing dynamic strategies and providing support to various agencies including the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, and U.S. Department of Defense. She completed a distinguished 34-year naval career in 2004, retiring as a vice admiral and the most senior woman officer in the history of the U.S. Navy. As chief of the Navy's $5 billion global education and training enterprise, Admiral Tracey led a successful revolution in training technology to improve the quality, access, effectiveness, and cost of Navy training. She graduated from the College of New Rochelle and the Naval Postgraduate School, with distinction, and completed a Fellowship with the Chief of Naval Operations' Strategic Studies Group.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL SUBCOMMITTEE MEMBERS

THE HONORABLE BARBARA S. JONES — CHAIR OF THE JPP SUBCOMMITTEE

Barbara Jones is a partner at the law firm Bracewell, LLP. She served as a judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for 16 years and heard a wide range of cases relating to accounting and securities fraud, antitrust, fraud and corruption involving city contracts and federal loan programs, labor racketeering, and terrorism. Before being nominated to the bench in 1995, Judge Jones was the Chief Assistant to Robert M. Morgenthau, then the District Attorney of New York County (Manhattan). In addition to her judicial service, she spent more than two decades as a prosecutor. Judge Jones was a special attorney of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Organized Crime & Racketeering, Criminal Division, and the Manhattan Strike Force Against Organized Crime and Racketeering. Previously, Judge Jones served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, as chief of the General Crimes Unit, and as chief of the Organized Crime Unit in the Southern District of New York.

THE HONORABLE ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN — CHAIR OF THE JPP

Elizabeth Holtzman, who took office as the youngest woman ever elected to Congress, served in the House of Representatives from 1973 to 1981, representing New York's 16th Congressional District. While in Congress, she served on the House Judiciary and Budget Committees and chaired the Immigration and Refugees Subcommittee. She co-founded the Congressional Women's Caucus and was elected its first Democratic chair. She subsequently was elected Brooklyn District Attorney (where she pioneered new strategies for the prosecution of rape cases)—the only woman ever elected DA in New York City. She was then elected New York City Comptroller, the only woman ever to hold that position. Ms. Holtzman was appointed by President Bill Clinton to the Interagency Working Group (on declassifying secret Nazi war crimes files), and by Secretary Hagel to the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel. She has also been appointed to the Department of Homeland Security Advisory Committee. Ms. Holtzman is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard University's Radcliffe College, magna cum laude. She practices law in New York City with the firm Herrick, Feinstein, LLP.

MS. LISA FRIEL

Lisa Friel is an internationally recognized expert on sexual assault. Ms. Friel has investigated and supervised complex cases involving sexual assault and harassment, human trafficking, workplace violence, child pornography, Internet predators, unlawful surveillance, theft, and fraud. Ms. Friel began her professional career at the New York County District Attorney's Office, specializing in sexual assault cases. She was the Chief of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit for nearly a decade and the Deputy Chief for 11 years. Supervising more than 40 assistant district attorneys, support staff, and investigators, she typically managed 300 cases and investigations at any one time.

Ms. Friel has directed thousands of investigations into allegations of sexual assault and other misconduct and has trained hundreds of law enforcement personnel throughout the world. In October 2011, following a distinguished 28-year career as a Manhattan prosecutor, Ms. Friel joined T&M Protection Resources as Vice President of the Sexual Misconduct Consulting & Investigations division. Ms. Friel and her staff developed policies and procedures, provided training workshops, and conducted sensitive investigations into a myriad of issues, including sexual misconduct (both sexual assault and sexual harassment) and domestic violence. In September 2014, Ms. Friel was appointed as T&M's Special Advisor to the NFL Commissioner, consulting on domestic violence, child abuse, and sexual assault within the National Football League. In April 2015, Ms. Friel accepted a permanent position with the NFL: an appointment by Commissioner Goodell as the NFL's Special Counsel for Investigations, where she is responsible for all investigations related to possible violations of the NFL's Personal Conduct Policy.

MS. LAURIE ROSE KEPROS

Laurie Rose Kepros is the Director of Sexual Litigation for the Colorado Office of the State Public Defender, where she trains and advises more than 700 lawyers and other staff statewide in their representation of adults and juveniles accused or convicted of sexual crimes. Ms. Kepros has personally represented thousands of criminal defendants, including many victims of sexual assault. She has tried and consulted on thousands of sexual offense cases across the state of Colorado. She has served on dozens of subcommittees of the Colorado Sex Offender Management Board and as a member of both the Sex Offense Task Force and the Sex Offense Working Group of the Sentencing Task Force of the Colorado Commission on Criminal and Juvenile Justice. Ms. Kepros was on the Board of Directors of the Colorado Criminal Defense Bar for 10 years and currently serves on the board of the CCDB's sister policy organization, the Colorado Criminal Defense Institute. She is a member of the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers and an adjunct professor at the University of Denver School of Law. She has repeatedly testified before the Colorado legislature as a subject matter expert in sexual crime law and as an expert witness in Colorado sex offense law in federal district court. In 2012, the CCDB awarded her the Gideon Award for upholding and preserving the principles captured by Gideon v. Wainwright.

DEAN LISA SCHENCK (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lisa Schenck became Associate Dean for Academic Affairs at the George Washington University Law School in 2009 after serving in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps for more than 25 years. She also has served as a judge, lawyer, and educator. While in the military, she was an appellate military judge on the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals in 2002 and received the 2003 Judge Advocates Association Outstanding Career Armed Services Attorney Award (Army). In 2005, Dean Schenck was the first woman appointed as a Senior Judge on that court, where she served until she retired. In 2007, the Secretary of Defense also appointed her to serve concurrently as Associate Judge on the U.S. Court of Military Commission Review. After retiring from the military as a colonel in 2008, Dean Schenck served as Senior Advisor to the Defense Task Force on Sexual Assault in Military Services.

PROFESSOR LEE SCHINASI (COLONEL, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED)

Lee Schinasi began his legal career as a trial attorney for the Office of Economic Opportunity before starting a 23-year career in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps. His final assignment was as Dean of Academics and Vice Dean of the Army's JAGC School. Professor Schinasi attended the resident Command and General Staff College and the resident Army War College. He has served as military legal advisor to the Army's Chief of Staff for Intelligence and as Staff Judge Advocate of the 3rd Infantry Division (in Germany) and United States Army South (in Panama). Professor Schinasi is co-author of several books on evidence and litigation, including The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, Military Evidentiary Foundations, The Florida Evidence Code Trial Book, Florida Evidentiary Foundations, Evidence in Florida, Emerging Problems under the Federal Rules of Evidence, and Lawyers Cooperative Practice Guide: Florida Evidence. He received a bachelor's degree in economics and a J.D. degree from the University of Toledo. Before joining the Barry Law faculty, Professor Schinasi taught at the University of Miami School of Law. He currently teaches evidence, torts, civil procedure, and national security law.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JAMES SCHWENK, U.S. MARINE CORPS (RETIRED)

James Schwenk retired from the Marine Corps in 2000 and from civil service in 2014, after 49 years of federal service. As a Marine Corps judge advocate, he served as a trial counsel, defense counsel, Deputy Staff Judge Advocate, Staff Judge Advocate, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Navy, Head of Operational Law Branch at Headquarters Marine Corps, Deputy Director of Legal and Legislative Policy for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Force Management and Policy, Assistant Judge Advocate General of the Navy for Military Law, and Military Assistant to the DoD General Counsel. Upon retiring from active duty, BGen Schwenk served for 14 years in the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense as Senior Associate Deputy General Counsel, specializing in personnel policy, military justice, and civil support. He was the principal legal advisor for the repeal of "don't ask, don't tell" and the provision of benefits to same-sex spouses of military personnel. In addition, he was the principal legal advisor to numerous DoD working groups in the area of military personnel policy, working extensively with the White House and Congress. BGen Schwenk attended the Washington College of Law, American University, earning his J.D. in 1977.

MS. JILL WINE-BANKS

Jill Wine-Banks has a background as a corporate executive in manufacturing and telecommunications and as an attorney and not-for-profit and government leader. Ms. Wine-Banks started her career at the Department of Justice prosecuting organized crime and labor racketeering cases and then played a crucial role as an assistant special prosecutor investigating and trying the Watergate obstruction of justice case. Ms. Wine-Banks also served as the General Counsel of the United States Army. In that position, Ms. Wine-Banks dealt with environmental, procurement, Panama Canal, intelligence, military justice, and political issues, including the integration of women into basic training and West Point. After leaving the Pentagon, she was a litigation partner at Jenner and Block, the Solicitor General and Deputy Attorney General of Illinois, and later the Executive Vice President and Chief Operating Officer of the American Bar Association, the world's largest legal publisher and professional association with almost 400,000 members. That experience led to her becoming a senior corporate executive at Motorola and then Maytag, handling international business development, global operations, alliance creation and management, and government relations in Pakistan, China, Ukraine, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, and Singapore. Recently, Ms. Wine-Banks was head of career and technical education for the Chicago Public Schools and a business consultant. Ms. Wine-Banks is currently writing a book about her life and career, with a special focus on her experiences during Watergate.

APPENDIX C: Judicial Proceedings Panel Tasks

A. STATUTORY TASKS

1. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice that were enacted by section 541 (Article 120 revision) of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year (FY) 2012 (Public Law 112-81; 125 Stat. 1404). (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(A))

2. Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(B))

3. Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(C))

4. Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required of the JPP and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(D))

5. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(E))

6. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(F))

7. Building on the data compiled as a result of paragraph (1)(D), assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(G))

8. Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(H))

9. Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(I))

10. Consider such other matters and materials as the panel considers appropriate for purposes of the reports. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(J))

11. An assessment of the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person. (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(A))

12. An assessment of the implementation and effect of section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, and make such recommendations for modification of such section as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate. (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(B))

13. An assessment of the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (article 56(b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1705, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice). (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(C))

14. An assessment of the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows:

    (i) Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation.

    (ii) Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice).

    (iii) Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial. (FY14 NDAA, 1731(b)(1)(D))

15. Conduct a review and assessment regarding the impact of the use of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), by the accused during the preliminary hearing conducted under section 832 of such title (article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings. (FY15 NDAA, § 545(a)(1))

16. Conduct a review and assessment regarding the establishment of a privilege under the M.R.E. against the disclosure of communications between—

    (A) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe Helpline; and

    (B) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe HelpRoom. (FY15 NDAA, § 545(a)(2))

B. TASKS ASSIGNED TO THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL BY THE RESPONSE SYSTEMS PANEL (RSP)

1. The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Services Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right. (RSP Recommendation 45)

2. The Judicial Proceedings Panel and Joint Service Committee consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120. (RSP Recommendation 113)

3. The Judicial Proceedings Panel assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers. (RSP Recommendation 115)

4. The Judicial Proceedings Panel study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified. (RSP Recommendation 117)

C. TASKS UNDERTAKEN INDEPENDENTLY BY THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

1. Assess the occurrence of retaliation related to sexual assault offenses. This task was undertaken by the JPP in response to the May 2015 release of a DoD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office report indicating that 62% of the victims who report being sexually assaulted experience retaliation as a result of making the report.

2. Assess the protection of sexual assault victims' appellate rights. This task was undertaken by the JPP in response to concerns raised by the Service special victims' counsel program managers at the April 8, 2016, JPP public meeting.

APPENDIX E: Reports and Recommendations of the Judicial Proceedings Panel

A. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL INITIAL REPORT (FEBRUARY 2015)

1. Implementation Process for Amendments to the Uniform Code of Military Justice

Recommendation 1: The Secretary of Defense examine the DoD and interagency review process for establishing guidance for implementing statutory provisions of the UCMJ and explore options to streamline the procedures.

2. Special Victims' Counsel Program

Recommendation 2: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to implement additional selection criteria requiring that judge advocates have adequate criminal justice experience before they are assigned as special victims' counsel.

Recommendation 3: The Department of Defense develop a policy to standardize both the time frame within which to receive SVC training and the substantive requirements of SVC training.

Recommendation 4: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to perform regular evaluations to ensure SVCs' assignment to locations that maximize the opportunity for face-to-face interactions between SVCs and clients, and to develop effective means for SVCs to communicate with clients when face-to-face communication is not possible.

Recommendation 5: The Secretary of Defense establish appropriate SVC program performance measures and standards, including evaluating, monitoring, and reporting on the SVC programs; establishing guiding principles for the Services; and ensuring centralized, standardized assessment of SVC program effectiveness and client satisfaction.

Recommendation 6: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to ensure SVCs and victims have appropriate access to docketing information and case filings. In part, this could be accomplished by adopting an electronic system akin to the civilian PACER (Public Access to Court Electronic Records) service.

Recommendation 7: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to establish uniform practices and procedures concerning SVCs' participation for all military judicial proceedings.

3. Victims' Rights

Recommendation 8: The Secretary of Defense consider establishing expedited procedures for victims to seek mandatory interlocutory review in the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals of any alleged violation of victims' rights.

Recommendation 9: The Secretary of Defense propose timely revisions to statutes, the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM), and/or regulations to extend eligibility for SVC representation so long as a right of the victim exists and is at issue.

4. Military Rules of Evidence 412 (Past sexual behavior) and 513 (Psychotherapist-patient privilege)

Recommendation 10: The President sign an executive order eliminating the "constitutionally required" exception within M.R.E. 412 at Article 32 hearings.

Recommendation 11: The Secretary of Defense issue specific, uniform guidance to ensure that mental health records are neither sought from a medical treatment facility by investigators or military justice practitioners nor acknowledged or released by medical treatment facility personnel until a military judge or Article 32 hearing officer has ordered their production.

5. Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice

Non-Enumerated Recommendations: The JPP believes that bifurcating different types of sex offenses under the UCMJ is not necessary at this time and would create further confusion. The JPP recommends against this action and does not believe that further evaluation of this issue is warranted.

The JPP recommends that a subcommittee conduct further evaluation and provide recommendations [on 17 specific questions related to Article 120, UCMJ, and coercive sexual relationships and situations involving abuse of authority].

B. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON RESTITUTION AND COMPENSATION FOR MILITARY ADULT SEXUAL ASSAULT CRIMES (FEBRUARY 2016)

Recommendation 12: The Department of Defense establish a new, uniform program that provides compensation for unreimbursed out-of-pocket expenses of victims of sexual assault crimes committed by Service members.

Recommendation 13: Congress not amend the Uniform Code of Military Justice to add restitution as an authorized punishment that may be adjudged at courts-martial.

Recommendation 14: The military Services provide recurring training to trial practitioners and victim assistance personnel on the availability and use of restitution in pretrial agreements between the government and the accused.

Recommendation 15: The President enact the Department of Defense's recently proposed executive order to modify Rule for Courts-Martial 705(d)(3) to provide victims the right to be heard before a convening authority enters into a pretrial agreement.

Recommendation 16: Congress not amend the Uniform Code of Military Justice to direct that the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces be used to pay compensation to victims of sexual assault crimes committed by Service members.

Recommendation 17: Congress not amend Article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to include bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress.

C. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON ARTICLE 120 OF THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE (FEBRUARY 2016)

Recommendation 18: Congress should amend the definition of "consent" in Article 120(g)(8) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Recommendation 19: The President should amend the Manual for Courts-Martial to specifically state that consent (as an attack on proof) and mistake of fact as to consent (as a clearly delineated defense) may be raised in any case in which they are relevant.

Recommendation 20: Congress should amend Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to provide a definition of the term "incapable of consenting" for cases under Article 120(b) and (d), and the President should provide further executive guidance about the circumstances to consider when considering whether a victim was incapable of consenting.

Recommendation 21: Congress should amend and replace the reference in Article 120(b)(1)(B) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to "causing bodily harm" and should remove the definition of "bodily harm" from Article 120(g)(3).

Recommendation 22: Congress should amend the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in Article 120(g)(1)–(2) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Recommendation 23: Congress should adopt a new theory of liability in Article 120(b)(1)(E) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice for coercive sexual acts or contact in which a perpetrator has used position, rank, or authority to obtain compliance by the other person.

D. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON RETALIATION RELATED TO SEXUAL ASSAULT OFFENSES (FEBRUARY 2016)

Recommendation 24: In the Department of Defense's strategy addressing retaliation related to sexual assault, the Secretary of Defense specify (1) processes for reporting and investigating retaliation, (2) responsibility for the collection and monitoring of reports, and (3) mechanisms for tracking retaliation complaints and outcomes.

Recommendation 25: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries develop a standardized form for reporting retaliation. The standardized form should be linked to DD Form 2910 in the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database to properly track retaliation allegations related to sexual assault offenses, should provide victims of retaliation with the option to file an informal or formal retaliation report, and should be updated throughout the investigative and judicial process to ensure that the retaliation allegation is monitored and resolved.

Recommendation 26: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries continue to provide multiple channels for Service members to report retaliation. In addition, the Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries formally task installation sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs) with consolidating information from reports on retaliation, recording information on retaliation reports in the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database, and ensuring that information about the investigation and resolution of retaliation claims is properly and fully monitored.

Recommendation 27: Congress require the Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries to track retaliation allegations related to sexual assault offenses and publish information regarding retaliation complaints, investigations, and final dispositions in the Department's annual report to Congress on sexual assault prevention and response.

Recommendation 28: The Secretary of Defense establish a policy that requires the DoD Office of Inspector General to investigate all complaints of professional retaliation related to sexual assault. The Secretary of Defense ensure that these investigations are prioritized and conducted by personnel with specialized training. The Secretary of Defense require the inspectors general to report the status of the investigations to the installation sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs) prior to each monthly case management group meeting.

Recommendation 29: The Service Secretaries establish policies to ensure that personnel assigned by commanders to investigate retaliation complaints are properly trained on issues regarding retaliation relating to sexual assault.

Recommendation 30: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries expand the expedited transfer program to include job retraining for Service members who belong to small specialty branches and to be made available, on a case-by-case basis, to bystanders and witnesses of sexual assault who experience retaliation.

Recommendation 31: The Secretary of Defense establish specific guidelines clarifying what information can be released to a person who files a retaliation complaint related to a sexual assault.

Recommendation 32: The Secretary of Defense begin tracking the Services' implementation of the statutory requirement that general or flag officers review proposed involuntary separations of Service members who made unrestricted reports of sexual assault within the preceding year.

Recommendation 33: The Service Secretaries revise their regulatory definitions of maltreatment, which currently contain an overly narrow intent requirement.

Recommendation 34: Congress refrain from creating an enumerated offense prohibiting social retaliation in the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Recommendation 35: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries develop innovative and effective training on retaliation for commanders and all other Service members, including targeted training that may be used in response to problems of retaliation within an organization.

Recommendation 36: The Secretary of Defense revise the elements and burdens of proof for reprisal claims made under the Military Whistleblower Protection Act so that they parallel the elements and burdens of proof outlined in the Whistleblower Protection Act for DoD civilians.

E. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON STATISTICAL DATA REGARDING MILITARY ADJUDICATION OF SEXUAL ASSAULT OFFENSES (APRIL 2016)

Recommendation 37: The Department of Defense collect and analyze case adjudication data using a standardized, document-based collection model, similar to systems used by the Judicial Proceedings Panel or U.S. Sentencing Commission, that incorporates uniform definitions and categories across all of the military Services.

Recommendation 38: The Department of Defense include legal disposition information related to all adult sexual assault complaints in one annual DoD report, changing its policy that excludes adult-victim cases that are handled by the Family Advocacy Program from Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office reports.

F. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES (APRIL 2017)

Recommendation 39: In order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as reasonably needed.

Recommendation 40: The military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an independent audit of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimal level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term and authorize temporary details from one Service to another to ensure expeditious disposition of allegations. Organizations that have conducted similar kinds of assessments of public defender resources in various civilian jurisdictions may be of assistance in conducting this audit.

Recommendation 41: The Secretary of Defense direct the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to draft appropriate rules and measures, as necessary, to vest defense expert approval authority and expenditure funding in the Service defense organizations.

Recommendation 42: The military Services permit only defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set assignment policies that provide defense counsel two or more consecutive years of experience in the role, to the maximum extent feasible at the same location. Exceptions to this policy should be personally approved, on a case-by-case basis, by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

G. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON VICTIMS' APPELLATE RIGHTS (JUNE 2017)

Recommendation 43: The Joint Service Committee on Military Justice revise its proposed amendment to Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 1103A(b)(4)(B)(ii) to include the following language: "Prior to a decision to permit examination of material described in this subparagraph, notice and an opportunity to be heard shall be given to any person whose records are about to be examined and to appellate counsel."

Recommendation 44: The Services formalize procedures to provide victims in sexual assault cases (1) with timely notice, unless declined, of significant appellate matters, including but not limited to the date and time of the filing of appellate pleadings and briefs, of any appellate courtroom proceedings, of the date when the case is taken under submission, and of the final decision and any opinion of any appellate court, and (2) with convenient access to any unsealed documents filed in the case, if requested.

Recommendation 45: Congress revise Section 547(a) of S. 2943, the Senate version of the Fiscal Year 2017 National Defense Authorization Act, to state:

SEC. 547. APPELLATE STANDING OF VICTIMS UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

(a) APPELLATE REVIEW.—Section 806b of title 10, United States Code (article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f) APPELLATE REVIEW.—(1) If counsel for the accused or the Government files appellate pleadings under section 866 or 867 of this title (article 66 or 67) calling into question a prior judicial ruling in the case on an issue as to which a victim previously had standing and was heard, during appellate review that same victim may respond in the same manner as a party regarding that same issue, including through a Special Victims' Counsel under section 1044e of this title."

Recommendation 46: Congress amend Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to grant the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) jurisdiction to hear a victim's appeal if a Service Court of Criminal Appeals denies the victim's petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b.

H. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY (SEPTEMBER 2017)

Recommendation 47: In order to ensure that military criminal investigative organizations can focus investigative resources on the most serious sexual assault cases, the advisory committee that follows the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, monitor the effects of the DoD policy that allows Service law enforcement agencies to assist the MCIOs with sexual assault investigations, and make findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Defense as it deems appropriate.

Recommendation 48: The Secretary of Defense take the necessary steps to ensure that special victims' counsel and victims' legal counsel (1) have the resources to schedule and attend the initial victim interview promptly after a report of sexual assault and (2) receive the training necessary to recognize the importance of a prompt initial victim interview by the MCIO to an effective and just prosecution.

Recommendation 49: The Secretary of Defense identify and remove barriers to thorough questioning of a sexual assault victim by the MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies.

Recommendation 50: The Secretary of Defense remove impediments to MCIOs' obtaining tangible evidence from a sexual assault victim, particularly information contained on a cell phone or other digital devices, and develop appropriate remedies that address victims' legitimate concerns about turning over this evidence to ensure that sexual assault investigations are complete and thorough.

Recommendation 51: The Secretary of Defense review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories.

I. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON STATISTICAL DATA REGARDING MILITARY ADJUDICATION OF SEXUAL ASSAULT OFFENSES FOR FISCAL YEAR 2015 (SEPTEMBER 2017)

Recommendation 52: The Secretary of Defense and the military Services use a standardized, document-based collection model for collecting and analyzing case adjudication data in order to implement Article 140a, Uniform Code of Military Justice (Case Management; Data Collection and Accessibility).

Recommendation 53: The new military justice data collection system required to be developed pursuant to Article 140a, Uniform Code of Military Justice (Case Management; Data Collection and Accessibility), should be designed so as to become the exclusive source of sexual assault case adjudication data for DoD's annual report to Congress on DoD's sexual assault prevention and response initiatives.

Recommendation 54: The successor federal advisory committee to the JPP, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, should consider continuing to analyze adult-victim sexual assault court-martial data on an annual basis as the JPP has done, and should consider analyzing the following patterns that the JPP discovered in its analysis of fiscal year 2015 court-martial data:

a. Cases involving military victims tend to have less punitive outcomes than cases involving civilian victims; and

b. The conviction and acquittal rates for sexual assault offenses vary significantly among the military Services.

c. If a Service member is charged with a sexual assault offense, and pleads not guilty, the probability that he or she will be convicted of a sexual assault offense is 36%, and the probability that he or she will be convicted of any offense (i.e., either a sex or a non-sex offense) is 59%.

J. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON PANEL CONCERNS REGARDING THE FAIR ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES (SEPTEMBER 2017)

Recommendation 55: The Secretary of Defense and the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which, in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP, no longer serves a useful discovery purpose. This review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of such a preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be given more weight by the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further analysis of, or changes to, the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP reiterates its recommendation—presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases—that the military Services provide the defense with independent investigators.

Recommendation 56: Article 33, UCMJ, nonbinding case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates should require that the following standard be considered for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The nonbinding disposition guidance should require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor.

Recommendation 57: After case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the Secretary of Defense and DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

Recommendation 58: The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. This review should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should also consider whether such a change would encourage the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed and candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

Recommendation 59: Congress review and consider revising provisions in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded for review and decision to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary, because these provisions appear to have created a perception of undue pressure on convening authorities to refer such cases. The Secretary of Defense should develop procedures to mitigate this perception.

Recommendation 60: The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

Recommendation 61: The Secretary of Defense ensure that special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVCs/VLCs) receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing reasonable access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of an effective relationship between the prosecutor and the victim in the advice they provide their victim-clients, with the goal of assisting the prosecutor in fully preparing for trial.

Recommendation 62: The Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and regarding the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent affect court-martial panel members.

Recommendation 63: The Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be modified to require commanders to determine, in each case, whether a sexual assault victim could be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation without sacrificing the vital interests of the victim. The intent of this change would be to strike a balance between ensuring that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial and satisfying the need to separate the victim from the accused, while maintaining the victim's access to support systems. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can be used by defense counsel to suggest victims' abuse of this system and to cast doubt on their credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial. The Secretary of Defense should develop procedures to minimize this problem.

The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD collect data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

APPENDIX F: Judicial Proceedings Panel Tasks, Recommendations, and Implementation Status

ARTICLE 120, UCMJ (RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT GENERALLY)
Article 120 Tasks	1. Assess and make recommendations for improvements in the implementation of the reforms to the offenses relating to rape, sexual assault, and other sexual misconduct under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) that were enacted by section 541 (Article 120 revision) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 (Public Law 112–81; 125 Stat. 1404). (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(A)) 2. An assessment of the likely consequences of amending the definition of rape and sexual assault under section 920 of title 10, United States Code (article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person. (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(A)) 3. Consider whether to recommend legislation that would either split sexual assault offenses under Article 120 of the UCMJ into different articles that separate penetrative and contact offenses from other offenses or narrow the breadth of conduct currently criminalized under Article 120. (RSP Recommendation 113 (June 2014))

ARTICLE 120, UCMJ (RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT GENERALLY)
Article 120 JPP Reports and Recommendations	9 Recommendations (including 2 non-enumerated recommendations) JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-1: The Secretary of Defense examine the DoD and interagency review process for establishing implementation guidance for UCMJ provisions and explore options to streamline the process. Non-Enumerated Recommendations: (1) Article 120, UCMJ, not be bifurcated into separate penetrative and contact (non-penetrative) offenses; and (2) a subcommittee be formed to evaluate 17 specific issues related to Article 120, UCMJ, and coercive sexual relationships and situations involving abuse of authority. JPP Report on Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (February 2016) R-18: Congress should amend the definition of "consent" in Article 120(g)(8), UCMJ. R-19: The President should amend the Manual for Courts-Martial to specifically state that consent (as an attack on proof) and mistake of fact as to consent (as a clearly delineated defense) may be raised in any case in which they are relevant. R-20: Congress should amend Article 120, UCMJ, to provide a definition of the term "incapable of consenting" for cases under Article 120(b) and (d), and the President should provide further executive guidance about the circumstances to consider when considering whether a victim was incapable of consenting. R-21: Congress should amend and replace the reference in Article 120(b)(1)(B), UCMJ, to "causing bodily harm" and should remove the definition of "bodily harm" from Article 120(g)(3), UCMJ. R-22: Congress should amend the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in Article 120(g)(1)–(2), UCMJ. R-23: Congress should adopt a new theory of liability in Article 120(b)(1)(E), UCMJ, for coercive sexual acts or contact in which a perpetrator has used position, rank, or authority to obtain compliance by another person.

ARTICLE 120, UCMJ (RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT GENERALLY)
Article 120 Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Congress enacted FY16 NDAA, § 543, requiring the Secretary of Defense to examine the DoD process for implementing statutory changes to the UCMJ for the purpose of developing options to streamline such a process. The Secretary is required to adopt procedures to ensure that legal guidance is published as soon as practicable whenever statutory changes to the UCMJ are implemented. In the FY17 NDAA, § 5430, Congress amended the definition of "consent," removed the definition and element of "bodily harm," and amended the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in Article 120, UCMJ. Congress also added a definition for "incapable of consent"; however, Congress chose to use the definition from the federal statute. Congress did not enact a new provision in Article 120, UCMJ, to add a theory of liability for coercive sex acts based on a perpetrator's position, rank, or authority, but did enact Article 93a, UCMJ, in the FY 17 NDAA that prohibited activities with a military recruit or trainee by a person in a position of special trust.

SPECIAL VICTIMS' COUNSEL/VICTIMS' LEGAL COUNSEL (SVC/VLC) PROGRAM
SVC Program Task	An assessment of the implementation and effect of section 1044e of title 10, United States Code, as added by section 1716, and make such recommendations for modification of such section as the Judicial Proceedings Panel considers appropriate. (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(B))
SVC Program JPP Reports and Recommendations	7 Recommendations JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-2: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to implement additional selection criteria for SVCs/VLCs. R-3: DoD develop a policy to standardize requirements for both content and timing of SVC/VLC training. R-4: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to optimize SVC/VLC assignments to maximize face-to-face contact with clients. R-5: The Secretary of Defense establish SVC/VLC guiding principles and performance measures. R-7: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to establish uniform SVC/VLC participation policies for judicial proceedings. R-9: The Secretary of Defense propose revisions to statutes, the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM), and/or regulations to extend eligibility for SVC/VLC representation as long as a right of the victim is at issue. JPP Report on Panel Concerns Regarding the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases (September 2017) R-61: The Secretary of Defense ensure that SVCs/VLCs receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing reasonable access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of an effective relationship between the prosecutor and the victim in the advice they provide their victim-clients, with the goal of assisting the prosecutor in fully preparing for trial.

SPECIAL VICTIMS' COUNSEL/VICTIMS' LEGAL COUNSEL (SVC/VLC) PROGRAM
SVC Program Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Congress enacted FY16 NDAA, §§ 531 and 535 standardizing training, maximizing face-to-face contact between SVCs/VLCs and clients, and establishing guiding principles. DoD directed the Services to establish uniform participation policies, implement additional selection criteria for SVCs, and extend the eligibility for SVC/VLC representation for as long as a victim's right is at issue. (Sept. 2, 2016, DSD Memo)

VICTIMS' ACCESS TO INFORMATION
Access to Information Task	The Judicial Proceedings Panel and the Joint Service Committee should review and clarify the extent of a victim's right to access information that is relevant to the assertion of a particular right. (RSP Recommendation 45)
Access to Information JPP Reports and Recommendations	1 Recommendation JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-6: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to ensure SVCs and victims have appropriate access to docketing information and case filings. In part, this could be accomplished by adopting an electronic system akin to the civilian Public Access to Court Electronic Records (PACER) service.
Access to Information Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Congress enacted FY 17 NDAA, § 5504, creating a new Article 140a, UCMJ (Case management; data collection and accessibility), which requires the Secretary of Defense to prescribe uniform standards and criteria for facilitating access to docket information, filings, and records in the military justice system, using, so far as practicable, the best practices of federal and state courts. DoD directed the Service Secretaries to develop guidance for their respective Departments to ensure that victims and their counsel have appropriate access to docketing information and case filings. (Sept. 2, 2016, DSD Memo)

VICTIM PRIVACY – MILITARY RULE OF EVIDENCE (M.R.E.) 412 (SEX OFFENSE CASES: THE VICTIM'S SEXUAL BEHAVIOR OR PREDISPOSITION)
M.R.E. 412 Tasks	1. Review and assess those instances in which prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was considered in a proceeding under section 832 of title 10, United States Code (Article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and any instances in which prior sexual conduct was determined to be inadmissible. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(E)) 2. Review and assess those instances in which evidence of prior sexual conduct of the alleged victim was introduced by the defense in a court-martial and what impact that evidence had on the case. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(F))
M.R.E. 412 JPP Reports and Recommendations	1 Recommendation JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-10: The President sign an executive order eliminating the "constitutionally required" exception within M.R.E. 412 at Article 32 hearings. JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP received additional testimony on this topic from 19 practitioners and former military judges at its January 6, 2017, public meeting devoted to military stakeholder perspectives on the application of M.R.E. 412 and 513 at Article 32 hearings and courts-martial.
M.R.E. 412 Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Executive Order 13696, signed on June 17, 2015, eliminated the "constitutionally required" exception within M.R.E. 412 at Article 32 hearings.

VICTIM PRIVACY – M.R.E. 513 (PSYCHOTHERAPIST-PATIENT PRIVILEGE)
M.R.E. 513 Task	Conduct a review and assessment regarding the impact of the use of any mental health records of the victim of an offense under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), by the accused during the preliminary hearing conducted under section 832 of such title (Article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and during court-martial proceedings, as compared to the use of similar records in civilian criminal legal proceedings. (FY15NDAA, § 545(a)(1))
M.R.E. 513 JPP Reports and Recommendations	1 Recommendation JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-11: The Secretary of Defense issue specific, uniform guidance to ensure that mental health records are not sought from or released by medical treatment facility personnel until a military judge or Article 32 hearing officer has ordered their production. JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP received additional testimony on this topic from 19 practitioners and former military judges at its January 6, 2017, public meeting devoted to military stakeholder perspectives on the application of M.R.E. 412 and 513 at Article 32 hearings and courts-martial.
M.R.E. 513 Congressional and DoD Implementation	In the FY15 NDAA, § 537, Congress set a much higher standard for in camera review and disclosure of mental health records. DoD directed the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to recommend uniform guidance regarding release of mental health records to ensure an appropriate balance between the interests of law enforcement and the privacy interests of victims of an alleged sex-related offense. (Sept. 2, 2016, DSD Memo) Executive Order 13696, signed June 17, 2016, implemented sweeping legislative reforms to Article 32 hearings and prohibited Article 32 preliminary hearing officers from ordering production of communications covered by M.R.E. 513 and 514.

VICTIM RESTITUTION AND COMPENSATION
Restitution and Compensation Tasks	An assessment of the adequacy of the provision of compensation and restitution for victims of offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice), and develop recommendations on expanding such compensation and restitution, including consideration of the options as follows: (i) Providing the forfeited wages of incarcerated members of the Armed Forces to victims of offenses as compensation. (ii) Including bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress under section 939 of title 10, United States Code (Article 139 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice). (iii) Requiring restitution by members of the Armed Forces to victims of their offenses upon the direction of a court-martial. (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(D))
Restitution and Compensation JPP Reports and Recommendations	6 Recommendations JPP Report on Restitution and Compensation for Military Adult Sexual Assault Crimes (February 2016) R-12: DoD establish a program to provide sexual assault victims with compensation for unreimbursed out-of-pocket expenses. R-13: Congress not amend the UCMJ to add restitution as an authorized punishment that may be adjudged at courts-martial. R-14: The Services provide practitioners recurring training on the availability and use of restitution in pretrial agreements. R-15: The President enact an executive order to provide victims the right to be heard before a convening authority enters into a pretrial agreement. R-16: Congress not amend the UCMJ to allow the forfeited wages of incarcerated Service members to be used to pay compensation to victims of sexual assault crimes. R-17: Congress not amend Article 139, UCMJ, to include bodily harm among the injuries meriting compensation for redress.

VICTIM RESTITUTION AND COMPENSATION
Restitution and Compensation Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Executive Order 13730 was signed on May 20, 2016, amending R.C.M. 705(d)(3) to require consultation with the victim, whenever practicable, before the convening authority accepts a pretrial agreement.

RETALIATION
Retaliation Task	The issue of retaliation related to the reporting of sexual assault offenses came to the JPP's attention when a 2014 survey published by the RAND Corporation indicated that 62% of active duty women who reported unwanted sexual contact to a military authority in 2014 perceived some form of retaliation. This statistic was unchanged from the 2012 survey. The Panel reviewed the issue pursuant to FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(J), which provides that the JPP may assess other issues it considers appropriate.

RETALIATION
Retaliation JPP Reports and Recommendations	13 Recommendations JPP Report on Retaliation Related to Sexual Assault Offenses (February 2016) R-24: The Secretary of Defense specify processes for reporting, investigating, monitoring, and recording retaliation complaints and outcomes. R-25: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries develop a standardized form to report retaliation, link it to a sexual assault report in the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database (DSAID), and provide victims with an option to file an informal or formal complaint. R-26: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries continue to provide multiple reporting channels and task sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs) to enter and track retaliation complaints in DSAID. R-27: Congress require the Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries to track retaliation incidents and publish statistics in the annual Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) reports to Congress. R-28: The Secretary of Defense establish a policy to require the DoD Inspector General to investigate all complaints of professional retaliation related to sexual assault reports, to receive specialized training, and to update SARCs on investigations at monthly case review meetings. R-29: Service Secretaries establish policies to ensure specialized training of command personnel assigned to investigate retaliation related to sexual assault. R-30: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries expand the expedited transfer program to include job retraining for those in small specialty fields and to be available for bystanders and witnesses experiencing retaliation (on a case-by-case basis). R-31: The Secretary of Defense establish specific guidelines on the release of retaliation complaint disposition information to complainants. R-32: The Secretary of Defense begin tracking the Services' implementation of the statutorily required general or flag officer review of involuntary separations of sexual assault victims who made unrestricted reports in the previous year. R-33: Service Secretaries revise Service regulatory definitions of maltreatment, which currently contain an overly narrow intent requirement. R-34: Congress not create a UCMJ offense prohibiting social retaliation. R-35: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries develop targeted and innovative training on retaliation for commanders and all other Service members. R-36: The Secretary of Defense revise the Military Whistleblower Protection Act elements and burdens of proof for reprisal claims to align with those in the federal Whistleblower Protection Act.

RETALIATION
Retaliation Congressional and DoD Implementation	Subsequent to the JPP recommendations, Congress enacted FY17 NDAA, § 545, which requires DoD SAPRO to establish metrics to evaluate the efforts of the Armed Forces to prevent and respond to retaliation in connection with sexual assault and to identify best practices to be used by the Military Departments in the prevention of and response to retaliation. Congress enacted FY17 NDAA, § 543, which requires DoD to include in the annual SAPRO report to Congress detailed information on each claim of retaliation in connection with a report of sexual assault made by or against a Service member. On July 28, 2016, the DoD Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) announced that a newly created team of seven DoD IG investigators and a supervisor would directly handle sexual assault reprisal cases from across the Services rather than overseeing investigations at the branch level. Congress enacted FY17 NDAA, § 546, which requires DoD personnel who investigate claims of retaliation to receive training on the nature and consequences of retaliation and, in cases involving reports of sexual assault, on the nature and consequences of sexual assault trauma. Congress enacted FY17 NDAA, § 547, which requires the Secretary of Defense to develop regulations requiring a Service member who reports retaliation to be informed in writing of the results of the investigation, including whether the complaint was substantiated, unsubstantiated, or dismissed.

SEXUAL ASSAULT ADJUDICATION TRENDS
Adjudication Trends Tasks	Review and evaluate current trends in response to sexual assault crimes whether by courts-martial proceedings, non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency and appropriateness of the decisions, punishments, and administrative actions based on the facts of individual cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(B)) Identify any trends in punishments rendered by military courts, including general, special, and summary courts-martial, in response to sexual assault, including the number of punishments by type, and the consistency of the punishments, based on the facts of each case compared with the punishments rendered by Federal and State criminal courts. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(C)) Review and evaluate court-martial convictions for sexual assault in the year covered by the most-recent report required of the JPP and the number and description of instances when punishments were reduced or set aside upon appeal and the instances in which the defendant appealed following a plea agreement, if such information is available. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(D))

SEXUAL ASSAULT ADJUDICATION TRENDS
Adjudication Trends JPP Reports and Recommendations	6 Recommendations JPP Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses (April 2016) R-37: DoD collect and analyze case adjudication data using a standardized, document-based collection model, similar to those used by the JPP or U.S. Sentencing Commission, that incorporates uniform definitions and categories across all of the military Services. R-38: DoD include legal disposition information related to all adult sexual assault complaints in one annual DoD report, changing its policy that excludes adult-victim cases that are handled by the Family Advocacy Program (FAP) from the annual SAPRO reports to Congress. JPP Report on Statistical Data Regarding Military Adjudication of Sexual Assault Offenses for Fiscal Year 2015 (September 2017) R-52: DoD and the military Services use a standardized, document-based collection model for collecting and analyzing case adjudication data in order to implement Article 140a, UCMJ, regarding case management and data collection and accessibility. R-53: The new military justice data collection system required to be developed under Article 140a, UCMJ, should be designed so as to become the exclusive source of sexual assault case adjudication data for DoD's annual report to Congress on DoD's sexual assault prevention and response initiatives. R-54: The Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) should consider continuing to analyze adult-victim sexual assault court-martial data on an annual basis as the JPP has done, including patterns that the JPP discovered in its analysis of fiscal year 2015 court-martial data. JPP Report on Panel Concerns Regarding the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases (September 2017) R-60: The Secretary of Defense and the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

SEXUAL ASSAULT ADJUDICATION TRENDS
Adjudication Trends Congressional and DoD Implementation	Congress enacted FY 17 NDAA, § 5504, which created a new Article 140a, UCMJ (Case management; data collection and accessibility), requiring the Secretary of Defense to prescribe uniform standards and criteria using, insofar as practicable, the best practices of federal and state courts for collection and analysis of data concerning substantive offenses and procedural matters in a manner that facilitates case management and decision making within the military justice system. Congress enacted FY17 NDAA, § 574, requiring FAP to produce an annual report that includes the number of intimate partner, spousal, and child physical and sexual abuse incidents reported and substantiated each year, including analyses of types of abuse reported and characteristics of the victims and perpetrators. Another provision (§ 544) requires that the FAP and SAPRO annual reports be submitted together to Congress. However, the statute does not require intimate partner and spousal sexual assault case adjudication data to be included in either the FAP or SAPRO annual reports.

TRAINING AND EXPERIENCE OF MILITARY DEFENSE AND TRIAL COUNSEL
Counsel Training and Experience Task	Building on the adjudication data compiled by the JPP, assess the trends in the training and experience levels of military defense and trial counsel in adult sexual assault cases and the impact of those trends in the prosecution and adjudication of such cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(G))
Counsel Training and Experience JPP Reports and Recommendations	4 Recommendations JPP Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases (April 2017) R-39: The military Services provide defense counsel with access to independent and deployable defense investigators. R-40: The military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an independent audit of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimal level of staffing for the Service defense organizations. R-41: The Secretary of Defense direct that defense organizations be given approval and funding authority for their own expert witnesses. R-42: The military Services permit only defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in sexual assault cases, and defense counsel should have two or more consecutive years of experience in the role. JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP submitted questions on this topic to DoD and the Services in its Request for Information Sets 6 and 9. The JPP also received testimony at its May 13, 2016, public meeting session titled "Overview of Judge Advocate Training Programs." The JPP Subcommittee gathered information about trial and defense counsel training and experience in practice during site visits from July to September 2016.

TRAINING AND EXPERIENCE OF MILITARY DEFENSE AND TRIAL COUNSEL
Counsel Training and Experience Congressional and DoD Implementation	In the FY17 NDAA, § 542, Congress enacted a provision requiring the Service Secretaries to establish a system of military justice skill and experience identifiers to ensure that judge advocates with sufficient skills and experience in military justice are assigned to prosecute and defend cases and are assigned to develop less experienced judge advocates. The provision also requires the Service Secretaries to carry out a five-year pilot program to assess the feasibility and advisability of establishing a deliberate process of professional development in military justice for judge advocates.

VICTIMS' APPELLATE RIGHTS
Victims' Appellate Rights Task	Issues related to victims' appellate rights came to the attention of the JPP during the testimony of the Services' special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel program managers at the April 8, 2016, JPP public meeting. The Panel reviewed this issue pursuant to FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(J), which provides that the JPP may review other issues it considers appropriate.
Victims' Appellate Rights JPP Reports and Recommendations	5 Recommendations JPP Initial Report (February 2015) R-8: The Secretary of Defense consider establishing expedited procedures for mandatory interlocutory review to Courts of Criminal Appeals for Article 6b issues. JPP Report on Victims' Appellate Rights (June 2017) R-43: The Joint Service Committee on Military Justice revise R.C.M. 1103A to provide victims with notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to appellate counsel review of certain sealed materials. R-44: The Services formalize procedures to provide victims in sexual assault cases with timely notice of significant appellate matters and with convenient access to any unsealed documents filed in the case, if requested. R-45: Congress revise Section 547(a) of S. 2943, the Senate version of the FY17 NDAA, to provide victims with standing to protect their Article 6b rights in post-conviction appellate proceedings for issues as to which a victim previously had standing and was heard. R-46: Congress amend Article 6b, UCMJ, to grant the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) jurisdiction to hear a victim's appeal if a Service Court of Criminal Appeals denies the victim's petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b.

VICTIMS' APPELLATE RIGHTS
Victims' Appellate Rights Congressional and DoD Implementation	Congress enacted FY15 NDAA, § 535, granting victims the right to petition the Courts of Criminal Appeals for a writ of mandamus for violations of victims' rights afforded by Military Rules of Evidence 412 (Sex offense cases: The victim's sexual behavior or predisposition) and 513 (Psychotherapist–patient privilege), providing for expedited, but not mandatory, review. Congress expanded this right in the FY16 NDAA, § 531, to include additional protections under Article 6b, UCMJ; however, such interlocutory review remains discretionary. The Senate version of the FY17 NDAA, S.2943, § 547, would have amended Article 6b, UCMJ, to provide for victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings and victim notice of appellate matters; however, this section was not passed in the final version of the FY17 NDAA. The conference committee report noted that the conferees would reconsider the issue after receipt of the JPP's recommendations. The BE HEARD (Building an Environment for Helpful, Effective, and Accessible Representation and Decision-making) Act, introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman Mike Turner (OH-10) and Congresswoman Niki Tsongas (MA-3) in May 2017, would grant CAAF jurisdiction to hear victims' Article 6b appeals.

SPECIAL VICTIM INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION (SVIP) CAPABILITIES
SVIP Capabilities Task	Monitor trends in the development, utilization and effectiveness of the special victims capabilities required by section 573 of this Act. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(H))
SVIP Capabilities JPP Reports and Recommendations	5 Recommendations JPP Report on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military (September 2017) R-47: DAC-IPAD monitor the effects of the DoD policy that allows Service law enforcement agencies to assist the military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs) with sexual assault investigations. R-48: The Secretary of Defense take the necessary steps to ensure that special victims' counsel and victims' legal counsel (1) have the resources to schedule and attend the initial victim interview promptly after a report of sexual assault and (2) receive the training necessary to recognize the importance of a prompt initial victim interview by the MCIO to an effective and just prosecution. R-49: The Secretary of Defense identify and remove barriers to thorough questioning of a sexual assault victim by the MCIOs or other law enforcement agencies. R-50: The Secretary of Defense remove impediments to MCIOs' obtaining tangible evidence from a sexual assault victim, particularly information contained on a cell phone or other digital devices, and develop appropriate remedies that address victims' legitimate concerns about turning over this evidence to ensure that sexual assault investigations are complete and thorough. R-51: The Secretary of Defense review the resources, staffing, procedures, and policies at forensic laboratories within the Department of Defense to ensure expeditious testing of evidence by forensic laboratories. JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP submitted questions on this topic to DoD and the Services in its Request for Information Sets 2 and 6. The JPP also received testimony on SVIP at its April 8, 2016, public meeting session titled "MCIO Overview and Perspective of the SVIP Policies, Practices, and Procedures" and at its May 13, 2016, public meeting session titled "Overview of Training and Experience of Attorneys Prosecuting Sexual Assault Cases." The JPP Subcommittee gathered information about SVIP in practice during site visits from July to September 2016.

SPECIAL VICTIM INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION (SVIP) CAPABILITIES
SVIP Capabilities Congressional and DoD Implementation	DoD issued a directive-type memorandum in February 2014 (DTM 14-003) establishing special victim capability prosecution and legal support; the memorandum was most recently updated in April 2017. In February 2015 DoD issued an instruction establishing the SVIP capability within the MCIOs (DoDI 5505.19), which was most recently updated in March 2017. Also in March 2017, DoD reissued its instruction on the investigation of adult sexual assault (DoDI 5505.18) to incorporate SVIP requirements. These policies require MCIO lead investigators to notify each SVIP member (judge advocates and victim assistance personnel) within 24 hours of receiving an allegation, collaborate with the SVIP members within 48 hours, and consult with respective SVIP members at least monthly to assess progress in the investigation or prosecution of a covered offense and to help ensure that all aspects of the victim's needs are being met. They also require specialized training for all SVIP members and ensure integrated capability during all stages of the process.

SEXUAL ASSAULT DISPOSITION WITHHOLDING POLICY
Withholding Task	Monitor the implementation of the April 20, 2012, Secretary of Defense policy memorandum regarding withholding initial disposition authority under the Uniform Code of Military Justice in certain sexual assault cases. (FY13 NDAA, § 576(d)(2)(I))
Withholding JPP Reports and Recommendations	JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP submitted questions on this topic to DoD and the Services in its Request for Information Set 6. In addition, the JPP Subcommittee gathered information about how the withholding policy is working in practice during site visits from July to September 2016.
Withholding Congressional and DoD Implementation	No further legislative action has been taken on this topic by Congress, and the JPP is not aware of any additional action taken by DoD.

MANDATORY MINIMUM SENTENCING
Mandatory Minimum Sentencing Task	An assessment of the implementation and effect of the mandatory minimum sentences established by section 856(b) of title 10, United States Code (Article 56(b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), as added by section 1705, and the appropriateness of statutorily mandated minimum sentencing provisions for additional offenses under chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice). (FY14 NDAA, § 1731(b)(1)(C))
Mandatory Minimum Sentencing JPP Reports and Recommendations	JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP did not conduct further assessment or make recommendations on this issue in light of the Military Justice Review Group's (MJRG) recommended revision to Article 56, UCMJ (Sentencing), which would have replaced broad sentencing authority with sentencing guided by predetermined parameters and criteria. Under the MJRG proposal, once sentencing parameters and criteria took effect, they would replace the mandatory punitive discharge provisions in Article 56(b), eliminating an incongruity in the system whereby designated sex offenses result in mandatory discharge, but other serious crimes such as murder do not.
Mandatory Minimum Sentencing Congressional and DoD Implementation	In the Military Justice Act of 2016, Congress enacted § 5301, which amended Article 56, UCMJ (Sentencing), but did not adopt the MJRG's proposed sentencing parameters and criteria for all offenses, or alter the current mandatory punitive discharge provisions for certain sexual assault offenses.

ESTABLISHING PRIVILEGE FOR COMMUNICATIONS WITH DOD SAFE HELPLINE AND SAFE HELPROOM PERSONNEL
Safe Helpline Task	Conduct a review and assessment regarding the establishment of a privilege under the M.R.E. against the disclosure of communications between— (A) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe Helpline; and (B) users of and personnel staffing the Department of Defense Safe HelpRoom. (FY15 NDAA, § 545(a)(2))
Safe Helpline JPP Reports and Recommendations	JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP did not conduct further assessment or make recommendations on this issue in light of Executive Order 13696, which established such a privilege.
Safe Helpline Congressional and DoD Implementation	Executive Order 13696, signed June 17, 2015, amended M.R.E. 514(a)–(c) to establish a privilege for confidential communications with DoD Safe Helpline staff.

DEPOSITIONS
Dispositions Task	The Judicial Proceedings Panel assess the use of depositions in light of changes to the Article 32 proceeding, and determine whether to recommend changes to the deposition process, including whether military judges should serve as deposition officers. (RSP Recommendation 115)
Dispositions JPP Reports and Recommendations	JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP did not make further assessment or recommendations on this issue in light of the legislative provisions enacted in the FY15 NDAA and the Military Justice Act of 2016.
Dispositions Congressional and DoD Implementation	Congress enacted FY15 NDAA, § 532, which requires a party requesting a deposition to demonstrate that there are "exceptional circumstances" and that it is "in the interest of justice" to take a deposition. It also provided that the convening authority may designate commissioned officers as counsel. In the Military Justice Act of 2016, Congress enacted § 5231, which amended Article 49, UCMJ (Depositions), to codify and expand on the FY15 NDAA provision, including a requirement that deposition officers be judge advocates "whenever practicable."

PLEA BARGAINING
Plea Bargaining Task	The Judicial Proceedings Panel study whether the military plea bargaining process should be modified. (RSP Recommendation 117)
Plea Bargaining JPP Reports and Recommendations	JPP Final Report (October 2017) The JPP did not make further assessment or recommendations on this issue in light of the legislative provisions enacted in the Military Justice Act of 2016.
Plea Bargaining Congressional and DoD Implementation	In the Military Justice Act of 2016, Congress enacted § 5237, creating a new Article 53a, UCMJ (Plea agreements), that provides basic rules for (1) the construction and negotiation of plea agreements concerning the charges, the sentence, or both; (2) the military judge's determination of whether to accept a proposed plea agreement; and (3) the operation of plea agreements containing sentence limitations with respect to the military judge's sentencing authority.

Note 1: A list of all JPP recommendations in their entirety is provided in Appendix E to this report.

Note 2: A list of all JPP tasks in their entirety is provided in Appendix C to this report.

Note 3: This chart does not include recommendations 55–59, 62–63 from the JPP Report on Panel Concerns Regarding the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases (September 2017), because these recommendations are based on information received by the JPP Subcommittee during site visits and were not directly related to a task assigned to the JPP. Since they were issued only weeks before this report, no report on the status of their implementation can yet be made.

MEMORANDUM FOR MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. Following the Secretary's objectives and at the request of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, the Subcommittee conducted military installation site visits throughout the United States and Asia. Based upon information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee undertook additional research of several topics. The Subcommittee has completed its review on the topic of barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Barbara S. Jones
Subcommittee Chair

Executive Summary

SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT TO THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL ON BARRIERS TO THE FAIR ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—all involved in the military justice process, from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

On the basis of information received at the site visits, the Subcommittee identified several topics to present to the JPP, some of which required additional research. Therefore, the Subcommittee decided to issue separate reports on each of the identified subjects. The Subcommittee issued its first report in December 2016 on the subject of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, its second report in February 2017 on sexual assault investigations in the military, and three short reports in March 2017 on the topics of the Department of Defense (DoD) initial disposition withholding policy, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and the training and experience of trial counsel and special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel.

This final Subcommittee report focuses on some large-scale issues in the military's handling of sexual assault cases that came to light during the site visits and subsequent research. In the past several years, there has been a huge public outcry about the problem of sexual assault in the military. Media reports, the documentary film Invisible War, and the work of a number of women members of the U.S. House and Senate have fostered a public perception that sexual assault is rampant in the military and that the military has swept the problem under the rug both by failing to effectively prosecute the accused and by failing to treat the victims with dignity and compassion. To address these concerns, Congress, the Department of Defense, and the White House have all worked to change the military system so that victims of sexual assault are treated with respect and are not further victimized by the criminal justice process. Other changes have been put in place to counter the perception that sexual assault predators were being protected from prosecution by military commanders.

Many of these changes have been valuable. One possible sign that they are having an effect is the increase in the past few years of the number of sexual assault cases being reported. While its cause cannot be identified with certainty, many believe that it indicates greater confidence that the criminal justice system will help the victim and vigorously prosecute the accused.

As constructive and important as these changes have been, they have also produced an unintended negative consequence: they have, as the Subcommittee was repeatedly told on its site visits, raised serious questions about the fundamental fairness of the military justice process when it comes to the treatment of the accused.

It is vital for the military justice system to strike the right balance between the needs of the victim and the needs of the defendant. Both must be properly addressed if the system is to be seen as fair and just. The failure to create the perception and the reality of a just system can undermine morale, affect recruiting, and create a corrosive cynicism among military personnel. For that reason, the Subcommittee believed it was important to share the information it received with the JPP.

The Subcommittee identified a number of problems with how the military justice system treats sexual assault offenses:

1. The revised Article 32 process provides less information to convening authorities and no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense;

2. Because convening authorities currently lack meaningful written guidelines to help them decide whether a case warrants referral to court-martial, such as the likelihood of securing a conviction at trial, they may be referring sexual assault charges to trial on the basis of weak evidence;

3. Because the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority must be provided to the defense, the staff judge advocate may be unwilling to provide a complete and candid written assessment of the evidence in the case;

4. Counsel perceive that convening authorities feel public pressure to refer sexual assault cases to trial;

5. Some trial counsel complained they no longer have the access to sexual assault victims that they need in order to properly prepare those victims for trial;

6. Military members who potentially may sit on court-martial panels receive sexual assault prevention and response training that may confuse them regarding the legal standard for consent in sexual assault cases. The frequency of this training is also causing "training fatigue" among military members; and

7. The current policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims can make it difficult for investigators and prosecutors to adequately consult with victims prior to trial when victims have been transferred to faraway locations.

In this report, the Subcommittee makes nine recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP no longer serves a useful purpose. Such a review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of the preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be binding on the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further changes to the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP Subcommittee reiterates its recommendation— presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, and adopted by the JPP—that the defense be provided with independent investigators.

Recommendation 2: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Article 33, UCMJ, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates require the following standard for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the disposition guidance require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor. These factors should be considered in their totality, with no single factor determining the outcome.

Recommendation 3: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that after case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

Recommendation 4: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. The DAC-IPAD should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should consider whether such a change would allow the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed, candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

Recommendation 5: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Congress repeal provisions from the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary. The perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial created by these provisions and the consequent negative effects on the military justice system are more harmful than the problems that such provisions were originally intended to address.

Recommendation 6: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

Recommendation 7: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense ensure that SVCs/VLCs receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing full access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of a meaningful victim-prosecutor relationship in the advice they provide their victim-clients and assist prosecutors in sufficiently developing the rapport with the victim needed to fully prepare for trial.

Recommendation 8: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent continue to affect court-martial panel members.

Recommendation 9: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be changed to state that when possible, sexual assault victims should be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation. This change will help ensure that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial, will satisfy the need to separate the victim from the accused, and will maintain the victim's access to support systems while combating the perception that the ability to ask for these transfers has encouraged fraudulent claims of sexual assault. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should all receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can foster the perception among military members that the expedited transfer system is being abused and in how such transfers can be used by defense counsel to cast doubt on the victim's credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD review data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

Barriers to the Fair Administration of Military Justice in Sexual Assault Cases

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals from 25 military installations in the United States and Asia involved in the military justice process; these conversations focused on the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.[1] Discussions were held without attribution so that Subcommittee members could hear candid perceptions of the military's handling of sexual assault cases from the men and women who are investigating and litigating those cases. The Subcommittee spoke to groups of military prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel, paralegals, and investigators, as well as commanders, sexual assault response coordinators, victim advocates, and victim-witness liaisons from all military Services.

During the site visits, the Subcommittee identified a number of possible barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases. The Subcommittee determined that it would have to analyze, discuss, and develop the information gathered and conduct further research into some of the issues identified. Therefore, the Subcommittee held 13 meetings or teleconferences from September 2016 through May 2017. Drawing on the site visit data and the Subcommittee's additional discussion and research—including information regarding ethics rules and prosecutorial discretion, provided by representatives of the Services at a Subcommittee meeting held in January 2017—the Subcommittee made recommendations on several of these points in two previous reports to the JPP: one on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, issued in December 2016, and one on sexual assault investigations in the military, issued in February 2017.[2] In addition, the Subcommittee provided brief reports to the JPP in March 2017 on the topics of the Department of Defense (DoD) initial disposition withholding policy, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and training and experience of trial counsel and special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel.[3] This final report summarizes site visit comments and the Subcommittee's research into additional barriers to the fair administration of military justice in sexual assault cases.

I. BACKGROUND

Historically, sexual assault in the military has at times garnered the public's attention. In recent years, however, public demands for accountability and justice have grown louder and more persistent, following complaints by sexual assault victims about the military's handling of their allegations and how they are treated. As a result, the procedures for dealing with such cases have been changed.

Many victims complained that commanders dismissed their sexual assault allegations without further investigation or action. In response, several DoD or congressionally appointed panels reviewed the state of sexual assault prevention, victim care, investigation, and prosecution in the military and issued reports and recommendations on those topics.[4] Congress and DoD responded to these recommendations and to military sexual assault victims' complaints by adopting more than 100 statutory reforms and numerous policy changes in the area of military sexual assault. The majority of these statutory reforms and policy changes have been instituted since 2012, and many have sought to address the treatment of sexual assault victims.

Statutes creating the Special Victims' Counsel Program and expanding victims' rights have profoundly changed the treatment of sexual assault victims. The statute creating the Special Victims' Counsel Program provides that every military member who reports being sexually assaulted is entitled to have a military attorney appointed to advise him or her of legal issues surrounding the case and other matters. This attorney is authorized to represent the victim, including at the Article 32 hearing and court-martial, at all pretrial stages of the case, and at trial. Since its inception as an Air Force pilot program in 2013, the Special Victims' Counsel/Victims' Legal Counsel[5] (SVC/VLC) Program has evolved to the point that an SVC/VLC right to argue victim privacy issues in court is now recognized.[6] The ability to have an SVC/VLC present during investigative interviews has also helped increase victims' comfort level with the investigative and military justice processes.

The recent passage of legislation allowing victims to decline to testify at Article 32 preliminary hearings has also been perceived positively by sexual assault victims.

These military justice reforms were prompted by past failures to properly address sexual assault allegations. They have empowered sexual assault victims and provided them a voice in how their sexual assault allegations are handled. Yet these reforms have also had unintended and, at times, negative consequences. In the view of trial counsel, defense counsel, investigators, and other military personnel involved in the military criminal justice system who were interviewed by the Subcommittee members during installation site visits, the military justice system is placing the rights and preferences of sexual assault victims over the due process rights of those accused of these offenses. Many of those interviewed sense that in an effort to respond to public criticism and right past wrongs, commanders now feel pressure to resolve greater numbers of sexual assault allegations at courts-martial, regardless of the relative merits of the case or the likelihood of conviction. The result, counsel asserted, has been a dramatic increase in acquittals in these cases. Several counsel went so far as to state that these changes in the military justice system have placed justice and the perception of a fair system at risk.

This report discusses some of the changes made to the military justice process in recent years, as well as the perceived pressure on convening authorities and judge advocates to refer sexual assault cases to trial, regardless of the likelihood of conviction. Further, this report highlights some of the long-term negative consequences identified as resulting from the recent reforms. It builds on the observations and conclusions found in two earlier and related Subcommittee reports written following the installation site visits: the Subcommittee Report to the Judicial Proceedings Panel on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, the Subcommittee Report to the Judicial Proceedings Panel on Sexual Assault Investigations in the Military, and the Subcommittee papers on Initial Disposition Withholding Authority, Military Rules of Evidence 412 and 513, and Training and Experience of Trial Counsel and Special Victims' Counsel/Victims' Legal Counsel.[7]

II. REFERRING SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES TO COURT-MARTIAL

A. Early Stages of Case Processing

Before the convening authority can refer charges to a court-martial, several events must take place. While there are some important differences in the treatment of sexual assault offenses, many of the steps in the military justice process are the same regardless of the offense.

If a victim reports a sexual assault to certain identified personnel, he or she has the ability to file either a restricted or unrestricted report.[8] If the victim chooses to file an unrestricted report of a sexual assault offense, the Services' military criminal investigative organizations (MCIOs) investigate the offense.[9] When the investigation is completed or near completion, military prosecutors discuss the case with the appropriate commander, who determines whether to prefer charges or take some other disciplinary action against the alleged perpetrator.[10]

Rule for Court-Martial (R.C.M.) 306(b) provides guidance for judge advocates and convening authorities on this decision, stating that "[a]llegations of offenses should be disposed of in a timely manner at the lowest appropriate level."[11] Further guidance is contained in nonbinding discussion accompanying R.C.M. 306(b):

> The disposition decision is one of the most important and difficult decisions facing a commander. Many factors must be taken into consideration and balanced, including,

The Subcommittee's report on sexual assault investigations is still pending before the JPP. The three Subcommittee papers were presented to the JPP for informational purposes.

8 Restricted reports of adult sexual assault may be only made to sexual assault response coordinators, SAPR victim advocates, and healthcare personnel. U.S. DEP'T OF DEF. INSTR. [hereinafter DoDI] 6495.02, SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE (SAPR) PROGRAM PROCEDURES, Encl. 4 (Mar. 28, 2013, incorporating Change 2, effective Jul. 7, 2015).

9 The Subcommittee discussed problems associated with MCIO investigations of sexual assault offenses more fully in the SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL REPORT ON SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS IN THE MILITARY, supra note 2.

10 Only commanders who hold at least special court-martial convening authority and who are in the grade of O-6 (i.e., colonel or Navy captain) or higher can hold initial disposition authority in sexual assault cases. See U.S. DEP'T OF DEFENSE, MEMORANDUM FROM THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE ON WITHHOLDING INITIAL DISPOSITION AUTHORITY UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE IN CERTAIN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES (Apr. 20, 2012).

11 MANUAL FOR COURTS-MARTIAL, UNITED STATES (2016 ed.) [hereinafter 2016 MCM], Rule for Court-Martial [hereinafter R.C.M.] 306(b). R.C.M. 306(c) discusses potential dispositions of allegations: no punishment, administrative action, nonjudicial punishment, or disposition through courts-martial.

> to the extent practicable, the nature of the offenses, any mitigating or extenuating circumstances, the views of the victim as to disposition, any recommendations made by subordinate commanders, the interest of justice, military exigencies, and the effect of the decision on the accused and the command. The goal should be a disposition that is warranted, appropriate, and fair.
> In deciding how an offense should be disposed of, factors the commander should consider, to the extent they are known, include:
> (A) the nature of and circumstances surrounding the offense and the extent of the harm caused by the offense, including the offense's effect on morale, health, safety, welfare, and discipline;
> (B) when applicable, the views of the victim as to disposition;
> (C) existence of jurisdiction over the accused and the offense;
> (D) availability and admissibility of evidence;
> (E) the willingness of the victim or others to testify;
> (F) cooperation of the accused in the apprehension or prosecution of another accused;
> (G) possible improper motives or biases of the person(s) making the allegation(s);
> (H) availability and likelihood of prosecution of the same or similar and related charges against the accused by another jurisdiction; and
> (I) appropriateness of the authorized punishment to the particular accused or offense.[12]

For sex-related offenses committed in the United States, R.C.M. 306 provides for the victim to express his or her views as to whether the offense should be prosecuted by court-martial or in a civilian court with jurisdiction over the offense. The convening authority must consider the victim's views as to disposition, if available, before making a decision to prefer charges or take some other disciplinary action.[13]

If charges are preferred and the special court-martial convening authority (SPCMCA) deems a general court-martial appropriate, he or she must direct the case to a preliminary hearing under Article 32 of the UCMJ.[14]

13 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 306(e)(2). R.C.M. 306(e)(1) defines "sex-related" offense as any alleged violation of Article 120—Rape and sexual assault generally, 120a—Stalking, 120b—Rape and sexual assault of a child, 120c—Other sexual misconduct, 125—Forcible sodomy; bestiality, or any attempt thereof under Article 80, Uniform Code of Military Justice.

B. The Evolution of the Article 32 Process

1. Statutory Changes. Before charges may be referred to a general court-martial, Article 32 of the UCMJ requires a preliminary hearing, unless the accused waives the hearing.[15] In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA), Congress made substantial changes to Article 32. The impetus for these changes was a widely reported Article 32 investigation at the U.S. Naval Academy in which counsel questioned a Naval Academy midshipman who had reported being sexually assaulted for "more than 30 hours" and subjected her to "humiliating and abusive questions."[16] The legislative changes to Article 32 were also intended to align the procedures with civilian preliminary hearing proceedings, which are used to determine if there is probable cause and if a case should go to trial; during them, victims are often not called to testify.[17]

Prior to these statutory changes, the Article 32 hearing was intended to be a "thorough and impartial investigation" by an investigating officer into the truth and form of the charges.[18] The Article 32 hearing also served as a mechanism for pretrial discovery for the defense.[19] Military witnesses, including sexual assault victims, could be compelled to appear and testify at the Article 32 hearing.[20]

The FY14 NDAA changes to Article 32 applied to Article 32 hearings conducted on or after December 26, 2014.[21] These changes, which restyled the Article 32 from a pretrial investigation into a preliminary hearing, limited the purpose of the hearing to determining whether probable cause exists to believe an offense was committed and whether the accused in the case committed the offense.[22] Under the December 2014 Article 32 format, preliminary hearing officers (PHOs) are still required to determine whether the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the accused and the offense, to consider the form of the charges, and to make recommendations to the convening authority as to disposition.[23] In an effort to limit the scope of Article 32, these statutory changes also removed the ability of a PHO to compel a military victim to appear and testify at the hearing if the victim was found "reasonably available," but allowed the PHO to consider alternatives to testimony for the victim and any other witnesses, regardless of their availability.[24]

22 Another change to the Article 32 process requires that judge advocates be used as preliminary hearing officers "whenever practicable." 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 405(d)(1). While this had previously been the practice in the Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force, the Army traditionally used line officers in this role, with a judge advocate appointed to advise the Article 32 investigating officer on legal matters. In addition, the updated R.C.M. 405 requires the preliminary hearing officer to be equal to or senior in grade to the military prosecutor and military defense counsel representing the accused, "when practicable." 2016 MCM, supra note 11, R.C.M. 405(d)(1). Navy and Air Force counsel stated that they often use active duty and reserve military judges as Article 32 preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases.

As observed above, while the Article 32 hearing had previously served as a means of discovery for the defense, the new R.C.M. 405, reflecting the statutory changes to Article 32, specifically states that the Article 32 hearing is "not intended to serve as a means of discovery."[25] This change is significant, as the U.S. Court of Military Appeals (now the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, or CAAF) previously emphasized the value of the Article 32 investigation as a discovery tool. In the case of Hutson v. United States, CAAF even relied on the Article 32 hearing to uphold a judge's refusal to grant the defense's request for appointment of an investigator.[26] While acknowledging that investigative assistance is provided for indigent defendants in federal courts, CAAF held that the federal statute used to grant such assistance in federal court was not available to military defendants, stating: "[I]t should be noted that the pretrial investigation to which these charges have been referred is the accused's only practicable means of discovering the case against him."[27] In light of the changes to the Article 32 process, this CAAF decision provides further support for the Subcommittee's recent recommendation, which the JPP adopted, that independent investigators be provided to the defense.[28]

A provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 (FY17 NDAA) removes the provision in Article 32 permitting the accused to present additional evidence at the Article 32 hearing "in defense and mitigation, relevant to the limited purposes of the hearing," and replaces it with language stating that the accused may present additional evidence "that is relevant to the issues [of whether there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the offense and the PHO's recommendation as to disposition of the case]."[29] It is too early to determine how PHOs will interpret this change and what effect, if any, it will have on the defense's ability to present additional evidence in defense and mitigation at the Article 32 hearing.

2. Site Visit Information. During installation site visits the Subcommittee spoke with trial counsel, defense counsel, and SVCs/VLCs, most of whom were familiar with both the pre-December 2014 and the new Article 32 proceedings. The consensus among them was that unlike the pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation, the new Article 32 preliminary hearing is not a meaningful process for evaluating the strength of the case or for any other purpose. Sexual assault victims are no longer required to testify at Article 32 hearings, and frequently do not. Trial counsel stated that often the first time a victim provides testimony and is subject to cross-examination by defense counsel is at the court-martial. Beyond Article 32 issues, several trial counsel told Subcommittee members that some SVCs/VLCs limit trial counsel access to the victim, thereby preventing trial counsel from building sufficient rapport with the victim and having the repeated interviews that they feel are necessary to prepare for trial. Several counsel stated that this combination of factors has led to victims being unprepared for trial and testifying poorly on the stand.

Frequently, no witnesses appear at the Article 32 preliminary hearing, which simply involves trial counsel submitting documentary evidence for consideration. Many trial and defense counsel with whom the Subcommittee spoke referred to the Article 32 preliminary hearing as a "paper drill" or "rubber stamp." While many defense counsel noted that they have begun waiving the hearing, some stated that they have continued to assert the accused's right to an Article 32 hearing even if they no longer get a chance to question the victim or receive additional information about the government's case.

Counsel universally observed that pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigations were used to identify weak cases and prevent them from going to court-martial, but the new Article 32 hearing no longer serves this function. The pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation and investigating officer's recommendation as to whether the evidence supported the charges and whether the charges should be sent forward to court-martial (and to what type of court-martial) helped test the strength of the prosecution's case. According to many trial and defense counsel who spoke with the Subcommittee, the limited scope of the present preliminary hearing and the removal of the requirement for victim testimony are the primary reasons why counsel do not believe the current Article 32 format is a useful tool for vetting cases. Several trial counsel acknowledged that prosecutors should be confident that probable cause exists and that they have sufficient evidence to prevail at trial before charges are even preferred.

Article 32 PHOs' recommendations on whether the case should proceed to trial remain nonbinding, and some trial and defense counsel noted that often staff judge advocates and convening authorities do not abide by the recommendations.[30] Such disregard occurs even when the PHO finds no probable cause to support a charge or an extremely low likelihood of conviction, recommending that the case should be dismissed outright or resolved through disciplinary action at some lower level. Counsel complained that because of the changes to the Article 32 process and because the PHO's recommendations are nonbinding, too many cases are referred to court-martial in which there is little chance of securing a conviction.

3. JPP Public Meeting Commentary on the Effects of the Changes to the Article 32 Hearing. Senior trial and defense counsel and former military judges, speaking to the JPP at a public meeting in January 2017, reinforced the comments of counsel on site visits that Article 32 hearings in sexual assault cases have become "paper drills" at which neither the victim nor other witnesses testify.[31] A senior trial counsel told the JPP that since Article 32 and R.C.M. 405 were modified, the trial counsel has "a lot more control over the presentation of evidence" at the Article 32 preliminary hearing, and can often establish probable cause with only a copy of the victim's statement and portions of the investigation report.[32]

Some counsel and former judges noted that they are seeing more Article 32 waivers from defense counsel since the new Article 32 preliminary hearing took effect, though some defense counsel said that they continue to go forward with these hearings to obtain what information they can.[33] A former judge told the JPP that in pre-December 2014 Article 32 proceedings, it was rare for the defense to submit an Article 32 waiver in a sexual assault case.[34] According to a senior trial counsel, the pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation was used as a "litmus test" to determine the strength of the case and to see how the victim comes across while testifying. He further stated that given the limited scope of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing, he believes more cases are now being referred to court-martial than would have been under the more robust pre-December 2014 Article 32 investigation.[35] Another senior trial counsel elaborated that some convening authorities who still want to use the Article 32

30 Article 32 investigating officers' recommendations under the pre-December Article 32 process were also nonbinding.

preliminary hearing to "test the evidence" in a sexual assault case are frustrated that they can no longer do that effectively under the new Article 32 process.[36] A senior defense counsel also questioned whether the new Article 32 preliminary hearing serves any meaningful purpose.[37]

A number of counsel expressed the concern that the more superficial process mandated by the current Article 32 is leading convening authorities to make court-martial referral decisions with less information than was available to them in the past. These counsel corroborated the perception of counsel interviewed by the Subcommittee during site visits that the reforms to Article 32 have made the hearings less meaningful, and as a result more sexual assault cases are referred despite weak evidence and little chance of conviction at trial.[38] One senior trial counsel expressed the opinion that an experienced trial counsel should be able to distill the evidence, research case law, and provide a well-supported recommendation to the convening authority. In his view, the Article 32 should become more like the civilian grand jury system.[39] A Marine Corps VLC concurred, stating that the Marine Corps has implemented a prosecution merits memo in which the trial counsel "writes a complete and informed opinion" of the evidence in the case and the likelihood of achieving a conviction at trial.[40] Prosecutors from the other Services indicated that they draft similar memos or have similar procedures for informing staff judge advocates and convening authorities about the evidence in such cases. Conversely, the Marine Corps VLC stated his view that it is not necessary for victims to testify in the Article 32 hearing. He added that it is traumatic for them and slows the process down.[41]

Several counsel pointed out that the recommendation of the Article 32 PHO is nonbinding on the convening authority, and the Article 32 hearing is now less effective at identifying cases that are likely to result in a conviction at court-martial. Practitioners who testified before the JPP in January 2017 stated they were aware of cases in which Article 32 PHOs either found no probable cause for a charge or recommended against sending the charge to trial, but their advice was not followed by the staff judge advocate and convening authority.[42] In addition, a senior defense counsel told the JPP that as a prosecutor, he has seen situations in which there was almost no probability of winning at trial, and when this information was presented to the convening authority, the convening authority still elected to refer the charges to court-martial.[43] He added that sending fatally weak cases on to court-martial was very demoralizing to the trial counsel.[44]

4. Data on Article 32 Recommendations and Convening Authority Referral Decisions. The Services provided case information and documents showing that out of 416 sexual assault cases that went to general court-martial in fiscal year 2015, 54 cases involved an Article 32 investigating officer or PHO recommending against referring one or more sexual offense charges to court-martial and the convening authority electing to refer the charge(s) to a general court-martial despite that recommendation.[45] In all these cases, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority was to refer these charges to general court-martial.[46]

In 45 of the 54 cases in which the Article 32 investigating officer or PHO recommended against referring one or more sexual offenses to trial, the accused was ultimately acquitted of those offenses, though the accused may have been convicted of other offenses.[47]

C. Referral and Prosecutorial Discretion

Following the Article 32 preliminary hearing, the PHO's report, along with the case file and SPCMCA disposition recommendation, is forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority (GCMCA) for disposition.[48] The staff judge advocate then provides written pretrial advice to the convening authority, including a conclusion as to whether each specification states an offense under the UCMJ, whether the allegations are warranted by the evidence in the Article 32 preliminary hearing report, and whether a court-martial would have jurisdiction over the accused and offense, as well as a recommendation of what action should be taken by the convening authority.[49] A copy of the pretrial advice must be provided to the defense if the convening authority refers the case to court-martial; this is not a document covered by attorney-client privilege.[50] The GCMCA must then decide whether to refer some or all of the charges to a general court-martial.[51]

1. Rules Governing Referral of Charges. R.C.M. 601 sets forth the basis for the referral of charges to court-martial:

> If the convening authority finds or is advised by a judge advocate that there are reasonable grounds to believe that an offense triable by a court-martial has been committed and that the accused committed it, and that the specification alleges an offense, the convening authority may refer it. The finding may be based on hearsay in whole or in part. The convening authority or judge advocate may consider information from any source[.][52]

45 While all of the cases went to trial in fiscal year 2015, some went to Article 32 hearings prior to the Dec. 26, 2014, change to the Article 32 preliminary hearing and some took place after. These numbers do not reflect the total number of sexual assault cases from all of the Services that went to general court-martial in fiscal year 2015: those cases for which the JPP staff did not receive all case file documents were not included in the total.

46 The pretrial advice in 5 of the 54 case files was not available.

47 The reasons the Article 32 investigating officer or PHO stated they recommended against referral of a sexual offense specification to trial were because he or she determined there were no reasonable grounds to believe the accused committed the offenses/there was no probable cause, or because the prosecution was unlikely to prevail at trial. Under the pre-December 2014 Article 32, the investigating officer's conclusion regarding whether reasonable grounds exist to believe that the accused committed the offenses alleged must be included in his or her report. 2012 MCM, supra note 19, R.C.M 405(j)(2)(H). The new Article 32 process requires the PHO to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the accused committed the offenses alleged. 10 U.S.C. § 832 (UCMJ, Art. 32).

"Information from any source" may include hearsay and information not previously presented at the Article 32 hearing or to the SPCMCA. This rule states that the convening authority or judge advocate is not required to resolve legal issues, "including objections to evidence," prior to referral.[53] The written discussion for R.C.M. 601(d)(1) refers back to disposition factors from R.C.M. 306, previously discussed in the "Early Stages of Case Processing" section of this report, that the convening authority should consider in deciding whether to refer the case to court-martial.[54]

2. Legislation and U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The FY17 NDAA created a new Article 33 under the UCMJ, which directs the Secretary of Defense to issue nonbinding guidance to be considered by convening authorities and judge advocates when exercising their duties with respect to the disposition of charges.[55] The new Article 33 states that this guidance should take into account the "principles contained in official guidance of the Attorney General to attorneys for the Government with respect to disposition of Federal criminal cases."[56]

The official guidance of the Attorney General mentioned in the new Article 33 refers to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual, which specifies a probable cause standard for prosecutors in determining whether to commence or recommend prosecution or some other disposition.[57] Within this section, however, probable cause is only a threshold consideration that, if met, does not automatically warrant prosecution.[58] The manual further provides that the attorney should commence prosecution if he or she believes that the conduct constitutes a federal offense and "that the admissible evidence will probably be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction"; nevertheless, prosecution should be declined when there is no substantial federal interest in prosecution, the person is subject to prosecution in another state, or there is an adequate non-criminal alternative.[59] The discussion to this section states that "both as a matter of fundamental fairness and in the interest of efficient administration of justice, no prosecution should be initiated against any person unless the government believes that the person probably will be found guilty by an unbiased trier of fact."[60]

3. The American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Standards. Similarly, according to the American Bar Association's (ABA) Criminal Justice Standards for the Prosecution Function, a prosecutor should file and maintain criminal charges only when the charges are supported by probable cause, when "admissible evidence will be sufficient to support conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, and [when] the decision to charge is in the interests of justice."[61] These standards also state that a prosecutor may file and maintain charges "even if juries in the jurisdiction have tended to acquit persons accused of the particular kind of criminal act in question."[62]

The Air Force has implemented, in modified form, the ABA Criminal Justice Standards. In its standard for charging decisions, the Air Force rule states that charges must be supported by probable cause and that a "trial counsel should not institute or permit the continued pendency of criminal charges in the absence of admissible evidence to support a conviction."[63] The other Services have not implemented the ABA standard, though representatives from the Coast Guard and Navy noted they informally use a version of it.[64]

4. Review of Disposition Decisions. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (FY14 NDAA) contained a provision requiring that a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed, either by a higher general court-martial convening authority or by the Service Secretary, depending on the circumstances.[65] This provision, which applies only to cases in which charges have been preferred and for which the staff judge advocate has provided the convening authority with pretrial advice under Article 34 of the UCMJ, was further modified in the FY15 NDAA to require that a convening authority's decision not to refer certain sexual assault cases be reviewed by the Service Secretary when the chief prosecutor of the Service requests such review.[66]

Responding to the JPP Subcommittee's request for information on the number of times that these elevated review provisions have been invoked, the Services provided the following:[67]

- All of the Services reported that since December 26, 2013,[68] there have been zero instances in which a Service Secretary reviewed a convening authority's decision not to refer a qualifying sex-related offense to court-martial.
- All of the Services reported that since December 19, 2014,[69] there have been zero instances in which their chief prosecutor requested that the Service Secretary review a convening authority's decision not to refer a qualifying sex-related offense to court-martial.
- Since December 26, 2013, the Services reported the following instances in which a case involving a qualifying sex-related offense was forwarded for review to the next superior commander after the general court-martial convening authority decided not to refer the case to court-martial.
  - » Army: 8 cases. Of these 8 cases, there was one instance in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - » Air Force: 21 cases.[70] Of these 21 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.
  - » Navy: 11 cases. Of these 11 cases, there were zero instances in which the next superior commander decided to refer the charge(s) to court-martial.

5. Possible Pressure on Convening Authorities to Refer Sexual Assault Cases to Courts-Martial. As noted, many trial and defense counsel interviewed by the Subcommittee during site visits mentioned their perception that convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial, in part owing to public and congressional interest in this issue. Several examples illustrate this pressure.

In late 2013, in a well-publicized case involving sexual assault allegations, a U.S. Air Force convening authority, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, following a pretrial hearing, agreed with legal advisors that the evidence was not sufficient to proceed to court-martial and dismissed the charges.[71] The acting Secretary of the Air Force then transferred the case for action to a different convening authority, 70 The Secretary of the Air Force served as the superior GCMCA in one of the 21 cases. The Secretary reviewed the case not because it met criteria for secretarial review under the provisions of FY14 NDAA § 1744 or FY15 NDAA § 541, but because she was the next superior GCMCA.

The convening authority, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, had earlier that year overturned an officer's sexual assault conviction, an act that angered many and led to legislation severely limiting a convening authority's ability to grant post-trial clemency relief in sexual assault cases.

who referred the case to a general court-martial.[72] Senator Claire McCaskill (D-MO) then called for Lieutenant General Franklin's removal from command, declaring: "Lieutenant General Franklin should not be allowed to fulfill the responsibilities of military command because he has repeatedly shown he lacks sound judgment."[73] The case eventually went to trial, and the accused was acquitted of all charges.[74] During the trial, the defense raised an unlawful command influence motion and introduced evidence that following Lieutenant General Franklin's dismissal of charges, the Air Force Judge Advocate General told Lieutenant General Franklin's staff judge advocate that failure to refer the case to trial would "place the Air Force in a difficult position with Congress" and that "absent a 'smoking gun,' victims are to be believed and their cases referred to trial."[75] Shortly thereafter, Lieutenant General Franklin announced that he would retire from the Air Force.

Also in 2013, Senator McCaskill blocked the confirmation of an Air Force convening authority, Lieutenant General Susan Helms, to the position of Air Force Space Command vice commander because she had overturned the sexual assault conviction of a member of her command.[76] Senator McCaskill expressed concerns about Lieutenant General Helms' decision, noting that it was against the advice of the staff judge advocate, who recommended that Lieutenant General Helms affirm the conviction. Senator McCaskill stated, "At a time when the military is facing a crisis of sexual assault, making a decision that sends a message which dissuades reporting of sexual assaults, supplants the finding of a jury, contradicts the advice of counsel, and further victimizes a survivor of sexual assault is unacceptable."[77]

Another source of perceived pressure came from the military's commander in chief, President Barack Obama. In May 2013, during a press conference, President Obama told reporters that those who commit sexual assault in the military should be "prosecuted, stripped of their positions, court-martialed, fired, dishonorably discharged."[78] These remarks led to defense counsel filing unlawful command influence motions in numerous courts-martial, on the grounds that the President's remarks could be interpreted by panel members as an attempt to influence the outcomes of courts-martial in sexual assault cases.[79] Lawyers argued that the President's comments could be considered unlawful command influence because they directed specific outcomes in sexual assault cases and were in conflict with the expectation that commanders exercise discretion in making disposition decisions. In an effort to blunt the negative effects of the President's remarks, the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum reiterating his and the President's expectations that those involved in the military justice process base their decisions on their independent judgment of the facts of each case, and not consider "personal

6. Site Visit Information. Counsel discussed the standard to refer a case to court-martial, which is probable cause—lower than the standard typically applied in state and federal prosecutions. Trial and defense counsel alike believe that the probable cause standard is too low and that convening authorities should be allowed to take into account other factors, such as the credibility of the victim and the likelihood of obtaining a conviction at trial. Judge advocates must hold a license with a state bar to practice law. Because the codes of ethics required by many state bars include standards for prosecution comparable to the United States Attorney's Manual and ABA Standards discussed above, several counsel expressed concern that they may be violating their state bar ethical rules by prosecuting cases in which they feel the charges are not supported by probable cause or in which there is no reasonable likelihood of proving the charges at trial.

Judge advocates overwhelmingly reported a perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, regardless of merit. According to many of the judge advocates interviewed on site visits, this pressure extends to weak cases that civilian jurisdictions would not prosecute and, in some cases, have already declined to prosecute. The vast majority of prosecutors and defense counsel who spoke with the Subcommittee have the impression that this pressure causes convening authorities to favor referral to court-martial rather than deal with the potential adverse ramifications of not referring a sexual assault case, such as career setbacks, media scrutiny, the possibility of their non-referral decisions being subjected to elevated review, or questions about why the case was not referred. These lawyers suspect that commanders may feel that the act of sending a case to trial, regardless of merit, is perceived as "safe" and harmless with respect to the parties involved and the justice system as a whole.

A commander (O-6) interviewed on a site visit told the Subcommittee that he forwards every sexual assault case to the next general officer in the chain of command for disposition decision, "because I would not want to get it wrong and have someone get away, so I send it forward to let the system sort it out." When asked what, if any, pressure is on commanders to handle sexual assault cases a certain way, one commander replied that he felt the need to "do something immediately" or face harm to his career. Another commander felt that there was pressure to be transparent throughout the process, rather than pressure to send every case to court-martial.

The discussion to R.C.M. 306(b) states that one of the factors a commander should consider when disposing of a case is the views of the victim regarding disposition.[81] Many counsel conveyed their perception that the merits of the case have become less important than the victim's preference regarding disposition. The rationale for referring some cases to court-martial provided by some prosecutors and commanders is that the court-martial process allows the victim to have his or her "day in court," which was described as a laudable end in itself, regardless of outcome. One commander acknowledged that there is pressure to go to trial if the victim wants to go to trial, regardless of the case's merits.

In addition, trial and defense counsel explained that in their experience guilty plea agreements, in which the defendant agrees to plead guilty to some or all charges in exchange for a lesser sentence, will not be approved by commanders if the victim does not support it. Likewise, the common perception among judge advocates is that a victim has veto power over whether the commander prefers to dispose of a case in an alternate forum, such as through administrative separation proceedings or nonjudicial punishment.

7. Information Presented to the JPP and Subcommittee. Reflecting the same view that the Subcommittee members heard during site visits, counsel speaking at a JPP public hearing also expressed concern about the low threshold of probable cause required to refer a case to court-martial. In the view of a senior defense counsel, the changes to the Article 32, combined with this low threshold to refer cases, result in sexual assault cases being referred when there is no chance for conviction, an outcome that causes both the accused and victim to suffer needlessly.[82] He further compared the military justice system to the civilian justice system, in which experienced prosecutors have the discretion to bring a case to trial, or not, based on the state of the evidence.[83] Another senior defense counsel similarly suggested that prosecutors and convening authorities in the military should exercise more discretion in referring cases to trial, much as state and federal prosecutors do, and refer cases to trial only when the evidence is sufficient to secure a conviction.[84]

A senior defense counsel told the JPP that the pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial is very high. No convening authority wants to fail to refer a sexual assault case to court only to have it determined later that there was additional evidence and the case should have been tried by court-martial.[85]

In January 2017, the JPP Subcommittee held a hearing on the standards currently applied by military prosecutors and heard from ethics officials and senior prosecutors from the Services. Participants highlighted the differences between the military and civilian justice systems, noting that the goal of the military system is not only to promote justice but also to maintain good order and discipline. In the military justice system, prosecutorial discretion is vested in convening authorities, rather than prosecutors.[86] However, all the Services have adopted some version of ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 3.8, which states that prosecutors have an ethical obligation to ensure that all charges are supported by probable cause.[87] If the situation arises in which a prosecutor believes a charge is not supported by probable cause, but his or her supervising attorney disagrees, ethical rules allow the junior attorney to rely on the supervising attorney's "reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty."[88] One presenter noted that in the previous seven years, his Service's ethics office had yet to have a trial counsel call with concerns about prosecuting a case without probable cause—an indication, he believes, that the counsel are working this out with their supervisors.[89]

One counsel described a dilemma in which prosecutors can find themselves when dealing with some sexual assault cases, giving the example of a sexual assault that occurs when the victim is too intoxicated to consent to sexual activity. If the offense is charged under the theory that the victim is incapable of consenting due to intoxication, guilt may be difficult to prove when there is evidence that the victim was walking, talking, texting, and performing other activities close in time to when the alleged assault occurred. On the other hand, if the offense is charged under the "bodily harm" theory of sexual assault, prosecutors will have problems when the victim does not recall what happened because of his or her intoxication, making it difficult to prove that the touching was offensive. In this situation, it can be difficult to establish probable cause.[90] In such cases, he explained, sometimes the prosecutor cannot establish probable cause, but the victim believes she was sexually assaulted and tells the convening authority that she wants the case to go to trial.[91] In these situations, they rely on the prosecution merit review of the case, using the R.C.M. 306 factors listed above, to persuade the convening authority that the evidence is not supported by probable cause.[92] In addition, Article 34, UCMJ, states that the convening authority cannot refer a charge to a general court-martial if advised in writing by the staff judge advocate that the specification is not warranted by the evidence.[93] According to the counsel, Navy prosecutors look not only at whether there is probable cause but at whether there is a reasonable probability of success at trial.[94] He told the Subcommittee that they have been successful in convincing convening authorities to use this higher standard in deciding whether to refer cases.[95]

Another counsel told the Subcommittee that once probable cause is established, counsel are compelled to go forward with a case even when they do not believe there is reasonable likelihood of success at trial.[96] Several counsel emphasized that there are cases in which conviction at trial seems unlikely, but they go forward to trial because "it is the right thing to do."[97]

8. Data on Referral Decisions. The JPP staff collected sexual assault courts-martial information and case documents from fiscal year 2015 from the Services and entered this information into an electronic database. The data from fiscal year 2015 encompassed 738 cases, all of which involved at least one preferred charge of a sexual offense. Dr. Cassia Spohn, Foundation Professor and Director, School of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Arizona State University, then analyzed these data, producing the following statistical information.[98]

According to the FY 2015 data, for sexual assault cases that went to courts-martial, 79% were referred to a general court-martial, 13% were referred to a special court-martial, and 7% were referred to a summary court-martial. In 52% of the cases referred to courts-martial, a military judge was the factfinder; 40% went to a panel of members; and 7% went to a summary court-martial officer.[99]

99 This data was rounded to the nearest whole number and does not add up to 100 percent.

For cases in which the accused was charged with at least one penetrative offense (rape, aggravated sexual assault, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts to commit these offenses), 28% were convicted of a sexual assault offense,[100] 22% were convicted of a non-sex offense only, and 21% were acquitted of all charges. Another 14% of cases received an alternate disposition,[101] and 15% had all charges dismissed prior to trial.[102]

For cases in which the accused was charged with at least one sexual contact offense (aggravated sexual contact, abusive sexual contact, wrongful sexual contact, and attempts to commit these offenses), 18% were convicted of a sexual contact offense, 41% were convicted of a non-sex offense only, and 13% were acquitted of all charges. Another 22% of cases received an alternate disposition, and 6% had all charges dismissed prior to trial.

FY15 – Case Outcomes by Most Serious Sexual Assault Offense Preferred

Penetrative offense (530 cases)	Number	Percent (%)
Convicted of a sexual offense	150	28%
Convicted of a non-sex offense	114	22%
Acquitted of all charges	113	21%
Alternate disposition/dismissal	153	29%
Contact offense (208 cases)
Convicted of a contact offense	37	18%
Convicted of a non-sex offense	85	41%
Acquitted of all charges	27	13%
Alternate disposition/dismissal	59	28%

Dr. Spohn also calculated conviction and acquittal rates for sexual assault cases that were tried at court-martial (excluding cases that went to alternate disposition or had charges dismissed prior to trial). For cases in which the most serious offense tried was a penetrative offense, 40% resulted in convictions of a sexual assault offense, 30% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 30% resulted in acquittal of all charges.

For cases in which the most serious sex offense tried at court-martial was a sexual contact offense, 25% resulted in convictions of a sexual contact offense, 57% resulted in convictions of a non-sex offense only, and 18% resulted in acquittal of all charges.

100 The vast majority of these cases were convicted of a penetrative offense.

101 Alternate dispositions primarily consist of resignation or administrative discharge in lieu of trial by court-martial. These resignations or discharges usually include an adverse service characterization.

102 For this "all charges dismissed prior to trial" category, the JPP staff does not have information on whether these cases resulted in the accused receiving nonjudicial punishment, administrative action, or no punishment.

FY15 – Case Outcomes of Trial by Court-Martial

Convicted of a non-sex offense	114	30%
Acquitted of all charges	113	30%
Contact offense (149 cases)
Convicted of a contact offense	37	25%
Convicted of a non-sex offense	85	57%
Acquitted of all charges	27	18%

Annual reports from the Service Judge Advocates General to the Code Committee provide some courts-martial data, though they do not provide specific information on sexual assault courts-martial. In the Fiscal Year 2015 Annual Report, the Army and Navy indicated that while their courts-martial caseload had declined from previous years, the percentage of contested cases remained constant or increased.[103] In that report, the Marine Corps stated that between 2012 and 2014, the number of contested sexual assault cases more than tripled. Their number of contested sexual assault cases in fiscal year 2015 was below that of fiscal year 2013 and 2014, but it was more than twice that of fiscal year 2012.[104]

III. ADDITIONAL ISSUES

A. Prosecutors' Lack of Access to the Victim. Victims with appointed SVCs/VLCs are likely to permit fewer interviews with prosecutors (and investigators) than victims without counsel.[105] Furthermore, when victims do agree to meet with prosecutors, the interviews are often in the presence of a SVC/VLC, who sometimes object to various questions and prevent those interviews from being as probing as they might otherwise be. Investigators also pointed out that few victims grant investigators access to their personal cell phones, which typically contain a wealth of evidence. SVCs/VLCs consistently reported that they do advise victims against sharing information from their phones or social media accounts with investigators. No prosecutors who acknowledged being denied access to the victim's cell phone during interviews indicated that they had considered not prosecuting the case. Prosecutors frequently lamented the loss of rapport-building opportunities because victims now are represented by SVCs/VLCs, even though they appreciated that victims' counsel provide valuable advice and guidance and relieve trial counsel of some of the time burden of helping victims navigate the legal system.

Defense counsel access to victims is discussed in the Subcommittee of the Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, supra note 2.

B. Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Training. Most sexual assault response coordinators and victim advocates who spoke with Subcommittee members acknowledged that misperceptions persist throughout the military regarding the consumption of alcohol and lack of consent, specifically that the consumption of any amount of alcohol makes a person incapable of consenting to sexual activity. Sexual assault response coordinators (SARCs) and victim advocates (VAs) stated they do not currently instruct Service members that "one beer means a person cannot consent." Instead, they emphasize to their audiences that having sex with an intoxicated person has risks and that determining intoxication can be difficult. At some installations, judge advocates stated they review the training materials or assist with the SAPR training to ensure information on this topic is relayed correctly. The Subcommittee viewed this as a positive development.

Commanders who spoke to the Subcommittee consistently expressed concerns about the frequency of mandatory SAPR training, describing it as time-consuming and potentially counterproductive because of perceived "training fatigue." One worried that the Sexual Harassment and Assault Response and Prevention (SHARP) classes and safety briefings are so repetitive that Service members may "tune out" the message.

In the view of some practitioners, SAPR training has become so pervasive that it affects the judgment and selection of potential panel members.[106] Counsel in the Army pointed out that every battalion-sized unit designates a noncommissioned officer (NCO) as the unit's VA, a collateral responsibility that requires specialized training on the topic of sexual assault from a victim-centric perspective. These senior NCOs, along with the other officer or enlisted members on a court-martial panel, have been instructed about the behavior that constitutes sexual assault so many times in SHARP briefings that they have strong opinions about the law. Consequently, counsel find it difficult to correct misperceptions and educate members on the nuances of the law and the burden of proof required at courts-martial.

A defense counsel providing information to the JPP at the January 2017 public meeting stated that in her experience, court-martial panel members, after years of SAPRO training, are "predisposed to believe the victims and misinterpret the legal definition of consent and mistake of fact as to consent."[107] The perception persists, in her view, that if a person is drinking, he or she cannot consent to sexual contact. She further noted that the voir dire process at trial does not completely expose the biases of potential panel members.[108]

Bolstering this point, in a September 2016 Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals decision involving an erroneous jury instruction on the definition of "impairment" in a sexual assault case,[109]

106 See Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual assault Crimes Panel 37, supra note 4 ("Response System Panel Recommendation 80: The Secretary of Defense and Service Secretaries ensure prevention programs address concerns about unlawful command influence. In particular, commanders and leaders must ensure sexual assault prevention and response training programs and other initiatives do not create perceptions among those who may serve as panel members at courts-martial that commanders expect particular findings and/or sentences at trials or compromise an accused Service member's presumption of innocence, right to fair investigation and disposition, and access to witnesses or evidence. Judge advocates with knowledge and expertise in criminal law should review sexual assault prevention training materials to ensure the materials neither taint potential panel members (military jurors) nor present inaccurate legal information.").

109 United States v. Newlan, No. 201400409 at 23 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. Sep. 13, 2016). The Court set forth a definition for "impairment" in such cases: "'Impairment' is the state of being damaged, weakened or diminished. Impairment rendering someone 'incapable of consenting' is that level of impairment which is sufficient to deprive him or her of the cognitive ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct in question or the physical or mental ability to make or to communicate a the court found that many members of the panel received training from SAPR personnel that "if someone ingested any alcohol, that individual was no longer able to legally consent."[110] The court stated:

> We first note that the erroneous definition of "impairment" may have compounded the legally-inaccurate proposition—that "one drink means you can't consent"—that some members received while attending mandatory SAPR training. While likely well-intentioned, these statements made during training generated a significant risk of skewing the panel's understanding of legal consent. Though these members were generally instructed to "not use [or discuss] anything you learned during SAPR training . . . in evaluating the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses in this case," a more tightly tailored and prompt statement of the law would have ameliorated any prejudicial impact generated by the legally-erroneous SAPR training. Since such a statement was not provided, we are not convinced that any confusion created by the SAPR training was wholly eradicated and that it did not contribute to the subsequent prejudice resulting from the incorrect definition of "impairment."[111]

C. Expedited Transfers. A Department of Defense policy familiar to all site visit participants provides sexual assault victims who file an unrestricted report of sexual assault the opportunity to receive an expedited transfer to another installation or to another unit within the same installation, on request.[112] One goal of this policy is to move the victim to a new location where no one knows of the sexual assault and where the victim need not confront the perpetrator on a regular basis and will have adequate support of family, friends, or counseling.[113] SVCs/VLCs draft the requests on behalf of victims, and send them to commanders. The victims often are able to select the location to which they will transfer. DoD policy also allows a commander to transfer the alleged offender, rather than the victim.[114] No participants discussed whether this option amounted to unlawful pretrial punishment in the context of a pending court-martial, but a Subcommittee member raised the issue. Commanders and a few victims' counsel indicated that commanders approve even questionable transfer requests to avoid accusations of reprisal against or mistreatment of a victim.

Some commanders, victims' counsel, and defense counsel believe that the expedited transfer policy is being abused by some individuals who make sexual assault allegations to obtain favorable transfers. Some participants have observed victims on very large installations of more than 50,000 Service members refuse to transfer to other units on the installation, preferring instead to request transfer to what are considered more favorable locations, such as Hawaii or San Diego. At another installation

110 Id. at 7. The Court noted that some of the comments from the venire included the following: "If you did have any form of impairment, that [sic] you can't have consent. You may—the person would not be in the proper frame of mind to provide that consent."; "When a person is impaired, they are unable to give consent, regardless of what they say at the time."; I viewed that as part of the training . . . that for someone to consent] they just should not be impaired."; "A person impaired by alcohol use is incapable of giving sexual consent."; "You need sober consent, per the brief."; "If there is alcohol involved, then there is no consent."; "if a person was under the influence of alcohol, even one drink, that person is not able to give consent to any sexual act."; "If a person has one drink of alcohol, they may be considered impaired, therefore, they may not be able to give consent."; "once the victim has had one drink, there is no longer a legal consent."

considered to be a "good" location, with an appealing climate and with metropolitan areas nearby, counsel noted that they see relatively few requests for expedited transfers. Expedited transfers by victims to more favorable locations may lead to defense counsel challenging the victim's motives during a court-martial, arguing to the panel that the victim made a false allegation of sexual assault to receive a transfer to a more desirable location. Such cross-examination, in turn, may cause panel members to question the victim's credibility and possibly acquit the accused.

IV. CONSEQUENCES

A. Site Visit Information. At all the site visits, most trial and defense counsel questioned whether justice is being served by the panoply of reforms in place. Many of them believe that fundamental rights of due process have been undermined. In their view, convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, regardless of the likelihood of securing a conviction. Many also feel that the military's emphasis on prosecuting sexual assault has led to criminalizing behavior that may be offensive and inappropriate, but would not be considered criminal in a civilian context. They also expressed concern that minor offenses are now being referred to court-martial that could be more appropriately resolved through nonjudicial punishment or administrative action. There is widespread consensus among prosecutors and defense counsel that the victim's wish regarding disposition of a case is the primary factor determining whether the case will go to court, and that evidentiary concerns, including the credibility of the victim, are given less consideration. Defense counsel perceive that false accusations are now more likely to make it through the system and, as a result, innocent people face allegations that could ruin their lives. To illustrate this point, one defense counsel described how several of his clients, under the immense psychological pressure of facing court-martial for sexual assault, submitted a request for discharge in lieu of trial, even though they claimed they were innocent—and even though a request for discharge in lieu of trial requires an acknowledgment of guilt and stigmatizing notations in their discharge paperwork.

Site visit participants identified a number of negative consequences of what they perceive as too many sexual assault allegations being referred to trial:

1. Practitioners universally described the acquittal rate in their jurisdiction as "high," in part due to the referral to court-martial of cases that lack merit. The acquittal percentages offered at one installation ranged from about 50% to 100%, significantly higher than the sexual offense acquittal rates seen in civilian jurisdictions.

2. Prosecutors and investigators must devote significant time to prosecuting less meritorious cases, which divert resources away from more serious and well-supported allegations.

3. Some prosecutors feel that they face a potential ethical quandary in trying cases in which they see no reasonable likelihood of conviction.

4. The low conviction rate tends to discredit the entire military justice system in the eyes of Service members and the general public.

5. As more cases flood the system, the time needed to take each case to trial increases.

6. When weak cases linger in the system pending trial, the accused's and the victim's careers and lives remain on hold until the case is resolved.

B. Information Presented to the JPP. One senior defense counsel told the JPP, "The lack of a thorough pre-trial investigation and prosecutorial discretion combined with the nature of acquaintance sexual assaults and the new incentives to fabricate [allegations] are a recipe for wrongful convictions."[115] She stated that despite changes to the system that favor victims and the prosecution, defense counsel are achieving more acquittals than ever before in sexual assault cases. She further observed, however, that the high acquittal rate demonstrates that many of the cases being "pushed through the system" should not be at court-martial and that, although the accused in these cases is often found not guilty, the trial process incurs "a real cost to the accused's life, reputation, family and career."[116] In her view, "the sands have shifted in favor of the victim at the expense of the accused."[117] Another defense counsel expressed his opinion that because of the changes in the military justice system, the rights of the accused to due process and a speedy trial are being eroded.[118] He noted that cases are lingering for as long as two years from report until the case goes to trial, putting the accused's and victim's life on hold for a significant period of time.[119]

V. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

It appears that recent sexual assault legislation and policy changes that have benefited sexual assault victims and made the military justice system less intimidating to them have also had some negative consequences that must be addressed. These changes have affected the perceived legitimacy of the justice system. While legislative changes have substantially reduced the number of victims who testify at Article 32 hearings and have clarified that this hearing is not intended to be a discovery mechanism for the defense, there has been no corresponding new legislation or policy to provide defense counsel access to important case information.[120] In addition, changes in the military justice system, such as the addition of SVCs/VLCs, have greatly benefitted sexual assault victims and given them a much-needed voice in the system. Some defense counsel, however, feel this unfairly tips the scales of justice against the defendant. Also, when SVC/VLC limit a prosecutor's access to the victim, it may adversely affect case outcomes. SVC/VLC must understand that in spite of their laudable intentions, they may inadvertently harm a victim's goals or interests by weakening the criminal case, thereby increasing the chances of an acquittal at trial.

The consensus among counsel interviewed during the installation site visits was that the combination of a less robust Article 32 process, pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial, and the low standard of probable cause for referring cases to courts-martial has led to cases being referred to courts-martial in which there is little chance for a conviction. Many counsel felt that the result has been a high acquittal rate in sexual assault cases, which, in turn, has caused military members to question the fairness of the military justice system. In addition, some counsel worried that when the word gets around that sexual assault cases are going to courts-martial supported only by weak evidence, military juries may be much more skeptical of the charges and the prosecution and thus may be more likely to acquit. Perhaps inevitably, as Service members become aware of weak cases and high acquittal rates, victims may become more reluctant to make unrestricted reports.

120 The Subcommittee of the Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases, supra note 2, highlights significant due process issues regarding defense counsel and makes four recommendations, including that defense counsel be provided with independent investigators, that defense offices be appropriately staffed and resourced, and that expert witness approval and funding be vested in Service defense organizations. The Subcommittee's report and recommendations were approved, with modifications, by the JPP. The Judicial Proceedings Panel Report on Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases is available at http://jpp.whs.mil/Public/docs/08-Panel_Reports/06_JPP_Defense_Resources_Experience_Report_Final_20170424.pdf.

Even when Article 32 officers have recommended against the referral of charges, those recommendations are not always followed by convening authorities. A substantial sampling of sexual assault cases tried in fiscal year 2015 reveal 54 cases in which the convening authority referred charges despite Article 32 investigating officers or PHOs finding that there was no probable cause or advising against the referral of sexual assault charges. In 45 of those cases, the accused was acquitted of the charges at trial, a number suggesting that perhaps the staff judge advocates and convening authorities should have paid more attention to the Article 32 officers' recommendations.

While most counsel now view the Article 32 process as having little value for scrutinizing the evidence in a sexual assault case, there has yet to emerge a formal written process for ensuring that the convening authority is made fully aware of the strengths and weaknesses of a case and has guidance for deciding an appropriate disposition. There are often good reasons, such as maintaining good order and discipline and respecting a belief that the assault took place, to refer a case to court-martial even when the likelihood of acquittal is high. But a convening authority should not be forced to make the critical decision about referral, with its life-changing impact on both the victim and the defendant, without clear guidelines and a better sense of the evidence's strength. Convening authorities must be corrected if they erroneously believe that a decision to refer a case to court-martial will have few consequences for the accused, the victim, or the public's perception of the military justice system. An accused facing court-martial is exposed to numerous adverse career and personal consequences, such as loss of promotion and career advancement opportunities, ostracism by peers, and the ongoing stress of knowing that a federal conviction, confinement, and sex offender registration are possible. Even if ultimately acquitted, the accused often suffers the enduring social and professional stigma of simply having been accused of these reprehensible offenses.

Recent legislation directing the Secretary of Defense to issue nonbinding guidance to be considered by convening authorities and staff judge advocates in determining an appropriate case disposition may help meet this need. Such formal case disposition guidance, in written form, should provide convening authorities with additional considerations, beyond whether the charges are supported by probable cause, as they decide whether to refer a case to court-martial or to resolve it through disposition at some lower level.

Several prosecutors discussed their practice in sexual assault cases of producing a prosecution merits memo to lay out the strengths and weaknesses of the evidence and the likelihood of a conviction at trial, thereby aiding the staff judge advocate and convening authority in making an appropriate decision on disposition. While this seems like a useful tool to fill the void left when a more robust Article 32 process was replaced, it is worth noting that under Article 34 of the UCMJ and under R.C.M. 406, the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority and accompanying documents must be provided to the defense if charges are referred to trial. A prosecution merits memo detailing evidentiary problems can go to the staff judge advocate without also being given to the defense, but any information provided in writing to the convening authority with the pretrial advice presumably must then be provided to the defense if charges are referred. This legal requirement may make staff judge advocates and prosecutors reluctant to write such candid memos to the convening authority for fear of disclosing a case's evidentiary problems to the defense. There is no such parallel in civilian jurisdictions, where information provided by a prosecutor to his or her superiors would not have to be provided to the defense counsel unless it revealed potentially exculpatory evidence (as also must be done by military prosecutors). More research and thought should be devoted to enabling the convening authority in the military justice system to be given enough information to make a proper decision, since the convening authority, like prosecutors in civilian jurisdictions, are responsible for determining which cases are prosecuted and which are not.

On site visits, counsel also discussed their perception that convening authorities feel pressure to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial regardless of their merits. Counsel are concerned that cases are being sent to courts-martial even when the evidence is weak or the allegations involve less serious conduct, such as an attempted kiss or slap on the buttocks, that could be resolved through nonjudicial punishment or administrative action. The Subcommittee notes, however, that in the fiscal year 2015 case data collected from the Services, convening authorities either dismissed charges prior to trial or disposed of cases by alternative means in almost 30% of all cases in which charges were preferred. Without knowing the facts of these cases, we cannot draw conclusions about why they were not referred to trial. But these data do reveal that while convening authorities may be experiencing pressure to refer sexual assault cases to court-martial, they are declining to do so almost 30% of the time. In addition, it may be that convening authorities are referring more sexual assault cases to courts-martial not because of outside pressure but because they now take sexual assault cases more seriously than they had done in the past and feel that disposition by courts-martial is the most appropriate way to resolve these grave allegations. So long as statutory language requires elevated review of a convening authority's decision not to refer a sexual assault case to court-martial, however, convening authorities will always feel some pressure to refer cases to trial against their better judgment.

Counsels' perceptions of a high acquittal rate for sexual assault offenses are borne out by the data. Among cases referred to courts-martial in fiscal year 2015, only 40% of the cases involving a penetrative sexual assault offense resulted in a conviction of any type of sexual assault offense. Just 25% of sexual contact cases resulted in conviction for any sexual offense. While the conviction rate is higher when convictions for non-sex offenses are included, the acquittal rate for sexual assault offenses is significant.

Although the JPP Subcommittee does not have the time to continue investigating the potential causes of this high acquittal rate, this issue must be explored further. The Subcommittee notes that the authorizing legislation for the JPP's successor panel, the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces, requires the panel to conduct an ongoing review of cases involving sexual misconduct allegations.[121]

The inherent difficulties in evaluating sexual assault case evidence, combined with the widespread perception that convening authorities are referring weak cases, have led to the belief by many of the Subcommittee's interviewees that the military justice system is weighted against the accused in sexual assault cases. Such one-sidedness is particularly serious in light of the potentially catastrophic effects of being accused of a sexual crime. The high rate of acquittal in military sexual assault cases can feed into this perception and lead to a general mistrust of the military justice system, which may lead Service members to acquit when they serve on panels in sexual assault courts-martial.

The public may view the high acquittal rate as a result not of the more aggressive approach to sexual offense prosecution described in the site visits but of the military's indifference to sexual assault. Public loss of confidence in the military and the military justice system has the potential to harm military enlistment and officer accession rates, as well as retention rates. In short, there must be a balance—a system that treats sexual assault victims fairly and compassionately and that also provides defendants with procedures that are perceived to be, and are, fair. It is not the accused alone who suffers when a sexual assault case for which there is little chance of winning a conviction is referred to court-martial—the victim is also forced to endure a lengthy, difficult process at whose end the accused is very likely to be found not guilty.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Recommendation 1: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces (DAC-IPAD) continue the review of the new Article 32 preliminary hearing process, which in the view of many counsel interviewed during military installation site visits and according to information presented to the JPP no longer serves a useful purpose. Such a review should look at whether preliminary hearing officers in sexual assault cases should be military judges or other senior judge advocates with military justice experience and whether a recommendation of the preliminary hearing officer against referral, based on lack of probable cause, should be binding on the convening authority. This review should evaluate data on how often the recommendations of preliminary hearing officers regarding case disposition are followed by convening authorities and determine whether further changes to the process are required.

In addition, because the Article 32 hearing no longer serves as a discovery mechanism for the defense, the JPP Subcommittee reiterates its recommendation— presented in its report on military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases, and adopted by the JPP—that the defense be provided with independent investigators.

Recommendation 2: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Article 33, UCMJ, case disposition guidance for convening authorities and staff judge advocates require the following standard for referral to court-martial: the charges are supported by probable cause and there is a reasonable likelihood of proving the elements of each offense beyond a reasonable doubt using only evidence likely to be found admissible at trial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the disposition guidance require the staff judge advocate and convening authority to consider all the prescribed guideline factors in making a disposition determination, though they should retain discretion regarding the weight they assign each factor. These factors should be considered in their totality, with no single factor determining the outcome.

Recommendation 3: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that after case disposition guidance under Article 33, UCMJ, is promulgated, the DAC-IPAD conduct both military installation site visits and further research to determine whether convening authorities and staff judge advocates are making effective use of this guidance in deciding case dispositions. They should also determine what effect, if any, this guidance has had on the number of sexual assault cases being referred to courts-martial and on the acquittal rate in such cases.

Recommendation 4: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD review whether Article 34 of the UCMJ and Rule for Court-Martial 406 should be amended to remove the requirement that the staff judge advocate's pretrial advice to the convening authority (except for exculpatory information contained in that advice) be released to the defense upon referral of charges to court-martial. The DAC-IPAD should determine whether any memo from trial counsel that is appended should also be shielded from disclosure to the defense. This review should consider whether such a change would allow the staff judge advocate to provide more fully developed, candid written advice to the convening authority regarding the strengths and weaknesses of the charges so that the convening authority can make a better-informed disposition decision.

Recommendation 5: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that Congress repeal provisions from the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 and Fiscal Year 2015, sections 1744 and 541 respectively, that require non-referral decisions in certain sexual assault cases to be forwarded to a higher general court-martial convening authority or to the Service Secretary. The perception of pressure on convening authorities to refer sexual assault cases to courts-martial created by these provisions and the consequent negative effects on the military justice system are more harmful than the problems that such provisions were originally intended to address.

Recommendation 6: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the DAC-IPAD continue to gather data and other evidence on disposition decisions and conviction rates of sexual assault courts-martial to supplement information provided to the JPP Subcommittee during military installation site visits and to determine future recommendations for improvements to the military justice system.

Recommendation 7: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense ensure that SVCs/VLCs receive the necessary training on the importance of allowing full access by prosecutors to sexual assault victims prior to courts-martial. Such training will ensure that SVCs/VLCs are considering the value of a meaningful victim-prosecutor relationship in the advice they provide their victim-clients and assist prosecutors in sufficiently developing the rapport with the victim needed to fully prepare for trial.

Recommendation 8: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Department of Defense Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office ensure that sexual assault training conducted by the military Services provide accurate information to military members regarding a person's ability to consent to sexual contact after consuming alcohol and the legal definition of "impairment" in this context and that training be timed and conducted so as to avoid "training fatigue."

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD monitor whether misperceptions regarding alcohol consumption and consent continue to affect court-martial panel members.

Recommendation 9: The JPP Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense review the policy on expedited transfer of sexual assault victims and consider whether it should be changed to state that when possible, sexual assault victims should be transferred to another unit on the same installation or to a nearby installation. This change will help ensure that prosecutors have access to victims in preparing for courts-martial, will satisfy the need to separate the victim from the accused, and will maintain the victim's access to support systems while combating the perception that the ability to ask for these transfers has encouraged fraudulent claims of sexual assault. Commanders and SVCs/VLCs should all receive training in how relocating victims from less desirable to more desirable locations can foster the perception among military members that the expedited transfer system is being abused and in how such transfers can be used by defense counsel to cast doubt on the victim's credibility, possibly leading to more acquittals at courts-martial.

The JPP Subcommittee further recommends that the DAC-IPAD review data on expedited transfers to determine the locations from which and to which victims are requesting expedited transfers and to review their stated reasons.

REPORT ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

MEMORANDUM FOR MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. Following the Secretary's objectives and at the request of the Judicial Proceedings Panel, the Subcommittee conducted military installation site visits throughout the United States and Asia. Based upon information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee undertook additional research of several topics. The Subcommittee has completed its review on the topic of military defense counsel resources and experience in sexual assault cases and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Executive Summary

SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT TO THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL ON MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL RESOURCES AND EXPERIENCE IN SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—representing 25 military installations throughout the United States and Asia, all involved in the military justice process—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses.

This report summarizes site visit information and the Subcommittee's subsequent research, and makes findings regarding defense investigators, the experience levels of defense counsel, and the resources available to them in the military.

On the basis of the information gathered, the Subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The Subcommittee recommends that in order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as needed.

Recommendation 2: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an audit conducted by an independent, outside entity of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimum level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term.

Recommendation 3: The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the military Services to vest defense expert funding and approval authority in the Service defense organizations.

Recommendation 4: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services permit only a defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set the minimum tour length for defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Military Defense Counsel Resources and Experience in Sexual Assault Cases

From July through September 2016, members of the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) Subcommittee, at the request of the JPP, spoke to more than 280 individuals—representing 25 military installations throughout the United States and Asia, all involved in the military justice process—about the investigation, prosecution, and defense of sexual assault offenses. Discussions were held without attribution so that Subcommittee members could hear candid perceptions of the military's handling of sexual assault litigation from the men and women who are investigating, litigating, and supporting those cases. The Subcommittee spoke to groups of military prosecutors, defense counsel, special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel (SVC/VLC), paralegals, and investigators, as well as commanders, sexual assault response coordinators, victim advocates, and victim-witness liaisons from all military Services.

On the basis of the information received during these site visits, the Subcommittee determined that on several issues, it would have to undertake further research before reporting to the JPP. This report summarizes site visit information and subsequent research regarding defense investigators, the experience levels of defense counsel, and the resources available to them in the military. In producing this report, the JPP Subcommittee used information gathered from site visits, information previously presented to the JPP at a public hearing, information derived from the Report of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel of June 2014, and existing statutory resources.

I. INADEQUATE STAFFING AND RESOURCES FOR MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL

A. Site Visit Information. Most of the defense counsel who participated in the Subcommittee's site visits reported that they are seriously understaffed and under resourced. These accounts were corroborated by comments from prosecutors interviewed during these site visits. At many installations, counsel stressed that a lack of attorneys, paralegals, investigators, experts, and basic resources hinders their ability to handle their caseload, more than half of which, they stated, is composed of sexual assault cases. At one installation, for example, an office at a large military installation with ten defense counsel had only one paralegal.

The most urgent and frequently raised issue regarding defense resources was a persistent lack of defense investigators. Defense counsel explained that in the current system, the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs) will not investigate leads at their request. Even if they were to do so, the information obtained would not be protected by attorney-client or work product privileges (as it would be for independent investigators assigned to work on a traditional criminal defense team). Some defense and trial counsel also expressed concern that MCIO investigators are often unwilling to follow up on investigative leads, thereby affecting the thoroughness of the investigation. And because, as MCIO investigators told the Subcommittee, they are required to be "non-confrontational" in their interactions with victims, potential problems in a victim's statement (e.g., inconsistencies with other evidence) may not be thoroughly explored.

Defense counsel also noted that as a result of recent statutory changes to the Article 32 pretrial hearing process, fewer witnesses, including the victim, testify at the Article 32 hearing and less evidence is presented, making it more difficult for defense counsel to ascertain pertinent information about the government's case. The combination of this recent change in Article 32 practice and the lack of defense investigators has left defense counsel unable to investigate their cases in what they see as an appropriately effective manner.

The Navy is currently the only Service that employs defense investigators—eight of them worldwide. The other Services lack any independent budget to fund defense investigators, and defense counsel stated that they have to request funding for an investigator from the convening authority or military judge in each case in which they deem an investigator necessary.[1] Defense counsel and prosecutors agreed that these requests are routinely denied. Defense counsel consistently told Subcommittee members during the site visits that they rely on junior paralegals, who are not trained investigators, to help investigate these cases by finding and interviewing potential witnesses. As a result, these paralegals are also less available to carry out those job functions for which they have in fact been trained. Defense counsel mentioned that they do, on occasion, ask their clients to personally hire investigators and experts if the government denies their requests.

Defense counsel noted that their ability to investigate their clients' cases is limited by their demanding trial schedules and by the ethical need to avoid a conflict of interest caused by becoming a potential witness in the case—a problem that may arise if the lawyer is the only person present to conduct a witness interview. If, for example, a witness makes a statement during an interview but then testifies inconsistently at trial, the lawyer would be the only possible witness available to impeach the discrepant testimony. The practical consequence of this situation is that the lawyer becomes a witness in his or her own case, and therefore a substitute, conflict-free counsel would have to be appointed, leading to greater expense, added complication, and likely delay in the trial process, in addition to the possible negative effect on the case of replacing the original defense counsel with a new lawyer unfamiliar with the case. At the same time, if such exculpatory, impeaching testimony is unavailable to the accused, he or she may be denied the constitutional protections of confrontation, the right to present a defense, the right to receive a fair trial, and the right to due process of law. In civilian practice, this problem is largely avoided through the use of professional defense investigators who can conduct the interviews and then testify about them in court as necessary. Feedback from Navy defense counsel about the recent addition of defense investigators was very positive, and they felt it alleviated the problems noted above.

B. Other Sources of Information Regarding Defense Investigators. The Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (RSP) reviewed the issue of defense investigators in its June 2014 report. The RSP found that defense requests for independent investigators made to the convening authority or military judge are routinely denied, noting that "military defense counsel need independent, deployable defense investigators to zealously represent their clients and correct an obvious imbalance of resources."[2] The RSP received information from a number of civilian public defenders and found that "many public defender offices have investigators on their staffs and consider them critical."[3] In fact, the former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers told a subcommittee of the RSP, "I don't know a lawyer in the country that does sex offenses without an investigator, except in the military. Really, there is no such thing."[4] The RSP noted that these investigators aid defense counsel in locating and interviewing potential witnesses, finding experts, and identifying services to assist the defense in complying with court-ordered treatment. Their work enables defense counsel to prepare for trial and gives attorneys "a fighting chance to develop facts and other evidence that is rarely provided to them by the government and is crucial for the proper representation of their clients."[5] The RSP concluded their review of this topic by making the following recommendation:

> RSP Recommendation 81: The Secretary of Defense direct the Services to provide independent, deployable defense investigators in order to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the defense mission and the fair administration of justice.[6]

As reported during the site visits, only the Navy has implemented this RSP recommendation: it has hired eight "defense litigation support specialists," more commonly known as defense investigators.[7] These defense investigators are civilians with prior law enforcement or defense experience. The Navy's Director of the Defense Counsel Assistance Program (DCAP) told the JPP that they have made it possible for defense counsel to focus on preparing for trial and getting needed training.[8] He added, however, that the Navy could use more than eight defense investigators.[9]

Also of significance regarding this issue are recent congressional changes that have dramatically altered the Article 32 process, changing it in practice from a pretrial investigation into a preliminary hearing and removing the requirement that a victim appear and testify at the hearing.[10] Prior to this statutory change, the Article 32 allowed for a "thorough and impartial investigation" of the case in which an investigating officer investigated the "truth and form of the charges."[11] Sexual assault victims were frequently required to appear and testify at the Article 32 investigation and were subject to cross-examination by the defense counsel.[12] One of the stated purposes of this Article 32 investigation was to "serve as a means of discovery."[13] Under the new process, the Article 32 preliminary hearing is limited to determining primarily whether there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the accused committed the offense.[14] Victims are no longer required to testify at the Article 32 hearing,[15] and frequently do not, and it is no longer one of the stated purposes of the hearing that it serve as a means of discovery. Both trial and defense counsel interviewed during installation site visits referred to the new Article 32 process as a "paper drill," often with no witnesses being called to testify and only documentary evidence submitted. Counsel expressed the view that because of these changes to the Article 32 process, it is more vital than ever to provide additional investigative resources for defense counsel.

And I was lucky enough to have my own specific investigator for a while. I share one now. But it makes it much easier in terms of being able to defend our clients finding out that you could throw away all your kind of subjective beliefs about your client's guilt or innocence and then you do investigation and you investigate no matter how much bad evidence there seemingly is. You find out that there are some things—sometimes complainants do not tell the truth. So, you know, one word I kind of bristle at when I hear it all the time from I guess panels that are supposedly objective is the word 'victim.' When we talk about pre-trial matters that have not resulted in conviction or that have not resulted in the guilty plea, we deal with complainants, because a lot of times we understand that alleged victims aren't victims at all when we investigate and even the government finds out before we do that things have been made up. So I think that just reemphasizes the importance of having investigators and having all the different aspects of the case, whether or not it's legal or on the field, done in order to have a decent—not only a decent, but a zealous defense.").

All of the military Services' chief defense counsel discussed the necessity of having defense investigators to relieve defense counsel and paralegals from the burden of having to conduct their own investigations. The Army Chief of Trial Defense Services noted that an informal survey of defense counsel making requests for defense investigators found that only one in twelve requests was approved in sexual assault cases.[16] One witness told the JPP that the law requires defense counsel to adequately investigate the facts of the case; otherwise, he or she could be found to be ineffective.[17] Several witnesses expressed their view that the refusal to provide defense investigators amounts to depriving the defendants of due process.[18] The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has not yet ruled on this specific issue[19] but has discussed an analogous resource, a mitigation specialist for a defendant in a capital case, stating that "[c]ompulsory process, equal access to evidence and witnesses, and the right to necessary expert assistance in presenting a defense are guaranteed to military accuseds through the Sixth Amendment, Article 46, UCMJ, 10 U.S.C. § 846 (2000), and Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 703(d)."[20]

Some counsel noted during site visits that there is a high acquittal rate in military courts-martial for sexual assault cases—a statistic that may, on its surface, seem to undercut the need for additional resources for defense counsel. However, the ultimate result of a trial, whether conviction or acquittal, is not the sole measure of whether a process was fair and indeed complied with the due process protections of the Constitution.

C. Other Sources of Information Regarding Additional Office Staffing and Resources. In its June 2014 report to Congress, the RSP recommended that military defense organizations be provided adequate funding resources and personnel.[21] In doing so, the RSP found that "maintaining adequate resources for the defense of military personnel accused of crimes, including sexual assault, is essential to the legitimacy and fairness of the military justice system."[22]

At the May 13, 2016, public meeting of the JPP, the Army Chief of Trial Defense Services identified his biggest challenge as not having enough defense counsel, explaining that the number of defense counsel billets has gone down since the RSP met and he can't fill the ones he has.[23] A Marine Corps witness told the JPP that "there's a perception of a disparity in resources. And, with all due respect, I'd like to say it's more than a perception, it's a reality." She explained that in the Marine Corps, the prosecution has four highly qualified experts (HQEs), while the defense has only two.[24]

D. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendations. Civilian public defense organizations and private defense counsel routinely rely on defense investigators to locate and interview witnesses, as well as to take other investigative steps. Their assistance enables defense counsel to properly prepare their cases and represent their clients to the best of their ability. According to information from Navy defense counsel, the addition of the eight defense investigators has been tremendously beneficial.

Given the introduction of the SVC/VLC into the MCIO victim interview process, as well as the unwillingness of MCIOs to follow up on leads from defense or trial counsel, the addition of independent defense investigators is more crucial now than it has ever been. The Subcommittee notes that the approval and funding authority for defense investigator requests is the convening authority who referred the charges to court-martial and who may have a vested interest in the outcome of the case. These requests, it should be noted, are denied more than 90% of the time.

Furthermore, as they are no longer able to cross-examine the victim at the current Article 32 hearing and have lost access to the witness testimony and other evidence formerly received at the Article 32 hearing, defense counsel are at significantly greater disadvantage than they were prior to the changes to the Article 32 process. This alteration in procedure makes adding independent defense investigators essential to the fair administration of justice.

The Subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The Subcommittee recommends that in order to ensure the fair administration of justice, all of the military Services provide independent and deployable defense

21 Supra note 2 at 38 (RSP Recommendation 82 reads: "The Service Secretaries ensure military defense counsel organizations are adequately resourced in funding resources and personnel, including defense supervisory personnel with training and experience comparable to their prosecution counterparts, and direct the Services assess whether that is the case.").

investigators under their control in sufficient numbers so that every defense counsel has access to an investigator, as needed.

Recommendation 2: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services immediately review Service defense organizations' staffing—defense counsel, paralegals, highly qualified experts, and administrative support personnel—and augment current levels in order to alleviate the reported understaffing. The Secretary of Defense should direct an audit conducted by an independent, outside entity of defense staffing across all military Services to determine the optimum level of staffing for the Service defense organizations in the long term.

II. DEFENSE REQUESTS FOR EXPERTS

A. Site Visit Information. Defense counsel and others also complained about lack of access to and funding for expert consultants, which puts the defense at an extreme disadvantage. Defense counsel noted that they have trouble getting qualified experts. In the military, defense counsel do not have their own source of funding for witnesses and experts, but must instead request funding from the convening authority. The response to these requests is frequently outright denial or provision of an inadequate substitute for the expert requested. Defense counsel described situations in which they requested a particular expert and were instead provided someone who was deemed to be an "adequate substitute." The "adequate substitute" often lacked the specific knowledge required (for example, an expert in suggestibility in children might be replaced by a child psychologist who was a generalist). Moreover, if approval for an expert is given, it is often granted not at the outset of the case but rather on the eve of trial, when the expert is much less helpful to developing a theory of defense or assisting with preparation of the defense case. Even if defense counsel are successful in getting a qualified expert, the process of requesting the expert forces them to reveal their case or trial strategy to the government. Defense counsel do not see trial counsel receiving comparable treatment from the convening authority; instead, trial counsel can identify and recruit experts to join the prosecution at will, and readily consult with their experts before the defense receives expert assistance. Several prosecutors on the Subcommittee's site visits concurred that this is a systemic problem.

B. Other Sources of Information. Article 46 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) states that "trial counsel, the defense counsel, and the court-martial shall have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence[.]"[25] Under the Rules for Courts-Martial, in every branch of Service and in every case, defense counsel must request funding from the convening authority, prior to referral of charges, for each specific expert witness or consultant needed. This request must include a complete statement of reasons why the expert is necessary and the estimated cost of employing the expert.[26] If the request is denied by the convening authority, after referral of charges, the request may be renewed before a military judge, who determines whether the expert's testimony is "relevant and necessary" and whether the government has provided or will provide an "adequate substitute."[27] This request before the military judge happens much later in the process, often close to trial, leaving inadequate time for the expert to fully assist the defense counsel in the preparation of the case.

27 Id.

In applying Article 46 of the UCMJ to the issue of designation of expert consultants, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has held that an "adequate substitute" must have qualifications "reasonably similar" to those of the government's expert.[28]

In comparing military defense organizations and civilian public defenders, the RSP found that some public defender offices maintain their own budgets or request experts through a trial judge who manages the budget.[29] The RSP also found that federal public defenders have specific funding to pay for defense experts.[30] The RSP noted that federal discovery rules generally require civilian defense counsel to disclose experts and other witnesses to the government before trial, but not as early as military defense counsel, who must request their witnesses from the convening authority, through trial counsel.[31] Civilian defense counsel also employ confidential consulting experts whose identities usually remain wholly unknown to the prosecution unless the defense elects to endorse the expert as a trial witness or otherwise injects their expertise into the litigation. This type of consulting expert is essential for defense counsel to receive a candid assessment of the evidence without fear that their investigation will develop inculpatory evidence that will be shared with and used by the government in prosecuting their client.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized a constitutional right to expert assistance for defendants with regard to both trial defense and sentencing defense, using the example of a mental health expert: "Without a psychiatrist's assistance, the defendant cannot offer a well-informed expert's opposing view, and thereby loses a significant opportunity to raise in the jurors' minds questions about the State's proof of an aggravating factor."[32]

C. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendation. Defense counsel in military organizations, like their civilian counterparts, should have separate sources of funding to employ defense experts, without having to request approval and thereby prematurely divulge their defense strategy to the government.

There is also a tension between what the defense attorney must be able to articulate to the convening authority about the expert's likely assistance and the lawyer's need to actually learn from the expert. In this regard, the relative inexperience of military defense counsel can be a particular problem: if they do not already have deep knowledge of the field, they cannot fully explain or clearly articulate why they need the expert or persuasively explain the potential prejudice to their client. Moreover, they should not have to disclose their thinking.

Recommendation 3: The Subcommittee recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the military Services to vest defense expert funding and approval authority in the Service defense organizations.

28 United States v. Warner, 62 M.J. 114 (C.A.A.F. 2005). The court went on to state, "The absence of such parity opens the military justice system to abuse, because the Government in general, and—as this case demonstrates—the trial counsel in particular, may play key roles in securing defense experts." The appellant's brief in this case analogizes this arrangement to "permitting a Major League baseball manager to choose the opposing pitcher in the final game of the World Series."

III. DEFENSE COUNSEL STAFFING AND EXPERIENCE LEVELS

A. Site Visit Information. The Subcommittee received information from defense counsel that the training they receive is generally adequate. However, there is disparity not only in the experience levels required among the Services but also between Service-level requirements and the actual experience of defense counsel in the field. While the Navy and Air Force require prior litigation experience of attorneys being assigned to defense counsel positions, in the Army and Marine Corps first-tour judge advocates with no experience in military justice or in the civilian criminal justice system are allowed to serve as defense counsel. Though participants acknowledged that such placements are not common, the few who had them found the experience overwhelming and discomforting. Several junior counsel recounted that in the first or second contested trial of their careers, they served as second chair in a rape case; one counsel then served as lead counsel in his third trial, also involving sexual assault charges. All of these counsel recommended against assigning brand-new attorneys to defense counsel positions. The likelihood that junior counsel will represent clients in serious and complex cases early in their careers is high, because—as participants uniformly reported—sexual assault cases make up most of their caseload. Defense counsel at multiple installations related that the recent addition of HQEs to trial defense services organizations has been very helpful in mitigating the experience gap, but noted that it is unclear whether the funding for these civilian career litigators will continue. In addition, HQEs hold term positions, not permanent ones.

B. Other Sources of Information. The RSP reviewed experience levels of defense counsel as part of its June 2014 report to Congress. The following table from that report[33] summarizes experience and training requirements for defense counsel in each of the Services.

RSP Report Chart on Service Standards for Defense Counsel Experience and Training

Organization	Experience	Training
U.S. Army Defense Counsel	• Majority of defense counsel have prior courtroom experience. No specific minimum experience required. • Experience sitting "second chair" until supervisor deems fit to try cases as first chair.	• Graduate of the Judge Advocate Officer Basic Course. • Defense Counsel "101." • Advanced Trial Advocacy Courses.
U.S. Air Force Defense Counsel	• The Air Force is unique in that defense counsel are selected in a very competitive, best-qualified standard by the Air Force Judge Advocate General. • Most defense counsel arrive with 2 to 5 years of experience working in a base legal office, which includes time as a trial counsel in courts-martial. • New defense counsel normally have between 8 and 10 courts-martial trials before starting as a defense counsel.	• Specialized courses provided by the Air Force Judge Advocate General's School. • On-the-job training. • Group training remains a challenge because of geographic diversity of counsel and length of tours. • Out of the 19 Senior Defense Counsel regions, only 3 (San Antonio, Colorado Springs and the National Capitol Region) have the majority of their bases in close enough proximity to drive to group training.

Organization	Experience	Training
U.S. Navy Defense Counsel	• Following their first 24-month tour handling administrative separations and other non-judicial issues, Navy Judge Advocates become eligible to be assigned to a Defense Service Office (DSO) as a defense counsel.[34] • Military Justice Litigation Career Track officers are stationed in all DSO headquarters offices and some detachments, which are smaller regional offices.	• Once selected, counsel receive additional training, including a basic trial advocacy course focusing on courtroom advocacy. • Within the first year at a DSO, defense counsel also attend the defending sexual assault cases class, an intense one-week course involving experts on forensics and psychology and very experienced civilian defense counsel.
U.S. Marine Corps Defense Counsel	• The vast majority of the Marine Corps' 72 defense counsel are first-tour judge advocates with less than 3 years of experience as an attorney. • They typically serve 18 months as defense counsel before moving to another assignment. • The average litigation experience of both senior defense counsel and defense counsel is 14 months, which includes both prosecution and defense time.	• Defense counsel training requirements are set forth in Marine Corps policy. Defense counsel have a basic certification under Article 27(b), the basic lawyer course at the Naval Justice School. And then, at some point, maybe not before they start their official job, but at some point early in their tour, we try to send them to our new defense counsel orientation class which is sponsored by the Naval Justice School.[35]
U.S. Coast Guard Defense Counsel	• By memorandum of agreement between the Coast Guard and the Navy JAG Corps, the Navy is principally responsible for defending Coast Guard members accused of Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) crimes. • In return, four Coast Guard judge advocates are detailed to work at various Navy DSOs on 2-year rotations, which provides another significant source of trial experience to Coast Guard judge advocates.	• Coast Guard Defense Counsel attend Navy defense training.

Noting the disparities between the Services regarding defense counsel experience and tour lengths, the RSP made the following recommendation:

> RSP Recommendation 86: The Service Judge Advocate Generals and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps permit only counsel with litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case as well as set the minimum tour length of defense counsel at two years or more, except when a

> lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, or designee, because of exigent circumstances or to specifically enable training of defense counsel under supervision of experienced defense counsel.[36]

According to presentations by the Service trial defense chiefs during the JPP's May 2016 public meeting, little has changed in defense counsel experience levels since the RSP Report was issued in June 2014.[37]

In the Army, about 20% of attorneys assigned to a defense counsel position have no prior experience.[38] While every attempt is made to avoid assigning a brand-new defense counsel to a sexual assault case, the realities of Trial Defense Services (TDS) staffing sometimes force the assignment of inexperienced attorneys to these cases, though they are able to consult with more senior defense counsel.[39] Underscoring the point, a witness testifying before the JPP in May noted that the accused's counsel in a given sexual assault case may have less trial experience than the victim's counsel.[40]

In the Marine Corps, the "vast majority" of defense counsel are serving in their first tour and are often brand-new attorneys right out of law school.[41] Compounding the problem, Marine Corps attorneys serve as defense counsel for only 12 to 14 months before moving to another position.[42] Marine Corps Defense Services attempts to make up for this lack of experience through training (having new defense counsel sit as second chair in several courts-martial before serving as lead defense counsel) and through supervision by more experienced defense counsel.[43]

C. National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017. There is currently a provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017 (FY 17 NDAA), pending presidential signature, which would require the Services to ensure that trial and defense counsel detailed to a court-martial "have sufficient experience and knowledge to effectively prosecute or defend the case" and

However, the realities of TDS manning and caseload often weigh against such a deliberative developmental process. require the Services to have a professional development process to ensure effective prosecution and defense in all courts-martial.[44] Under this provision, the Services must use a system of skill identifiers or experience designators for "identifying judge advocates with skill and experience in military justice proceedings" to provide oversight of less experienced counsel.[45] The Services would also be required to carry out a five-year pilot program to "assess the feasibility and advisability of establishing a deliberate professional developmental process for judge advocates . . . that leads to judge advocates with military justice expertise serving as military justice practitioners capable of prosecuting and defending complex cases in military courts-martial."[46]

D. Subcommittee Assessment and Recommendation. Most sexual assault cases that go to trial are fully litigated, complicated, difficult cases, and they often involve Military Rule of Evidence (MRE) 412 or MRE 513 motions.[47] Since these cases are less likely than others to be plea-bargained, lawyers have a critical need to draw on trial court advocacy skills; and junior lawyers often have not yet had an opportunity to develop these skills in less serious cases. As reported by several defense counsel during Subcommittee site visits, sometimes defense counsel with little trial experience are called on to defend a Service member accused of serious sexual assault crimes.

If convicted of a sexual assault offense, the accused faces a sentence that could include a punitive discharge and months or years of confinement as well as lifetime collateral sanctions related to the sex offense registry and evolving state, local, and international policies.[48] The consequences for the accused of having inexperienced defense counsel could be catastrophic and life changing.

Numerous foreign countries, including Mexico and the Philippines, have already begun denying entry to U.S. citizens who have been convicted of sex crimes. The maximum punishments for sexual assault offenses specified in UCMJ, Appendix 12, are as follows:

Rape	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for life without eligibility for parole, forfeiture of all pay and allowances
Sexual Assault	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for 30 years, forfeiture of all pay and allowances
Forcible Sodomy (Article 125, MCM)	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for life without eligibility for parole, forfeiture of all pay and allowances
Aggravated Sexual Contact	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for 20 years, forfeiture of all pay and allowances
Abusive Sexual Contact	Dishonorable discharge, confinement for 7 years, forfeiture of all pay and allowances

Recommendation 4: The Subcommittee recommends that the military Services permit only a defense counsel with prior military justice or civilian criminal litigation experience to serve as lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. The military Services should develop a formal process, using objective and subjective criteria, to determine when a defense counsel is qualified to serve as a lead defense counsel in a sexual assault case. In addition, the military Services should set the minimum tour length for defense counsel at two years or more, except when a lesser tour length is approved by the Service Judge Advocate General or Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

IV. CONCLUSION

There have been numerous changes to law and policy in the arena of military sexual assault litigation in recent years that have serious implications for the quality of defense afforded to those accused of sexual assault. These include the introduction of special victims' counsel/victims' legal counsel for sexual assault victims, development of a Special Victim Investigation and Prosecution capability, and introduction of a less robust Article 32, UCMJ, process that no longer serves as a discovery vehicle for defense counsel. Many of these changes were instituted with the worthy goal of benefiting victims of sexual assault, but it is important that the military justice system continue to respect the rights of the accused. In order to maintain balance in the military justice system, (1) Service defense organizations must be adequately funded and staffed, as is reportedly not the case in all of the Services; (2) defense counsel must have access to an independent funding source for expert witnesses and consultants; and (3) those serving as defense counsel in sexual assault cases must be experienced attorneys.

MEMORANDUM FOR MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS PANEL

SUBJECT: Report of the Subcommittee

On April 9, 2015, the Secretary of Defense established this Subcommittee to support the Judicial Proceedings Panel in its duties under Section 576(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013. The Secretary established four objectives for the Subcommittee to assess and make recommendations for improvements in the construction, interpretation, and implementation of current adult sexual assault provisions contained in the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), to include Article 120 of the UCMJ. The Subcommittee has completed its review and submits to the Judicial Proceedings Panel its report with our assessment, conclusions, and recommendations.

Executive Summary

In its February 2015 assessment of the 2012 version of Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) recommended that seventeen issues should be referred to a subcommittee for further evaluation. Eleven of these issues related to the definitions of terms, elements of offenses, defenses, and enumerated offenses under the statute. Some presenters testified to the JPP that a lack of clarity or specificity in certain definitions in Article 120 could create difficulty or uncertainty in prosecuting cases under the statute. Conversely, others told the JPP that further revisions to Article 120—a statute significantly revised twice in recent years—would make prosecutions more complex.

The JPP also recommended that a subcommittee further assess how the military prosecutes crimes under the UCMJ involving abuse of position, rank, or authority, including relationships between trainers and trainees, recruits and recruiters, and senior and subordinate military members in the same chain of command. The JPP heard testimony about whether the 2012 version of Article 120 and other articles of the UCMJ provide sufficient means for the prosecution of coercive sexual offenses, inappropriate relationships, and maltreatment, and the JPP heard proposals to amend Article 120 to more specifically address offenses committed by training instructors against trainees. The JPP recommended that a subcommittee examine these issues and provide recommendations for possible amendments.

To review the issues referred to it by the JPP, the JPP Subcommittee (hereinafter "the Subcommittee") held seven meetings from April 2015 to October 2015. Members of the Subcommittee heard from more than forty witnesses, considered more than one-hundred sources of written material, and deliberated extensively on each issue. In accord with the JPP's directives, the Subcommittee discussed and deliberated on each issue regarding whether amendments to Article 120 of the UCMJ should be recommended, and, if so, what form such amendments should take. This analysis included detailed discussion and debate over specific statutory language and various proposals prepared by the Subcommittee members.

Overall, the Subcommittee determined that Article 120 of the UCMJ provides a reasonably effective statutory framework for prosecution of sexual assault offenses in the military, but that some definitions and terms used in Article 120 are sufficiently confusing or vague as to create uncertainty or concern regarding the effects of these terms on standards of conduct among Service members or on court-martial prosecution of sexual assault offenses. Accordingly, the Subcommittee determined that amendments to Article 120 of the UCMJ and the Manual for Courts-Martial are warranted to address seven issues it reviewed. For ten of the issues it reviewed, the Subcommittee determined that change or amendment is not warranted.

Overview of the Subcommittee's Assessment

In its initial report of February 4, 2015, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) determined that seventeen issues regarding Article 120 of the UCMJ should be directed to a subcommittee for further evaluation. The first eleven of these issues were related to definitions of terms, elements of offenses, defenses, and enumerated offenses under the statute, and the other six issues were related to coercive sexual relationships and abuse of authority.

To complete these tasks, the Subcommittee considered the JPP's February 2015 report, together with the testimony and written materials regarding these issues previously provided to the JPP during its public meetings in August through December 2014. The Subcommittee held seven meetings, from April through October 2015, and received testimony from forty-four witnesses. These witnesses included retired military judges, senior prosecutors and defense counsel, appellate counsel, civilian practitioners, staff judge advocate legal advisers to training commanders, general and flag officers in command at the Services' entry-level training commands, the Chief of the Joint Service Committee at the time the current version of Article 120 was drafted and submitted to Congress, the Director of Law Enforcement Policy for the Department of Defense (DoD), and one member of Congress along with one of her constituents who was a victim of sexual misconduct during her entry-level military training. In addition to this testimony, the Subcommittee considered the written materials and recommendations provided by the witnesses. The Subcommittee deliberated during five of its meetings. The issues, the material considered, and the Subcommittee's conclusions and recommendations are set forth below.

Summary of Subcommittee Recommendations

The Subcommittee recommends that amendments be made to Article 120 of the UCMJ and the Manual for Courts-Martial to address the following issues referred to it by the JPP:

JPP Issue 1: Is the current definition of "consent" unclear or ambiguous?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the definition of consent is confusing in some areas and still retains vestiges of outdated rape laws that could be interpreted to require a victim to physically resist an attacker before a fact-finder can conclude there was a lack of consent. The Subcommittee's recommended changes would retain most of the current definition, but remove repetitive and contradictory language about resistance. A lack of resistance would still be relevant for the fact-finder to consider along with all the surrounding circumstances, but the proposed change clarifies that a lack of resistance alone does not constitute consent.

JPP Issue 2: Should the statute define defenses relying on the victim's consent or the accused's mistake of fact as to consent in sexual assault cases?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that there should be clarification in the Manual for Courts-Martial so that consent (as an attack on the government's proof) and mistake of fact as to consent (as a clearly delineated defense) may be raised in any case in which it is relevant.

JPP Issue 3: Should the statute define "incapable of consenting?"

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that practitioners, including military judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, appellate courts, panel members at courts-martial, and Service members as part of their sexual assault training, need a definition for this important term that is an issue in many sexual assault and abusive sexual contact prosecutions under Articles 120(b) and 120(d). Practitioners testified that a majority of the cases that go to trial have an alleged victim who was incapable of consenting due to impairment by alcohol or other intoxicating substances, and the absence of any explanation of this term leaves a "gap" in the statute that makes it difficult for counsel to argue their cases and for judges to instruct panel members on this issue. The Subcommittee's recommended definition of "incapable of consenting" would appear in the Subcommittee's recommended redraft at Article 120(g)(8), and further explanatory guidance for practitioners would be set forth in a subsequent executive order explaining in more depth that a totality of the circumstances test applies when determining the ultimate question of whether a victim was incapable of consenting.

JPP Issue 5: Does the definition of "bodily harm" require clarification?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the concept of "bodily harm" is useful for cases in which a sexual act or sexual contact has been committed without a victim's consent, especially in cases in which the alleged victim has little or no recollection of the incident owing to impairment, but that the term and its present definition are confusing and should be amended. The present language of 120(b)(1)(B) should be amended and replaced with the words "without the consent of the other person." This would remove any confusion over the term "bodily harm" and would create a baseline theory of liability for any sexual act or sexual contact committed without a victim's consent. The Subcommittee's recommended changes would clarify what the presenters told the Subcommittee: that "bodily harm" in Article 120(g)(3), as applied under Article120 (b)(1)(B) and Article 120(d), means a sexual act or sexual contact done without the consent of the victim, but no further "bodily harm" or physical injury must be shown. This change would further require removing the present definition of "bodily harm" set forth in Article 120(g)(3). Accordingly, the successive definitions set forth in Article 120(g) will also require renumbering. This renumbering is set out in the Subcommittee's proposed redraft in Enclosure 1 to this report.

JPP Issue 9: Are the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" too narrow, or are they overly broad?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" require clarification. The definition of "sexual act" should be modified so that penetration and contact are addressed in separate subsections, and the definition of "sexual contact" should include the use of an object.

JPP Issue 13: Does the 2012 version of the UCMJ afford prosecutors the ability to effectively charge coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority under Article 120?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the 2012 version of the UCMJ does afford prosecutors the ability to effectively charge some types of coercive sexual misconduct or sexual misconduct involving the abuse of authority. But the Subcommittee also concluded that some offenses in the entry-level training environment involve subtle forms of coercion not easily captured under the current statutory framework. The Subcommittee therefore recommends a new subsection, Article 120(b)(1)(E), that would create an additional theory of liability for sexual assault or abusive sexual contact in which an accused has abused his or her position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person.

JPP Issue 15: Should a new provision be added under Article 120 to specifically address coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that although Article 120(b)(1)(A) is used by practitioners to charge coercive sexual misconduct offenses involving the abuse of authority, numerous fact patterns—especially those arising in the entry-level training environment between instructors and recruits—are not easily captured by this theory of liability. Accordingly, the Subcommittee recommends a new subsection, Article 120(b)(1)(E), to address sexual assaults and abusive sexual contact when an accused has abused his or her position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person.

The Subcommittee does not recommend amendments to Article 120 of the UCMJ regarding the following issues referred to it by the JPP:

JPP Issue 4: Is the definition concerning the accused's "administration of a drug or intoxicant" overbroad?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the definition concerning the accused's "administration of a drug or intoxicant" under Article 120(a)(5) is not overbroad. The Subcommittee therefore recommends no changes on this issue.

JPP Issue 6: Is the definition of "threatening wrongful action" ambiguous or too narrow?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the definition of "threatening wrongful action" is not so ambiguous or narrow as to require a change to the definition. However, the Subcommittee believes that the concerns expressed by practitioners that this definition is too narrow to capture offenses arising in the entry-level training environment can and should be addressed. The Subcommittee believes that the best approach to the practitioners' concerns is through its responses to issues 13 and 15 recommending a new subsection under Article 120(b)(1) for sexual assaults and abusive sexual contact when an accused has abused his or her position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person.

JPP Issue 7: How should "fear" be defined to acknowledge both subjective and objective factors?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that no change was necessary to the current requirements that the fear of the victim be both a personal, subjective fear and that it be an objectively reasonable fear, as currently specified by Article 120(g)(7).

JPP Issue 8: Is the definition of "force" too narrow?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that in light of the recommended amendments to the statutory definition of consent in issue 1, no modification to the Article 120(g)(5) definition of force should be recommended.

JPP Issue 10: Should the accused's knowledge of a victim's capacity to consent be a required element of sexual assault?

Subcommittee Recommendation: At present, the government must prove both the victim's incapacity to consent and that the accused knew or reasonably should have known of that incapacity. The Subcommittee determined that the government should continue to be required to prove that the victim was incapable of consenting and that the accused knew or reasonably should have known of that incapacity. Title 18 U.S.C. Section 2242 (Sexual abuse) and Section 2244 (Abusive sexual contact) require the government to prove not only the charged sexual act or sexual contact but also the accused's knowledge of the victim's incapacity to consent. The elements in Article 120(b)(2) and 120(b)(3) similarly require the government to prove the act and the accused's knowledge of the incapacity, but also permit a conviction when an accused "reasonably should have known" of the victim's incapacity to consent. The Subcommittee considered the specific issue referred by the JPP, as well as whether Article 120's scienter requirement was overly broad in permitting a conviction for an accused who "reasonably should have known" of the victim's incapacity to consent, and determined that it would not recommend any changes on this issue.

JPP Issue 11: Should the offense of "indecent act" be added to the UCMJ as an enumerated offense?

Subcommittee Recommendation: For the great majority of the UCMJ's history, "indecent acts" were punishable as a specified offense under Article 134, requiring a showing that the conduct was either prejudicial to good order and discipline or of a nature to bring discredit upon the Armed Forces. An enumerated offense under Article 120 would require no such showing, which could result in overbroad application of the offense. The Subcommittee is aware that the Department of Defense has proposed an Article 134 offense in a recent draft executive order that addresses "Indecent Conduct," pursuant to the President's authority under Article 56 of the UCMJ. The Subcommittee takes no position on the contents of that proposal. The Subcommittee does not recommend adding the offense of "indecent act" to the UCMJ as an enumerated offense under Article 120. The Subcommittee's recommendation does not extend to offenses specified by the President under Article 134 of the UCMJ.

JPP Issue 12: Is the current practice of charging inappropriate relationships or maltreatment under articles of the UCMJ other than Article 120 appropriate and effective when sexual conduct is involved?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that the current practice of charging inappropriate sexual relationships or maltreatment under articles of the UCMJ other than Article 120 (Articles 92 and 93) can be appropriate and effective when sexual conduct is involved.

JPP Issue 14: Should the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" be amended to ensure that coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority are covered under an existing Article 120 provision?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that if the proposed Article 120(b)(1)(E) is adopted (see issue 15), the definition of threatening or placing another person in fear does not need to be amended with respect to coercive sexual relationships.

JPP Issue 16: Should sexual relationships between basic training instructors and trainees be treated as per se illegal or strict liability offenses under Article 120?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that consensual sexual relationships between basic training instructors and trainees should not be treated as per se illegal or strict liability offenses under Article 120.

JPP Issue 17: As an alternative to further amending Article 120, should coercive sexual relationships currently charged under other articles of the UCMJ be added to DoD's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration?

Subcommittee Recommendation: The Subcommittee determined that sexual relationships currently charged under other articles of the UCMJ, including Articles 92 and 93, should not be added to DoD's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration.

Subcommittee Review of Issues

1. Is the current definition of "consent" unclear or ambiguous?

Current definition of "consent" in Article 120(g)(8) of the UCMJ:

(8) Consent.

(A) The term "consent" means a freely given agreement to the conduct at issue by a competent person. An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear does not constitute consent. A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship by itself or the manner of dress of the person involved with the accused in the conduct at issue shall not constitute consent.

(B) A sleeping, unconscious, or incompetent person cannot consent. A person cannot consent to force causing or likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm or to being rendered unconscious. A person cannot consent while under threat or in fear or under the circumstances described in subparagraph (C) or (D) of subsection (b)(1).

(C) Lack of consent may be inferred based on the circumstances of the offense. All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent, or whether a person did not resist or ceased to resist only because of another person's actions.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Some witnesses who appeared before the JPP in late 2014 testified that the current UCMJ definition of consent[1] is inconsistent and confusing. According to JPP witness and Subcommittee member Professor Stephen J. Schulhofer of the New York University School of Law, this definition of consent mixes three of the four definitions of consent used throughout many American jurisdictions. He observed that the current version of Article 120 is awkwardly constructed and the consent language is vague and contradictory. He suggested that the JPP propose a fresh start to the sexual assault statute rather than attempt to amend it piecemeal. In contrast, other witnesses, including trial practitioners, said that the definition is clear, unambiguous, and should not be altered. Given these opposing viewpoints, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[2]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of the presenters before the Subcommittee recommended some change to the definition of consent. A retired Army military judge stated that some parts of the consent definition are contradictory. He suggested replacing the term "freely given" with "voluntary." He also suggested removing terminology regarding a victim needing to resist the attack.[3] A senior Marine Corps prosecutor and former military judge agreed.[4] A senior Army prosecutor recommended that consent should be "outwardly expressed in words or conduct."[5] He suggested removing subparagraph (g)(8)(c) as being redundant given the other subparagraphs.[6]

The reserve Chief of the Marine Corps Defense Services Organization testified that the term "competent person" is confusing and unclear and needs to be defined.[7] A senior Air Force defense counsel stated that the definition of consent is internally inconsistent in some places, that any terminology requiring "affirmative consent" is not realistic, and that affirmative expressions of consent are not how people interact socially.[8]

An Army appellate government counsel who litigates sexual assault convictions on appeal testified that there needs to be clarification regarding what a competent person is; the definition provides that "a sleeping, unconscious or incompetent person cannot consent," but she suggested that there is a gap in the definition when applied to a victim who is not sleeping or unconscious.[9] A civilian practitioner who formerly served on active duty as a Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel stated that the present definition of consent is too narrow and needs to be broader.[10]

A smaller number of presenters recommended no changes to the definition of consent. For instance, a senior Air Force prosecutor stated that while the various concepts in the definition could be organized in a simpler manner, the statute nevertheless provides Service members, practitioners, and finders of fact with a relatively concise statement of this fundamental legal term.[11] And a civilian attorney and former prosecutor testified that he does not see a problem with the definition of consent in Article 120. He noted that over his career, he never prosecuted a sexual assault case where he didn't have to prove that there was no consent, even when lack of consent was not included as a specific element of an offense; in his opinion attempting to avoid the consent issue does not accomplish much. He does not think the law is the problem; rather, the problem is in the implementation of the law, which he describes as how cases are investigated, charged, and prosecuted, and how victims are treated.[12]

C. Conclusion: Some Subcommittee members noted a concern with the definition's "residual reference to resistance."[13] The definition and the bench instructions given to the court-martial panel members can be interpreted as requiring a victim to physically resist an attacker before a judge or panel can find that the victim did not consent to the sexual act or sexual contact alleged. For instance, the Subcommittee noted that the language in 120(g)(8)(A), which in part states that a "lack of verbal or physical resistance" "resulting from the use of force" does not constitute consent, could actually imply that a lack of verbal or physical resistance not resulting from the use of force could constitute consent.

Moreover, the Subcommittee also noted that 120(g)(8)(C) on one hand advises the fact-finder to consider "all the surrounding circumstances" of the offense, yet on the other hand advises the fact-finder to consider whether and why the victim did or did not resist the attack. Grouping the question of resistance with all the other circumstances surrounding the offense places too much weight—perhaps inadvertently—on the issue of resistance.[14] Although the Subcommittee believes evidence of resistance or the lack thereof to be relevant and admissible evidence for a fact-finder to consider, it is just one of the circumstances surrounding the offense and should be given no greater or lesser emphasis than any other circumstance in the text of the statute or elsewhere.

Regarding the definition of "consent," the Subcommittee decided to recommend that the statutory definition of "consent" be modified in order to address concerns that the definition is unclear, is confusing, and contains language seeming to require resistance by a victim in order for a fact-finder to find that a victim did not consent.

To avoid placing too much emphasis on evidence of resistance or the lack thereof, the Subcommittee's proposal would break out in one subsection of the definition the concept of resistance and the other issues currently listed in the statute for determining whether there was consent, and would place the general concept of the circumstances surrounding the offense in a separate subsection of the definition.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee recommends that the text of Article 120(g)(8)(A) be amended by deleting the words "or submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another in fear" and by adding the words "Submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another in fear also does not constitute consent." The Subcommittee recommends that the text of Article 120(g)(8)(C) be amended by deleting the words "Lack of consent may be inferred based on the circumstances of the offense" and by deleting the words "or whether a person did not resist or ceased to resist only because of another person's actions." See Enclosure 1, Proposed Modified Article 120 of the UCMJ.

The new definition of consent in the Subcommittee's proposed redraft would appear at Article 120(g)(7) and would read as follows:

(7) Consent.

(A) The term "consent" means a freely given agreement to the conduct at issue by a competent person. An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent. Lack of verbal or physical resistance does not constitute consent. Submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear also does not constitute consent. A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship by itself or the manner of dress of the person involved in the conduct at issue does not constitute consent.

(B) A sleeping, unconscious, or incompetent person cannot consent. A person cannot consent to force causing or likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm or to being rendered unconscious. A person cannot consent while under threat or in fear or under the circumstances described in subparagraph (C) or (D) of subsection (b)(1).

(C) All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent.[15]

[15] See Enclosure 1.

2. Should the statute define defenses relying on the victim's consent or the accused's mistake of fact as to consent in sexual assault cases?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Several witnesses before the JPP testified that the availability of the defenses of consent and mistake of fact as to consent under the current statute is unclear, because such defenses were explicitly included in the 2007 version of Article 120 but are not specifically included in the 2012 version. Other witnesses said that the mistake of fact defense still clearly applied, but contended that it should be reintroduced into the statute to expressly limit its applicability and make clear any limitations on its scope.

During deliberations, members of the JPP agreed that the statute's lack of clarity in its definition of consent contributes to confusion about the role of consent in determining knowledge or intent in Article 120 offenses. The JPP also agreed that consent and mistake of fact as to consent are important defenses and that the statute should clearly indicate what constitutes a mistake of fact and whether the defense applies to rape and sexual assault offenses. Given the opposing views of presenters before the JPP and the JPP's own concerns regarding this issue, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[16]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters recommended clarification that these two defenses are available and may be raised by an accused. A retired Army trial judge opined that the statute should clearly state that, if raised, consent to the sexual conduct at issue is a defense to all of the offenses in Article 120.[17] He also stated that mistake of fact as to consent in any Article 120 case where it is relevant should be clearly listed as a defense in the statute or in Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 916.[18] A retired Marine Corps trial judge agreed that mistake of fact as to consent should be clearly stated to be an available defense.[19] A retired Air Force trial judge also recommended that it be clearly stated that consent and mistake of fact as to consent are available defenses to an accused in sexual assault cases.[20]

A senior Army supervisory prosecutor testified that listing the defenses available to an accused in a prosecution under Article 120 would be helpful to practitioners.[21] The reserve Chief of the Marine Corps Defense Services Organization testified that both consent and mistake of fact as to consent should be clearly stated in both the statute and R.C.M. 916.[22] A senior Army Defense Counsel recommended that both consent and mistake of fact as to consent be put back into the statute to remove any confusion as to their availability to an accused.[23] A civilian military court-martial practitioner and current reservist who formerly served on active duty as both a military prosecutor and a defense counsel opined that both consent and mistake of fact as to consent are always available to an accused as a matter of constitutional due process.[24]

A smaller number of military prosecutors opined that regardless of whether it is expressly stated in the statute or elsewhere, an accused may always raise consent and mistake of fact as to consent because Article 120(f) states "an accused may raise any applicable defenses available under this chapter or the Rules for Courts-Martial." In light of this, they testified that amendment to Article 120 is unnecessary.[25]

C. Conclusion: With respect to the defenses of "consent" and "mistake of fact as to consent," at its June meeting the Subcommittee decided to recommend that "consent" be left the way it is now treated, as a defense attack on the government's proof regarding which the judge instructs the court-martial panel members, and that "mistake of fact as to consent" be clearly listed as a defense and added back into the statute or in the Rules for Courts-Martial.

D. Recommendation: Owing to some question by practitioners regarding the availability of these defenses, the Subcommittee recommends clarification, in the Manual for Courts-Martial, that an accused may raise both "consent" and "mistake of fact as to consent" in appropriate cases. Presenters told the Subcommittee that these defenses have always been available to an accused, in statute, in the Manual for Courts-Martial, or as a matter of the common law as developed by the appellate courts. Presenters told the Subcommittee that mistake of fact has traditionally been listed as a defense in the Manual for Courts-Martial and "consent" has been viewed as an attack on the government's proof which an accused may make during trial and on which, if raised by the evidence, requires a judicial instruction by the military judge. Accordingly, the availability of "consent" as an attack on proof and "mistake of fact as to consent" as a defense should be clearly stated in the Manual for Courts-Martial. The Subcommittee does not recommend that these defenses be listed in the text of the statute.

3. Should the statute define "incapable of consenting?"

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Numerous witnesses told the JPP that the interpretation of "incapable of consenting" and of "impairment" under the 2012 version of Article 120 raised just as many problems as had language in the 2007 version of the statute. Noting that the statute includes no definitions or further guidance regarding the term "incapable of consenting," witnesses provided anecdotes of military judges using their "common sense and the knowledge of human nature to the ways of the world" to determine the meaning of "incapable of consent." These witnesses recommended amending the statute to provide either a definition or a statutory test to determine when an individual is incapable of consenting.

During deliberations, the JPP determined that additional review was required. In particular, it noted the interrelationship between incapacity and consent and the importance of providing clear definitions of these terms to judges, practitioners, and court-martial panel members. And because sexual assault prevention training for all Service members uses language from Article 120, vague terms may leave them confused about standards of behavior and expectations, raising an important policy interest. Given the views of presenters before the JPP and the JPP's own concerns regarding this issue, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[26]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of the presenters before the Subcommittee recommended that a definition be adopted of this important term that is often relevant in sexual assault cases. This term appears in the statute at Article 120(b)(3), but unlike most other terms or definitions referred to the Subcommittee, there is no explanation or definition of the term under Article 120(g). Perhaps as a result, this issue generated the greatest number of recommendations for change from the presenters before the Subcommittee.

One retired Navy military judge testified that the lack of a definition for "incapable of consenting" is "a big anemia in the statute, and we have to go in and fill it."[27] A retired Army military judge recommended adoption of a definition that would state, "The term 'incapable of consenting' means unable to appraise the nature of the sexual conduct at issue, physically decline participation in the sexual conduct at issue, or physically communicate unwillingness to engage in the sexual conduct at issue."[28] A senior Army prosecutor stated that the current Article 120 is devoid of any definition for "incapable of consenting," and this lack of definition renders an already challenging theory of culpability almost useless.[29] By removing the 2007 definition of "substantially incapacitated," in his view, Congress left practitioners adrift without a standard by which to teach Service members how to behave, provide notice of criminal behavior, make appropriate charging decisions, and effectively prosecute those who exploit impaired or intoxicated individuals.[30] A senior Air Force prosecutor testified that a definition is needed, and he suggested the following: "The term 'incapable of consenting' means unable to appraise the nature of the sexual conduct at issue, decline participation in the sexual conduct at issue, or communicate unwillingness to engage in the sexual conduct at issue."[31]

An Air Force appellate government counsel stated that the lack of a definition leads to defense counsel's arguing that any condition short of a victim being asleep or unconscious amounts to the victim being capable of consenting to sexual activity.[32] She suggested that a definition contain the following language: "A person does not need to be unconscious or asleep in order to be incapable of consenting to a sexual act due to impairment by a drug, intoxicant or other similar substance," or "a person's level of impairment does not need to rise to the level of unconsciousness or sleep in order for that person to be incapable of consenting to a sexual act due to impairment by a drug, intoxicant or other similar substance."[33] An Army appellate government counsel agreed that this term needs to be clarified.[34]

Defense counsel also agreed that there should be a definition of "incapable of consenting." The reserve Chief of the Marine Corps Defense Services Organization testified that the statute should define "incapable of consenting."[35] A senior Air Force defense counsel testified that a definition is needed, and she agreed with the definition recommended by the retired Army military judge quoted above: "The term 'incapable of consenting' means unable to appraise the nature of the sexual conduct at issue, physically decline participation in the sexual conduct at issue, or physically communicate unwillingness to engage in the sexual conduct at issue."[36] A senior Army defense counsel agreed that a definition is needed, and likewise agreed with the one recommended by the retired Army military judge.[37] A senior Navy defense counsel also testified that practitioners absolutely need the statute to define this term; consent becomes an issue as early as the investigative stage, and without an adequate definition cases end up devolving into a battle of experts giving opinions on the level of intoxication.[38] He told the Subcommittee that the concept of "incapable of consenting" also comes into conflict with the training received by court-martial panels on alcohol intoxication as it relates to the ability to consent, and without a legal definition military judges cannot assist the panel members on this often pivotal issue.[39]

One civilian attorney and former prosecutor testified that a victim's capacity to consent is always a fact question, but it helps to give examples in a definition, such as "less than 16 years old, mentally defective, mentally incapacitated, too intoxicated to appreciate the nature of the act, physically helpless, or unconscious."[40]

One Subcommittee member, in presenting before the Judicial Proceedings Panel, noted that the phrase "incapable of consenting" is "conclusory and meaningless." For instance, when is a person incapable? What is the test? Civilian courts have worked with similar language and managed convictions from time to time, he pointed out, but the ambiguity impedes the law's ability to communicate a normative message and may inhibit prosecution of deserving cases. He stated that the criteria of incapacity must be defined.[41]

C. Conclusion: The vast majority of presenters before the Subcommittee who practice under the UCMJ requested a definition of "incapable of consenting," as this issue is present in most cases prosecuted at trial. The Subcommittee concluded that a definition is necessary and should be initiated through statutory amendment, an executive order, or in the Military Judges' Benchbook instructions.

The Subcommittee first looked to 18 U.S.C. § 2242 (Sexual abuse) for possible guidance regarding what factors should be considered when adopting a definition of "incapable of consenting."[42] That code section criminalizes knowingly engaging in a sexual act with another person if that other person is—

> (A) incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct; or
> (B) physically incapable of declining participation in, or communicating unwillingness to engage in, that sexual act.[43]

However, the Subcommittee believed that this language, although helpful, could be seen as too narrow. The Subcommittee found the Navy-Marine Court of Criminal Appeals opinion in United States v. Pease[44] to be more useful. The Pease court stated:

> An "incompetent" person is a person who lacks either the mental or physical ability to consent due to a cause enumerated in the statute. To be able to freely give an agreement, a person must first possess the cognitive ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct in question, then possess the mental and physical ability to make and to communicate a decision regarding that conduct to the other person.[45]

The court further stated that to be incapable of consenting means a person "lacked the cognitive ability to appreciate the sexual conduct in question or the physical or mental ability to make and to communicate a decision about whether they agreed to the conduct."[46]

Accordingly the Subcommittee recommends a new definition of "incapable of consenting," based in part on the Pease case.

The Subcommittee also believes that additional guidance should be provided regarding the factors that should be considered by a fact-finder when resolving the question of whether the alleged victim was incapable of consenting, including a totality of the circumstances analysis that sets forth a non-exhaustive list of example factors.[47] This proposed definition is set forth in the Subcommittee's recommendation.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee recommends that the following definition of "incapable of consenting" be adopted as part of the Subcommittee's redraft of Article 120, which would appear at Article 120(g)(8):

> Incapable of consenting. A person is 'incapable of consenting' if that person does not possess the mental ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct or does not possess the physical or mental ability to make or communicate a decision regarding such conduct.

The Subcommittee further recommends that the following language be promulgated in an executive order to be published in the Manual for Courts-Martial and the Military Judges' Benchbook instructions:

> A totality of circumstances standard applies when assessing whether a person was incapable of consenting. In deciding whether a person was incapable of consenting, many factors should be considered and weighed, to the extent they are known, including, but not limited to, that person's:
> - Decision-making ability;
> - Ability to foresee and understand consequences;
> - Awareness of the identity of the person with whom they are engaging in the conduct;
> - Level of consciousness;
> - Amount of alcohol or other intoxicants ingested;
> - Tolerance to the ingestion of alcohol or other intoxicants; and/or
> - Ability to walk, talk, and engage in other purposeful physical movements.

4. Is the definition concerning the accused's "administration of a drug or intoxicant" overbroad?

> Current text of Article 120(a)(5) of the UCMJ:
> Any person subject to this chapter who commits a sexual act upon another person by—
> (5) administering to that other person by force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or consent of that person, a drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance and thereby substantially impairing the ability of that other person to appraise or control conduct, > is guilty of rape and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. According to JPP witness and Subcommittee member Professor Schulhofer, the statute should be narrowly tailored to criminalize only the intentional administration of an intoxicant for the purpose of committing a sexual act, not actions that are accidental or negligent. No military practitioners raised concerns regarding this issue with the JPP or related any criticisms arising from problems with this definition that have occurred at the trial level.

During deliberations, JPP members noted that only one presenter highlighted the issue of intent with regard to the administration of a drug or intoxicant. It was not clear to the JPP if a conviction would be possible in cases in which the substance was administered by accident or without proof of intent. Given these questions, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[48]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended no changes to the definition of an accused's administering a drug or intoxicant to a victim under Article 120(a)(5). For instance, according to a senior Army prosecutor there is no indication from the field that, as worded, this provision is capturing conduct that is not exploitative or assaultive.[49] He urged the Subcommittee not to add a specific intent requirement to this offense. He offered the hypothetical that if a person spiked a punch bowl at a party and then performed a sexual act on someone who had consumed that intoxicant and become impaired, that behavior should be criminal. Adding a specific intent that the intoxicant be administered with the purpose of rendering people impaired and vulnerable to sexual acts would render this theory unprovable. Doing so would also require the offender to have specifically chosen the victim at the time of administering the substance, when it is just as likely that he or she is targeting a pool of individuals (e.g., anyone who partakes in the punch). Similarly, a senior Air Force prosecutor stated that recommendations to include a specific intent requirement (e.g., that administration of the drug or intoxicant be for the purpose of impairing a victim's capacity to consent) are misplaced.[50] The discretion of commanders throughout the processing of a case and the consistent safety check provided by judge advocates, including their Article 34, UCMJ, pretrial advice, make it unlikely this subsection will be applied to situations where the administration is disconnected from the sexual act or sexual contact. Adding a specific intent requirement would, however, undermine prosecutions through this subsection in two obvious circumstances: (1) where the accused formed the intent to commit the offense only after recognizing how intoxicated the victim became and (2) where the accused ingests drugs or intoxicants at the same time and thereby raises the issue of voluntary intoxication. See R.C.M. 916(l)(2). And one civilian practitioner who formerly served as a Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel observed that this issue appears to be concerned with an incredibly narrow set of hypothetical facts that do not require preemptive congressional action.[51]

A contrary view was offered by a retired Army military judge, who suggested amending the definition by adding the requirement that the administration of a drug or intoxicant be done for the purpose of impairing the victim's capacity to express a lack of consent to the sexual act.[52]

C. Conclusion: With respect to the definition concerning the accused's "administration of a drug or intoxicant," as stated in Article 120(a)(5), the Subcommittee determined that no change should be made to this definition.[53] The Subcommittee concluded that adding an element to this provision would unnecessarily complicate charging certain offenses under the statute.

D. Recommendation: No change.

5. Does the definition of "bodily harm" require clarification?

> Current definition of "bodily harm" in Article 120(g)(3) of the UCMJ:
> (3) Bodily harm. The term "bodily harm" means any offensive touching of another, however slight, including any nonconsensual sexual act or nonconsensual sexual contact.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The 2012 version of Article 120 expanded the offense of sexual assault to include sexual acts by causing bodily harm. Under the current statute, bodily harm is defined as "any offensive touching of another, however slight, including any nonconsensual sexual act or nonconsensual sexual contact." Thus, in cases in which the bodily harm alleged is the sexual act (or contact) itself, lack of consent can effectively become an element of the offense.

The issue raised to the JPP is whether sexual assault based on bodily harm under Article 120(b)(1)(B) includes only offenses that involved bodily harm in addition to the sexual act or if the statute also includes offenses that involved only a nonconsensual sexual act. According to several current practitioners, the definition of bodily harm, as well as the statutory scheme surrounding the bodily harm offense, is ambiguous and creates confusion at trial. One solution recommended to the JPP was to amend the definition of bodily harm to include "physical pain, illness, or any impairment" while establishing a separate and distinct offense under Article 120 for sexual intercourse without consent. However, another witness before the JPP argued that the bodily harm definition should not be altered and that Congress's intention to include sex without consent as an offense was clear.

During deliberations, the JPP members found the definition of bodily harm confusing. Given the opposing views of presenters and the JPP's own concerns over the term "bodily harm," the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[54]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of the presenters before the Subcommittee recommended that no changes be made to the concept of bodily harm in Article 120(b)(1)(B) or the definition of bodily harm in Article 120(g)(3). Several experienced prosecutors stated that they would charge Article 120(b)(1)(B) in cases in which the victim has little or no recollection of the incident but can affirmatively state that a perpetrator engaged in a sexual act or sexual contact with the victim without consent. For instance, one senior Army prosecutor stated that he has had cases in which the victim was positioned, unclothed, in such a manner that the offender penetrated her without having to adjust clothing, bedding, or her body, and without having to use force.[55] If the sexual act could not be used as the bodily harm, this would not be prosecutable as a sexual assault. He testified that this definition also helps in cases of poor or old memory, and he has prosecuted numerous cases in which the victim remembered being penetrated, but not the details of any physical contact before the penetration.[56] A senior Marine prosecutor recommended leaving this definition unchanged because it allows the government to capture acts that are nonconsensual and also addresses the scenario where consent is withdrawn.[57] A senior Air Force prosecutor recommended that no changes be made because the definition accurately captures the legal term and allows prosecutors to criminalize nonconsensual sexual acts and sexual contacts even in situations where the act or contact constitutes the offensive touching.[58]

An Army appellate government counsel asked that no changes be made because this subsection allows the government to charge the bodily harm as the act, and this tactic is useful in cases in which the victim does not have a clear memory of what happened owing to impairment by drugs or alcohol.[59] One civilian practitioner testified that the statute is clear that Congress intended to define nonconsensual sexual activity as bodily harm, and this definition is uncontroversial.[60]

On the other hand, a retired Army trial judge opined that the definition was confusing and in need of change, and he suggested creating a new offense under Article 120 of "wrongful sexual contact," which would criminalize any sexual contact on another person without that other person's permission.[61] And a senior Air Force defense counsel stated that there is "just no real definition" of "bodily harm" that actually lends itself to be easily defended when it is used in the context of incapacitation or alcohol. It is used in various different ways. And for that reason, it is hard to articulate what exactly "bodily harm" means. She suggested that the term "bodily harm" needs to have a definition that is actually workable.[62]

Testifying before the JPP in August 2014, Subcommittee member Professor Stephen Schulhofer opined that the concept of "bodily harm" is confusing as used in several places in Article 120 and should be more clearly defined. He stated that it should serve to differentiate more serious cases from those in which there is no injury or threat of injury beyond the harm of unwanted penetration itself. Bodily harm as currently defined in the UCMJ ("any offensive touching of another, however slight, including any nonconsensual sexual act or nonconsensual sexual contact") conflicts with the Model Penal Code's definition, which specifies "physical pain, illness or any impairment of physical condition."[63]

C. Conclusion: According to military practitioners who testified before the Subcommittee, the concept of "bodily harm" is useful for cases in which a sexual act or contact has been committed without the victim's consent and a victim has little or no recollection of the event beyond the nonconsensual act or contact. But despite many practitioners' testimony that the concept of bodily harm as used under Article 120(b)(1)(B), Article 120(d), and the definition in Article 120(g)(3) is workable, the Subcommittee nevertheless finds the term and its present definition confusing for two reasons.

First, the statute currently defines bodily harm as "any offensive touching of another, however slight," meaning a nonconsensual touching and nothing more. Although that concept of bodily harm has a well-developed history in military law under Article 128, UCMJ (Assault)—a history that judges and legal practitioners are well-versed in—non-lawyers who sit on military courts-martial panels are not typically familiar with this legal concept. "Bodily harm" in lay terms often means the presence of physical injuries, and the Subcommittee is concerned that a panel could interpret "bodily harm" to require some physical injury in addition to the unwanted sexual penetration or contact. Because rape and sexual assault may not result in physical injuries, these differing concepts could be confusing to a panel and result in inappropriate acquittals.[64] Second, the current text regarding this theory of liability in Article 120(b)(1)(B) is tautological. For these reasons, the Subcommittee recommends it be amended.

The Subcommittee's recommended changes would clarify what the presenters told the Subcommittee: that "bodily harm" in Article 120(g)(3), as applied under Article120 (b)(1)(B) and Article 120(d), is defined as a sexual act or sexual contact done without the consent of the victim, but no further "bodily harm" must be shown.

D. Recommendation: Change the language of 120(b)(1)(B) and replace it with "without the consent of the other person."[65] This would remove any confusion over the term "bodily harm" and would create a baseline offense for any sexual act or sexual contact committed without a victim's consent. The removal of the definition of bodily harm set forth in Article 120(g)(3) will require that each successive subparagraph be renumbered. This renumbering is set forth in the Subcommittee's proposed redraft in Enclosure 1 to this report.

The new Article 120(b)(1)(B) would read as follows:

(b) Sexual assault. Any person subject to this chapter who—

(1) commits a sexual act upon another person

(B) without the consent of the other person;

is guilty of sexual assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.[66]

6. Is the definition of "threatening wrongful action" ambiguous or too narrow?

> Current definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" in Article 120(g)(7) of the UCMJ:
> (7) Threatening or placing that other person in fear. The term "threatening or placing that other person in fear" means a communication or action that is of sufficient consequence to cause a reasonable fear that non-compliance will result in the victim or another person being subjected to the wrongful action contemplated by the communication or action.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The Manual for Courts-Martial does not define the term "wrongful action" and provides no guidance on whether Congress intended this provision to cover the inherently coercive senior–subordinate relationships unique to the military. Significantly, the 2007 version of Article 120 specifically articulated and provided a theory of liability for placing a victim in fear "through the use or abuse of military position, rank, or authority, to affect or threaten to affect, either positively or negatively, the military career of another." However, this language was removed from the current version of Article 120.

Some witnesses contended that the current provision is too narrow and ambiguous, because it does not encompass sexual acts or contacts that are induced through promises of career advancement or undeserved favorable treatment. Others testified to the contrary that the current language is adequate to charge sexual assaults resulting from inherently coercive relationships and that the "threat of . . . wrongful action" language is appropriately broad and can encompass senior–subordinate relationships.

During deliberations, the JPP agreed that additional review was necessary to determine whether the current statutory language is intended to cover relationships unique to the military and, if so, whether the statute is sufficiently broad. Given the opposing views offered by practitioners, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[67]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended some change in the definition of "threatening wrongful action." This group testified that the term is unclear and ambiguous in cases in which an accused is charged with violating Article 120(b)(1)(A) or 120(d) by using his or her position of authority or rank to coerce a victim into a sexual act or sexual contact. For instance, a senior Air Force appellate government counsel stated that the definition should be made more explicit.[68] To her, it is not obvious at first glance that the definition is meant to encompass situations where a superior is using his or her rank or authority to coerce sexual acts or contacts.[69] Military court-martial panels are used to following orders, she noted, and thus it is important for those selected to sit as panel members to receive explicit instructions. Otherwise, defense counsel could certainly successfully argue that since neither "use of rank" or "abuse of authority" is expressly included in the definition of "threatening or placing in fear," the court members cannot find the accused guilty. She suggested incorporating the language of the 2007 version of Article 120 into the definition of "threatening or placing in fear"— with the caveat that offering to affect a subordinate's career positively should not be a criminal act. A senior Marine Corps prosecutor at an entry-level training command testified that the bench book instructions for this definition are inadequate.[70] He suggested "reaching back" to the previous version of Article 120 for guidance. The prior version of Article 120 provided some specific examples of what could constitute the threatened harm targeted, one of which was threatening or placing the victim in fear "through the use or abuse of military position, rank, or authority, to affect or threaten to affect, either positively or negatively, the military career of some person."[71] He suggested also explaining that threats may be either express or implied.[72] A senior Coast Guard prosecutor and former military judge testified that the definition "falls short."[73] He stated that a military judge needs to be able to provide court-martial panels with specific instructions, and he suggested a modification to the bench instructions in accord with his fellow prosecutors' suggestions based on the prior version of Article 120.[74]

A senior Air Force appellate defense counsel agreed that the definition needs modification. Like some of the prosecutors, she suggested looking back to the 2007 version of Article 120 and modifying the bench instructions to address this issue.[75] A senior Air Force staff judge advocate and legal adviser to a training commanding general testified that this definition is too narrow and should include any offers of favorable action by the accused.[76] A Marine Corps staff judge advocate and legal adviser to the commanding general of an entry-level training facility testified that he believes the definition should be modified in accord with the 2007 version of article to include the specific example of abusing military position, rank, or authority.[77]

A minority of presenters suggested that the definition does not need change. A retired Army military judge believes that the current definition is sufficient because it addresses "wrongful" conduct.[78] And a senior Air Force prosecutor noted that the current definition is sufficiently broad to cover the types of sexual assaults and abusive sexual contacts falling outside of the other theories contained in Article 120(b)(1).[79] That said, he recommended consideration of a new sexual offense specifically targeting the inherently coercive senior–subordinate relationships unique to the military.[80]

One Subcommittee member, in presenting before the Judicial Proceedings Panel, noted that the definition is either too ambiguous or too narrow in its application to an officer or NCO who seeks sexual favors in return for undeserved favorable treatment, or sexual favors absent which he will report an enlistee's infractions or mention factually accurate shortcomings in the enlistee's personnel report.[81] He recommends that the definition be clarified and that these types of scenarios be treated as a coercive sexual crime.[82]

Two other presenters held that the definition is actually too broad and encompasses conduct that should not be criminal. For instance, a senior Army prosecutor suggested the words "physical or violent" be inserted to qualify "action contemplated by the communication or action."[83] The effect would be to strip nonviolent threats out of the sexual assault arena, reserving the most severe offenses and punishments for those who (a) violate a person's physical integrity (their body) and (b) render ineffective a person's personal autonomy (their ability to decide what happens to their body).[84] Force, violence, threatening coercion, and incompetence—all of these have violence at their core; the victim is compelled to participate, actively or passively, in the sexual conduct. They cannot, or reasonably do not, have the opportunity to escape or avoid the conduct. He suggested that economic harms should be addressed outside of Article 120, if at all.[85] And a civilian practitioner and former Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel declared that "the definition is incredibly broad and presents a uniquely factual question: Was the contemplated action wrongful?"[86] In his view, this is a question of fact to be determined according to the evidence, and he believes that the current definition of wrongful action is adequate to address the issues of coercive sexual relationships and abuses of military rank or authority.[87]

C. Conclusion: Although concerns were expressed to the Subcommittee regarding the definition being unclear and perhaps too narrow, the Subcommittee nevertheless concluded that adding a new subsection (E) to Article 120(b)(1) addressing abuse of position, rank, or authority would satisfy those worried about potential narrowness in the definition of threatening wrongful action in Article 120(g)(7).[88] Accordingly, the Subcommittee recommended no change to the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" under Article 120(g)(7).

D. Recommendation: No change.

7. How should "fear" be defined to acknowledge both subjective and objective factors?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Because the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" hinges on "caus[ing] a reasonable fear,"[89] it is clear that for offenses under Article 120 involving threats or placing a victim in fear, an objective "reasonable person" standard must be met rather than a subjective standard that takes into account the victim's actual and individual mind-set. The JPP received some testimony that the "reasonable" test should be amended to recognize a victim's subjective, actual fears.

During deliberations, the JPP agreed that additional review was necessary to determine whether a different test should replace the current objective test and to evaluate the most effective and efficient means of implementing such a change. In addition, the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" in the 2012 version of the statute was substantially narrowed from the definition used in the 2007 version. This change raises questions as to whether the current version of Article 120 sufficiently criminalizes certain types of sexual misconduct, particularly those that involve abuse of authority. Given the opposing views among presenters and the JPP's own concerns about this issue, the JPP referred it to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[90]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended no changes to Article 120(g)(7), at least in the context of prosecutions under Article 120(a)(3), 120(b)(1)(A), 120(c), or 120(d), when the accused has been charged with placing the victim in "fear" of the threatened act alleged. The majority of presenters stated the government is—and should be—required to prove both (1) the victim's subjective, personal fear, and (2) that the victim's subjective fear was also objectively reasonable under the circumstances.

A senior Army prosecutor stated that fear is defined adequately as written: a victim's actual, subjective fear could indicate that the victim's fear is also objectively reasonable in response to a particular threat.[91] He believes these forms of proof to be sufficient; there is no need for further adjustment.[92] Likewise, a senior Air Force prosecutor found the requirement that a victim's fear be "objectively reasonable under the circumstances" to be proper: a subjective but objectively unreasonable fear in a victim would, in cases in which the defense was raised, make it impossible for the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused did not have an honest and reasonable mistake of fact as to consent.[93] He noted that in the marginal case in which the accused has knowledge of the victim's objectively unreasonable but subjective fear, the prosecution is free to allege sexual assault or abusive sexual contact by bodily harm, as the sexual act or sexual contact would be nonconsensual.[94]

A retired Army military judge stated that "fear" does not need to be defined to acknowledge subjective fear, because subjective fear is already relevant and admissible and would also be relevant to show objective fear.[95] He believes that removing the requirement that the fear be objectively reasonable would result in confusion and cause practical problems in litigating sexual assault trials.[96] And a civilian practitioner who was formerly a Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel stated that requiring an objectively reasonable fear is "appropriate because it incorporates the defense of mistake of fact regarding whether the other person was actually in fear" and also "avoids prosecuting someone for instilling a fear that is objectively unreasonable."[97]

One retired Air Force military judge offered a different view, testifying that if the focus is on protecting the victim, the court-martial panel members "should not be permitted to superimpose their own judgment upon the victim, as long as they believe the victim believed he or she was in fear."[98] He suggested that in such cases, the accused should be responsible for the victim as he or she "finds" the victim.[99]

One Subcommittee member who submitted written material to the Judicial Proceedings Panel recommended modifying the definition from a narrower reasonable person standard to a more subjective one that allows a more vulnerable victim's fear to be sufficient to satisfy the fear element.[100]

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that no change was needed to the requirements that a victim's subjective and personal fear be also objectively reasonable under the circumstances, as currently specified by Article 120(g)(7).[101]

D. Recommendation: No change.

8. Is the definition of "force" too narrow?

> Current definition of force in Article 120(g)(5) of the UCMJ:
> (5) Force. The term "force" means—
> (A) the use of a weapon;
> (B) the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or
> (C) inflicting physical harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Under the 2007 version of Article 120, force was defined as an "action to compel submission of another or to overcome or prevent another's resistance" by use or suggestion of a dangerous weapon, or by "physical violence, strength, power, or restraint . . . sufficient that the other person could not avoid or escape the sexual conduct." According to one expert, this phrasing required the victim to resist the assault.[102] The 2012 revision to Article 120 amended the definition of force to focus objectively on the offender's conduct rather than subjectively on the victim's behavior. Force is now defined as "(A) the use of a weapon; (B) the use of such physical strength or violence sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or (C) inflicting physical harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim." Subsection (B) measures the offender's use of physical strength or violence by an objective reasonable person standard rather than by the actions of the particular victim in a case. While subsection (C) does look at the particular victim, it does not place the burden of resistance on that person.

Two witnesses before the JPP advocated for a broader definition of force. JPP Subcommittee member Dean Lisa Schenck noted that the 2012 version of Article 120 restricts "force" to a situation in which a weapon is used, rather than simply displayed or suggested. The degree of force to compel the victim's submission is more subjective than in the 2007 version and places less emphasis on whether the victim could escape the assault. One other JPP witness recommended that Article 120(g)(5) should include "the use, the display, or the suggestion of the use of a weapon." Professor Schulhofer argued that there should be two categories of forcible rape—one encompassing unlawful force applied against a person; the other, escalated use of force that could cause death or grievous bodily harm. During deliberations, the JPP decided that additional review was warranted to determine if the definition of force should be broadened and referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[103]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended no change to the definition of force under Article 120(g)(5). A senior Air Force prosecutor stated that in his experience, offenses falling under the statute's definitions of rape and aggravated sexual contact are much less common than those qualifying as sexual assault and abusive sexual contact.[104] He noted that in cases in which "force" is used, it is normally apparent, and the language included within Article 120(g)(5) is adequate.[105] Similarly, a senior Army prosecutor opined that the definition is sufficient, and he suggested adding the words "using or brandishing a weapon" to the first prong under Article 120(g)(5)(A).[106] He provided the example of an accused brandishing a Taser, a weapon that would not be likely to cause grievous bodily harm or death, but would serve to compel submission even without completing the act of using it.[107] A retired Army military judge opined that the definition of "force" is not too narrow.[108] In his view, some of the concerns about situations that are arguably not covered could be addressed by other theories of liability, such as "threatening or placing that other person in fear that any person will be subjected to death, grievous bodily harm, or kidnapping."[109] And a civilian practitioner and former Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel testified that the statutory definition of force is narrow, which in his opinion is sensible when considered in the context of the broader statutory definitions of bodily harm and of threatening or placing in fear.[110]

One senior Air Force appellate government counsel offered an opposing view, suggesting that the current definition of force should clarify that a victim is not required to exert any particular level of resistance in order for the accused to be found to have used unlawful force.[111] She relied on an appellate case in which the Service court overturned a rape conviction because the government did not admit sufficient evidence to prove force: specifically, "trial counsel did not elicit sufficient evidence to indicate that the Appellant used force to overcome the pushing."[112] The court appears to have focused on what it perceived was a lack of resistance by the victim, and although the case was prosecuted under the 2007 version of Article 120, she believes that the same result could occur under the present version of the statute.[113]

One Subcommittee member, in written material presented to the Judicial Proceedings Panel, recommended modifying the definition of force to include situations in which the accused suggests that he or she has possession of a weapon; at this time the definition covers only situations in which a weapon is actually used.[114]

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that in light of the amendments to the statutory definition of consent recommended in the discussion of issue 1, no modification to the Article 120(g)(5) definition of force should be recommended.[115]

D. Recommendation: No change.

9. Are the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" too narrow, or are they overly broad?

Current definitions of sexual act and sexual contact in Article 120(g)(1) and (2) of the UCMJ:

(1) Sexual act. The term "sexual act" means—

(A) contact between the penis and the vulva or anus or mouth, and for purposes of this subparagraph contact involving the penis occurs upon penetration, however slight; or

(B) the penetration, however slight, of the vulva or anus or mouth, of another by any part of the body or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(2) Sexual contact. The term "sexual contact" means—

(A) touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, the genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, or degrade any person; or

(B) any touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, any body part of any person, if done with an intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The JPP heard testimony that the statute's definition of sexual act may be overbroad. One JPP witness observed that a military member who put his or her finger in the mouth of another to abuse or harass that person could be charged with committing a sexual act under the current definition. A military defense counsel recommended amending the definition to eliminate the potential of a sexual assault conviction in cases in which objects or "any body part" are inserted into another's mouth for a purpose that is not sexual. The JPP also heard testimony that the statute's definition of sexual contact may be either too narrow or overbroad. Witnesses before the JPP were split on that issue. Those who criticized the definition as too narrow contended that the statute does not include a sexual touching of another person through the use of an object. Conversely, those who viewed the definition as overly broad reasoned that the definition allows for possible inclusion of "hypotheticals [that are] absurd;" one observed that "if the absurdity can be removed from the definition, then I think it adds respect to the law."[116] Another presenter agreed, noting that the definition could be used to impose unnecessary or inappropriate collateral consequences, such as sex offender registration for acts of touching that are not necessarily sexual. During deliberations, members of the JPP agreed that additional review of these definitions was warranted, and referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[117]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended some modification of the definitions of "sexual act" and

[117] JPP INITIAL REPORT 33–35 (Feb. 2015).

"sexual contact" under Article 120(g)(1)–(2). A retired Army military judge stated that the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" are too broad.[118] The term "sexual act," he suggested, could be fixed by deleting two words—"or mouth"—from subparagraph (B). The term "sexual contact," he suggested, should be corrected by deleting most of subparagraph (B), which criminalizes touching any body part with any body part, including through the clothing, if it is accompanied by the intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person. He suggested that statutory language requiring specific intent should be added to subparagraph (A). In addition, with this change, an ambiguity in the last sentence can be corrected, and "or by any object" can be added after "by any body part." A senior Air Force prosecutor testified that "sexual act" is too broad and "sexual contact" is too narrow.[119] He recommended removing "or mouth" from the definition of "sexual act," and adding "or any object" to the definition of "sexual contact."

A senior Army defense counsel recommended modifying the definition of "sexual contact" to state, "Touching may be accomplished by any part of the body or by any object when the object is used to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[120] A senior Navy defense counsel agreed with the retired Army trial judge that "or mouth" should be deleted from the definition of sexual act.[121] He also agreed with the suggested change to the definition of sexual contact to include the use of an object. An Army appellate government counsel agreed that the use of an object should be added to the definition of sexual contact.[122] One senior Marine Corps appellate defense counsel testified that the second parts of the definitions of sexual act and sexual contact in Article 120(g)(1)(B) and 120(g)(2)(B) are overly broad and should be removed.[123]

On the other hand, one senior Army prosecutor recommended no changes to the definition of sexual act because in his view it is correctly defined.[124] He stated that the definition of "sexual contact" is adequate, although he agreed that the words "or an object" should be added.[125]

On July 15, 2015, in the midst of the Subcommittee's meetings, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces issued its opinion in United States v. Schloff,[126] holding that "sexual contact" may include those instances when an accused touches a victim with an object. In a 3–2 decision, the Court ruled that a specification alleging abusive sexual contact by pressing a stethoscope to the breasts of a noncommissioned officer in violation of Article 120 of the UCMJ appropriately stated an offense, because the act of pressing a stethoscope to the victim's breasts (object-to-body contact) constituted sexual contact as defined by Article 120(g)(2).

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that the definitions for "sexual act" and "sexual contact" should be amended to clarify the bounds of prohibited conduct and address concerns regarding overbreadth in some places and narrowness in other parts of these definitions.[127]

Numerous presenters testified that the definition of sexual act in Article 120(g)(1)(B) may be too broad because it could include placing an object like a toothbrush into someone's mouth with the intent to abuse, humiliate, or degrade any person, regardless of whether there was any specific sexual intent.[128] The Subcommittee believes that this definition could convert into a sex crime acts that might constitute hazing or battery-types of offenses—offensive touchings—but are not sex offenses.[129]

Moreover, to address concerns regarding the narrowness of the definition of sexual contact in Article 120(g)(2), and following the recommendations of several presenters, the Subcommittee believes the statutory definition of sexual contact should clearly state that contact can be accomplished not only with any part of the body but also with an object.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee recommends that the Article 120(g)(1) definition for "sexual act" be amended as follows:[130] The words "contact between the" should be deleted, and the words "penetration however slight of the" should be inserted, in Article 120(g)(1)(A). Further, the word "and" preceding the word "vulva" should be deleted and replaced with the word "into" and the words "and for purposes of this subparagraph contact involving the penis occurs upon "penetration, however slight" should be deleted.

A new subsection (B) should be added to subparagraph (g)(1), consisting of the words "contact between the mouth and the penis, vulva, or scrotum or anus." The current subsection (B) should be redesignated subsection (C), and the words "or penis" should be added after the word "vulva," and the words "or mouth" should be deleted.

The Subcommittee recommends that the Article 120(g)(2) definition for "sexual contact" be amended as follows: Article 120(g)(2)(A) and (B) should be merged into one subparagraph. The word "genitalia" should be deleted, and the words "vulva, penis, scrotum" should be added in its place. The words "any touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, any body part of any person, if done" should be deleted.[131]

The new definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in Article 120(g) would read as follows:

(1) Sexual act. The term "sexual act" means—

(A) penetration, however slight, of the penis into the vulva or anus or mouth;

(B) contact between the mouth and the penis, vulva, scrotum, or anus; or

(C) the penetration, however slight, of the vulva or penis or anus of another by any part of the body or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person, or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(2) Sexual contact. The term "sexual contact" means—touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, the vulva, penis, scrotum, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, or degrade any person, or with an intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

Touching may be accomplished by any part of the body or an object.

10. Should the accused's knowledge of a victim's capacity to consent be a required element of sexual assault?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The requirement of proving that the accused knew or reasonably should have known of the victim's incapacity to consent is not found in the text of the federal sexual abuse statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2242, upon which Article 120(b)(2) and 120(b)(3) were based. Some testimony before the JPP suggested that this additional requirement in Article 120 is essentially an extra mens rea element that the prosecution must prove, which, in turn, affords unnecessary protections to the accused. Critics opined that this extra mens requirement is unnecessary because the statute is aimed at protecting the victim who is mentally or physically unable to consent owing to one of the specifically enumerated conditions, such as being asleep, unconscious, or otherwise unaware that a sexual act is occurring (120(b)(2)); impaired by drugs, intoxicants, or other substances (120(b)(3)(A)); or suffering from a mental disease or defect or physical disability (120(b)(3)(B)). Given these concerns, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[132]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended that no changes be made to Article 120(b)(2) or 120(b)(3), which require the government to prove both (1) the victim's incapacity to consent and (2) that the accused knew or reasonably should have known of that incapacity. A retired Army military judge opined that the requirement that the accused knew or should have known of the victim's incapacity to consent should remain as a required element of sexual assault.[133] A senior Army prosecutor testified that this will be a required item of proof whether it is a stated element or it is raised as a defense. In its current form, the statute simply takes the defense of mistake of fact and incorporates it into Article 120(b)(2)–(3) by making it a required element. In other words, an accused cannot be both reasonably aware of the victim's incapacity and reasonably mistaken that the victim consented. If this requirement were removed, an accused could still raise mistake of fact as a defense.[134] Likewise, a senior Air Force prosecutor stated that the requirement that the accused "knows or reasonably should know" of the victim's incapacity to consent is properly included as part of Article 120(b)(2), (b)(3)(A), and (b)(3)(B), UCMJ. He believes it strikes the proper balance between criminalizing sexual acts (as well as sexual contacts through Art. 120(d), UCMJ) against victims who are in a condition making them incapable of consent and sparing from unfair punishment Service members who were both honestly and reasonably mistaken about that status. In courts-martial involving evidence of such a mistake of fact, the accused will appropriately be held to the standard of a reasonably careful, ordinary, prudent, and sober adult under the circumstances at the time of each offense.[135] A former Marine prosecutor and defense counsel who is now a civilian counsel stated that the government should have to prove the accused had some knowledge that the victim was incapable of consenting.[136]

[136] Transcript of JPP Subcommittee Meeting 391 (May 7, 2015) (testimony of Mr. Zachary Spilman, Attorney at Law).

Two federal circuit courts of appeal have held that in prosecutions under 18 U.S.C. § 2242, the government must prove both that the victim was incapacitated and that the accused knew of this incapacity (the scienter requirement).[137]

There were no presenters before the Subcommittee who suggested amending this section of Article 120.

C. Conclusion: Although some testimony was presented to the JPP that these subsections of Article 120 impose an additional mens rea requirement on the government in prosecutions for sexual assault and abusive sexual contact, this scienter element of proof is necessary, and it is also required under the federal criminal code in Title 18, U.S.C. Section 2242 (Sexual abuse). That section of the federal criminal code punishes anyone who knowingly:

> (1) causes another person to engage in a sexual act by threatening or placing that other person in fear (other than by threatening or placing that other person in fear that any person will be subjected to death, serious bodily injury, or kidnapping); or
> (2) engages in a sexual act with another person if that other person is—
> > (A) incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct; or
> > (B) physically incapable of declining participation in, or communicating unwillingness to engage in, that sexual act.

The Subcommittee finds persuasive the federal circuit courts' rationale for requiring that the government prove not just that the accused engaged in a sexual act, but also that the accused knew the victim was incapacitated when doing so.[138] For instance, the Eighth Circuit in United States v. Bruguier reasoned that to do otherwise would, among other things, "disregard the bedrock American tradition" of requiring this scienter element to be proven in rape and sexual assault prosecutions involving an incapacitated victim, and it would make the crime one where strict liability is imposed for the act alone.[139]

The Subcommittee additionally considered the difference in the scienter requirements between Article 120(b)(2)–(3) and 18 U.S.C. § 2242. The federal criminal code requires proof that an accused knew of a victim's incapacity to consent, whereas Article 120(b)(2)–(3) permits conviction when an accused either knew or "reasonably should have known" of the victim's incapacity to consent. The Subcommittee determined that the standard established by Congress in Article 120(b)(2)–(3) is neither unclear nor ambiguous; therefore, the Subcommittee does not recommend changes to the standard.

Two members of the Subcommittee concluded that Service members should not face the severe consequences of conviction under Article 120(b)(2) and (3) in the absence of the same culpability required for convicting a civilian under the same circumstances. Therefore they would recommend changing Article 120(b)(2) and (3) to require, as under 18 U.S.C. § 2242, that the accused have knowledge of the victim's incapacity to consent. Under federal law, of course, knowledge includes willful blindness, a substantial means for assuring punishment in cases of culpable misconduct.

In sum, the Subcommittee determined that an accused's knowledge of a victim's incapacity to consent should remain a required element of sexual assault under Article 120(b)(2) and 120(b)(3).

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee does not recommend changing Article 120(b)(2) or Article 120(b)(3).

11. Should the offense of "indecent act" be added to the UCMJ as an enumerated offense?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The UCMJ offense of "indecent acts with another" traditionally proscribed a variety of sexual misconduct that was not otherwise prohibited, such as consensual sexual intercourse in the presence of others and sex acts with an animal or a corpse. The 2007 amendment to Article 120 moved "indecent acts with another" from Article 134 to Article 120 and eliminated the element of the conduct as prejudicial to good order and discipline or discrediting the Service. The 2012 amendment to Article 120, however, removed the offense entirely. Currently, "indecent act" is not an enumerated offense under the UCMJ.

The JPP received testimony that the statute should be amended to restore indecent acts as an enumerated offense. The prosecution may still charge an indecent act as a general disorder offense under Article 134, but it must prove as an additional element that the conduct was prejudicial to good order and discipline or discredited the Service. In addition, the maximum punishment for a general disorder Article 134 offense is four months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for four months, whereas the maximum punishment for an indecent act charged under the 2007 version of Article 120 was up to five years' confinement, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and a dishonorable discharge.

During deliberations, members of the JPP agreed that additional review was necessary to consider whether indecent acts should be restored as an enumerated offense, and the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[140]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended that this offense be added back into the Uniform Code of Military Justice. A retired Marine Corps trial and appellate judge testified that this offense should be put back in the UCMJ because, in his experience, "the breadth and amount of [indecent] things that younger generations will do today that are completely incompatible with what the public believes the military culture is needs to be back in there."[141] A senior Army prosecutor stated that this offense should be added back into the code, and suggested that the tougher decision is between putting it into Article 120 versus having the President add it back to Article 134's enumerated offenses.[142] In his view, putting the offense under Article 120 relieves the government of having to prove that the conduct was Service discrediting or prejudicial to good order and discipline, which is an additional element of proof for an Article 134 offense that is not required under Article 120.[143] The importance of this, he believes, is not that it saves the government effort; rather, it is that indecent acts could then be a lesser-included offense of other Article 120 crimes.[144] If it is an Article 134 offense, the additional element of proof prevents its use as a lesser offense.[145] And a senior Air Force prosecutor testified that an offense of indecent acts should be added back into the code, although it could be placed under either Article 120 or Article 134.[146] He believes that nonconsensual sexual encounters regularly include elements of abuse that are not well captured within the present statutory scheme; if this offense is reintroduced into the code, investigators and trial practitioners at all levels could be aware of its availability when faced with fact patterns that appear to fall under the category of sexual assault but do not satisfy the elements of any current offense. In his view, the fair administration of military justice by the consistent charging of these crimes in similar fact patterns would benefit significantly if indecent acts were added back into the UCMJ as an enumerated offense.[147]

One Subcommittee member, in material presented to the Judicial Proceedings Panel, recommended adding this offense back into Article 120 in order to avoid the additional element of proof under Article 134.[148]

Two presenters recommended no change on this issue. A retired Army military judge stated that the offense of "indecent act," which existed in the statute between 2007 and 2012, should not be added as an enumerated offense under Article 120.[149] Most of what was in that offense between 2007 and 2012 has been moved to Article 120c(a). The remainder of indecent acts that should be criminalized and are not covered by Articles 120, 120b, 120c, or 125 can fall within Article 134, as does the offense of indecent language. He suggested that if the President thinks it warrants being specifically enumerated as an offense under Article 134 in part IV of the Manual for Courts-Martial, then the President can accomplish that enumeration by executive order, which is how indecent acts were handled in the past. And a civilian practitioner and former Marine Corps prosecutor and defense counsel suggested that indecent conduct can currently be prosecuted as a general offense under Article 134.[150]

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that adding indecent acts to the UCMJ as an enumerated offense (i.e., a statutory offense enumerated in Title 10 of the U.S. Code) is unwarranted. For the great majority of the UCMJ's history, "indecent acts" were punishable as a specified offense under Article 134, requiring a showing that the conduct was either prejudicial to good order and discipline or of a nature to discredit the Armed Forces. An enumerated offense under Article 120 would require no such showing, which could result in overbroad application of the offense. The Subcommittee is aware that the Department of Defense has proposed an Article 134 offense in a recent draft executive order that addresses "Indecent Conduct," pursuant to the President's authority under UCMJ Article 56. The Subcommittee takes no position on the contents of that proposal.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee does not recommend adding the offense of "indecent act" to the UCMJ as an enumerated offense under Article 120. The Subcommittee's recommendation does not extend to offenses specified by the President under Article 134 of the UCMJ.

12. Is the current practice of charging inappropriate relationships or maltreatment under articles of the UCMJ other than Article 120 appropriate and effective when sexual conduct is involved?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Inappropriate, consensual sexual relationships between instructors and recruits are currently charged as a violation of Article 92, UCMJ. The maximum punishment that may be imposed at a court-martial for a violation of this provision is a dishonorable discharge (or dismissal for an officer), forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and confinement for two years. Coercive relationships may also be charged, depending on the specific facts of the offense, under Article 93, maltreatment; Article 128, assault; or Article 134, conduct that discredits the Service or is prejudicial to good order and discipline. As further explained with respect to issue 13, sometimes behavior occurring within the context of these prohibited relationships is already chargeable and charged under Article 120 as well.

Those who testified before the JPP against amending Article 120 to cover these types of sexual relationships highlighted the articles and regulations that already prohibit inappropriate sexual relationships. Numerous witnesses, including prosecutors, staff judge advocates, military justice experts, a civilian defense counsel, and the Army's Judge Advocate General, told the JPP that current UCMJ punitive articles and regulations sufficiently criminalize sexual relationships between senior officials and subordinates, trainers and trainees, and recruiters and recruits, contending that the statute does not require further revision.

Several other witnesses, however, told the JPP that prosecuting offenses of senior–subordinate relationships that involve elements of coercion under punitive articles other than Article 120 is not sufficient, because convictions for violating these other punitive articles generally do not require sex offender registration. They contend that such offenses should be charged and viewed as sex offenses, because while a sexual relationship between a senior and a subordinate may appear consensual, the inherently coercive nature of the relationship prevents the subordinate from rendering freely given consent.

Given the opposing views between presenters before the JPP regarding whether the current practice of charging inappropriate relationships or maltreatment under articles of the UCMJ other than Article 120 is appropriate and effective when sexual conduct is involved, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further evaluation.[151]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee stated that the current practice of charging inappropriate sexual relationships or maltreatment under Articles 92 or 93 is appropriate and effective when consensual sexual conduct is involved. A senior Marine Corps prosecutor testified that the current method of charging inappropriate sexual relationships under Articles 92 or 93 is adequate.[152] A senior Army prosecutor testified that the present framework is workable and suggested adding a new Article 92 offense for any training instructor who has a sexual relationship with a recruit.[153] A senior Navy prosecutor and former defense counsel testified that the current version of Article 120 is sufficient to prosecute sexual assault and contact crimes.[154] In cases in which Article 120 is charged and the government is arguing that the accused placed the victim in fear, he believes that Article 120 allows a prosecutor to make a fact-specific prosecution and to make an argument as to why the language used by the accused was sufficient to put that person in fear and give them a reasonable belief that "what they said was going to happen, would happen."[155] And a senior Coast Guard prosecutor who has also served as a staff judge advocate and military judge concurred that the current practice of prosecuting consensual trainer–trainee cases under Article 92 is sufficient.[156]

Numerous defense counsel also expressed their belief that the current practice of charging inappropriate relationships or maltreatment under articles of the UCMJ other than Article 120 is appropriate and effective when consensual sexual conduct is involved. A senior Air Force appellate defense counsel testified that the current structures of the UCMJ, specifically Article 120, are fully capable of handling sexual misconduct within the training environment.[157] A Navy defense counsel reiterated that the current practice of charging under Articles 92, 93, or 120 allows prosecutors the flexibility needed when charging these types of cases.[158] And a Marine defense counsel who has previously served as a prosecutor stated that Article 92 is sufficient when charging sexual relationships between trainers and trainees that do not fit under Article 120.[159]

C. Conclusion: The current practice of charging inappropriate relationships as a violation of a lawful general order or maltreatment under articles 92 or 93 of the UCMJ can be appropriate and effective when consensual sexual conduct is involved.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee does not recommend any changes to the current practice of charging inappropriate sexual relationships that cannot be charged under Article 120 as a violation of Articles 92 and/or 93.

13. Does the 2012 version of the UCMJ afford prosecutors the ability to effectively charge coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority under Article 120?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. Any case involving overt force or threat of force may be charged as an offense under Article 120. But for cases that involve coercive sexual relationships without overt force, the ability to charge conduct as a criminal offense under Article 120 has been diminished by amendments to the statute. Under the pre-2007 version of Article 120, cases without overt force relied on the doctrine of constructive force—an alternative legal theory that recognizes use of threats and intimidation to gain control or prevent resistance as a type of force. Military courts further developed this theory to address instances of clearly nonconsensual sexual acts—especially between military members with rank disparity—when there was no use of overt physical force. The necessary force was found to be constituted by fear, coercion, or abuse of authority. However, the mere existence of a sexual relationship between individuals of a different rank was not alone enough to sustain a conviction under Article 120 of the UCMJ. Under the constructive force doctrine, military appellate courts determined that the victim's lack of consent must be manifest and/or the accused must have explicitly used the difference in rank to create a situation of dominance and control.

The 2012 version of Article 120 does not contain language that specifically addresses the use of military rank to threaten or coerce, without force, an individual into a sexual act or sexual contact. Some witnesses told the JPP that the current statutory language in Article 120 does not clearly criminalize sexual relationships between senior personnel and their subordinates resulting from coercion and/or abuse of authority when force and lack of consent are not overtly present. Two witnesses before the JPP described the difficulty of charging coercive sexual relationships as sexual assault offenses under Article 120(b)(1)(A), a sexual act accomplished through fear of wrongful action, noting that the statutory language was ineffective for such cases. The witnesses recommended amending Article 120 to specifically encompass situations in which senior Service members use their position of authority to coerce a subordinate into a sexual act or contact. Given the opposing views of the presenters before the JPP, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further evaluation.[160]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee stated that the 2012 version of Article 120 provides military prosecutors the ability to effectively charge coercive sexual acts or contacts involving the abuse of rank or authority. A senior Coast Guard prosecutor testified that the current version of Article 120 is sufficient to effectively charge coercive sexual misconduct involving the abuse of authority.[161] A senior Army defense counsel who previously served as a prosecutor at an Army training command testified that in his experience, even consensual sexual acts or contacts between trainers and trainees were prosecuted under an appropriate article and the offenders punished and held publicly accountable.[162] A senior Marine Corps defense counsel and former prosecutor testified that the current version of Article 120 gives prosecutors sufficient ability to charge coercive sexual relationships involving the abuse of authority.[163] A senior Air Force appellate defense counsel testified that the current version of Article

120 is fully capable of handling sexual misconduct cases that arise in the training environment, and no changes are necessary.[164] A senior Navy defense counsel also testified that the current version of Article 120 is both effective and appropriate and provides prosecutors the flexibility they need in charging this type of sexual misconduct.[165]

Numerous staff judge advocates who advise commanding officers at entry-level training facilities regarding investigations and prosecution of sexual assault allegations testified in accord with the majority of the presenters before the Subcommittee. For instance, an Air Force staff judge advocate testified that the current versions of Article 92 and Article 120 can be used to effectively prosecute trainer sexual misconduct.[166] She believes that other articles of the UCMJ, such as Article 93 (maltreatment and cruelty), Article 128 (assault, simple assault, and battery), or 134 (general disorders), provide the flexibility to charge appropriately depending on the unique facts of each individual case.[167] A senior Marine Corps staff judge advocate legal advisor for an entry-level training commanding officer testified that the current versions of Articles 92 and 120 are sufficient to hold Marines accountable for sexual misconduct in the entry-level training environment.[168] And a senior Coast Guard staff judge advocate legal adviser to the commanding officer at an entry-level training installation testified that the current practice of charging other articles, primarily Article 92, is sufficient in capturing the criminality of any given fact pattern.[169] He also told the Subcommittee that the current version of Article 120 gives prosecutors the ability to adequately prosecute these types of cases.[170]

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that in some cases Article 120, as well as other provisions in the UCMJ, provides prosecutors with an effective means of charging coercive sexual misconduct.[171] However, because such relationships—especially those that occur in the entry-level training environment—can involve subtle forms of coercion not easily captured under the current structure of Article 120, such misconduct could be better addressed via the proposed Article 120(b)(1)(E).

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee recommends no changes to Article 120(b)(1)(A), but will recommend that a new subsection be added to better address coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority. See Issue 15.

14. Should the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" be amended to ensure that coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority are covered under an existing Article 120 provision?

> Current definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" in Article 120(g)(7) of the UCMJ:
> (7) Threatening or placing that other person in fear. The term "threatening or placing that other person in fear" means a communication or action that is of sufficient consequence to cause a reasonable fear that non-compliance will result in the victim or another person being subjected to the wrongful action contemplated by the communication or action.

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" used in the 2012 version of Article 120 is less encompassing than the 2007 definition. The JPP agrees that as a result, the 2012 version of Article 120 does not sufficiently criminalize sexual relationships between senior and subordinates when force or the threat of force is not overt. Given this concern, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further evaluation.[172]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended amending the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" to ensure that coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority are better covered under an existing Article 120 provision. A senior Air Force appellate government counsel testified that the current definition is not expansive enough, and she recommended going back to the definition of threatening or placing in fear from the 2007 version of Article 120.[173] She offered a single caveat: that the definition should not include promises to positively affect a person's career.[174] A senior Marine Corps prosecutor testified that while it is not necessary to amend the statutory definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear," the bench instructions on this definition need to be modified to address the fact scenario in which an accused coerces a victim into a sexual act or contact by abusing his or her military rank or authority.[175] A senior Coast Guard prosecutor testified that this definition "falls short," simply because "when we define wrongful action—that gets a little gray."[176] From a prosecutor's standpoint, he believes that the military judge should be equipped to provide instructions that are definitive on the law and that can be followed by the court-martial panel members. Like several other presenters before the Subcommittee, he suggested looking back to the 2007 version of Article 120 and its definition for guidance.[177] A senior Air Force appellate defense counsel testified that the current definition should be modified along the lines of the definition set forth in the 2007 version of Article 120.[178] And a senior Navy defense counsel recommended that the concerns regarding the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" be addressed by modifying the bench instructions to align more closely with the definition contained in the 2007 version of Article 120.

Staff judge advocate legal advisers to training commanding officers also agreed that the definition needs modification. A senior Air Force staff judge advocate to a training commanding officer testified that the definition is too narrow and should be expanded to include a promise of positive action in return for sexual acts or contact.[179] A Marine Corps staff judge advocate to the commanding officer of entry-level training testified that this definition needs to be improved by referring back to the previous definition in the 2007 version of Article 120, which provided the specific example of an accused who uses or abuses his or her military position, rank, or authority to obtain sexual acts or contact from a victim.[180]

Conversely, one senior Navy prosecutor testified that the definition of "threatening or placing that other person in fear" in Article 120(g)(7) is sufficient and allows the prosecutor to make a fact-specific prosecution and an argument as to why the language used by the accused was sufficient to put that person in fear and give them a reasonable belief that "what they said was going to happen, would happen."[181] He testified that in situations in which the accused has not made any express threats or taken any overt actions that would help to corroborate a threat of wrongful action, he can still prosecute that fact pattern under Article 120(b)(1)(B) or 120(d) by alleging that the act or contact was committed without the consent of the victim.[182]

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that if the proposed Article 120(b)(1)(E) is adopted (see issue 15), the definition of threatening or placing another person in fear does not need to be amended with respect to coercive sexual acts or coercive sexual contact.[183]

D. Recommendation: No change.

15. Should a new provision be added under Article 120 to specifically address coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. The "Report on Protections for Prospective Members" stated that a new UCMJ article or an additional provision under Article 120 was not required because "statutes and regulations are in place to hold offenders appropriately accountable when prospective and new members of the military are victimized by service members who exercise control over them."[184] Given the JPP's concerns regarding whether the current methods of charging coercive sexual misconduct committed by abuse of rank or authority under Article 92, 93, or 120 are effective, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[185]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended against a new provision under Article 120 to specifically address coercive sexual relationships or those involving abuse of authority. Those presenters noted that when cases arise in which an alleged victim states he or she was coerced into engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with a superior, this fact pattern is currently charged as a violation of Article 120(b)(1)(A) for threatening or placing the victim in fear of wrongful action.

C. Conclusion: Although most presenters before the Subcommittee recommended against adopting a new provision to specifically address coercive sexual relationships or offenses involving abuse of authority, the Subcommittee is concerned that the present statute removed language from the 2007 version of Article 120 that specifically addressed the abuse of position, rank, or authority. This concern is especially acute when it analyzes offenses that have arisen in the entry-level training environment which have been the subject of so much recent public scrutiny and which often lack overt, direct threats of wrongful action, involving instead more subtle elements of coercion. Accordingly, to address this concern and make it abundantly clear that in cases in which an accused has used his or her position, rank, or authority to coerce a victim into engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact, the Subcommittee believes that a new subsection should be added under Article 120(b)(1).[186]

D. Recommendation: Article 120(b)(1) should be amended to include a new subparagraph (E): "by using their position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person."

The new Article 120(b)(1)(E) would read as follows:

(b) Sexual assault. Any person subject to this chapter who—

(1) commits a sexual act upon another person

16. Should sexual relationships between basic training instructors and trainees be treated as strict liability or per se illegal offenses under Article 120?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. One member of Congress told the JPP that the issue of consent was paramount during recent courts-martial of military training instructors who were accused of sexually assaulting trainees at Lackland Air Force Base, Texas. She noted that many of the instructors acknowledged sexual relationships with the trainees but argued at trial that the relationships were consensual and therefore not criminal. She stated that on the basis of this defense, many of the instructors were found not guilty of sexual offenses but guilty of lesser offenses that did not carry the collateral consequence of having to register as a sex offender. From these outcomes, she concluded that the UCMJ and Article 120 do not properly deal with military training environments, and she declared, "I believe there should be strict liability." She also told the JPP that current military regulations discourage victims from reporting sexual assaults resulting from abuse of authority, because they leave victims subject to possible UCMJ action for engaging in consensual relationships with instructors.[188]

In law, strict liability is liability that does not depend on intent to harm. Instead, it is based on the breach of an absolute duty to make something safe. In this context, strict liability would make the trainer who engages in a sexual act with a trainee guilty of a sexual assault owing solely to his or her position of trust and authority as it relates to the victimized subordinate. The assumption of this legal theory is that trainers of military personnel have an absolute duty to make safe every aspect of the training environment—from equipment integrity to command structure and interpersonal relationships. This point of view holds that any deviation from this standard would be an affront to the authority placed in those leaders and would cause trainees to distrust the immediate chain of command and military leadership as a whole.

The JPP heard from numerous witnesses who recommended against a strict liability or per se illegal standard that would remove any consideration of the trainer's intent or an alleged victim's consent. Witnesses contended that such a standard would be overbroad, criminalize truly consensual relationships, and result in unjust outcomes. Other witnesses reasoned that the UCMJ already criminalizes such conduct, that the current charging mechanisms appropriately cover abuses of power in training environments, and that an additional punitive provision is not necessary. Given these opposing views, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further evaluation.[189]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. A majority of presenters before the Subcommittee recommended against treating sexual relationships between training instructors and trainees as per se illegal or strict liability offenses under Article 120. The consistent theme sounded by those voicing this position was twofold: (1) the present methods for prosecuting these types of offenses under Article 92 are sufficient to hold military training instructors accountable, and (2) it would be unjust to make consensual sexual relationships between trainers and trainees a registrable sex offense, when no such registration results from similar consensual sexual relationships in the civilian community.

One senior Air Force prosecutor and appellate government counsel stated that she is opposed to making these offenses per se illegal or strict liability because (1) it is overly paternalistic to tell adults they can never consent to sex while simultaneously telling them they must act and be treated like adults in the military; (2) labeling someone a sex offender for having a consensual sexual relationship with an adult is unjust; (3) these relationships are already criminalized under Article 92, and that is an effective deterrent and method of prosecution; and (4) per se/strict liability for what are factually consensual relationships is an overcorrection in sexual assault policy.[190] All other senior prosecutors from the Marine Corps,[191] Army,[192] Navy,[193] and Coast Guard[194] who testified at the same Subcommittee meeting agreed with this assessment.

Similarly, the defense counsel who testified before the Subcommittee during its August meeting recommended against treating sexual relationships between training instructors and trainees as per se illegal or strict liability offenses under Article 120. One senior Army defense counsel who has previously served as a senior prosecutor testified that it would be a mistake to adopt a strict liability or per se illegal standard making any sexual relationship between instructors and trainees a violation of Article 120 when the facts reveal consensual conduct. He testified that there have been cases in which an investigation found consensual sexual conduct between a trainer and trainee who both intended to remain in a relationship after the trainee's graduation.[195] A senior Marine defense counsel who also served previously as a prosecutor echoed these sentiments and stated that Article 92 is sufficient to criminalize and hold accountable trainers who have consensual sexual relationships with recruits.[196] An Air Force appellate defense counsel who represented several Air Force military training instructors in cases arising from the Lackland sexual abuse from 2011 to 2013 stated that the current version of Article 120 is sufficient to address nonconsensual sexual assault or contact cases arising in the training environment, and she recommended against adopting a strict liability or per se illegal standard.[197] And a Navy defense counsel and former prosecutor testified that the current version of Article 120 is sufficient to prosecute nonconsensual sexual offenses in the training environment; adopting a strict liability or per se illegal standard is unnecessary and would be inappropriate because in his experience the majority of sexual misconduct committed by instructors is mutual, consensual conduct.[198]

Numerous staff judge advocate legal advisers to training commanding officers reiterated the comments of the prosecutors and defense counsel. A senior Air Force staff judge advocate stated that she did not believe the adoption of a strict liability or per se illegal standard under Article 120 would improve prosecutions under Article 120.[199] She viewed the present framework of using Article 92, Article 93, or the general article under Article 134 as sufficient to address trainer sexual misconduct that does not rise to the level of nonconsent.[200] A senior Army staff judge advocate legal adviser recommended against a strict liability or per se illegal standard under Article 120.[201] A Marine Corps staff judge advocate legal adviser to a training commanding officer stated that the typical method of prosecuting trainer sexual misconduct under Article 92 is sufficient to hold trainers accountable.[202] He therefore is not in favor of adopting any strict liability or per se illegal standard under Article 120.[203] And a Coast Guard staff judge advocate testified that the present practice of charging inappropriate sexual relationships between trainers and trainees under Article 92 is sufficient and there is no need to make such relationships a strict liability or per se illegal violation of Article 120.[204]

The legal advisers to the training commands also noted that recruits are given thorough training that even consensual relationships are inappropriate and illegal for both recruits and trainers and that recruits sign acknowledgment forms indicating their understanding of these regulations. They added that instructors already express fears in dealing with trainees and that continued over-criminalization would further erode the important mentoring relationship that must be created between instructors and recruits. [205]

At the July meeting, some former and current training commanders gave views differing from those of the prosecutors and legal advisers. One commanding general for an Army training command opined that making consensual sexual relationships per se illegal under Article 120 or a different article not currently used would provide commanders with an additional tool to deter this misconduct.[206] An Air Force general officer expressed views similar to those of the prosecutors and legal advisers. She was skeptical of making these offenses per se illegal under Article 120, but suggested modifying Article 120 so as to cover situations involving "constructive force" by instructors.[207] A Coast Guard flag officer commander testified that she supported "an expansion of Article 120 to be able to accommodate for this imbalance of power" between instructors and recruits.[208] And a Marine Corps commanding general stated that he is not opposed to strict liability in boot camp (entry-level training) alone, but in other contexts he believes that the present prosecution framework is sufficient.[209]

C. Conclusion: Consensual sexual relationships that occur between instructors and trainees in the environment of basic training should not be treated as either strict liability or per se illegal under Article 120. Service orders and regulations make these types of relationships per se illegal under Article 92, and they can be prosecuted with a maximum punishment of two years' confinement and a dishonorable discharge.

D. Recommendation: The Subcommittee does not recommend that consensual sexual relationships between basic training instructors and trainees be treated as either strict liability or illegal per se under Article 120.

17. As an alternative to further amending Article 120, should coercive sexual relationships currently charged under other articles of the UCMJ be added to DoD's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration?

A. JPP Rationale for Referring This Issue to the Subcommittee. In receiving testimony regarding the question of whether sexual relationships between basic training instructors and trainees should be treated as strict liability or per se illegal offenses under Article 120, presenters told the JPP that coercive sexual relationships charged under articles other than Article 120, such as Articles 92 and 93, do not result in an accused being registered as a sex offender after conviction. Accordingly, the JPP referred this issue to the Subcommittee for further analysis.[210]

B. Testimony and Information Received by the Subcommittee. None of the presenters before the Subcommittee recommended adding any offenses charged under articles other than Article 120 to DoD's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration.

C. Conclusion: The Subcommittee concluded that cases in which sexual relationships are charged and prosecuted under Articles 92 and/or 93 should not be added to the Department of Defense's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration. Before being reported as a sex offender, a military accused should be convicted of a qualifying sex offense involving lack of consent. Articles 92 and 93 do not involve sex crimes in which a sexual act or sexual contact has been committed without a victim's consent.

D. Recommendation: Sexual relationships currently charged under other articles of the UCMJ, including Articles 92 and 93, should not be added to DoD's list of offenses that trigger sex offender registration.

Subcommittee's Proposed Revisions to Article 120

45. Article 120—Rape and sexual assault generally

a. Text of statute.

(a) Rape. Any person subject to this chapter who commits a sexual act upon another person by—

(1) using unlawful force against that other person;
(2) using force causing or likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to any person;
(3) threatening or placing that other person in fear that any person will be subjected to death, grievous bodily harm, or kidnapping;
(4) first rendering that other person unconscious; or
(5) administering to that other person by force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or consent of that person, a drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance and thereby substantially impairing the ability of that other person to appraise or control conduct;

is guilty of rape and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(b) Sexual Assault. Any person subject to this chapter who—

(1) commits a sexual act upon another person ~~by~~

(A) by threatening or placing that other person in fear;
(B) without the consent of the other person;
~~causing bodily harm to that other person;~~
(C) by making a fraudulent representation that the sexual act serves a professional purpose; ~~or~~
(D) by inducing a belief by any artifice, pretense or concealment that the person is another person; or
(E) by using position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person;

(2) commits a sexual act upon another person when the person knows or reasonably should know that the other person is asleep, unconscious or otherwise unaware that the sexual act is occurring; or

(3) commits a sexual act upon another person when the other person is incapable of consenting to the sexual act due to—

(A) impairment by any drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance, and that condition is known or reasonably should be known by the person; or
(B) a mental disease or defect, or physical disability, and that condition is known or reasonably should be known by the person is guilty of sexual assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(c) Aggravated sexual contact.

Any person subject to this chapter who commits or causes sexual contact upon or by another person, if to do so would violate subsection (a) (rape) had the sexual contact been a sexual act, is guilty of aggravated sexual contact and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(d) Abusive sexual contact. Any person subject to this chapter who commits or causes sexual contact upon or by another person, if to do so would violate subsection (b) (sexual assault) had the sexual contact been a sexual act, is guilty of abusive sexual contact and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(e) Proof of Threat. In a prosecution under this section, in proving that a person made a threat, it need not be proven that the person actually intended to carry out the threat or had the ability to carry out the threat.

(f) Defenses. An accused may raise any applicable defenses available under this chapter or the Rules for Court-Martial. Marriage is not a defense for any conduct in issue in any prosecution under this section.

(g) Definitions. In this section:

(1) Sexual act. The term "sexual act" means—

(A) ~~contact between the~~ penetration however slight of the penis ~~and~~ into the vulva or anus or mouth, ~~and for purposes of this subparagraph, contact involving the penis occurs upon penetration, however slight; or~~

(B) contact between the mouth and the penis, vulva, or scrotum or anus; or

(~~B~~C) the penetration, however slight, of the vulva or penis or anus ~~or mouth~~ of another by any part of the body or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(2) Sexual contact. The term "sexual contact" means—

~~(A)~~ touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, the ~~genitalia~~ vulva, penis, scrotum, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person, with an intent to abuse, humiliate or degrade any person or

~~(B) any touching, or causing another to touch, either directly or through the clothing, any body part of any person, if done~~ with an intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

Touching may be accomplished by any part of the body or an object.

~~(3) Bodily harm. The term "bodily harm" means any offensive touching of another, however slight, including any nonconsensual sexual act or nonconsensutal sexual contact.~~

(3~~4~~) Grievous bodily harm. The term "grievous bodily harm" means serious bodily injury. It includes fractured or dislocated bones, deep cuts, torn members of the body, serious damage to internal organs, and other severe bodily injuries. It does not include minor injuries such as a black eye or a bloody nose.

(4~~5~~) Force. The term "force" means—

(A) the use of a weapon;

(B) the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or

(C) inflicting physical harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim.

(5~~6~~) Unlawful Force.—The term "unlawful force" means an act of force done without legal justification or excuse.

(6~~7~~) Threatening or placing that other person in fear. The term "threatening or placing that other person in fear" means a communication or action that is of sufficient consequence to cause a reasonable fear that non-compliance will result in the victim or another person being subjected to the wrongful action contemplated by the communication or action.

(7~~8~~) Consent.

(A) The term "consent" means a freely given agreement to the conduct at issue by a competent person. An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent. Lack of verbal or physical resistance ~~or submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear~~ does not constitute consent. Submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear also does not constitute consent. A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship by itself or the manner of dress of the person involved in the conduct at issue does ~~shall~~ not constitute consent.

(B) A sleeping, unconscious or incompetent person cannot consent. A person cannot consent to force causing or likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm or to being rendered unconscious. A person cannot consent while und er threat or in fear or under the circumstances described in subparagraph (C) or (D) of subsection (b)(1).

(C) ~~Lack of consent may be inferred based on the circumstances of the offense.~~ All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent, ~~or whether a person did not resist or ceased to resist only because of another person's actions.~~

(8) Incapable of consenting. A person is "incapable of consenting" if that person does not possess the mental ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct or does not possess the physical or mental ability to make or communicate a decision regarding such conduct.

Supplemental and Dissenting Commentary Concerning Subcommittee Recommendations, with Proposed New Article 120 Statute

by Laurie Rose Kepros

SUPPLEMENTAL AND DISSENTING COMMENTARY CONCERNING SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

by Laurie Rose Kepros

The JPP Subcommittee has reached consensus on several important improvements to Article 120 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM), and Military Judges' Benchbook (Benchbook) which are set forth in its report. I write separately to identify ongoing problems with Article 120 that remain either unaddressed or inadequately addressed by the Subcommittee's recommendations and to urge further modifications. My comments discuss the following issues:

INTRODUCTION

It is undisputed that the just resolution of sexual offense allegations is a matter of utmost importance to those accused, to victims, and to the friends and family who care for them, as well as to the broader military community and society. Perhaps more than ever before, conviction of a sex crime is a wholly life-altering event. A Service member convicted of an offense under Article 120 may face not only the end of his or her military career but also potential terms of imprisonment up to and including a life sentence. Even if he or she is allowed to return to life in a civilian community, a sex offense adjudication will still have lifelong effects. In addition to requirements to comply with varied and complex state sex offender registration laws (or face additional criminal prosecutions and punishments), sex offense convictions trigger an ever-expanding list of punitive consequences in the community that affect both the offender and his or her family (whether or not the restriction is relevant to the facts of the underlying offense). Currently these collateral sanctions include housing and residency restrictions (which even keep people out of homeless shelters); GPS monitoring; employment, educational, and professional licensing prohibitions; bans on access to religious institutions; parental rights consequences (and sometimes a ban from entering a child's school); restrictions on food stamp benefits; anti-loitering provisions to discourage offenders from certain locations; denial of housing and educational financial aid assistance; restrictions on library and computer/Internet usage (as well as on the use of private websites such as Facebook and dating websites such as Match.com); trick-or-treating prohibitions; special drivers' licenses and license plates; limitations on international travel; and even civil commitment.[1] With so much at stake, the military justice system must take great care to ensure that these internal and external consequences are not arbitrarily or unfairly imposed and that when Service members are accused of such offenses, they are afforded the full array of constitutional protections that they have spent their military careers defending.

A. REMAINING CONFUSION IN ARTICLE 120

At its June 25, 2015, meeting, the Subcommittee commenced a debate that was central to its overall deliberative process. At that time, the positions of the Subcommittee members as to whether to recommend statutory changes to Article 120, and whether to limit any recommendations to the seventeen issues identified by the JPP, ran the gamut. Some members invoked the position of witnesses who voiced objections to further amendments, noting that Article 120 had been revised three times already in recent years history and that the result has sometimes been complex prosecutions under multiple versions of the statute. Often, these witnesses advocated instead for changes in the Benchbook or MCM rather than Article 120, or suggested that if any statutory changes were absolutely necessary, they be as narrow as possible. For example, Subcommittee member Brigadier General James Schwenk stated: "I'll be the no-change person, and put the burden on everybody who believes change . . . needs to be made in the near-term to justify what's broken—if it ain't broke, don't fix it."[2] At the other end of the spectrum, I supported a rewrite of the statute. Yet General Schwenk also acknowledged: "I did hear there is a lot of confusion. I did hear that it would be a lot better if things were clarified."[3] As General Schwenk noted, the need for clarity arose repeatedly during testimony before the Subcommittee, with almost all witnesses ultimately recommending at least some minor change and with some witnesses urging larger-scale revisions.[4]

Notably, among the witnesses open to a broader reorganization of the statute was Major Aimee Bateman, an associate professor of criminal law at the Army's Judge Advocate General's (JAG) School.[5] Major Bateman estimated that in the past three years, she has taught a block of instruction on Article 120 about 50 times to almost 3,000 students, including reservists and those receiving her training through recorded classes.[6] Her trainees at the Army's JAG School include "brand-new newly commissioned, minted judge advocates," and her course is "one of the very first classes of instruction they get. They have been in the Army for about six weeks. They have been judge advocates for about six weeks."[7] She also trains judicial candidates from across all the Services, as well as

[1] Notably, empirical research into many of policies has shown they do nothing to reduce sexual recidivism. In the case of the sex offender registry, some studies have even demonstrated that it increases sexual recidivism by socially isolating individuals and thus stripping away some of the most robust factors shown to protect against sexual re-offense. See, e.g., J. > a lot of judge advocates who are not in any way, shape, or form going to practice . . . criminal law . . . but they are staff judge advocates, they are leaders, they are managers, and teaching them and familiarizing them with the law, so that they can answer those questions [for] our very junior, inexperienced judge advocates. . . . I'll teach a lieutenant—again, they have been in the Army six weeks. I give them their hour of block instruction on Article 120. They go out to Fort Bragg, Fort Drum . . . and now they are the subject matter expert on Article 120 for anybody who crosses their path out in the field, which is a little . . . scary.[8]

According to Major Bateman, about half of the lawyers she teaches "are in very early stages of their [legal] career[s]" and, at the time of their introduction to Article 120, lack other professional experience navigating complex statutory schemes.[9]

Major Bateman provided numerous examples of sources of confusion to practitioners concerning Article 120. Hopefully, some of these concerns would be mitigated by adoption of the Subcommittee's recommendations. Yet she also pointed to structural problems in Article 120. For instance, she described difficulties that have arisen in understanding the role of consent in Article 120. Even judicial candidates have found the law to be unclear with respect to whether to instruct on consent-related defenses: "[I]f we are having trouble explaining this to 50 very smart prescreened—we want these people to sit on the bench and be trial judges and appellate judges, and they are having trouble kind of conceptualizing and capturing this and feel[ing] comfortable."[10]

It is unnecessary to wade deeply into Article 120 to find other examples, unaddressed by the Subcommittee's recommendations, of how unhelpful this statute can be in describing the parameters of criminal sexual behavior. Among them is the first offense described in Article 120(a)(1): "Any person subject to this chapter who commits a sexual act upon another person by using unlawful force against that other person is guilty of rape and shall be punished as court-martial may direct." "Unlawful force" is further defined in Article 120(g)(6) as "an act of force done without legal justification or excuse." Moreover, "Force" is specified as "(A) the use of a weapon; (B) the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or (C) inflicting physical harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim."

In light of these definitions, how is the reader to assess when or whether in the course of a sexual act an act of force may be done with legal justification? What is a legal justification or excuse for force in this context? What if the "force" is incidental to the "sexual act" itself? Is consent a legal justification for a forceful sexual act? If so, does it negate the element of "unlawful force" or is it an affirmative defense? In either event, what if there was consent to the sexual act but not the forceful act? Has the crime of rape been committed? It is unsurprising that experienced lawyers like the judicial candidates in Major Bateman's class struggled with these types of questions.

Helpfully, with respect to JPP issue 2, the Subcommittee has recommended that the MCM be amended to clarify the availability of the defenses of "consent" and "mistake of fact as to consent" for offenses under Article 120. Hence, it is reasonable to ask whether adoption of this Subcommittee recommendation alone would be sufficient to fix the problem identified in Major Bateman's testimony—that her class of judicial candidates was confused about the availability of consent defenses. In fact, for that group of jurists or other military lawyers, an amendment to the MCM is a tangible improvement and will clarify the availability of those defenses. For non-attorney readers of Article 120, however, this clarification may remain invisible.

In contrast, in its recommendation concerning JPP issue 5, the Subcommittee wisely has rewritten the statutory language concerning the counterintuitive term of art "bodily harm" (which, as defined, requires no physical injury to the body). In pertinent part, the Subcommittee's recommendation on JPP issue 5 eliminates the term "bodily harm" and instead describes a new offense that is significantly more understandable on its face. The new Article 120(b)(1)(B) would read as follows:

> (b) Sexual assault. Any person subject to this chapter who—
> (1) commits a sexual act upon another person
> (B) without the consent of the other person;
> is guilty of sexual assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.[11]

The Subcommittee's JPP issue 5 proposal, therefore, makes it clear to any reader that it is criminal to commit a sexual act upon another person without the consent of that person. The reader need not engage in a searching review of the MCM, Benchbook, or case law to have a basic understanding of the statutory language and what it forbids.

Fair notice is among the constitutional protections to be guaranteed in all criminal prosecutions. It must be clear what conduct is prohibited, and the forbidden behavior must be described with sufficient clarity that its alleged violation cannot be capriciously enforced. Due process requires that criminal statutes be defined "in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement."[12] This "more important aspect of vagueness doctrine" requires that the statute "'establish minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement'" rather than "'a standardless sweep [that] allows policemen, prosecutors, and juries to pursue their personal predilections.'"[13] Therefore, every effort should be made to make all of the sexual crimes described in Article 120 as clear and comprehensible as possible—and not just to lawyers, judges, or court-martial panel members but to everyone subject to prosecution under the UCMJ.

1. THE ARTICLE 120 AUDIENCE

Major Bateman's testimony revealed how, ultimately, all Service members look to Article 120 for guidance on how to appropriately conform behavior to the UCMJ. Major Bateman explained how her charge in teaching Article 120 reaches far beyond training lawyers to apply the statute to cases they are litigating. Rather, she must > try to equip [her students] with kind of a baseline understanding of the law, so that they may be able to practice in a courtroom properly, but also be conversant on the law, because this isn't just talked about within our judge advocate community. As we all know, this is the topic of the day in command huddles . . . at the Chief of Staff of > the Army level, and all the way down, preventing sexual assault is the number one priority of the Army. So . . . it is talked about in all sorts of contexts and all sorts of forums outside the courtroom.[14]

Consequently, although the Subcommittee heard testimony from numerous military practitioners with prosecutorial, defense, and judicial experience, these lawyers are not the only Service members who are expected to take direction from Article 120. As noted by the Subcommittee, "because sexual assault prevention training for all Service members uses language from Article 120, vague terms may leave them confused about standards of behavior and expectations, raising an important policy interest."[15] Furthermore, it is unfair to expect Service members to suss out on their own counterintuitive interpretations of terminology that may lurk in the case law, Benchbook, MCM, or other legal references. Troublingly, Major Bateman was one of many military witnesses[16] who described a serious problem with how Article 120, unclear on its face, is being taught to Service members in the course of sexual assault prevention trainings:

> [T]he priority for the Chief of Staff of the Army and the Secretary of the Army is [to] prevent sexual assault, not [just to] prosecute it properly. Right? I mean, we want to prevent it on the front end. So the conversations are toward that end of this. So when can I have sex with someone then, or when can I approach somebody else to have sex and not be charged with a crime for it? So how do we explain that? And this is where I have heard people say everything from, well, you know, could you buy a car, or were you with [it] enough to get a tattoo, or, you know, even to the extent of the way they like to teach it in the field, the way commanders like to teach it, if you have one drink, you can't do anything, don't touch anybody. Right? That's clearly not a legal definition in any sense. Even lawyers, though, I have heard teach this as if you're too drunk to drive, you are too drunk to consent. [But] . . . we are not [in Article 120] imparting any sort of definitions from [DUI law].[17]
> The problem is when the law is articulated incorrectly in the prevention training, . . . we run into the problem of degrading the legitimacy of the law.[18]

2. ADDITIONAL CHANGES TO ARTICLE 120 REQUIRED DESPITE RECENT AMENDMENTS TO THE STATUTE

Major Bateman explained that currently three versions of Article 120 "are still in some respects active and still on the books . . . in that there is an unlimited statute of limitations."[19] Nevertheless, when questioned by JPP Chair and Subcommittee member Elizabeth Holtzman about whether the numerous recent statutory changes meant further substantial change should be avoided, Major Bateman shared her insights into why this was not a reason to avoid more statutory changes at this time:

> [A]n evolution of my perspective . . . is from what I have seen—whether it's formally changed by Congress or not—it is still changing and evolving. So we can't avoid the fact that—the way the instructions are changing. . . . [W]hen facts applie[d] to law make it into a courtroom, it is changing. So …I think appropriate measured changes would be good at this point because it is already—there is a level of confusion. There is a level of inconsistency potentially because of the way that people have adjusted to their understanding of the law through . . . pleading decisions and evidentiary instructions. In that regard, I don't think we should be scared of changing it because it is going to cause all sorts of . . . unrest in the force. It is already unrestful. So I think changes are okay and not to be strictly avoided at this point.[20]

Hence, in Major Bateman's view, because the decisions of appellate courts in actual cases will continue to interpret and reinterpret the statutory language, fear of change should not be a reason to refrain from making intentional clarifications to the law.

Similarly, the Subcommittee heard testimony from Colonel Terri Zimmermann on behalf of the Marine Corps Defense Services Organization.[21] Colonel Zimmermann is the reserve counterpart to the active duty Chief Defense Counsel in the Marine Corps and has been a Marine Corps judge advocate since 1993, litigating sexual assault cases as a prosecutor, an appellate military judge, and a defense counsel.[22] She also has a civilian criminal defense practice that is about 75% military, and she does both trial and appellate work.[23] In light of her experience with all versions of Article 120 as well as with civilian criminal statutes, Colonel Zimmermann urged the Subcommittee to consider the following in its deliberations:

> What is the purpose of the military justice system? . . . [O]ne of those purposes is to achieve justice. . . . It's to punish people who intentionally or with some culpable mental state take an action that we, as a society, deem as inappropriate and unlawful. It's not to punish people who do things, for the most part, by accident or mistake. . . . [O]ur criminal justice system is intended to identify people who break the law, punish them and deter other people from committing the same type of conduct. And so, I think it's really important to keep that in mind when we're talking about whether we tweak a statute, whether we rewrite a statute, what is the purpose of the statute? What kind of due process concerns do we have? What kind of notice concerns do we have? All of those factors, in my opinion, militate towards completely rewriting [Article 120].[24]

Colonel Zimmermann further explained, consistent with Major Bateman's testimony, that changes to Article 120 are inevitable and thus should take the form of a complete statutory rewrite and not just "tweaks":

> This statute is a mess. It is just unworkable. It's too complicated. It's unwieldy and it's not fair. So, there is going to be some change. . . . And . . . people in the field are going to have to adjust. . . . In my view, it's appropriate for us to rewrite [Article 120] and get it correct, as correct as we can get it. Nothing's ever going to be perfect, I know that. But I think we ought to start from scratch and get it right and then people can adjust to that. I'm not too concerned about people saying, well, there are going to be four statutes in effect. Well, there's going to be four statutes in effect no matter what change is enacted. So, as opposed to tweaking, my recommendation is that we start from scratch.[25]

3. THE KEPROS PROPOSAL IN ATTACHMENT A

In the context of this confusion and need for clarification, I advocate for broader changes to Article 120 than the Subcommittee has endorsed, including a wholesale reorganization of the statute. To that end, in anticipation of the June 25, 2015, Subcommittee meeting, I drafted a new proposed Article 120 statute. My proposal is attached as Attachment A. The Subcommittee, persuaded by the concerns about more dramatic changes to Article 120, elected to approach any revisions more conservatively and not to undertake work on my proposal in its deliberative process. Consequently, Attachment A does not reflect the work of the Subcommittee in its June 25, 2015, or subsequent meetings and remains only a rough draft. I have nonetheless included it because it illustrates some of the current shortcomings within Article 120 that remain unaddressed and provides one suggestion as to how Article 120 may be made more coherent.

Although my proposal recommends numerous modifications to Article 120, the biggest change is conceptual. Notions of "consent" and "force" in Article 120 have become complicated through both military jurisprudence and statutory changes. As Ms. Holtzman commented during the Subcommittee's May 7, 2015, meeting,

> This is one of the worst statutes I have read in terms of drafting. . . . And so we have complicated issues. . . . [T]he fact that this statute tried to take consent out of the picture, and now consent has come back in, has created a kind of a pretzel approach. Everybody is twisting things around to kind of figure out how to get the language of the statute and the concept of consent in and how we do that.[26]

Ms. Holtzman further suggested to Major Bateman that for "some of the bigger issues, like dealing with consent, you can't just make an itty-bitty statutory change," and Major Bateman agreed.[27]

Hence, my proposal seeks to realign the terms "consent" and "force" with their commonly understood meanings; and rather than trying to pretend that consent is not relevant, I aim instead to create a statute in which, as many laypeople would intuitively assume, the baseline criminal behavior is a nonconsensual sexual touching. Then, that notion of "nonconsent" can also encompass a person

[25] Id. at 222.

who is incapable of consenting for various reasons. Further, and consistent with most American criminal statutory schemes, this type of organization would permit the level of offense and potential penalties to increase to account for more aggravated conduct, such as the use of extreme violence or the deliberate introduction of intoxicants.

During her testimony, I asked Major Bateman if reorganizing Article 120 to make nonconsensual sexual touching the baseline crime would make sense. She confirmed that notwithstanding the 2007 and 2012 changes to Article 120,

> [W]hat we have ended up discovering over the last three years is consent is always relevant, it's always instructed on, and it always comes up. [N]ow that we have actually seen it play out, . . . I think it would make it cleaner to just affirmatively bring it back in the law explicitly. So I think that is, fundamentally, why I do agree with your proposal.[28]

Colonel Zimmermann concurred, noting that "the issue of consent is really the pivotal issue"[29] and expressing her agreement with the notion of creating a scheme in which a nonconsensual sexual touching was the baseline offense with "aggravating circumstances that can be added onto that" with "a graduated series of penalties for the conduct."[30]

Finally, reorganizing Article 120 so that principles of "consent" are central to criminality could eliminate the need for the continual creation of additional new subsections in the statute to try to describe every conceivable type of coercion, such as the Subcommittee's recommendation in response to JPP issue 15 to create a new Article 120(b)(1)(E) that would read as follows:

> (b) Sexual assault. Any person subject to this chapter who—
> (1) commits a sexual act upon another person
> (E) by using position, rank, or authority to secure compliance by the other person
> is guilty of sexual assault and shall be punished as a court-martial shall direct.[31]

If consent is defined so that it is valid only where it is "freely given" (as in the current definition) or "voluntary" (as suggested in Attachment A, following the recommendation of a witness[32]), consent cannot exist when rank or other authority is deployed to compel the other person into sexual activity. Consequently, such sexual abuse would be prosecutable as a nonconsensual act.

[32] Transcript of JPP Subcommittee Meeting 418 (May 7, 2015) (testimony of Mr. John Wilkinson, Æquitas—The Prosecutors' Resource on Violence Against Women).

B. JPP ISSUE 1: IS THE CURRENT DEFINITION OF "CONSENT" UNCLEAR OR AMBIGUOUS?

In responding to its mandate to consider this issue, the Subcommittee, in pertinent part, urges that the following language be used within the definition of "consent": "(A) . . . Lack of verbal or physical resistance does not constitute consent."[33] Simultaneously, the Subcommittee endorses retaining the following language from subsection (C) of the definition of "consent": "All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent."[34]

Moreover, in its summary recommendation concerning issue 1, the Subcommittee states, "A lack of resistance would still be relevant for the fact-finder to consider along with all the surrounding circumstances, but the proposed change clarifies that a lack of resistance alone does not constitute consent."[35] In its complete recommendation, the Subcommittee further explains that "Although the Subcommittee believes evidence of resistance or the lack thereof to be relevant and admissible evidence for a fact-finder to consider, it is just one of the circumstances surrounding the offense and should be given no greater or lesser emphasis than any other circumstance in the text of the statute or elsewhere."[36]

Cooperative and voluntary sexual activity usually will involve a lack of resistance by the participating parties. Therefore, these sentences from the Subcommittee's Report accurately convey the intentions of the Subcommittee that court-martial panel members incorporate considerations of a "lack of resistance" in their overall consideration of "[a]ll the surrounding circumstances." Problematically, the recommended statutory change itself does not adequately communicate the Subcommittee's intentions and may result in misadvice by courts and misinterpretation by fact-finders. For example, the Subcommittee declined to recommend that the statute read "Lack of verbal or physical resistance alone does not constitute consent but shall be considered among the surrounding circumstances" (emphasis added).[37]

Imagine a scenario in which a couple is in a long-term relationship and engages in routine patterns of sexual behavior. The partners generally experience cooperation with each other upon initiating the sexual activity and are alerted that one person is not consenting to the sexual behavior only if that person objects or otherwise indicates a disinclination to engage in some or all sexual activity at that time. Within "all the surrounding circumstances" of this relationship, the habits and expectations of the partners certainly inform their beliefs about whether there is consent to sexual activity, including whether one of the parties is objecting or otherwise resisting. Although, as the Subcommittee notes, a lack of resistance alone would not constitute consent in this situation, it would certainly be relevant to a fact-finder assessing whether an accused reasonably believed an alleged victim had consented to sexual activity.

Similarly, the Subcommittee recommends that the definition of "consent" retain the current language that "(A) . . . An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent."

[33] JPP SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT at 9-10.

[34] Id.

[37] An alternate clarification of the Subcommittee's recommendation for the definition of "consent" could state at subsection (A): "Lack of verbal or physical resistance alone does not constitute consent" and at subsection (C): "All the surrounding circumstances including lack of resistance (if applicable) are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent."

Yet a fact-finder attempting to apply the definition's mandate that this "means there is no consent" may be confused in a situation in which there is credible evidence of an alleged victim initially and clearly verbally declining to engage in sexual activity but then later cooperating in, and possibly even initiating, sexual acts. In her testimony, Major Bateman described such a scenario presented to her JAG students:

> [T]he day before [sexual activity occurred,] the accused approached me and said, "Would you like to have sex with me?" I said, "No, I hate you. I will never have sex with you." Is that even relevant? . . . [T]hat caused . . . the most recent time teaching this to a senior audience [of judicial candidates], a huge problem. Of course it's relevant. [Yet they said:] Well, show me to what . . . element of the crime that is relevant to.[38]

Concerningly, this debate ensued among judicial candidates despite the fact that the "all the surrounding circumstances" language is already present in the definition. So, once again, this aspect of the statutory definition of "consent" in subsection (A) suggests inflexibility and potential confusion in how evidence is to be evaluated by the fact-finder. Even as amended, the definition leaves it unclear that "[a]n expression of lack of consent through words or conduct" is also among the evidence that is to be evaluated in light of "[a]ll the surrounding circumstances."

Finally, the Subcommittee's recommendation largely retains the following language from current subsection (A): "A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship by itself or the manner of dress of the person involved in the conduct at issue shall not constitute consent," except that the Subcommittee has recommended substituting the word "does" in place of "shall." While the language concerning dating / social / sexual relationships is appropriately contextualized by the phrase "by itself," the statute does not reflect the same nuance concerning "manner of dress." Of course, it is again true that "manner of dress" by itself does not constitute consent but it certainly would be relevant to an assessment of "[a]ll the surrounding circumstances." It is easy to imagine a scenario in the context of an ongoing relationship, for example, in which dress is a mechanism used to convey to one's partner an interest in and desire to participate in sexual activity. And, yet again, the definition fails to make it explicit that evidence concerning dress comes within "[a]ll the surrounding circumstances."[39]

An alternate definition of "consent" is set forth in Attachment A's draft iteration of Article 120(g)(6). Among other things, the Attachment A proposal avoids the problem described above with respect to "manner of dress" evidence by simply reordering the sentence to read: "A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship or the manner of dress of the person involved in the conduct at issue by themselves shall not constitute consent."[40] The Attachment A[41] definition therefore avoids the confusion present in both the current statute and the Subcommittee's recommendation.

[38] Transcript of JPP Subcommittee Meeting 39 (May 7, 2015).

[39] Building on the alternate proposal set forth in n.27, subsection (C) could be more explicit in including the scenarios which are defined in subsection (A) as "nonconsensual," e.g., "All the surrounding circumstances, including (if applicable) manner of dress, and any expressions of lack of consent or lack of resistance, are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent."

[40] Attachment A at Article 120(g)(6)(D)(emphasis added).

[41] Unlike the current statute, the framework of the Attachment A proposal organizes the Article 120 crimes of rape, sexual assault, aggravated sexual contact, and abusive sexual contact around the principle that these crimes have at their core a victim who does not or cannot given consent to sexual activity. Consequently, the Attachment A definition of "consent" addresses a

C. MENS REA ISSUES

Several of the issues referred to the Subcommittee by the JPP involved the role of mens rea in Article 120. Despite their severe consequences, Article 120 does not articulate specific intent requirements for the crimes it describes. In fact, in some contexts, Article 120 creates criminal liability not only for an actor who commits the actus reus with actual knowledge of the relevant circumstances but also for an actor who, under a mere negligence standard, "reasonably should know" of such a circumstance.

Interestingly, the topic of mens rea has received renewed attention in multiple national forums during the Subcommittee's work on these issues. On November 16, 2015, bipartisan leadership from the House Judiciary Committee and House Crime Subcommittee introduced legislation titled the "Criminal Code Improvement Act of 2015"[42] to address the erosion in the mens rea requirement in federal criminal law. On November 18, 2015, the legislation passed out of the House Judiciary Committee by a unanimous voice vote. That same day, a group of senators introduced even stronger legislation called the "Mens Rea Reform Act of 2015,"[43] aimed at ensuring that only those who are truly culpable of criminal conduct committed with criminal intent are ensnared by federal criminal laws. Sponsored by Senators Orrin Hatch, Ted Cruz, Mike Lee, Rand Paul, and David Perdue, the mens rea reform would generally establish a default criminal intent requirement that the government prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant acted "willfully, with respect to any element for which the text of the covered offense does not specify a state of mind."

Earlier in 2015, the United States Supreme Court decided a case in which it considered the sufficiency of a merely negligent mens rea, similar to the "should have known" language recurring throughout Article 120. In Elonis v. United States,[44] the Supreme Court considered the federal law making "it a crime to transmit in interstate commerce 'any communication containing any threat . . . to injure the person of another.'" In Mr. Elonis's case the jury was instructed that to render a verdict of "guilty," they must find that Mr. Elonis communicated what a reasonable person would regard as a threat but not that Mr. Elonis himself be aware of the threatening nature of the communication.[45] In finding these instructions insufficient to sustain Mr. Elonis's conviction, the Supreme Court reviewed the important role of mens rea in defining criminal conduct and provided several examples of cases in which convictions were vacated as a consequence of inadequate proof of a culpable mental state:

> "[W]rongdoing must be conscious to be criminal." Id., at 252, 72 S.Ct. 240. As Justice Jackson explained, this principle is "as universal and persistent in mature systems of law as belief in freedom of the human will and a consequent ability and duty of the normal individual to choose between good and evil." Id., at 250, 72 S.Ct. 240. The "central thought" is that a defendant must be "blameworthy in mind" before he can be found guilty, a concept courts have expressed over time through various terms such as mens rea, scienter, malice aforethought, guilty knowledge, and the like. Id., at 252, 72 S.Ct. 240; 1 W. LaFave, Substantive Criminal Law § 5.1, pp. 332–333 (2d ed. 2003). . . .

> Morissette, for example, involved an individual who had taken spent shell casings from a Government bombing range, believing them to have been abandoned. During his trial for "knowingly convert[ing]" property of the United States, the judge instructed the jury that the only question was whether the defendant had knowingly taken the property without authorization. 342 U.S., at 248–249, 72 S.Ct. 240. This Court reversed the defendant's conviction, ruling that he had to know not only that he was taking the casings, but also that someone else still had property rights in them. He could not be found liable "if he truly believed [the casings] to be abandoned." Id., at 271, 72 S.Ct. 240; see id., at 276, 72 S.Ct. 240.

> By the same token, in Liparota v. United States, we considered a statute making it a crime to knowingly possess or use food stamps in an unauthorized manner. 471 U.S. 419, 420, 105 S.Ct. 2084, 85 L.Ed.2d 434 (1985). The Government's argument, similar to its position in this case, was that a defendant's conviction could be upheld if he knowingly possessed or used the food stamps, and in fact his possession or use was unauthorized. Id., at 423, 105 S.Ct. 2084. But this Court rejected that interpretation of the statute, because it would have criminalized "a broad range of apparently innocent conduct" and swept in individuals who had no knowledge of the facts that made their conduct blameworthy. Id., at 426, 105 S.Ct. 2084. . . . [2010] . . .

> To take another example, in Posters 'N' Things, Ltd. v. United States, this Court interpreted a federal statute prohibiting the sale of drug paraphernalia. 511 U.S. 513, 114 S.Ct. 1747, 128 L.Ed.2d 539 (1994). Whether the items in question qualified as drug paraphernalia was an objective question that did not depend on the defendant's state of mind. Id., at 517–522, 114 S.Ct. 1747. But, we held, an individual could not be convicted of selling such paraphernalia unless he "knew that the items at issue [were] likely to be used with illegal drugs." Id., at 524, 114 S.Ct. 1747. Such a showing was necessary to establish the defendant's culpable state of mind.
> And again, in X–Citement Video, we considered a statute criminalizing the distribution of visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct. 513 U.S., at 68, 115 S.Ct. 464. We rejected a reading of the statute which would have required only that a defendant knowingly send the prohibited materials, regardless of whether he knew the age of the performers. Id., at 68–69, 115 S.Ct. 464. We held instead that a defendant must also know that those depicted were minors, because that was "the crucial element separating legal innocence from wrongful conduct." Id., at 73, 115 S.Ct. 464. . . . [46]

In light of these trends, and for the sake of fundamental fairness, the mens rea issues referred by the JPP should be resolved with recommendations that ensure a sufficient mental culpability element separating "legal innocence from wrongful conduct." Beyond the issues referred by the JPP, and as illustrated in Attachment A, Article 120 should require that an accused act with actual knowledge and not attach the serious criminal liability that flows from a sexual offense conviction to merely negligent conduct.

1. JPP ISSUE 4: IS THE DEFINITION CONCERNING THE ACCUSED'S "ADMINISTRATION OF A DRUG OR INTOXICANT" OVERBROAD?

In its recommendation concerning Issue 4, the Subcommittee concludes that "the definition concerning the accused's 'administration of a drug or intoxicant' under Article 120(a)(5) is not overbroad. The Subcommittee therefore recommends no changes on this issue."[47] Article 120(a)(5) states that

> Any person subject to this chapter who commits a sexual act upon another person by administering to that other person by force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or consent of that person, a drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance and thereby substantially impairing the ability of that other person to appraise or control conduct is guilty of rape and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

As suggested by a retired Army military judge, the definition should be amended by adding a requirement that the administration of a drug or intoxicant be done for the purpose of impairing the victim's capacity to express a lack of consent to the sexual act.[48] In the Subcommittee's deliberations, a fair argument was made that the word "by" in the statute means that it already requires such intent, since the use of the drug or intoxicant is to be the mechanism for effectuating the rape. But if that is the intent of the statute, there is no harm in making this specific intent requirement more explicit.

Hypothetically, a person may spike the punch or serve marijuana-laced brownies for the purpose of surreptitiously introducing alcohol or drugs into a social setting with no preexisting plan to create a sexual offense victim. The person may even administer such intoxicants because of socially informed expectations that other guests already voluntarily ingest such substances and would not object to them. If that individual commits a sexual offense after later discovering that someone has become substantially impaired as a result of the intoxicants, reasonable distinctions can and should be drawn concerning his or her level of culpability compared to that of a person whose prior intent was to use the substances as a vehicle for sexual offending.

A different subsection, Article 120(b)(1)(3)(A) defines as guilty of sexual assault

> Any person subject to this chapter who commits a sexual act upon another person when the other person is incapable of consenting to the sexual act due to impairment by any drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance, and that condition is known or reasonably should be known by the person.

Hence, the opportunist who sexually abuses an impaired victim (regardless of how that victim became intoxicated) is guilty of Article 120(b)(1)(3)(A) and already faces up to thirty years' imprisonment. The sanction of a potential sentence of life imprisonment as provided for in Article 120(a)(5), however, should be reserved for a premeditated actor who administered intoxicants as the means to facilitate sexual abuse. Such distinctions (and sanctions) based on specific intent are routinely and appropriately drawn in law. For example, a homicide committed with premeditation or after deliberation is routinely punished much more severely than a murder committed in the "heat of passion." In addition, requiring a specific intent in Article 120(a)(5) would better distinguish it from cases more appropriately prosecuted under Article 120(b)(3)(A) and reduce the risk of arbitrariness or otherwise inadequately constrained prosecutorial discretion.

Further, this issue should be considered with reference to Rule for Courts-Martial 916(l)(2) concerning the relevance of voluntary intoxication evidence. Witnesses testified to the frequent scenario in military sexual assault prosecutions of undisputed evidence being present that both the alleged victim and the accused were intoxicated. The rule states:

> Voluntary intoxication, whether caused by alcohol or drugs, is not a defense. However, evidence of any degree of voluntary intoxication may be introduced for the purpose of raising a reasonable doubt as to the existence of actual knowledge, specific intent, willfulness, or a premeditated design to kill, if actual knowledge, specific intent, willfulness, or premeditated design to kill is an element of the offense.

Thus, although the rule makes it clear that voluntary intoxication never provides a defense to criminal behavior, it may be considered in evidence whenever "actual knowledge" or "specific intent" are elements. Given the vague drafting of Article 120(a)(5), it is unclear on its face whether it contains a mens rea sufficient to make evidence of the accused's perhaps extreme voluntary intoxication relevant even in a case in which he or she is facing the possibility of lifetime imprisonment. In assessing culpability, the fact-finder should consider the voluntary intoxication of a drunken and unplanned effort to subject another to intoxicants in order to effect the person's submission to sexual activity. Clarifying the mens rea in Article 120(a)(5) would therefore assist in delineating the relevance of such evidence. In addition, as further discussed below, in light of the Supreme Court's antipathy in Elonis toward the use of a negligence standard in a criminal statute, the "reasonably should be known" language in Article 120(b)(3)(A) should be removed. Removing the "reasonably should be known" provision would also serve the purpose of clarifying in Article 120(b)(3)(A) that the accused's voluntary intoxication is relevant as well to his or her assessment of the level of impairment in his or her sexual partner.

2. JPP ISSUE 3: SHOULD THE STATUTE DEFINE "INCAPABLE OF CONSENTING"?

In crafting a proposed definition of "incapable of consenting," the Subcommittee initially looked to 18 U.S.C. § 2242 (Sexual abuse). Section 2242 criminalizes knowingly engaging in a sexual act with another person if that other person is—

> (A) incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct; or
> (B) physically incapable of declining participation in, or communicating unwillingness to engage in, that sexual act.

Its final proposal differs from the federal statute, however, as the Subcommittee recommends that the following definition be part of its redraft of Article 120(g)(8): "A person is 'incapable of consenting' if that person does not possess the mental ability to appreciate the nature of the conduct or does not possess the physical or mental ability to make or communicate a decision regarding such conduct."[49]

[49] JPP SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT at 16.

Notably, § 2242 requires a defendant to have actual knowledge[50] of the alleged victim's incapability before suffering criminal liability. Article 120(b)(3), however, also criminalizes the sexual behavior if an accused only "reasonably should have known" that the other person was incapable of consenting.

The lack of criminal culpability for an actor in the federal criminal justice system who merely "reasonably should have known," unlike the liability flowing under the UCMJ, becomes particularly important in the context of the Subcommittee's proposal. The Subcommittee has done its best to draft a new definition of "incapable of consenting." But its proposed definition—unlike the federal definition—is completely new, novel, and untested by practice or application. Hence, a wiser course would be to adopt the rule that limits criminal culpability to an actor with actual knowledge, since doing so would protect both the unjustly accused and the constitutionality of the statutory language from any areas of inadvertently overbroad application in the untested proposed definition of "incapable of consenting."

Severe prison sentencing and other punishing lifetime consequences flow from a conviction under Article 120(b)(3). Yet the Subcommittee heard testimony that these cases frequently involve situations in which both parties are intoxicated.[51] This "reasonably should have known" standard of mere negligence is inadequate to fairly assess and assign culpability under such circumstances. If both parties were so intoxicated as to be "incapable of consenting," how could identical behavior render one party criminally culpable and the other a "victim"? Or is charging to be impermissibly driven by arbitrariness, sexism,[52] or the vagaries of the reporting process?

And, once again, with an intoxicated accused, the relevance of voluntary intoxication evidence under Rule for Courts-Martial 916(l)(2) becomes important. For example, what if two intoxicated people commenced voluntary acts of sexual intimacy but, in the course of that activity, one of them fell asleep or passed while the other continued to engage in the sexual contact with the unconscious party? If these sexual acts were complained of later, fairness would dictate consideration of the actor's level of intoxication in assessing whether he or she had recognized that the situation had changed before continuing with the sexual acts and, thus, whether he or she had the necessary culpable mental state. Removing the "reasonably should be known" provision would clarify that, for purposes of Article 120(b)(3)(A), the accused's voluntary intoxication is also relevant to his or her assessment of the level of impairment in his or her sexual partner.

Moreover, the Elonis decision seriously calls into question the continued viability of a criminal statute that attaches culpability based on proof of mere negligence alone:

> Elonis's conviction . . . was premised solely on how his posts would be understood by a reasonable person. Such a "reasonable person" standard is a familiar feature of civil liability in tort law, but is inconsistent with "the conventional requirement for criminal conduct—awareness of some wrongdoing." Staples, 511 U.S., at 606–607, 114 S.Ct. 1793 (quoting United States v. Dotterweich, 320 U.S. 277, 281, 64 S.Ct.

[50] Like the federal government, numerous states (e.g., Colorado, Texas) limit liability for sexual assault crimes to cases in which the government has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused had actual knowledge of the circumstances giving rise to the sexual contact.

[52] See generally id. at 271–72 (observing that under such circumstances it is usually a male who is prosecuted).

> 134, 88 L.Ed. 48 (1943); emphasis added). Having liability turn on whether a "reasonable person" regards the communication as a threat—regardless of what the defendant thinks—"reduces culpability on the all-important element of the crime to negligence," Jeffries, 692 F.3d, at 484 (Sutton, J., dubitante), and we "have long been reluctant to infer that a negligence standard was intended in criminal statutes," Rogers v. United States, 422 U.S. 35, 47, 95 S.Ct. 2091, 45 L.Ed.2d 1 (1975) (Marshall, J., concurring) (citing Morissette, 342 U.S. 246, 72 S.Ct. 240, 96 L.Ed. 288). See 1 C. Torcia, Wharton's Criminal Law § 27, pp. 171–172 (15th ed. 1993); Cochran v. United States, 157 U.S. 286, 294, 15 S.Ct. 628, 39 L.Ed. 704 (1895) (defendant could face "liability in a civil action for negligence, but he could only be held criminally for an evil intent actually existing in his mind"). Under these principles, "what [Elonis] thinks" does matter[.][53]

Before criminal culpability as a sex offender should attach for sexual activity with a person incapable of consenting, the government, consistent with the federal statute, should be required to establish through direct or circumstantial evidence that an actor actually knew that a victim was incapable of giving consent yet engaged in sexual behavior with that victim anyway.

D. JPP ISSUE 11: SHOULD THE OFFENSE OF "INDECENT ACT" BE ADDED TO THE UCMJ AS AN ENUMERATED OFFENSE?

I join the Subcommittee's recommendation that the former offense of indecent acts should not be restored as an enumerated offense. The Subcommittee has been notified that the Department of Defense proposed an Article 134 offense called "Indecent Conduct" in a recent draft executive order. I write separately to identify a few unresolved concerns that prevent me, without further study, from taking a position on whether the current proposal to create this Article 134 offense should go forward.

Past applications of the indecent act law have punished sexual behaviors that are normative and noncriminal within a civilian context: for example, consensual sexual activity occurring in the presence of a consenting third party or known recording device. The breadth (and potential overbreadth) of criminalizing such behavior is concerning on both vagueness and free speech grounds. It also raises questions about whether such a law's reach could be meaningfully narrowed with additional or different elements (including but not limited to requiring proof that the behavior was prejudicial to good order and discipline or Service discrediting).

Furthermore, it appears that satisfactory, alternate mechanisms within military discipline channels to address such behavior may already exist. Although the Subcommittee heard from witnesses who endorsed returning indecent acts provisions to the UCMJ, the justifications were sometimes vague and included that there had been such provisions in the past as well as some witnesses' general disapproval of indecent behavior. A need for this particular tool was not clearly articulated. In addition, although some requested the reenactment of indecent act provisions, others testified that prosecutions addressing such behavior had been brought through alternate mechanisms and upheld on appeal, thereby again raising the question of why advocates feel there would be value in reenacting these provisions. Issue 11 further raises the question of what policy reasons led to the removal of these provisions in the 2012 version of Article 120.

Another specific apprehension with respect to the indecent conduct proposal that arises for me as a civilian practitioner concerns the sex offender registry. As I understand it, the current proposal would enumerate indecent conduct provisions within Article 134 with the intention not to trigger sex offender registration requirements. Problematically, however, sex offender registry provisions vary greatly among the states. States routinely use their own criteria for who must register and may decline to defer to the policies of the jurisdiction of conviction.[54] Therefore, it is a matter of genuine concern that state law enforcement agencies or courts may see the word "indecent" on a rap sheet revealing a military adjudication and wrongly and harmfully mandate that that party register as a sex offender.

[54] For example, in Colorado, any person who was ever required to register in another jurisdiction, must register anew upon entering Colorado even if s/he was previously released from the registry in the state of conviction or another state. Colorado also has required individuals without criminal sex offense convictions to register based on civil proceedings in other states and conducts its own analysis of whether another jurisdiction's offense is sufficiently "equivalent" to Colorado sex crimes to require registration without regard for whether registration was ordered in that state.

REDRAFT OF ARTICLE 120 (NONCONSENT PROPOSAL) BY LAURIE ROSE KEPROS

45. Article 120—Rape and sexual assault generally

a. Text of statute.

(a) Rape. Any person subject to this chapter who knowingly commits a sexual act upon another person without that person's consent by using—

(1) unlawful force in addition to the force incidental to the sexual act against that other person;

(2) threats or otherwise placing the other person in fear that any person will be subjected to death, grievous bodily harm, or kidnapping;

(3) means to render the other person unconscious; or

(4) the administration of a drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance by force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or consent of that person, to substantially impair the ability of that other person to appraise or control conduct; is guilty of rape and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(b) Sexual Assault.

Any person subject to this chapter who knowingly commits a sexual act upon another person without that person's consent is guilty of sexual assault and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(c) Aggravated sexual contact.

Any person subject to this chapter who commits or causes sexual contact upon or by another person, if to do so would violate subsection (a) (rape) had the sexual contact been a sexual act, is guilty of aggravated sexual contact and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(d) Abusive sexual contact.

Any person subject to this chapter who commits or causes sexual contact upon or by another person, if to do so would violate subsection (b) (sexual assault) had the sexual contact been a sexual act, is guilty of abusive sexual contact and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

(e) Proof of Threat. In a prosecution under this section, in proving that a person made a threat, it need not be proven that the person actually intended to carry out the threat or had the ability to carry out the threat.

(f) Defenses. An accused may raise any applicable defenses available under this chapter or the Rules for Court-Martial including but not limited to consent and mistake of fact. Marriage is not a defense for any conduct in issue in any prosecution under this section.

(g) Definitions. In this section:

(1) Sexual act. The term "sexual act" means—

(A) contact between the penis and the vulva or anus or mouth, and for purposes of this subparagraph contact involving the penis occurs upon penetration, however slight; or

(B) the penetration, however slight, of the vulva or anus of another by any part of the body or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(2) Sexual contact. The term "sexual contact" means touching, or causing another person to touch, either directly or through the clothing, the genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person, if done with an intent to abuse, humiliate or degrade any person or to arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person. The touching may be accomplished by any part of the body or any object.

(3) Force. The term "force" means—

(A) the use of a weapon;

(B) the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or

(C) inflicting physical harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim.

(4) Unlawful Force.—The term "unlawful force" means an act of force done without consent or any other legal justification or excuse.

(5) Threatening or placing that other person in fear. The term "threatening or placing that other person in fear" means a communication or action that is of sufficient consequence to cause a reasonable fear that non-compliance will result in the victim or another person being subjected to the wrongful action contemplated by the communication or action.

(6) Consent.

(A) The term "consent" means a voluntary agreement to the conduct at issue.

(B) Consent may be conveyed through words or actions. An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent. All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent or not, including whether a person did not resist or ceased to resist only because of another person's actions. Lack of verbal or physical resistance alone does not constitute consent.

(C) Submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear is involuntary and does not constitute consent.

(D) A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship or the manner of dress of the person involved in the conduct at issue by themselves shall not constitute consent.

(E) A sleeping or unconscious person cannot consent. A person cannot consent if s/he is unaware that the sexual act is occurring.

(F) A person does not consent if s/he agrees to the sexual act(s) only because the perpetrator has made a fraudulent representation that the sexual act serves a professional purpose.

(G) A person does not consent if s/he agrees to the sexual act(s) only because the perpetrator has induced a belief by artifice, pretense or concealment of the fact that the person is another person;

(H) Any alleged consent is not valid if the person was incapable of consenting at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

(7) Incapable of consenting.— The term "incapable of consenting" means that as a result of impairment by any drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance, physical disability, or mental disease or defect, a person is unable to appraise the nature of the sexual conduct at issue, physically decline participation in the sexual conduct at issue, or physically communicate unwillingness to engage in the sexual conduct at issue.

Dear Mr. Taylor,

On behalf of the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG), I enclose Part I of our report: UCMJ Recommendations. Thank you for the superb support provided by you and your staff during this project.

Sincerely,

Andrew S. Effron

Enclosure:
As stated

Overview

The Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) provides the statutory framework for the military justice system. In this Report, the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG) analyzes each UCMJ article, including its historical background, current practice, and comparison to federal civilian law. The Report proposes substantive additions to the UCMJ through 37 new articles, substantive statutory amendments to 68 articles, and includes consolidated draft legislation incorporating all proposed changes. These proposed changes would enhance the purpose of military law as stated in the Preamble to the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM): "[T]o promote justice, to assist in maintaining good order and discipline in the armed forces, to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the military establishment, and thereby to strengthen the national security of the United States."

Establishing the Military Justice Review Group

This comprehensive review of the UCMJ and MCM resulted from a request to the Secretary of Defense by DoD's senior uniformed leadership.

- In August 2013, the then-Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Martin Dempsey, and the other members of the Joint Chiefs recommended that then-Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel order a holistic review of the UCMJ in order to ensure that it effectively and efficiently achieves justice consistent with due process and good order and discipline.

- On October 18, 2013, Secretary Hagel directed the DoD General Counsel to conduct a comprehensive review of the UCMJ and the military justice system with support from military justice experts provided by the military services. Secretary Hagel directed the review to include an analysis of not only the UCMJ, but also its implementation through the Manual for Courts-Martial and service regulations.

- The Secretary also directed the review to consider the report and recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel), a twelve-month independent review and assessment of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate adult sexual assault and related offenses in the military, including the role of the commander in the administration of military justice.

Guiding Principles

The DoD General Counsel established the MJRG with direction to take into account five principles during its review:

- Use the current UCMJ as a point of departure for baseline reassessment.

- Where they differ with existing military justice practice, consider the extent to which the principles of law and the rules of procedure and evidence used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts should be incorporated into military justice practice.

- To the extent practicable, UCMJ articles and MCM provisions should apply uniformly across the military services.
- Consider any recommendations, proposals, or analysis relating to military justice issued by the Response Systems Panel.
- Consider, as appropriate, the recommendations, proposals, and analysis in the report of the Defense Legal Policy Board, including the report of that Board's Subcommittee on Military Justice in Combat Zones.

Major Legislative Proposals

This Report contains the MJRG's completed review of the UCMJ. Proposals for amendments to the UCMJ generally fall into seven categories. This Report's major proposals would:

- Strengthen the Structure of the Military Justice System by—
  - Requiring issuance of guidance on the disposition of criminal cases similar to the U.S. Attorneys Manual, tailored to military needs.
  - Mandating additional training for commanders and convening authorities focused on the proper exercise of UCMJ authority.
  - Establishing a military judge-alone special court-martial as an additional option for disposition, similar to the judge-alone forum in civilian proceedings, with confinement limited to a maximum of six months and no punitive discharge.
  - Establishing selection criteria for military judges, mandating tour lengths, and requiring appointment of a Chief Trial Judge in each armed force.
  - Creating authority for military judges to handle specified legal issues that arise before formal referral of a case to court-martial that would otherwise await a ruling until after referral to court-martial.
  - Establishing a military magistrates program as an option for the services, with magistrates authorized to preside over specified pre-referral matters upon designation by a military judge, and to preside with the consent of the parties in the proposed judge-alone special court-martial.
- Enhance Fairness and Efficiency in Pretrial and Trial Procedures by—
  - Continuing to enhance victims' rights by:
    - Creating the opportunity for victim input on disposition decisions at the preliminary hearing stage.
    - Providing for public access to court documents and pleadings.
    - Treating victims consistently with regard to defense counsel interviews and access to records of trial.
  - Expanding authority to obtain documents during investigations through subpoenas and other process.

- Enhancing the utility of the preliminary hearing for the staff judge advocate and convening authority and providing an opportunity for parties and victims to submit relevant information on the appropriate disposition of offenses.
- Replacing the current variable composition and voting percentages for court-martial panels (military juries) with a requirement for a standardized number of panel members and a consistent voting percentage.
- Requiring, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one defense counsel be learned in the law applicable to capital cases, as in federal civilian courts and military commissions.

- Reform Sentencing, Guilty Pleas, and Plea Agreements by—
  - Ensuring that each offense receives separate consideration for purposes of sentencing to confinement.
  - Replacing the current sentencing standard (which relies on maximum punishments with minimal criteria in adjudging a sentence below the maximum) with a system of judicial discretion guided by parameters and criteria.
  - Improving military plea agreements by allowing negotiated ranges of punishments and adjudged sentences within the range.
  - Continuing to permit appeals of sentences by servicemembers, and establishing government appeals of sentences in circumstances similar to federal civilian practice.
  - Providing for the effective implementation of these reforms by establishing sentencing by military judges in all non-capital trials.

- Streamline the Post-Trial Process by—
  - Eliminating redundant post-trial paperwork and requiring an entry of judgment by the military judge similar to federal civilian practice to mark the completion of a special or general court-martial.
  - Establishing restricted authority to suspend sentences in cases in which the military judge recommends a specific form of suspension and the convening authority approves a suspension within the military judge's recommendation.

- Modernize Military Appellate Practice by—
  - Permitting the government to file interlocutory appeals in general and special courts-martial regardless of whether a punitive discharge could be adjudged.
  - Transforming the automatic appeal of cases to the service Courts of Criminal Appeals into an appeal of right in which the accused, upon advice of appellate defense counsel, would determine whether to file an appeal.
  - Expanding direct review jurisdiction of the Courts of Criminal Appeals primarily with respect to cases in which an accused is sentenced to confinement for more than six months.
  - Providing servicemembers, like their civilian counterparts, with the opportunity to obtain judicial review in all cases.

- Focusing the appeal on issues raised by the parties, with the opportunity for the Courts of Criminal Appeals to review for plain error.
- Establishing harmless error standards of review for guilty pleas similar to those applied by the federal civilian courts of appeal.
- Providing for review of issues identified by the accused regarding factual sufficiency when the appellant makes a sufficient showing to justify relief.
- Permitting the government to appeal a sentence under conditions similar to those applied by the federal civilian courts of appeal.
- Continuing to require automatic review of capital cases and requiring, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one appellate defense counsel be learned in the law applicable to capital cases.

- Increase Transparency and Independent Review of the Military Justice System by—
  - Creating a statute requiring uniform public access to courts-martial documents and pleadings similar to that available in federal civilian courts.
  - Establishing an independent blue ribbon panel of experts to conduct periodic reviews of the UCMJ.

- Improve the Functionality of Punitive Articles and Proscribe Additional Acts by—
  - Restructuring the punitive articles of the UCMJ, which proscribe criminal acts.
  - Establishing specific statutory punitive articles to cover many forms of misconduct now addressed by Executive Order in the General Article.
  - Authorizing the President to designate lesser included offenses under legislative criteria.
  - Aligning the definition of "sexual acts" in Article 120 with federal civilian law.
  - Revising the prohibition against stalking (Article 130) to include cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners.
  - Amending the statute of limitations for child-abuse offenses, fraudulent enlistment, and to extend the period when DNA testing implicates an identified person.
  - Creating new enumerated offenses, including:
    - Article 93a: Prohibited activities with military recruit or trainee by person in position of special trust
    - Article 121a: Fraudulent use of credit and debit cards
    - Article 123: Offenses concerning Government computers
    - Article 132: Retaliation

Executive Summary

Introduction

The Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) provides the statutory framework for the military justice system. In this Report, the Military Justice Review Group (MJRG) provides individual analysis of every article of the UCMJ, including summaries of the current statutes, historical background, current practice, and comparisons to applicable rules and procedures in federal civilian practice. The Report proposes substantive additions to the UCMJ through 37 new articles and substantive statutory amendments to 68 articles. The Report includes consolidated draft legislation incorporating all proposed changes.

This summary briefly describes the background of the MJRG and highlights the primary recommendations in the Report.[1]

Establishing the MJRG and its Guiding Principles

This comprehensive review of the military justice system resulted from a request by the Department of Defense's senior uniformed leadership to the Secretary of Defense. In August 2013, the then-Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Martin Dempsey, and the other members of the Joint Chiefs recommended to then-Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel "a comprehensive and holistic review" of the UCMJ and the military justice system to ensure that the system "most effectively and efficiently does justice consistent with due process and good order and discipline."[2] The Joint Chiefs concluded that a comprehensive review of the UCMJ was appropriate in view of the many social developments and major changes in the armed forces since the last comprehensive review, which occurred in the 1980s.

On October 18, 2013, Secretary Hagel directed the General Counsel of the Department of Defense to conduct a comprehensive review of the UCMJ and the military justice system, including the MCM and service regulations, with support from military justice experts provided by the military Services.[3] The Secretary's direction included a requirement to consider the report and recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Response Systems Panel).[4]

The DoD General Counsel established the MJRG to carry out the comprehensive review, utilizing military justice experts detailed by the Services.[5] The General Counsel appointed Andrew S. Effron, former Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, to serve as the Director of the MJRG.[6]

The General Counsel's Terms of Reference established five guiding principles for the MJRG to apply during its review:

- Use the current UCMJ as a point of departure for baseline reassessment.
- Where they differ with existing military justice practice, consider the extent to which the principles of law and the rules of procedure and evidence used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts should be incorporated into military justice practice.
- To the extent practicable, UCMJ articles and MCM provisions should apply uniformly across the military services.
- Consider any recommendations, proposals, or analysis relating to military justice issued by the Response Systems Panel.
- Consider, as appropriate, the recommendations, proposals, and analysis in the report of the Defense Legal Policy Board, including the report of that Board's Subcommittee on Military Justice in Combat Zones.[7]

The DoD General Counsel also directed the MJRG to consult with general and flag officers with experience as general court-martial convening authorities—senior commanders with authority to direct that cases be tried by court-martial. The Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff was tasked with assisting in identifying a suitable group of officers for this purpose. Finally, the DoD General Counsel required the Director to coordinate any proposed amendments, at his discretion, on an ongoing basis with the DoD Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy), The Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.[8]

The General Counsel designated two distinguished experts in the law—the Honorable David Sentelle, former Chief Judge for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; and the Honorable Judith Miller, former DoD General Counsel—to serve as Senior Advisors to the MJRG. The DoD General Counsel also requested that the Department of Justice designate an expert criminal litigator to serve as an advisor to the MJRG. Mr. Jonathan Wroblewski, Director of the Office of Policy and Legislation in the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice (DoJ), serves as the DoJ's Advisor to the MJRG. Mr. John Sparks and Mr. Clark Price have served as advisors to the MJRG from the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

The DoD Office of General Counsel facilitated the opportunity for public input to the MJRG by establishing a website that included an invitation to submit recommendations.[9] The Office of General Counsel also wrote to over 400 organizations, including bar associations, law schools, victims' advocacy groups, and other public interest organizations, advising them of the opportunity for input. The MJRG received numerous thoughtful public comments which it considered during the review process.

The Secretary of Defense established a very tight time frame for completion of the comprehensive review—one year for a legislative report on the UCMJ, and a report on implementing rules six months later.[10] Based upon this guidance and direction from the DoD General Counsel, the MJRG submitted its initial report on the UCMJ to the General Counsel on March 25, 2015. Following a period of internal review within the Department of Defense, the MJRG submitted a revised UCMJ report on September 2, 2015. The Department approved the legislative proposals in the revised report as an official Department of Defense proposal, and submitted the proposals to the Office of Management and Budget for interagency review. After considering comments provided during the interagency review, the MJRG prepared this final report, which includes the legislation that has been submitted to Congress as an official administration proposal.

Based upon guidance from the DoD General Counsel, the MJRG has prepared a separate report on implementing rules, focusing primarily on the Manual for Courts-Martial

(MCM).[11] The MJRG's report on the MCM, which was submitted to the DoD General Counsel on September 21, 2015, currently is under review within the Department of Defense.

Further information regarding the scope and methodology of the MJRG is found in Part A of this Report.

Purpose of Military Law

The purpose of military law is "to promote justice, to assist in maintaining good order and discipline in the armed forces, to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the military establishment, and thereby to strengthen the national security of the United States."[12] These three major recurring themes—justice, discipline, and efficiency—are set forth in complementary clauses of the Preamble to the Manual for Courts-Martial and are woven throughout the structure and provisions of the UCMJ and the Manual. Since its inception in 1775, military law in the United States has evolved to recognize that all three components are essential to ensure that our national security is protected and strengthened by an effective, highly disciplined military force.

The current structure and practice of the UCMJ embodies a single overarching principle based on more than 225 years of experience: a system of military law can only achieve and maintain a highly disciplined force if it is fair and just, and is recognized as such both by members of the armed forces and by the American public. "Once a case is before a court-martial, it should be realized by all concerned that the sole concern is to accomplish justice under the law. . . . It is not proper to say that a military court-martial has a dual function as an instrument of discipline and as an instrument of justice. It is an instrument of justice and in fulfilling this function it will promote discipline."[13] This Report's proposals are made with full recognition that the necessity for justice and the requirement for discipline are inseparable.[14]

[11] The President implements the UCMJ and prescribes rules for pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedure by executive order in the MCM. Based upon direction from the DoD General Counsel, the MJRG's report on the MCM includes recommendations for rules that would be used to implement the legislative proposals from the MJRG, subject to enactment. In that context, the recommendations in the MJRG's MCM report take the form of a discussion draft that provides a foundation for further consideration during internal DoD and interagency review.

[14] See, e.g., POWELL REPORT, supra note 11, at 11-12 ("In the development of discipline, correction of individuals is indispensable; in correction, fairness or justice is indispensable. [C]onfronted with the necessity of maintaining a delicate balance between justice and

The need to promote discipline through an instrument of justice requires a court-martial system that differs in important respects from civilian criminal justice systems. As the Supreme Court has stated, the military remains a "specialized society separate from civilian society . . . [because] it is the primary business of armies and navies to fight or be ready to fight wars should the occasion arise."[15] This separateness of purpose and mission has shaped the values and traditions that are embodied in the UCMJ, as reflected in the following unique characteristics that distinguish courts-martial from criminal trials in the civilian courts.

Unique Military Offenses. The offenses proscribed by the UCMJ are "military offenses," even when similar offenses also exist at common law. This is because crimes committed by military members, irrespective of substantially similar civilian counterparts, have the potential to seriously damage unit cohesion by destroying the bonds of trust critical to successful mission accomplishment. There are also crimes under the UCMJ that consist of unique military offenses—including desertion, disrespect, disobedience, malingering, misbehavior before the enemy, and others. These offenses are specifically proscribed in the military context because of their deleterious impact on morale and mission accomplishment.

In addition, Article 134, the General Article, proscribes conduct that is prejudicial to good order and discipline or of a nature to bring discredit on the armed forces. Under this article and others, members of the armed forces can face prosecution for acts which are not regarded as criminal in civilian jurisdictions. For example, activity that might be protected under the First Amendment to the Constitution if carried out by a civilian can lead to criminal punishment for a member of the armed forces. This is because the unique needs of military service require constitutional considerations to be applied differently to those who serve in the military.[16] "In civilian life there is no legal sanction—civil or criminal—for failure to behave as an officer and a gentleman; in the military world, [Article] 133 imposes such a sanction on a commissioned officer."[17]

Unique Military Procedures. The court-martial system has unique procedures developed for those circumstances where civilian criminal procedures are impractical or unworkable in a military setting. The procedures often have as their origin the need for a system that is discipline, Congress liberalized the military judicial system but also permitted commanding officers to retain many of the powers held by them under prior laws."); Article 30(b), UCMJ ("Upon the preferring of charges, the proper authority shall take immediate steps to determine what disposition would be made thereof in the interest of justice and discipline.") (emphasis added).

[16] See Parker, 417 U.S. at 758 ("While the members of the military are not excluded from the protection granted by the First Amendment, the different character of the military community and of the military mission requires a different application of those protections. The fundamental necessity for obedience, and the consequent necessity for imposition of discipline, may render permissible within the military that which would be constitutionally impermissible outside it.").

simultaneously efficient and capable of operating in a wide variety of settings—including forward-deployed areas of armed conflict—while also remaining fair and just given the highly hierarchical structure of the military.

Sometimes these procedures are more favorable to members of the armed forces than analogous procedures in civilian practice. For example, rights advisement warnings under Article 31(b)—similar to those required in the civilian setting by Miranda v. Arizona[18]—are required whenever a servicemember is suspected of an offense and questioned, regardless of whether he or she is in custody. This extra protection for military members suspected of crimes is rooted in the recognition of the inherently custodial nature of interrogation within the military setting. Additionally, in the military, the assistance of counsel is provided throughout the court-martial and appellate process, regardless of the member's rank or ability to pay. With respect to court-martial procedure, the military employs a robust and open discovery process designed to minimize gamesmanship, increase efficiency in the pretrial and trial processes, and ensure that a servicemember's rights during these processes are protected.

Sometimes the procedures employed in the court-martial process are less favorable to servicemembers than similar procedures in civilian practice. For example, in the military, confinement before trial is permitted under broader circumstances than in civilian practice, and with no potential for bail. Also, court-martial panels (military juries) can be composed of fewer than twelve members and do not require unanimous verdicts except to proceed to capital sentencing in a case in which the death penalty is an authorized sentence. The Supreme Court traditionally defers to the balance struck by Congress in these matters. "[I]n determining what process is due, courts must give particular deference to the determination of Congress, made under its authority to regulate the land and naval forces, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8."[19]

Unique Military Punishments. In addition to confinement and fines, servicemembers found guilty of committing criminal offenses under the UCMJ face possible punitive separation (bad-conduct or dishonorable discharges for enlisted personnel; dismissal for officers) as well as reductions in their rank and loss of pay. These punishments not only remove convicted military members from the armed forces, they may also deprive them of vested retirement pay and veterans benefits otherwise earned during periods of honorable service.

Partnership of Staff Judge Advocates and Convening Authorities. The partnership of convening authorities—senior commanders authorized to convene courts-martial—and their primary legal advisors, staff judge advocates, is a distinct feature of the military justice system. Staff judge advocates provide critical advice to general court-martial convening authorities. A convening authority may not refer charges to trial by general court-martial in the absence of legal analysis and the staff judge advocate's determination that: the charge alleges an offense under the UCMJ; there is jurisdiction over the offense and the accused; and the charge is warranted by the evidence contained in the preliminary hearing report.[20]

Due in part to the unique roles of the staff judge advocate and convening authority in the military justice system, as well as the authority and responsibilities of commanders throughout the military organization, the UCMJ includes an express statutory provision addressing unlawful command influence. Under Article 37, interference with court-martial proceedings by convening authorities and all others subject to the Code is strictly prohibited. Such a prohibition has no direct parallel in federal civilian practice, but is essential in ensuring a just system that maintains the confidence of both servicemembers and the public. For example, "by insulating military judges from the effects of command influence, [the UCMJ and corresponding regulations] sufficiently preserve judicial impartiality so as to satisfy the Due Process Clause" requirement for "a fair trial in a fair tribunal."[21] The prohibition against unlawful command influence was a major driving factor behind the enactment of the UCMJ. It remains essential to ensure fairness and justice in the armed forces, which require a hierarchical command structure in order to prevail in the harsh and unforgiving conditions of military combat.

Deployability. In the military, there is a unique need to conduct trials in deployed environments during ongoing combat operations around the world, as well as in other nations where American servicemembers are stationed. Courts-martial are routinely conducted in nations with which the United States has Status of Forces Agreements; these agreements establish priority of criminal jurisdiction over offenses committed by servicemembers between the host nation's law and the UCMJ. In addition, numerous courts-martial have been conducted during combat deployments, including throughout the deployments that have taken place in Iraq and Afghanistan since the September 11, 2001 attacks.

Consideration of Criminal Law Practices in Civilian Courts. Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950 following widespread dissatisfaction with the operation of courts-martial and their fairness to the accused during World War II. Congress addressed this dissatisfaction in the UCMJ, in part, by prohibiting unlawful command influence and creating an appellate court composed of civilians, the court now designated as the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Since then, the UCMJ has continually evolved in an effort to achieve justice, discipline, and efficiency and fine tune the balance between these complementary goals. The result is "a system of military justice notably more sensitive to due process concerns than the one prevailing through most of our country's history . . . ."[22]

Military law has incorporated practices and procedures of federal civilian law where practicable and not contrary to or inconsistent with the requirements of the armed forces. It also has counterbalanced the limitation of rights available to servicemembers with procedures designed to ensure protection of those rights that are provided under military law.[23] Since its enactment in 1950, significant changes to the UCMJ include the establishment of the military judiciary in 1968 with enhanced powers and the requirement for qualified defense counsel in most instances; the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence in 1980; simplification of the post-trial process and enhancement of appellate review in 1983; adoption of a rule-based MCM in 1984 to replace the uncertainties generated by the prior treatise format; and a variety of clarifying amendments in subsequent years.

As a result of these and other changes, the modes of presentation and the rules of evidence that currently apply during trials by courts-martial are nearly identical to those in federal civilian courts. Other procedures—such as how cases are sent to trial and how panel members are selected; the number of members required on panels; the percentage of votes required for a finding of guilty; sentencing proceedings; and numerous other procedures—continue to retain military-specific components.

This Report examines many of the distinctions that remain between military practice under the UCMJ and federal and state civilian practice. The proposals recommend aligning certain procedures with federal civilian practice in instances where they will enhance fairness and efficiency and where the rationale for military-specific practices has dissipated. For example, robust military judiciary and defense counsel organizations are firmly rooted in a system largely constructed prior to their development. These and other systemic changes reflect the growth and maturation of the military justice system since Congress enacted the UCMJ.

This Report's proposals recommend retaining military-specific practices where the comparable civilian practice would be incompatible with the military's purpose, function, and mission, or would not further the goals of justice, discipline, and efficiency in the military context. Maintaining distinct military practices and procedures—where appropriate—remains vital to ensuring justice within a hierarchical military organization that must operate effectively both at home and abroad, during times of conflict and times of peace.

Contemporary Context

Recent Legislation. Recognizing the inseparable link between justice and discipline, changes made to the UCMJ since 1950 have served to enhance the rights of servicemembers, to provide effective disciplinary tools for military commanders, and to increase the efficiency of court-martial and appellate procedures.[24] In recent years, [23] See Weiss, 510 U.S. at 174 ("By enacting the [UCMJ] in 1950, and through subsequent statutory changes, Congress has gradually changed the system of military justice so that it has come to more closely resemble the civilian system.").

[24] For a detailed narrative of the evolution of military justice, see Section A of this Report.

legislative changes focused primarily, but not exclusively, on concern over the manner in which the military justice system addresses sexual assault allegations, and the treatment of sexual assault victims within the system. These targeted changes reflect concern that neither servicemembers nor the public will have confidence in a system of military law that does not—or does not appear to—protect the dignity and rights of victims as well as the rights of the accused.

Recent changes represent significant modifications to court-martial practice. In general, the changes enhanced victims' rights and participation throughout the military justice process while limiting the exercise of convening authorities' pretrial and post-trial discretion. These changes also revised a number of practices before, during, and after trial related to the interests of an accused in the context of a military organization.

In the National Defense Authorization Acts for Fiscal Years 2014 and 2015, Congress enacted substantial amendments to 15 articles of the UCMJ, along with additional statutory provisions outside the UCMJ, that have directly impacted military justice practice.[25] A recent executive order contains numerous provisions that implement these statutory provisions throughout the Manual for Courts-Martial.[26]

Major changes in the recent legislation include:

- Codifying victims' rights in Article 6b and incorporating into the statute many of the rights available to victims in federal civilian courts.
- Providing Special Victims' Counsel to alleged victims of sex-related offenses who are authorized to receive legal assistance for legal consultation and representation in connection with the reporting, military investigation, and military prosecution of sex-related offenses.
- Transforming the broad pretrial investigation of offenses under Article 32 into a more focused preliminary hearing, and providing that victims may not be compelled to testify at the hearing.
- Curtailing the convening authority's previously unrestricted post-trial discretion to take action favorable to an accused on the findings or sentence of a court-martial, permitting modification only in narrowly defined circumstances.
- Limiting the availability of depositions to situations in which exceptional circumstances and the interests of justice require the preservation of prospective witness testimony for use at preliminary hearings or trial.

- Creating oversight mechanisms in circumstances where the convening authority declines to refer certain alleged sexual assaults to trial, and limiting the forum for trial of those offenses to general court-martial.
- Directing the President to amend the Military Rules of Evidence to enhance witnesses' psychotherapist-patient privilege and limit the accused's right to present evidence of his or her good military character to raise reasonable doubt as to guilt.
- Amending the equal opportunity of the trial counsel, defense counsel, and the court-martial to obtain witnesses and other evidence by limiting the circumstances under which counsel for the accused may interview alleged sexual assault victims.
- Requiring that the sentence for certain sexual assault offenses include, at a minimum, a dishonorable discharge or dismissal.

Further changes were enacted in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2016.[27]

Federal Advisory Committees. Congress also directed the Secretary of Defense to establish several federal advisory committees to examine military law and practices with regard to sexual assault allegations. All of these efforts reflect significant congressional and public interest in the military justice system.

- The Response Systems Panel was established in 2013 to conduct a twelve-month review of the effectiveness of the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate sexual assault offenses, including the role of the commander in the military justice system. The Response Systems Panel issued its report in June 2014, including 132 recommendations, many of which directly impact practices under the UCMJ.[28]

- The Judicial Proceedings Panel followed the Response Systems Panel.[29] The Judicial Proceedings Panel is reviewing the operation of the court-martial process with respect to sexual assault offenses, and will issue periodic reports through 2017. The Judicial Proceedings Panel issued its Initial Report on February 4, 2015.[30]

- Congress recently directed the creation of an additional advisory committee to conduct an in-depth study of selected court-martial cases involving sexual assault. The Defense Advisory Committee on Investigation, Prosecution, and Defense of Sexual Assault in the Armed Forces will begin its work in 2016.[31]

- In addition to these congressionally mandated review groups, the Secretary of Defense independently established the Defense Legal Policy Board, a discretionary federal advisory committee, in 2012. The Board issued its report on the reporting and investigation of cases where servicemembers were alleged to have caused the death, injury, or abuse of non-combatants in Iraq or Afghanistan in June 2013.[32] The report of the Board recommended, among other things, reforms to the military justice system.

Summary of Recommendations – Major Legislative Proposals

The following are the MJRG's major proposals for changes to the UCMJ. Unless otherwise noted, the proposals are predicated on a one-year transition period for implementation—that is, a one-year period between the date of enactment of any legislation and the date on which the new legislation would come into effect. These proposals fall into seven categories:

- Strengthening the Structure of the Military Justice System
- Enhancing Fairness and Efficiency in Pretrial and Trial Procedures
- Reforming Sentencing, Guilty Pleas, and Plea Agreements

Strengthening the Structure of the Military Justice System

The Convening Authority-Staff Judge Advocate Partnership. This Report proposes strengthening the partnership between the convening authority and the staff judge advocate. The proposals in the Report will enhance the scope and quality of information available to the convening authority and staff judge advocate in their evaluation of the full range of disposition options.

The Exercise of Disposition Discretion by Convening Authorities. Military commanders are responsible for instilling and maintaining the level of discipline necessary to ensure accomplishment of the military mission. The issue of whether that responsibility should continue to include the authority to refer cases to courts-martial, or whether that authority should be vested in judge advocates, has been the subject of considerable debate, as reflected in the report of the Response Systems Panel, a blue-ribbon advisory committee composed of distinguished non-governmental experts in civilian practice as well as military law.[33] Congress expressly directed the Response Systems Panel to assess the impact of removing disposition authority from the chain of command, focusing on sexual assault cases.[34] The Panel's report, which recommended retention of the commander's role in exercising disposition discretion, includes thoughtful views on both sides of the issue.[35] In view of the extensive testimony and evidence so recently gathered and considered by the congressionally-established Response Systems Panel, the MJRG has focused its efforts on measures to improve the current process, rather than on revisiting the underlying fundamental policy so soon after the Response Systems Panel completed its thorough and careful treatment of the issue.

[and] the strengths and weaknesses of proposed legislative initiatives to modify the current role of commanders in the administration of military justice and in the investigation, prosecution, and adjudication of adult sexual assault crimes.").

In that regard, the proposals in this Report endeavor to enhance decision-making in the context of the convening authority-staff judge advocate relationship.

- Focused commander and convening authority training. First, this Report proposes to amend Article 137, which currently requires that all enlisted members receive training on the UCMJ, to also extend this requirement to cover officers, and to require periodic training for all those who exercise responsibility for the imposition of nonjudicial punishment or who convene courts-martial. Although the services currently incorporate military justice training into a variety of continuing professional education programs for both officers and non-commissioned officers, this proposal would establish a statutory requirement for focused training on the exercise of authority under the UCMJ. Part II of the Report will address the importance of focusing training and operational guidance that considers both the restrictions on unlawful command influence and the authority of commanders and senior officials to instill discipline through the exercise of lawful command emphasis.

- Disposition considerations. Second, this Report proposes to clarify the distinction between the minimum legal requirements for referral of a case to trial by court-martial under Article 34 (Advice of staff judge advocate and reference for trial) and the separate, prudential issues involving the exercise of disposition discretion by military commanders and convening authorities. This includes a proposal to establish Article 33 (Disposition guidance), which would require the President to direct the Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, to issue non-binding guidance regarding factors that commanders, convening authorities, staff judge advocates and judge advocates should take into account when exercising their duties with respect to disposition of charges in the interest of justice and discipline. These considerations would take into account the guidance in the Principles of Federal Prosecution in the United States Attorneys Manual, with appropriate modifications to reflect the unique purposes and aspects of military law. This non-binding guidance, a proposed draft of which will be offered in Part II of this Report, would provide a functional decision-making framework for convening authorities, commanders, staff judge advocates and judge advocates to assess the full range of disposition options for alleged offenses under the Code, recognizing that the disposition decision encompasses many issues beyond the legal and factual sufficiency of a particular case.

- Staff Judge Advocate/Legal Advisor's Advice. The staff judge advocate's pretrial advice will still be required prior to referring a case to general court-martial, in accordance with Article 34. To enhance the exercise of referral discretion for special courts-martial, this Report's proposed amendments to Article 34 also would require pre-referral judge advocate consultation in all special courts-martial. Part II of the Report will focus on the rules implementing Article 34, with particular attention to the content of the staff judge advocate's advice and the responsibility to convey any victim's input in the referral decision. Part II also will address the content of the staff judge advocate's advice in cases where the staff judge advocate disagrees with the findings of the preliminary hearing officer with respect to probable cause, the form of the charges, or jurisdiction.

Court-Martial Options. The military justice system has four primary components: non-judicial punishment, summary courts-martial, special courts-martial, and general courts-martial. This Report proposes including an additional option for special courts-martial, through amendments to Articles 16 (Courts-martial classified) and 19 (Jurisdiction of special courts-martial). Similar to civilian practice, the proposed option would authorize non-jury trials for minor offenses. This option would provide an alternative means of addressing minor offenses that may warrant a degree of punishment greater than authorized for a summary court-martial but would not warrant a punitive discharge or confinement for more than six months (particularly during contingency operations or when a rapid and large build-up of forces is underway). This alternative would consist of a judge-alone proceeding for findings and sentence, with a maximum confinement of six months and no punitive discharge authorized. The judge-alone special court-martial would be an option for consideration by the convening authority, not a matter for election by the accused, similar to civilian practice authorizing non-jury trials for petty offenses when the maximum punishment includes confinement for no more than six months. The accused in such a proceeding, and in all special courts-martial, would have increased access to appellate review under the proposed amendments to Articles 66 and 69 discussed later in this summary.

The Military Judiciary. The military judiciary provides the linchpin to a fair and effective military justice system and guarantees a fair and impartial tribunal. This Report makes several proposals to build on that foundation:

- Selection criteria and tour lengths. The Report proposes enhancing the stature, management, and public perception of the military judiciary by establishing in statute the foundational requirements for the qualification and appointment of military judges in Article 26 (Military judge of a general or special court-martial), with flexible criteria in the Manual for Courts-Martial. The primary authority for selection and certification of military judges would remain vested in The Judge Advocates General, including identification of a Chief Trial Judge for each Service, a position formally recognized in proposed changes to Article 26. The Judge Advocates General and the Commandant of the Marine Corps would assign military judges in accordance with minimum tour lengths established by the President in the Manual, subject to exceptions that could be invoked to meet military exigencies, or to grant a request for reassignment or retirement. These proposed changes are designed to promote the experience level of military judges and enhance public confidence in the independence of the military judiciary.

- Pretrial judicial decisions. A number of military justice decisions made prior to trial involve substantial legal issues. In order to reduce the number of issues that must be litigated at trial, and thereby increase efficiency in the court-martial process, this Report proposes to create a new statute, Article 30a (Proceedings conducted before referral), to provide statutory authority for judicial rulings on legal issues arising prior to trial. The new statute would authorize the President to identify the types of issues appropriate for those proceedings, to establish procedures for such proceedings, and to specify available remedies. The statute would create authority for judicial rulings prior to referral on limited issues that currently must await judicial action until after referral. This authority would permit judicial review of, but not replace, command and convening authority decisions on those matters. Part II of the Report will consider rules to set forth particular issues for pretrial rulings, which could include, for example: review of pretrial confinement actions, requests for mental competency evaluations, requests for depositions, requests for individual military counsel, and ensuring that the protections afforded to victims under the Military Rules of Evidence are properly enforced in preliminary hearings.

- Military magistrates. The current and proposed role of military judges contains substantial potential for utilizing full and part-time military magistrates, akin to the federal system. The proposed Articles 26a (Military magistrates) and 30a also would provide the services with the option of establishing a military magistrate program, with qualifications and tour-length criteria separate from the criteria used for the certification of military judges. The Judge Advocates General and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps could appoint full or part-time military magistrates. The services could employ magistrates designated by military judges prior to referral to conduct pretrial hearings, act on designated pretrial matters, and preside with the consent of the parties in the proposed judge-alone special courts-martial discussed above. In these areas, military magistrates would act with full authority of military judges, with their decisions reviewed by military judges. The use of magistrates would permit a more efficient utilization of the military judiciary, and could provide a training and certification pipeline for future military judges.

Enhancing Fairness and Efficiency in Pretrial and Trial Procedures

Victims' Rights.

- Article 6b. In the NDAA FY 2014, Congress enacted Article 6b, which codifies victims' rights under the UCMJ and incorporates many provisions of the federal Crime Victims' Rights Act. This Report proposes to conform military law to federal law with respect to the relationship between the rights of victims and the disposition of offenses and with respect to the appointment of individuals to assume the rights of deceased, incompetent, or minor victims. This Report also would extend recently enacted provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses to cover victims of all UCMJ offenses.

- Implementing Article 6b. As noted earlier, the President implements the UCMJ and prescribes rules for pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedure through the Rules for Courts-Martial. Part II of this Report will consider rules to implement the rights set forth in Article 6b and other victim provisions this Report proposes, as well as enhancements to remedial options for violations of these rights.[36] The matters that will be considered in Part II will include, for example: the ability of the victim to be reasonably heard on the plea agreement, pretrial confinement, release, and sentencing (including through an unsworn statement); the victim's input on the disposition of offenses to the convening authority; the right to notice of proceedings and the release or escape of the accused; the right to not be excluded from proceedings absent a required showing; and the right to submit post-trial matters to the convening authority.[37]

- Additional proposals. This Report's proposal regarding Article 32 (Preliminary hearing) also addresses the victim's opportunity to convey views on disposition of offenses to the convening authority. The proposal regarding Article 54 (Record of trial) increases access of victims of all offenses to trial records. The proposal to enact Article 140a (Case management; data collection and accessibility) would provide victims, counsel, and members of the public access to all unsealed court-martial documents. This Report would revise the current prohibition against stalking to address cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners (Article 130). This Report also proposes additional punitive articles that would address retaliation (Article 132) and specifically criminalize improper sexual activities with a recruit or trainee by a person in a position of special trust (Article 93a).

Investigative Subpoena Power. The optimal time for use of subpoena power often occurs during the conduct of an investigation, making it possible to develop and analyze information for use in the decision as to whether to prefer charges, whether a preliminary hearing should be ordered, and for consideration during a preliminary hearing. The Article 32 proceeding, as recently revised, serves primarily as a preliminary hearing rather than as an investigative tool and will operate most efficiently and effectively when based upon information compiled prior to the hearing. This Report proposes, through amendments to Article 46 (Opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence) and Article 47 (Refusal to appear or testify) to provide a process for making subpoenas and other process available independent of Article 32 during the earliest stages of an investigation.

[36] A recent executive order contains numerous provisions to implement Article 6b rights throughout the Manual for Courts-Martial. Exec. Order No. 13,696, 80 Fed. Reg. 35,783 (Jun. 22, 2015).

[37] Article 6b(a)(6) provides that a victim has the "right to receive restitution as provided in law." As a matter of current practice, non-statutory restitution may be included in pretrial agreements in guilty plea cases, see, e.g., R.C.M. 705(c)(2)(C), and a limited form of restitution related to property damage is available outside the sentencing process in the form of deductions from pay under Article 139. The congressionally-chartered Judicial Proceedings Panel is considering whether additional options for restitution should be provided in connection with sexual offense proceedings. See NDAA FY14 at § 1731(b)(1)(D). In view of the limited jurisdiction of courts-martial over personal property and assets, development of an effective restitution program may require consideration of options outside the military sentencing process, and beyond the scope of this Report. Because such options would include consideration of administrative and judicial procedures outside the military justice system, this Report recommends that development of any statutory changes regarding restitution take place after the Judicial Proceedings Panel presents its recommendations.

The Article 32 Preliminary Hearing. This Report proposes to retain the core features of the Article 32 preliminary hearing as set forth in current legislation (NDAA FY 2014 and FY 2015). The proposal would focus the preliminary hearing on an initial determination of probable cause prior to referring charges to a general court-martial; require a more comprehensive preliminary hearing report; and provide an additional opportunity for the government, the defense, and victims to present information relevant to an appropriate disposition of the charges and specifications. The proposal would require the preliminary hearing officer to analyze and organize the information presented in a manner designed to enhance the utility of the hearing to the staff judge advocate and the convening authority in fulfilling their respective disposition responsibilities. The requirement for detailed analysis of this information for use in the disposition process would replace the current requirement for a disposition recommendation. Consistent with the recently enacted legislation, the preliminary hearing officer will be a judge advocate, equal to or greater in rank than the most senior counsel. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 32 that would be required as a result of the proposed statutory amendments.

Discovery. The discovery rules applicable to courts-martial are addressed primarily in the Rules for Courts-Martial, which implement Article 46 and provide for robust and open discovery in military practice. Part II of this Report will consider proposed rule changes to strengthen the military's open discovery practice, which is intended to be timely and comprehensive. The Rules serve the goals of discovery in courts-martial, which include improving efficiency, preventing delays and surprise during trials, limiting gamesmanship, and permitting the accused to prepare adequately for trial and to present a defense, subject to limitations on classified and privileged information. Part II also will consider whether the President should establish a mechanism to address potential wrongful convictions that result from discovery violations or other factors.

Double Jeopardy. This Report proposes amending Article 44 (Former jeopardy), the prohibition against double jeopardy in military law, to conform to federal civilian practice by providing for jeopardy attachment when the members are impaneled following completion of challenges, or, if there are no members, when evidence is introduced on the merits of the charges.

Panel Member Selection, Panel Size, and Votes Needed to Convict.

- Current Practice. The composition of courts-martial has changed over time, from the thirteen-member panels required under the original American Articles of War, to the variable panel sizes permitted under current law—a minimum of three members for a special court-martial, a minimum of five members for a non-capital general court-martial, and a minimum of twelve members for a capital general court-martial. The use of a minimum number of members, rather than a standard number, means that the panel size can vary from case to case. The voting percentage also has changed, from a simple majority vote since the beginning of the Revolutionary War through World War I, to the varied system under the UCMJ: two-thirds for the findings in general and special courts-martial; three-fourths for sentences to confinement for ten years or more; unanimity in order to proceed to capital sentencing in cases in which a death sentence is an authorized punishment; and unanimity for a death sentence. The variation in panel sizes means that the number of votes required for findings may vary substantially from trial to trial, even within the same category of court-martial, with percentages ranging from 67% to 80% depending on the number of members actually seated. Additionally, the variation in panel sizes complicates the member selection process because of the unpredictability in the number of panel members who ultimately will serve on the panel.

- Providing consistency. This Report proposes to provide consistency by standardizing the number of members for each type of court-martial through amendments to Article 16 (Courts-martial classified), Article 25a (Number of members in capital cases), and Article 52 (Number of votes required). The Report proposes four members for a special court-martial (with three votes required for a conviction); eight members for a non-capital general court-martial (with six votes required for a conviction); and twelve members for a capital general court-martial (with unanimity on the findings and sentence required for the death penalty). This proposal would establish a standard panel size, which would facilitate the detailing process, and also would establish a standard percentage of votes cast to convict (75 percent, with unanimity required to proceed to capital sentencing in cases in which a death sentence is an authorized punishment). Following voir dire, challenges, and final empanelment, the unseated prospective members left over from the venire would be free to return to their normal duties.

- Panel selection. This Report proposes to retain the current criteria in Article 25(Who may serve on courts-martial) for member selection by the convening authority, with two modifications. First, this proposal would eliminate the blanket prohibition against detailing enlisted panel members serving in the same unit as the accused and would permit such members to be detailed under the same conditions applicable to the detailing of officers from the same unit as the accused. Second, the proposal would amend Article 29 (Absent and additional members) to permit the convening authority to authorize alternate panel members, at his or her discretion. Under criteria to be established in the Rules for Courts-Martial in Part II of this Report, the convening authority would have initial discretion in panel composition to include selection of a panel of all enlisted members. The proposed criteria also would provide guidance for fulfilling a request by an accused, as under current law, for a panel composed of at least one-third enlisted members or all officers. The Report recognizes unique features of military practice by providing flexibility for a non-capital general court-martial to proceed with not less than six members when it becomes necessary, due to unforeseen circumstances, to excuse a member for good cause during trial.

Learned Counsel in Capital Trials and Appeals. Consistent with federal law and the law applicable to military commissions, this Report proposes amending Article 27 (Detail of trial and defense counsel) and Article 70 (Appellate counsel) to require that, to the greatest extent practicable in capital cases, at least one defense counsel be learned in the law applicable to capital cases.

Reforming Sentencing, Guilty Pleas, and Pretrial Agreements

Sentencing Reforms. The Report proposes replacing the current sentencing system—which relies primarily on maximum punishments and which provides only minimal guidance regarding the adjudication of sentences below the maximum—with a system of judicial discretion guided by parameters and criteria.

- Judicial sentencing. The Report proposes, through an amendment to Article 53 (Court to announce action), that military judges adjudicate the sentence for each non-capital offense, consistent with the practice in federal proceedings and in the vast majority of states that rely on judges rather than juries to adjudicate non-capital sentences. Judicial sentencing would facilitate the use of parameters and criteria to enhance the potential for greater consistency in military sentencing and provide a better balance between individualized sentences and sentence uniformity. It also would facilitate consideration of a broader range of relevant information in the military sentencing process, and consideration of victim-impact statements, including unsworn statements. The judicial sentencing process also would make it easier to employ segmented sentencing, in which any confinement portion of a sentence would be adjudged for each offense, as discussed more fully below. These changes, along with the elimination of instructional issues, have the potential for a considerable reduction in appellate litigation and rehearings in the area of military sentencing.

- Sentencing procedures. The Report proposes to revise court-martial sentencing procedures through amendments to Article 56 (Maximum and minimum limits), by borrowing, with substantial modification, federal civilian practices to enhance the opportunity to achieve consistency, fairness, and justice in the adjudication of military sentences. Although it is not practicable to simply adopt the federal sentencing guidelines due to the many differences in the procedures, offenses, and types of punishments at courts-martial, the proposed sentencing reforms would endeavor to promote greater uniformity and predictability in military sentencing while allowing the military judge to exercise meaningful sentencing discretion in order to ultimately craft an individualized sentence for each offender.

- Replacing unitary sentencing with segmented sentencing. Under current practice, the court-martial adjudges a single sentence for all offenses resulting in a conviction, not a separate punishment for each offense. The proposal would adopt the practice in federal civilian courts and most state courts of adjudging a separate sentence for each offense with respect to confinement and fines. Where appropriate, the military judge would determine a sentence to confinement and a fine for each offense, and when the accused is convicted of multiple offenses, would determine whether terms of confinement should run consecutively or concurrently.

- Replacing broad sentencing authority with sentencing guided by parameters and criteria. Current law authorizes a court-martial to adjudge any punishment, or no punishment at all, subject only to the maximum punishments established under Article 56(a) or by statute, and by any mandatory minimum punishments established by statute. This proposal would replace the current sentencing process with a system based upon published standards developed by a new Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board. The Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board would collect and analyze sentencing data to inform determinations of appropriate parameters and criteria for specific offenses.
    - In general, a sentencing parameter is a boundary on the punishment that may be imposed for an offense, subject to departure for reasons set forth in the trial record. Sentencing criteria are factors that a judge must consider when sentencing a case, but that do not set a boundary on the punishment. The goal is to limit inappropriate disparity within a system that will largely maintain individualized sentencing and judicial discretion in sentencing.
    - The proposal involves discrete use of the sentencing experience developed in the civilian sector while maintaining the distinct characteristics of military sentencing, particularly with respect to unique military offenses and punishments. The military judge would be able to sentence outside the parameters, as may be warranted, with a written explanation on the record subject to review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals for abuse of discretion.
- The implementation of parameters and criteria would draw upon best practices at the federal and state level, and would replace the current practice of adjudging a sentence with little or no guidance. This proposal differs in important respects from the federal civilian guidelines, which are based upon a set of offenses and an offender population that is markedly different from the majority of individuals accused of criminal offenses in the armed forces. Under the proposal, the Chief Trial Judges of the Services would serve as the voting members of the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board. The Board will collect and analyze sentencing data, propose confinement parameters and sentencing criteria for approval by the President, and issue other sentencing policy guidance.
- Implementation in two phases. The development of comprehensive sentencing parameters and criteria will require detailed analysis of sentencing data involving the relationship between specific offenses and the sentence imposed for those sentences. Because the military justice system, unlike the federal civilian system and most state systems, does not currently utilize segmented sentencing (which provides a separate sentence for each offense), it will be necessary to implement sentencing parameters in two phases.
    - In the first phase, the President, with the advice of the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board, will issue interim guidance based upon an analysis of past experience in the military and civilian sectors. The interim guidance will be used by military judges as they apply the new sentencing procedures, included segmented sentencing, in conjunction with the effective date of the legislation (one year after the date of enactment).

- In the second phase, the Military Sentencing Parameters and Criteria Board will conduct a detailed analysis of the data generated by military segmented sentencing. Based upon that analysis, the President will issue comprehensive sentencing parameters and sentencing criteria, which will take effect not later than four years after the enactment of the legislation. Upon implementation, the comprehensive sentencing parameters would replace the mandatory minimum sentences currently set forth in Article 56(b).

Guilty Pleas. This Report makes several proposals regarding military guilty plea practice and procedures.

- Current procedures. The military justice system takes particular care to test the validity of guilty pleas because the facts and the law are not tested in the crucible of the adversarial process. Further, there may be subtle pressures inherent to the military environment that may influence the manner in which servicemembers exercise (and waive) their rights. The providence inquiry and a judge's explanation of possible defenses are established procedures which ensure that servicemembers knowingly and voluntarily admit to all elements of a formal charge. This Report proposes that the military justice system retain many of the procedures currently in effect under Article 45 (Pleas of the accused) to ensure that an accused's guilty plea at a court-martial is knowing and voluntary.

- Proposed changes. The Report proposes several changes to Article 45, including: an amendment to Article 45(b) to permit an accused to plead guilty in capital cases for offenses where death is not a mandatory sentence; and creation of paragraph 45(c), which would align military law with federal civilian law by applying the doctrine of harmless error to variances from Article 45.

Plea Agreements. This Report's proposals with regard to plea agreements align with those that would create sentencing parameters and criteria.

- Create Article 53a. This Report proposes to create a new statute, Article 53a (Plea agreements) that would continue those aspects of current practice in which a plea agreement is viewed as an agreement between the accused and the convening authority but that takes into account proposed sentencing by judge alone and the establishment of sentencing parameters and criteria. The convening authority would be responsible for entering into an agreement that reflects the interests of the government in general and the disciplinary interests of the unit in particular. As noted above with regard to guilty pleas, the military judge would continue to use the providence inquiry in accordance with R.C.M. 910 to ensure that the guilty plea is provident and that all plea agreement terms are lawful. This proposal also would retain present rules governing lawful terms, including the prohibition on requiring waiver of appellate review.

- Military judge's responsibility. Under the proposal, the military judge's responsibility would be to: (1) determine the legality of the plea agreement; (2) adjudge a sentence in accordance with the plea agreement; and, (3) take any other action on the sentence (e.g., make a recommendation on suspension) that is authorized under the rules. The military judge would review the entire agreement, including any negotiated sentence agreement, prior to determining whether to accept the agreement and adjudge the sentence. If the agreement contains a negotiated sentencing range, the military judge would enter a sentence within that range unless the judge determines that the negotiated sentencing range is plainly unreasonable or otherwise unlawful.

Streamlining the Post-Trial Process

This Report proposes to simplify post-trial processing of courts-martial in accordance with changes enacted in the NDAA FY 2014. The amendments to Article 60(Action by convening authority) enacted as part of the NDAA FY 2014 significantly restricted the convening authority's discretion to change the findings and sentence of a court-martial. The proposals in this Report reflect those restrictions by eliminating all redundant or unnecessary paperwork in cases where the recent legislation has removed the convening authority's post-trial discretion. In all general and special courts-martial, the military judge would make an "entry of judgment" incorporating the results of the court-martial and any actions taken by the convening authority within the limited scope permitted by the recent legislation. The proposed legislation also would provide a restricted authority to suspend sentences, which would be in addition to the authority under present law to include suspension as a term in a pretrial agreement. The new authority would be limited to cases where the military judge recommends suspension and the convening authority acts within the scope of the military judge's recommendation. The proposed changes in post-trial processing are set forth in Articles 60 through 60c.

Modernizing Military Appellate Practice

The current appellate process involves: (1) automatic review for matters of fact and law, as well as sentence appropriateness, by the service Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66 for those cases with a sentence to confinement for one year or more or a punitive discharge; (2) discretionary review of matters of law for good cause by the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces under Article 67; (3) access to the Supreme Court for only those cases the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces reviews under Article 67a. All other general courts-martial (except those where review is waived or withdrawn) receive a limited review by the Office of The Judge Advocate General under Article 69. All other special and summary courts-martial receive limited review by a judge advocate under Article 64. The government is entitled to interlocutory appeals in limited circumstances under Article 62.

The current appellate review process reflects the historical legacy of routine post-trial examination of cases in which lay officers acted as counsel, judge, and jury. Under the UCMJ, the military justice system has established a formal system of appellate review, involving judicial consideration of trials presided over by qualified judges involving parties represented by qualified counsel. The development of a trial and appellate system with attorneys and judges has made it possible to adapt selected features of the federal appellate system for use in the military justice system.

This Report's proposals would modernize military appellate practice through amendments to Articles 56 (Sentencing), 62 (Appeal by the United States), 64 (Review by a judge advocate), 65 (Disposition of records), 66 (Review by Court of Criminal Appeals), 67 (Review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces), 69 (Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General), and 73 (Petition for a new trial). In general, the proposals would:

- Permit the government to file interlocutory appeals in general and special courts-martial regardless of whether a punitive discharge may be adjudged (through amendment to Article 62).
- Clarify that the government may file an interlocutory appeal where the military judge enters a finding of not guilty following the return of a finding of guilty by members (through amendment to Article 62).
- Require appellate defense counsel to review the record of trial and provide the accused with advice regarding the filing of an appeal in all cases in which an accused is sentenced to confinement for more than six months, a punitive discharge, or in which the government has previously filed an interlocutory appeal (through amendment to Article 65).
- Revise the jurisdiction of the service Courts of Criminal Appeals to include all cases in which the accused files an appeal and in which an accused is sentenced to confinement for more than six months, a punitive discharge, or in which the government had filed an interlocutory appeal (through amendment to Article 66).
- Enhance the ability for all other appellants to have their cases reviewed by the service Courts of Criminal Appeals (through amendments to Articles 64, 65, 66, and 69).
- Transform the automatic appeal of non-capital cases to the service Courts of Criminal Appeals to an appeal of right and eliminate the requirement for the service Courts of Criminal Appeals to review the record of trial in non-capital cases where the appellant has not filed an appeal raising issues for the court's review (through amendment to Article 66).
- Provide for factual sufficiency review only when appellant raises the issue for the court's review and makes an appropriate showing that the court should dismiss the findings (through amendment to Article 66).
- Hear appeals as to sentence brought by either an appellant or, in appropriate circumstances, the government (through amendment to Articles 56 and 66).

- Require appropriate notification to the other Judge Advocates General prior to certification by a Judge Advocate General of an issue for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (through amendment to Article 67).
- Expand the time limit for filing a petition for new trial from two to three years, consistent with practice in federal civilian courts (through amendments to Articles 69 and 73).
- Continue to require automatic review of capital cases and require, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one defense counsel who is learned in the law applicable to capital cases (through an amendment to Article 70).
- Establish harmless error standard of appellate review in guilty plea cases (through an amendment to Article 45).

Increasing Transparency and Independent Review of the Military Justice System

This Report makes two proposals that would increase transparency and require periodic independent review of the military justice system. Both would enhance the confidence of members of the armed forces and the public in military law and the operation of the military justice system.

Public Access. This proposal would establish a new statute, Article 140a (Case management; data collection and accessibility), that would require the Secretary of Defense to develop uniform case management standards and criteria that also would allow public access to court-martial dockets, pleadings, and records in a manner similar to that available in the federal civilian courts. This proposal envisions implementation across the services to ensure ease of access and management of data. In addition to the criticism made by the Response Systems Panel regarding the difficulty in gathering and analyzing military justice data, the Judicial Proceedings Panel recently recommended that DoD adopt an electronic system similar to that utilized by federal courts to ensure Special Victims' Counsel and victims have appropriate access to docketing information and case filings.

The Military Justice Review Panel. This proposal would enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of the UCMJ by amending Article 146 (Code committee) to establish a blue ribbon panel—the Military Justice Review Panel—composed of experts in military law and civilian criminal law, to conduct periodic reviews of the military justice system.

The Panel would issue its first report four years after the effective date of the legislation, focusing on the implementation of the new legislation. Eight years after the effective date of the legislation, the Panel would issue its first comprehensive review of the UCMJ and Manual for Courts-Martial. Thereafter, the Panel would issue comprehensive reports every eight years. Within each eight-year cycle the Panel would issue targeted reports at the mid-point of each cycle, and could issue additional reports on matters referred to the Panel by the Secretary of Defense or Congress.

The proposal is based on the concept that periodic review needs to be scheduled on a regular basis, but that it should not be so frequent that the constant process of review and change becomes more disruptive than helpful to judges and lawyers who must have a degree of stability in order to engage in effective practice. Accordingly, the comprehensive reviews are scheduled to occur every eight years.

The proposal also relies on the expectation that the Joint Service Committee will continue to conduct its vital role within the executive branch addressing the type of targeted adjustments in law and regulation that are required on a more frequent basis to address specific issues in the law.

Improving the Functionality of the Punitive Articles and Proscribing Additional Criminal Acts

Finally, this Report proposes amendments to the punitive articles, those provisions of the UCMJ (Articles 77-134) that describe prohibited criminal acts, as follows:

Restructuring the Punitive Articles. This Report proposes migrating most of the prohibited conduct addressed by the President in the Manual for Courts-Martial under Article 134 (General article) into new statutory articles or existing enumerated statutory articles that proscribe related criminal conduct. In addition, the Report proposes a statutory clarification that would provide extraterritorial jurisdiction over all offenses otherwise covered by clause 3 of Article 134 (i.e., Title 18 offenses that currently must be prosecuted under other clauses of Article 134 when the underlying civilian offense does not have extraterritorial application).

Lesser Included Offenses. This Report proposes to provide notice of lesser included offenses, by establishing statutory authorization in Article 79 (Conviction of lesserincluded offense) for the President to designate a reasonably included offense as a lesser included offense.

Statute of Limitations. This Report proposes amending Article 43 (Statute of limitations) to adopt the federal civilian approach to child-abuse offenses (10 years when the victim is no longer alive); revising the period for fraudulent enlistment to cover the length of the enlistment or 5 years, whichever is longer; and extending the period when DNA testing implicates an identified person. This report also proposes to make the amendments apply to the prosecution of any offense committed before, on, or after the date the statute is enacted if the applicable limitation period has not yet expired.

Article 120 (Rape and sexual assault generally). This Report proposes aligning the definition of "sexual act" in military law with federal civilian law. The congressionally-chartered Judicial Proceedings Panel, which is giving extensive consideration to whether further changes to Article 120 are warranted, has recommended, and the Secretary of Defense has established a subcommittee of distinguished criminal law experts to examine Article 120. Pending the outcome of that review, this Report does not recommend further changes beyond the conforming changes needed to align Article 120 to the parallel provisions in federal civilian criminal proceedings.

Article 128 (Assault). The Report proposes aligning the definition of assault with federal civilian law, which would permit greater flexibility to address assaults involving domestic violence as an aggravating factor.

Article 130 (Stalking). This proposal would expand the current Article 120a to include cyberstalking.[38] The proposal also would update current law to address threats to intimate partners.

New Offenses Proposed:

- Article 93a (Prohibited activities with military recruit or trainee by person in position of special trust). This proposal would create a new statute that identifies persons (such as recruiters and drill sergeants) for whom sexual activity with other identified individuals (such as recruiting prospects or trainees) would be strictly prohibited without requiring additional proof of coercion or abuse. This would not preempt the services' authority to issue regulations under Article 92 (Failure to obey order or regulation) addressing matters such as fraternization that involve non-sexual as well as sexual conduct, nor would it preempt charges for rape or sexual assault under Article 120 that are based upon abuse of one's position in the chain of command to gain access to or coerce another person.[39]

- Article 121a (Fraudulent use of credit cards, debit cards, and other access devices). This proposal would create a new statute that would specifically criminalize unauthorized use of another's credit or debit card.

- Article 123 (Offenses concerning Government computers). This proposed new offense would criminalize accessing a government computer with an unauthorized purpose and is based on an analogous federal statute (18 U.S.C. §1030 (Fraud and related activity in connection with computers)). The proposed article is targeted to meet military needs and it applies only to persons subject to the code and is directed only at United States government computers.

- Article 132 (Retaliation). This proposed new article would prohibit retaliation against victims and witnesses of crime. The offense would define retaliation as when a person, with the intent to retaliate against any person for reporting or planning to report an offense, or with the intent to discourage any person from reporting an offense, wrongfully takes or threatens to take an adverse personnel action against the person, or wrongfully withholds or threatens to withhold a favorable personnel action with respect to the person.

[38] The current offense within Article 130 (Housebreaking) would be codified within Article 129 (Burglary).

[39] The Judicial Proceedings Panel is examining whether the definitions of rape and sexual assault in Article 120 should be amended to expressly cover a situation in which a person subject to the UCMJ commits a sexual act upon another person by abusing one's position in the chain of command of the other person to gain access to or coerce the other person. See NDAA FY 2014 at § 1731(b)(1)(A). The proposal to create a new Article 93a addresses a related but different matter.

Conclusion

The current military justice debates provide an opportunity to consider changes that would enhance the vital role of the UCMJ in strengthening our national security. The Military Justice Review Group respectfully submits these recommendations for appropriate consideration.

Legislative Report

Section A. Background

The recommendations in this Report draw upon the history of American military justice and the specific responsibilities assigned to the Military Justice Review Group. Part 1 of this background section summarizes the structural development of the military justice system. Part 2 discusses the establishment and role of the Military Justice Review Group.

Part 1. Historical Perspective: Summary of Structural Changes in the Military Justice System

For purposes of providing background regarding the recommendations in this Report, this section provides a brief historical perspective highlighting major developments in the structure of military justice in terms of three historical phases.[1]

- The first phase (1775-1912), which established the structural foundation, began in the period leading up to the Declaration of Independence, and continued to the pre-World War I years in the 20th Century. In many significant respects, the court-martial process in 1912 closely resembled the structure of courts-martial at the time of the Revolutionary War.

- The second phase (1913-1941) introduced the first significant structural reforms. This phase began on the eve of World War I, and continued through the post-war debates about the administration of justice, the enactment of amendments that emerged from that debate, and the subsequent implementation of those amendments.

- The third phase (1941-present) began with a major national debate about the purposes and practices of military justice growing out of World War II experience. The third phase produced major structural changes, including enactment of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, implementation of the new legislation under the 1951 Manual for Courts-Martial, and subsequent periodic revisions to the Code and the Manual.

I. The First Phase: Foundation (1775 to 1912)

Prior to the Revolutionary War, Americans became familiar with courts-martial over the course of fighting four colonial wars with the British against the French. American colonists

[1] The modern military justice system was derived primarily from the Articles of War used by the Army. The other Services had their own disciplinary systems with many similarities to the Articles of War. The Navy was governed by Articles for the Government of the Navy. The Coast Guard followed Regulations for the U.S. Revenue-Cutter Service, as it was first known. The Marine Corps was subject to the Navy articles, except when detached for service with the Army by order of the President.

fighting with the British Army in those conflicts were subject to trial by courts-martial under the British Articles of War.[2] America's future Commander in Chief—George Washington—presided over at least one British general court-martial while serving as a colonel in the First Virginia Regiment.[3]

In the year leading up to the Declaration of Independence, the Continental Congress focused on the steps necessary to secure liberty and prepare for armed conflict. After the Battles of Lexington and Concord on April 19, 1775, the Continental Congress organized the colonial fighters and militia converging on Boston into a unified military force—the Continental Army—with George Washington as its Commander in Chief. Shortly thereafter, the Continental Congress enacted the American Articles of War to govern the newly created army.[4] The articles required members of the Continental Army to take an oath of allegiance, prescribed the duties of soldiers and officers, listed punishable offenses, and authorized punishments and modes of trial by courts-martial. Over the next few months, General Washington determined that the list of crimes and related punishments in the American Articles of War were insufficient to meet the needs of the Continental Army, and he asked Congress to add more capital offenses and increase the authorized punishment in several articles.[5] Congress made the requested changes.[6]

The Provisional Congress of Massachusetts Bay had enacted its own modified version of British Articles of War for the government of its militia. Gerald F. Crump, Part I: A History of the Structure of Military Justice in the United States, 1775-1920, 16 A.F. L. REV. 41, 42-44 (1974). The American and the Massachusetts versions differed from the British version in that, except for the three capital offenses, they limited the types of punishment that could be imposed. Id. In non-capital cases, the maximum allowable punishments were a dismissal or discharge out of the Army, whipping not exceeding thirty-nine lashes, a fine of up to two months of pay, and imprisonment for one month. See AW 51 of 1775.

By taking an active role in revising the articles, the Continental Congress underscored the responsibility of the civilian legislature in establishing the basic rules of military justice, as expressly established in the Constitution. See U.S. CONST. art I, § 8, cl. 14 (setting forth the power of Congress "to make rules for the Government and Regulations of the land and naval Forces").

[6] Additional Articles, enacted November 7, 1775, reprinted in WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 959. On November 28, 1775, Congress also adopted Rules for the Regulation of the Navy of the United Colonies of North America. These rules, according to John Adams, were based on the British Regulations and Instructions Relating to His Majesty's Service at Sea, published in 1772. In response to Washington's concerns about the state of discipline, a committee led by John Adams recommended a new and enlarged version of the articles, modeled more closely on the original British articles.[7] Acting on the committee's recommendations, Congress enacted a new version of the American articles in 1776.[8]

Through the balance of the 18th and 19th Centuries, as America obtained its independence, adopted the Constitution, and engaged in a variety of military conflicts of varying size, duration, and location, the basic structural components of the 1776 Articles remained in place.[9] The following describes the primary features of military justice during this foundational period.

A. Purpose of Military Justice during the foundational period

The military justice system was designed to instill good order and discipline by punishing neglects, disorders, and other offenses. Most offenses listed in the Articles of War were unique to the military and had no counterpart in civilian criminal codes.

Military-specific offenses punishable by court-martial included desertion,[10] absence without leave,[11] contemptuous or disrespectful words against the President or the [9] For much of this era, the United States maintained relatively small land and naval forces, with substantial increases occurring during conflicts such as the War of 1812, the Mexican-American War, the Civil War, and the Spanish American War (followed by the conflict in the Philippine-American War). Crump, supra note 4, at 45-54 (noting that court-martial practice was stable and military law had remained almost unchanged for 135 years). Congress revised the Articles of War in 1786, 1806, and 1874. See WINTHROP, supra note 2, at appendices 11-13; see also Frederick Bernays Wiener, Courts-Martial and the Bill of Rights: The Original Practice I, 72 HARV. [10] AW, § 6, art. 1 of 1776; AW 48 of 1874. In the Revolutionary War, the most common offense tried by court-martial was desertion. One survey of available records from this period showed that nearly 44 percent of courts-martial (1,162 of 2,666 cases) were trials for desertion. JAMES C. Congress,[12] contempt or disrespect towards the commander,[13] mutiny and sedition,[14] striking a superior officer or failing to obey a lawful command,[15] misbehavior before the enemy,[16] being drunk on duty,[17] and sleeping on post.[18] The court-martial also had the power to punish all other non-capital crimes not mentioned in the Articles of War that affected good order and discipline.[19] Except for desertion or some other impediment in which the accused was not amenable to justice, the Articles of War imposed a two-year statute of limitations on all crimes punishable by court-martial.[20]

In peacetime, capital crimes such as murder and rape could only be prosecuted in civilian court.[21] The Articles of War required the commanding officer, upon request of the injured party or parties, "to use his utmost endeavors" to deliver soldiers accused of committing crimes "punishable by the known laws of the land" to the civil magistrate for trial.[22] A commanding officer who failed to deliver the soldier to the civil magistrate was himself liable to be tried by court-martial and cashiered out of the service for this failure.[23] The Articles of War thus expressed a preference in peacetime for trying common law crimes in civilian courts.[24]

[24] The British Articles of War also imposed a duty on the commanding officer to deliver any officer or soldier accused of a capital crime or of using violence against civilians to the civil magistrate for trial. British AW, §

Because the military justice system was different from the common law system, Congress required that everyone joining the military must have the Articles of War read to them by the person enlisting them, or by their commanding officer, before taking their oath of military service.[25] Thereafter, the articles were to be read and published in every garrison, regiment, troop, or company every two months to remind all officers and soldiers of their duty to observe and follow them.[26]

B. Investigation and charging during the foundational period

Any person, civilian or military, could complain about a soldier to any commissioned officer. The officer then signed formal charges to initiate the court-martial process.[27] This legal act of a commissioned officer signing formal charges against an accused was called a "preferral" of charges. The preferred charges were then forwarded to the accused's commanding officer for his approval, accompanied by a request or recommendation that the charges, if approved, be "referred" to trial by court-martial.[28] If the commanding officer found it more appropriate for a charge to be disposed of without trial, the charges were not preferred at all; or, if charges were preferred, the commanding officer dismissed them.

As soon as a commissioned officer preferred formal charges, the accused was placed under arrest and confined until tried by court-martial.[29] Although the arrest could legally be made by any commissioned officer, it was ordinarily made by the accused's immediate commanding officer.[30] The accused was also relieved of all military duties while under arrest. The Articles of War limited the period of arrest to eight days, or until the trial could be held, whichever came first.[31]

There was no formal requirement for a preliminary investigation under the Articles of War before preferring charges and forwarding them to the appropriate commanding officer.

11, art. 1 of 1765. This provision explains why the British soldiers accused of murder and defended by John Adams for their role in the Boston Massacre were tried in civilian court.

[25] AW, § 3, art. 1 of 1776; AW 10 of 1806; AW 2 of 1874. It was important for a soldier to learn about the Articles of War, because the soldier was now subject to a legal system distinct from the civilian system. The articles contained many offenses unique to the military, and ignorance of the law was not a defense to a violation of the articles.

[26] AW, § 18, art. 1 of 1776; AW 101 of 1806; AW 128 of 1874 (articles were to be read and published every six months). However, prior to preferral, the normal practice was that the charges should be supported by prima facie evidence or by a proper preliminary investigation before preferral.[32] Otherwise, an unsupported charge would result in the initial arrest and confinement of an innocent person as well as the needless waste of time at the trial, if the unsupported charge went to trial. It was a neglect of duty to bring frivolous or malicious charges, and such neglect often resulted in censure or severe punishment.[33]

After the charges were preferred and the accused arrested, a judge advocate served the accused with a copy of the formal charges[34] and forwarded them, along with a recommendation as to the disposition of the charges, to the commanding officer.[35]

C. Convening the court-martial during the foundational period

After receiving a copy of the formal charges, the commanding officer had complete discretion regarding whether to try the charges by court-martial and the type of court-martial that should hear the charges.[36] To convene a court-martial, the commanding officer published an order announcing the place and time of trial, the name of the person or persons to be tried, and the appointment of all court-martial personnel, which included the persons to serve as court members (judge and jury) and as the judge advocate (prosecutor). As discussed below, the number of personnel required to serve as members of the panel depended on the type of court-martial selected.

The commanding officer could elect between two types of court-martial: the general court-martial and several inferior courts-martial. The main distinctions between the two types of [35] During the Revolutionary War, some officers brought charges against fellow officers to revenge slights and insults. NEAGLES, supra note 10, at 29. Others requested trial by a court-martial as a means to vindicate their honor and to clear themselves of wrongdoing. THE ARMY LAWYER, supra note 5, at 15. General Charles Lee, for example, demanded a court-martial after General George Washington reprimanded him for disobeying orders and making an unnecessary retreat at the Battle of Monmouth. General Lee was found guilty.

In 1786, Congress created the court of inquiry to prevent the misuse of courts-martial as an outlet for the jealousies and animosities that sometimes permeated the officer corps. The court of inquiry provided the means by which an impartial body could look "into the nature of any transaction of, or accusation or imputation against, any officer or soldier." EDWARD M. COFFMAN , THE OLD ARMY: A PORTRAIT OF THE AMERICAN ARMY IN PEACETIME, 1784-1898 32 (1986). A court of inquiry had three members whose duty it was to examine the allegations and to pronounce a conclusion on the facts. The Navy also had courts of inquiry. 1862 ROCKS AND SHOALS, supra note 26, at arts. 23-24. Because courts of inquiry could be also abused—or, according to the 1874 Articles of War, ". . . perverted to dishonorable purposes, and . . . employed, in the hands of weak and envious commandants, as engines for the destruction of military merit"—the Articles prohibited commanding officers from ordering them "except upon demand by the officer or soldier whose conduct is to be inquired of." courts were the number of commissioned officers appointed as members and the maximum punishment the court-martial could impose.

1. General Court-Martial

The general court-martial was the only court-martial that could adjudge a sentence imposing the maximum punishment authorized under the Articles of War, and it was the only forum empowered to try officers. It was also the only court-martial in which the commanding officer was required to appoint a judge advocate.[37]

The commanding officer appointed between five and thirteen commissioned officers to serve as members of the general court-martial. Although the Articles of War required the commanding officer to appoint thirteen officers "where that number can be convened without manifest injury to the service," after the Revolutionary War, the Articles were amended to require the appointment of at least five members.[38] The actual number appointed was solely within the discretion of the commanding officer.[39] The general court-martial could adjudge a sentence containing any punishment authorized under the Articles of War for the offenses charged, to include the death penalty.[40] Other authorized punishments included imprisonment, fines or forfeiture of pay, and dismissal from the military.[41] The Articles of War typically authorized the general court-martial to sentence

[38] AW 64 of 1806. During the Revolutionary War, the general court-martial had at least 13 commissioned officers as its members. AW, § 14, art. 1 of 1776. After the War, the Army was disbanded, leaving a total of about 80 persons in the entire Army, scattered across the country to guard munition depots, which made it difficult for any commander to convene a court-martial with 13 officers on the panel. In 1786, Congress reduced the minimum number of officers needed to five, while stating a preference for 13, if they could be assembled "without manifest injury to the service." AW 1 of 1786. Since 1786 when the Army almost did not exist, Congress has kept the minimum number at five members, except for the trial of capital offenses, where there must be 12 members before a death sentence can be imposed. AW 5 of 1920 (eliminating the five-to-thirteen officer requirement and simply requiring that the number of officers cannot be "less than five"). But see the current version of Article 25(a) (requiring at least 12 members in capital cases if they are "reasonably available"). The Navy general court-martial also consisted of between five and 13 commissioned officers. 1862 ROCKS AND SHOALS, supra note 26, at art. 11. The 1775 Navy rules required at least six commissioned officers, three Captains and three lieutenants, and the eldest captain presided. 1775 RULES OF THE NAVY, supra note 8, at art. 39. The U.S. Revenue-Cutter Service (the predecessor service to the modern Coast Guard) had two courts. The general court—convened only at the direction of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury—was also composed of no less than three commissioned officers. the accused "according to the nature of the offense,"[42] or "in the discretion of the court-martial."[43] In addition to the better known punishments, others included flogging, ear cropping, being marked with indelible ink, confinement in dark holes, dunking in water, and forced labor with a ball and chain.[44] The findings and sentence of a court-martial were not complete or final, and could not be executed, until they were approved by the commanding officer who convened the court-martial.[45]

2. Inferior Courts-Martial

During various periods of time in the foundational phase, a number of different types of inferior courts-martial were available to commanding officers—the regimental court-martial, the garrison court-martial, the field-officer court, and the summary court. All inferior courts-martial typically involved the same maximum punishment: a fine of one month's pay, imprisonment for one month, and hard labor for one month.[46]

AW 98 of 1874 ("No person in the military service shall be punished by flogging, or by branding, marking, or tattooing on the body.").

[45] See Part VI, "Commanding Officer Review," infra.

[46] The regimental court-martial (convened by a regimental commander) and the garrison court-martial (convened by a garrison commander) were identical in structure. Both were used solely to try enlisted soldiers for non-capital offenses with the limited punishment described above. AW 83 of 1874. Corporeal punishment was also often part of the sentence. Both courts required the commanding officer to detail at least three court members, but there was no requirement to appoint a judge advocate. AW 82 of 1874. The regimental and garrison courts-martial used the same procedures as the general courts-martial. The adjudged sentence was executed only after being approved by the commanding officer who convened the court-martial. AW 109 of 1874.

The field-officer court was first created in 1862 for use in the Civil War, and was later incorporated into the 1874 Articles of War. The field-officer court, when available, replaced the regimental and garrison courts-martial. AW 83 of 1874. Like the regimental and garrison courts-martial, the field-officer court could only try enlisted soldiers for non-capital offenses. AW 80 of 1874. The field-officer court consisted of a field grade officer (a major, lieutenant colonel, or colonel) who the commanding officer (normally the regimental commander) detailed to sit alone as a single court member. WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 491. No judge advocate was detailed. The maximum punishment the field-officer court could impose on a soldier was the same as the maximum permitted for the regimental and garrison courts-martial. The sentence of a field-officer court was executable only after approval by a senior commanding officer, normally the brigade or post commander. AW 110 of 1874.

The summary court was created in 1890 to replace the regimental and garrison courts-martial. The summary court consisted of a single court member, usually the commissioned officer who was second in command. The summary court was held within 24 hours of the accused's arrest, and, unlike the other inferior courts-martial, the accused had a right to object to this proceeding and could demand a general court-martial. The maximum sentence a summary court could adjudge was the same as the other inferior courts-martial. AW 83 of 1874. The sentence was executed after being approved by the commanding officer convening the court.

D. Trial Procedure during the foundational period

1. Selection of Court Members

The commanding officer authorized to convene the court-martial selected its members from the officer corps. The commander had broad authority in the selection of members, subject to the requirement that members not be of a rank inferior to the accused "if it can be avoided."[47] If the accused challenged any court member for cause, the other court members voted to decide whether the challenge had any merit.[48] Court members could be removed, even during trial, as long as the number did not fall below the minimum required. When a member of the militia faced trial by court-martial, militia officers of the same provincial corps as the offender had to compose the entire panel.[49]

2. The Court President

The senior member of the court-martial was its president, or presiding officer.[50] The court president, however, was not a judge nor was he required to have formal training in the law. He was a regular officer like the other detailed members. He presided over the court-martial by opening the court, calling it to order, and announcing its adjournment when the court-martial voted to adjourn.[51] The president was also the channel of communication with the commanding officer responsible for convening the court-martial.[52] The court-

In 1909, Congress created for the Navy the "deck court," which was similar to the Army's summary court. Pasley & Larkin, supra note 6, at 198 n.14 (citing 35 Stat. 621 (1909) and 39 Stat. 586 (1916)). The "deck court" was a single officer appointed to try enlisted men for minor offenses. U.S. Department of the Navy, NAVAL COURTS AND BOARDS B-66 (2d ed. 1945) [hereinafter NAVAL COURTS AND BOARDS] at B-66. The maximum punishment that could be adjudged was confinement and forfeiture of pay for 20 days; the sentence was executed after it was approved by convening authority. The U.S. Revenue Cutter Service had only two courts, the minor court and the general court. REGULATIONS FOR THE U.S. REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE, art. 1107 (1907). Punishments for officers included dismissal, suspension, forfeitures, imprisonment for two years, reduction in rank and reprimand. Id. at art. 1171. Punishment for enlisted members included dishonorable discharge; forfeitures; confinement for one year; confinement in irons, on bread and water, for 30 days; reduction in rank, deprivation of liberty for three months; and extra duties. Id. The Revenue Cutter Service and the Lifesaving Service merged to form the Coast Guard in 1915. The newly formed Coast Guard initially maintained the original two courts, but later added the deck court, with similar punishments as the Navy. COAST GUARD COURTS AND BOARDS, arts. 41-49 (1923).

martial president acted for and in the name of the court-martial, but was in every other way an equal of the other court members.

3. The Court Members as judge and jury

Some of the members' powers were comparable to those of a judge, and others were comparable to those of a jury.[53] No judge presided over the court to instruct the members on the law, and there were few rules of procedure and evidence.[54] The members were responsible for determining both the law and the facts. The court members took an oath in which they swore "to duly administer justice" according to the Articles of War, but "if any doubt should arise" in which the Articles did not adequately explain the law, then they should decide the case "according to your conscience, the best of your understanding, and the custom of war in like cases."[55]

4. The Judge Advocate

The Articles of War required the commanding officer to detail a judge advocate to every general court-martial. A judge advocate, when detailed, could advise the members of the court. The judge advocate, however, was not necessarily a lawyer, and the court members were not required to follow his advice.[56] The judge advocate did not have to be a commissioned officer or even a member of the military.[57] The American legal profession at

No oath was prescribed for the field-officer court. WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 492. The absence of anyone with legal training at a court-martial was not necessarily that different from civilian practice during that era, depending on the location. Many common law judges of the post-Colonial period were also untrained in the law and there were few legal reports available. THE ARMY LAWYER, supra note 5, at 11; G. Edward White, The Path of American Jurisprudence, 124 U. PENN. L. REV. 1212, 1214 (1976). High-level judgeships were often held by non-lawyers throughout the eighteenth century. An untrained judge is reported to have told a jury "to do justice between the parties, not by any quirks of the law out of Coke or Blackstone—books that I never read and never will—but by common sense as between man and man." Id. at 1213 n.5 (footnote omitted).

[56] In common law courts, even when instructed on the law by judges, the jury decided the law and the facts, sometimes ignoring judicial instructions and "finding the law" themselves. Juries had wide latitude to decide the law, especially the colonial jury, which had a more active role and was a stronger institution. Id. at 129. Naval court members were also free to disregard the advice of the judge advocate. See NAVAL COURTS AND BOARDS, supra note 46, at § 400.

[57] WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 183-84 (citing instances where enlisted and civilians were known to act as judge advocate). The Navy had never placed a high premium on lawyers in uniform. As late as World War I, the that time was not fully developed, and lacked a formal structure for education, achievement, and specialization.[58] The judge advocate had three legal duties to perform under the Articles of War: to prosecute the case in the name of the United States;[59] to administer the oath of office to the court members;[60] and to protect the interests of the accused in limited ways.[61]

The judge advocate represented the public interest and thus had a duty to do justice, not merely to convict.[62] Accordingly, he was expected to call all witnesses with knowledge of the alleged offense and not solely those witnesses whose testimony was favorable to the prosecution.[63] Moreover, the judge advocate owed two duties to the accused: to object to any leading question posed to any of the witnesses, and to object to any question asked of the accused which might elicit an incriminating answer.[64]

While having in mind his duties as prosecutor, he was to advise the accused against advancing anything that would tend to incriminate him or prejudice his case. Id. Furthermore, he was to see that no illegal evidence was brought against the accused and was to assist him in presenting to the court a defense, including evidence in extenuation or mitigation as well as evidence of previous good conduct and character. Id. The U.S. Revenue Cutter Service rules for courts required that "[a] commissioned officer, cadet (if serving on a cruising vessel), warrant officer, or petty officer may be permitted to appear as counsel for the accused at the request of the latter." Practice under the early Articles of War generally preluded participation by defense counsel at trial.[65] These restrictions were relaxed over time, and by the late 19th Century had become obsolete.[66] As in civilian life at that time, and well into the 20th Century, the right of an accused to representation by counsel was limited to those who could afford an attorney.[67]

6. Presentation of the case

The trial proceedings, which were open to the public, could be held only between the hours of eight in the morning and three in the afternoon.[68] The prescribed hours were intended [65] Until the late 19th Century, the accused had no right to counsel, and defense counsel were not allowed to participate in courts-martial. WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 166. The proceedings of some courts-martial had been disapproved solely because a defense counsel had participated at trial. THE ARMY LAWYER, supra note 5, at 29. General William Hull claimed legal error in his court-martial because he had been denied his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, but the denial was approved by no less an authority than the father of the Bill of Rights himself, President James Madison. Frederick Bernays Wiener, Courts-Martial and the Bill of Rights: The Original Practice II, 72 HARV. L. REV. 266, 284 (1958).

Here the court-martial was no different than the English common law where no accused felon had counsel. J. M. Beattie, Scales of Justice: Defense Counsel and the English Criminal Trial in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, 9 LAW AND HIST. REV. NO. 2, 221 (1991). Blackstone wrote in 1765, "It is a settled rule at common law, that no counsel shall be allowed a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue, in any capital crime, unless some point of law shall arise proper to be debated." WILLIAM S. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, vol. IV, at 355 (1765). In Great Britain, it was not until 1836 that Parliament granted accused felons the right to counsel. Beattie, supra, at 222 (discussing the Prisoner's Counsel Act of 1836); Wiener, supra note 9, at 4 (discussing the same). But the American colonies were ahead of the English common law. By 1791, seven states had guaranteed the right to counsel in their constitutions and two others made them available by statute or practice. Id. at 4-5.

The judge advocate serving as prosecutor had a duty to protect the rights of the accused. At common law, the judge looked after the defendant's interests in the absence of counsel. Blackstone declared, "[T]he judge shall be counsel for the prisoner; that is, shall see that the proceedings against him are legal and strictly regular." BLACKSTONE, supra, at 355. Judges often conducted cross-examinations for prisoners and saw no reason to insist on defendants doing this for themselves. Beattie, supra, at 233.

[66] In due time, the prohibition against defense counsel was relaxed so as to permit counsel to sit with the accused at trial, but not to speak in open court, such as by questioning witnesses, making objections, arguing motions, or presenting opening statements or closing arguments. Later, the prohibition against counsel's participation was further relaxed by degrees, until it became almost obsolete by 1895. Winthrop characterized the rule prohibiting the participation of defense counsel in courts-martial as "embarrassing, if not indeed humiliating." WINTHROP, supra note 2, at 166-67. By 1895, the rule was mostly either ignored or relaxed, as defense counsel were frequently permitted to participate in courts-martial without objection by the court members, except in the rarest of cases.

[67] The Supreme Court did not apply the Sixth Amendment right to counsel to the states through the 14th Amendment until 1932 in capital cases, until 1963 in felony cases, and until 1972 for imprisonable misdemeanors. See Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 85 (1932); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 375 (1963); Argesinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972).

The Articles of War permitted the trial to go beyond these prescribed hours when the nature of the case, "in the opinion of the officer appointing the court, require[d] immediate example." Id. By contrast, a naval court-martial could be held at any hour of the day, but was not supposed to be held at unusual hours or for an unusually to keep the trial from becoming too protracted or onerous for others to attend, and also afforded the judge advocate an opportunity to compile the daily report of the proceedings.[69]

Ordinarily, neither side made an opening statement, except in complicated cases.[70] Witnesses took an oath to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God."[71] The judge advocate conducted the direct examination, the accused conducted cross-examination, and the court members then asked any questions they had. Witnesses were not permitted to listen to the testimony of other witnesses, except for experts and victims who had already testified.[72] The victim of an offense—also known as the prosecuting witness—was allowed to remain in court after testifying to enable the judge advocate to confer with the prosecuting witness during trial. The prosecuting witness's counsel, if any, was also allowed to sit with the prosecuting witness, but took no active part in the proceedings.[73]

The court members conducted all of their business, to include evidentiary and procedural rulings, by majority vote.[74] Like common law courts, the court members by majority vote were authorized to punish refusals by witnesses to testify, contempt of court, and other disturbances.[75] In non-capital cases, the court members also considered evidence in the form of depositions.[76]

Although the court members were supposed to follow the rules of evidence as recognized by the criminal courts of the country, in practice they took a more liberal course in regard to the admission of testimony and the examination of witnesses, and considered whatever evidence they determined was relevant and reliable.[77] The members often asked the judge advocate to produce other witnesses or evidence as needed.[78] Evidence of the accused's good general character was always admissible as a defense as well as in mitigation.[79] When it came time for closing arguments, the accused spoke first, and the judge advocate spoke last.[80] Although the Articles of War were silent as to the burden of proof, the practice was for the prosecution to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.[81]

7. Deliberation and Voting

The judge advocate joined the court members during deliberation as a non-voting member to provide advice, and to call attention to formal errors regarding the preparation of the verdict.[82] Because the judge advocate was with the court members when they deliberated and voted, the judge advocate took an oath not to discover or to disclose the vote or opinion of any court member, unless required to do so in due course of law.[83]

The court members arrived at their findings and sentence by majority vote,[84] except that a death sentence required a two-thirds vote.[85] The court members cast their votes beginning with the most junior in rank.[86] This procedure was meant to prevent the more senior ranking persons from unduly influencing the vote of the junior ranking officers.[87] In addition, court members—individually or with other court members—could recommend clemency to the commanding officer who convened the court-martial.[88]

The court-martial arrived at a single sentence covering all charges upon which the accused was found guilty, without regard to any differences among the offenses as to the maximum authorized punishment.[89] The commanding officer who convened the court had to approve the findings and sentence before they could be announced. The court members were required by oath not to divulge the sentence of the court until it was approved and published by the proper authority.[90]

E. Review of Courts-Martial during the foundational period

1. Commanding Officer Review

During the foundational era, the primary responsibility for review rested with the commander who convened the court-martial. The sentence or acquittal by a court-martial was not complete or final without the approval of the commanding officer who convened the court-martial.[91] Without the commanding officer's approval, the result of trial was more in the nature of a recommendation only: it was but the opinion of a body of officers.

The commanding officer who convened the court-martial had a legal duty to personally review and act on the case, exercising personal judgment as if the commanding officer were one of the court-martial members.[92] The action was judicial in nature, involving the exercise of discretion to act according to the commanding officer's own judgment in light of the facts and law as understood by the commander, with no obligation to give a reason for the action. The commanding officer was not at liberty to delegate this duty to another.[93] A commanding officer who disagreed with an acquittal could ask the court members to reconsider their finding.[94] In the event of a disagreement with a conviction, the commanding officer could set it aside. A commanding officer who viewed the sentence as too severe could reduce it, except with respect to a sentence to death or dismissal.[95] If the commanding officer viewed the sentence as not sufficiently severe, the case could be returned to the court-martial for an upward revision.[96] Once approved, the president of the court-martial announced the verdict, and the members of the court spoke with one voice, regardless of the actual vote. If a death sentence was announced, the court-martial stated that two-thirds of the court concurred in the sentence.[97] No dissents were revealed, and no majority or minority vote was disclosed, or even whether the vote was unanimous, because that would violate the members' oath by identifying how members voted.[98]

The judge advocate assigned to the court-martial was required to transmit the original proceedings and approved sentence to the Secretary of War for retention.[99] Upon request, the accused was entitled to a copy of the record of trial and sentence.[100]

2. Further Review

in the field could confirm these punishments.[102] The President also had to confirm the results of all trials involving general officers in time of war or peace.[103]

Beyond these reviews, there was no further right of appeal. Once the commanding officer approved the results of trial, the case became final. There was no judicial or appellate review;[104] the military justice system did not have appellate courts. The only other avenue for review was by seeking collateral review in federal court, primarily through writs of habeas corpus or back pay claims.[105] Collateral review during the foundational period focused narrowly on jurisdictional issues, which largely precluded review on the merits of non-jurisdictional claims of error.[106]

3. Execution of the Sentence

The sentence was carried out in a manner designed to make an example of a condemned prisoner, often in great ceremony. If a prisoner was to be shot to death, the commanding officer had all available troops assemble in formation on three sides of a square. The prisoner was then paraded in front of them, accompanied by the provost marshal, the regimental band (playing a funeral march), the firing squad, and the prisoner's coffin, carried by four men. On arriving at the open space in front of the formation, the music ceased; the prisoner was placed on the fatal spot marked by his coffin; and the charge, finding and sentence of the court-martial, and the order for his execution, were read aloud. The firing squad formed six or eight paces from the prisoner. After the chaplain said a final prayer and the provost marshal gave the signal, the prisoner was shot to death. The assembled troops were then marched in slow time and in single file by the body of the deceased before returning to their quarters.[107]

Soldiers sentenced to a discharge were literally "drummed out" of the service. The man about to be discharged was brought forward escorted by a guard before the assembled troops where his crimes, misdeeds, and the order for his discharge were read aloud. After stripping the buttons, facings, and any other insignia from his clothing, he was escorted out of the barracks or camp of his corps with drummers and fifes playing the "rogue's march."[108]

In addition, if a commissioned officer was dismissed from the service for cowardice or fraud, the sentence often directed that notices of the crime be published in newspapers to ensure the officer's humiliation before his fellow officers, troops, and associates and family back home.[109] The dismissal action was frequently published in the newspapers circulated near the camp as well as around the officer's residence.[110]

II. The Second Phase: Structural reforms of the World War I era and its aftermath (1913-1941)

The period from the years immediately preceding World War I through the interwar years brought important structural reforms to the military justice system. The World War I era proposals and debates featured the broadest public and congressional attention to military justice since the Revolutionary War era adoption of the Articles of War.

A. The 1913 and 1916 Articles of War

In the years preceding America's entry into World War I, Congress enacted two sets of amendments, which largely reflected the results of a detailed review by Major General Enoch Crowder, the Judge Advocate General of the Army.[111] A set of amendments approved in 1913 included replacement of the garrison and regimental courts-martial with a new forum, the special court-martial, empowered to impose six months confinement.[112] The 1916 amendments retained much of the basic court-martial structure and procedures of the previous articles, while also making a number of changes that have remained part of the military justice system to the present day, including: (1) broad jurisdiction over a wide range of criminal offenses;[113] (2) jurisdiction over certain civilians accompanying the armed forces;[114] (3) appointment of a judge advocate for special as well as general courts-[113] AW 92 of 1916. The 1916 amendments included jurisdiction over the full range of criminal conduct with the exception of a restriction on peacetime jurisdiction over two offenses: murder and rape. This restriction against trial for murder or rape in times of peace was carried forward in future revisions, to include the 1948 Elston Act, in which no person could be tried for murder or rape committed within the geographical limits of the United States and the District of Columbia in time of peace. AW 92 of 1948, as amended by the Act of June 24, 1948, ch. 625, tit. II, 62 Stat. 627 [hereinafter Elston Act]. This restriction remained in place until adoption of the UCMJ in 1950, which provided worldwide jurisdiction over all offenses.

Non-judicial discipline

The 1916 Articles of War provided a new means by which commanders could punish soldiers for minor offenses without having to resort to a court-martial.[120] This new tool was initially called non-judicial discipline, and later came to be known as non-judicial punishment. The tool was available only for "minor offenses not denied by the accused."[121] The authorized punishments included admonition, reprimand, withholding of privileges, extra duty, and restriction to certain specified limits. Forfeiture of pay and confinement, persons were subject to military law both within and without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. Similar bases of jurisdiction were incorporated into the UCMJ when it was enacted in 1950, and remain a part of the Code to the present day. See Art. 2 (10-12).

If the accused was not represented by counsel, the judge advocate was to advise the accused "from time to time throughout the proceedings . . . of his legal right." Id. By comparison, civilian defendants in federal and state courts also had the right to counsel, but only if they could afford counsel. If they could not afford counsel, civilian defendants faced trial without any counsel and without anyone present to record what was said at trial. See Wiener, supra note 3, at 24.

[118] AW 24 of 1916. This provision was the forerunner to Article 31 of the UCMJ, which is more protective than the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination in non-custodial interrogations. See Miranda v. [119] AW 70 of 1916.

[120] AW 104 of 1916. The "captain's mast" was the naval term for the non-judicial proceeding. Unlike the soldier, a sailor could not refuse non-judicial punishment and demand trial by court-martial, or appeal the punishment. These differences are explained by the fundamentally different leadership styles of the two Services. In the Navy, the commanding officer who imposed non-judicial punishment was almost always the commander of a ship in whom the Navy reposed special faith and who was also authorized to convene both deck and summary courts-martial. WILLIAM T. GENEROUS, JR., SWORDS AND SCALES: THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE 123 (1973). A similar procedure existed in the Coast Guard, but the Coast Guardsman had a right to appeal the punishment. REGULATIONS FOR THE UNITED STATES COAST GUARD, art. 1924 (1916). In the Army, non-judicial punishment was generally exercised by company commanders, who were often junior officers with much less experience and no authority to convene a court. GENEROUS, supra, at 123.

however, were not authorized.[122] The accused also had a right to appeal the punishment imposed by his immediate commander to the next superior officer, if he believed it was unjust or disproportionate to the offense.[123]

Non-judicial punishment was not a bar to a trial by court-martial for the same offense. But if the accused was convicted of the same offense for which he received non-judicial punishment, evidence of this punishment was admissible at the court-martial to mitigate the sentence.[124]

B. World War I and the post-war military justice debates

The 1916 Articles of War were soon put to the test. The United States declared war on Germany in April 1917. Over the next three years, over four million would serve on active duty, including many who had been drafted or enlisted under the pressure of the draft. Few had any prior experience with military justice.

During the War, Major General Crowder was appointed to be in charge of the draft, and Brigadier General Samuel T. Ansell was designated as the Acting Judge Advocate General. Ansell took the position the Judge Advocate General had the authority to revise court-martial sentences for injustice. Crowder disagreed, and the Secretary of the Army sided with Crowder.[125]

Soon after resolving the initial Ansell-Crowder disagreement, the War Department learned that thirteen African-Americans had been executed only two days after being convicted in a mass court-martial in Texas.[126] In the aftermath of public and internal criticism of the proceedings,[127] the War Department published a General Order providing that no death sentences could be executed in the United States until the War Department reviewed the

Under the 1948 Elston Act, hard labor without confinement was also authorized, but confinement and forfeiture of pay were not authorized, except when a general court-martial convening authority punished an officer below the rank of brigadier general with a forfeiture of not more than one-half of his pay per month for three months. [126] A large racial disturbance involving African-American soldiers resulted in multiple civilian deaths. Sixty-three soldiers were tried in a single court-martial for the disturbance and thirteen were sentenced to death by hanging. The commanding general approved the sentences, and the soldiers were hanged the next day, under the wartime authority of a commanding general to execute sentences in the field without prior approval from high authority. The records of trial were then sent to the Office of the Judge Advocate General for review where four months later they were found to be legally sufficient. Wiener, supra note 3, at 17-18.

case.[128] The end of the war and return of many soldiers to civilian life was accompanied by increased attention to the administration of military justice during the war, including allegations of cases proceeding on the basis of unsupported charges, excessive sentences, improper command interference, and numerous cases returned by the convening authority to the court-martial in an effort to transform acquittals into convictions.[129]

Congress held extensive hearings on the administration of the court-martial system during World War I.[130] It heard reports about a variety of injustices and it invited testimony from many persons of interest, to include Crowder, Ansell, and others. Two main criticisms emerged. The first was that non-lawyers were assigned to defend soldiers.[131] The second was that commanders repeatedly intervened in courts-martial to bring about the results they wanted.[132]

C. The 1920 Articles of War and the interwar implementing rules.

After detailed congressional hearings and public debate,[133] Congress enacted legislation in 1920 that made a number of important changes to the Articles of War.

1. Law Member

The 1920 Articles of War created a new position for the general court-martial. A "law member" was detailed to every general court-martial,[134] even though in practice the court-

Senator Chamberlain discussed four death penalty cases from France to illustrate the problem of inexperienced defense counsel. All four soldiers sentenced to death were represented by young second lieutenants with no legal training. Two soldiers were sentenced to death for sleeping on post at the front, but they alleged they had not slept for five days prior to their offense and thus fell asleep from sheer exhaustion. The other two soldiers were sentenced to death for refusing to drill, even though they claimed they were too sick to drill. None of the courts had apparently made any effort to confirm or disprove these extenuating circumstances.

martial could proceed in the law member's absence.[135] To qualify, the law member had to be an officer in the Judge Advocate General's office;[136] if such an officer was not available, the appointing officer had to appoint someone specially qualified to perform those duties.[137] The presence of the law member at trial meant that the judge advocate no longer served both as the prosecutor and as the advisor to the court on the law.

The law member was not a judge. The law member served as one of the appointed court members and was seated with them to the immediate left of the presiding court president.[138] As a court member, the law member had an equal vote in deciding all questions submitted to a vote or ballot of the court, including challenges, findings, sentence, and any interlocutory questions submitted to a vote of the court.[139]

Some of the law member's evidentiary rules were binding on the court-martial.[140] But the court members were authorized to overrule or disregard many of the law member's rulings, just as they could reject the advice of the prosecuting judge advocate before there was a law member. The law member's rulings were not binding on matters such as the order of the witnesses or other evidence, the recall of a witness for further examination, the qualifications of expert witnesses, whether the court members would visit the premises where the alleged offense took place, the competence of witnesses, the insanity or other mental defect of the accused, whether argument or statement of counsel was improper, and the correctness of any military action, strategy or tactics.[141] If any court member objected to a law member's ruling, the court was cleared and closed to the public, and the court members decided the question by a majority voice vote, beginning with the officer most junior in rank.[142]

In special courts-martial, which had no appointed law member, the court president performed the role of law member by making rulings in open court.[143]

The 1920 Articles of War required the convening authority to appoint a defense counsel at government expense to represent the accused in all general and special courts-martial, but did not require the appointment of a qualified attorney to serve as defense counsel.[144]

3. Charging and Investigation

The 1920 Articles of War permitted any military member—officer or enlisted—to swear charges against a military accused.[145] There was a safeguard against frivolous charges: the person signing the charges had to take an oath to affirm that he either had personal knowledge of the offenses or had the charges investigated, and that the charges were true in fact to the best of his knowledge and belief.[146]

Moreover, before charges could be referred to a general court-martial, the 1920 Articles required a thorough and impartial investigation of the charged offenses.[147] The investigation was conducted by the commanding officer or another officer appointed by him. The investigation examined the form of the charges and the evidence supporting them.[148] The officer investigating the charges heard testimony from witnesses, including those the accused requested.[149] The accused could cross-examine witnesses, and present evidence in defense or mitigation.[150] At the conclusion of the investigation, the officer appointed to investigate the charges forwarded the charges, a summary of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides, and his recommendation as to disposition of the case to the commanding officer.[151]

[144] AW 11 of 1920. The 1916 Articles of War merely granted the accused the right to be represented by counsel of his own selection, if counsel was reasonably available. Nevertheless, even the new version did not require the appointed defense counsel be a lawyer—and often he did not possess legal training. But the naming of defense counsel in courts-martial was in this limited sense far in advance of anything available in contemporary federal or state courts. The indigent federal defendant in noncapital cases had to wait for a similar benefit another 18 years until the Supreme Court decided Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938), while the indigent defendant in state court was not entitled to court-appointed counsel until the Supreme Court decided Gideon v. Wainwright, 373 U.S. 335 (1963).

[145] AW 70 of 1920. The Coast Guard had a similar procedure. When a report of misconduct was received, "the officer receiving the report shall institute a careful investigation into the circumstances on which the complaint is founded. He shall call upon the complainant for a written statement of the case, together with a list of his witnesses, mentioning where they may be found, and a recommendation of any documentary evidence bearing upon the case that may be obtainable." 4. Voting

The 1920 Articles of War increased the percentage of the vote needed to reach a conviction and determine the sentence. The new Articles also changed the voting procedure used in arriving at the verdict. Before 1920, only a majority vote was needed for a non-capital offense and a two-thirds vote for a capital one. Under the new law, a two-thirds vote was required to convict in all non-capital cases, and a unanimous vote to convict in capital cases.[152] Before 1920, all sentences in non-capital cases required only a majority vote; the new law required that every sentence have a minimum two-thirds concurrence.[153] If the sentence to confinement was for life imprisonment or for more than ten years confinement, the vote had to be by a three-fourths concurrence.[154]

The 1920 Articles of War also changed the procedure for voting on findings and the sentence: the court members voted by secret written ballot.[155] The junior member counted the votes and the court president checked the count.[156] The court members decided all other interlocutory matters by a simple majority on a voice vote.[157]

The same voting procedure used for findings and the sentence was also used in deciding whether to excuse or "challenge" a member for cause at the start of the trial.[158] The 1920 Articles granted the prosecuting judge advocate a right to challenge court members for cause; and, in addition to challenges for cause, the Articles granted both the prosecutor and the defense counsel the right to exercise one peremptory challenge, which allowed both to remove a member for any reason or no reason at all.[159] The law member was also subject to challenge, but only for cause.[160]

5. Acquittal

Before 1920, the commanding officer could return the record of trial to the court-martial with a request for a different verdict or a more severe sentence.[161] In the period between 1917 and 1919, one-third of all acquittals were turned into convictions at the request of the convening authority.[162] The 1920 revision prohibited the convening authority from revisiting an acquittal or from seeking an increase in the sentence originally imposed, unless the sentence was less than the mandatory sentence fixed by law for the offense.[163]

Until 1920, the findings and sentence were not announced until the convening authority finally approved them. Under the new Articles of War, whenever the court acquitted the accused on all charges and specifications, the court-martial was required to immediately announce this result in open court, since the commanding officer could no longer revisit the acquittal.[164]

6. Post-Trial and Appellate Review

The 1920 Articles improved upon the procedures for post-trial review provided by the general orders published in the aftermath of the Houston riot cases. Previously, the War Department reviewed all cases with a death sentence, a dismissal, or a dishonorable discharge. The new procedures also extended War Department review to cases where the sentence included imprisonment for more than one year or a bad-conduct discharge. The new review procedures were both automatic and at public expense.[165]

The review procedures were integrated into the post-trial actions taken by the reviewing authorities. No sentence could be approved, confirmed, or executed until all reviewing authorities had obtained a written legal opinion from their staff judge advocate.[166] The convening authority could approve and execute low level sentences, meaning those where less than a year of confinement and no discharge had been imposed. Higher reviewing authorities in the chain of command had to confirm other sentences, and the adjudged sentence determined the designation of the final confirming authority.

The President of the United States confirmed any sentence that included the death penalty, the dismissal of an officer, or concerned a general officer.[167] There were three war-time exceptions permitting the commanding general in the field to confirm such a sentence: (1) if the dismissal was not for a general officer;[168] (2) if the commanding general had, as part of his review, reduced the sentence so that it no longer needed to be confirmed by the President;[169] or (3) when a death sentence for murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, and spying, and the record of trial had been examined under the provisions of Article 50 ½, discussed next.

Article 50 ½ required the Judge Advocate General to establish a board of review consisting of at least three officers from his department.[170] The board of review was to examine and prepare a written legal opinion for every case needing the President's approval or confirmation.[171] Except in cases based solely on a guilty plea, neither the President nor the commanding general in the field could order the execution of a sentence to death, a dismissal (not suspended), a dishonorable discharge (not suspended), or to confinement in a penitentiary, until the board of review determined that the record of trial was legally sufficient to support the sentence.[172]

The opinion of the board of review and the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General were advisory only. When the Judge Advocate General ruled, with the concurrence of the Secretary of War, that a case was not legally sufficient, it would not be submitted to the President, and would instead be returned to the convening authority for a rehearing or other appropriate action.[173] But, if the Judge Advocate General disagreed with the board's opinion, then the Judge Advocate General had to forward the entire case, along with the board's opinion and his own dissent, to the President.[174] The President could then decide whether to confirm the sentence or to remit, mitigate, commute, or disapprove all or part of the sentence.[175]

The Judge Advocate General's office also reviewed all other records of trial from general courts-martial. If the review determined a record of trial was legally insufficient, the case was forwarded to the board of review. If the board agreed that the record was legally insufficient, the Judge Advocate General forwarded the record, along with the board's opinion and his own opinion, to the Secretary of War or the President for action.[176]

III. The Third Phase: The UCMJ: Prelude, Enactment, Implementation, and Revision (1941-present)

A. Military Justice in World War II - volume and controversy

In World War II, the United States expanded its armed forces to a maximum strength of 12,300,000,[177] and more than 16,000,000 individuals served in the Army over the course of the war.[178] The Navy expanded from 250,000 personnel in peacetime to an aggregate of more than 4,750,000 individuals, including the Marine Corps and the Coast Guard.[179] Six hundred thousand courts-martial were held per year at the height of World War II.[180] The military conducted over 1.7 million trials by the end of the war, carried out over 100 capital executions, and held over 45,000 members of the armed forces in prison, even at the end of the war.[181] The Navy conducted over 600,000 courts-martial during the war, and, at the beginning of 1946, held approximately 15,000 naval personnel in confinement.[182] In all, the armed forces handled one third of all criminal cases tried in the nation.[183]

During and immediately after World War II, Congress was flooded with countless complaints about the administration of military justice; in fact, the military justice system attracted the attention of every major bar association in the United States. The chief complaint was that, even under the 1920 Articles of War, courts-martial were wholly lacking in independence and their decisions were dictated in advance of the trial by the commanders who appointed them.[184]

Studies conducted during and after the war by the Army, the Navy, bar associations, and veterans groups identified areas of significant concern, including improper command interference with courts-martial, inadequate representation, inadequate training of court-members in the legal aspects of their duties, and unduly harsh sentences.[185] These concerns were echoed and amplified during post-war military justice hearings.[186]

B. The 1948 Elston Act

Congress first addressed the issues arising out of the World War II experience through revisions of the Articles of War in 1948 legislation that came to be known as the Elston Act.[187] The legislation included a number of major changes in military practice which were made part of the UCMJ two years later.[188]

The Elston Act was approved during the same time period in which Congress combined the military departments into a single organization, which became the Department of Defense.[189] The Elston Act applied to the Army, not the Navy, and it was not clear initially if the Act applied to the Air Force until a federal appeals court ruled that it did so apply.[190]

James V. Forrestal, the first Secretary of Defense, decided that a single military code should be enacted to apply to all of the armed forces, and appointed a committee to draft the new Code.[191] Based on the committee's report and draft legislation, the Department forwarded to Congress proposed legislation to create a Uniform Code of Military Justice. After extensive hearings and debate, the legislation, as modified by Congress, was signed into law by President Truman on May 5, 1950.[192] It became effective on May 31, 1951, and applied [188] The Elston Act's major provisions are discussed together with the UCMJ's major provisions below.

[189] In 1947 Congress placed the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy in the newly created National Military Establishment under the control of a Secretary of Defense. Act of June 26, 1947, ch. 343, 61 Stat. 495 [National Security Act of 1947]. The National Military Establishment was renamed the "Department of Defense" on August 10, 1949.

[190] Stock v. Department of the Air Force, 186 F.2d 968, 968 (4th Cir. 1950). When the President signed the Air Force Military Justice Act on June 25, 1948, the statute stated that the Air Force was now governed by the "laws now in effect." The laws in effect then were the 1920 Articles of War, not the Elston Act. The Elston Act, which President Truman signed the day before, on June 24, 1948, would not go into effect until February 1, 1949. GENEROUS, supra note 120, at 31-32.

[191] Secretary Forrestal appointed a four-man committee to draft the new code. He chose Harvard law professor and long-time advocate of military justice reform, Edmund M. Morgan, to chair the committee. Professor Morgan was the same professor who nearly 30 years earlier had criticized the 1916 Articles of War in congressional hearings. LURIE, supra note 125, at 157-70; Felix Larkin, Professor Edmund M. Morgan and the Drafting of the Uniform Code, 28 MIL. L. REV. 7, 8-9 (1965). In Professor Morgan's words, to all of the military services—the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard.[193]

C. The Uniform Code of Military Justice

The UCMJ retained the core features of military justice, including unique military offenses and punishments, as well as the disciplinary and disposition authority of the commander.[194] The legislation also made major changes in the structure of the military justice system. These changes have been refined in subsequent legislation, as summarized in the following sections.

81st Cong. (1949); H.R. REP. NO. 81-491 (1949); S. REP. NO. 81-486 (1949); H.R. REP. NO. 81-1946 (1950) (Conf. Rep.); 95 CONG. REC. [Feb. 8; April 26; May 5, 13; July 29 (1949); Feb. 1, 2, 3 (1950)].

[193] The Marine Corps is a branch of the Armed Forces separate from the Navy, but is a component of the Department of the Navy. The Coast Guard is also a branch of the Armed Forces. In peacetime it is under the Department of Homeland Security, but in war or exigency it can be transferred to the Department of the Navy. The Coast Guard began as the Revenue-Cutter Service under the Department of the Treasury in 1790, and merged with the U.S. Lifesaving Service to become the modern Coast Guard in 1915. The Service was transferred to the Department of Transportation with its establishment in 1967, and was again transferred to the Department of Homeland Security in 2002.

[194] The UCMJ provided a standard procedure whereby commanding officers could discipline officers and enlisted persons for minor offenses without a court-martial. Article 15, UCMJ (1950). This procedure was not a court-martial and the receipt of punishment was not a conviction. Receiving non-judicial punishment did not bar a later trial by court-martial for the same offense, but the accused had a right to show at the later trial he had previously been punished for the same offense during sentencing. Art. 15(e), UCMJ (1950).

The Code did not provide the military member a right to refuse non-judicial punishment and demand trial by court-martial, as was previously the case under the Articles of War. Instead, service Secretaries could, by regulation, place limitations on the powers granted under the Code. Art. 15(b), UCMJ (1950). The Army and the Air Force published regulations giving their members the right demand a court-martial when offered non-judicial punishment. MCM 1951, ¶ 132. The Navy and the Coast Guard did not afford their members this right.

In 1962, Congress amended the UCMJ to give military members a statutory right to demand trial by court-martial, "except in the case of a member attached to or embarked on a vessel." Act of September 7, 1962, Pub. L. No. 87-648, 76 Stat. 447, 448. (1962). This amendment had the effect of extending to members of the Navy and Coast Guard the right to demand trial by court-martial in lieu of nonjudicial punishment, subject to the "vessel exception." See Dwight H. Sullivan, Overhauling the Vessel Exception, 43 NAVAL LAW REV. 71 (1996) (explaining the history of the UCMJ's "vessel exception," and noting instances in which sailors were denied the right to demand a court-martial due to the "vessel exception" when the "vessels" in question were in dry dock being overhauled and, thus, not operational).

In receiving non-judicial punishment, commissioned officers and warrant officers could be required to forfeit their pay, have their privileges withheld, and be restricted to certain specified limits. Article 15(a)(1), UCMJ (1950). Enlisted persons could also have their privileges withheld and be restricted to certain specified limits, be given extra duties, be reduced in rank, and, if attached to or embarked on a vessel, confined on bread and water or diminished rations. Article 15(a)(2), UCMJ (1950). The maximum punishment imposable on enlisted persons depended on the rank of the officer imposing the punishment and on the rank of the enlisted persons involved.

1. Court-Martial Jurisdiction

The Elston Act provided that the military had jurisdiction to punish violations of all offenses, except murder or rape committed within the geographical limits of the United States and the District of Columbia in time of peace.[195] Under the UCMJ, court-martial jurisdiction extended to all offenses over all persons subject to the Code at all times and in all places.[196] The category of persons subject to the Code covered not only servicemembers on active duty, but also family members and civilian employees and contractors accompanying the armed forces overseas; the UCMJ also purported to retain jurisdiction over former servicemembers who had committed serious offenses while on active duty and who could not be tried in federal or state court for those offenses.[197]

In the 1950s, the Supreme Court invalidated the portions of the UCMJ authorizing trial by court-martial of military dependents and civilian employees accompanying the armed forces overseas in time of peace.[198] The Court also held that ex-servicemen were no longer subject to military jurisdiction for offenses they may have committed while on active duty.[199]

In 1969, the Supreme Court also placed a major limitation on the trial of servicemembers for some offenses committed under the UCMJ. In O'Callahan v. Parker, the Court ruled that military jurisdiction extended only to offenses with a "service-connection" to the military; in the absence of a "service-connection," civilian courts had to try the offenses so the defendant would receive the full protections of the Bill of Rights, in particular, a grand jury indictment under the Fifth Amendment and a trial by jury under the Sixth Amendment.[200]

United States ex rel. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234 (1960) (civilian dependents). In light of these cases, the U.S. Court of Military Appeals declined to sustain military jurisdiction over civilian employees of Army contractors in Vietnam, because Congress had not declared war in the armed conflict. See, e.g., United States v. Averette, 41 C.M.R. 363 (1970) (no UCMJ jurisdiction over civilian employee of Army contractor in Vietnam, interpreting the jurisdictional provision as applying only in time of a declared war), superseded by statute Article 2(a)(10), UCMJ (1950), as stated in United States v. [200] O'Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969). In O'Callahan, the Court determined that an off-duty soldier's attempted rape and assault of a civilian in a Honolulu hotel had no service-connection since the offenses were committed in peacetime, in U.S. territory, and did not involve military authority, security, or property.

By one estimate, the service-connection rule resulted in civilian courts handling roughly two out of every five serious offenses by soldiers.[201] In 1987, the Supreme Court overruled O'Callahan and ended the service-connection requirement.[202] Today, court-martial jurisdiction is based solely on the accused's status as a member of the armed forces.

2. Pretrial Investigation/Preliminary Hearing

The UCMJ carried forward the requirement that no charge could be referred to a general court-martial until a thorough and impartial investigation had been made of all matters set forth in the charges.[203] From 1920 to 2014, the purpose of this pretrial investigation was to inquire into the truth of the matters set forth in the charges, consideration of the form of charges, and a recommendation as to the disposition which should be made of the case "in the interest of justice and discipline."[204]

The accused had the right to be present at the investigation, to be represented by counsel, and to have a "full opportunity" to cross-examine witnesses against him.[205] The accused also had the right to present anything he desired in his own behalf, either in defense or mitigation, and to have the investigating officer examine available witnesses requested by the accused.[206]

In 2013, Congress changed the pretrial investigation into a preliminary hearing.[207] The hearing's purpose now is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe an offense has been committed and that the accused committed the offense. Victims are not required to appear at the hearing, and cross-examination of witnesses, if any, is limited to matters directly relevant to the hearing.[208] The hearing's other objectives remain the same: whether the convening authority has court-martial jurisdiction over the offense and the accused, the form of the charges, and a recommendation as to the disposition that should be made of the case.[209]

3. Types of Courts-Martial (including panel membership)

The UCMJ maintained the same three basic types of court-martial available since 1916: the general court-martial, the special court-martial, and the summary court-martial.[210] The general court-martial required the appointment of at least five court members.[211] The senior member was the court president who presided at the court-martial, and who retained a few important duties, such as setting the time and place of trial, prescribing the uniform required in court, and preserving order in the open sessions of the court to ensure they were conducted in a dignified, military manner.[212] Both the Elston Act and the UCMJ provided that enlisted persons were now competent to sit on all general and special courts-martial when the accused was enlisted.[213]

The general court-martial could impose any authorized punishment, including the death penalty.[214] A unanimous vote of the court members was required to convict on an offense for which the death penalty was mandatory or discretionary.[215] A sentence of life imprisonment or confinement for more than ten years needed a three-fourths concurrence.[216] In both general and special courts-martial, all other findings of guilty and sentences required a two-thirds vote of the members.[217] Questions, such as a challenge for cause, a motion for a finding of not guilty, or a motion relating to the accused's sanity, were decided by a majority vote of the court members.[218]

The special court-martial required at least three members (no law officer was required),[219] and could adjudge a bad-conduct discharge, confinement for six months, hard labor without confinement for three months, and forfeiture of two-thirds pay for six months.[220] In 1999, Congress increased the period of confinement and forfeiture that special courts-martial could impose to one year.[221]

The summary court-martial consisted of one officer who could adjudge confinement for one month, hard labor without confinement for 45 days, restriction for two months, and forfeiture of two-thirds pay for one month.[222] The UCMJ retained the right of a servicemember to object to the forum, unless he had previously refused punishment under Article 15, UCMJ.

4. Military Judge (from law member to law officer to military judge)

The Elston Act increased the qualifications of the law member by requiring the law member to be an officer in the Judge Advocate General's department or an officer who was a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a state of the United States and certified by the Judge Advocate General for such detail.[223] The legislation also enhanced the role of the law member by providing that the law member's evidentiary rulings were final and binding on the court members.[224] The law member, however, did not occupy the position of a judge. The law member continued to serve as a voting member of the panel. The presiding officer at trial was still the court president, and the law member was still seated next to him.

a. The judicial role of the law officer

The UCMJ replaced the law member with a new position—the law officer. The law officer now sat apart from the court members during trial, usually in the front of the courtroom on a raised dais, where a judge would normally preside over a trial.[225] Unlike the law member, the law officer was not one of the court members, did not deliberate or vote with the members, and could not discuss the case with the members outside of the presence of the accused (with one limited exception that allowed the law officer to help the members put the findings and sentence into proper form).[226]

Although the law officer was not a judge, the law officer was expected to remain scrupulously impartial,[227] to instruct the court members on all elements of the offense or lesser-included offenses fairly raised by the evidence,[228] to avoid unauthorized out-of-court discussions about the case,[229] and to abstain from improperly entering the closed sessions of the court members.[230] In special courts-martial, the court president was expected to perform the same duties the law officer performed at a general court-martial.[231]

As the law officer was meant to be more like a judge, it was also evident that the court president of a general court-martial was meant to occupy a position more like the foreman of a jury. Except for the court president's right as a member to object to certain rulings of the law officer, the president was not to interfere with those rulings.[232]

[226] The law officer still lacked the authority to rule on challenges, motions for a finding of not guilty, or the accused's sanity. These issues continued to be decided by the court members. The law officer made evidentiary and procedural rulings, and instructed the court members on the elements of the offense, the presumption of innocence, and the burden of proof. Art. 51(c), UCMJ (1950). The duties of the law officer were not entirely spelled out in the UCMJ. These details were left for the President, who was responsible to prescribe the rules of procedure and evidence in the Manual for Court-Martial. A natural tension thus arose between the law officer, whose evidentiary rulings and instructions were final, and the court president, who still presided over the court-martial, and was adjusting to a diminished role. The court president was not permitted to make rulings reserved for the law officer. See United States v. Berry, 2 C.M.R. 141 (C.M.A. 1952) (reversing the conviction in a pre-UCMJ case, because the court president had made rulings that were for the law member: "The ground for this

Two lingering problems impeded the law officer's independence. In the 1950s, the law officer often performed this duty on a part-time basis. When not engaged in trial work, the law officer's primary job could be any number of tasks performed by military lawyers.[233] More importantly, the law officer was often a judge advocate assigned to work for the staff judge advocate to the commanding officer who convened the court. Because the law officer was a subordinate in the staff judge advocate's office, he knew that the charges at the court-martial had already been approved for trial by the very same officer who wrote his efficiency reports. This arrangement created the potential for unlawful command influence from the office of the staff judge advocate.[234]

In 1957, the Army developed a solution to address the organizational pressures faced by the law officer by creating an independent judiciary—a corps of judge advocates whose only duty would be to sit as law officers on general courts-martial and who would not be under the command of any person who recommended trial, who ordered trial, or who would review the record of trial in any capacity.[235]

Under the program, senior judge advocates were assigned to a normal three-year tour of duty as judicial officers by the Judge Advocate General. Efficiency reports were written by the assistant judge advocate general and endorsed by the Judge Advocate General.

The creation of an independent judiciary had an immediate benefit: in the first year and a half of the new program, reversals for law officer error were cut to less than 50 percent of the previous rate.[236] The actual length of the trial doubled, as a result of the law officer paying more attention to interlocutory rulings and instructions.[237] The law officer would no longer be rushed by pressure from the court president to "get on with it."[238]

In 1968, Congress replaced the law officer with the military judge, and made the Army's independent field judiciary system mandatory for all five Services.[239] Moreover, for the first time in military history, an accused could elect to be tried and sentenced by a military judge sitting alone—without court members—in both general and special courts-martial.[240] The military judge's new powers also included the power to release an accused from pretrial confinement after referral of the case to court-martial.[241] In addition, before any special court-martial could adjudge a bad-conduct discharge, Congress required the appointment of a military judge and legally trained counsel for both sides.[242] The transformation of law officer into military judge marked the end of a long decisional process by Congress.

5. Counsel

The UCMJ required that any person who was appointed as trial counsel or defense counsel in a general court-martial must be a judge advocate or a graduate of an accredited law school or a member of the bar of a federal court or the highest court of a state, and certified as competent to perform such duties by a judge advocate general.[243] The appointment of counsel with these qualifications was not required in special courts-martial.[244]

In 1968, Congress amended the UCMJ to excuse the appointment of qualified defense counsel on account of physical conditions or military exigencies.[245] In 1983, Congress again

[244] During the Vietnam War, some commanders opposed relinquishing control over special courts-martial, even after lawyers began serving as defense counsel. These commanders accepted that felony-level general courts-martial required judge advocates, but they did not appreciate the intrusion of lawyers into their special courts. For example, the Army division's aviation group and artillery commanders in Vietnam continued using non-lawyers as prosecutors, believing that a line officer, rather than a judge advocate, would better represent the command's interest. FREDERIC L. BORCH, JUDGE ADVOCATES IN COMBAT: ARMY LAWYERS IN MILITARY OPERATIONS FROM VIETNAM TO HAITI 33 (US Army, 2001). However, non-lawyer trial counsel did not perform as well as legally trained defense counsel. The most reluctant convening authorities eventually accepted the presence of judge advocates at special courts-martial. By mid-1970, the Army required a military judge in all special courts-martial, not just those that could adjudge a bad-conduct discharge. Id.

amended the UCMJ to state that qualified defense counsel must be appointed in all special courts-martial, except on account of physical conditions or military exigencies.[246]

Defense counsel faced the same circumstances law officers faced before development of the field judiciary program. Defense counsel were members of the same legal office as prosecutors and were under the supervision and control of the staff judge advocate who advised the commander.

In 1973, the Secretary of Defense directed each of the military departments to submit plans for restructuring its defense counsel services.[247] In 1974, the Air Force and the Navy placed its defense counsel under the direction of the appropriate judge advocate general, with the Army following suit in 1978.[248]

[247] The Vietnam War exposed another problem area in the military: racial tension and unrest. In 1972, Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird commissioned a task force "to identify and assess the impact of racially related patterns or practices on the administration of justice" and "to recommend ways to strengthen the military justice system and to enhance the opportunity for equal justice for every serviceman and woman." The Task Force also found that many enlisted men lacked confidence in military defense counsel and did not believe that defense counsel truly represented their interests. 6. Trial procedure

The UCMJ provided broad authority to the President to prescribe rules for pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedures, including modes of proof.[249] The President prescribes rules which, so far as he considers practicable, apply the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally applicable in United States district court, so long as those rules are not contrary to or inconsistent with other provisions of the UCMJ.[250]

The President publishes the military criminal procedures in the Rules for Courts-Martial, which generally conform to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure insofar as practicable.[251] The Rules for Courts-Martial tend to be much more extensive than the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as they must provide detailed guidance on matters that are specific to military practice.

In 1950, the admissibility of evidence and the competency and privileges of witnesses in federal courts was governed by common law principles. The rules of evidence in the federal and state criminal system were largely the product of case law. Congress enacted the Federal Rules of Evidence in 1975.[252] The Military Rules of Evidence, adopted in 1980, were identical in many respects to the federal rules.[253] By regulation, any amendment to the federal rules will automatically amend parallel provisions in the Military Rules of Evidence, unless the President takes action to the contrary within eighteen months of the amendment.[254]

With military rules and procedures modeled on federal rules and procedures, courts-martial can look to federal court decisions interpreting those rules and procedures as persuasive authority.[255]

7. Unlawful Command Influence

The Elston Act addressed inappropriate interference in the court-martial trial and review process by identifying and prohibiting acts that could unlawfully influence the actions of court-members and convening authorities.[256]

[249] Art. 36, UCMJ (1950). This provision was derived from a similar one in the Articles of War. In the Navy, rule-making authority was given to the Secretary of the Navy. See Hearings on H.R. 2498, supra note 184, at 1014.

The UCMJ similarly addressed "unlawful command influence" by prohibiting convening authorities and commanders from censuring, reprimanding, or admonishing a court member, law officer, or counsel with respect to the findings or sentence of the court, or the exercise of their functions in the conduct of the proceedings.[257] The UCMJ also made such conduct punishable in a punitive article.[258]

8. Post-trial role of the Convening Authority

Under the Elston Act, the convening and the confirming authority (the authority to confirm a sentence) had the implied power to disapprove both the findings of guilty and the sentence, in whole or in part, and to remand the case for rehearing.[259]

Under the UCMJ, the convening authority continued to exercise an appellate-type review function with responsibility to act on the findings and sentence, and was only to approve them to the extent that he found them correct in law and fact, and to the extent he determined in his discretion that they should be approved.[260]

In 1983, Congress removed the requirement for the convening authority to conduct formal appellate reviews of cases to ensure their legal sufficiency before approving the findings and the sentence.[261] The 1983 Act focused the convening authority's attention on matters of direct interest to the exercise of command prerogative—the matter of clemency. For these purposes, the Act also permitted the accused's defense counsel to submit a rebuttal to the staff judge advocate's recommendation before the convening authority took action on the case.

Whitley, 19 C.M.R. 82 (C.M.A. 1955) (conviction reversed after the convening authority during the trial replaced the court president of a special court-martial who had ruled consistently in favor of the defense with a "more qualified" court president).

[260] The commander's authority to disapprove or approve in whole or in part the findings and sentence was a matter "wholly within [the commander's] discretion[.]" Art. 64, UCMJ (1950). Even before the UCMJ was enacted, the judgment and sentence of a court-martial was "incomplete and inconclusive, being in the nature of a recommendation only" to the commanding officer who convened the court-martial. [261] Pub. L. No. 98-209, 97 Stat. 1393 (1983).

In 2014, Congress removed the convening authority's power to modify the findings and sentence, with some exceptions.[262] The convening authority can modify the findings and sentence for light sentences involving minor offenses where the accused was sentenced to less than six months of confinement with no punitive discharge, and where the offense carried a maximum sentence of two years or less of confinement. With respect to all other offenses, the convening authority can reduce the sentence pursuant to a pretrial agreement or upon a recommendation by the trial counsel when the accused provided substantial assistance in the investigation or prosecution of another person.

9. Appellate review

a. Appellate review under the Elston Act

Records of trial not requiring action by a confirming authority under the Elston Act were reviewed by a legal officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General and, if the legal officer was of the opinion that the record was legally deficient in any respect, the record went to the board of review to be examined.[263]

Under the Elston Act, the boards of review examined all cases with sentences to a dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge or to confinement in a penitentiary, except when the discharge was suspended. The boards of review had to determine whether the evidence in each record of trial was legally sufficient to support a conviction by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.[264] In so doing, the boards of review were authorized to weigh the evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses, and determine controverted questions of fact.[265]

But the board of review was essentially only an advisory board; its opinions were not binding unless the Judge Advocate General concurred in the opinion.[266] If the Judge Advocate General disagreed with it, the case was forwarded to higher authority for resolution.

The President had to confirm any sentence to death or sentence involving a general officer. AW 48(a) of 1948.

[266] If the board of review found record to be legally deficient and the Judge Advocate General agreed with the board's opinion, the Judge Advocate General returned the record of trial to the convening authority for a rehearing or other action. AW 50(d)(3), 50(e)(3) of 1948.

After the post-trial review and confirming action were completed, the findings of guilty and the sentence became final and conclusive. Orders publishing the proceedings and all actions taken were binding upon all departments, courts, agencies, and officers of the United States, subject only to action upon application for a new trial.[267]

b. Transformation of the Boards of Review into Appellate Courts

The UCMJ transformed the boards of review into actual appellate courts with authority to issue judicial rulings binding on the Judge Advocate General and all other convening and confirming authorities and whose decisions were reviewable only by the Court of Military Appeals.[268]

In 1968, Congress recast the boards of review as Courts of Military Review,[269] and, in 1994, they were renamed Courts of Criminal Appeals.[270]

c. U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces

The UCMJ created a civilian court of last resort within the military justice system—the Court of Military Appeals.[271] Congress established the Court to be "completely removed from all military influence or persuasion."[272] The Court originally had three judges, appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of fifteen years.[273] In 1989, Congress increased the number of judges on

Other common law countries quickly followed the example of the United States in establishing a civilian court of last resort over their military justice system. For Congress, the Court of Military Appeals was merely an extension of the American concept of civilian control over the military. But this concept was vigorously opposed in congressional hearings by military leaders before the UCMJ was adopted. See, e.g., Hearings on H.R. 2498, supra note 184, at 772-73 (statement of Maj. Gen Kenneth F. Cramer, Chief, National Guard Bureau); Crump, supra, at 66.

the Court to five to enhance the Court's stability and effectiveness.[274] In 1994, Congress changed the name of the Court to its current designation—the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.[275]

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces can review a case on appeal on one of three bases: (1) if the accused is a general or flag officer, or the sentence includes the death penalty; (2) if a judge advocate general certifies an issue to the court; or (3) if the court grants a petition for review. [276] The Court's review is mandatory for cases in the first two categories. For the third category, the Court grants a petition for review for "good cause," a determination within the court's discretion. The Court exercises its discretion to address important legal issues or to resolve conflicts among the Services in their interpretation of the UCMJ.

In addition to the authority for direct review of cases from the Courts of Criminal Appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces may consider petitions for extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act.[277]

d. Direct Appeal to the Supreme Court

In 1983, Congress provided for direct review of the Court's decisions by the Supreme Court.[278] Under the Act, parties may petition the Supreme Court for discretionary writs of certiorari in all cases in which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces had granted the petition for review.[279] Since 1983, the Supreme Court has granted review in a relatively small number of cases.[280]

[274] With only three judges, the replacement of a single judge could produce major swings in the law and in the court's development of precedent. The same could occur if a single judge were to change his or her viewpoint. Such change undermined doctrinal stability and sapped the court's pronouncements of the legitimacy that comes with predictability. Joel D. e. Interlocutory appeals by the United States

In the 1983 Act, Congress authorized interlocutory appeals by the prosecution of certain adverse trial rulings.[281] Before then, the government had no ability to appeal a military judge's ruling that terminated the proceedings with respect to a charge or otherwise excluded important evidence. This change allowed government appeals under procedures similar to appeals by the United States in a federal prosecution.

f. Collateral Review

Federal courts outside the military justice system also review court-martial sentences under the standards applicable to collateral review. In addition to jurisdictional issues, a court during collateral review may consider the constitutional claims of servicemembers under the "full and fair" consideration test stated by the Supreme Court in Burns v. Wilson.[282]

10. Punitive Articles

The UCMJ added definitions (in Article 1) and offenses on matters pertaining to substantive criminal law, such as principals, accessory after the fact, conviction of a lesser included offense, attempt, conspiracy, solicitation, malingering, and extortion.[283] The UCMJ also carried forward many military-unique offenses, such as desertion, failure to obey an order or regulation, and disrespect towards superior officer.[284] In all, it contained 58 punitive articles. When it came to defining offenses, the UCMJ was a model of clarity, especially when compared to prior versions of the Articles of War or the Articles for the Government of the Navy.

Two punitive articles have been part of military justice system since 1775.[285] They are unique in that, if they had been civilian offenses, the Supreme Court would have struck them down as unconstitutionally vague; but the Court has upheld them when applied to a United States, 520 U.S. 651 (1997) (Secretary of Transportation could appoint civilian judges to court of criminal appeals); United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303 (1998) (per se rule against admission of polygraph evidence in court-martial proceedings did not violate the Fifth or Sixth Amendment rights of an accused to present a defense); Clinton v. Goldsmith, 526 U.S. 529 (1999) (invalidating injunction against dropping court-martialed service member from the Air Force rolls); United States v. Denedo, 556 U.S. 904 (2009) (military appellate courts can entertain coram nobis petitions under the All Writs Act).

servicemember.[286] The first is "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman," and the second is the "General Article."[287]

The General Article prohibits all disorders and neglects prejudicial to good order and discipline, and prohibits all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces.[288] In exercising his authority to designate maximum punishments, the President has defined certain well known offenses under the General Article that are not in enumerated articles.[289] These offenses include kidnapping, negligent homicide, bribery, obstruction of justice, and misprision of a serious offense, among others.[290] Because they are merely Presidentially designated offenses and not enumerated offenses enacted by Congress, the prosecution must allege and prove an extra element in addition to the regular elements of the offenses; this extra element is referred to as the "terminal" element, which consists of showing that the conduct was either prejudicial to good order and discipline or was service discrediting.

IV. Military Justice Reform in Historical Perspective: Managing Change in Challenging Times

In 1950, the military establishment responded in a remarkable manner to the enactment of the UCMJ. The month after President Harry S. Truman signed the new law, the Korean War broke out.[291] Commanders and judge advocates immediately confronted the challenge of implementing an entirely new Code while simultaneously fighting a major war.[292] The military expanded from about 1.5 million in uniform in 1950 to nearly 3 million in 1955. The military's quick expansion brought with it a sharp increase in the number of courts-

[286] The Supreme Court upheld both punitive articles in Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974) (stating that the military, whose business it was to fight or be ready to fight wars, had a need to regulate aspects of the conduct of its members which in the civilian sphere are left unregulated).

[287] Art. 133, UCMJ (1950); Art. 134, UCMJ (1950) (Clauses 1 and 2 offenses).

[288] The General Article also permits the convening authority to assimilate federal and state crimes and offenses, when they are not capital offenses. Art. 134, UCMJ (1950) (Clause 3 offenses).

[291] President Truman signed the UCMJ into law on May 5, 1950. Harry S. Truman, Statement by the President Upon Signing Bill Establishing a Uniform Code of Military Justice, May 6, 1950. The Korean War began on June 25, 1950. The UCMJ went into effect on May 31, 1951.

[292] The armed services scrambled to train a cadre of lawyers who could implement the UCMJ. In late 1950, the Air Force inaugurated the Judge Advocate General Staff Officer Course at Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama. PATRICIA A. KEARNS, FIRST 50 YEARS: U.S. AIR FORCE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT 27 (2004). Also in 1950, the Army reopened its Judge Advocate General's School, previously located at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor and deactivated after World War II, in temporary facilities at Fort Myer, Virginia, until a permanent school was established the following year on the campus of the University of Virginia in Charlottesville, where it remains today. martial.[293] Yet the transition into lawyer-conducted general courts-martial was relatively smooth, with no noticeable adverse impact upon military discipline or effectiveness.[294]

[293] The court-martial rate during the Korean War was even higher than during World War II under the Articles of War. Westmoreland & Prugh, Judges in Command, supra note 201, at 86. For example, the Army's court-martial rate in the Korean War fluctuated between 9.5 and 11.6 courts per thousand soldiers. Id. at 90. During World War II, the Army's rate was never more than 6.9 per thousand. Id. at 38. Although the Korean War ended in 1953, the Cold War obliged the military to maintain a large force with a global presence. Consequently, judge advocates conducted a total of about two million courts-martial in the first ten years of the UCMJ's existence from 1951 to 1961.

Part 2. The Role of the Military Justice Review Group

Establishing the MJRG

The current comprehensive review of the UCMJ had its origins in a memorandum to the Secretary of Defense from General Martin Dempsey, then-Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The August 5, 2013 memorandum, written on behalf of the Joint Chiefs, recommended to then-Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel that he "direct the Department of Defense General Counsel to conduct a comprehensive, holistic review of the UCMJ and the military justice system . . . solely intended to ensure that our system most effectively and efficiently does justice consistent with due process and good order and discipline."[1] The memorandum observed that "much has changed since [the last major review of the UCMJ in 1983], to include the end of the Cold War, the successful integration of the All-Volunteer Force, and the enactment of the Goldwater-Nichols Act of 1986." The Joint Chiefs concluded that a "DOD-led holistic review of the UCMJ and the military justice system would be appropriate."[2]

On October 18, 2013, Secretary Hagel directed the Department of Defense General Counsel to "conduct a comprehensive review of the [UCMJ] and the military justice system with support from military justice experts provided by the Services."[3] Secretary Hagel determined that "[s]uch a review is appropriate given the many amendments to the UCMJ since the Military Justice Act of 1983 and the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM) since 1984."[4]

Secretary Hagel directed the review to "include an analysis of not only the UCMJ, but also its implementation through the MCM and service regulations."[5] The Secretary also directed the review to consider the June 2014 report and recommendations of the Response Systems Panel.[6] Finally, Secretary Hagel directed the preparation of two reports with relatively short deadlines: (1) a report due in 12 months providing recommendations for amendments to the UCMJ; and (2) a report due in 18 months providing recommendations for amendments to the MCM. Subsequently, the Secretary of Defense set specific deadlines for the report: March 25, 2015, for Part I of the Report (the UCMJ) and September 21, 2015, for Part II (the MCM and service regulations).

As directed by the Secretary of Defense, the DoD General Counsel established the MJRG with support from military justice experts provided by the Services.[7] The MJRG members detailed by the services included: one judge advocate in the grade of O-6 or O-5 with military justice expertise from each of the military services; two additional judge advocates in the grade of O-4 or O-3 with military justice experience from each of the military services; and a noncommissioned officer serving in the legal field from each of the military services. The Coast Guard nominated one military justice expert in the grade of O-5. The services provided all personnel to the MJRG for extended periods of time.

The military personnel on the MJRG served as team members, rather than as service representatives. As such, they were able to provide advice and assistance based upon their experience with the ability to initiate and comment on proposals without obtaining prior approval from their Services. At the same time, the military members were encouraged to engage experts from within their service and in other services as they explored ideas and shaped proposals.

The MJRG staff included civilian personnel with expertise in military and criminal law, as well as experienced legislative counsel. The MJRG also benefited from the assistance of personnel made available on a periodic basis by the DoD General Counsel and the Department of Justice. The General Counsel appointed Andrew S. Effron, former Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, to serve as the Director of the MJRG.

The General Counsel designated two distinguished experts in the law, the Honorable David Sentelle, former Chief Judge for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and the Honorable Judith Miller, former DoD General Counsel, to serve as Senior Advisors to the MJRG. The DoD General Counsel also requested that the Department of Justice designate an expert criminal litigator as an advisor to the MJRG. Mr. Jonathan Wroblewski, Director of the Office of Policy and Legislation in the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice (DoJ), served as DOJ's Advisor to the MJRG. Mr. John Sparks and Mr.

[7] In requesting nominees from the services, the General Counsel stated his expectation that "the judge advocates on the MJRG will have experience as military judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, and victim's counsel, or access to others in their organizations with those perspectives. They may also draw on their experience as staff judge advocates advising military commanders as convening authorities." Terms of Reference for Military Justice Review Committee (Jan. 24, 2014) and Addendum (Mar. 12, 2014) [hereinafter Terms of Reference and Addendum, respectively]. The Addendum changed the name from "Committee" to "Group." Both the Terms of Reference and Addendum are attached as Appendix C to this Report. The Federal Register also announced the MJRG's comprehensive review of the military justice system. 79 Fed. Reg. 28688-28689 (May 19, 2014).

Clark Price have served as advisors to the MJRG from the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

The Director and members of the MJRG provided the advisors with periodic updates on the status of the project, and from time to time consulted with the advisors on various issues. The discussions with each advisor, which took place on an individual basis, provided the MJRG with diverse perspectives from experienced experts. The interchanges with the advisors were conducted on an informal basis, not as a matter of coordination, and without any request for or expectation of approval for the Report or any of its components.

Scope of the MJRG's Review

This Report constitutes the MJRG's proposals for amendments to the UCMJ. The MJRG's proposal for changes to the MCM, which were submitted to the DoD General Counsel on September 21, 2015, currently are under review within the Department of Defense. Many aspects of military life and culture help shape and promote discipline within the armed forces in addition to the military justice system and its guiding documents, the UCMJ and MCM. Other important components of a disciplined force include matters such as recruiting and enlistment standards to determine who may serve; training of personnel in military values and culture; establishing an appropriate command climate; and the many administrative options available to commanders to enforce discipline and maintain good order, high morale, and esprit de corps.

Although the statutes, regulations, and policies governing the non-UCMJ aspects of military discipline have a bearing on the operation of the military justice system, an assessment of the impact and effectiveness of the non-UCMJ components of discipline is beyond the scope of this Report. Accordingly, although the MJRG took into account the non-UCMJ aspects of military discipline, the recommendations in Parts I and II of the Report focus on the statutory provisions of the UCMJ, its implementing executive order (MCM), and service implementation.

Guiding Principles and Operational Considerations of the MJRG

The General Counsel issued Terms of Reference for the MJRG, which established objectives and guidance for the MJRG to apply during its review. The Terms of Reference set forth five guiding principles:

- Use the current UCMJ as a point of departure for baseline reassessment.
- Where they differ with existing military justice practice, consider the extent to which the principles of law and the rules of procedure and evidence used in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts should be incorporated into military justice practice.
- To the extent practicable, UCMJ articles and MCM provisions should apply uniformly across the military services.

- Consider any recommendations, proposals, or analysis relating to military justice issued by the Response Systems Panel.[8]
- Consider, as appropriate, the recommendations, proposals, and analysis in the report of the Defense Legal Policy Board, including the report of that Board's Subcommittee on Military Justice in Combat Zones.[9]

The General Counsel also required the MJRG to "consult with general and flag officers who have had experience as general court-martial convening authorities," and to request the assistance of the Legal Counsel for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, to help "conven[e] a meeting or meetings with a suitable group of officers for this purpose."[10] Finally, the General Counsel required the Director to coordinate any proposals, at his discretion, on an ongoing basis with the DoD Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy), The Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Legal Counsel.[11]

In the course of the review, the MJRG identified six key considerations to provide operational guidance for the MJRG's analysis and to provide a framework for any MJRG proposals:

- Discipline: National security requires armed forces that are trained, motivated, and highly disciplined.
- Unique Features: History has demonstrated that military discipline requires a court-martial system that differs in important respects from the trial of criminal cases in the civilian sector, including:
    - unique military offenses (e.g., desertion, disrespect, disobedience);
    - unique military punishments (e.g., punitive discharges, reductions in rank); and
    - trials conducted outside the United States (e.g., in deployed and other overseas environments).

[8] The DoD General Counsel also specifically requested the MJRG to assess 14 of the Response System Panel's recommendations. U.S. Dep't of Def., Memorandum of the General Counsel on Recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel (Sep. 29, 2014). The General Counsel's memorandum is attached as Appendix F to this Report.

[9] Terms of Reference, supra note 7, at 3.

[10] Addendum, supra note 7.

[11] Terms of Reference, supra note 7, at 4.

- Democratic Values: History also has demonstrated that in our democratic society, servicemembers, their families, and the public expect the court-martial process to:
    - employ the standards and procedures of the civilian sector as far as practicable; and
    - counterbalance the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces and the hierarchical nature of military service with procedures to ensure protection of rights provided under military law.
- Personnel Policies:
    - The military justice system must be sufficiently flexible to function effectively across a wide variety of national and international environments, personnel practices, and operational requirements, regardless of whether the forces are composed of highly motivated volunteers, reluctant conscripts, or a combination of the two. In that regard, the military justice system must be designed not only for today's force, but also for the wide array of force structures that may be needed to address the national security challenges of the future.
    - The court-martial system is critical to the establishment of a disciplined force, but it is not the sole component. The establishment and maintenance of a disciplined force requires effective training, sound leadership, and sound personnel policies.
- Periodic Evaluations: The history of military justice has further demonstrated the need for periodic evaluation and recalibration of the court-martial process to maintain an appropriate balance between the interests of justice and discipline.
- Working Assumptions:
    - A primary focus of the MJRG's review is to promote justice through enhanced efficiency at all phases of the process.
    - The MJRG should strive to reduce unnecessary litigation by addressing ambiguities, uncertainties, and inconsistencies in rules, statutes, and case law.
    - With respect to recently enacted revisions to the UCMJ, the MJRG should confine further changes to those areas where there is a compelling reason for change, or to harmonize recent legislation with other recommended reforms. Similar considerations should apply with respect to areas with frequent litigation, but stable case law.
    - The MJRG should take into account, but is not bound by, past or current DoD positions on military justice matters.

- The MJRG should take into account the importance of maintaining "system balance"; that is, the balance among factors such as the constitutional and statutory rights of the accused, the power and resources of the prosecutor, the role of the commander, the statutory rights of the victim, and the importance of striving to achieve justice in order to maintain good order and discipline.

Public Input, DoD Outreach Discussions, and Consultation Sessions

In order to most efficiently and thoroughly complete its comprehensive review of the UCMJ and MCM, the MJRG utilized a variety of methods. The MJRG held outreach discussions with various military justice participants from DoD and the military services; the DoD Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy) facilitated specific requests for public input; a website informed those wishing to submit comments and suggestions to the MJRG on how to do so; and the MJRG engaged in consultation on selected issues with the Office of the General Counsel, The Judge Advocates General and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Legal Counsel for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff. Finally, the Director and members of the staff met periodically with the Senior Advisors to the MJRG. Due to the comprehensive nature of the review and the limited time frame within which to conduct it, the MJRG determined it would not be practical to collect or originate military justice data other than that already available from other sources.

Public Input to MJRG. Part I of the Report involves the development of a proposal by an internal DoD group for Department of Defense and executive branch review under standard legislative coordination policies prior to public release. Notwithstanding the internal nature of the MJRG's work, the Department of Defense determined that it would be valuable to provide an opportunity for public input to the MJRG. The Federal Register announced the MJRG's creation and described how the public could submit any desired comments.[12] The DoD Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy) sent over 400 letters to various organizations seeking public input to the MJRG.[13] The MJRG also created a website with information on providing comments and suggestions.[14] The MJRG received numerous thoughtful public comments which it considered and incorporated into the review process.

MJRG DoD Outreach Roundtable Discussions. Given the requirement to review every article of the UCMJ within a one year time frame and every provision of the MCM within six months after completing the UCMJ review, it was not practicable for the MJRG to hold hearings, engage in field investigations, or require the services to develop data on the [12] 79 Fed. Reg. 28688 (May 19, 2014).

[13] Organizations contacted for input included victim advocacy and human rights organizations, veterans' organizations, professional legal organizations, state and local bar associations, and 202 law schools in the United States that grant juris doctorates and are approved by the American Bar Association (ABA).

operation of every component of the UCMJ and MCM. The MJRG's location in Washington, however, enabled the MJRG to benefit from informal meetings with a large number of judge advocates and other military justice experts within the government who not only served in area organizations, but who also had extensive prior experience with military justice activities around the nation and in the deployed environment.

Throughout the spring and summer of 2014, the MJRG engaged in Outreach Roundtable Discussions with various DoD military justice experts, including military criminal investigative organizations, staff judge advocates and convening authorities, trial counsel, defense counsel, appellate counsel for the government and the defense, military trial and appellate judges, special victims' counsel, victim witness/assistance personnel, senior enlisted personnel, commanders, and flag and general officers. The Outreach Discussions provided an opportunity for DoD and Coast Guard military justice experts to engage in informal discussions with the MJRG, and to provide information to the MJRG as it conducted its comprehensive review. In addition, the Outreach Discussions created an opportunity for the DoD Services and the Coast Guard to provide any input they desired for the MJRG's consideration.

In the winter of 2015, the MJRG continued its Outreach Roundtable Discussions, meeting with commanders and senior enlisted personnel at Marine Corp Base Quantico, senior commanders attending the National Defense University at Fort McNair, Washington, District of Columbia, and additional commanders and judge advocates attending The Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School operated by the Army in Charlottesville, Virginia as well as the school's criminal law faculty.

Consultation Sessions. The General Counsel's Terms of Reference required the MJRG to "consult with general and flag officers who have had experience as general court-martial convening authorities," and to request the assistance of the Legal Counsel for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, to help "conven[e] a meeting or meetings with a suitable group of officers for this purpose."[15] With the assistance of the Chairman's Legal Counsel and his staff, the MJRG held two extended sessions with general and flag officers who had served as general court-martial convening authorities. Finally, the DoD General Counsel required the Director to coordinate any proposals, at his discretion, with the DoD Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy), The Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Legal Counsel. In addition, the General Counsel provided those officials and the military departments with the opportunity to review the MJRG's March 25 report. As directed by the General Counsel, the MJRG had the opportunity to consider, but was not bound by, the suggestions provided during the consultation and review process in the course of preparing the final version of this Report.

The Review Process Methodology

The MJRG Team Process. The MJRG organized the staff into four teams, representing different components of the military justice system: structure; punitive articles; pretrial and trial process; and sentencing and post-trial process. Military justice experts from the Services served as team leads: a general breakdown of the four teams' primary focus areas and responsibilities is below:

Structure Team
Focus Area	UCMJ Subchapters: Articles
A – Structure This focus area included a review of the fundamental structure of the military justice system, to include: nonjudicial punishment, courts of inquiry, and all levels of courts-martial; ways to improve funding the courts-martial system; and the rules and procedures for appointment of trial judges and the practice of the separate service trial judiciaries.	Subchapters I: Articles 1, 6-6A Subchapter III: Article 15 Subchapter IV: Articles 16-21 Subchapter V: Articles 22-29 Subchapter VII: Article 37 Subchapter XI: Articles 135-140
B – Jurisdiction & Preliminary Issues This focus area included a review of the rules, practices, and procedures related to military criminal investigation, apprehension, pretrial confinement, preliminary hearings, unlawful influence, and courts-martial jurisdiction (including issues related to the overlapping jurisdiction of military, federal, state, and foreign governments).	Subchapter I: Articles 2-5 Subchapter II: Articles 7-11, 13 Subchapter VI: Article 32
Pretrial and Trial Process Team
Focus Area	UCMJ Subchapters: Articles
C – Pretrial Process This focus area included a review of the rules, practices, and procedures from the initial disposition of charges to arraignment, including preferral and referral of charges, the role of special victims' counsel, and victims' rights.	Subchapter I: Articles 6b Subchapter II: Articles 12 & 14 Subchapter VI: Articles 30-31, 33-35 Subchapter VII: Article 36

Pretrial and Trial Process Team cont'd
Focus Area	UCMJ Subchapters: Articles
D – Trial Process This focus area included a review of the rules, practices, and procedures from arraignment to the announcement of findings, including, among other things, trial procedure, interlocutory appeals, and the Military Rules of Evidence.	Subchapter VII: Articles 38-42, 44-50, 51-53 Subchapter IX: Article 76b
Sentencing and Post Trial Team
Focus Area	UCMJ Subchapters: Articles
E – Sentencing This focus area included the rules, practices, and procedures of sentencing proceedings, to include: consideration of whether to adopt mandatory minimums and sentencing guidelines in courts-martial; and the role of the convening authority and the service courts of criminal appeals in reviewing sentences for appropriateness and clemency. Focus Area	UCMJ Subchapters: Articles
G – Punitive Articles This focus area included a comprehensive review of the punitive articles of the UCMJ, to include comparisons to federal offenses in Title 18 of the U.S. Code and the Model Penal Code, and whether to incorporate federal civilian offenses by reference rather than create separate offenses in the UCMJ.	Subchapter VII: Article 43, 50a Subchapter X: Articles 77-134
H – Standardization and Ongoing Review of the System This focus area included an examination of the current structure and role of the Code and Joint Service Committees with the aim of improving and making more robust the processes for keeping the military justice system current. This focus area also covers standardization across the services, including standardization with regard to data collection.	Subchapter XII: Article 146

The MJRG Teams conducted their reviews and analyses in two stages. In the first stage, each team researched and analyzed the portions of the UCMJ within their areas of responsibility. Using the DoD General Counsel's Terms of Reference and the MJRG's operational guidance as a framework, the MJRG teams completed a review of the UCMJ and its implementing rules in the MCM in order to identify issues for potential legislative and manual proposals.

For each UCMJ article or MCM rule (or any proposed new article or rule), the responsible MJRG Team compiled the relevant historical background of the UCMJ or MCM provision, and provided a thorough analysis of the provision, including: (1) current practice; (2) key judicial decisions and scholarly commentary; (3) ongoing legislative and regulatory developments; (4) parallel practices, if any, in federal and state criminal law; (5) other sources of law and policy; and (6) and any external proposals for change, such as from the Response Systems Panel or public input. Based on all of this information, the MJRG Team determined whether to propose changing the current provision, propose a new provision, or recommend no change. Each team, and each member of a team, had a full opportunity to comment on the proposals made by other team members and other teams.

There was vigorous and ongoing debate about many ideas and proposals contained in this Report, as well as those that were not included. This included inter- and intra-team in-depth discussions as well as debate and discussion with the Director and the MJRG as a whole, which continued into the Report drafting phase, in order to reach the ultimate decisions on this Report's proposals.

In the second stage of the team review process, the MJRG Teams combined the analysis of the respective UCMJ articles with specific proposed legislative language to prepare the analysis that appears in the Statutory Review and Recommendations section of this Report.

The MJRG submitted the initial draft of the legislative report to the DoD General Counsel on March 25, 2015. Following a period of internal review within the Department of Defense, the MJRG submitted a revised UCMJ report on September 2, 2015. The Department approved the legislative proposals in the revised report as an official Department of Defense proposal, and submitted the proposals to the Office of Management and Budget for interagency review.[16] After considering comments provided during the interagency review, the MJRG prepared this final report, which includes the legislation that has been submitted to Congress as an official administration proposal.

Based upon guidance from the DoD General Counsel, the MJRG also prepared a separate report on implementing rules, focusing primarily on the Manual for Courts-Martial

[16] See U.S. DEP'T OF DEF. DIR. 5500.01, PREPARING, PROCESSING, AND COORDINATING LEGISLATION, EXECUTIVE ORDERS, PROCLAMATIONS, VIEWS LETTERS, AND TESTIMONY (Jun. 15, 2007) and OMB Circular A-19.

(MCM).[17] The MJRG's report on the MCM, which was submitted to the DoD General Counsel on September 21, 2015, currently is under review within the Department of Defense.[18]

[17] The President implements the UCMJ and prescribes rules for pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedure by executive order in the MCM.

[18] Based upon guidance from the DoD General Counsel, the MJRG's September 21, 2015 report on the MCM was designated as a "Discussion Draft." The MCM recommendations were drafted with the understanding that revisions would be necessary to reflect any changes in the legislative proposals during the course of interagency review and consideration by the Congress, as well as during any formal coordination of a draft executive order following enactment of amendments to the UCMJ. As such, the MJRG's Discussion Draft serves as the foundation for subsequent development of a proposed executive order, not as an official proposal.

Section B.
Statutory Review and Recommendations

Article-by-Article Index of UCMJ Recommendations

The implementing rules and guidance in the Manual for Courts-Martial for all UCMJ articles, including those recommended to be retained in their current form, will be examined in Part II of the MJRG Report.

- Amend the article to allow military magistrates, with the consent of the parties and upon designation by a military judge, to preside over special courts-martial referred to a judge alone under proposed Art. 16.

§ 820. Art. 20. Jurisdiction of summary courts-martial

- Amend the article to clarify that a finding of guilt at a summary court-martial is not a conviction from a criminal court.

§ 821. Art. 21. Jurisdiction of courts-martial not exclusive

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

SUBCHAPTER V. COMPOSITION OF COURTS-MARTIAL

§ 822. Art. 22. Who may convene general courts-martial

- Retain the article with technical amendments.

§ 823. Art. 23. Who may convene special courts-martial

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 824. Art. 24. Who may convene summary courts-martial

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 825. Art. 25. Who may serve on courts-martial

- Amend the article to permit detailing enlisted personnel to serve on court-martial panels without a specific request from the accused for enlisted representation, and to permit detailing enlisted members from the same unit as the accused under the same conditions applicable to detailing of officers from the same unit as the accused.

- Retain the right of an enlisted accused to specifically elect one-third enlisted panel membership or elect an all-officer panel.

- Amend the article to require that the convening authority detail a sufficient number of members for impanelment under the proposed amendments to Article 29.

§ 825a. Art. 25a. Number of members in capital cases

- Amend the article to require a fixed panel size of twelve members in capital cases.

- This article will be retitled as "Number of court-martial members in capital cases."

§ 826. Art. 26. Military judge of a general or special court-martial

- Amend the article to require, as is current practice, that a military judge be detailed to every general and special court-martial.
- Amend the article to authorize cross-service detailing of military judges, with the approval of the appropriate Judge Advocate General.
- Amend the article to require the appointment by the Judge Advocate General of a chief trial judge in each Armed Force.
- Amend the article to establish appropriate criteria for the Judge Advocate General to use in certifying a person for service as a military judge.
- Amend the article to authorize the President to establish uniform regulations concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges with provisions for early reassignment as necessary.

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 826a. Art. 26a. Military magistrates

- Establish a new article providing for Judge Advocates General certification of military magistrates pursuant to broad qualification criteria, similar to the requirements for military judges.
- In the new statute, provide that military magistrates may perform duties other than those under Articles 19 and 30a in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned.

§ 827. Art. 27. Detail of trial counsel and defense counsel

- Amend the article to require uniform qualifications for defense counsel at all courts-martial, and to require that all trial counsel and assistant trial counsel meet certain minimum requirements and be determined competent by their Judge Advocate General.
- Amend the article to require that, to the greatest extent practicable, at least one defense counsel detailed to a capital case be "learned in the law" applicable to capital cases.

§ 828. Art. 28. Detail or employment of reporters and Interpreters

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 829. Art. 29. Absent and additional members

- Amend the article to clarify the function of assembly and impanelment in courts-martial with members and the limited situations in which a member may be absent after assembly.
- Amend the article to authorize the impanelment of alternate members on courts-martial, similar to the use of alternate jurors in federal practice.
- Amend the article to allow non-capital general courts-martial to proceed after impanelment with not less than six members if members are excused.
- This article will be retitled as "Assembly and impaneling of members; detail of new members and military judges."

SUBCHAPTER VI. PRE-TRIAL PROCEDURE

§ 830. Art. 30. Charges and specifications

- Retain the article with technical amendments.

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 830a. Art. 30a. Proceedings conducted before referral

- Establish a new article authorizing the President to issue regulations permitting military judges or magistrates to consider certain pretrial matters and make judicial rulings on those matters before referral of charges to a court-martial.
- Authorize the President to issue regulations setting forth the matters that may be ruled upon and limitations on available remedies.

§ 831. Art. 31. Compulsory self- incrimination prohibited

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 832. Art. 32. Preliminary hearing

- Retain the primary focus on an initial determination of probable cause before referring charges to a general court-martial.
- Amend the article to revise the requirement for a disposition recommendation to focus the preliminary hearing officer more directly on providing an analysis of information that will be useful in informing the staff judge advocate's recommendation and the convening authority's ultimate disposition decision under Articles 30 and 34.
- Amend the article to also provide an opportunity for the parties and the victim to submit material to inform the hearing officer's report and ultimately the Staff Judge

Advocate recommendation and convening authority decision regarding appropriate disposition of the case.

- This article will be retitled as "Preliminary hearing required before referral to general court-martial."

§ 833. Art. 33. Forwarding of charges

- Strike this article, but incorporate it substantively into Art. 10.

Proposed new title and content for UCMJ article

§ 833. Art. 33. Disposition guidance

- Establish a new article requiring that the Secretary of Defense issue non-binding guidance regarding factors that convening authorities and judge advocates should take into account when exercising disposition discretion.
- The guidance shall take into account, with appropriate consideration of military requirements, the principles contained in the U.S. Attorney's Manual concerning the fair and evenhanded administration of criminal law.

§ 834. Art. 34. Advice of staff judge advocate and reference for trial

- Require that a staff judge advocate's recommendation on whether to refer charges to trial uses the standard of whether referral is "in the interest of justice and discipline."
- Enhance the article by requiring that convening authorities consult with a judge advocate on relevant legal issues before referring charges for trial at special courts-martial.
- This article will be retitled as "Advice to convening authority before referral for trial."

§ 835. Art. 35. Service of charges

- Retain the article with technical amendments.
- This article will be retitled as "Service of charges; commencement of trial."

SUBCHAPTER VII. TRIAL PROCEDURE

§ 836. Art. 36. President may prescribe rules

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 837. Art. 37. Unlawfully influencing action of court

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 838. Art. 38. Duties of trial counsel and defense counsel

- Amend the article to require that assistant defense counsel in general and special courts-martial be qualified in accordance with proposed changes in Art. 27.

§ 839. Art. 39. Sessions

- Retain the article with conforming amendments to align it with the proposals in Articles 16 and 53 for fixed-size member panels, the elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge, and judge-alone sentencing in all non-capital general and special courts-martial.

§ 840. Art. 40. Continuances

- Retain the article with conforming amendments.

§ 841. Art. 41. Challenges

- Retain the article with conforming amendments to align it with the proposal in Art. 16 for fixed-size member panels, and the elimination of special courts-martial without a military judge.

§ 842. Art. 42. Oaths

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 843. Art. 43. Statute of limitations

- Amend the article to increase the statute of limitations for child abuse offenses to 10 years or life of the child, whichever is longer.
- Technical amendments to the statute of limitations for offenses under Art. 83 "Fraudulent enlistment" (proposed to be recodified as Art. 104).
- Amend the article to extend the statute of limitations for offenses in which DNA evidence implicates an identified person.
- Other technical amendments to the article.
- Application provision.

§ 844. Art. 44. Former jeopardy

- Amend the article by placing the attachment of jeopardy to when the panel members are impaneled after challenges are exercised, instead of when evidence is first introduced.
- This amendment will align double jeopardy protections under the UCMJ more closely with federal practice.

§ 845. Art. 45. Pleas of the accused

- Amend the article to permit an accused to plead guilty in capital cases where the sentence of death is not mandatory.
- Amend the article so that review of deviations from the article's requirements are subject to a "harmless error" standard of review; not all deviations would mandate invalidation of the guilty plea.
- Amend the article to eliminate the need for separate Service regulations authorizing entry of findings upon acceptance of a guilty plea.
- Other technical amendments to the article.

§ 846. Art. 46. Opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence

- Amend the article to allow the issuance of investigative subpoenas for the production of evidence prior to referral and preferral of charges. This will align UCMJ subpoena authority with that in federal and state jurisdictions, and improve the operation of the military justice system in this area.
- Amend the article by moving the provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims to Article 6b, extending these protections to all victims as defined under that article.
- Amend the article by providing military judges with the ability to issue warrants and court orders for the production of certain electronic communications under the Stored Communications Act, 18 U.S.C. §2701 et seq. This will align the authority to obtain such evidence for use in courts-martial more closely with federal and state practices.
- Amend the article to provide authority to military judges to modify, quash, or order compliance with military subpoenas, issued before or after referral of charges, in conjunction with the subpoena and warrant authorities proposed in the article.

§ 847. Art. 47. Refusal to appear or testify

- Amend the article to clarify its function with respect to the enforcement of subpoenas for civilian witnesses and evidence custodians.
- This article will be retitled as "Refusal of person not subject to chapter to appear, testify, or produce evidence."

§ 848. Art. 48. Contempts

- Amend the article to extend the contempt power of military judges to pre-referral sessions and proceedings, consistent with the proposed amendments to Art. 26 and the authorities proposed in new Art. 30a.

- Amend the article to provide for appellate review of contempt punishments in a manner consistent with the review of other orders and judgments under the UCMJ. This will align the UCMJ more closely in this area with the review procedures applicable in federal district courts and federal appellate courts regarding the contempt power.
- Amend the article to clarify that judges on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals do not have to be "detailed" to cases or proceedings in order to exercise contempt power.
- This article will be retitled as "Contempt."

§ 849. Art. 49. Depositions

- Amend the article to require that depositions are ordered only when either party demonstrates that the testimony of the prospective witness may be lost and should therefore be preserved for later use at trial.
- The proposed amendments will align the use of depositions under the UCMJ more closely with federal practice, and improve the operation of the military justice system in this area.
- Amend the article to conform to recent changes to Article 32, by requiring that deposition officers be judge advocates certified under Article 27(b) "whenever practicable."
- Other technical and conforming amendments to the article.

§ 850. Art. 50. Admissibility of records of courts of inquiry

- Amend the article to permit sworn testimony from a court of inquiry to be either played from an audio or visual recording or read into evidence when it is otherwise admissible.
- This article will be retitled as "Admissibility of sworn testimony from records of courts of inquiry."

§ 850a. Art. 50a. Defense of lack of mental responsibility

- Retain this article with conforming amendments based on the proposal to eliminate special courts-martial without a military judge.

§ 851. Art. 51. Voting and rulings

- Retain the article with conforming amendments.

§ 852. Art. 52. Number of votes required

- Amend this article to require concurrence of at least three-fourths (75 percent) of the members present to convict for non-capital offenses and unanimity on the findings and sentence for capital offenses, and to conform to the proposal in Article 16 for fixed-size panels in general and special courts-martial.

- This article will be retitled as "Votes required for conviction, sentencing, and other matters."

§ 853. Art. 53. Court to announce action

- Amend the article to require sentencing by a military judge in all general and special courts-martial, except in capital cases. For capital offenses, members would determine whether the sentence shall include death, life without eligibility for parole, or such other lesser punishments as may be determined by the military judge.
- This article will be retitled as "Findings and sentencing."

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 853a. Art. 53a. Plea Agreements

- Establish a new article to more closely align plea agreements under the UCMJ with federal practice and improve the operation of the military justice system in this area.
- Provide statutory authority for convening authorities to enter into plea agreements under the system of sentencing by the military judge, guided by sentencing parameters, proposed in Articles 53 and 56, and consistent with the entry of judgment model proposed in Article 60c.

§ 854. Art. 54. Record of trial

- Amend the article to facilitate the use of modern court reporting technology in the recording, certification, and distribution of court-martial records; authorize certification of the record of trial by a court reporter, instead of authentication by the military judge.
- Amend the article to require a complete record in any general or special courts-martial in which confinement or forfeitures exceed six months.

SUBCHAPTER VIII. SENTENCES

§ 855. Art. 55. Cruel and unusual punishments prohibited

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 856. Art. 56. Maximum and minimum limits

- Amend the article to require "segmented" sentencing in general and special courts-martial, where confinement is adjudged for each individual guilty finding; this further aligns sentencing under the UCMJ with federal practice, and will improve the operation of the military justice system in this area.

- Amend the article to establish sentencing parameters and criteria for use in general and special courts-martial to provide guidance to military judges in determining an appropriate sentence.
- Establish a Board, within the Department of Defense, to develop sentencing parameters and criteria as well as review and recommend changes to sentencing rules and procedures.
- Amend the article to authorize appeal by the government, in limited circumstances, of awarded sentences.
- This article will be retitled as "Sentencing."

§ 856a. Art. 56a. Sentence of confinement for life without eligibility for parole

- Strike this article, but incorporate it substantively into Article 56.

§ 857. Art. 57. Effective date of sentences

- Combine Articles 57, 57a, and 71 into one single article that addresses when an accused begins serving a court-martial punishment as well as deferment of punishment.

§ 857a. Art. 57a. Deferment of sentences

- Strike this article, but incorporate it substantively into Article 57.

§ 858. Art. 58. Execution of confinement

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 858a. Art. 58a. Sentences: reduction in enlisted grade upon approval

- This article will be repealed, and the automatic reductions in grade of enlisted members will sunset when the sentencing parameters and criteria proposed under Art. 56 take effect.

§ 858b. Art. 58b. Sentences: forfeiture of pay and allowances during confinement

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

SUBCHAPTER IX. POST-TRIAL PROCEDURE AND REVIEW OF COURTS-MARTIAL

§ 859. Art. 59. Error of law; lesser included offense

- Amendment of this article is not required to facilitate proposed reforms or consideration of further reforms.

§ 860. Art. 60. Action by the Convening authority

- Amend the article to address the requirements for a Statement of Trial Results in general and special courts-martial and to authorize the President to establish regulations addressing post-trial motions.
- Amend the article to eliminate redundant or unnecessary paperwork in cases where the recent legislation has removed the convening authority's post-trial discretion.
- This article will be retitled as "Post-trial processing in general and special courts-martial."

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 860a. Art. 60a. Limited authority to act on the sentence in specified post-trial circumstances

- Retain and clarify limitations on the convening authority's ability to act on the findings and sentence of most general and special courts-martial, with conforming amendments to align the article with other revisions to post-trial processing
- Establish restricted authority to suspend sentences of confinement or punitive discharge, limited to cases where the military judge recommends suspension and the convening authority acts within the scope of the military judge's recommendation.

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 860b. Art. 60b. Post-trial actions in summary courts-martial and certain general and special courts-martial

- Establish this article to clarify the convening authority's power to modify the findings and sentence in all summary courts-martial and any general or special court-martial not covered by the proposed Article 60a, consistent with current law.

Proposed new article to the UCMJ

§ 860c. Art. 60c. Entry of judgment

- Establish this article to more closely align post-trial processing under the UCMJ with federal practice, and enhance the operation of the military justice system in this area.
- Amend the article to require, in all general and special courts-martial, that the military judge make an "entry of judgment" incorporating the statement of trial results and any post-trial action of the convening authority. In summary courts-martial, the judgment would consist of the findings and sentence of the court-martial, as modified by any post-trial actions of the convening authority.

§ 861. Art. 61. Waiver or withdrawal of appeal

- Retain the article with conforming amendments.
- This article will be retitled as "Waiver of right to appeal; withdrawal of appeal."

§ 862. Art. 62. Appeal by the United States

- Amend the article to authorize the government to appeal when, upon defense motion, the military judge sets aside a panel's finding of guilty because of legally insufficient evidence; such an appeal would not be authorized when it would violate Article 44's prohibitions on double jeopardy.
- Other conforming amendments to the article.

§ 863. Art. 63. Rehearings

- Amend the article so that, at a sentencing rehearing, where an accused changes his or her plea to not guilty or otherwise fails to comply with the terms a pretrial agreement, the new sentence that may be awarded is not limited, or capped, by the original sentence.
- Remove the prohibition on increased sentences at rehearing after a sentence is set aside based on a government appeal of the sentence.
- These amendments will align sentencing rehearings under the UCMJ with federal practice and improve the operation of the military justice system in this area.

§ 864. Art. 64. Review by a judge advocate

- Amend the article so that the option for review of a proceeding by a judge advocate applies only to summary courts-martial.
- Other conforming amendments to the article.
- This article will be retitled as "Judge advocate review of finding of guilty in summary court-martial."

§ 865. Art. 65. Disposition of records

- Amend the article to require forwarding for review by an appellate defense counsel a copy of the record of trial for cases eligible for direct access review by the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals under Article 66.
- Amend the article to require review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General of all general and special court-martial cases not eligible for direct access review by the Courts of Criminal Appeals under proposed Article 66.
- Amend the article to require review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General of all court-martial cases that are eligible for direct access review by Courts of Criminal Appeals under Art. 66, but where appeal has been waived, withdrawn, or not filed.
- This article will be retitled as "Transmittal and review of records."

§ 866. Art. 66. Review by Court of Criminal Appeals

- Amend the article to replace the automatic review of all non-capital cases with an "appeal of right."
- Amend the article to authorize direct access to the Courts of Criminal Appeals for all courts-martial that include a sentence greater than six months confinement or a punitive discharge, instead of the current threshold of greater than one year confinement or a punitive discharge.
- Amend the article to authorize direct access to the Courts of Criminal Appeals for all courts-martial in which the government previously appealed under proposed Article 62.
- Amend the article to allow an accused to apply for discretionary review by the Court of Criminal Appeals when the accused is not entitled to file an appeal of right.
- Amend the article to provide statutory standards for factual sufficiency review, sentencing appropriateness review, and review of excessive post-trial delays.
- This article will be retitled as "Courts of Criminal Appeals."

§ 867. Art. 67. Review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces

- Amend the article to require notification to other Judge Advocates General in connection with any decision by a Judge Advocate General to certify a case for review by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.
- Conforming amendments to align the article to the creation of an "entry of judgment" in Article 60c.

Subchapter I. General Provisions

Article 1 – Definitions
10 U.S.C. § 801

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend the current definition of "judge advocate" in Article 1(13)(A) to reflect that a judge advocate in the Air Force is a member of the Air Force Judge Advocate General's Corps. The proposal also would amend the definition of "military judge" in Article 1(10) to reflect proposed changes in Article 30a, allowing limited detailing of military judges outside the context of a referred general or special court-martial case.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 1 provides statutory definitions for certain words and terms used throughout the UCMJ. Currently, the definition of "judge advocate" in Article 1(13) does not reflect the 2003 name change from the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Department" to the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Corps." Also, Article 1(10) defines "military judge" to mean "an official of a general or special court-martial detailed in accordance with [Article 26]."

3. Historical Background

Article 1 was designed to define and explain certain words and terms used within the UCMJ. Although the statute has remained relatively unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950,[1] Congress has periodically amended Article 1 for clarity and to account for changing circumstances.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 1 through R.C.M. 103. The rule incorporates by reference all Article 1 definitions into the Manual for Courts-Martial, and adds additional definitions applicable throughout the Manual.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The definitions under Article 1, as well as those prescribed by the President under R.C.M. 103, are in many instances similar to the definitions applicable in federal civilian practice, provided under 1 U.S.C. §§ 1-5 and Fed. R. Crim. P. 1.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 1.1: Amend Article 1(13)(A) to reflect the change within the Air Force from the "Judge Advocate General's Department" to the "Judge Advocate General's Corps."

[1] Act of May 5, 1950, Pub. L. No. 81-506, ch. 169, 64 Stat. 108.

- Prior to 2003, the Air Force Judge Advocate General's Corps was known as the Judge Advocate General's Department. This amendment would reflect the 2003 change.

Recommendation 1.2: Amend Article 1(10) to conform the definition of "military judge" to the proposed addition of Article 30a, allowing limited detailing of military judges to address matters prior to referral of charges.

- This is a conforming change.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 101. DEFINITIONS.

(a) DEFINITION OF MILITARY JUDGE.—Paragraph (10) of section 801 of title 10, United States Code (article 1 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(10) The term 'military judge' means a judge advocate designated under section 826(c) of this title (article 26(c)) who is detailed under section 826(a) or section 830a of this title (article 26(a) or 30a)).".

(b) DEFINITION OF JUDGE ADVOCATE.—Paragraph (13) of such section (article) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A), by striking "the Army or the Navy" and inserting "the Army, the Navy, or the Air Force"; and

(2) in subparagraph (B), by striking "the Air Force or".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 101 contains amendments to Article 1 of the UCMJ concerning the definitions of "military judge" and "judge advocate," as follows:

Section 101(a) would amend the definition of "military judge" in Article 1(10) to reflect the changes in Articles 16, 19, 26, and 30a regarding the detailing of military judges. See Sections 401, 403, 504, and 602, infra.

Section 101(b) would make a technical amendment to Article 1 to reflect the 2003 name change from the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Department" to the "Air Force Judge Advocate General's Corps."

Article 2 – Persons Subject to this Chapter
10 U.S.C. § 802

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 2 to clarify personal jurisdiction over reserve component members performing periods of inactive-duty training. This Report does not recommend any other changes to Article 2.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 2 defines which persons are subject to the jurisdiction of courts-martial under the UCMJ. Article 2(a) specifies thirteen categories of persons who, by their membership in a defined category—for example, members of a regular component of the armed forces, cadets and midshipmen, and persons in the custody of the armed forces serving a court-martial sentence, among others—are subject to UCMJ jurisdiction. Of particular relevance to this proposal, Article 2(a)(3) provides jurisdiction over members of a reserve component while on inactive-duty training, including members of the National Guard performing inactive-duty training while in federal service. Article 2(b) specifies that UCMJ jurisdiction for new enlistees commences upon taking the oath of enlistment. Article 2(c) supplements subsection (a), defining additional criteria by which a person serving with an armed force who is not otherwise subject to the Code may "constructively enlist" and thereby be subject to court-martial jurisdiction.[1] Article 2(d) specifies requirements for recalling a servicemember to active duty involuntarily for purposes of military justice proceedings, and Article 2(e) states that jurisdiction under the statute is subject to the mental capacity standards provided in Article 76b.

3. Historical Background

The first American Articles of War, enacted by the Continental Congress in 1775, began with a personal jurisdiction provision that required all officers and soldiers to subscribe to the Articles of War upon their commissioning or enlistment.[2] From that first version of the Articles of War until 1920, similar provisions regarding jurisdiction appeared in either Article 1 or the Articles of War Preamble. In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War to provide for statutory definitions in Article 1 and, as under the current UCMJ, Congress provided the various categories of persons subject to military law in Article 2.[3] When the

UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress borrowed from Article 2 of the Articles of War, Article 5 of the proposed Articles for Government of the Navy, and a variety of existing federal statutes to create the new Article 2, delineating twelve categories of persons subject to UCMJ jurisdiction.[4] Since it was first enacted, Article 2 has been amended several times, and the issue of personal jurisdiction under the UCMJ has been contested regularly in both military and civilian courts.[5]

The definitions of some terms are necessary for understanding the application of personal jurisdiction under the UCMJ. As used throughout the Manual for Courts-Martial, the term "active duty" means full-time duty in the active military service of the United States.[6] The term includes full-time training duty, annual training duty, and attendance at a school designated as a service school by law while in active service.[7] "Active service" means service on active duty.[8] "Inactive-duty training," means duty performed pursuant to service regulations as a member of a reserve component of the armed forces.[9] This duty often takes place on weekends in four-hour increments commonly referred to as "drill" periods.

Historically, the armed services took different approaches to exercising jurisdiction over members of a reserve component on inactive-duty training.[10] Prior to the UCMJ's

Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 5-6 (1957) (holding that the provisions of Article 2(11), extending court-martial jurisdiction to persons accompanying the armed forces outside the continental limits of the United States, could not be constitutionally applied to trial of civilian dependents of members of the armed forces overseas, in times of peace, for capital offenses); O'Callahan v. This Report focuses primarily on the application of the UCMJ to active and reserve members of the armed forces. Jurisdiction over civilians has not been invoked frequently in recent decades. In that context, this Report does not provide a recommendation to amend Article 2 beyond the specific recommendations regarding reservists under Article 2(3).

enactment in 1950, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard exercised jurisdiction in all situations involving reserve training.[11] The Navy extended jurisdiction broadly, subjecting reservists to court-martial jurisdiction for any duty or instruction period, and any time they wore their uniforms.[12] In contrast, the Army historically exercised court-martial jurisdiction over reservists more narrowly, finding jurisdiction only in situations where the reservist was using expensive or dangerous equipment.[13]

During the drafting of the UCMJ, the proposed provision for court-martial jurisdiction over reservists in an inactive-duty training status specified that "reserve personnel who are voluntarily on inactive-duty training authorized by written orders" would be subject to UCMJ jurisdiction.[14] The "written orders" requirement was added to apply jurisdiction only to certain types of training and to provide notice of UCMJ jurisdiction to the personnel concerned.[15] The legislation was further refined during congressional consideration to read: "(3) Reserve personnel while they are on inactive-duty training authorized by written orders voluntarily accepted by them, which orders specify that they are subject to the code."[16] The legislative history indicates that it was the drafters' intent to extend court-martial jurisdiction principally to reservists over training weekends who use dangerous and expensive equipment such as aircraft and ships, and that it was not intended to cover other incidental circumstances.[17] Article 2(3) was enacted in this revised form as part of the UCMJ. In 1979, the statute was redesignated as Article 2(a)(3) without change.[18]

In 1986, Congress amended Articles 2 and 3 to make three changes in jurisdiction over reservists.[19] First, Article 2(a)(3) was modified to eliminate the requirement that the reservist must voluntarily accept orders to active duty in order for court-martial jurisdiction to attach.[20] Second, Article 2(d) was added to provide for authority, under regulations established by the President, to involuntarily activate reservists not on active duty for the purposes of nonjudicial punishment or court-martial proceedings. Third, Article 3(d) was added to provide that a reservist would still be subject to court-martial jurisdiction, even after the termination of a period of active duty or inactive duty for training, for offenses committed during a period of active duty or inactive duty for training.[21]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under Article 2(a)(1), persons subject to UCMJ jurisdiction include "[m]embers of a regular component of the armed forces, including . . . other persons lawfully called or ordered into, or duty in or for training in, the armed forces, from the dates when they are required by the terms of the call or order to obey it." In addition, Article 2(a)(3) specifies that "[m]embers of a reserve component while on inactive-duty training" are subject to the UCMJ. Misconduct by reservists that takes place outside of inactive-duty drill periods, even if committed on base or in government housing, typically falls outside of UCMJ jurisdiction. Military courts have held to a bright-line rule for personal jurisdiction over reservists, finding no jurisdiction over a reservist who commits an offense when not on active duty or inactive-duty training.[22]

Although Article 2(a)(3) provides a basis for personal jurisdiction over reservists performing inactive-duty training (IDT) in certain circumstances, jurisdictional gaps remain: misconduct by a reserve component member carried out while en route from their home to their IDT drill site, or while berthed in military housing or contract commercial berthing, or during periods in between successive IDTs (i.e. meal breaks and Saturday evenings), or while en route from the IDT site to their home typically all fall outside of UCMJ jurisdiction under current law. Misconduct that occurs during the periods described above, which, for example, could include driving under the influence, damage to government quarters, or a crime of violence, has the potential to negatively affect good order and discipline in the armed forces.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Jurisdictional issues based on military status normally do not arise in federal civilian proceedings except in a narrow class of cases arising under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act.[23]

In civil litigation, such as cases involving the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), amenability to military discipline is not sufficient by itself to establish federal liability for the acts of reservists committed outside the scope of their duties.[24]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 2: Amend Article 2 to expand the applicability of UCMJ jurisdiction for reserve component members performing inactive-duty training.

- Under the present interpretation of Article 2(a)(3), UCMJ jurisdiction over reserve component members performing inactive-duty training typically applies only during individual four-hour drill periods. A clarification in the law is needed to ensure that UCMJ jurisdiction applies to misconduct committed by an individual ordered to inactive-duty training throughout the drill period, including after working hours.
- The proposed amendments to Article 2 would enhance good order and discipline in the reserve components of the armed forces by giving commanders better disciplinary options to address misconduct that takes place incident to periods of Inactive-Duty Training.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing an ambiguity in current law with respect to court-martial jurisdiction over reserve personnel.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 102. CLARIFICATION OF PERSONS SUBJECT TO UCMJ WHILE ON INACTIVE-DUTY TRAINING.

Paragraph (3) of section 802(a) of title 10, United States Code (article 2(a) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(3)(A) While on inactive-duty training and during any of the periods specified in subparagraph (B)—

"(i) members of a reserve component; and

United States, 786 F.2d 964, 968 (9th Cir. 1986) ("[A] soldier traveling between duty stations is not acting within the scope of employment notwithstanding the military's general right to control his activities."); Bissell v. McElligott, 369 F.2d 115, 119 (8th Cir. 1966) ("[T]he unique control which the Government maintains over a soldier has little if any bearing upon determining whether his activity is within the scope of his employment.").

"(ii) members of the Army National Guard of the United States or the Air National Guard of the United States, but only when in Federal service.

"(B) The periods referred to in subparagraph (A) are the following:

"(i) Travel to and from the inactive-duty training site of the member, pursuant to orders or regulations.

"(ii) Intervals between consecutive periods of inactive-duty training on the same day, pursuant to orders or regulations.

"(iii) Intervals between inactive-duty training on consecutive days, pursuant to orders or regulations.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 102 would amend Article 2(a)(3) of the UCMJ to clarify jurisdiction over reserve component members performing periods of inactive-duty training. The amendment would provide commanders clearer authority to address misconduct that takes place during periods incident to inactive-duty training, and during intervals between inactive-duty training on consecutive days.

Article 3 – Jurisdiction to Try Certain Personnel
10 U.S.C. § 803

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 3. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 3.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 3 provides UCMJ jurisdiction over four special classes of persons. Article 3(a) provides that if a person commits an offense while subject to the Code, and there is a subsequent break in that jurisdiction, the person is not relieved from amenability to trial for that offense once UCMJ jurisdiction is re-established. Article 3(b) provides for continuing court-martial jurisdiction over individuals who are alleged to have fraudulently obtained a discharge from the military on the issue of the fraudulent discharge. It further provides that if the servicemember is convicted of fraudulently obtaining a discharge, the member is then subject to trial by court-martial for all offenses committed before the fraudulent discharge. Article 3(c) addresses the narrow situation that could arise if a deserter subsequently enlists in the service (or receives a commission) and is then discharged from that second term of service. It provides that the deserter is still subject to UCMJ jurisdiction despite the later discharge. Article 3(d) provides that reservists are still subject to court-martial jurisdiction, even after the termination of a period of active duty or inactive duty for training, for offenses committed during a period of active duty or inactive duty for training if they still have time remaining on their military obligation.

3. Historical Background

Under the Articles of War, court-martial jurisdiction was lost over military personnel following their separation from service.[1] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Article 3(a) established continuing court-martial jurisdiction over certain discharged members for acts they committed prior to their discharge.[2] The original version of Article 3(a) sought to balance the interest in terminating court-martial jurisdiction over an individual following a valid discharge against the interest in holding accountable individuals who committed crimes in a place where state and federal jurisdiction was lacking, and who had been subsequently discharged from the service.[3] The drafters of the UCMJ included subsection (c) to address a case in which the court held that a discharge from the Navy barred military prosecution of a person who had deserted from the Marine Corps, subsequently enlisted in the Navy, and thereafter had been validly discharged from Navy.[4]

In 1955, the Supreme Court held that Congress could not, under its constitutional authority to make rules for the government of the armed forces, subject a servicemember who had been validly discharged to trial by court-martial for a violation of military law committed before the discharge.[5] Subsection (d) was added to the statute in 1986, to provide for continuing UCMJ jurisdiction over reservists despite breaks in their periods of service.[6] In 1987, the President promulgated R.C.M. 204 provisions that reflected and implemented the changes to Article 3(d) as well as other changes made to Article 2, the main statute concerning UCMJ jurisdiction. In 1992, Congress adopted the current form of Article 3(a) to align the statute with controlling case law and contemporary practice.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 3 through R.C.M. 202 and 204. The Discussion to R.C.M. 202(a) addresses the implementation of the provisions of Article 3(a)-(c). R.C.M. 204 addresses jurisdiction over reserve personnel. Current service regulations specifically provide that members whose enlistments have expired but who are still awaiting formal discharge are subject to UCMJ jurisdiction. Under applicable case law, jurisdiction over active duty military personnel normally continues until: (1) the member receives a valid discharge certificate; (2) there is a final accounting of pay; and (3) the member has completed administrative clearance processes required by his or her Service Secretary.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 3 in federal civilian practice due to aspects of personal jurisdiction unique to the military.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 3: No change to Article 3.

- In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 3's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 3.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.
- Changes to jurisdiction over reserve personnel recommended in Article 2 would provide more clarity as to when a reservist is subject to UCMJ jurisdiction during periods of training and drilling. The proposed amendments to Article 2 are consistent with the current jurisdictional authority found in Article 3.

Article 4 – Dismissed Officer's Right to Trial by Court-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 804

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 4. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 4.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

In time of war, the President may order the dismissal of an officer.[1] Article 4 provides that any officer dismissed by order of the President can make a written application alleging wrongful dismissal. Upon the filing of such an application, the officer must be tried by a general court-martial convened by the President as soon as practicable. If the President fails to convene a court-martial within six months, the Secretary of the service concerned must substitute an administrative discharge for the dismissal ordered by the President. If a court-martial is convened but does not adjudge dismissal or death, the Secretary concerned must substitute an administrative discharge for the dismissal. If an administrative discharge is substituted for a Presidential discharge, only the President can reappoint the officer. If an officer is discharged by administrative action, the officer does not have a right to trial by court-martial under Article 4.

3. Historical Background

Article 4 addresses a difference in procedure that existed between the Army and the Navy prior to the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950.[2] Under the Articles of War, Army officers did not have the right to request a court-martial when dismissed by the President.[3] However, Article 37 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy provided naval officers with such a right.[4] Article 4 provided a uniform rule consistent with the Navy's practice.[5] By Article 36 of the earlier Articles for the Government of the Navy provided the President the same authority to dismiss an officer without a court-martial finding. However, instead of providing the authority in "time of war," it withheld the authority "in time of peace." AGN 36 of 1930. Case law interpreting the "in time of peace" provision of Article 36 held that it "contemplated not a mere cessation of the hostilities, but peace in the complete sense, officially proclaimed." See Kahn v. requesting a trial, such officers could 'ameliorate the infamy' of the dismissal by converting it to an administrative discharge, if the result of the trial did not support the dismissal.[6] Article 4 differed from previously existing law in that it provided—depending on the results of the court-martial (or whether the trial was convened in a timely manner)—for the substitution of an administrative discharge rather than completely voiding the dismissal of the President.[7] This change was based on concern that Congress lacked the constitutional authority to provide a means to outright void the decision of the President concerning the dismissal of an officer.[8] The drafters agreed that the President's decision to remove an officer from the service could not be curtailed, but believed the characterization of the officer's service could be changed based on the findings of a subsequent court-martial.[9] Article 4 has remained relatively unchanged since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 4 through R.C.M. 107. Both the statute and the rule have limited applicability, as the President may only order the dismissal of an officer during time of war and there are other administrative procedures for removing officers from further service.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 4 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 4: No change to Article 4.

- The right of an officer to demand a trial by court-martial after a dismissal by the President during time of war under Article 4 is not contentious and is a stable provision, albeit with limited applicability.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 4.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique feature of military practice.

Article 5 – Territorial Applicability of this Chapter
10 U.S.C. § 805

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 5. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 5.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 5 provides that the UCMJ is applicable in all places without limitation.

3. Historical Background

Prior to enactment of the UCMJ, Army courts-martial exercised worldwide jurisdiction for most offenses, but Navy courts-martial were conducted under provisions that generated jurisdictional issues.[1] Article 6 of the Articles for the Government of the United States Navy (1930), only allowed military trials for murder when the accused was alleged to have been a person "belonging to any public vessel of the United States," who committed the offense outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. Even when this provision was amended in 1945, removing the requirement for the accused to "belong" to a vessel, the geographical limitation on jurisdiction for murder continued to cause confusion and difficulty in cases, leading to calls for its elimination.[2] The UCMJ, as enacted in 1950, adopted the worldwide jurisdictional approach for all offenses[3]. Other than a technical amendment in 1956, there have been no other amendments to this article.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 5 through Rule for Courts-Martial 201(a)(2).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 5 is unique to the military given its worldwide mission and does not have a counterpart in federal civilian law. Geographically, UCMJ jurisdiction reaches every place where servicemembers and other persons subject to the Code are present. Venue in federal civilian practice is governed by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and by statute.[4]

Except as otherwise expressly provided by enactment of Congress, any offense against the United States begun in one district and completed in another, or committed in more than one district, may be inquired of and prosecuted in any district in which such offense was begun, continued, or completed.[5] Jurisdiction is provided by statute, such as 18 U.S.C. § 7 (Special Maritime and Territorial Jurisdiction), by some interstate nexus such as a weapon possessed by a felon,[6] or by some other legislative finding. Although federal civilian criminal jurisdiction is generally limited to offenses committed in the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, some federal statutes have been given extraterritorial application.[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 5: No change to Article 5.

- In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 5's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary. The current statute reflects the expeditionary nature of our armed forces, and is critical to the administration of military justice around the globe. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 5.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.
- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

Article 6 – Judge Advocates and Legal Officers
10 U.S.C. § 806

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 6 by broadening the disqualification provision under Article 6(c) to include appellate judges, and counsel who have participated in the same case—including victims' counsel—in any proceeding before a military judge, preliminary hearing officer, or appellate court. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 6.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 6 concerns the assignment for duty of judge advocates and the role of staff judge advocates and legal officers in military justice matters. The article contains four subsections. Article 6(a) provides that the assignment for duty of judge advocates shall be made upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General or, in the case of Marine Corps judge advocates, by direction of the Commandant of the Marine Corps; and that the Judge Advocate General or senior members of his staff shall make frequent field inspections in supervision of the administration of military justice. Subsection (b) requires convening authorities to communicate directly with their staff judge advocates or legal officers in all military justice matters, and empowers staff judge advocates and legal officers to communicate directly with other staff judge advocates and legal officers in the chain of command, or directly with the Judge Advocate General. Subsection (c) disqualifies military judges, trial and defense counsel, investigating officers, and panel members from later acting as a staff judge advocate or legal officer to any reviewing authority in a case in which they previously participated. Subsection (d) authorizes judge advocates assigned or detailed to hold or exercise the functions of civil offices within the government to perform such duties, subject to reimbursement by the agency concerned under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Homeland Security.

3. Historical Background

Article 6 was designed to fulfill four related purposes: (1) to place judge advocates and legal officers under the independent control of the Judge Advocates General; (2) to enhance the effectiveness and independence of staff judge advocates and legal officers by requiring direct communication between them and their commanding officers in all military justice matters, and by providing for independent communication among judge advocates; (3) to help prevent interference with the due administration of military justice by the command; and (4) to ensure review of court-martial cases by independent staff judge advocates.[1]

[1] See Uniform Code of Military Justice: Hearings on H.R. 2498 Before a Subcomm. of the H. Comm. on Armed Services, 81st Cong. 898 (1949) [hereinafter Hearings on H.R. 2498]; H.R. REP. No. 81-491, at 12-13 (1949); see also MCM, App. 21 (R.C.M. 105, Analysis).

Subsections (a)-(c) of the statute were derived from Articles 47a and 11 of the Articles of War and have changed little since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[2] There were no similar provisions in the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] In 1967, Congress amended Article 6(a) to provide the Commandant of the Marine Corps (as opposed to the senior judge advocate) with the responsibility for the duty assignments of Marine Corps judge advocates.[4] This change reflected the unique structure of the Marine Corps and its position as a distinct military service within the Department of the Navy. Subsection (d) of the statute, concerning the assignment of judge advocates to hold and exercise the functions of civil office within the government, was added in 1987.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented subsections (b) and (c) of Article 6 through R.C.M. 105 and R.C.M. 1106(b), respectively. Both rules essentially repeat the statutory provisions.[6] R.C.M. 503(b)-(c) provide that the Judge Advocates General may permit the detailing of counsel or military judges from one service to serve as counsel or military judge in a different armed force, a combatant command, or a joint command, consistent with their authority under Article 6(a) with respect to assignments for duty of judge advocates.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no direct federal civilian analogue for Article 6. However, Article 6's provisions concerning the independence of staff judge advocates and legal officers reflect the quasi-judicial role of these officers within the military command structure, similar to rules and canons concerning "judicial independence" in the civilian sector.[7] In addition, 28 U.S.C. § 530B explicitly obligates attorneys for the Government, including Assistant U.S. Attorneys, to observe applicable state rules of professional responsibility, which preclude attorneys from assuming roles in cases where they were previously involved in a different capacity.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 6: Amend Article 6(c) to expand the disqualification provision concerning later involvement in the same case as the staff judge advocate or legal officer to also include appellate judges and counsel who have acted in the same case or in any proceeding before a military judge, preliminary hearing officer, or appellate court.

- This proposed amendment would account for the role of victims' counsel (including Special Victims' Counsel under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e) and appellate judges in military practice, ensuring no conflicts of interest when an individual who has been assigned for duty in one of these positions is subsequently assigned for duty as a staff judge advocate to the reviewing authority with respect to the same case.
- This proposal also would account for pre-referral proceedings, such as Article 32 preliminary hearings, where the counsel assigned to represent the government or the defense may not have been specifically detailed as "trial counsel" or "defense counsel." In these situations, the assigned counsel should be disqualified from later action as the staff judge advocate.
- This proposal also reflects recent changes to Article 32, redesignating the "investigating officer" as a "preliminary hearing officer."

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposed change supports MJRG Operational Guidance by addressing an ambiguity in Article 6(c)'s disqualification provision with respect to victims' counsel (including Special Victims' Counsel under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e), appellate judges, and counsel who participate in proceedings prior to referral of charges and specifications for trial, thereby reducing the risk of unnecessary litigation.
- This proposal accounts for the establishment of military magistrates who, when designated to act on matters as authorized under the proposed amendments to Articles 19 and 30a, would be disqualified from further participation in a case in a different capacity.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 103. STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE DISQUALIFICATION DUE TO PRIOR INVOLVEMENT IN CASE.

Subsection (c) of section 806 of title 10, United States Code (article 6 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) No person who, with respect to a case, serves in a capacity specified in paragraph (2) may later serve as a staff judge advocate or legal officer to any reviewing or convening authority upon the same case.

"(2) The capacities referred to in paragraph (1) are, with respect to the case involved, any of the following:

"(A) Preliminary hearing officer, court member, military judge, military magistrate, or appellate judge.

"(B) Counsel who have acted in the same case or appeared in any proceeding before a military judge, military magistrate, preliminary hearing officer, or appellate court.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 103 would amend Article 6, which concerns the assignment for duty of judge advocates and the role of staff judge advocates and legal officers in military justice matters. Article 6(c) currently disqualifies military judges, trial and defense counsel, investigating officers, and panel members from later acting as a staff judge advocate or legal officer to any reviewing authority in a case in which they previously participated. The proposed amendments would expressly cover military magistrates when presiding over pre-referral proceedings under Article 30a, or when presiding, with the parties' consent, over cases referred to judge-alone special courts-martial, under Article 19. See Sections 403, 602, infra. The amendments also would revise the disqualification provision under Article 6(c) to include appellate judges and counsel (including victims' counsel) who have participated previously in the same case or in any proceeding before a military judge (to include a military magistrate designated under Articles 19 or 30a), preliminary hearing officer, or appellate court in the same case.

Article 6a – Investigation and Disposition of Matters Pertaining to the Fitness of Military Judges

10 U.S.C. § 806a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would align Article 6a with the proposal to allow the detailing of military magistrates to proceedings under Article 30a, adding "military magistrates" to the list of officials whose fitness to perform duties shall be subject to investigation and disposition under regulations prescribed by the President. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 6a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 6a directs the President to prescribe procedures for the investigation and disposition of charges, allegations, or information pertaining to the fitness of military judges and military appellate judges to perform their judicial duties. The statute requires that such procedures shall be uniform for all armed forces to the extent practicable, and it directs the President to transmit a copy of the procedures prescribed to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

3. Historical Background

Enacted in 1989, Article 6a was intended by Congress to establish procedures to investigate and dispose of allegations concerning judges in the military consistent with similar procedures found in the civilian sector.[1] Other than minor technical amendments in 1996 and 1999, the statute has remained unchanged since its enactment.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 6a through R.C.M. 109(c), which was added to the rule in 1993.[2] R.C.M. 109 generally delegates responsibility for professional supervision of military judges, judge advocates, and other counsel to the service Judge Advocates General. The specific procedures prescribed in subsection (c) for investigation and disposition of matters pertaining to the fitness of military judges are modeled after the American Bar Association's Model Standards Relating to Judicial Discipline and Disability Retirement (1978) (ABA Model Standards) and the procedures relating to the investigation of complaints against federal judges established by the Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of

[1] See H.R. REP. NO. 101-331, at 656 (1989) (Conf. Rep.). See generally MCM, App. 21 (R.C.M. 109(c), Analysis).

[2] MCM, App. 21 (R.C.M. 109(c), Analysis).

1980, 28 U.S.C. § 372(c).[3] R.C.M. 109(c) recognizes the overall responsibility of the Judge Advocates General for the professional supervision and discipline of military trial and appellate judges and provides the Judge Advocates General with final disposition authority with respect to any findings and recommendations made during the initial inquiry into the matters alleged.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The procedures prescribed by the President under Article 6a and R.C.M. 109(c) for investigation and disposition of matters pertaining to the fitness of military judges are based on similar federal civilian standards and procedures recommended in the ABA Model Standards and established by federal law under title 28. Specifically, 28 U.S.C. § 351(d)(1) includes "magistrate judge" within the definition of "judge" with respect to investigations into fitness for duty complaints against federal civilian judges.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 6a: Amend Article 6a to add "military magistrate" to the list of officials whose fitness to perform duties shall be subject to investigation and disposition under regulations prescribed by the President.

- This proposal is a conforming amendment to align Article 6a with the proposal to allow the detailing of military magistrates to proceedings under Article 30a. The purpose of this proposal is to enable the Judge Advocates General to appropriately investigate complaints of misconduct or lack of fitness with respect to any official designated to perform official judicial duties under the UCMJ.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 6a, including any updates needed based on the Judicial Improvements Act of 2002, 28 U.S.C. §§ 351-364.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by employing, insofar as practicable, the standards and procedures of the civilian sector pertaining to the investigation and disposition of matters relating to the fitness of officials authorized to perform judicial duties, including federal magistrate judges.

[3] Id. This Act was later replaced by the Judicial Improvements Act of 2002, 28 U.S.C. §§ 351-364. See generally ELIZABETH B. BAZAN, JUDICIAL DISCIPLINE PROCESS: AN OVERVIEW (2005), available at http://fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/RS22084.pdf.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 104. CONFORMING AMENDMENT RELATING TO MILITARY MAGISTRATES.

The first sentence of section 806a(a) of title 10, United States Code (article 6a(a) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "military judge" and all that follows through the end of the sentence and inserting "military appellate judge, military judge, or military magistrate to perform the duties of the position involved.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 104 would amend Article 6a of the UCMJ to align the statute with the changes proposed in Article 19 and the proposed new sections, Articles 26a and 30a, concerning military magistrates. See Sections 403, 507, and 602, infra. Article 6a directs the President to prescribe procedures for the investigation and disposition of charges, allegations, or information pertaining to the fitness of military judges and military appellate judges to perform their judicial duties. The proposed amendment would add "military magistrate" to the list of officials whose fitness to perform duties shall be subject to investigation and disposition under regulations prescribed by the President, consistent with federal law concerning the investigation and disposition of matters relating to the fitness of federal magistrate judges in the performance of their judicial duties.

Article 6b – Rights of the Victim of an Offense Under this Chapter

10 U.S.C. § 806b

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 6b in order to better align military practice with federal civilian practice under the Crime Victims' Rights Act with respect to the relationship between the rights of victims and the disposition of offenses, as well as the procedures for judicial appointment of individuals to assume the rights of certain victims. The proposed amendments also would move recently enacted provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses into Article 6b and would extend those provisions to victims of all offenses, consistent with related victims' rights provisions.

Part II of the Report will address a number of different areas in the rules implementing (or implicating) Article 6b, with particular emphasis on structuring the victim's role in the disposition decision-making process and ensuring the victim's right to participate in the court-martial process is fully realized. Part II of the Report will address pretrial, trial, and post-trial procedures in the context of victim's rights. In addition, Part II of the Report will consider and address recent and proposed changes to the Military Rules of Evidence impacting victims during the pretrial and trial stages of the court-martial process.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 6b provides victims of offenses under the UCMJ with the following rights:

- To be reasonably protected from the accused;
- To reasonable, accurate, and timely notice of any public hearing or proceeding concerning the continuation of confinement prior to trial of the accused, a preliminary hearing under Article 32, a court-martial, or clemency and parole board proceeding involving the crime, or any release or escape of the accused;
- To not be excluded from any such public hearing or proceeding, unless the court, after receiving clear and convincing evidence, determines that testimony by the victim would be materially altered if the victim heard other testimony at that proceeding;
- To be reasonably heard at any public proceeding involving pretrial release, sentencing, or any parole proceeding;
- To reasonably confer with the attorney for the government in the case;
- To restitution as provided by law;

- To proceedings free from unreasonable delay; and
- To be treated with fairness and with respect for the victim's dignity and privacy.

The statute defines a "victim" as an individual who has suffered direct physical, emotional, or pecuniary harm as a result of the commission of an offense under the UCMJ. Subsection (c) states that the military judge shall designate a representative for the victim in a case where the victim is under 18 years of age, not in the military, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased. The definition of "victim of an offense" under Article 6b applies only to natural persons. Article 6b(d) provides that nothing in the statute authorizes a cause of action for damages against the United States or any of its officers or employees. The statute states that victims may file petitions for writs of mandamus with the Courts of Criminal Appeals when the victim asserts the trial judge erred in rulings under M.R.E. 412 (Relevance of alleged victim's sexual behavior or sexual predisposition) and M.R.E. 513 (Psychotherapist-patient privilege). These interlocutory appeal provisions serve to highlight a victim's right to seek relief by mandamus on the two matters, but they do not restrict victims' ability to seek extraordinary relief under applicable law for violations of the other rights that are listed in Article 6b.[1]

3. Historical Background

Congress enacted Article 6b in 2013.[2] The statute codifies victims' rights under the UCMJ and incorporates many provisions of the federal Crime Victims' Rights Act.[3] In 2014, Congress amended Article 6b to clarify the definition of victim and the authority to appoint individuals to assume the rights of certain victims.[4] The 2014 legislation also added subsection (e) to the statute regarding petitions for writs of mandamus in connection with rulings under M.R.E. 412 and 513.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

In recent years, legislative changes to the UCMJ have addressed concerns about the manner in which the military justice system has handled sexual assault allegations and the treatment of victims of sexual assault and other sex-related offenses. These changes have served to enhance victims' rights and victim participation throughout the military justice process. The Department of Defense has addressed these changes primarily through directives and additional guidance.[6]

In 2011, Congress enacted legislation providing victims of sexual assault in the military with legal assistance services, sexual assault response coordinators, and victim advocates.[7] In 2013, Congress required the establishment of additional services to provide support to adult victims of sex-related offenses.[8] On August 14, 2013, the Secretary of Defense directed each of the services to implement special victim's advocacy programs to provide legal advice and representation to victims of sex-related offenses.[9] Congress built upon this directive by enacting legislation requiring the services to establish Special Victims' Counsel programs and make available legal assistance and representation to victims of sex-related offenses.[10]

In the NDAA FY 2014, Congress also required the Secretary of Defense to designate an authority within each service to receive and investigate complaints against Department of Defense civilian employees and military personnel relating to the provision of, or violation of, victims' rights under Article 6b.[11] The Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel recommended that the Secretary of Defense assess the effectiveness of the complaint processes to determine whether a more uniform process is needed.[12] On December 14, 2014, the Secretary approved the recommendation and referred it to the Services for implementation.[13]

The Special Victims' Counsel program provides support to victims of sexual assault, enhances the role of victims within the military justice system, and helps to enforce the rights of victims under Article 6b. Pursuant to the program, eligible victims can receive legal advice and representation by a Special Victims' Counsel on a wide array of matters. Special Victims' Counsel assist victims: (1) in understanding the military justice process; (2) by providing legal guidance to victims to allow full participation in applicable programs, services, and the military justice process; and (3) by representing victims in proceedings in connection with the reporting, investigation, and prosecution of sex-related offenses.

[13] Memorandum from Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel, "Department of Defense Implementation of the Recommendations of the Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel" (15 December 2014).

Article 6b became effective immediately upon enactment.[14] A recent executive order contains numerous provisions to implement Article 6b rights throughout the Manual for Courts-Martial.[15] These provisions include the following:

- R.C.M. 305(i) provides crime victims the right to timely notice of the 7-day pretrial confinement review; the right to attend and be heard at a pretrial confinement hearing; and the right to confer with the government counsel.
- R.C.M. 405(i)(2) provides crime victims the right to notice of a preliminary hearing under Article 32, the right to confer with counsel for the government, and the right to be present at a preliminary hearing.
- R.C.M. 801(a)(6) provides procedures to appoint a representative for victims who are minors.
- R.C.M. 806(b)(2) provides crime victims the right to attend a court-martial proceeding and reflects the standard for exclusion from the courtroom articulated in Article 6b(a)(3).
- R.C.M. 906(b)(8) provides crime victims the right to notice of a motion or hearing to release the accused from pretrial confinement, the right to confer with the trial counsel, and the right to be heard on the motion.
- R.C.M. 1001 and R.C.M. 1001A implement the requirements of Article 6b(a)(4)(B) regarding sentencing hearings and further provide crime victims with the right to make an unsworn statement during the sentencing phase in non-capital courts-martial.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 6b incorporates into the military justice system many of the rights set forth in the Crime Victims' Rights Act.[16] A recent executive order contains numerous provisions to implement Article 6b rights throughout the Manual for Courts-Martial.[17]

---

[14] In its report, the Response Systems Panel provided an extended analysis and recommendations concerning implementation of Article 6b in various Manual for Courts-Martial provisions and service regulations. See RESPONSE SYSTEMS PANEL REPORT, supra note 12, at 28-31. Part II of this Report will address these recommendations and provide additional analysis and recommendations concerning implementation of Article 6b in the MCM.

[17] Exec. Order No. 13,696, 80 Fed. Reg. 35,783 (Jun. 22, 2015).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 6b.1: Amend Article 6b to conform military law to federal civilian practice by addressing the relationship between victims' rights under Article 6b and the exercise of disposition discretion under Articles 30 and 34.

- The Crime Victims' Rights Act, which affords numerous rights to crime victims, specifically states that those rights do not impair the prosecutorial discretion of the Attorney General or any officer under his direction. Although Article 6b contains a nearly identical "No cause of action" provision, the statute does not contain a similar provision addressing the relationship of the rights afforded to victims under subsection (a) and the exercise of disposition discretion under the UCMJ.
- This proposal would better align military practice with federal civilian practice, expressly addressing and clarifying the relationship between victims' rights under the UCMJ and the exercise of disposition discretion by convening authorities under Articles 30 and 34.
- The proposed amendment would serve as a foundation for further clarification in the Rules for Courts-Martial and other Manual provisions of the role of victims at various stages in the military justice process.

Recommendation 6b.2: Amend Article 6b to conform military law to federal civilian practice by expanding the options available for assumption of a victim's rights by a proper representative when the victim is under 18 years of age, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased.

- The Crime Victims' Rights Act provides that, "[i]n the case of a crime victim who is under 18 years of age, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased, the legal guardians of the crime victim or the representatives of the crime victim's estate, family members, or any other persons appointed as suitable by the court, may assume the crime victim's rights under this chapter, but in no event shall the defendant be named as such guardian or representative." This proposal would align military practice with federal civilian practice by mirroring the language currently contained in the CVRA, with minor changes to adapt the language to military use.
- The proposed amendment would promote efficiency by eliminating the need for the military judge to designate a representative when another court of competent jurisdiction has already appointed a legal guardian who can assume the rights of the victim on their behalf.

Recommendation 6b.3: Amend Article 6b by incorporating the provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims currently located in Article 46(b), extending those provisions to victims of all offenses.

- This provision would address the procedure for interviewing victims in the context of the rights of all who are designated as victims under Article 6b.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- These proposals support the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating into military justice practice, to the extent practicable, the principles of law and the rules of procedure used in the trial of criminal cases in the U.S. district courts, specifically in the area of victims' rights.
- Accompanying proposals related to the enhancement of victims' rights are addressed in Article 32 (providing for a victim's input on disposition of offenses), Article 54 (increasing access to records of trial for victims of any offense), and Article 140a (providing improved public access to military justice matters).
- Proposals for additional substantive offenses related to the matters under Article 6b include the proposal for Article 93a (improper sexual activity with recruits and trainees), Article 130 (expand the current prohibition against stalking to include cyberstalking and threats to intimate partners), and Article 132 (retaliation against victims and witnesses of crime).

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 105. RIGHTS OF VICTIM.

(a) DESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE.—Subsection (c) of section 806b of title 10, United States Code (article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended in the first sentence by striking "the military judge" and all that follows through the end of the sentence and inserting the following: "the legal guardians of the victim or the representatives of the victim's estate, family members, or any other person designated as suitable by the military judge, may assume the rights of the victim under this section.".

(b) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.—Subsection (d) of such section (article) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) by striking the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) to impair the exercise of discretion under sections 830 and 834 of this title (articles 30 and 34).".

(c) INTERVIEW OF VICTIM.—Such section (article) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f) COUNSEL FOR ACCUSED INTERVIEW OF VICTIM OF ALLEGED OFFENSE.—(1) Upon notice by counsel for the Government to counsel for the accused of the name of an alleged victim of an offense under this chapter who counsel for the Government intends to call as a witness at a proceeding under this chapter, counsel for the accused shall make any request to interview the victim through the Special Victim's Counsel or other counsel for the victim, if applicable.

"(2) If requested by an alleged victim who is subject to a request for interview under paragraph (1), any interview of the victim by counsel for the accused shall take place only in the presence of the counsel for the Government, a counsel for the victim, or, if applicable, a victim advocate.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 105 contains amendments related to the rights of victims under Article 6b of the UCMJ, as follows:

Section 105(a) would clarify the procedure for appointment of individuals to assume the rights of a victim who is under 18 years of age, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased, consistent with the similar provision in the Crime Victims' Rights Act. This change would conform military law to federal civilian law with respect to the procedure for appointment of individuals to assume the rights of certain victims.

Section 105(b) would clarify the relationship between the rights provided to victims under the UCMJ and the exercise of disposition discretion under Articles 30 and 34, consistent with a similar provision in the Crime Victims' Rights Act concerning the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. This change would conform military law to federal civilian law with respect to the relationship between the rights of victims and the duties of government officials to investigate crimes and properly dispose of criminal offenses.

Section 105(c) would move the recently enacted provisions concerning defense counsel interviews of victims of sex-related offenses from Article 46(b) into Article 6b and would extend those provisions to victims of all offenses, consistent with related victims' rights provisions.

Implementing regulations would address a number of matters concerning the rights of victims under Article 6b, to include: the ability of victims to be heard on the plea, confinement, release, and sentencing (including through an unsworn statement); the victim's input on the disposition of offenses to the convening authority; the right to notice of proceedings and the release or escape of the accused; the right not to be excluded from proceedings absent a required showing; and the right to submit post-trial matters to the convening authority.

Subchapter II. Apprehension and Restraint

Article 7 – Apprehension
10 U.S.C. § 807

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 7. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 7.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 7 concerns the apprehension of persons subject to the Code for law enforcement purposes. The article contains three subsections. Article 7(a) defines apprehension as the taking of a person into custody (equivalent to a civilian "arrest"). Article 7(b) provides that any person authorized under regulations governing the armed forces to apprehend persons subject to the Code, or otherwise subject to prosecution under the UCMJ, may do so upon reasonable belief that an offense has been committed and the person to be apprehended committed it. This standard is equivalent to probable cause.[1] In addition, Article 7(c) provides specific authority to commissioned officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and noncommissioned officers to apprehend persons in order to "quell quarrels, frays, and disorders" among persons subject to the Code.

3. Historical Background

Article 7 has not been amended since the enactment of the UCMJ in 1950.[2] The drafters of the UCMJ chose the word "apprehension" to eliminate confusion created by "a certain duality of meaning in the words 'arrest,' 'restraint,' 'confinement,' and words of that character" as those terms were used in the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[3] Under the Code, "apprehension" refers to the initial taking or seizing of a person into custody. "Arrest" and "confinement" under Article 9, by contrast, refer to subsequent formal actions that may be taken by the accused's commanding officer and that terminate the initial period of custody. The drafters also adopted a standard that embodies the concept of probable cause, while rejecting any requirement for the issuance of a warrant prior to apprehension on the grounds that such a requirement would be inconsistent with the military environment.[4]

[4] See Hearings on H.R. 2498, supra note 3, at 902.

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 7 through R.C.M. 302. The rule provides that apprehensions under Article 7 may be conducted by military law enforcement officials; commissioned, warrant, petty, and noncommissioned officers; and civilians authorized to apprehend deserters under Article 8. The remainder of the rule provides the standard for apprehension (probable cause) and the procedures applicable to apprehensions.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian practice and military practice with respect to apprehensions differ slightly in terminology ("arrest" versus "apprehension") and in the procedures required for a lawful apprehension. In the federal civilian system, arrests are generally made upon warrants issued by the court or a magistrate judge under Fed. R. Crim. P. 4 and 9. In military practice, apprehensions may be made by military law enforcement personnel upon probable cause without a warrant.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 7: No change to Article 7.

- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 7.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline assessment. Based on the stability in the case law dealing with Article 7's substantive provisions, no change is warranted.

Article 8 – Apprehension of Deserters
10 U.S.C. § 808

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 8. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 8.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 8 provides that any civilian law enforcement officer authorized to arrest offenders under federal or state laws may summarily apprehend a deserter from the armed forces and deliver the person into military custody.

3. Historical Background

In 1885, the Supreme Court held that a civilian law enforcement officer did not have the authority to arrest a military deserter unless the authority to do so could be "derived from some rule of the law of England which has become a part of our law, or from the legislation of Congress."[1] The Court concluded that English law had never authorized such arrests and that existing U.S. law failed to establish the authority to do so.[2] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War to provide civilian law enforcement officers with statutory authority to arrest deserters.[3] Article 8 was based on that original statutory provision and remains virtually unchanged from its original form.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 8 through R.C.M. 302(b)(3), which restates the statutory provision. The Discussion to R.C.M. 302(b)(3) clarifies that civilian law enforcement officers do not have the authority to apprehend military members for other violations of the UCMJ.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 8 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 8: No change to Article 8.

- Article 8 remains an important statutory authority in military justice practice and is the basis for cooperation between military and civilian law enforcement personnel in desertion cases.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 8.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique feature of military law that is essential to the law enforcement function in desertion cases.

Article 9 – Imposition of Restraint
10 U.S.C. § 809

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 9. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 9.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 9 concerns the imposition of restraint, including arrests and confinement, upon persons subject to the Code before and during disposition of offenses. Generally, such forms of restraint are imposed by the order of an accused's commanding officer and act to terminate an initial period of custody following an apprehension under Article 7; however, apprehension is not a prerequisite for the imposition of restraint.[1] Article 9 is divided into five subsections. Subsection (a) defines "arrest" as the restraint of a person by an order, not imposed as a punishment for an offense, directing the person to remain within certain specified limits. "[C]onfinement" is defined as the physical restraint of a person. Subsection (b) provides that an enlisted member may be ordered into arrest or confinement by any commissioned officer or, if authorized by the member's commanding officer, by a warrant, petty, or noncommissioned officer. Subsection (c) provides that commissioned officers, warrant officers, and civilians subject to the Code may be ordered into arrest or confinement only by their commanding officer. Subsection (d) provides that no person may be ordered into arrest or confinement except for probable cause. Finally, subsection (e) clarifies that Article 9's provisions do not limit the authority of persons authorized to make apprehensions under Article 7, such as military law enforcement personnel.

3. Historical Background

Under the Articles of War, the Army used the term "arrest" to refer both to apprehension and the imposition of restraint.[2] The Navy employed the term "close arrest" to describe a practice that was essentially confinement.[3] The drafters of the UCMJ sought to eliminate the confusion created by the use of the term "arrest" to refer both to law-enforcement type apprehensions (Article 7) and command-directed restraint or confinement pending disposition of charges, so they placed these authorities in different articles.[4] Subsections

(b)-(d) of Article 9 reflect the practices in place in the Army and the Navy at the time of the article's enactment.[5] Article 9 has not been amended since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[6]

In 1993, in United States v. Rexroat, the Court of Military Appeals clarified that Supreme Court case law requiring a review of the probable cause basis for pretrial confinement within 48 hours by a "neutral and detached magistrate" applies to military confinement orders under Article 9.[7] However, the court declined to hold that the 48-hour probable cause review must be conducted by a military magistrate. Citing the authority given to all commissioned officers under Article 9(b) to order enlisted members into arrest or confinement, the court held that the 48-hour review could be conducted by a non-magistrate commissioned officer, so long as the officer is "neutral and detached" and not involved in the command's law enforcement function.[8]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 9 through R.C.M. 304 and 305, which govern pretrial restraint and pretrial confinement, respectively. R.C.M. 304 defines pretrial restraint as "moral or physical restraint on a person's liberty which is imposed before and during disposition of offenses." The rule then defines the different levels of military restraint —conditions on liberty, restriction in lieu of arrest, arrest, and confinement—and the procedures for ordering restraint of persons subject to the Code. R.C.M. 305 provides the rules and procedures applicable to pretrial confinement pending disposition of charges, including review of the confinement decision by commanding officers and neutral and detached pretrial confinement review officers.[9] These rules and procedures are discussed in greater detail in the section of this Report addressing Article 10 (Restraint of persons charged with offenses).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The authority to impose restraint under Article 9 is somewhat analogous to a U.S. district court's authority to issue arrest warrants under Fed. R. Crim. P. 4. Furthermore, the review function of the "neutral and detached officer" under R.C.M. 305(i)(1) (48-hour review) is similar to the function of the magistrate judge at the initial appearance under Fed. R. Crim. P. 5 and applicable Supreme Court case law concerning the 48-hour review requirement.[10]

The notification aspects of the initial appearance under the federal rule are also similar to the charge notification requirement under Article 30(b) and R.C.M. 305(e); however, whereas the magistrate judge provides notice to the defendant of the charges in federal civilian practice, in military practice this is a command function.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 9: No change to Article 9.

- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 9.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline assessment. Based on the stability in the case law dealing with Article 9's substantive provisions, no change is warranted.
- This recommendation is related to this Report's proposal in Article 30a to authorize military magistrates and military judges to conduct specific judicial functions prior to referral of charges and specifications for trial, including the review of pretrial confinement decisions.

Article 10 – Restraint of Persons Charged with Offenses

10 U.S.C. § 810

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 10 to conform the language of the statute to current practice and related statutory provisions. Additionally, it would place into Article 10 the requirement for forwarding of charges and, when applicable, the preliminary hearing report, when an accused is in confinement (currently in Article 33 in the form of an eight-day forwarding requirement whenever a person is being "held for trial by general court-martial"). Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 10.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 10 concerns restraint of persons charged with offenses and, in conjunction with Article 33, the actions that must be taken by military commanders and convening authorities when persons are held for trial by court-martial. The statute provides that any person subject to the Code who is charged with an offense shall, as the circumstances may require, be ordered into arrest or confinement; but that any person charged only with an offense normally tried by a summary court-martial shall not ordinarily be placed in confinement. The statutory authority for commanding officers and other officials to order persons subject to the Code into arrest or confinement is provided separately in Article 9. Article 10 also provides that, when a person is placed in arrest or confinement prior to trial, immediate steps shall be taken to inform the person of the accusation and to either proceed to trial or dismiss the charges and release the person.

3. Historical Background

Article 10 was derived from Articles 69 and 70 of the Articles of War and was generally consistent with the practice in the Navy at the time of the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[1] However, the provision requiring notice to the confined person did not exist in prior laws or practice.[2] The statute has not been amended since it was enacted. The requirement in the statute that proper authority take "immediate steps" toward trial when an accused has been ordered into arrest or confinement has been interpreted as creating a speedy trial right, beyond that provided for in R.C.M. 707 and the Sixth Amendment, for an accused in pretrial confinement.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 10 through R.C.M. 304 (Pretrial restraint), R.C.M. 305 (Pretrial confinement), and R.C.M. 707 (Speedy trial).

R.C.M. 304(c) and 305(d) address when a person may be ordered into arrest or confinement. R.C.M. 304(e) and 305(e) implement Article 10's notice requirement, and R.C.M. 305(e) provides that an accused who is ordered into confinement must also be promptly informed of his right to remain silent and his right to counsel. R.C.M. 304(c) and R.C.M. 305(d), which address when a person may be ordered into arrest or confinement, combine the probable cause requirement for restraint articulated in Article 9(d) with the "as circumstances may require" standard in Article 10 for continued restraint. With respect to review of pretrial confinement orders, R.C.M. 305 provides for a 48-hour probable cause review by a "neutral and detached officer"; a 72-hour written memorandum by the accused's commander, addressing both probable cause and whether continued confinement is required by the circumstances; and a 7-day review by a "neutral and detached officer"—commonly referred to as the "pretrial confinement hearing officer"—who reviews submissions by the government and the accused and determines whether the accused should remain in confinement or be released.[4] Under current Army practice, a judge advocate specially trained and designated as a military magistrate acts as a pretrial confinement hearing officer in most cases. In the other services, this role is typically performed by line officers.

Under R.C.M. 305(j)-(k), a person ordered into confinement is unable to challenge the appropriateness of the pretrial confinement decision before a military judge with the power to make findings of fact and conclusions of law until the case is referred to a court-martial for trial by a convening authority, which can be several months after the imposition of confinement in many cases.[5] After referral of charges, issues regarding the legality of pretrial confinement may be reviewed by the military judge who has the authority under R.C.M. 305(k) to provide a remedy in the form of day-for-day credit for illegal pretrial confinement.[6]

Burton, 44 C.M.R. 166 (C.M.A. 1971), but requiring the government to exercise "reasonable diligence."); id. ("Article 10 does not require instantaneous trials, but the mandate that the Government take immediate steps to try arrested or confined accused must ever be borne in mind.").

[5] R.C.M. 305(j). Under current law, prior to referral and failing a motion for reconsideration with the pretrial confinement review officer, the only possible route for a challenge to the pretrial confinement decision within the military justice system is the unwieldy and narrowly limited opportunity to file an extraordinary writ with a military Court of Criminal Appeals. See, e.g., United States v. Palmiter, 20 M.J. 90, 97 (C.M.A. 1985).

[6] See United States v. Adcock, 65 M.J. 18, 23-24 (C.A.A.F. 2007).

R.C.M. 707 assists in enforcement of the requirement under Article 10 for prompt disposition of offenses when the accused is in arrest or confinement, by requiring the government to bring such an accused to trial within 120 days of the imposition of restraint.[7] Under the rule, the remedy for failure to comply with the 120-day requirement is dismissal of the affected charges, possibly with prejudice.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There are some basic similarities between military practice and federal civilian practice in the areas of pretrial confinement review and speedy trial. In both systems, an initial review of the probable cause basis for confinement by a "neutral and detached" official is required within forty-eight hours of the imposition of confinement. And in both systems, speedy trial requirements are amplified when the accused is placed in pretrial confinement. Beyond these basic similarities, however, the systems differ in many ways.

One main difference between military practice and federal civilian practice in the area of pretrial confinement concerns the right to bail, which does not exist in the military.[9] The Bail Reform Act of 1984 prescribes the rules and procedures for pretrial detention of criminal defendants in the federal civilian system, including the rules concerning release of defendants from detention pending trial.[10] Under the law, defendants can be detained even if the charged conduct does not give rise to a rebuttable presumption of detention, and the Government may proceed by proffer at detention hearings.[11] In the military, subject to the confinement review procedures under R.C.M. 305, discretion to impose pretrial confinement on accused military members rests primarily with military commanders.[12] In the federal civilian system, this function is performed by judicial officers, primarily magistrate judges, under 18 U.S.C. § 3142 and Fed. R. Crim. P. 5(d)(3).

A second area of difference between the two systems concerns statutory and regulatory speedy trial provisions. In the federal civilian system, individuals who are arrested are required to be presented to a magistrate judge without unnecessary delay.[13] The Speedy

Trial Act provides that such individuals who are charged with crimes must proceed to trial no sooner than thirty days, and no later than seventy days, after their arraignment.[14] Individuals charged by complaint must, as a general rule, be indicted within 30 days of their arrest.[15] The statute also governs the computation of time within which a trial must commence, providing exclusions of time on various grounds, and provides for dismissal of indictments or informations for a failure to commence trial within the statutory time limits.[16] Under the law, individuals subject to pretrial detention are required to be brought to trial within ninety days of their detention.[17] However, due to the law's various exclusion of time provisions, it is not unusual for individuals to be detained for many months, and even years, before their trials begin. For purposes of the Speedy Trial Act, a trial commences at the beginning of voir dire.[18] The factors used to determine whether violations of the speedy trial rules should result in dismissal of charges with or without prejudice include the seriousness of the offense, the facts and circumstances of the case which lead to the dismissal, and the impact of re-prosecution on the administration of the Speedy Trial Act and on the administration of justice.[19]

A final area of difference between the two systems concerns review of the pretrial confinement determination. Under R.C.M. 305, judicial review of pretrial confinement decisions currently cannot take place until after charges have been referred for trial. In the federal civilian system, when individuals are arrested for a "probable cause" arrest (in other words, an arrest made before a criminal complaint is filed), the Supreme Court has required that a judicial officer make a probable cause determination regarding that arrest within forty-eight hours.[20] When probable cause arrests occur over the weekend or holidays this can be accomplished by presenting the facts to a judicial officer who then makes a probable cause determination rather than by a formal 'in-person' presentation of the defendant for an initial appearance under Fed. R. Crim. P. 5.[21] If probable cause has already been established as a matter of law, such as with an indictment, then no additional probable cause determination prior to the initial appearance is required.[22] When individuals are arrested upon a criminal complaint, they have a right to a preliminary hearing to determine probable cause within fourteen days of their initial appearance if they remain in custody, or within twenty-one days if they have been released.[23] If an indictment is returned before the preliminary hearing then probable cause has been established and the hearing is automatically waived.[24] At the preliminary hearing, defendants have the right to present evidence and to cross-examine witnesses, but they may not seek to suppress evidence.[25] If the magistrate judge finds that probable cause is lacking, he is required to dismiss the complaint (without prejudice) and discharge the defendant.[26]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 10: Amend Article 10 to conform the language of the statute to current practice and related statutory provisions, and to incorporate the forwarding requirement under Article 33. Specifically, divide the article into two subsections. Subsection (a) would provide that any person charged with an offense under the UCMJ "may be ordered into arrest or confinement as the circumstances require," except when they are charged with an offense that is normally tried by summary court-martial. Subsection (b) would require that, when a person is ordered into arrest or confinement before trial, immediate steps shall be taken to inform the person of the specific offense of which the person is accused and to try the person or dismiss the charges and release the person, and would incorporate Article 33's requirement to forward the charges and specifications and, when applicable, the Article 32 preliminary hearing report.

- This proposal would conform Article 10 to current practice, in which persons charged with offenses are ordered into confinement only as the circumstances require.
- The proposed amendments also would align the language of Article 10 more closely with related statutory provisions and other changes proposed in this Report.
- By moving the provision concerning forwarding of charges from Article 33 to Article 10, the proposed changes would facilitate expeditious processing of all cases involving pretrial confinement rather than just those expected to be referred to a general court-martial. This change also would replace the eight-day forwarding requirement under Article 33 with time frames established in the Manual for Courts-Martial that would reflect contemporary considerations regarding current processing times in courts-martial cases while preserving the requirement to promptly forward the charges and the preliminary hearing report.

- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 10, with particular emphasis on judicial review of pretrial confinement decisions under R.C.M. 305 and the requirements for prompt disposition of offenses under R.C.M. 707 (Speedy trial).

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal would support the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating, insofar as practicable, practices and procedures used in U.S. district court into military justice practice in the area of pretrial confinement review.
- This proposal is related to this Report's proposal to empower military judges and military magistrates to exercise judicial review functions before referral of charges to courts-martial, including with respect to pretrial confinement decisions.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 201. RESTRAINT OF PERSONS CHARGED.

Section 810 of title 10, United States Code (article 10 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§810. Art. 10. Restraint of persons charged

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), any person subject to this chapter who is charged with an offense under this chapter may be ordered into arrest or confinement as the circumstances require.

"(2) When a person subject to this chapter is charged only with an offense that is normally tried by summary court-martial, the person ordinarily shall not be ordered into confinement.

"(b) NOTIFICATION TO ACCUSED AND RELATED PROCEDURES.—(1) When a person subject to this chapter is ordered into arrest or confinement before trial, immediate steps shall be taken—

"(A) to inform the person of the specific offense of which the person is accused; and

"(B) to try the person or to dismiss the charges and release the person.

"(2) To facilitate compliance with paragraph (1), the President shall prescribe regulations setting forth procedures relating to referral for trial, including procedures for prompt forwarding of the charges and specifications and, if applicable, the preliminary hearing report submitted under section 832 of this title (article 32).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 201 would amend Article 10 to conform the language of the statute to current practice and related statutory provisions concerning restraint of persons charged with offenses and the actions that must be taken by military commanders and convening authorities when persons subject to the Code are held for trial by court-martial. The amendments would clarify the general provisions concerning restraint under Article 10, and would incorporate into Article 10 the requirement under Article 33 for prompt forwarding of charges in cases involving pretrial confinement. The amendments would expand the requirement for prompt forwarding to cover special courts-martial as well as general courts-martial, and would require the establishment of prompt processing timeframes in the Manual for Courts-Martial. Implementing rules would address pre-referral review of confinement orders by military magistrates and military judges under the proposed Article 30a, as well as the requirements for prompt disposition of offenses by military commanders and convening authorities.

Article 11 – Reports and Receiving of Prisoners
10 U.S.C. § 811

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 11. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 11.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 11 provides that a confinement officer may not refuse to accept or keep a prisoner when provided with a signed statement by a commissioned officer detailing the offense alleged against the prisoner. Article 11 further requires that the confinement officer report within twenty-four hours to the prisoner's commanding officer the name of the prisoner, the offense alleged against him, and the name of the person who ordered the confinement.

3. Historical Background

Article 11 was based on a consolidation of two offenses within the Articles of War: Article 71 (Refusal to Receive and Keep Prisoners); and Article 72 (Report of Prisoners Received).[1] Article 11 was designed to be a reiteration of the law in force at the time, and to supplement punitive articles 95, 96, and 97, which address unlawful incarceration and unlawful release of prisoners under the UCMJ.[2] The drafters considered addressing the subject matter covered by Article 11 in regulations only, but ultimately opted to enact Article 11 to avoid the perception that "it [was] dropped [because] it was no longer necessary."[3] Article 11 has not been amended since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[4]

Few reported appellate cases have addressed Article 11 since its enactment. The most direct analysis was provided in United States v. Espinosa, where the Navy Court of Military Review found that Article 11's requirement of a report within twenty-four hours to the prisoner's commanding officer was consistent with the due process requirements articulated by the Supreme Court in Gerstein v. Pugh.[5] The court noted that the chief intent of Article 11's precursors in the Articles of War was evidently "to preclude the unreasonable detention without trial of the prisoners committed daily to the guard-house at post, etc., and to secure them a prompt trial by bringing the cases, every twenty-four hours, (or at other brief regular periods,) to the attention of the commanding officer, who, upon examination of the facts reported, may determine then and there, so far as in his power, whether the parties shall be tried or released."[6]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 11(b) through R.C.M. 305(h)(1). The rule closely follows Article 11(b), except that terms used in Article 11 such as "provost marshal" and "master at arms" are replaced with the more general term "commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned, or petty officer into whose charge the prisoner was committed."

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The closest federal civilian corollary to Article 11 is Fed. R. Crim. P. 5(a)(1), which requires that an arresting officer bring the arrestee before a state or federal judicial officer for an initial appearance "without unnecessary delay" (unless a statute provides otherwise).[7]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 11: No change to Article 11.

- The language in R.C.M. 305(h)(1) has been updated to accurately reflect terminology used to describe current practice in confinement facilities. Although the language of the statute has not been updated, the current statutory provision fully addresses its intended purpose.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline assessment. Based on the stability in the case law dealing with Article 11's substantive provisions, no change is warranted.

Article 12 – Confinement with Enemy Prisoners Prohibited
10 U.S.C. § 812

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 12 by limiting the prohibition on confinement of military members with foreign nationals to situations where the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 12 provides that no member of the armed forces may be placed in confinement in "immediate association" with enemy prisoners or other foreign nationals who are not members of the armed forces.

3. Historical Background

Article 12 was derived from Article 16 of the Articles of War.[1] The specific language included in Article 12 reflected Congressional concern over confining American servicemembers with foreign prisoners of war.[2] The inclusion of the phrase "in immediate association with" in the statute was intended to permit confinement of military members with enemy prisoners and foreign nationals within the same confinement facility, including overseas facilities, but to require segregation between such prisoners and military members within the facility.[3]

In recent decades, the services have closed a number of military confinement facilities in the United States, particularly those at smaller bases and in other areas with low concentrations of active duty servicemembers.[4] These closures have resulted in an increasing number of cooperation agreements between the services and federal, state, and local authorities to allow sentenced military members to be held at civilian confinement facilities, in association with civilian prisoners. Although these facilities rarely house "enemy prisoners," they frequently house foreign nationals who are not members of the armed forces. Despite these changes in military confinement practices, however, the prohibition on confinement with enemy prisoners and "other foreign nationals not members of the armed forces" under Article 12 has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 12 through R.C.M. 1113(e)(2)(C), which repeats the statutory prohibitions in the context of general rules and procedures concerning confinement of servicemembers.[6] Article 12 and the rules implementing the statute apply to all situations in which a convicted servicemember is housed in "immediate association" with a non-U.S. citizen, regardless of whether the non-citizen is an enemy foreign national.[7] In civilian confinement facilities where there are no readily available methods for identifying which prisoners are foreign nationals, this strict prohibition has resulted in military members being confined in total isolation.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 12 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 12: Amend Article 12 to limit the prohibition on confinement of military members with foreign nationals to situations where the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war.

- This change would address situations where military members are incarcerated in civilian confinement facilities pursuant to an agreement with the armed forces. The proposed amendment would clarify that this is not the type of situation Article 12 was designed to address as it does not involve confinement in close association with enemy prisoners or unlawful combatants/detainees.
- This proposed amendment retains the prohibition on confining military members in immediate association with enemy prisoners.

- This proposal is a stand-alone recommendation.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 202. MODIFICATION OF PROHIBITION OF CONFINEMENT OF ARMED FORCES MEMBERS WITH ENEMY PRISONERS AND CERTAIN OTHERS.

Section 812 of title 10, United States Code (article 12 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§812. Art. 12. Prohibition of confinement of armed forces members with enemy prisoners and certain others

"No member of the armed forces may be placed in confinement in immediate association with—

"(1) enemy prisoners; or

"(2) other individuals—

"(A) who are detained under the law of war and are foreign nationals; and

"(B) who are not members of the armed forces.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 202 would amend Article 12 to limit the prohibition on confinement of military members with foreign nationals to situations where the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war. Under current law, it is a violation of Article 12 if a military member is held in "immediate association" with enemy prisoners or foreign nationals who are not members of the armed forces. Under current practice, however, it is not uncommon for non-U.S. citizens to be held in the same civilian confinement facilities where our military members are held during periods of pretrial or post-trial confinement. This practice was not anticipated by the drafters of the UCMJ in 1949. The proposed amendment to Article 12 would maintain the current strict prohibition against confining military members in immediate association with enemy prisoners of war, while clarifying that the restrictions in Article 12 relating to confinement of military member with "foreign nationals" are limited to situations in which the foreign nationals are not members of the U.S. Armed Forces and are detained under the law of war. This change would ease the administrative burden placed on civilian confinement facilities that hold confined military members, and would prevent military members in these facilities from being isolated unnecessarily.

Article 13 – Punishment Prohibited Before Trial
10 U.S.C. § 813

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 13. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 13.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 13 provides that no person may be subjected to punishment pending trial. The statute clarifies that this does not prohibit pretrial arrest or confinement provided that the conditions of arrest or confinement may not be any more rigorous than necessary to ensure the person's presence at trial. Article 13 also does not prohibit minor punishment during any period of confinement for disciplinary infractions.

3. Historical Background

Article 13 was based on Article 16 of the Articles of War, and adopted the practices of the Army and Navy concerning the rigor of pretrial confinement or arrest.[1] In Article 13, the drafters of the UCMJ removed the ambiguities that had been present in the Articles of War, and clarified the relationship of Article 13 with the effective date of sentences (Article 57).[2] Prior to this change, the Articles of War had been interpreted to prohibit the enforcement of any sentence until after final approval, even though the accused was placed in confinement immediately after the sentence was adjudged.[3] In 1981, the reference to Article 57 was stricken to "clarify the distinction between the so-called un-sentenced and sentenced prisoner so that after trial, regardless of whether the sentence had been executed upon appellate review, post-trial confinees could be administered under similar programs."[4] The statute has remained unchanged since that time.

4. Contemporary Practice

Article 13 prohibits two types of activities: (1) intentionally imposing punishment on an accused before a finding of guilt has been adjudged at trial (illegal pretrial punishment);[5] and (2) pretrial confinement conditions that are more rigorous than necessary to ensure the accused's presence at trial (illegal pretrial confinement).[6] The commingling of pretrial and sentenced prisoners may violate Article 13 if it is intended to punish the prisoner or is unrelated to any legitimate government purpose.[7] An accused subjected to illegal pretrial punishment or confinement under Article 13 is entitled to "meaningful" sentence relief.[8]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no statutory equivalent to Article 13 in federal civilian practice. Federal courts have, however, held that punishment prior to trial is a violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[9]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 13: No change to Article 13.

- In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 13's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 13.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.
- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique feature of the military justice system that helps to counterbalance the limitation of rights available to members of the armed forces.

Article 14 – Delivery of Offenders to Civil Authorities
10 U.S.C. § 814

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 14. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 14.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 14 concerns the delivery of military offenders to civil authorities. The article is divided into two subsections. Article 14(a) provides that, in accordance with service regulations, a member of the armed forces accused of an offense against civil authority may, upon request, be delivered to the civil authority for trial, subject to being returned into military custody if the sentence of a court-martial is interrupted. This is a permissive authority only.[1] Article 14(b) provides that when a member of the armed forces who is undergoing sentence of a court-martial is delivered to civil authorities, such delivery interrupts the execution of any court-martial sentence; and that the civil authorities must, upon request of competent military authority, return the member to military control. This provision "encourages cooperation between military and civil authorities when a sentenced servicemember in military custody also is suspected of having committed criminal offenses amenable to civilian prosecution. As a result of Article 14(b) . . . if civil authorities subsequently try, convict, and sentence to confinement the servicemember, the two sentences, in effect, will run consecutively."[2]

3. Historical Background

Under Army practice prior to the enactment of the UCMJ, commanders were required, upon request, to turn a military member accused of a civil crime over to civilian authorities, except in a time of war. This practice was adopted before the Army had authority to try its personnel for civil offenses in time of peace, and was originally enacted in the Articles of War.[3] Under Navy practice, on the other hand, commanders exercised broad discretion with respect to the delivery of enlisted personnel to civilian authorities. Article 14 was based on the Navy practice.[4]

In 1988, Congress required the Secretary of Defense to ensure that the Service Secretaries issued uniform regulations to provide for the delivery of members of the armed forces to civilian authority when such members have been accused of offenses against civil authority.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 14(a) through R.C.M. 106 and Article 14(b) through R.C.M. 1113(e)(2)(A)(ii). The rules only apply to delivery of military members to authorities of the United States or its political subdivisions. Delivery of a military member to a foreign government for trial is ordinarily covered by status of forces agreements.[6] Each of the services has regulations outlining the procedures for delivery of a military member to civilian authorities.

There has been very little case law concerning Article 14 since the UCMJ's adoption, and the few cases which have dealt with its provisions have affirmed the statute's continued relevance and authority.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 14 has no corresponding rule in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 14: No change to Article 14.

- In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 14's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 14.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique feature of the military justice system that supports military discipline while ensuring appropriate coordination with civilian authorities.

Subchapter III. Non-Judicial Punishment

Article 15 – Commanding Officer's Non-judicial Punishment
10 U.S.C. § 815

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would retain the wide range of punishments available to commanders to address misconduct through non-judicial proceedings under Article 15, while precluding punishment in the form of confinement on a diet consisting only of bread and water. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 15.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 15 provides commanders with a range of disciplinary measures for minor offenses in order to promote good order and discipline in the armed forces and correct deficiencies in servicemembers without the stigma of a court-martial conviction. Article 15 is implemented through detailed regulations proscribed by the President in Chapter V of the MCM, and through service-specific regulations. Members may request a trial by court-martial in lieu of non-judicial punishment except when attached to or embarked on board a vessel.

Under the current statute, the punishments authorized by Congress include: reduction to the lowest pay grade; confinement on bread and water or diminished rations for three days when attached or embarked on a vessel; correctional custody for 30 days; restriction for 60 days; arrest in quarters for 30 days; extra duties for 45 days; forfeitures of one-half of one month's pay for three months; and detention of one-half of one month's pay for two months. The scope of these punishments may vary depending upon the grade of the member and that of the imposing authority. Rank reduction, confinement on bread and water, correctional custody, extra duties, and restriction may only be imposed against enlisted members. Arrest in quarters is limited to officers.

3. Historical Background

From the earliest days of our nation, commanders have had the authority to impose disciplinary punishments through a variety of formal and informal procedures.[1] Congress

[1] The ability of commanders to summarily punish sailors for minor offenses has origins in the earliest naval regulations, and for troops, in regulations and practices promulgated during the Revolutionary War. While the ability of a ship's captain to impose punishment was well-established by naval tradition, field commanders routinely complained of challenges with disciplining their troops, and would often exercise general orders in order to fill the legislative gaps where discipline was not expressly authorized. See generally Captain Harold L. Miller, A Long Look at Article 15, 28 MIL. L. REV. 37 (1965).

codified the ability of a company commander to impose disciplinary punishment in Article 104 of the 1916 Articles of War.[2] This provision served as the foundation for Article 15 when the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[3] In 1962, Congress amended Article 15 with a view towards reducing the number of courts-martial for minor offenses.[4]

4. Contemporary Practice

Non-judicial punishment is governed by Article 15, Part V of the Manual for Courts-Martial, and service-specific regulations. Article 15 provides substantial discretion to the services in structuring non-judicial punishment proceedings. Although similar in terms of purpose—efficient and direct disposition of minor offenses—service regulations and cultures have created essentially five different variations of this administrative forum, under a variety of different names: "Captain's Mast" (Navy and Coast Guard); "Office Hours" (Marine Corps); "Article 15" (Air Force and Army); or just "NJP" (a commonly used term). The services apply three different standards of proof during Article 15 proceedings: the Army applies a beyond a reasonable doubt standard, just as in courts-martial; the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard use a preponderance of the evidence standard, recognizing the non-criminal nature of the proceeding; and the Air Force has no established regulatory standard of evidence for non-judicial punishment.[5] The statutorily authorized "vessel exception," which precludes a member attached or embarked on a vessel from demanding a court-martial in lieu of non-judicial punishment proceedings, is utilized primarily by the Sea Services.[6] The Army's Article 15 regulations provide commanders with options with respect to whether non-judicial punishment records are filed locally or permanently, depending on the rank of the member and the nature of the offense.[7]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Non-judicial punishment does not have a direct civilian equivalent. Although civilian employees are subject to a variety of administrative disciplinary matters, the range of punishments available under Article 15 and the service-specific procedures and rules that implement the statute are unique to military service.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 15: Amend Article 15 to remove punishment in the form of confinement on a diet limited to bread and water from the list of authorized punishments.

- This proposal reflects confidence in the ability of commanders in a modern era to administer effective discipline through the utilization of the wide range of punishments otherwise available under Article 15 and other non-punitive measures.
- Part II of this Report will consider: (1) whether a uniform burden of proof can be adopted in Part V of the Manual to promote greater consistency in non-judicial punishment proceedings; (2) whether to enhance options for the services to administer low-level NJP for minor disciplinary infractions without necessarily triggering permanent adverse administrative consequences; and (3) whether to clarify the circumstances qualifying for the "vessel exception."

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.
- The recommendation to retain Article 15 largely in its current form reflects a recognition that NJP effectively promotes good order and discipline at the unit level, and is essential to the effective administration of military justice in the armed forces.

SEC. 301. MODIFICATION OF CONFINEMENT AS NON-JUDICIAL PUNISHMENT.

Section 815 of title 10, United States Code (article 15 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (b)—

(A) in paragraph (2)(A), by striking "on bread and water or diminished rations"; and

(B) in the undesignated matter after paragraph (2), by striking "on bread and water or diminished rations" in the sentence beginning "No two or more"; and

(2) in subsection (d), by striking "on bread and water or diminished rations" in paragraphs (2) and (3)."

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 301 contains amendments concerning non-judicial punishment under Article 15. Non-judicial punishment under Article 15 provides commanders with a range of disciplinary measures for minor offenses to promote good order and discipline in the armed forces and correct deficiencies in servicemembers without the stigma of a court-martial conviction. Article 15, as amended, would retain the wide range of punishments available to commanders to address misconduct through non-judicial proceedings, while precluding punishment in the form of a diet consisting only of bread and water. Implementing rules would address several issues concerning the administration of non-judicial punishment under Article 15, including the standard of evidence at non-judicial punishment proceedings, the administrative consequences of non-judicial punishment for minor disciplinary offenses, and the circumstances qualifying for the "vessel exception."

Subchapter IV. Court-Martial Jurisdiction

Article 16 – Courts-Martial Classified
10 U.S.C. § 816

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would establish standard sized panels in non-capital courts-martial: eight members in a general court-martial, and four members in a special court-martial. As provided in Article 25a, a general court-martial in a capital case would have a panel of twelve members. Reflecting longstanding practice, the proposal would require a military judge at all special courts-martial. The proposed amendments would continue the authority for judge-alone trials in non-capital cases at the request of the accused. Consistent with the constitutional authority to authorize civilian non-jury trials without obtaining a defendant's consent in cases involving confinement for six months or less, the proposal also would provide the military justice system with similar discretionary authority for referral to a judge-alone special court-martial, in which confinement and forfeitures would be limited to six months or less and no punitive discharge would be authorized (as reflected in the proposed changes to Article 19). The authority to refer cases to the new judge-alone forum would be subject to limitations prescribed by the President. This proposal would retain the summary court-martial.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Currently, Article 16 authorizes the following types of courts-martial: a general court-martial, consisting of a military judge and at least five members; a general court-martial authorized to adjudge the death penalty, subject to the requirements and exceptions of Article 25a, consisting of a military judge and at least 12 members; a special court-martial consisting of a military judge and at least three members; a special court-martial without a military judge, consisting of at least three members; and a summary court-martial consisting of a single commissioned officer. The current statute establishes minimum requirements for the number of members, not a fixed panel size, for general and special courts-martial. The statute also permits judge-alone general and special courts-martial at the election of the accused in non-capital cases.

3. Historical Background

Modeled after the British Articles of War, the earliest American Articles of War called for thirteen-member general courts-martial and specified that regimental courts-martial (analogous to the current special courts-martial) should convene with five members, but never fewer than three.[1] Naval courts-martial at that time impaneled at least six members, a number that was eventually reduced to three (five for capital cases). After the American Revolution, and in order to account for the limited-size of America's military forces, the Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy adopted the practice of seating five to thirteen officers in general courts-martial, with regimental courts-martial (or "summary" courts-martial in the Navy) fixed at three members.[2] By 1920, the practice under the Articles of War was again amended by having no fewer than five members in general courts-martial and no fewer than three members in special courts-martial, a practice that has remained in place since that time.[3]

The 1920 Articles of War created the position of the law member.[4] The law member was one of the appointed court members and was seated with them.[5] As a court member, the law member had an equal vote in deciding all questions submitted to a vote or ballot of the court, including challenges, findings, sentence, and any interlocutory questions submitted to a vote of the court.[6] Although the law member made evidentiary and procedural rulings, the court members could overrule the law member, just as they could reject the advice of the prosecuting judge advocate.[7] When a court member objected to a law member's ruling, the members decided the question by a majority vote.[8] In special courts-martial, which had no appointed law member, the court president performed the role of law member by making rulings in open court.[9]

When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress replaced the law member with a "law officer."[10] The law officer was no longer one of the court members and sat apart from them during trial, usually in the front of the courtroom on a raised dais, where one would expect a judge to sit.[11] The law officer did not deliberate or vote with the members, and could not discuss the case with the members outside of the presence of the accused, except to help put the findings and sentence into proper form. Then, in 1968, Congress replaced the law officer with a military judge, aligning the judicial powers of the position roughly with the powers of federal civilian judges.[12] For the first time, the accused could elect trial by a military judge alone—without court members—in both general and special courts-martial.[13] The military judge's new powers included the power to release an accused from pretrial confinement, and to hold sessions outside the presence of the members at the pretrial, trial, and post-trial stages under Article 39(a).[14] In addition, before any special court-martial could adjudge a bad-conduct discharge, Congress required the appointment of a military judge and legally trained counsel for both sides.[15]

The summary court-martial, composed of a single commissioned officer, has been a codified feature of military justice practice since the late nineteenth century, and has been a disposition option for low-level offenses under the UCMJ since its enactment in 1950. Case law and practice have identified it as being distinct from the other courts-martial, as it is an administrative, non-criminal forum without the consequence of criminal liability.[16]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 16 through R.C.M. 501, 502, and 503, which provide the rules and procedures concerning the composition of courts-martial and the qualifications, duties, and detailing of courts-martial personnel, including panel members. In accordance with the criteria under Article 25 and the procedures under R.C.M. 502-503, court-martial convening authorities develop a list of best-qualified members whom they detail to a particular court-martial. As a general practice, the number detailed to a court-martial will be greater than the minimum required by Article 16 in order to account for the possibility of excusals and successful challenges. Even with excusals and challenges, courts-martial frequently impanel more than the required number of members. Under current practice, the excess members cannot be returned to their units to perform their regular duties, but must continue to sit on the panel through the completion of the court-martial. As a result, the panel size can vary from case to case, even in cases involving similar charges. Because the size of the panel can vary, so can the percentage required for a conviction, anywhere from 67% (e.g., two out of three members, four out of six, six out of nine) to 80% (e.g., four out of five members).

With respect to special courts-martial without a military judge, although current law continues to provide authority for this forum, the services have a longstanding practice of assigning a military judge to every special court-martial. Summary courts-martial remain an available forum for the disposition of minor offenses in a court-martial proceeding without a detailed military judge.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian practice and state criminal practice, judges preside in all criminal proceedings, including in misdemeanor cases. Furthermore, federal juries are required to have twelve jurors in all cases, except when the defendant is charged with Class B or C misdemeanors or violations, in which case the defendant is not entitled to a jury trial.[17] Among the fifty states, Florida, Connecticut, Utah, and Arizona allow for felony-level convictions in non-capital cases by juries of fewer than twelve—with Florida and Connecticut authorizing six-person juries, and Utah and Arizona requiring an eight-person jury. However, there is no civilian jurisdiction, state or federal, that allows jury panels to fluctuate between cases depending on the size of the initial venire and the number of excusals or challenges granted. Military panels are not subject to the same general constitutional requirements as civilian juries in terms of their size.[18]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 16.1: Amend Article 16 to establish standard panel sizes in all courts-martial: eight members in a general court-martial (subject to the requirements of Article 25a in capital cases), and four members in a special court-martial.

- The current system creates an anomaly by varying the percentage required for a conviction based upon the happenstance of the number of members who remain on the panel after challenges and excusals—a variance that can range from 67% to 80% depending on the number of members impaneled to the court-martial.

- The recommendation for a standard four-member special court-martial and a standard eight-member non-capital general court-martial—in conjunction with the change proposed in Article 52 to require a fixed percentage (75%) of votes on the findings in all cases—will eliminate this anomaly. The proposed changes would provide an appropriate number of members for group discussion and deliberation, while ensuring that the operational requirements of convening authorities are appropriately balanced.

- The proposal would address the inefficiencies that result from the current requirement for the court-martial to impanel every member detailed in excess of the required number. Although it is necessary for the convening authority to detail a number of members larger than the minimum in order to take into account the potential for challenges and excusals, the current system creates a burden on military effectiveness by requiring the excess members to remain on the panel rather than return to their regular duties.

[17] 18 U.S.C. § 3559; FED. R. CRIM. P. 58(b)(2); see United States v. Merrick, 459 F.2d 644 (4th Cir. 1972).

[18] See Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 17 (1942); Sanford v. United States, 586 F.3d 28, 35 (D.C. Cir. 2009); Mendrano v. Smith, 797 F.2d 1538, 1544 (10th Cir. 1986).

- The proposed standard panel sizes for general and special courts-martial are well within the range of the number of members that currently sit in most courts-martial. The twelve-member general court-martial in capital cases is consistent with the current minimum number of members required in that forum.

- The proposed standard panel size for general courts-martial will be subject to the requirements of the proposed amendments to Article 25a, requiring a standard panel of twelve members in capital cases.

- To address excusals of members that may occur during the course of trial, the proposed amendments to Article 29 will provide the procedure for replacements, options for the use of alternate members, and the opportunity for non-capital general courts-martial to proceed with a reduced panel, but no fewer than six members.

Recommendation 16.2: Amend Article 16 to require a military judge to be detailed to all special courts-martial.

- Although the UCMJ has authorized special courts-martial to proceed without a detailed military judge (subject to restrictions on punishment), the military services have long required the presence of a military judge to preside at all special courts-martial. In the unlikely event that a disciplinary proceeding is needed to address misconduct in a situation where a judge cannot be readily assigned, a commander will continue to have the broad authority to issue non-judicial punishment under Article 15, as well as the authority to refer charges to a summary court-martial, a one-officer court without a military judge or counsel, which is empowered to impose an array of punishments, including up to thirty days of confinement.

Recommendation 16.3: Amend Article 16 to provide the military justice system with an option for a judge-alone trial special court-martial, with confinement limited to six months or less, as reflected in the proposed changes to Article 19.

- The proposed authority for referral of cases to a judge-alone special court-martial draws upon the successful experience of the military justice system with judge-alone trials since 1968. It also draws upon the experience in the federal civilian system, as well as in state courts, in which an accused defendant does not have the right to trial by jury when the confinement does not exceed six months.

- Consistent with federal civilian practice, the confinement that could be adjudged in a case referred to a judge-alone special court-martial would be six months or less; forfeitures would be capped at six months; and a punitive discharge would not be available, in accordance with the proposed changes to Article 19.

- The convening authority would have discretion, subject to such limitations that the President may prescribe by regulation, in deciding whether to refer a case to a judge-alone special court-martial or to a traditional special court-martial empowered to adjudge up to twelve months confinement and forfeitures, as well as a punitive discharge. At the traditional special court-martial, the accused would have the same opportunity as under current law to elect a judge-alone trial or a trial with a panel of members.

- The judge-alone special court-martial will provide the convening authority with a greater range of disposition options, which may prove particularly useful when addressing cases involving a request for court-martial arising out of a non-judicial punishment or summary court-martial refusal, and in deployed environments where operational demands may make it difficult to assemble a panel to address cases involving minor misconduct.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- The proposal to create a referred judge-alone special court-martial supports the GC Terms of Reference by incorporating a practice used in U.S. district courts—the judge-alone trial with a punishment cap of six months confinement (and no punitive discharge in the military context). This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by promoting the first of six "key principles": discipline in the armed forces. The judge-alone special court-martial would offer military commanders a new disposition option for low-level criminal misconduct—one that would be more efficient and less burdensome on the command than a special court-martial, but without the option for the member to refuse as in summary courts-martial and non-judicial punishment.

- The proposed amendments that would require standard panel sizes in all general and special court-martial support MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures of the civilian sector with respect to consistency between jury/panel sizes insofar as practicable in military practice.

- In the section of this Report addressing Article 20, clarifying language has been proposed to incorporate the Supreme Court's treatment of the summary court-martial as an administrative, non-criminal forum.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 401. COURTS-MARTIAL CLASSIFIED.

Section 816 of title 10, United States Code (article 16 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§816. Art. 16. Courts-martial classified

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The three kinds of courts-martial in each of the armed forces are the following:

"(1) General courts-martial, as described in subsection (b).

"(2) Special courts-martial, as described in subsection (c).

"(3) Summary courts-martial, as described in subsection (d).

"(b) GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.—General courts-martial are of the following three types:

"(1) A general court-martial consisting of a military judge and eight members, subject to sections 825(d)(3) and 829 of this title (articles 25(d)(3) and 29).

"(2) In a capital case, a general court-martial consisting of a military judge and the number of members determined under section 825a of this title (article 25a), subject to sections 825(d)(3) and 829 of this title (articles 25(d)(3) and 29).

"(3) A general court-martial consisting of a military judge alone, if, before the court is assembled, the accused, knowing the identity of the military judge and after consultation with defense counsel, requests, orally on the record or in writing, a court composed of a military judge alone and the military judge approves the request.

"(c) SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL.—Special courts-martial are of the following two types:

"(1) A special court-martial, consisting of a military judge and four members, subject to sections 825(d)(3) and 829 of this title (articles 25(d)(3) and 29).

"(2) A special court-martial consisting of a military judge alone—

"(A) if the case is so referred by the convening authority, subject to section 819 of this title (article 19) and such limitations as the President may prescribe by regulation; or

"(B) if the case is referred under paragraph (1) and, before the court is assembled, the accused, knowing the identity of the military judge and after consultation with defense counsel, requests, orally on the record or in writing, a court composed of a military judge alone and the military judge approves the request.

"(d) SUMMARY COURT-MARTIAL.—A summary court-martial consists of one commissioned officer.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 401 contains amendments concerning courts-martial classifications under Article 16 of the UCMJ. Under current law, general courts-martial consist of a military judge and not less than five members in non-capital cases, or a military judge alone upon the election of the accused. Special courts-martial consist of not less than three members, a military judge and not less than three members, or a military judge alone upon the election of the accused. Because there is a variable number of members in each case, the number of votes required for a conviction under Article 52 can fluctuate from case to case without any guiding principle to ensure consistency. See Section 715, infra (discussing voting by the court-martial panel under Article 52). The proposed amendments seek to enhance military justice and improve the consistency of court-martial panel deliberations by establishing standard panel sizes: twelve members in capital general courts-martial, eight members in non-capital general courts-martial, and four members in special courts-martial. As amended, Article 16 would include references to Article 25a (addressing panel size in capital cases), Article 25(d) (addressing the initial detailing of members by the convening authority), and Article 29 (addressing the impaneling of members and the impact of excusals on panel composition).

Article 16(c), as amended, would require a military judge to be detailed to all special courts-martial, reflecting current military practice and similar federal and state civilian practice. The amendments also would add the option of referral to a non-jury (judge-alone) special court-martial. Such a forum is common among civilian criminal jurisdictions. See 18 U.S.C. § 3559; Fed. R. Crim. P. 58(b)(2); United States v. Merrick, 459 F.2d 644 (4th Cir. 1972). Providing commanders with this option would generate greater efficiencies in the military justice system for the adjudication of low-level, misdemeanor-equivalent offenses. As provided in the proposed amendments to Article 19, punishments at this forum could include confinement and forfeitures limited to no more than six months and would not include a punitive discharge. In addition, a military magistrate designated by the detailed military judge could preside when authorized under service regulations and with the consent of the parties. See Section 403, infra. Implementing provisions in the Manual for Courts-Martial would establish limits on the types of offenses that could be referred for trial at this forum.

Article 17 – Jurisdiction of Courts-Martial in General
10 U.S.C. § 817

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 17. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 17.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 17 provides that each armed force has court-martial jurisdiction over all persons subject to the UCMJ. Subsection (a) provides each armed force with court-martial jurisdiction over all persons subject to the Code and authorizes the President to prescribe regulations for jurisdiction by one armed force over the personnel of another (i.e., "reciprocal jurisdiction"). Subsection (b) provides for departmental review of cases tried by one armed force by the service of the accused.

3. Historical Background

Article 17 has not been amended since the UCMJ's enactment in 1950.[1] However, the regulatory language for reciprocal jurisdiction contained in R.C.M. 201(e) was amended in 1986 (post-Goldwater-Nichols Act) to conform the statute to the reorganization of the joint service environment.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 17 through R.C.M. 201(e). Under the rule, unified and specified combatant commanders are authorized to convene courts-martial over members of any service within their respective command, subject to service-specific regulations or agreements. In the event of disagreement among Service Secretaries, military departments, or combatant commanders, the Secretary of Defense or his designee designates the appropriate organization to exercise jurisdiction.[3] The rule and its guidance

The Subcommittee recommended that military justice jurisdictional responsibilities be determined and prescribed during the joint-planning process. It is possible for the Services to implement the DLPB recommendations under existing statutory and regulatory authority. Part II of this Report will consider whether any regulatory changes are needed to facilitate the exercise of military justice jurisdiction over are consistent with the original "congressional intent that reciprocal jurisdiction ordinarily not be exercised outside of joint commands or task forces, and is designed to protect the integrity of intraservice lines of authority."[4]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 17 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 17: No change to Article 17.

- Article 17 requires no amendments. As drafted, the statute provides all necessary authority for, and restrictions concerning, reciprocal jurisdiction.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 17.

Article 18 – Jurisdiction of General Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 818

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would make a conforming changes to align Article 18 with the revised descriptions of the types of courts-martial under Article 16, and would specify the sexual offenses currently listed under Article 56(b)(2), over which general courts-martial have exclusive jurisdiction.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 18 establishes the jurisdiction of general courts-martial over persons subject to the UCMJ, including those subject to military tribunal under the law of war. The statute authorizes general courts-martial to adjudge all punishments available under the UCMJ, including death, subject to any limitations prescribed by the President; however, it expressly prohibits judge-alone general courts-martial from exercising jurisdiction in cases where the death penalty may be awarded. Article 18(c) limits jurisdiction over the sex-related offenses listed under Article 56(b)(2).

3. Historical Background

Congress has amended Article 18 twice since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[1] The statute was first amended in 1968, in order to prohibit judge-alone general courts-martial in capital cases.[2] More recently, in 2013, Congress amended Article 18 by dividing the statute into three subsections and, in subsection (c), limiting jurisdiction over the sex-related offenses specified under Article 56(b)(2) to general courts-martial.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 18 through R.C.M. 201 (Jurisdiction in general), R.C.M. 202 (Persons subject to the jurisdiction of courts-martial), and R.C.M. 203 (Jurisdiction over the offense), which are consistent with the statutory provisions.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no equivalent to Article 18 in federal civilian practice.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 18: Amend Article to conform the statute to the proposed changes to Article 16 concerning the types of general courts-martial and the proposed changes to Article 56 concerning sex-related offenses.

- This proposal would retain current law with non-substantive conforming changes necessitated by the proposed amendments to Article 56.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.
- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by minimizing change to an area recently revised by Congress; taking into account the importance of maintaining system balance; and maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.
- This recommendation would align Article 18 with the proposed changes in Articles 16 and Article 56.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 402. JURISDICTION OF GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Section 818 of title 10, United States Code (article 18 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in subsection (b), by striking "section 816(1)(B) of this title (article 16(1)(B))" and inserting "section 816(b)(3) of this title (article 16(b)(3))"; and

(2) by striking subsection (c) and inserting the following:

"(c) Consistent with sections 819 and 820 of this title (articles 19 and 20), only general courts-martial have jurisdiction over the following offenses:

"(1) A violation of subsection (a) or (b) of section 920 of this title (article 120).

"(2) A violation of subsection (a) or (b) of section 920b of this title (article 120b).

"(3) An attempt to commit an offense specified in paragraph (1) or (2) that is punishable under section 880 of this title (article 80).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 402 would make conforming changes to Article 18 of the UCMJ to align the statute with the revised descriptions of types of courts-martial under Article 16. The amendments also would modify Article 18 to specify the sexual offenses (currently listed by cross-reference to Article 56(b)(2)) over which general courts-martial have exclusive jurisdiction. This would accommodate the proposal under Section 801, infra, to repeal Article 56(b) following the enactment of sentencing parameters under Article 56(d).

Article 19 – Jurisdiction of Special Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 819

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would provide conforming changes in Article 19, which sets forth the requirements for a special court-martial, in light of: (1) the proposed changes in Article 16 that provide an option to refer cases to a judge-alone special court-martial; (2) the proposed changes in Article 27 regarding the requirement to detail defense counsel for both general and special courts-martial; and (3) the proposed changes in Article 54 regarding the preparation of records for all courts-martial. The proposed amendments also would amend Article 19 to codify current practice by requiring a military judge to be detailed to every special court-martial, and would allow military judges to designate military magistrates, if available, to preside over special courts-martial referred judge-alone, with the consent of the parties.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 19 concerns the jurisdiction of special courts-martial. Under this section, the maximum punishment for any case tried by special court-martial is confinement for one year, forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for one year, hard labor without confinement for not more than three months, reduction to the lowest pay grade (E-1), and a bad-conduct discharge. A special court-martial may not adjudge a bad-conduct discharge, more than six months confinement, or forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for more than six months unless there is a "complete record" of the proceedings, a qualified defense counsel is detailed to represent the accused, and a military judge presides at trial.

3. Historical Background

When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950,[1] it based Article 19 on Article 13 of the Articles of War.[2] The statute's legislative history reflects a congressional intent to prohibit trial at a special court-martial of any offense for which a mandatory punishment was prescribed by the UCMJ.[3] The provision in Article 19 allowing capital offenses to be tried at a special court-martial, minus the authority to adjudge the death penalty, was adopted at the urging of the Navy in order to retain the option of trying such cases aboard ship, because prompt disciplinary action might be needed in circumstances where it would be impractical to refer such a case to a general court-martial convening authority.[4]

The Military Justice Act of 1968 amended Article 19 to provide that a bad-conduct discharge could not be adjudged at a special court-martial unless legally qualified defense counsel was appointed to represent the accused, a military judge was detailed to the trial, and a complete record of the proceedings was made.[5] In 1999, Congress again amended Article 19 to revise the maximum punishment authorized at special courts-martial by increasing the maximum period of authorized confinement and forfeitures from six months to one year.[6] In 2014, Congress amended Article 56 and Article 18 to require certain rape and sexual assault offenses to be tried only at general courts-martial, precluding convening authorities from referring these charges to special courts-martial.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

Special courts-martial are typically used to try unique military disciplinary offenses and other minor offenses. The provision in Article 19 for special court-martial cases to be tried without a judge is not a part of contemporary practice. Under established practice in all services, virtually all special courts-martial are conducted with a military judge, and defense counsel qualified under Article 27(b).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Supreme Court has held that the Sixth Amendment right to a jury does not apply to trials of petty offense crimes (i.e., those punishable by not more than six months confinement).[8] State courts generally do not provide jury trials when adjudicating petty offenses, and federal courts do not provide jury trials for petty offenses.[9] In federal civilian courts, magistrate judges typically preside over the initial appearance, arraignment and trial of all petty offenses.[10] The parties may appeal a ruling of a magistrate judge to a district court judge within fourteen days of its entry.[11]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 19.1: Amend Article 19 to conform to the proposal in Article 16 to allow special courts-martial to be referred judge-alone, with authority for a military judge to designate a military magistrate to preside over these cases as well.

- This proposal would conform the requirements and jurisdictional limits of special courts-martial to include the specific option for charges to be referred to a special court-martial consisting of a military judge-alone, as proposed in Article 16, subject to the additional limitation on sentence. A military magistrate would be authorized to preside over the special court-martial referred judge-alone, if designated by the military judge, with the consent of the parties.
- As with other special courts-martial, appellate review would be available for this forum under the proposed amendments to Articles 66 and 69.

Recommendation 19.2: Amend Article 19 to conform to current practice requiring a military judge, qualified defense counsel, and a record at every special court-martial.

- This proposal would clarify the requirement for every special court-martial to have a military judge, qualified defense counsel, and a complete record, consistent with current practice and the statutory requirements in Article 27 and Article 54.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal reflects federal civilian practice in allowing a magistrate to preside over cases that adjudicate petty offense level charges.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 403. JURISDICTION OF SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Section 819 of title 10, United States Code (article 19 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(2) by striking "A bad-conduct discharge" and all that follows through the end; and

(3) by adding after subsection (a), as designated by paragraph (1), the following new subsections:

"(b) ADDITIONAL LIMITATION.—Neither a bad-conduct discharge, nor confinement for more than six months, nor forfeiture of pay for more than six months may be adjudged if charges and specifications are referred to a special court-martial consisting of a military judge alone under section 816(c)(2)(A) of this title (article 16(c)(2)(A)).

"(c) MILITARY MAGISTRATE.—If charges and specifications are referred to a special court-martial consisting of a military judge alone under section 816(c)(2)(A) of this title (article 16(c)(2)(A)), the military judge, with the consent of the parties, may designate a military magistrate to preside over the special court-martial.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 403 would amend Article 19 to align the statute with proposed changes in Article 16 regarding the composition of special courts-martial. See Section 401, supra.

Article 20 – Jurisdiction of Summary Courts-Martial

10 U.S.C. § 820

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 20 to incorporate Supreme Court case law identifying the summary court-martial as a non-criminal forum. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 20.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 20 provides the jurisdictional limits of summary courts-martial, including who may be tried by summary courts-martial and the maximum punishments that may be adjudged by summary courts-martial. Under the statute, summary courts-martial have jurisdiction to try all persons subject to the Code except officers, cadets, aviation cadets, and midshipmen. They may not try persons for capital offenses, and they may not adjudge punishments of death, dismissal, dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, confinement in excess of 30 days, hard labor without confinement for more than 45 days, restriction to specified limits for more than two months, or forfeiture of more than two-thirds of one month's pay. Article 20 further provides that no person may be tried by summary court-martial over his or her objection. Any refusal to submit to trial by summary court-martial permits a convening authority to bring the charges to a special or general court-martial at the convening authority's discretion. The UCMJ does not provide a right to counsel at summary courts-martial.[1]

3. Historical Background

Military commanders have long exercised the authority to summarily punish servicemembers under their command for minor disciplinary infractions. During the Civil War, Congress created "Field Officer Courts," consisting of one field grade officer who summarily adjudicated charges against enlisted troops for non-capital offenses.[2] The maximum punishment authorized at these courts was a fine of one month's pay and one month's confinement or hard labor.[3] In 1890, Congress created a peacetime "summary court," providing military members the right to refuse trial by the summary court and demand trial by court-martial.[4] The statutory authority for this court endured through various iterations of the Articles of War until it, in turn, formed the basis of Article 20 when the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[5] Under the UCMJ, the purpose of the summary court-martial, which "occupies a position between informal non-judicial disposition under Article 15 and the courtroom-type procedure of the general and special courts-martial . . . 'is to exercise justice promptly for relatively minor offenses under a simple form of procedure.'"[6] In 1976, in Middendorf v. Henry, the Supreme Court considered a Sixth Amendment challenge to the summary court-martial based on the lack of right to counsel.[7] The Court denied the challenge, holding that "a summary court-martial is not a 'criminal prosecution' for purposes of the Sixth Amendment."[8]

4. Contemporary Practice

Summary courts-martial typically are convened to provide for prompt disposition of minor offenses. Cases may be referred directly to a summary court-martial for disposition. Summary courts-martial also may be convened pursuant to a pretrial agreement, where the accused agrees to plead guilty at summary court-martial in exchange for the inherent protections offered by this low-level forum (limited confinement; limited reduction; limited forfeitures). In addition, a convening authority may consider referral to a summary court-martial among the options for disposition when an accused has exercised the right under Article 15 to request trial by court-martial in lieu of a non-judicial punishment proceeding. The President has implemented the rules and procedures for summary courts-martial primarily in Chapter XIII of the Rules for Courts-Martial, with additional guidance provided through service regulations.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

There is no direct civilian equivalent to the summary court-martial; however, "pretrial diversion" programs are available in the federal system, substituting community supervision or the performance of other services in lieu of criminal prosecution in order to save judicial resources for major cases.[9] Although not directly analogous, there are some

In arriving at its conclusion, the Court explained that the legitimacy of the summary court-martial rested upon the important distinction between civilian and military society, noting that "the court-martial proceeding takes place not in civilian society, as does the parole revocation proceeding, but in the military community with all of its distinctive qualities." Id. at 37.

The use of such programs varies widely from district to district.

similarities in function between these diversion programs and the summary court-martial forum.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 20: Amend Article 20 by adding a new subsection expressly defining the summary court-martial as "a non-criminal forum" and clarifying that "[a] finding of guilty at a summary court-martial does not constitute a criminal conviction."

- Like a non-judicial punishment proceeding under Article 15, a summary court-martial under Article 20 provides commanders with an option for disposition of minor offenses in a non-criminal forum where the findings do not constitute a criminal conviction. Unlike an Article 15 proceeding, however, the designation of a proceeding under Article 20 as a "court-martial" may lead government and private sector entities to treat the results of a summary court-martial as a criminal conviction. To clarify the status of a summary court-martial, the amendment would expressly set forth the non-criminal nature of this forum.

- In Part II of the Report, further consideration will be given to the development of guidance concerning to the rules and procedures used in summary courts-martial, as well as appropriate use of, and consequences flowing from, the results of summary courts-martial adjudications.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- The proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by adding clarifying language to Article 20 to ensure the records of summary court-martial convictions are not categorized by agencies or organizations, both inside and outside of the Department of Defense, as constituting a criminal conviction from a "judicial" proceeding.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 404. SUMMARY COURT-MARTIAL AS NON-CRIMINAL FORUM.

Section 820 of title 10, United States Code (article 20 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a) IN GENERAL.—" before "Subject to"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(b) NON-CRIMINAL FORUM.—A summary court-martial is a non-criminal forum. A finding of guilty at a summary court-martial does not constitute a criminal conviction.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 404 would amend Article 20 to clarify the status of the summary court-martial as a non-criminal forum. In Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976), the Supreme Court held that a summary court-martial does not constitute a criminal prosecution. Although a summary court-martial appropriately may result in administrative and personal consequences, it does not have the collateral consequences of a criminal conviction because it does not reflect a determination made by a judicial, criminal forum. The proposed amendment would clarify that, because of its non-judicial nature, a summary court-martial is not a "criminal prosecution," within the traditional due process understanding of a criminal prosecution (i.e., presided over by a judicial officer, and where the accused has a right to counsel) and that a finding of guilty at a summary court-martial does not constitute a "criminal conviction."

Article 21 – Jurisdiction of Courts-Martial Not Exclusive

10 U.S.C. § 821

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 21. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 21.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 21 provides that the provisions of the UCMJ that confer jurisdiction upon a court-martial do not deprive other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction over the offense or the offender. The statute expressly does not apply to military commissions established under chapter 47A of title 10, United States Code.

3. Historical Background

Article 21 was based on Article 15 of the Articles of War and reflected the Supreme Court's decision in Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), upholding the President's authority to convene military commissions.[1] The legislative history of Article 21 indicates congressional intent to preserve double jeopardy protections by providing for concurrent jurisdiction between the UCMJ and other military tribunals or commissions, without permitting the government to try an individual in both forums.[2] In 2006, as part of the Military Commissions Act, Congress added a sentence to Article 21 stating the provisions of the statute do not apply to the military commissions provided for under that Act.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 21 through R.C.M. 201(g), which essentially repeats the statutory provisions.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Article 21 is unique to the UCMJ and does not have a federal statutory counterpart. The concept of concurrent jurisdiction, however, is well-established with respect to the concurrent jurisdiction of military, federal civilian, and state courts over many matters.[4]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 21: No change to Article 21.

- This report recommends no change to Article 21. The current statutory provision fully addresses the article's intended purpose. The procedures implementing this provision support the statute's intent and function.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 21.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports MJRG Operational Guidance by maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military practice.

Subchapter V. Composition of Court-Martial

Article 22 – Who May Convene General Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 822

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would make a technical amendment to Article 22 to reflect the current terminology for the title of an officer commanding a naval fleet, with no substantive changes to the statute. Part II of the Report will consider whether any additional changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 22.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 22 provides that the authority to convene general courts-martial may be exercised by the President, designated senior civilian officials and commanding officers, and commanding officers empowered to do so by the President. The statute also addresses the process for consideration of a case when a commanding officer empowered to convene courts-martial is the accuser, and the general power of superior commanding officers to exercise court-martial convening authority.

3. Historical Background

Article 22 was derived from Article 8 of the Articles of War and Article 38 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] In 1986, Congress amended Article 22 to add the Secretary of Defense and combatant commanders to the list of general court-martial convening authorities;[2] and in 2006, Congress removed the reference to a commanding officer of a "Territorial Department."[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 22 through R.C.M. 504. The statute and the rule reflect current practice.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian courts are standing courts with no direct analogy to courts-martial, each of which is a temporary tribunal convened to consider a specific case.[4]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 22: Amend Article 22(a)(6) by removing the words "in chief."

- This is a minor technical change to reflect the current terminology for the commander of a naval fleet. No other statutory changes are needed.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any additional changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 22.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This is a minor technical change and is not related to any other provisions of the Code.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 501. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO PERSONS AUTHORIZED TO CONVENE GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Section 822(a)(6) of title 10, United States Code (article 22(a)(6) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by striking "in chief".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 501 would make a technical amendment to Article 22 to reflect the current terminology for the title of an officer commanding a naval fleet, with no substantive changes.

Article 23 – Who May Convene Special Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 823

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 23. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 23.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 23 identifies the officials who may convene special courts-martial: all general court-martial convening authorities; commanding officers of various commands and military installations; and commanding officers or officers-in-charge of any other command when empowered by the Secretary concerned. The article also provides that if any such official is an accuser, the court must be convened by superior competent authority.

3. Historical Background

Article 23 was derived from Article 9 of the 1920 Articles of War and Article 26 of the 1930 Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] It has changed little since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 23 through R.C.M. 504, which provides additional clarification concerning the definition of "separate and detached" commands and units, and specifies procedures for determining whether particular commands are separate and detached. The statute and the rule reflect current practice.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Because federal civilian courts are courts of standing jurisdiction, there is no civilian equivalent of court-martial "convening authority" as exercised by military commanders and other designated officials under Articles 22, 23, and 24.[3]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 23: No change to Article 23.

- In view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 23's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 23.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique aspect of military law that is essential to command authority and the administration of military justice under the Code.

Article 24 – Who May Convene Summary Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 824

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 24. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 24.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 24 identifies the officials who may convene summary courts-martial: all general and special court-martial convening authorities; commanding officers of detached companies or other Army detachments; commanding officers of detached squadrons or other Air Force detachments; and commanding officers or officers in charge of any other command when empowered by the Secretary concerned. The statute also provides that when only one commissioned officer is present with a command or detachment, that officer shall be the summary court-martial of that command or detachment and shall hear and determine all summary court-martial cases brought before him.

3. Historical Background

Article 24 was derived from Article 10 of the Articles of War and Article 64 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy.[1] The statute has remained unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 24 through R.C.M. 504(d)(2) and R.C.M. 1302, the latter of which provides discretion to the convening authorities to determine whether to forward charges to a superior authority when the summary court-martial or the convening authority is the accuser. R.C.M. 504(b)(2)(A) provides clarification concerning the definition of "separate and detached" commands and units and procedures for determining whether particular commands are separate and detached. The specific rules and procedures for summary courts-martial are laid out in Chapter XIII of the Rules for Courts-Martial. The statute and the rules implementing the statute reflect current practice.

[2] Act of May 5, 1950, Pub. L. No. 81-506, ch. 169, 64 Stat. 108.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Because federal civilian courts are courts of standing jurisdiction, there is no civilian equivalent of court-martial "convening authority" as exercised by military commanders and other designated officials under Articles 22, 23, and 24.[3]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 24: No change to Article 24.

- Consistent with this Report's recommendations to retain the basic authority and purpose of summary court-martial, and in view of the well-developed case law addressing Article 24's provisions, a statutory change is not necessary.
- Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 24.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by preserving a unique feature of the military justice system that allows for efficient disposition of relatively minor offenses in an administrative, non-criminal forum.

Article 25 – Who May Serve on Courts-Martial
10 U.S.C. § 825

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 25 to expand the opportunity for service on a court-martial by enlisted personnel. Under the proposal, the convening authority would have the option of detailing enlisted personnel to a court-martial in the initial convening order. The accused would then have the opportunity to request a different panel composition, reflecting the two alternatives under current law. The accused could request either a panel composed entirely of officers or a panel composed of at least one-third enlisted personnel. The proposal would retain the current prohibition against detailing panel members who are junior in rank and grade to the accused, but would remove the statutory prohibition against detailing enlisted panel members (but not officers) who are from the same unit as the accused. The proposal would instead rely on the well-developed procedures for voir dire and challenges to address any concerns about bias or conflicts—the same process that is used to address any issues involving officers from the same unit as the accused.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 25 defines the eligibility requirements for members serving on courts-martial panels. Currently, the convening authority selects and details members using the following criteria listed in Article 25(d)(2): age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament. The convening authority may select any active duty commissioned officer or warrant officer for service on a general or special court-martial panel.[1] The convening authority may also detail enlisted members, but only if requested by an enlisted accused. If such a request is made, Article 25(c)(1) provides that enlisted membership must comprise at least one-third of the total membership of the panel, unless eligible enlisted members cannot be obtained due to physical conditions or military exigencies.[2] When it can be avoided, an accused may not be tried by a member junior in rank or grade;[3] and in all cases, enlisted members may never be detailed from the accused's same unit[4]

[1] Warrant officers and enlisted members are only eligible to serve as panel members on general and special courts-martial, whereas commissioned officers are eligible to serve on all courts-martial, including as a summary court-martial officer. Article 25(a)-(b).

[2] If enlisted members cannot be obtained following a request by the accused for enlisted membership on the panel, Article 25(c)(1) requires the convening authority to make a detailed written statement, to be appended to the record of trial, stating why they could not be obtained.

[3] Prohibitions against members being tried at courts-martial by persons of inferior rank have been in effect since 1775. See generally WILLIAM WINTHROP, MILITARY LAW AND PRECEDENCE 951-983 (2000 reprint) (2d ed. 1920).

unless the prohibition is waived by the accused.[5] Article 25(e) permits the convening authority to excuse members before the court-martial is assembled—delegable to the staff judge advocate, legal officer, or another principal assistant pursuant to service regulations. After the court-martial is assembled, however, Article 29 provides that members may be added to or removed from the panel only with the approval of the military judge.

3. Historical Background

The right to trial by jury in criminal cases has not been extended to courts-martial.[6] Beginning in the Revolutionary era, the Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy provided for the appointment of officers to serve on courts-martial, but otherwise did not provide statutory criteria for their selection by court-martial convening authorities. In the aftermath of controversies about court-martial practices during World War I,[7] Congress first set forth basic criteria for service on courts-martial in the 1920 Articles of War.[8] When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, it incorporated these selection criteria into Article 25.[9] With respect to enlisted representation on courts-martial, Congress did not authorize enlisted representation in statute until 1948, as part of the Elston Act amendments.[10] This authorization was incorporated into Article 25 as enacted in 1950. From 1950 to 1986, Article 25 required all requests for enlisted members to be in writing. In 1986, Congress amended the statute to allow for oral requests by the accused.[11]

[4] Article 25(c)(2) currently defines a unit as being: "[A]ny regularly organized body as defined by the Secretary concerned, but in no case may it be a body larger than a company, squadron, ship's crew, or body corresponding to one of them."

Kimball, 13 M.J. 659, 660 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (holding that "where the accused and his defense counsel purported at trial to waive any objection to the enlisted members on the grounds that they were from the same unit as the accused, he will not be permitted to challenge the composition of the court in this regard on appeal.").

4. Contemporary Practice

A court-martial is a temporary body, created by a convening order to hear a specific case. Each convening order sets forth the names of the individual members detailed to serve on the specific court-martial. The members are selected by the convening authority, frequently from lists of nominees prepared by the convening authority's staff judge advocate with input from the nominees' superiors. Most services prepare lists of members designated for service over a period of time; in one service, a new list of members is prepared for each case.[12] An allegation of improper manipulation of the member selection process may be reviewed as an issue of unlawful command influence.[13]

The President has implemented Article 25 through R.C.M. 502 (Qualifications and duties of personnel of courts-martial), R.C.M. 503 (Detailing members, military judge, and counsel), R.C.M. 505 (Changes of members, military judge, and counsel), and R.C.M. 903 (Accused's elections on composition of court-martial). R.C.M. 903(a)(1) specifically provides that the military judge shall ascertain, on the record and before the end of the initial Article 39(a) session, whether the accused wishes to exercise his right to elect enlisted membership on the panel. The convening authority's excusal power under Article 25(e) and R.C.M. 505(c) is typically exercised when the member has an approved reason for being absent from court duty.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Under the Sixth Amendment and 28 U.S.C §§ 1861-1869, federal jurors are randomly selected, and the jury venire is required to represent a fair cross-section of the local community in the district or division where the court convenes. Each federal district court is required to devise and implement a written plan for random selection of jurors that does not exclude potential jurors on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or economic status. The practices for selecting and impaneling juries vary widely among the federal districts, as the specific processes are managed by judges, administrative staff, and local district rules.[14] The military justice system must be able to operate in deployed and [12] In the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, the common practice is for an annual standing convening order, with amendments made for specific courts-martial. Commanders update these standing orders annually or upon assuming command. See ARMY REG. 27-10; JAGINST 5800.7F; MARINE CORPS ORDER 5800.16A; COMMANDANT INSTR. M5810.1E. In the Air Force, commanders publish new convening orders for each new case referred for trial. See AIR FORCE INSTR. 51-201.

Wiesen, 56 M.J. 172, 174 (C.A.A.F. 2001) (reversing for improper denial of challenge for cause of senior panel member who was in the chain of command of five other persons on the venire); United States v. Drain, 17 C.M.R. 44 (C.M.A. 1954) (reversing for improper denial of challenge for cause of senior panel member in part because he wrote the efficiency reports of all other court members); United States v. Mitchell, 19 M.J. 905 (A.C.M.R. 1985) (remanding a case where evidence was raised that the commander made remarks capable of influencing court members to disregard favorable character testimony by a convicted solider who was a sentencing witness for the accused).

[14] See WAYNE LAFAVE, JEROLD ISRAEL, NANCY KING, AND ORIN KERR, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE § 22.2(a) (3d ed. 2013) (describing the minimum requirements applicable to all random selection plans issued by federal district courts, and highlighting areas of difference).

operational environments in which large numbers of potential court-members are engaged in vital national security activities. As a consequence, it has not been considered practicable to adopt the civilian random selection model for use in courts-martial on a system-wide basis.[15] Although court-martial panel members are not considered to be jurors under the Sixth amendment,[16] a well-developed body of case law addresses the need for assembled court members to be objective and impartial.[17] In addition, members are subject to challenge and disqualification under criteria similar to—and in some cases more stringent than—the criteria applicable to removal of jurors from civilian panels.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 25.1: Amend Article 25 to permit convening authorities to detail enlisted personnel to court-martial panels, subject to the accused's ability to specifically elect an all-officer panel under the same rules and procedures with which an accused may elect one-third enlisted panel membership.

- This proposal would benefit the court-martial panel member selection process by allowing commanders to detail highly qualified enlisted members with greater frequency and in greater numbers. This expanded opportunity for enlisted personnel to serve on panels would enable the court-martial process to benefit from the experience, education, training, and judgment of the high quality personnel who serve in the armed forces.

- The proposed change would increase the efficiency of the military justice system, by providing commanders with a broader pool of potential members to be detailed to courts-martial. Such a broader pool would be particularly important in situations involving small units, or remote or deployed locations.

[15] Attempts at random panel selection efforts have been made—most notably in experiments occurring at Fort Riley in 1974 and, later, at V Corps in 2005. Both experiments sought to apply random-selection procedures, but produced unforeseen difficulties in meeting the criteria under Article 25(d)(2). See James T. Hill, Achieving Transparency in the Military Panel Selection Process with the Preselection Method, 205 MIL. L. REV. 117, 128-130 (2010). In 1999, Congress directed the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to study random selection of court-martial members. See generally JOINT SERVICE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY JUSTICE, REPORT ON THE METHODS OF SELECTION OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES TO SERVE ON COURT-MARTIAL (1999). In its study, the Committee examined different methods of panel selection employed by the services, analyzed past random court-martial selection experiments, and analyzed Canadian and United Kingdom member-selection systems. Id. at 3. The Committee concluded that random selection is incompatible with Article 25(d)(2), and found that the standard selection method best applies Article 25(d)(2)'s best qualified mandate. Id. at 3, 22.

[17] See, e.g., United States v. McQueen, 7 M.J. 281, 281 (C.M.A. 1979) ("The proper test to evaluate the propriety of the judge's denial of a challenge for cause 'is whether he (the prospective court member) is mentally free to render an impartial finding and sentence based on the law and the evidence.'") (quoting United States v. Parker, 19 C.M.R. 400, 410-411 (1955)).

- This recommendation reflects the reality that enlisted members are capable fact-finders, having received extensive technical training during the course of their careers, with many having additional education beyond high school. The ability of a convening authority to draw upon this resource in accordance with the criteria of Article 25 would enhance his or her ability to appoint a "blue ribbon" panel, when compared to a civilian jury randomly drawn from the community at large.[18]

- The proposed amendments would specifically retain the accused's ability to elect one-third enlisted panel membership, and would continue the right to elect an all-officer panel. This would ensure that any additional flexibility provided to convening authorities does not diminish an accused's alternatives under current law—to be trial by a panel composed of either officers, or to be tried by a mixed panel of officers and enlisted members.

Recommendation 25.2: Amend Article 25 by removing the statutory prohibition against detailing enlisted members to courts-martial who are from the same unit as an enlisted accused.

- This proposal would retain the statutory limitation against detailing panel members junior in rank and grade to the accused; however, it would eliminate the blanket prohibition against detailing enlisted members who are of the same unit as an enlisted accused. The current law contains no such limitation on the detailing of officers from the same unit as the accused. As such, current law provides an unnecessary distinction between enlisted members and officers. The proposal would eliminate this outmoded distinction, and rely instead on the well-developed procedures for voir dire and challenges to address any concerns about bias or conflicts—the same process that is used to address any issues involving officers from the same unit as the accused.

Recommendation 25.3: Amend Article 25(d) to conform to the proposed amendments under Article 29 concerning impaneling of members.

- This proposal would conform Article 25 to the proposed amendments in Article 29 requiring the detail of not less than 12 members in a capital case, 8 members in a non-capital general court-martial, and 4 members in a special court-martial.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by enhancing efficiency during the panel selection phase of the court-martial process, which maintaining a unique and necessary feature of military justice practice.

SEC. 502. WHO MAY SERVE ON COURTS-MARTIAL; DETAIL OF MEMBERS.

(a) WHO MAY SERVE ON COURTS-MARTIAL.—Subsection (c) of section 825 of title 10, United States Code (article 25 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) Any enlisted member on active duty is eligible to serve on a general or special court-martial for the trial of any other enlisted member.

"(2) Before a court-martial with a military judge and members is assembled for trial, an enlisted member who is an accused may personally request, orally on the record or in writing, that—

"(A) the membership of the court-martial be comprised entirely of officers; or

"(B) enlisted members comprise at least one-third of the membership of the court-martial, regardless of whether enlisted members have been detailed to the court-martial.

"(3) Except as provided in paragraph (4), after such a request, the accused may not be tried by a general or special court-martial if the membership of the court-martial is inconsistent with the request.

"(4) If, because of physical conditions or military exigencies, a sufficient number of eligible officers or enlisted members, as the case may be, are not available to carry out paragraph (2), the trial may nevertheless be held. In that event, the convening authority shall make a detailed written statement of the reasons for nonavailability. The statement shall be appended to the record.".

(b) DETAIL OF MEMBERS.—Subsection (d) of such section (article) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) The convening authority shall detail not less than the number of members necessary to impanel the court-martial under section 829 of this title (article 29).".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 502 concerns the eligibility requirements for service on court-martial panels. The proposed amendments to Article 25 would expand the opportunity for service on a court-martial panel by permitting the detail of enlisted personnel as panel members without requiring a specific request from the accused. As amended, Article 25 would contain the following provisions:

Article 25(c)(1) and (d)(1) would retain the statutory prohibition against detailing panel members junior in rank and grade to the accused, but the statutory prohibition against detailing enlisted panel members who are of the same unit as an enlisted accused would be eliminated. There is no such limitation on the detailing of officers from the same unit as the accused under current law. As such, current law provides an unnecessary distinction between enlisted members and officers. The amendments would eliminate this outmoded distinction, and rely instead on the well-developed procedures for voir dire and challenges to address any concerns about bias or conflicts—the same process that is used to address any issues involving officers from the same unit as the accused. This change would enhance the convening authority's ability to draw from a large pool of highly qualified members, thereby expanding the opportunity for courts-martial to reflect the input of the high caliber enlisted personnel in the modern armed forces.

Article 25(c)(2) would retain the option for the accused to request a panel with at least one-third enlisted members. In addition, it would grant the accused the option to request an all-officer panel, which is the default panel composition under current practice. The Article 25(d)(2) member-selection criteria (age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament) would be retained to ensure that court-martial panels continue to be composed of the most highly qualified, eligible personnel. The statute's implementing rules would include appropriate adjustments to address requests for panels that include all officers or at least one-third enlisted representation.

Article 25(d)(3) would require that the convening authority detail a sufficient number of members for impanelment under the proposed amendments to Article 29. See Section 506, infra.

Article 25a – Number of Members in Capital Cases
10 U.S.C. § 825a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would conform the number of panel members in a capital case to a fixed number of twelve members, as required in federal civilian criminal trials.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 25a establishes a floor of twelve members for panels in capital cases, but it does not provide a ceiling, thereby permitting the number of members in capital cases to vary from case to case. The statute provides that the convening authority may specify a number of members less than twelve but not "less than five" (the current minimum for a general court-martial) when twelve members are "not reasonably available because of physical conditions or military exigencies."

3. Historical Background

Before 1920, the Articles of War required that all general courts-martial panels be composed of five to thirteen officers, including in capital cases.[1] In 1920, Congress amended the Articles of War to provide that general courts-martial panels could consist of "any number of officers not less than five";[2] in addition, the voting requirement in capital cases was changed to require a unanimous vote in order to adjudge a death sentence.[3] When the UCMJ was enacted in 1950, Congress incorporated these requirements into the Code in Article 52.[4] Article 25a, and its requirement for a twelve-member minimum in capital cases, was added in 2001.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 25a through R.C.M. 501(a)(1)(B), which mirrors the statutory provisions.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

In federal civilian capital cases, and in capital cases among the states that authorize the death penalty, a jury panel composed of at least twelve jurors is required.[6] Federal civilian capital cases require a fixed panel of twelve jurors unless the parties stipulate otherwise, or the defendant voluntarily waives his or her right to a trial by jury in writing, with government consent, and court approval.[7] Pursuant to Article 18, the right to waive a trial by members is not permitted in a military capital case.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 25a: Amend Article 25a to require a fixed-size panel of twelve members in capital cases.

- By requiring twelve-member panels in all cases in which the accused may be sentenced to death, this proposal would align military practice with prevailing capital litigation practice in the United States.
- In the event the case becomes non-capital as a result of developments after referral, the case would proceed in accordance with the membership requirements under Articles 16, 29, and 53. If the case becomes non-capital after twelve members have been impaneled, the case would proceed with twelve members subject to the excusal provisions in Articles 29 and 53.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by incorporating the practices and rules used in U.S. district courts applicable to capital cases into military practice insofar as practicable.
- This proposal will impact or be impacted by related proposals in this Report pertaining to Articles 17-20, 25, 29, 41, 45, and 51-53.

SEC. 503. NUMBER OF COURT-MARTIAL MEMBERS IN CAPITAL CASES.

Section 825a of title 10, United States Code (article 25a of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

---

[6] See, e.g., Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 103 (1970).

[7] FED. R. CRIM. P. 23.

"§825a. Art. 25a. Number of court-martial members in capital cases

"(a) IN GENERAL.—In a case in which the accused may be sentenced to death, the number of members shall be 12.

"(b) CASE NO LONGER CAPITAL.—Subject to section 829 of this title (article 29)—

"(1) if a case is referred for trial as a capital case and, before the members are impaneled, the accused may no longer be sentenced to death, the number of members shall be eight; and

"(2) if a case is referred for trial as a capital case and, after the members are impaneled, the accused may no longer be sentenced to death, the number of members shall remain 12.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 503 would amend Article 25a to establish a standard panel size of twelve members in capital cases, consistent with the standard size for juries in federal civilian capital trials. Under current law, panels in capital courts-martial are composed of a variable number of members no fewer than twelve, which means that the number of members can vary from case to case without any guiding principle to ensure consistency. Under the statute, as amended, in the event a case becomes non-capital as a result of developments after referral but prior to impanelment, the case would proceed in accordance with the membership requirements under Articles 16 and 29. If the case becomes non-capital after twelve members have been impaneled, it would proceed with twelve members subject to the excusal provisions in Articles 29.

Article 26 – Military Judge of a General or Special Court-Martial

10 U.S.C. § 826

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 26 to conform to current practice by requiring that a military judge preside over every general and special court-martial, by providing for the designation of a chief trial judge by each Judge Advocate General, and by providing statutory authority for cross-service detailing of military judges with the approval of the Judge Advocate General of the Armed Force of which the military judge is a member. Further, the proposal would amend Article 26 to provide for uniform selection criteria and regulations concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges with limited exceptions.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 26 requires that a military judge be detailed to preside over every general court-martial, and provides discretionary authority for the detailing of military judges to preside over special courts-martial.[1] Article 26 further provides that a military judge must be a commissioned officer who is a member of the bar and who is certified as qualified for service as a military judge by the Judge Advocate General. In addition, Article 26 prohibits a person who is the accuser or a witness for the prosecution, or who has investigated or acted as counsel in the case, from acting as a military judge in the same case. Under Article 26(e), any consultation between the military judge and members of the court-martial must take place in the presence of the accused, trial counsel, and defense counsel. The military judge serves as the presiding official, not as a voting member of the court.

3. Historical Background

Prior to enactment of the UCMJ, a court-martial consisted of a board of officers without a presiding judge. At the time, courts-martial did not include a military judge. Under the Articles of War, the Army employed a "law member" who, in addition to participating as a member of the panel, could rule on certain legal issues.[2] The UCMJ, as enacted in 1950, required the detailing of a law officer to each general court-martial.[3] The law officer was [1] Article 19 currently requires that, in any special court-martial case where a military judge could not be detailed to the trial because of physical conditions or military exigencies, the convening authority shall provide a detailed written explanation stating the reason a military judge could not be detailed. In practice, no special court-martial is held without a military judge, and the accompanying proposal to amend Article 19 conforms to this practice.

---

not a member of the panel and did not deliberate or vote on findings or the sentence.[4] The law officer performed many, but not all, of the duties of a trial court-judge.[5] In special courts-martial, the president of the court-martial served as the presiding official.[6]

In the Military Justice Act of 1968, Congress transformed the law officer position into that of the military judge, with authority to preside over courts-martial under Article 26. Other changes in the 1968 legislation authorized the military judge to conduct motion and related hearings without the presence of the panel members, to preside in judge-alone non-capital cases upon request of the accused, and to perform the duties generally associated with the judicial role in criminal proceedings.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, Article 26 and accompanying service regulations control the duties of military judges in courts-martial as well as the detailing and rating of judges. Military judges must be detailed to every general court-martial; they may also be detailed to special courts-martial, but because the UCMJ currently provides for the possibility of a special court-martial without a military judge, it does not require detailing of a special-court-martial judge in every case. The UCMJ currently provides no authority for a military judge to act as a judge outside the context of a referred case, and Article 26 limits detailing of a judge to a referred court-martial case.

The Judge Advocates General select judge advocates for assignment as military judges using minimal statutory standards supplemented by individual service criteria. Most services have an assigned chief trial judge, established by service regulations. The chief trial judges perform various functions related to their positions, such as supervising and rating other judges, detailing other judges to cases, and coordinating judicial training. All of the services have formal or informal minimum tour lengths for military judge assignments that are not less than three years, with established exceptions for ending these tours early.

The President has implemented Article 26 through R.C.M. 503(b)(3). In 2005, this rule was updated to clarify that a military judge from any service may be detailed to a court-martial convened within another service or a combatant command or joint command, when permitted by the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of the judge. This rule, as well as R.C.M. 201(e)(4), allows for cross-service detailing of military judges.

The president was expected to preserve order in the courtroom, set the time and place of trial, administered oaths, and recessed or adjourned the court. In special courts-martial, the president served as the presiding official and addressed legal matters.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian courts are standing courts with no direct analogy to courts-martial, each of which is a temporary tribunal convened to consider a specific case.[8] In the federal civilian system, judges are presidentially appointed, subject to Senate confirmation, with life tenure in the case of Article III judges,[9] or tenure for a statutory term in the case of Article I judges.[10] Federal district court judges consider issues and make judicial rulings at the request of a party or in response to requirements of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure any time after a defendant has made an initial appearance. A judge becomes the chief judge of a U.S. district court or U.S. circuit court of appeals based on seniority among eligible judges. The President appoints the Chief Justice of the United States, subject to confirmation by the Senate. Federal district court judges may preside over cases in other federal districts within their circuit if designated by the Chief Judge of their circuit. The Chief Justice of the United States may designate district court judges to preside outside their own circuit.[11]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 26.1: Amend Article 26: (1) to conform the statute to the current practice of detailing a military judge to every general and special court-martial; (2) to provide for cross-service detailing of military judges; (3) to require a chief trial judge in each armed force; and (4) to provide appropriate criteria for service as a military judge.

- This proposal would conform Article 26 to current practice by requiring that a military judge preside over every general and special court-martial, and by requiring a chief trial judge in each service. It also would codify the authority for detailing military judges to a court convened by a joint commander or within another armed force.
- The proposal would establish statutory criteria for selection for service as a military judge, including education, training, experience, and judicial temperament.
- The proposal would remove "or his designee" from Article 26 in the three instances that phrase occurs to conform to current practice under the UCMJ, in which the Judge Advocate General has designated other officials to perform duties without express statutory reference to the ability to designate.

Recommendation 26.2: Amend Article 26 to authorize the President to establish uniform regulations concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges with provisions for early reassignment as necessary.

- This proposal would provide a stable tour length for military judges, consistent with the vital importance of developing a significant level of experience within the judiciary.
- The proposed amendments support uniformity of practice among the services with respect to tour lengths for assignment of military judges, with exceptions for early reassignment.
- Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 26, with particular emphasis on the rules concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges. The implementing rules in Part II will reflect the Services' role and discretion in applying exceptions to the minimum tour lengths.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC terms of reference by better aligning the provisions of Article 26 with federal civilian practice and by applying provisions more uniformly across the services.
- The proposal would codify the ability of each Judge Advocate General to detail military judges to cases outside their services and to establish a unified minimum tour length for all military trial judges.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 504. DETAILING, QUALIFICATIONS, ETC. OF MILITARY JUDGES.

(a) SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL.—Subsection (a) of section 826 of title 10, United States Code (article 26 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by inserting after "each general" the following: "and special"; and

(2) by striking the second sentence.

(b) QUALIFICATIONS.—Subsection (b) of such section (article) is amended by striking "qualified for duty" and inserting "qualified, by reason of education, training, experience, and judicial temperament, for duty".

(c) DETAIL AND ASSIGNMENT.—Subsection (c) of such section (article) is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) In accordance with regulations prescribed under subsection (a), a military judge of a general or special court-martial shall be designated for detail by the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which the military judge is a member.

"(2) Neither the convening authority nor any member of the staff of the convening authority shall prepare or review any report concerning the effectiveness, fitness, or efficiency of the military judge so detailed, which relates to the military judge's performance of duty as a military judge.

"(3) A commissioned officer who is certified to be qualified for duty as a military judge of a general court-martial—

"(A) may perform such duties only when the officer is assigned and directly responsible to the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which the military judge is a member; and

"(B) may perform duties of a judicial or nonjudicial nature other than those relating to the officer's primary duty as a military judge of a general court-martial when such duties are assigned to the officer by or with the approval of that Judge Advocate General.

"(4) In accordance with regulations prescribed by the President, assignments of military judges under this section (article) shall be for appropriate minimum periods, subject to such exceptions as may be authorized in the regulations.".

(d) DETAIL TO A DIFFERENT ARMED FORCE.—Such section (article) is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f) A military judge may be detailed under subsection (a) to a court-martial or a proceeding under section 830a of this title (article 30a) that is convened in a different armed force, when so permitted by the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which the military judge is a member.".

(e) CHIEF TRIAL JUDGES.—Such section (article), as amended by subsection (d), is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(g) In accordance with regulations prescribed by the President, each Judge Advocate General shall designate a chief trial judge from among the members of the applicable trial judiciary.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 504 contains amendments to Article 26 pertaining to the detailing and qualifications of military judges, as follows:

Section 504(a) would amend Article 26(a) to conform to the proposed amendments to Article 16 and to reflect current practice in which a military judge is detailed to every general and special court-martial.

Section 504(b) would amend Article 26(b) to provide that the Judge Advocates General certify officers to be military judges who are most qualified to serve by virtue of meeting statutory criteria and through an evaluation of their individual education, training, experience, and judicial temperament.

Section 504(c) would amend Article 26(c) to provide for Manual provisions concerning minimum tour lengths for military judges. Implementing rules would enable the Services to apply appropriate exceptions to the minimum tour lengths.

Section 504(d) would add a new subsection (f) to Article 26 to expressly authorize cross-service detailing of military judges. Although such detailing has been addressed in the Rules for Courts-Martial, these amendments would provide clear statutory authority for this practice.

Section 504(e) would further amend Article 26 by adding a new subsection (g) to codify the position of chief trial judge. Under implementing regulations, the chief judge could detail subordinate military judges to particular cases, and carry out additional duties as directed by the Judge Advocates General or as identified in the UCMJ, MCM, and service regulations.

The proposed amendments to Article 26 also would remove the phrase "or his designee" from Article 26 in the three instances where it occurs. This change would conform the statute to current practice under the UCMJ, in which the Judge Advocate General has designated other officials to perform duties without express statutory reference to the ability to designate.

Article 26a (New Provision) – Military Magistrates
10 U.S.C. § 826a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create a new section, Article 26a, providing the minimum qualifications for military magistrates and providing that military magistrates may be assigned under service regulations to perform duties other than those described under Articles 19 and 30a.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

This proposal would create a new article of the UCMJ.

3. Historical Background

The Military Justice Act of 1968 established the position of military judge at courts-martial, created independent trial judiciaries within the services, and granted an accused the right to elect a trial by military judge alone, without members.[1] Since 1968, the law and the practice in the military justice system have shifted primary responsibility to military trial judges to preside over all aspects of court-martial procedure.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

There is no current statutory provision specifically authorizing or describing military magistrates. However, under the executive authority governing military search authorizations, the President has provided military judges and non-statutory magistrates the power to issue search authorizations.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

The Federal Magistrates Act of 1968 established the magistrate judge system for the federal civilian courts.[4] A federal magistrate judge's jurisdiction and powers are set forth by statute.[5] The local rules in each district outline the specific duties magistrate judges are assigned, and they may act on authority expressly granted by federal district court judges or by consent of the parties.[6]

A magistrate judge's duties vary considerably depending on local rules. In criminal cases, magistrate judges have full authority to preside over trials involving petty offenses and in Class A misdemeanor cases by consent of the parties. Magistrate judges assist in felony preliminary proceedings (search and arrest warrants, summonses, initial appearances, preliminary examinations, arraignments, and detention hearings) and in felony pretrial matters (pretrial motions, evidentiary hearings, probation/supervised release hearings, and guilty plea proceedings). When a federal criminal defendant is placed in pretrial confinement, the defendant has the right to a detention hearing during his initial appearance before a magistrate judge.[7] This hearing determines whether continued confinement of the defendant before trial is warranted. Either party may seek an immediate de novo review of a detention order before a federal district court judge.[8] A magistrate judge may administer oaths and issue orders pertaining to the setting of bail or detention without authorization from a district judge.[9]

6. Recommendations and Justification

Recommendation 26a: Enact a new section, Article 26a, providing the minimum qualifications for military magistrates and providing that military magistrates may be assigned under service regulations to perform duties other than those described under Articles 19 and 30a.

- This proposal would align the qualification requirements for military magistrates with the qualification requirements of military judges under Article 26.
- This proposal also would authorize the Secretary concerned to prescribe regulations governing other duties that military magistrates may perform in addition to the duties specified under Articles 19 and 30a. Such duties could include, for example, duty as a preliminary hearing officer under Article 32 or as summary courts-martial officers. Such duties also could include issuing search authorizations and performing pretrial confinement reviews, both before and after referral of charges.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal to create a new section, Article 26a, supports the Terms of Reference by incorporating positive aspects of the federal civilian judicial system into the current military justice structure.
- The proposal is related to Article 26, which addresses qualification requirements for military judges, and to Articles 19 and 30a, which would allow detailed military judges to designate military magistrates to preside over judge-alone special courts-martial (with consent of the parties) and proceedings before referral of charges and specifications to court-martial for trial.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 507. MILITARY MAGISTRATES.

Subchapter V of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 826 (article 26 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice) the following new section (article):

"§826a. Art. 26a. Military magistrates

"(a) QUALIFICATIONS.—A military magistrate shall be a commissioned officer of the armed forces who—

"(1) is a member of the bar of a Federal court or a member of the bar of the highest court of a State; and

"(2) is certified to be qualified, by reason of education, training, experience, and judicial temperament, for duty as a military magistrate by the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which the officer is a member.

"(b) DUTIES.—In accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, in addition to duties when designated under section 819 of this title or section 830a of this title (articles 19 or 30a), a military magistrate may be assigned to perform other duties of a nonjudicial nature.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 507 would create a new section, Article 26a, which would set forth minimum qualifications under which the Judge Advocates General, in accordance with service regulations, could certify military magistrates who could preside over proceedings under Articles 19 and 30a when designated by the detailed military judge.

Under Article 26a(b), military magistrates also could be assigned to non-judicial duties if so authorized under regulations of the Secretary concerned. This provision recognizes that the services have programs through which qualified officers may be detailed to perform duties of a non-judicial nature—that is, duties that do not have to be performed by a military judge—such as issuing search authorizations or serving as a summary court-martial officer, preliminary hearing officer, or pretrial confinement review officer.

Article 27 – Detail of Trial Counsel and Defense Counsel
10 U.S.C. § 827

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 27 by requiring the detailing of qualified defense counsel to all special courts-martial, and by requiring, "to the greatest extent practicable," the detailing of defense counsel "learned in the law applicable to capital cases" in all capital cases. This proposal would retain the authority for the services to detail individuals not qualified under Article 27(b)—such as law students preparing to become judge advocates—to serve as trial counsel in special courts-martial and assistant trial counsel in both general and special courts-martial, but would require that they meet minimum requirements prescribed by the President before being detailed. The proposed amendments also would broaden the disqualification provision under Article 27(a)(2) to include appellate judges who have participated in the same case.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 27 concerns the detailing of trial and defense counsel to courts-martial and prescribes minimum qualification requirements for counsel so detailed. The statute contains three subsections. Article 27(a) directs that trial counsel and defense counsel shall be detailed for each general and special court-martial, and provides limits on the ability of counsel, investigating officers, military judges, and members to later participate in a different capacity in the same case. Article 27(b) provides that counsel detailed for general courts-martial must be certified as competent by the Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which the counsel is a member, and must be either: (1) a judge advocate who is a graduate of an accredited law school or a member of the bar of a Federal court or the highest court of a state; or (2) a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a state. Article 27(b) also requires that a non-judge advocate detailed as a trial or defense counsel be a member of the bar of a Federal court or the highest court of a state. In the case of special courts-martial, Article 27(c) allows the detailing of defense counsel who do not meet the requirements of Article 27(b) when required by physical conditions or military exigencies, but generally requires the detailed defense counsel to have qualifications equivalent to those of the detailed trial counsel. The statute is silent regarding qualification requirements to act as trial counsel at general courts-martial, and to act as trial counsel or assistant trial counsel at special courts-martial.

3. Historical Background

Article 27 is based on Article 11 of the Articles of War.[1] In most respects, the current statute is not significantly different from the original version that was enacted in 1950.[2] In the Military Justice Act of 1968, Congress removed the term "law officer" from subsection (a) and replaced it with the term "military judge" to reflect the addition of a judicial officer to the military justice system.[3] Congress also added what is now subsection (c)(1) to the statute to make allowance for situations where physical conditions or military exigencies prevent assignment of qualified counsel.[4] This provision had previously been in the Articles of War, but was not included in Article 27 when the UCMJ was enacted in 1950. In the Military Justice Act of 1983, Congress amended the statute to require the service Secretaries to prescribe regulations for detailing of trial and defense counsel to general and special courts-martial.[5]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 27 through R.C.M. 502 (Qualifications and duties of personnel of courts-martial) and R.C.M. 503 (Detailing members, military judge, and counsel). The specific procedures and regulations for detailing of counsel are provided by service regulations.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Currently, all federal courts require attorneys who practice before them to be admitted to a state bar or eligible to practice before the highest court of a state. However, the rules for admission to practice before federal district courts across the 94 districts of the federal court system are not uniform. Some districts only require membership in good standing with any state bar, while other districts have additional requirements for independent examinations, sponsorship, fees, and availability for pro bono assignment.[6]

Similar to the requirements under article 27(b), Assistant United States Attorneys are required to be members of the bar of a federal court or of the highest court of a state, and must also have at least one year of legal or other relevant experience.[7] There is no requirement that the attorney be a law school graduate (eight states still allow students to "read the law" by apprenticing with a licensed attorney and sit for the bar exam without having graduated from law school),[8] nor is there a requirement that any law school attended be accredited, unless graduation from an accredited law school is a requirement to sit for that attorney's state bar.[9] Public defender qualification requirements are similar, requiring any public defender to be "a member in good standing in the bar of the state."[10] Graduation from an accredited law school is not listed as a requirement. 18 U.S.C. § 3005 imposes additional qualification requirements upon defense counsel assigned in capital cases, requiring they be "learned in the law applicable to capital cases."

With respect to the right to counsel, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A requires representation to be provided for any financially eligible (indigent) person who is charged with a felony or Class A misdemeanor.[11] When a magistrate judge determines it is required by the interests of justice, representation may be required for those charged with a Class B misdemeanor (confinement for 6 months or less, but more than 30 days) or a Class C misdemeanor (confinement for 30 days or less but more than 5 days).[12] The federal civilian system only provides defense counsel upon showing of indigency. The UCMJ provides for the detailing of defense counsel in every general and special court-martial, recognizing the fact that servicemembers are often assigned involuntarily to locations that are far from family, friends and other sources of support.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 27.1: Amend Article 27(a)(2) to broaden the disqualification provision to include appellate judges who have participated in the same case.

- This proposed change recognizes that military appellate judges may have previously participated in the same case in a different capacity prior to being assigned as an appellate judge.

Recommendation 27.2: Amend Article 27 to require that: (1) all defense counsel detailed to general or special courts-martial must be qualified under Article 27(b); and (2) all trial counsel and assistant trial counsel detailed to special courts-martial, and all assistant trial counsel detailed to general courts-martial, must be determined to be competent to perform such duties under regulations prescribed by the President.

- This proposal would remove the authority to detail counsel who are not certified under Article 27(b) to represent the accused in special courts-martial. This proposal is consistent with current practice, as well as with this Report's proposal to require the detailing of a military judge in all special courts-martial. This proposal would not prohibit non-lawyers, such as investigators, defense paralegals or law students, from assisting the defense in a capacity other than as defense counsel or assistant defense counsel.

- This proposal retains the authority for the services to detail certain individuals, such as law students preparing to become judge advocates, as trial counsel or assistant trial counsel in special courts-martial if the Judge Advocate General or a designee of the Judge Advocate General determines the individual is competent to perform such duties. Part II of the Report will address the minimum requirements that would provide a uniform baseline across the services, with the Judge Advocates General retaining the opportunity to prescribe additional rules and procedures for detailing these counsel.

Recommendation 27.3: Amend Article 27 by adding a "learned counsel" requirement for defense counsel in capital cases. Specifically, add a new subsection (d) providing that, "[t]o the greatest extent practicable, at least one defense counsel detailed for a court-martial in a case in which the death penalty may be adjudged shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases."

- This proposal would align defense counsel qualification requirements in capital cases in military practice with the requirement for learned counsel under 18 U.S.C. § 3005, insofar as practicable given the small number of capital cases that are tried in military practice.

- Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 27, with particular attention to the applicable procedures for assigning qualified defense counsel in capital cases.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment in evaluating minimum qualification requirements for trial and defense counsel.

- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by employing the standards and procedures applicable to defenses counsel in the civilian sector insofar as practicable in military criminal practice.

- The proposed amendments are consistent with the changes proposed to Articles 16 and 26 to require a military judge to preside at all special courts-martial.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 505. QUALIFICATIONS OF TRIAL COUNSEL AND DEFENSE COUNSEL

Section 827 of title 10, United States Code (article 27 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended—

(1) in the first sentence of paragraph (2) of subsection (a), by striking "No person" and all that follows through "trial counsel," the first place it appears and inserting the following: "No person who, with respect to a case, has served as a preliminary hearing officer, court member, military judge, military magistrate, or appellate judge, may later serve as trial counsel,";

(2) in the first sentence of subsection (b), by striking "Trial counsel or defense counsel" and inserting "Trial counsel, defense counsel, or assistant defense counsel"; and

(3) by striking subsection (c) and inserting the following new subsections:

"(c)(1) Defense counsel and assistant defense counsel detailed for a special court-martial shall have the qualifications set forth in subsection (b).

"(2) Trial counsel and assistant trial counsel detailed for a special court-martial and assistant trial counsel detailed for a general court-martial must be determined to be competent to perform such duties by the Judge Advocate General, under such rules as the President may prescribe.

"(d) To the greatest extent practicable, in any capital case, at least one defense counsel shall, as determined by the Judge Advocate General, be learned in the law applicable to such cases. If necessary, this counsel may be a civilian and, if so, may be compensated in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 505 would amend Article 27, which concerns the detailing of trial and defense counsel to courts-martial, prescribes minimum qualification requirements for counsel, and disqualifies persons who have acted as the investigating officer, military judge, or a court member from later acting as trial or defense counsel in the same case.

Section 505(1) would broaden the disqualification provision under Article 27(a)(2) to include appellate judges who have participated previously in the same case.

Section 505(2) would amend Article 27(b) to extend the qualification requirement to any assistant defense counsel detailed to a general court-martial.

Section 505(3) would amend Article 27(c)(1) by requiring any defense counsel or assistant defense counsel detailed to a special court-martial to be qualified under Article 27(b). Article 27(c)(2), as amended, would retain the authority for the Services to detail individuals such as law students preparing to become judge advocates to serve as trial counsel in special courts-martial and assistant trial counsel in both general and special courts-martial without a requirement for certification under Article 27(b), so long as such individuals are determined to be competent to perform such duties by the Judge Advocate General. These changes are consistent with current practice, applicable federal civilian practice, and with the proposed changes to Articles 16 and 26, which would require a military judge to preside at all special courts-marital.

Section 505(3) also would add a new subsection (d) to Article 27. The new provision would require, to the greatest extent practicable, in any capital case, at least one defense counsel shall be learned in the law applicable to capital cases, reflecting the standard applicable in capital cases tried in the Article III courts and before military commissions.

Article 28 – Detail or Employment of Reporters and Interpreters

10 U.S.C. § 828

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 28. Part II of the Report will consider whether any changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 28.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 28 requires the convening authority of a court-martial, military commission, or court of inquiry to detail or employ qualified court reporters to record the proceedings and testimony taken before the court or commission. The article also authorizes the convening authority to detail or employ interpreters. The statute does not apply to the military commissions established under Chapter 47A of title 10.

3. Historical Background

Congress derived Article 28 from Article 115 of the 1948 Articles of War, which differed only in that it empowered the President of the court-martial panel, rather than the convening authority, to appoint a court reporter.[1] The only substantive amendment to Article 28 came in 2006, to provide the exception for statutory military commissions.[2]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 28 through R.C.M. 501(c), which provides that reporters and interpreters may be detailed or employed as appropriate, and R.C.M. 502(e), which provides the duties of reporters and interpreters so detailed and authorizes the Secretary concerned to prescribe regulations for the qualification and compensation of reporters and interpreters. In special courts-martial, the convening authority may determine that a reporter or interpreter is not required.[3]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Similar to general and special court-martial practice, federal court reporters record proceedings at the following stages of trial: (1) all proceedings in criminal cases had in open court; (2) all proceedings in other cases had in open court unless the parties with the approval of the judge shall agree specifically to the contrary; and (3) such other proceedings as a judge of the court may direct or as may be required by rule or order of court as may be requested by any party to the proceeding.[4] Each session of court and every proceeding designated by rule or order of the court or by one of the judges is required be recorded verbatim by shorthand, mechanical means, or electronic sound recording equipment.[5] The district courts are provided discretion to select the method of recording.[6] By comparison, current military law requires a verbatim transcript in most cases, with exceptions for summary courts-martial and general and special courts-martial resulting in a sentence of less than six months confinement, less than six months forfeiture of pay, and which does not include a punitive discharge.[7] The Court Interpreters Act provides that the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall prescribe, determine, and certify the qualifications of persons who may serve as certified interpreters in judicial proceedings instituted by the United States.[8]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 28: No change to Article 28.

- Part II of the Report will consider whether amendments to the MCM are necessary to ensure appropriate implementation of the proposed amendments to Articles 54 and 65 concerning the production and disposition of trial records. The proposed revision to Article 54(a) designates the court reporter as the individual statutorily empowered to certify the record.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This recommendation supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for a baseline reassessment.

[8] 28 U.S.C. § 1827.

Article 29 – Absent and Additional Members
10 U.S.C. § 829

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would amend Article 29 to align the statute with the proposed amendments to Articles 16 and 25a regarding the required number of members at general and special courts-martial. The proposal would clarify the function of assembly and impanelment in courts-martial with members, and the limited situations in which members may be absent after assembly. The amendments would allow the convening authority to detail alternate members to the court-martial, and would further clarify the option under current law for consideration of the record by a new member or military judge, by allowing for the member or judge to consider the record through the use of an electronic or other similar recording.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 29 authorizes the excusal of members from assembled general and special courts-martial as the result of a challenge, physical disability, or for good cause. The current statute requires the convening authority to detail new members in order for a trial to proceed whenever a panel falls below five members in the case of a general court-martial, and below three members in the case of a special court-martial. Article 29 also governs how evidence is presented whenever a new member or new military judge is detailed to a court-martial after the court is assembled.

3. Historical Background

Article 29 reflects longstanding military practice regarding the authority to excuse members and to detail new members to a court-martial panel as necessary.[1] At one time, military custom allowed for the impanelment of additional officers as "'supernumeraries,' whose purpose was to supply the places of such original members as might be excluded on challenge, or whose seats might be vacated by absence."[2] This practice had no statutory basis, and was abandoned in the 1840s. In its current form, Article 29 has remained substantially unchanged since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950.[3]

4. Contemporary Practice

Under current law, both Article 29 and R.C.M. 505(c)(2)(A) permit the excusal of members after assembly for good cause. R.C.M. 505(f) defines good cause as including "physical disability, military exigency, and other extraordinary circumstances which render the member, counsel, or military judge unable to proceed with the court-martial within a reasonable time."[4] Under R.C.M. 505(f), this does not include temporary inconveniences that are "incident to normal conditions of military life." These requirements are designed to ensure that members are not relieved or excused in an attempt to affect the outcome of a case.[5] However, Article 29 and current practice recognize the unique nature of the military mission and the need for a means to excuse members due to military exigencies.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian practice and military practice concerning excusal of members (or jurors) differ in several ways. Although both systems allow for excusals, the UCMJ does not have a statutory mechanism for seating alternate members. In contrast, in the federal civilian system, a district court judge may remove and replace a seated juror with an alternate whenever doubt arises about that juror's ability to perform his or her duties.[6] A federal court may impanel up to six alternates, with each side entitled to additional peremptory challenges based on the number of alternates to be impaneled. District court judges are granted wide latitude in their handling of member selection, and absent a demonstration of bias or prejudice to the defendant, their discretion will typically not be disturbed.

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 29.1: Amend Article 29 to: (1) clarify the function of assembly and impanelment in general and special courts-martial with members, and the limited situations in which members may be absent from the court-martial after assembly; (2) provide for the impaneling of 12 members in a capital general court-martial, 8 members in a non-capital general court-martial, and 4 members in a special court-martial; (3) authorize (but not require) the convening authority to direct the use of alternate members; and (4) authorize non-capital general courts-martial to proceed with a minimum of six members if one or more members are excused for good cause after the members have been impaneled.

- Under current law, Articles 16, 25, and 29 refer to the court-martial being "assembled," but there is no UCMJ provision that directly addresses assembly. This proposal would clarify the function of assembly and impanelment in members cases, and the situations in which a member may be absent or excused after assembly.

P. 23(b)(2) ("In addition, at any time before the verdict, the parties may, with the court's approval, stipulate in writing to a jury of less than [twelve] persons.").

- The option for the convening authority to utilize alternate members would enhance efficiency and better align military practice with federal civilian practice.

Recommendation 29.2: Amend Article 29 to clarify that a newly-detailed court-martial member or military judge may consider the record of previously admitted evidence through the use of an electronic or other similar recording.

- This proposal will increase efficiency when court members are replaced mid-trial. The option to use recordings to present the record to new members would enable the court to proceed by utilizing modern technology without having to await the production of a written transcript.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference and MJRG Operational Guidance by incorporating, insofar as practicable, practices and procedures concerning alternate members and replacement of members mid-trial as used in criminal trials in U.S. district court.

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 506. ASSEMBLY AND IMPANELING OF MEMBERS; DETAIL OF NEW MEMBERS AND MILITARY JUDGES.

Section 829 of title 10, United States Code (article 29 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§829. Art. 29. Assembly and impaneling of members; detail of new members and military judges

"(a) ASSEMBLY.—The military judge shall announce the assembly of a general or special court-martial with members. After such a court-martial is assembled, no member may be absent, unless the member is excused—

"(1) as a result of a challenge;

"(2) under subsection (b)(1)(B); or

"(3) by order of the military judge or the convening authority for disability or other good cause.

"(b) IMPANELING.—(1) Under rules prescribed by the President, the military judge of a general or special court-martial with members shall—

"(A) after determination of challenges, impanel the court-martial; and

"(B) excuse the members who, having been assembled, are not impaneled.

"(2) In a general court-martial, the military judge shall impanel—

"(A) 12 members in a capital case; and

"(B) eight members in a noncapital case.

"(3) In a special court-martial, the military judge shall impanel four members.

"(c) ALTERNATE MEMBERS.—In addition to members under subsection (b), the military judge shall impanel alternate members, if the convening authority authorizes alternate members.

"(d) DETAIL OF NEW MEMBERS.—(1) If, after members are impaneled, the membership of the court-martial is reduced to—

"(A) fewer than 12 members with respect to a general court-martial in a capital case;

"(B) fewer than six members with respect to a general court-martial in a noncapital case; or

"(C) fewer than four members with respect to a special court-martial; the trial may not proceed unless the convening authority details new members and, from among the members so detailed, the military judge impanels new members sufficient in number to provide the membership specified in paragraph (2).

"(2) The membership referred to in paragraph (1) is as follows:

"(A) 12 members with respect to a general court-martial in a capital case.

"(B) At least six but not more than eight members with respect to a general court-martial in a noncapital case.

"(C) Four members with respect to a special court-martial.

"(e) DETAIL OF NEW MILITARY JUDGE.—If the military judge is unable to proceed with the trial because of disability or otherwise, a new military judge shall be detailed to the court-martial.

"(f) EVIDENCE.—(1) In the case of new members under subsection (d), the trial may proceed with the new members present after the evidence previously introduced is read or, in the case of audiotape, videotape, or similar recording, is played, in the presence of the new members, the military judge, the accused, and counsel for both sides.

"(2) In the case of a new military judge under subsection (e), the trial shall proceed as if no evidence had been introduced, unless the evidence previously introduced is read or, in the case of audiotape, videotape, or similar recording, is played, in the presence of the new military judge, the accused, and counsel for both sides.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 506 contains amendments to Article 29 pertaining to the assembly, impaneling, and excusal of members, and the detailing of new court members and military judges. As amended, Article 29 would contain the following provisions:

Article 29(a) would clarify the function of assembly in general and special courts-martial with members, and the limited situations in which a member may be absent or excused after assembly of the court-martial.

Article 29(b)-(c) would require the military judge to impanel the number of members required under Articles 16 and 25a: twelve members in a capital case; eight members in a non-capital general court-martial; and four members in a special court-martial. The military judge would impanel any alternate members authorized by the convening authority in a specific case, and would then excuse any member who was detailed but not impaneled.

Article 29(d) would provide for the detail of new members if, as a result of excusals after the members have been impaneled, the membership on the panel is reduced below the following: twelve members in a capital general court-martial; six members in a non-capital general court-martial; and four members in a special court-martial. Because excusal of a member for good cause mid-trial is not a common occurrence, this provision should be used only in unusual situations. As under current law, the prohibition on further trial proceedings when the panel membership falls below the required number of members does not preclude sessions under Article 39.

Article 29(e) would address the detailing of a new military judge when the military judge is unable to proceed as a result of physical disability or otherwise.

Article 29(f) would establish the procedure for presenting the prior trial proceedings to the newly detailed members or judge. In addition to retaining the current procedure for reading a transcript of the prior proceedings, the amendment would permit the previously admitted evidence to be presented to the new members through play-back of a recording.

Subchapter VI. Pretrial Procedure

Article 30 – Charges and Specifications
10 U.S.C. § 830

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would clarify the language and organization of Article 30 in the context of current practice and related statutory provisions, with no substantive changes. Part II of the Report will address whether changes are needed in the rules implementing Article 30.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 30 provides basic statutory requirements for the initial signing and swearing of criminal charges against a military accused, and for the disposition of charges and specifications by military commanders and convening authorities exercising various levels of disciplinary authority over persons subject to the Code. The article is divided into subsections to deal with these two distinct aspects of military charging practice. Article 30(a) provides that charges and specifications may be "preferred"—that is, signed and sworn to under oath—by any person subject to the Code. It then provides the knowledge requirements for the person signing the charges, usually known as the "accuser": (1) that the signer has personal knowledge of, or has investigated, the matters set forth in the charges and specifications; and (2) that the charges and specifications are "true in fact" to the best of the signer's knowledge and belief.[1] Article 30(b) directs "the proper authority," which ordinarily is the commander who exercises non-judicial punishment authority over of the accused, but can also include any higher commander, to take "immediate steps" to determine what disposition should be made of the charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline."[2] It then requires that the accused be informed of the charges against him "as soon as practicable."

3. Historical Background

Congress derived Article 30, in part, from Article 46 (Charges; Action Upon) of the Articles of War, as amended by the Elston Act of 1948.[3] The title and subject of Article 30 ("Charges and specifications") refers to the particular nomenclature of the military's distinctive two-

This definition allows that the "signer" of the charges may be a nominal, but not the actual, accuser.

part charging procedure, which has long been a part of American "military usage and practice."[4] Under this practice, a person initiates a charge against an accused by writing out a short description of the Article violated (the "charge") and a plain, concise statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged (the "specification").[5] Charges are "preferred," or officially brought against the accused as a criminal matter, when a person subject to the UCMJ signs and swears to them, as required by Article 30(a). Under early versions of the Articles of War, only officers could prefer charges.[6] In 1920, Congress relaxed this requirement, providing that "[c]harges and specifications must be signed by a person subject to military law, and under oath either that he has personal knowledge of, or has investigated, the matters set forth therein and that the same are true in fact, to the best of his knowledge and belief."[7] When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, it divided this statutory provision into its component parts and added the requirement that the signer's oath be taken before "an officer of the armed forces authorized to administer oaths."[8] In 1956, Congress amended the article to clarify that this officer must be "commissioned." Other than this change, the current version of Article 30(a) is basically identical to the version that Congress originally enacted in 1950.

The origins of Article 30(b)'s disposition and notification provisions are more recent. Under the Articles of War, military commanders were given little guidance concerning their disposition duties, and military members were not required to be notified when charges were preferred against them. The 1891 Manual, for example, advised commanders simply to ensure "that there are good grounds for sustaining the charges" before acting upon them, including by referring the charges to court-martial for trial.[9] Winthrop advised that "[o]nly such charges as, upon sufficient investigation, are ascertained to be supported by the facts—are found to be sustained by at least prima facie evidence—should be preferred for trial," and that "[a]ll charges should be substantial and made in good faith."[10] Neither of these admonitions, however, was ever incorporated into the Articles of War in connection with preferral of charges or the commander's initial disposition authority. The 1920 Articles of War were the first to introduce the phrase "in the interest of justice and discipline" in connection with the commander's duty to dispose of charges and specifications that have been preferred against a military accused. It did so in the paragraph concerning pre-referral "investigations," which would later become the basis for Article 32 pretrial investigations.[11]

When Congress enacted the UCMJ, it sought to provide consistent statutory guidance to commanders and convening authorities in the exercise of their initial disposition and referral responsibilities, so it included the "in the interest of justice and discipline" standard in Article 30(b) as well as Article 32(a).[12] Congress also sought to prevent the situation experienced by many servicemembers under the Articles of War: lengthy stays in jail, or worse, on orders of their commanders without any notice of the charges for which they were being held, and without prompt action on the part of the commanders to dispose of the charges appropriately.[13] It addressed this concern in Article 30(b)—in conjunction with Articles 10 and 33—by requiring the commander "to take immediate steps" to dispose of the charges and specifications, and to inform the accused of the charges and specifications "as soon as practicable."[14] Congress bound together the interests of justice and discipline in Article 34, requiring the convening authority to obtain the advice of his or her staff judge advocate—with respect to both the threshold legal questions of probable cause, proper charging, and jurisdiction, and the disposition decision itself—before referring charges and specifications to general court-martial for trial.

In its current form, Article 30, in conjunction with Article 34, codifies both the commander-judge advocate partnership and the dual-purpose of the American military justice system: to promote justice while maintaining discipline within the ranks.[15] Throughout the history of the Code, legislators, servicemembers, and the public have regarded the dual-purpose nature of military law and the commander's role in charging decisions with both admiration and skepticism.[16] Over the years, attention to the disposition discretion of military commanders has tended to focus on Article 30.[17]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 30 across a number of different rules in the Manual for Courts-Martial. R.C.M. 307 implements Article 30(a), providing the rules and procedures concerning who may prefer charges and specifications, how they are to be preferred, and the manner in which they are to be technically alleged in the charge sheet. R.C.M. 308 implements Article 30(b)'s notice requirement and, in conjunction with R.C.M. 707 (Speedy trial) and R.C.M. 401(b) (Prompt determination), the requirement that notice of the charges be provided to the accused "as soon as practicable."[18] R.C.M. 306(c), 402-405, 407, and 601 provide the actions that commanders and convening authorities of various levels may take to dispose of the charges and specifications against an accused, including: dismissal of the charges; administrative action (such as counseling, reprimands, extra military instruction, or the administrative withholding of privileges); forwarding the charges to a superior or subordinate commander for disposition; directing a pretrial investigation (or preliminary hearing) on the charges; and referral of charges to a summary, special, or general court-martial for trial.[19] And finally, R.C.M. 306(b) (Initial disposition: policy) and 401 (Forwarding and disposition of charges in general) guide commanders and convening authorities with respect to how to determine what disposition to make of the charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline." R.C.M. 401 restates this statutory standard and then directs commanders to, once they have ensured that the accused has been notified of the charges, dispose of the charges "in accordance with the policy in R.C.M. 306(b)."[20]

R.C.M. 306(b) forms the President's core policy guidance with respect to disposition of offenses under the Code "in the interest of justice and discipline." The Discussion to the rule provides a non-exclusive list of factors military commanders should consider when deciding how to dispose of offenses. These "disposition factors" are then incorporated by reference into the rules concerning disposition of preferred charges and specifications and referral of charges and specifications to court-martial for trial.[21] The Discussion notes, "The disposition decision is one of the most important and difficult decisions facing a commander. Many factors must be taken into consideration and balanced . . . . The goal should be a disposition that is warranted, appropriate, and fair."[22] The rule itself directs commanders to dispose of allegations of offenses "in a timely manner at the lowest appropriate level of disposition . . . ."[23] Under current law, the disposition factors include:

- the nature of and circumstances surrounding the offense and the extent of the harm caused by the offense, including the offense's effect on morale, health, safety, welfare, and discipline;
- when applicable, the views of the victim as to disposition;
- existence of jurisdiction over the accused and the offense;
- availability and admissibility of evidence;
- the willingness of the victim or others to testify;
- cooperation of the accused in the apprehension or prosecution of another accused;
- possible improper motives or biases of the person(s) making the allegation(s);
- availability and likelihood of prosecution of the same or similar and related charges against the accused by another jurisdiction; and
- appropriateness of the authorized punishment to the particular accused or offense.[24]

These factors are based, in part, on the 1979 version of the ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function § 3-3.9(b), and are similar—but not identical—to the factors used by civilian prosecutors in determining whether or not to charge someone with a criminal offense in federal or state court.[25]

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Military charging practice under Article 30(a) and R.C.M. 307 combines aspects of the civilian complaint under Fed. R. Crim. P. 3 and the indictment or information under Fed. R. Crim. P. 7. Like the civilian indictment or information, charges and specifications preferred under Article 30(a) "must be a plain, concise, and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged and it must be signed by an attorney for the government."[26] And like the indictment in federal civilian practice, preferral of charges under Article 30(a) formally initiates a criminal matter against an accused, putting the accused on notice of potential prosecution, and generally triggering his right to counsel under service regulations. In other ways, however, charges and specifications under Article 30(a) and R.C.M. 307 function more like the complaint under Fed. R. Crim. P. 3. Like the complaint, charges and specifications are "a written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged,"[27] and the signer is required to swear before an authorized official that they are true "to the best of [the signer's] knowledge and belief."[28] Also like the complaint, preferred charges and specifications alone are not sufficient to bring an accused to trial. In both systems, a second step is needed: the referral of charges to a court-martial under Article 34, and the filing of the information or indictment with a federal district court under Fed. R. Crim. P. 7.[29] Furthermore, in both systems, formal discovery rules are generally not triggered until after referral of charges or the indictment/information;[30] preliminary hearing procedures take place, by design, between the preferral/complaint stage and the referral/information stage;[31] and until the charges are formally referred or filed, they can be modified without approval of the court.[32]

The essential differences between the two systems in the area of pretrial process are that in the federal system, the complaint - preliminary hearing - information procedures can be bypassed through the securing of a grand jury indictment under Fed. R. Crim. P. 6. The grand jury indictment is not available in the military justice system,[33] and there is no corresponding mechanism to bypass Articles 30 and 32 and refer charges directly to a court-martial. In addition, in the federal civilian system, complaints are reviewed for probable cause by judges, who then issue an arrest warrant or summons to bring the accused to court for an initial appearance.[34] In the military justice system, the initial appearance function is fulfilled under Article 30(b) and R.C.M. 308 (Notification to accused of charges), and there is no need for an arrest warrant or summons because military members are subject to orders. The formal probable cause screening takes place initially at the preliminary hearing stage in general courts-martial, and before referral of charges and specifications to trial in all courts-martial.[35] Furthermore, in all cases, probable cause is required before the accused may be ordered into arrest or confinement pending trial by court-martial under Articles 9 and 10.

With respect to disposition of charges and notice to the accused under Article 30(b) and R.C.M. 306, 308, 401-404, and 407, military practice varies from federal civilian practice in several key aspects. Under R.C.M. 308, the accused's immediate commander is responsible for causing the accused to be notified of the charges preferred against him; this notice function is provided in the federal civilian system by the judiciary under Fed. R. Crim. P. 4 (Arrest Warrant or Summons on a Complaint) and Fed. R. Crim. P. 5 (Initial Appearance). Additionally, the duty to determine whether the accused should be held in confinement is generally performed by the accused's commander or, when authorized by service regulations, an officer designated as a magistrate.[36] In federal civilian practice, this duty is generally performed by a magistrate judge at the initial appearance under Fed. R. Crim. P.

5. Most significantly, whereas federal civilian prosecutors are guided in the exercise of their prosecutorial discretion by robust, uniform disposition guidance—the Principles of Federal Prosecution, contained in the United States Attorneys' Manual[37]—military commanders and convening authorities are guided in the exercise of their disposition discretion only by the non-binding "disposition factors" in the Discussion to R.C.M. 306 and by Article 30(b)'s broad admonition to dispose of charges and specifications "in the interest of justice and discipline."[38] This difference is addressed in greater detail in this Report in the proposal to amend Article 33 (Disposition Guidance).

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 30.1: Amend Article 30 by reorganizing the statute into three subsections: (a) providing the mode of preferring charges and specifications and the oath requirement; (b) providing the required statement of the person who signs the charges; and (c) providing the duty of proper authority to notify the accused of the charges and to dispose of them in the interest of justice and discipline.

- This reorganization of the statutory provisions under Article 30 would clarify the relationship and sequencing of related requirements for preferral of charges and specifications against a military accused, better aligning the statute's provisions with current practice and the President's implementing rules. This will reduce the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area and make the statute clearer and more functional.

Recommendation 30.2: Amend Article 30 by re-sequencing the notification and disposition requirements and providing that both actions take place "as soon as practicable."

- Currently, Article 30(b) requires that commanders take "immediate steps" to determine what disposition should be made of charges and specifications; it then requires them to inform the accused of the charges "as soon as practicable." In practice (and under the Rules for Courts-Martial), this sequence of events is reversed: the accused is notified of the charges as soon as practicable, and only then does the accused's commander or the cognizant convening authority determine how to dispose of the charges. This proposal would align the sequencing of the notification and disposition requirements with current practice.

- As noted in the Discussion to R.C.M. 306(b), "The disposition decision is one of the most important and difficult decisions facing a commander." Although timeliness is critical in military justice, it is not so critical as to require immediacy over thoughtful and deliberate action. Amending the statute so that notification to the accused and disposition of the charges in the interest of justice and discipline are both required "as soon as practicable" would better align these requirements with current practice and reduce the potential for unnecessary litigation in this area.

- The timeliness requirements in Article 30(b) were originally placed in the statute in order address a situation that occurred frequently under the Articles of War: commanders would delay in notifying the accused and disposing of the charges while the accused was in confinement. This was the origin of the "immediate steps" requirement. Since that time, the practices and procedures used to ensure timely processing of cases have evolved, particularly with the introduction of military judges in 1968 and the adoption of R.C.M. 707 (Speedy trial) in 1984. Articles 10 and 33, along with R.C.M. 305, sufficiently ensure that military members in pretrial confinement will have the charges against them disposed of promptly. The "immediate steps" requirement in Article 30(b) is no longer necessary.

Recommendation 30.3: Retain the current procedures for the exercise of disposition discretion based upon the interlocking responsibilities of military commanders, staff judge advocates, and judge advocates.

- The guidance in Article 30(b) and R.C.M. 306 regarding the exercise of the military commander's disposition function in partnership with his or her staff judge advocate (or judge advocate, as the case may be) reflects the ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function, a core guiding document for federal and state prosecutors. This guidance also performs a similar function to the Principles of Federal Prosecution contained in the United States Attorneys' Manual, which effectively guides federal civilian prosecutors in their exercise of prosecutorial discretion.

- Commanders are responsible for instilling and maintaining the level of discipline necessary to ensure accomplishment of the military mission. The issue of whether that responsibility should continue to include the authority to refer cases to courts-martial, or whether that authority should be vested in judge advocates, has been the subject of considerable debate, as reflected in report of the Response Systems Panel, a blue-ribbon advisory committee composed of distinguished non-governmental experts in civilian practice as well as military law.[39] Congress expressly directed the Response Systems Panel to assess the impact of removing disposition authority from the chain of command, focusing on sexual assault cases.[40] The Panel's report, which recommended retention of the commander's role in exercising disposition discretion, includes thoughtful views on both sides of the issue.[41] In view of the extensive testimony and evidence so recently gathered and considered by the congressionally-established Response Systems Panel, the MJRG has focused its efforts on measures to improve the current process, rather than on revisiting the underlying fundamental policy so soon after the Response Systems Panel completed its thorough and careful treatment of the issue.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the MJRG Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a point of departure for the MJRG's baseline reassessment.

- This proposal supports MJRG Operational Guidance by re-emphasizing the critical importance of discipline as a key principle of the military justice system. Furthermore, this proposal would address ambiguities between Article 30 and the rules implementing the statute, reducing the potential for unnecessary litigation and improving the functionality of the mechanisms and procedures associated with charging and disposition of offenses.
- This proposal is related to the sections in this Report discussing Article 34 (Advice of staff judge advocate and reference for trial) and the proposed amendments to Article 33 (Disposition Guidance).

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 601. CHARGES AND SPECIFICATIONS.

Section 830 of title 10, United States Code (article 30 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended to read as follows:

"§830. Art. 30. Charges and specifications

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Charges and specifications—

"(1) may be preferred only by a person subject to this chapter; and

"(2) shall be preferred by presentment in writing, signed under oath before a commissioned officer of the armed forces who is authorized to administer oaths.

"(b) REQUIRED CONTENT.—The writing under subsection (a) shall state that—

"(1) the signer has personal knowledge of, or has investigated, the matters set forth in the charges and specifications; and

"(2) the charges and specifications are true, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the signer.

"(c) DUTY OF PROPER AUTHORITY.—When charges and specifications are preferred under subsection (a), the proper authority shall, as soon as practicable—

"(1) inform the person accused of the charges and specifications; and

"(2) determine what disposition should be made of the charges and specifications in the interest of justice and discipline.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 601 would amend Article 30, which provides basic statutory requirements for the initial signing and swearing of criminal charges against a military accused, and for the disposition of charges and specifications by military commanders and convening authorities exercising various levels of disciplinary authority over persons subject to the Code. By reorganizing Article 30 into three subsections and removing the requirement for commanders to take "immediate steps" to dispose of charges and specifications, the amendments would improve the functionality of the statute and better align the statute's provisions with current practice.

Article 30a (New Provision) – Proceedings Conducted Before Referral

10 U.S.C. § 830a

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would create Article 30a to authorize military judges or military magistrates to consider certain pretrial matters and to make judicial rulings on those matters prior to the referral of charges to a court-martial. The proposed statute would authorize the President to designate the specific pretrial matters that may be considered by a military judge or magistrate prior to referral. The President also would prescribe the procedures for conducting such proceedings, and set forth limitations on available remedies. Article 30a would further authorize the services to establish a military magistrates program. Military magistrates in such a program would be available to preside in pretrial proceedings under Article 30a when designated to do so by a military judge. When designated, magistrates would act on these matters with the full authority of a military judge. The proposed article also would provide for the issuance of regulations for procedures in which military judges could formally review any magistrate rulings. Each service would establish procedures for the detailing of military judges and the designation of magistrates under this program.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

This proposal creates a new article of the UCMJ. Although military judges may be assigned to perform duties in addition to presiding over courts-martial, the UCMJ does not provide an express judicial role for military judges prior to referral of charges.[1] There is no current statutory provision specifically authorizing or describing military magistrates.[2]

3. Historical Background

Before enactment of the UCMJ in 1950, the Articles of War provided for a law member to make legal rulings at a court-martial and for a president of the panel to make administrative and procedural decisions.[3] At the time, courts-martial did not include a military judge. The UCMJ created the position of law officer for all general courts-martial. The law officer was not a member of the panel and did not deliberate or vote on findings or [1] Article 26(c). Under R.C.M. 707(c)(1), the President has provided military judges with the pre-referral authority to exclude pretrial delays for purposes of determining speedy trial issues, if authorized under service regulations.

[2] Under the executive authority governing military search authorizations, the President has provided military judges and non-statutory magistrates the power to issue search authorizations under M.R.E. 315(d)(2), if authorized under Department of Defense or service regulations.

[3] See, e.g., AW 8, 31 of 1920.

the sentence.[4] A decision by a law officer was usually advisory, and the president of the panel had ultimate control over a number of authoritative and procedural decisions.[5]

The Military Justice Act of 1968 established the position of military judge at courts-martial, created independent trial judiciaries within the services, and granted an accused the right to elect a trial by military judge alone, without members.[6] Since 1968, the law and the practice in the military justice system have shifted primary responsibility to military trial judges to preside over all aspects of court-martial procedure.[7]

4. Contemporary Practice

Although military judges have significant authority in presiding over courts-martial, the UCMJ provides no specific statutory role for military judges prior to the referral of charges to a court-martial. Prior to referral, the convening authority makes decisions in certain matters that are then subject to judicial review after charges are referred to a specific court-martial. Examples of legal issues that, under current practice, may require a legal decision prior to referral of charges, include:

- Inquiries into Mental Capacity or Responsibility: Under R.C.M. 706 and current practice, an accused's defense counsel typically makes an initial request for a mental health inquiry to the convening authority. If the convening authority denies the request prior to referral, the defense counsel must wait until referral to request that the court order the inquiry. If the military judge at trial concludes that the convening authority erred in denying the request, the trial is abated until the convening authority ensures the inquiry is complete.

- Depositions: Article 49 and R.C.M. 702 control deposition practice. Under current law, a convening authority may order depositions after preferral of charges, but a military judge has no power to order a deposition until after charges are referred to a court-martial for trial. After referral, either the convening authority or the military judge may order a deposition.

- Search Authorizations: Under M.R.E. 315(d)(1), military commanders have primary authority to authorize probable cause searches conducted in areas over which they have control. There is no UCMJ provision authorizing probable cause searches by military judges or magistrates. M.R.E. 315(d)(2) provides a very limited authority for a military judge or magistrate to authorize a search based on probable cause, but only if authorized by departmental regulations.

- Pretrial Confinement Reviews: R.C.M. 305 sets forth the procedural requirements for holding a servicemember in pretrial confinement. The rule includes a review of the probable cause determination and the necessity of continued confinement within seven days of the imposition of confinement by a "neutral and detached officer appointed in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned." A servicemember is unable to challenge the appropriateness of the pretrial confinement decision or continued confinement before a military judge until a convening authority refers charges, which can occur up to several months after the imposition of pretrial confinement. If the convening authority never refers charges, but instead dismisses the charges after the accused has spent a significant period of time in pretrial confinement, the servicemember has no review of the pretrial confinement decision before a judicial authority. Each service implements R.C.M. 305 in a slightly different manner, based on service regulations.

- Individual Military Counsel: Under Article 38(b)(3)(B), an accused has the right to request representation by a specific military counsel if that counsel is reasonably available. The request is submitted through counsel to the convening authority for decision under R.C.M. 506 and service regulations. Prior to referral, the decision is subject to further administrative review, but judicial review is not available until the case is referred for trial. After referral of charges, an accused may file a motion under R.C.M. 905(b)(6) objecting to denial of the request. If the military judge at trial determines that the convening authority erred in denying the request, the trial may be delayed for a lengthy period of time pending the detail of counsel and an opportunity for counsel to prepare for trial. Prior to referral of charges, an accused may not raise such a motion before a military judge.

- Subpoenas: The issuance of subpoenas is authorized under Articles 46 and 47 and R.C.M. 703. Under current law, the trial counsel is authorized to issue subpoenas for witnesses and for the production of evidence at any time after charges have been referred to court-martial for trial, and before referral of charges in connection with an Article 32 preliminary hearing. Under R.C.M. 703(e)(2)(F), a military judge only becomes involved in the issuance and enforcement of subpoenas when, after referral of charges to court-martial, "a person subpoenaed requests relief on grounds that compliance is unreasonable or oppressive."[8] At that point, the military judge may direct that the subpoena be modified or withdrawn, as appropriate, or may issue a warrant of attachment to compel the attendance of the witness or the production of documents.[9]

[8] This Report proposes amendments to Articles 46 and 47 that would allow military judges to exercise this review authority before referral of charges in the case of subpoenas for the production of evidence (subpoenas duces tecum). Further, the proposed amendments would authorize military judges to issue warrants before referral of charges for the production of stored electronic communications under Chapter 121 of Title 18, United States Code.

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Federal civilian courts are standing courts, as opposed to courts-martial, which are temporary tribunals convened to consider specific cases.[10] After a federal defendant makes an initial appearance under Fed. R. Crim. P. 5, the defendant may file motions with a district court judge on issues that must be addressed prior to arraignment or trial.[11] Pretrial issues for judicial determination may include various motions brought on specific grounds or under the All Writs Act.[12]

The Federal Magistrates Act of 1968 established the magistrate judge system for the federal civilian courts.[13] A federal magistrate judge's jurisdiction and powers are set forth by statute.[14] The local rules in each district outline the specific duties magistrate judges are assigned, and they may act on authority expressly granted by federal district court judges or by consent of the parties.[15]

A magistrate judge's duties vary considerably depending on local rules. In criminal cases, magistrate judges have full authority to preside over trials involving petty offenses and in Class A misdemeanor cases by consent of the parties. Magistrate judges assist in felony preliminary proceedings (search and arrest warrants, summonses, initial appearances, preliminary examinations, arraignments, and detention hearings) and in felony pretrial matters (pretrial motions, evidentiary hearings, probation/supervised release hearings, and guilty plea proceedings). When a federal criminal defendant is placed in pretrial confinement, the defendant has the right to a detention hearing during his initial appearance before a magistrate judge.[16] This hearing determines whether continued

P. 12(b)(3), some motions must be raised before trial, including a motion alleging a defect in instituting the prosecution, a motion alleging defects in the indictment or information, a motion to suppress evidence, and a motion to sever charges or defendants. Other pretrial motions include a motion for depositions (FED. R. CRIM. P. 15), a motion to quash or modify a subpoena (FED. R. CRIM. P. 17), a motion to dismiss an indictment based on lack of legal qualification of a grand jury or juror (FED. R. CRIM. P. 6(b)(2)), a motion to produce a witness statement (FED. R. CRIM. P. 26.2), and a request to issue a search and seizure warrant (FED. R. CRIM. P. 41).

confinement of the defendant before trial is warranted. Either party may seek an immediate de novo review of a detention order before a federal district court judge.[17] A magistrate judge may administer oaths and issue orders pertaining to the setting of bail or detention without authorization from a district judge.[18]

6. Recommendations and Justification

Recommendation 30a: Enact a new Article 30a to provide statutory authority for military judges or magistrates to provide timely review, prior to referral of charges, of certain matters currently subject to judicial review only on a delayed basis at trial.

- Under this proposal, the President would designate in the Manual for Courts-Martial the matters subject to pre-referral judicial review. The President also would set forth the procedures for conducting such review, the specific limitations on the remedies available in such cases, and rules regarding further review of such rulings. As a general matter, the remedies available in pre-referral proceedings would be structured in a manner that would preserve the option for the convening authority to defer action until a decision is made to refer the case to trial by court-martial.

- This change would not relieve commanders from the pretrial responsibilities assigned to them under current law, but would provide for earlier rulings on matters currently subject to later review in courts-martial.

- The opportunity for an earlier ruling by a military judge, including the opportunity for timely corrections prior to referral, would enhance the efficiency of the court-martial process by reducing the number of delays that now result from precluding judicial review until referral of charges. Part II of the Report will propose rules governing the types of matters to be considered by military judges and magistrates, such as motions on requests for individual military counsel, mental competency examinations, depositions, the issuance of subpoenas, and ensuring that the protections afforded to victims under the Military Rules of Evidence are properly enforced in preliminary hearings.

- Allowing for judicial determinations of such matters prior to referral would promote efficiency and also would provide relevant information to the convening authority for consideration in the referral and disposition decision-making process.

- Under this proposal and the related proposals under Articles 19 and 26a, military magistrates would function much like military judges but without the entire scope of responsibilities of a military judge due to their lesser experience and rank. These magistrates would augment the military judiciary and serve to relieve the resource burden on military judges to address myriad pretrial matters. In addition, these duties would serve as a training ground to prepare a military magistrate for certification as a military judge and allow for an assessment as to whether such a certification would be appropriate. The services would have discretion as to whether to employ a magistrate program, consistent with general unified standards as supplemented by their own service specific regulations. Certification and detailing of magistrates would rest with the Judge Advocates General or their designees.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal to create an Article 30a supports the Terms of Reference by incorporating positive aspects of the federal civilian judicial system into the current military justice structure.
- The proposal is related to Article 26, which addresses detailing military judges to referred court-martial cases, and to the proposal to create Article 26a, which would provide qualification requirements for military magistrates similar to those applicable to military judges.
- The proposal to create an Article 30a also is related to proposed changes to Articles 16 and 19, which would provide for referral to a judge-alone special court-martial, with an option for a military magistrate to preside in such trials with the consent of the parties.
- This proposal is consistent with the proposed amendments to Articles 46 and 47 authorizing military judges to issue and review pre-referral subpoenas and warrants.
- This proposal is consistent with the recommendation contained in the Report of The Response Systems to Adult Sexual Assault Crimes Panel, which stated: "It is the sense of the Panel that military judges should be involved in the military justice process at an earlier stage to better protect the rights of victims and the accused."[19]

8. Legislative Proposal

SEC. 602. PROCEEDINGS CONDUCTED BEFORE REFERRAL.

Subchapter VI of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 830 (article 30 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice) the following new section (article):

[19] REPORT OF THE RESPONSE SYSTEMS TO ADULT SEXUAL ASSAULT CRIMES PANEL 49-50 (June 2014) (Recommendation 118).

"§830a. Art. 30a. Proceedings conducted before referral

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) The President shall prescribe regulations for proceedings conducted before referral of charges and specifications to court-martial for trial.

"(2) The regulations prescribed under paragraph (1) shall—

"(A) set forth the matters that a military judge may rule upon in such proceedings;

"(B) include procedures for the review of such rulings;

"(C) include appropriate limitations to ensure that proceedings under this section extend only to matters that would be subject to consideration by a military judge in a general or special court-martial; and

"(D) provide such limitations on the relief that may be ordered under this section as the President considers appropriate.

"(3) If any matter in a proceeding under paragraph (1) becomes a subject at issue with respect to charges that have been referred to a general or special court-martial, the matter shall be transferred to the military judge detailed to the court-martial.

"(b) DETAIL OF MILITARY JUDGE.—The Secretary concerned shall prescribe regulations providing for the manner in which military judges are detailed to proceedings under subsection (a)(1).

"(c) DISCRETION TO DESIGNATE MAGISTRATE TO PRESIDE.—In accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, a military judge detailed to a proceeding under subsection (a)(1) may designate a military magistrate to preside over the proceeding.".

9. Sectional Analysis

Section 602 would create a new section, Article 30a, to authorize military judges to preside over certain pretrial issues that arise prior to referral of charges in a case. The authority under this section would extend only to issues: (1) that would be subject to post-referral review by a military judge at a general or special court-martial; and (2) that are designated expressly by the President as eligible for pre-referral review under this section. To the extent identified by the President in implementing regulations, judicial proceedings under this section could include matters currently reviewed in post-referral proceedings, such as search authorizations; requests for mental competency evaluations, individual military counsel, depositions, and subpoenas; review of pretrial confinement determinations; and enforcing victims' rights in pretrial proceedings under Article 6b. The rules prescribed by the President would set forth the procedures military judges should use under this section, and would limit the available remedies to those expressly identified by the President. Any pre-referral judicial consideration of these select issues would occur after an appropriate authority had the opportunity to take action to resolve them.

Article 30a(c) would allow the detailed military judge to designate a military magistrate to preside over the proceeding. The statute would provide for the creation of regulations by which military judges could formally review a military magistrate's rulings on pretrial matters. In addition to acting on pretrial matters, military magistrates also could preside over special court-martial cases referred as judge-alone trials, as proposed in Article 19, with the parties' consent. See Section 403, supra.

Article 31 – Compulsory Self-Incrimination Prohibited
10 U.S.C. § 831

1. Summary of Proposal

This Report recommends no change to Article 31. Part II of the Report will consider whether changes to the rules implementing Article 31 are needed.

2. Summary of the Current Statute

Article 31 codifies the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination and common law rules concerning involuntary confessions, providing additional statutory protections against coercive interrogations and degrading questions in the military setting. The article contains four subsections. Subsection (a) provides the general privilege: that persons subject to the Code may not compel any person to incriminate himself or to answer any question that might tend to incriminate them. Subsection (b) operationalizes the privilege by prohibiting any person subject to the Code from interrogating or requesting any statement from an accused, or from any other person suspected of an offense, without first advising them of the nature of the accusation, of their right not to make any statement regarding the suspected offense, and that any statement they make may be used against them in a trial by court-martial. Subsection (c) provides an added protection for witnesses before military tribunals, by prohibiting persons subject to the Code from compelling witnesses to make non-material statements, or to produce non-material evidence, that may tend to degrade them. Subsection (d) is the enforcement mechanism for this section and provides that statements obtained in violation of Article 31, "or through the use of coercion, unlawful influence, or unlawful inducement," may not be used as evidence against the person so questioned in trials by court-martial.

3. Historical Background

The law of confessions and self-incrimination in the military setting has changed significantly since the Articles of War were originally adopted in 1775.[1] The 1776 Articles of War explicitly authorized compulsory testimony, declaring that "[a]ll persons called to give evidence, in any cause, before a court-martial, who shall refuse to give evidence, shall be punished for such refusal at the discretion of such court-martial."[2] By 1916, the law against self-incrimination had evolved, and the Articles of War provided a statutory protection against self-incrimination in the context of military court proceedings:

[2] AW, § XIV, art. 6, of 1776.

> No witness before a military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before a military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any questions which may tend to incriminate or degrade him.[3]

The 1917 Manual for Courts-Martial clarified the Fifth Amendment's applicability to servicemembers, stating that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination "applies to trials by courts-martial and is not limited to the person on trial, but extends to any person who may be called as a witness."[4] In 1948, Congress added an additional statutory protection, providing for exclusion of coerced statements and a duty to warn all persons accused of offenses of the right not to make a statement and that any statement made could be used as evidence at a court-martial.[5]

When Congress enacted the UCMJ in 1950, it significantly expanded the protections against self-incrimination in Article 31.[6] The newly enacted statute protected all persons in all situations, not just witnesses during official proceedings.[7] In Article 31(b), Congress extended the warning requirement to any "person suspected of an offense" and added a required warning concerning the nature of the accusation. Finally, under Article 31(d), any statement obtained in violation of the article was now excluded as evidence, regardless of whether or not the statements were "coerced."

In addition to the requirements of Article 31, self-incrimination issues in the military justice system are litigated in light of the requirements of the Fifth Amendment.[8] Given the critical role of confessions and admissions in both civilian and military proceedings, a well-developed and evolving body of case law exists in connection with Article 31 and the related constitutional and regulatory provisions.[9]

[3] AW 24 of 1916. Prior to 1916, aspects of the right against self-incrimination existed in law and practice. For example, in 1878, Congress made it clear that a military accused did not have to take the stand, and no comment could be made about an accused's failure to do so. See Captain Fredric I. Lederer, Rights Warnings in the Armed Services, 72 MIL. L. REV. 1, 54 (1976) (citing the Act of March 16, 1878, ch. 37, 20 Stat. 30). By 1901, Congress included the proviso that "no witness shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any question which may tend to incriminate or degrade him." Article 31 has changed very little since the UCMJ was enacted in 1950. However, the case law concerning the statute's application has evolved over the years—particularly with respect to Article 31(b)'s warning requirements.[10] Some of the key issues addressed by appellate courts include when warnings must be given and who must warn. Not all conversations with a suspect must be preceded by rights warnings.[11] Warnings must be given before any "official" questioning by a person subject to the Code, or questioning by someone acting as an agent for the military, which might include a civilian, a government employee, or a foreign law enforcement officer.[12]

4. Contemporary Practice

The President has implemented Article 31 through Military Rules of Evidence 301 (Privilege concerning compulsory self-incrimination), 303 (Degrading questions), 304 (Confessions and admissions), and 305 (Warnings about rights). These rules create a procedural framework to protect the right of witnesses against self-incrimination, and to provide guidance to courts and practitioners on the application of Article 31's provisions.[13] The rules generally track the case law concerning the Fifth Amendment and Article 31, though some terms used in the rules are left unspecific given the evolving nature of the case law in the area.[14] The rules have not yet been updated to reflect the most recent developments in the case law concerning Article 31(b).

5. Relationship to Federal Civilian Practice

Military practice and federal civilian practice in the areas of self-incrimination, involuntary confessions, and rights warnings share many commonalities, and the Supreme Court's case law in this area is fully applicable to servicemembers.[15] Civilian practice focuses largely upon case law interpreting the Fifth Amendment, although in Miranda v. Arizona, the Supreme Court specifically looked to Article 31(b) to craft an exclusionary rule to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination during civilian police interrogations.[16] In its decision, the Court held that an individual being questioned by law enforcement "must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed," or else any statement made by the person would be inadmissible against him in a criminal proceeding.[17] Military practice applies Article 31, the Military Rules of Evidence, and the Fifth Amendment. Because both privileges—the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the statutory privilege under Article 31—apply to servicemembers, M.R.E. 301 clarifies that "[t]he privilege most beneficial to the individual asserting the privilege shall be applied" when determining whether to admit an accused's prior statements in a military criminal proceeding.[18]

6. Recommendation and Justification

Recommendation 31: No changes to Article 31.

- The subject of self-incrimination lies at the intersection of constitutional law, statutory articles, and regulatory provisions in an area of intense and ongoing litigation. As such, caution is particularly warranted with respect to statutory changes, lest the attempt to codify existing case law either stifles a subject in which the applicable civilian and military case law is evolving, or in which the introduction of new language would trigger extensive interpretative litigation. The military appellate courts have shown flexibility in adapting Article 31's provisions to changing times and to previously unanticipated factual scenarios. In that context, this Report does not recommend amendments to Article 31.

- Part II of the Report will consider whether any of the regulatory provisions need to be update to ensure consistency with the evolving interpretations of Article 31.

7. Relationship to Objectives and Related Provisions

- This proposal supports the GC Terms of Reference by using the current UCMJ as a baseline for departure. This proposal supports the MJRG's Operational Guidance by not recommending statutory changes in an area where the case law is evolving yet stable, and which would likely lead to additional litigation.

Article 32 – Preliminary Hearing
10 U.S.C. § 832

1. Summary of Proposal

This proposal would focus the preliminary hearing on an initial determination of probable cause prior to referring charges to a general court-martial; require a more comprehensive preliminary hearing report; and provide an opportunity for the government, the defense, and victims to submit additional information at the conclusion of the hearing pertinent to an appropriate disposition of the charges and specifications. The proposal would replace the statute's provision for a "recommendation" on disposition with a requirement for the preliminary hearing officer to analyze and organize the information from the proceeding in a manner designed to better assist the staff judge advocate and the convening authority in fulfilling their respective disposition responsibilities under Articles 30 and 34. Part II of the Report will address changes in the rules implementing Article 32 that would be required as a result of the proposed statutory amendments.

2. Summary of the Current Statute
